Appeal from the United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas
USDC No. 7:16-CV-108-O

Before ELROD, WILLETT, and ENGELHARDT, Circuit Judges.

PER CURIAM:*

Religious medical providers challenged a Department of Health and Human Services 2016 rule prohibiting discrimination on the basis of “termination of pregnancy” and “gender identity.”¹ The providers claimed that the rule violated the Administrative Procedure Act by defining “sex discrimination” inconsistently with Title IX, the statutory basis for the rule. They also claimed that the rule violated the Religious Freedom Restoration Act by forcing them to perform abortions and gender-transition surgeries against their sincerely held religious beliefs. The district court agreed. It vacated the offending provisions of the rule but declined to enter a permanent injunction. The providers timely appealed the denial of injunctive relief.

Since then, the legal landscape has shifted significantly: HHS repealed the 2016 rule and finalized a new rule in 2020;² the Supreme Court interpreted Title VII’s prohibition of “sex discrimination” to include gender identity in Bostock v. Clayton County;³ applying Bostock’s reasoning to Title IX, two district courts entered preliminary injunctions against the 2020 rule and purported to restore certain provisions of the 2016 rule at the center of this case;⁴ President Biden issued an executive order declaring that his administration would apply Bostock's interpretation of Title VII to other statutes prohibiting sex discrimination;⁵ the Department of Justice issued guidance specifically instructing federal agencies to apply Bostock's definition of sex discrimination to Title IX;⁶ and HHS is again considering a new rule.⁷

These developments keep us from reaching the merits of this appeal. Whether the providers are pressing the same claim before us as they did in the district court is unclear, as are the jurisdictional consequences of the evolving state of the law. Indeed, the parties cannot even agree on what kind of relief the district court granted. The Department of Justice simply calls it a “favorable final judgment;” the ACLU calls it a “declaratory judgment;” and the providers call it a “vacatur” of some of the 2016 rule’s provisions.

On appeal, the providers argue that the district court should have granted them injunctive relief against the 2016 rule and the underlying statute, that they still suffer a substantial threat of irreparable harm under the 2016 rule, and that the subsequent developments have only made it clear that an injunction should have been granted in the first place. In response, the

The Walker court specifically disagreed with HHS’s assertion that, after the district court’s judgment in this case, “the sex stereotyping provision ha[s] no real-world effect.” Walker, 480 F. government contends that the case is moot and that the providers never asked the district court for relief against the underlying statute. On remand, the district court should consider these issues, and we express no view as to their relative merits at this time.

We REMAND for further proceedings. If a party to this case later files a notice of appeal, the appeal shall return to this panel.⁸
