UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS
CORPUS CHRISTI DIVISION

Liana Davis,	*
Plaintiff,	*
	*
v.	*	Case No. 2:25-cv-220
	*
Christopher Cooprider, et al.	*
Defendants.	*

RESPONSE TO PLAINTIFF'S MOTION TO DISMISS DEFENDANT CHRISTOPHER COOPRIDER'S COUNTERCLAIMS

TABLE OF CONTENTS

TABLE OF CONTENTS……i

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES……..…iv

I. INTRODUCTION……..……..1

II. ARGUMENT AND AUTHORITIES…..……...…….....1

A. STANDARD OF REVIEW.…….……....1

B. WHY THE MOTION SHOULD BE DENIED…….…...2

1. Malicious Prosecution……..……..2

A. The Criminal Investigations Have Been Closed ……....2
(1) Press Statements by Criminal Investigatory Bodies That the Investigations are Now Closed…….…....2
(2) COOPRIDER's FOIA Request of the CCPD……..2
B. There Can Be No Appeal of the Decision Not to Prosecute……2

2. Intentional Infliction of Emotional Distress……..5

A. Identification of Conduct Qualifying as Extreme and Outrageous …….6
(1) Cases Approving IIED Claims…….7
B. Conduct Causing Emotional Distress Upon Him ……9
C. COOPRIDER's Emotion Distress was Severe ……..11
D. Whether Filing a Groundless Lawsuit is Extreme and Outrageous ……...13

3. Fraud ……....15

A. COOPRIDER did comply with Rule 9(b) and Thompson by pleading fraud with particularity ……...15
B. DAVIS incorrectly complains that COOPRIDER did not plead an injury with the particularity required by Rule 9(b) ……..16
C. DAVIS's Alternative Causation Argument Fails at the Rule 12(b)(6) Stage ……...17
D. DAVIS's Illegitimately Uses Abridged Text Messages to Attempt to Characterize Who Initiated the "Night of Trust ……18
(1) Generally, the Court Must Confine its Rule 12(b)(6) Analysis to the Complaint ……19
(2) The One Exception Recognized by the Fifth Circuit 25 Years Ago Requires the Extraneous Document to Be Central to the Claim…19

(3) Exhibit 32 is Not Central to DAVIS's Claim of Murder, and Therefore, Should Be Stricken from Consideration ...……..21

E. DAVIS's Last Argument That COOPRIDER's Claim Fails The Plausibility Requirement of Twombly and Iqbal Does Not Merit Dismissal ……..21

4. Malice ……23

5. Plaintiffs' Other Requested Remedies ……24

C. LEAVE SHOULD BE GRANTED TO REPLEAD IF NECESSARY……..24

III. CONCLUSION ……25

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

Cases

7X Cattle Co. LLC v. Brandstadt,
Case No. 6:22-CV-00396-JDK-KNM, 2024 WL 4183301 (E.D. Tex. Jul. 22, 2024).....8

Albores v. Dimitri,
Civil Action No. 18-6936, 2025 WL 871601 (E.D. La. Mar. 20, 2025).....15

Amin v. United Parcel Service, Inc.,
66 F.4th 568 (5th Cir. 2023).....12

ASG Chemical Holdings, LLC v. Bisley Int'l, LLC,
Civil Action No. H-23-4333, 2024 WL 5036568 (S.D. Tex. Nov. 18, 2024.....15

Banquete I.S.D. v. Alliance for Community Solutions, Ltd., Civil Action No. 2:22-Cv-00094, 2024 WL 4720290, (S.D. Tex. Sept. 10, 2024).....22

Beecy v. Pucciarelli,
387 Mass. 589, 441 N.E.2d 1035 (1982),.....13

Besser v. Tex. Gen. Land Off., 834 F. 876 (5th Cir. 2020).....11

Blair v. Pride Industries, Inc.,
EP-14-CV-00183-DCG, 2015 WL 11251771 (W.D. Tex. Jan. 27, 2015).....14

Bordenkircher v. Hayes,
434 U.S. 357 (1978) 5

Borneo Energy Sendirian Berhad v. Sustainable Power Corp., 646 F.Supp.2d 860 (S.D. Tex. Aug. 12, 2009).....16

Briceno-Belmontes v. Coastal Bend College,
Civil Action No. 2:20-CV-00114, 2022 WL 673854 (S.D. Tex. Mar. 5, 2022).....10

Bruce,
998 S.W.2d 618 13

Cabot Oil & Gas Corp.,
620 F.Supp.3d 603 (S.D. Tex. 2022) 17

ClaimHub, Inc. v. Universal Risk Ins. Srvs., Inc., Civil Action No. H-10-2841, 2011 WL 13247456 (S.D. Tex. Jul. 25, 2011).....16

Clark County School Dist. v. Breedon,
532 U.S. 268 (2001) 11

Clawson v. Wharton County,
941 S.W.2d 267 (Tex. App. – Corpus Christi-Edinburg Dec. 19, 1996) 5

Collins v. Morgan Stanley Dean Witter,
224 F.3d 496 (5th Cir. 2000) 19, 20

Crotts v. Healey,
2015 WL 5890103 (Tex. App. – Houston [1st Dist.] 2015.....5

Cuvillier v. Taylor, ...
503 F.3d 397 (5th Cir 2007) 2

Dean v. Ford Motor Credit Co.,
885 F.2d 300 (5th Cir. 1989).....7

Delaware County Employees Retirement System v. Cabot Oil & Gas Corp.,
620 F.Supp.3d 603 (S.D. Tex. 2022) 9

Diagnostic Affiliates of Northeast Houston, LLC v. United Healthcare Services, Inc., Civil Action No. 2:21-CV-00131, 2022 WL 214101 (S.D. Tex. Jan. 18, 2022).....17

Forum Subsea Rentals v. Globaltech Offshore,
Civil Action No. H–13–885, 2014 WL 10751177 (S.D. Tex. Sept. 17, 2014) 15

Gaona v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., SA-23-CV-280-FB (HJB), 2025 WL 699353 (W.D. Tex. Feb 13, 2025).....13

Garcia v. LCS Corrections Services, Inc., Civil Action No. C–09–334, 2010 WL 2163284 (S.D. Tex. May 24, 2010).....9

Garcia v. Oceans Healthcare, L.L.C.,
Civil Action No. 2:22-CV-00219, 2023 WL 6393885 (S.D. Tex. Sept. 30, 2023) 11

GTE Southwest, Inc. v. Bruce,
998 S.W.2d 605 (Tex. 1999) 8

Gutierrez v. Corrections Corp. of America,
559 Fed. Appx. 406 (mem) (5th Cir. Apr. 3, 2014) 13

Henderson v. Wells Fargo Bank,
779 F.Supp.3d 910 (S.D. Tex. Mar. 31, 2025) 11

Homesavers Council of Greenfield Gardens, Inc., 70 Mass. App. Ct. 453, 874 N.E.2d 497 (2007) 14

Kafi, Inc. v. Sand Canyon Corp.,
Civil Action No. 3:20-cv-00354, 2022 WL 3084480 (S.D. Tex. Aug. 3, 2022) 1, 16

Katz v. Intel Pharma, LLC,
Civil Action No. H-18-1347, 2018 WL 4701566 (S.D. Tex. Oct. 1, 2018) 16

Kaye v. Lone Star Fund V (U.S.), L.P., 453 B.R. 645 (N.D. Tex. Apr. 26, 2011) 20

Kroger Texas Limited Partnership v. Suberu,
216 S.W.3d 788 (Tex. 2006) 5

Kumar v. Panera Bread Co.,
Case No. 23-20178, 2024 WL 1216562 (5th Cir. Mar. 21, 2024) 8

Ladd v. Polidoro,
424 Mass. 196, 675 N.E.2d 382 (1997) 14

Lee v. Samsung Electronics America, Inc.,
Case No. 4:21-cv-1321, 2023 WL 4240277 (S.D. Tex. Jun. 28, 2023) 18

Lopez v. Don Herring Ltd.,
Civil Action No. 3:16-CV-02663-B, 2018 WL 296063 (N.D. Tex. Jan. 4, 2018) 20

Lormand v. US Unwired, Inc.,
565 F.3d 228 (5th Cir. 2009).....9

Louisiana Oilfield Logistics, LLC v. Flotek Chemistry, LLC,
Civil Action No. H-19-1272, 2020 WL 13240060 (S.D. Tex. Jun. 29, 2020).....16

Luebano v. Office Depot, L.L.C.,
Case No. 22-50767, 2023 WL 4249268 (5th Cir. Jun. 29, 2023).....10

Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife,
504 U.S. 555 (1992).....16

M.D.C.G. v. United States,
Civil Action No. 7:15–CV–552, 2016 WL 6638845 (S.D. Tex. Sept. 13, 2016).....12

Massey v. Massey,
867 S.W.2d 766 (Tex. 1993).....8

Maxim Crude Oil, LLC v. Noil Corp., Inc., Civ. No. 2:21-CV-90, 2021 WL 12320541 (S.D. Tex. Nov. 16, 2021).....2

Medford Co-Operative Bank v. Skerry,
2004 Mass. App. Div. 120, 2004 WL 1853343 (2004).....14

Morgan v, Anthony,
27 S.W.3d 928 (Tex. 2000).....8

Mott's LLP v. Comercializadora, S.A.,
507 F.Supp.3d 780 (W.D. Tex. Dec. 14, 2020).....12

Munoz v. H&M Wholesale, Inc., 926 F.Supp. 596 (S.D. Tex. 1996).....13

Oliveros v. Oliveros,
Case No. 5:23-CV-00402-FB-RBF, 2024 WL 875834 (W.D. Tex. Feb. 13, 2024).....5

Outley v. Luke & Assocs., Inc.,
840 F.3d 212 (5th Cir. 2016).....10

Peavy v. Harman,
37 F.Supp.2d 495 (N.D. Tex. 1999) 13

Peninsula Marine, Inc. v. Principle Industrial Services, LLC,
Civil Action No. 2:23-CV-00104, 2024 WL 5036616 (S.D. Tex. Sept. 30, 2024) 6

Perez v. Brooks County, Texas,
Civil Action No. 2:19-CV-391, 2020 WL 4261253 (S.D. Tex. Jul. 24, 2020) 11

Pierce v. Aircraft Finance Corp. LLC,
512 F.Supp.3d 753 (S.D. Tex. Jan. 8, 2021) 15

Pointeast Pharma Consulting, Inc. v. Lenzing Aktiengesellschaft,
Civil Action No. 4:21-CV-3654, 2024 WL 5048964 (S.D. Tex. Dec. 9, 2024) 16

Polanco v. Innovation Ventures, LLC,
Civil Action No. 7:13-CV-568, 2014 WL 12599332 (S.D. Tex. May 5, 2014) 18

Premier Holdings of Texas, LP v. Sterling Reit, Inc., Case No. A H-04-0916, 2006 WL 2796387 (S.D. Tex. Sep. 26, 2006) 23

Ratliff v. Aransas County, Texas,
948 F.3d 281 (5th Cir. 2020) 11

Rep. & Rec. Adopted by,
2025 WL 696546 (W.D. Tex. Mar. 4, 2025) 13

Rep. & Rec. Adopted in Part & Rejected in Part by, 717 F.Supp.3d 585 (S.D. Tex. Feb. 13, 2024) 18

Rep. & Rec. Appr. by,
2022 WL 4454395 (S.D. Tex. Sept. 23, 2022) 1, 16

Rep. & Rec. Appr. By,
2024 WL 5108450 (S.D. Tex. Dec. 13, 2024 15

Rep. & Rec. Appr. in part, Denied in part,
2025 WL 957598 (S.D. Tex. Mar. 31, 2025) 22

Scanlan v. Texas A& M University,
343 F.3d 533 (5th Cir. 2003).....19

Smith v. MTGLQ Investors, L.P.,
851 Fed. Appx. 514, 514 (Mem) (5th Cir. June 30, 2021).....6

Specialties of Mexico, Inc. v. Masterfoods USA,
Civil Action No. L–09–88, 2010 WL 2488031 (S.D. Tex. Jun. 14, 2010).....15

Spoljaric v. Percival Tours, Inc.,
708 S.W.2d 432 (Tex. 1986).....21

Stewart v. City of Arcola,
Civil Action No. 4:23-cv-04387, 2024 WL 3297361 (S.D. Tex. Jul. 3, 2024).....11

Texas Beef Cattle Co. v. Green,
921 S.W.2d 203 (Tex. 1996.....4

Texas Dept. of Housing and Community Affairs v. Inclusive Communities Project, Inc., 576 U.S. 519, 542 (2015).....11

Tony Gullo Motors I, L.P. v. Chapa,
212 S.W.3d 299 (Tex. 2007). 22

Turner v. Pleasant,
663 F.3d 770 (5th Cir. 2011).....1

Twyman v. Twyman,
855 S.W.2d 619, (Tex. 1993).....7

U.S. ex rel. Steury v. Cardinal Health, Inc.,
625 F.3d 262 (5th Cir. 2010).....24

U.S. ex rel. Thompson v. Columbia/HCA Healthcare Corp.,
125 F.3d 899 (5th Cir. 1997).....15

United States ex rel. BakerRipley v. Kids U US, Inc.,
Civil Action No. 23-cv-1124, 2024 WL 3541499 (S.D. Tex. Jul. 25, 2024).....23

United States ex rel. Porter v. Magnolia Health Plan, Inc., 810 Fed. Appx. 237 (5th Cir. Apr. 15, 2020) 13

U.S. v. Kim,
Criminal No. H-07-406, 2009 WL 29688 (S.D. Tex. Jan. 5, 2009) 14

United States v. Basulto-Reina,
421 Fed. Appx. 349 (5th Cir. Apr. 5, 2011) 14

Walch v. Adjutant General's Dept. of Texas,
533 F.3d 289 (5th Cir. 2008). 19

Western Reserve Medtec Services, LLC v. Stryker Corporation,
Civil Action No. 4:18-CV-2604, 2019 WL 13191641 (S.D. Tex. May 13, 2019) 9

William Marsh Rice University v. Arrowhead Research Corp.
Civil Action No. 14-03496, 2016 WL 3223313 (S.D. Tex. Mar. 8, 2016) 17

Wilson v. Monarch Paper Co.,
939 F.2d 1138 (5th Cir.1991) 7

Xiongen Jiao v. Ningbo Xu,
Case No.: 4:19-cv-01848, 2020 WL 6136265 (S.D. Tex. Jan. 29, 2020) 23

Zytax, Inc. v. Green Plains Renewable Energy, Inc., Civil Action No. H–09–2582, 2010 WL 4702303 (S.D. Tex. Nov. 10, 2010) 16

Rules

5A C. WRIGHT & A. MILLER, FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE: Civil 2d § 1356 (1990) 19
Federal Practice and Procedure § 1291 2
Restatement (Second) of Torts § 46 cmt. d (1965) 7, 8
Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code, § 41.003 23

COMES NOW Counter-Plaintiff Christopher Cooprider ("COOPRIDER") and files this his Response to Plaintiff's Motion to Dismiss COOPRIDER's Counter Claims (Doc. 22).

I. INTRODUCTION

In response to the Complaint (Doc. 1) filed by Plaintiff Liana Davis ("DAVIS"), COOPRIDER filed an Answer and Counterclaims (Doc. 7), alleging malicious prosecution, id., pp. 89-91, ¶¶2(a-g), 3(a-e), 3 and 4, intentional infliction of emotional distress, id., pp. 91-92, ¶¶5-7, fraud, id., p. 92, ¶¶8-9 (referencing ¶¶11-105 supporting factual allegations supporting a cause of action for fraud, which were first discussed in the affirmative defense section earlier), and malice. Id., p. 92, ¶9 (same cross-reference). DAVIS then filed a Motion to Dismiss ("MTD") these Counterclaims under Rule 12(b)(6). COOPRIDER now responds to the MTD herein.

II. ARGUMENT AND AUTHORITIES

COOPRIDER now provides the Court with cases describing the correct standard of review in evaluating a Rule 12(b)(6) motion, the reasons and legal support as to why the MTD should be denied, and a request for permission to replead, if the Court deems that necessary.

A. STANDARD OF REVIEW

DAVIS has moved to dismiss COOPRIDER's counterclaims (Doc. #22). "A motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6) "is viewed with disfavor and is rarely granted." Turner v. Pleasant, 663 F.3d 770, 775 (5th Cir. 2011) (reversing a Rule 12(b)(6) dismissal). This is because "[c]ourts are intended as places of redress" and when motions to dismiss are granted, "they tend to undermine the overarching public policy favoring merits-based disposition." Kafi, Inc. v. Sand Canyon Corp., Civil Action No. 3:20-cv-00354, 2022 WL 3084480, at *10 (S.D. Tex. Aug. 3, 2022) (Edison, M.J.) (Appx. 1), Rep. & Rec. Appr. by, 2022 WL 4454395 (S.D. Tex. Sept. 23, 2022) (Brown, J.) (Appx. 2). As such, "[t]o survive a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss, a complaint "does not need detailed factual allegations," but must provide the "grounds for entitlement to relief" with facts that when assumed to be true "raise a right to relief above the speculative level." Cuvillier v. Taylor, 503 F.3d 397, 401 (5th Cir 2007), citing Twombly, 550 U.S. at 545. As this Court has told the parties here, Rule 8 says that "[e]ach [pleading] must be simple, concise, and direct." (Doc. 17). Moreover, "[T]hose portions of Rule 9 that require specific or detailed allegations should not be construed in an unduly strict fashion." Kafi, at 9, citing 5A CHARLES A. WRIGHT & ARTHUR R. MILLER, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1291 (4th ed.) (Appx. 3).

This Court has properly observed that to defeat a motion filed under FRCP 12(b)(6), "'a complaint must contain sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to 'state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.'" Maxim Crude Oil, LLC v. Noil Corp., Inc., Civ. No. 2:21-CV-90, 2021 WL 12320541, at *4 (S.D. Tex. Nov. 16, 2021) (Morales, J.) (Appx. 4). A claim is facially plausible "when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Id., citing Iqbal & Twombly.

B. WHY THE MOTION SHOULD BE DENIED

COOPRIDER now provides specific reasons why each of the five (5) arguments made by DAVIS in her MTD should be rejected, with authorities supporting this response.

1. Malicious Prosecution

DAVIS moves to dismiss the malicious prosecution claim because "the proceedings that Ms. Davis has initiated against him have not terminated" and because COOPRIDER cannot state a claim "until after he prevails and after all appeals are exhausted." (Doc. 22, p. 1). Yet the exhibits authenticated by Exhibit 1, the Declaration of Mikal Watts, demonstrate termination has occurred.

(A) The Criminal Investigations Have Been Closed

While DAVIS's counsel said on September 2, 2025 that COOPRIDER would be "held to account … in the upcoming criminal proceedings," (Doc. 24, p. 2), it now appears that Plaintiff's counsel's press announcement concerning "the upcoming criminal proceedings" was just fiction, and that the criminal investigations initiated by his client has already been terminated.

(1) Press Statements by Criminal Investigatory Bodies That the Investigations are Now Closed

In an article published on August 12, 2025, but unknown to COOPRIDER at the time, the CCPD told the Washington Times[1] that it and the Nueces County District Attorney's Office had closed the investigation back on May 28, 2025, "as unfounded."

On August, 14, 2025 again, Madeline Vaugh, a spokeswoman for the CCPD told The New York Times that "the investigation was subsequently closed as unfounded."[2]

Moreover, after COOPRIDER's Counterclaim was filed on September 3, 2025 (Doc. 7), NBC News reported that the CCPD "declined to recommend criminal prosecution after investigating her claims," "told NBC News that there are no active investigations involving Cooprider," said that "an investigator with more than a dozen years of experience as a detective 'conducted an extremely thorough investigation' into DAVIS' claim that she was drugged and that the investigation was closed as unfounded," and "stands by the results of this investigation and is confident that any honest and objective third-party review would reach a similar conclusion."[3]

After DAVIS's attorney indicated on September 4, 2025, to the New York Magazine's online publication called INTELLIGENCER that COOPRIDER "will be held to account for what

---

[1] Exhibit 1-A - Swoyer, Alex, Texas who was eight weeks pregnant files wrongful death suit after man drugs her with abortion pills, THE WASHINGTON TIMES, August 12, 2025. https://www.washingtontimes.com/news/2025/aug/12/texan-sues-marine-drugging-abortion-pills-killing-baby/.

[2] Exhibit 1-B - Petri, Alexandra E., Woman Claims Marine Laced Her Drink With Abortion Pills, THE NEW WORK TIMES, August 14, 2025. https://www.nytimes.com/2025/08/14/us/marine-abortion-pills-lawsuit-texas.html.

[3] Exhibit 1-C - Chan, Melissa, Marine files countersuit against Texas woman who claims he spiked her drink with abortion pills, NBC NEWS, Sept. 4, 2025. https://www.nbcnews.com/news/us-news/marine-files-countersuit-texas-woman-claims-spiked-drink-abortion-pill-rcna229088.

he did, both in this civil suit and in the upcoming criminal proceedings,"[4] COOPRIDER's attorney immediately prepared and filed a Motion for Limited Stay (Doc. 11).

Finally, on September 5, 2025, at 8:25 p.m., after DAVIS's attorney's statement concerning "the upcoming criminal proceedings," AUTONOMY NEWS updated its prior story dated September 3, 2025 "with statements from the Corpus Christi Police Department and the Naval Criminal Investigative Service," with the CCPD "confirm[ing that] it has 'no open or active investigations involving these individuals at this time,'" and the Naval Criminal Investigative Service (NCIS), saying: 'I can confirm that the NCIS investigation has been closed.'"[5]

(2) COOPRIDER's FOIA Request of the CCPD

After learning of these statements to the press reported, COOPRIDER issued a Freedom of Information Act ("FOIA") request on the CCPD and the Nueces County D.A.'s office. No materials received suggest anything but a closed investigation.

(B) There Can Be No Appeal of the Decision Not to Prosecute

Despite extrajudicial press statements by her lawyer, DAVIS provides no indication in filings before this Court that there is an ongoing criminal investigation (Docs. 22-24). Nonetheless, DAVIS cites Texas Beef Cattle Co. v. Green, 921 S.W.2d 203, 208 (Tex. 1996) for the proposition that the Court "should dismiss the malicious-prosecution counterclaim under Rule 12(b)(6)" because COOPRIDER "cannot state a claim for malicious-prosecution until after he prevails and after all appeals are exhausted." (Doc. 22, p. 1).

---

[4] Exhibit 1-D - Carmon, Irin, The Explosive Lawsuit Challenging a Right-Wing Abortion-Pill Story, INTELLIGENCER, September 5, 2025. https://nymag.com/intelligencer/article/christopher-cooprider-sues-over-abortion-pill-allegation.html.

[5] Exhibit 1-E - Henderson, Garnet & Rinkunas, Susan, Texas Man Accused of Putting Abortion Pills in Partner's Drink Claims She Made It Up, Countersues for $100 million, AUTONOMY NEWS, September 3, 2025, 7:10 p.m. https://www.autonomynews.co/texas-man-accused-of-putting-abortion-pills-in-partners-drink-claims-she-made-it-up-countersues-for-100-million/.

The Supreme Court says, "the decision whether or not to prosecute, and what charge to file or bring before a grand jury, generally rests entirely in [the prosecutor's] discretion." Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 U.S. 357, 364 (1978). While DAVIS may not like the CCPD's decision not to recommend charges, nor that of prosecutors not file a criminal case, she has no appeal therefrom. See Clawson v. Wharton County, 941 S.W.2d 267, 272 (Tex. App. – Corpus Christi-Edinburg Dec. 19, 1996), reh'g overruled (Jan. 16, 1997), writ denied (Mar. 26, 1998), reh'g of writ of error overruled (May 14, 1998) ("The act … complain[ed of] - the decision not to prosecute – is the quintessential function of a prosecutor."). See also Crotts v. Healey, 2015 WL 5890103, at  2-3 (Tex. App. – Houston [1st Dist.] 2015), rev. denied (Feb. 26, 2016), reh'g of petition for review denied (April 8, 2016), cert denied, 580 U.S. 868 (2016) (Appx. 5) (same).

DAVIS has no right to appeal the decision not to prosecute, so Texas Beef does not delay COOPRIDER's malicious prosecution claim "until after he prevails on all appeals are exhausted." DAVIS's motion to dismiss COOPRIDER's malicious prosecution claim should be denied now.

2. Intentional Infliction of Emotional Distress

COOPRIDER filed a counterclaim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). (Doc. 7, § V(B), pp. 91-92), yet DAVIS argues he "has failed to state a claim," citing Kroger Texas Limited Partnership v. Suberu, 216 S.W.3d 788, 796 (Tex. 2006). (Doc. 22, § II, p. 2).

But Kroger has been held to be distinguishable in the context of a Rule 12(b)(6) motion. Kroger involved a plaintiff acquitted of shoplifting suing a store owner for IIED, contending that the store "knowingly provided false information to police so that an innocent person is prosecuted. Kroger, 216 S.W.3d at 291, 296. In Oliveros v. Oliveros, Case No. 5:23-CV-00402-FB-RBF, 2024 WL 875834 (W.D. Tex. Feb. 13, 2024) (Farrer, M.J.) (Appx. 7), Rep. & Rec. Appr. by, 2024 WL 874145 (W.D. Tex. Feb. 29, 2024) (Biery, J.) (Appx. 8), the Court denied a Rule 12(b)(6) motion, distinguishing Kroger and noting that the Kroger court "found that such behavior would be sufficiently extreme and outrageous if the evidence supported it." Id. at *11, citing Kroger, 216 S.W..3d ay 796. See also Kroger, at 796 ("Suberu, however, argues that knowingly providing false information to police so that an innocent person is prosecuted for shoplifting is extreme and outrageous. …[W]e are inclined to agree that Suberu's premise is sound.").

Moreover, Kroger reviewed on appeal a jury verdict in favor of the shopper. The standard concerning of that appellate court's post-verdict review is much different than this Court's role in considering a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6). The Kroger court reviewed trial court evidence; this Court must review factual allegations in a Complaint, "accepting all well-pleaded facts as true and viewing those facts in the light most favorable" to COOPRIDER at this stage of the proceedings. See Smith v. MTGLQ Investors, L.P., 851 Fed. Appx. 514, 514 (Mem) (5th Cir. June 30, 2021) (per curiam) (unpublished) (Appx. 9); Peninsula Marine, Inc. v. Principle Industrial Services, LLC, Civil Action No. 2:23-CV-00104, 2024 WL 5036616, at 2, 4 & n.6, 8, 10, 12, 14 (S.D. Tex. Sept. 30, 2024) (Morales, J.) (Appx. 10) (same).

Here, COOPRIDER has alleged DAVIS knew her allegations to be untrue. Doc. 7, p. 5, ¶13(b-c)); p. 5, ¶13(b-c)); p. 5, ¶¶14-3, 4, 14(g); p. 6, ¶14(h); p. 7, ¶¶21, 22; p. 8, ¶27; p. 11, fn. 6; p. 27, fn. 23; p. 38, ¶104; p. 60, ¶180. As such, this Court should deny a Rule 12(b)(6) dismissal, as Judge Biery did in Olivares, and for the additional reasons discussed below.

DAVIS next moves to dismiss COOPRIDER's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) "for four separate and independent reasons". (Doc. 22, § II, p. 2).

(A) Identification of Conduct Qualifying as Extreme and Outrageous

DAVIS first argues that COOPRIDER "has not identified the conduct of Mr. Davis that qualifies as 'extreme and outrageous'." (Doc. 22, § II(A), pp. 2-3).

1. Cases Approving IIED Claims

DAVIS identically quotes four times[6] from Twyman v. Twyman, 855 S.W.2d 619, 621 (Tex. 1993) (quoting Restatement (Second) of Torts § 46 cmt. d (1965) (Appx. 11)), which is the Supreme Court of Texas case adopting the IIED tort for Texas 32 years ago.

Before Twyman, the Fifth Circuit twice affirmed IIED judgments based on conduct similar to that of DAVIS's here involving threats of criminal charges. First, the Fifth Circuit in 1989 denied the appeal of a defendant who "contends that the district court erred in denying its Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss the plaintiff's emotional distress claim." Dean v. Ford Motor Credit Co., 885 F.2d 300, 301 (5th Cir. 1989). Second, in 1991, that court affirmed a jury verdict in favor of the plaintiff's IIED claim in Wilson v. Monarch Paper Co., 939 F.2d 1138 (5th Cir.1991).

In Dean, the plaintiff presented evidence that her supervisor intentionally placed checks in her purse to put her in fear of criminal charges for theft. Dean, 885 F.2d at 304, 306–07. In affirming the jury's verdict in favor of the plaintiff over the defendant's challenge, the Fifth Circuit held that the "check incidents ... [were] precisely what [took] this case beyond the realm of an ordinary employment dispute and into the realm of an outrageous one." Id.

In Wilson, the plaintiff presented sufficient evidence to support the jury's verdict in his favor by showing that the defendant, as part of a plan to get rid of older employees, tried to force plaintiff, a 60–year–old executive, to resign. Wilson, 939 F.2d at 1145. Age discrimination was held to be within the "realm of an ordinary employment dispute." id., at 1144–45, but also assigning janitorial duties to an executive in order to humiliate him into resigning was "outrageous conduct" that took the case "out of the realm of an ordinary employment dispute." Id., at 1145.

[6] Doc. 22, p. 2, p. 3 and p. 5 (twice).

In Twyman, the Supreme Court of Texas adopted Section 46 of the Restatement (Second) of Torts. Id., at 621-22 ("Today we become the forty-seventh state to adopt the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress as set out in § 46(1) of the RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS."). The Twyman court noted that Section 46 "expressly includes situations in which the actor recklessly inflicts emotional distress," and advised that on retrial, the jury may consider whether [the Defendant] acted recklessly toward [the Plaintiff]." Id., at 624. That mere reckless conduct will suffice for an IIED claim in Texas federal court has been observed by the Fifth Circuit as well. Kumar v. Panera Bread Co., Case No. 23-20178, 2024 WL 1216562, at *4 (5th Cir. Mar. 21, 2024) (per curiam) (unpublished) (Appx. 12) ("intentional infliction of emotional distress can be established through merely reckless conduct…," citing Twyman).

Since Twyman, Texas courts have reiterated the viability of IIED as a tort in Texas. See Massey v. Massey, 867 S.W.2d 766 (Tex. 1993) (denying writ of error of IIED judgment); GTE Southwest, Inc. v. Bruce, 998 S.W.2d 605 (Tex. 1999) (affirming IIED judgment for Plaintiff); Morgan v, Anthony, 27 S.W.3d 928 (Tex. 2000) (reversing summary judgment on IIED claim).

COOPRIDER's Counterclaim alleges mendacious conduct by DAVIS knowingly designed to lure him in so that she could frame him for murder. Doc. 7, p. 5, ¶13(b-c)); p. 5, ¶13(b-c)); p. 5, ¶¶14-3, 4, 14(g); p. 6, ¶14(h); p. 7, ¶¶21, 22; p. 8, ¶27; p. 11, fn. 6; p. 27, fn. 23; p. 38, ¶104; p. 60, ¶180; p. 91, ¶2(d). This well-pleaded conduct by DAVIS easily qualifies as "extreme and outrageous," see Bruce, 998 S.W.2d at 613-14 (reciting evidence of threatening employment status," threatening "he was in a position to get even" as certainly justify an order denying dismissal at the Rule 12(b)(6) pleadings stage). See 7X Cattle Co. LLC v. Brandstadt, Case No. 6:22-CV-00396-JDK-KNM, 2024 WL 4183301, at *5 (E.D. Tex. Jul. 22, 2024) (Mitchell, M.J.) (Appx. 13), Rep. & Rec. Appr. by, 2024 WL 3950677 (E.D. Tex. Aug. 27, 2024) (Kernodle, J.)

(Appx. 14) ("A jury could plausibly find this conduct demonstrates the "extreme and outrageous" standard required for an IIED claim.").

(B) Conduct Causing Emotional Distress Upon Him

With no citation to even a single case here other than global references to Iqbal and Twombly here, DAVIS argues second that COOPRIDER "has not properly alleged that Ms. Davis's actions inflicted 'emotional distress' upon him." (Doc. 22, § II(B), pp. 3-4). But because "the question of causation is a fact question for the jury," at the 12(b)(6) stage, the facts alleged by COOPRIDER, "presumed to be true, raise a fact issue regarding proximate cause and preclude dismissal." Western Reserve Medtec Services, LLC v. Stryker Corporation, Civil Action No. 4:18-CV-2604, 2019 WL 13191641 (S.D. Tex. May 13, 2019) (Bryan, M.J.) (Appx. 15).

COOPRIDER must allege only a "facially plausible" causal relationship between DAVIS's actions and harm to him, i.e., only "enough facts to give rise to a reasonable hope or expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of the foregoing elements of loss causation." Lormand v. US Unwired, Inc., 565 F.3d 228, 258 (5th Cir. 2009), citing Twombly. A court is "not authorized or required to determine whether the plaintiff's plausible inference of loss causation is equally or more plausible than other competing inferences." Delaware County Employees Retirement System v. Cabot Oil & Gas Corp., 620 F.Supp.3d 603, 633 (S.D. Tex. 2022) (Rosenthal, C.J.).

This can be done through temporal proximity alone. In Garcia v. LCS Corrections Services, Inc., Civil Action No. C–09–334, 2010 WL 2163284 (S.D. Tex. May 24, 2010) (Crane, J.) (Appx. 16), a court in the Corpus Christi Division of the Southern District of Texas denied a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6) contending that the "'seven bare-boned allegations of negligence and one-sentence generic allegation of causation' fail to state a facially plausible claim for relief against this Defendant." Sitting in this very courthouse, the Court rejected this argument, reasoning,

> The hospital discharged Mr. Gacia with instructions given to continue his medications. Shortly thereafter, he died. Against the "framework" of Plaintiff's allegations of negligence in the provision of medical treatment to Mr. Garcia, and proximate cause, these factual allegations are enough to state a facially plausible claim for relief against Dr. Pendleton, allegedly the physician at the prison at the time of Mr. Garcia's death.

Id., at *4. "[I]t is enough … to plead adequate facts that allow us to draw a reasonable causation inference: and this can be done by pleading "temporal proximity that is quite tight." Luebano v. Office Depot, L.L.C., Case No. 22-50767, 2023 WL 4249268, at *5 (5th Cir. Jun. 29, 2023) (per curiam) (unpublished) (Appx. 17) (reversing dismissal when complaint alleged facts demonstrating separation of only weeks between Defendant's action and Plaintiff's harm); Outley v. Luke & Assocs., Inc., 840 F.3d 212, 219 (5th Cir. 2016) (about two months' difference is close enough to show a prima facie causal connection). See also Briceno-Belmontes v. Coastal Bend College, Civil Action No. 2:20-CV-00114, 2022 WL 673854, at *7 (S.D. Tex. Mar. 5, 2022) (Tipton, J.) (Appx. 18) (denying dismissal when only four months lapsed).

COOPRIDER alleged that on the evening of "April 5, 2025, with her children sleeping upstairs" already, DAVIS put alcohol in her drink," Doc. 7, p. 46, ¶131. Plaintiff's Complaint suggests she drank hot chocolate approximate 30 minutes before she claims to have begun hemorrhaging "shortly before midnight" (Doc. 1, p. 22, ¶50), meaning she would have drank hot chocolate shortly before 11:30 p.m. Less than two hours later, at 1:24 a.m., DAVIS "arrived at the emergency room" "at the hospital," (Doc. 1, p. 27, ¶67) when she says she turned the evidence "over to the Corpus Christi police." (Doc. 1, p. 27-28, ¶¶70-71). Thus, DAVIS's own pleading suggests that less than three hours later, she accused COOPRIDER of murder. This "quite tight" temporal relationship of only a few hours is – by itself – sufficient to draw a reasonable causation inference" under the Fifth Circuit's holding in Luebano. This is far tighter than a timeline of "just a few days" that a Judge in this courthouse said supported causation. See Perez v.

Brooks County, Texas, Civil Action No. 2:19-CV-391, 2020 WL 4261253 (S.D. Tex. Jul. 24, 2020) (Gonzales Ramos, J.) (Appx. 19) ("it is clear from the allegations that the [harm alleged] followed" fewer than "just a few days after the [activity], which is sufficient to support causation").

As such, this is not a discrimination case with a "robust causality requirement, Texas Dept. of Housing and Community Affairs v. Inclusive Communities Project, Inc., 576 U.S. 519, 542 (2015), nor a complaint alleges that "a failure to train" fails to "support a plausible causation inference, see Ratliff v. Aransas County, Texas, 948 F.3d 281, 285 (5th Cir. 2020), nor where the Counterclaim "fails to plausibly allege that Defendant's actions or omissions proximately caused Plaintiff's harm" and therefore "cannot pass 12(b)(6) muster based on causation." See Henderson v. Wells Fargo Bank, 779 F.Supp.3d 910, 918 (S.D. Tex. Mar. 31, 2025) (Morales, J.) (Appx. 20).

Here, "the close temporal proximity in this case" between DAVIS's actions and harm to COOPRIDER are alone "enough to satisfy the low 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss standard." Stewart v. City of Arcola, Civil Action No. 4:23-cv-04387, 2024 WL 3297361, at *3 (S.D. Tex. Jul. 3, 2024) (Hanen, J.) (Appx. 21); Garcia v. Oceans Healthcare, L.L.C., Civil Action No. 2:22-CV-00219, 2023 WL 6393885, at *6 (S.D. Tex. Sept. 30, 2023) (Tipton, J.) (Appx. 22) (denying 12(b)(6) motion on causation, citing Besser v. Tex. Gen. Land Off., 834 F. 876, 884 & n. 30 (5th Cir. 2020) (per curiam)) (citing Clark County School Dist. v. Breedon, 532 U.S. 268, 273 (2001) ("very close" temporal proximity is "sufficient evidence of causality to establish a prima facie case").

(C) COOPRIDER's Emotional Distress was Severe

DAVIS argues third that COOPRIDER "has not properly alleged that the emotional distress that Ms. Davis inflicted was 'severe'." (Doc. 22, § II(C), p. 4). While Rule 12(b)(6) relates to cause of action," it does not reference damages. Though DAVIS tries to have Iqbal and Twombly require the pleading of "facts showing that his emotional distress was 'severe,'" she does so by citing to Rule 8(a)(2) which requires only "a short and plain statement of the claim." But COOPRIDER met that under Rule 8(a)(2), Doc. 7, p. 92, ¶ 6(d), and under Rule 8(a)(3) ("monetary damages, mental anguish and reputational damage."). Id, p. 92, ¶ 7, even though the rule exempts from the effect of failing to deny matters "relating to the amount of damages." FRCP 8(b)(6).

Damages severity is not an appropriate matter for pleadings practice, as is evidenced by DAVIS's failure to cite any Rule 12(b)(6) case on this issue. A court in this District permitted this claim to proceed past Rule 12(b)(6) practice. M.D.C.G. v. United States, Civil Action No. 7:15–CV–552, 2016 WL 6638845, at *12 (S.D. Tex. Sept. 13, 2016) (Crane, J.) (Appx. 23) (citing Twyman and denying Rule 12(b)(6), observing "the Court will allow Plaintiffs' intentional infliction of emotional distress claim, as limited, to proceed" after reciting allegations of post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD), that "none of the injuries they sustained were accidental," and that defendant's conduct "will remain mental scars years after physical injuries diminish." Because "damages are remedies, not causes of action, a Rule 12(b)(6) motion is an improper vehicle for dismissing these specific requests for relief." Mott's LLP v. Comercializadora, S.A., 507 F.Supp.3d 780, 791 (W.D. Tex. Dec. 14, 2020) (Ezra, J.).

The extent of damages, see Rule 26(a)(1)(A)(iii), requiring initial disclosure of a computation of each category of damages claimed, is a matter to be adjudicated after discovery, see Rule 55(b)(2)(B) (the court needs to "determine the amount of damages."). The Fifth Circuit case granting dispositive relief in an intentional infliction of emotional distress case concerning "sever[ity]," did so only at the summary judgment phase after discovery was conducted, but not at the Rule 12(b)(6) phase. See Amin v. United Parcel Service, Inc., 66 F.4th 568, 572 (5th Cir. 2023) (noting that three of four causes of action were dismissed under Rule 12(b)(6), but not Count 3 for intentional infliction of emotional distress; and noting that the issue of whether emotional distress is "severe" has been handled at the Rule 56 stage. Id., n. 1 ("As with any factual issue subject to Rule 56, federal courts can and have found that certain allegations do not constitute severe emotional distress as a matter of law. See, e.g., Peavy v. Harman, 37 F.Supp.2d 495, 523 (N.D. Tex. 1999), aff'd in part and rev'd in part on other grounds, 221 F.3d 158 (5th Cir. 2000), cert. denied, 521 U.S. 1051 (2001)."). This makes sense because the Peavy noted that "[i]t is also significant that plaintiffs were not required to seek help from a mental health professional. This further militates against a finding of 'severe emotional distress.'" Cases deciding whether the bar has been reached are those evaluating the evidence developed in discovery, as the Rule 56 summary judgment stage. See Gaona v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., SA-23-CV-280-FB (HJB), 2025 WL 699353, at *9 (W.D. Tex. Feb 13, 2025) (Bemporad, M.J.) (Appx. 24), Rep. & Rec. Adopted by, 2025 WL 696546 (W.D. Tex. Mar. 4, 2025) (Biery, J.) (Appx. 25); Munoz v. H&M Wholesale, Inc., 926 F.Supp. 596, 613 (S.D. Tex. 1996). Cf., Bruce, 998 S.W.2d at 618-19.

(D) Whether Filing a Groundless Lawsuit is Extreme and Outrageous

DAVIS argues fourth that "the act of filing a lawsuit does not qualify as 'extreme and outrageous' conduct, even if the person filing the lawsuit knows that it is groundless." (Doc. 22, § II(D), pp. 4-6). This argument wrongly suggests that COOPRIDER's IIED claim relies only on the filing of this lawsuit. That is untrue. Furthermore, the single case DAVIS could find in support of this argument - Beecy v. Pucciarelli, 387 Mass. 589, 596, 441 N.E.2d 1035, 1040 (1982), cited at p. 5 of Doc. 22 - does not help her for two reasons.

First, Beecy is from Massachusetts, not binding on this Court located in the Fifth Circuit. See, e.g., United States ex rel. Porter v. Magnolia Health Plan, Inc., 810 Fed. Appx. 237, 242, n. 7 (5th Cir. Apr. 15, 2020) (unpublished) (Appx. 26); Gutierrez v. Corrections Corp. of America, 559 Fed. Appx. 406, 408 (mem) (5th Cir. Apr. 3, 2014) (unpublished) (Appx. 27); United States v.

Basulto-Reina, 421 Fed. Appx. 349 (5th Cir. Apr. 5, 2011) (unpublished) (Appx. 28). See U.S. v. Kim, Criminal No. H-07-406, 2009 WL 29688, at *1 (S.D. Tex. Jan. 5, 2009) (Rosenthal, J.) (Appx. 29). See also Blair v. Pride Industries, Inc., EP-14-CV-00183-DCG, 2015 WL 11251771, at *3, n. 2 (W.D. Tex. Jan. 27, 2015) (Guaderrama, J.) (Appx. 30). In Dean, by contrast, the Fifth Circuit affirmed the denial of a Rule 12(b)(6) motion when the plaintiff alleged that the defendant took actions "to put her in fear of criminal charges for theft," Dean, 885 F.2d at 304, 306–07. Here, DAVIS actually followed through and took steps to pursue criminal charges for murder, which surely qualifies as conduct supporting an IIED claim under the precedent provided in Dean.

Second, Beecy is distinguishable, as the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court in Ladd v. Polidoro, 424 Mass. 196, 199, 675 N.E.2d 382, 385 (1997) flat out restricted Beecy as only requiring a filing plus an ulterior motive under its caselaw, noting that "[a] reasonable argument can be made that the Beecy opinion overstated the consistency with which this court has announced a requirement of proof of an ulterior motive (see id., at 596, 441 N.E.2d 1035), but it cannot be doubted that our Beecy opinion proclaimed that an ulterior motive is an element of the tort of abuse of process in all instances." Courts reviewing Beecy have further restricted its application. In Homesavers Council of Greenfield Gardens, Inc., 70 Mass. App. Ct. 453, 874 N.E.2d 497 (2007), the Court noted "[t]he facts underlying Beecy... on which the landlord relies, which cases held that the mere filing of a lawsuit is not extreme and outrageous conduct, fell far short of the level to which the behavior of the landlord sank in the present case."). Id., at 503-04. Likewise, in Medford Co-Operative Bank v. Skerry, 2004 Mass. App. Div. 120, 2004 WL 1853343, at *4 (2004) (Appx. 31), the Court noted Beecy, but said that "proof of ill will, bad intentions, or knowledge that a claim is groundless … is relevant in proving ulterior or illegitimate purpose."

3. Fraud

Over 34 pages, COOPRIDER supplied detailed factual allegations constituting fraud. (Doc. 7, pp. 4-38). While conceding that when "Cooprider's 94-page pleading hurls many accusations" at DAVIS, they must "be assumed true when deciding a motion to dismiss" (Doc. 22, p. 2), DAVIS nonetheless offers three arguments in support of her MTD with respect to the fraud claim.

(A) COOPRIDER did comply with Rule 9(b) and Thompson by pleading fraud with particularity

DAVIS initially cites U.S. ex rel. Thompson v. Columbia/HCA Healthcare Corp., 125 F.3d 899, 903 (5th Cir. 1997) as a fraud pleading floor (Doc. 22, p. 6), but "Rule 9(b)'s application is context-specific, however, and "[d]epending on the claim, a plaintiff may sufficiently 'state with particularity the circumstances constituting fraud or mistake' without including all the details of any single court-articulated standard—it depends on the elements of the claim at hand." ASG Chemical Holdings, LLC v. Bisley Int'l, LLC, Civil Action No. H-23-4333, 2024 WL 5036568 (S.D. Tex. Nov. 18, 2024 (Bray, M.J.) (Appx. 32), Rep. & Rec. Appr. By, 2024 WL 5108450 (S.D. Tex. Dec. 13, 2024 (Lake, J.) (Appx. 33). "Minimal" factual allegations will do if they provide the "Defendant with notice of the nature and specifics of the fraud claim against it." Specialties of Mexico, Inc. v. Masterfoods USA, Civil Action No. L–09–88, 2010 WL 2488031, at *8 (S.D. Tex. Jun. 14, 2010) (Alvarez, J.) (Appx. 34).

Nonetheless, COOPRIDER did comply with both Rule 9(b) and Thompson, as follows:

- COOPRIDER alleged the "who" to be DAVIS. (Doc. 7, p. 5, ¶13(a)); see Albores v. Dimitri, Civil Action No. 18-6936, 2025 WL 871601, at *4 (E.D. La. Mar. 20, 2025) (Milazzo, J.) (Appx. 35);

- COOPRIDER alleged the "what" to be DAVIS's lie on January 31, 2025, Doc. 1, p. 3, ¶33; and February 3, Doc. 7, p. 5, ¶13(a & b); see Forum Subsea Rentals v. Globaltech Offshore, Civil Action No. H–13–885, 2014 WL 10751177, at *8 (S.D. Tex. Sept. 17, 2014) (Hittner, J.) (Appx. 36); and her representation to him that he was invited over for cocoa as part of a "night of trust" when she intended to frame him for murder. (Doc. 7, pp. 6-7, ¶14(3)–(j)); see Pierce v. Aircraft Finance Corp. LLC, 512 F.Supp.3d 753, 767 (S.D. Tex. Jan. 8, 2021) (Eskridge, J.); see also Pointeast Pharma Consulting, Inc.

v. Lenzing Aktiengesellschaft, Civil Action No. 4:21-CV-3654, 2024 WL 5048964, at *5 (S.D. Tex. Dec. 9, 2024) (Hanen, J.) (Appx. 37);

- COOPRIDER alleged the "when" as the February 3, 2025 representation that she was pregnant. Doc. 7, p. 5, ¶13(a) and April 4, 2025, when she lured him to her place for the proverbial "night of trust." Id., pp. 6-7, ¶14(3)–(j)); see Katz v. Intel Pharma, LLC, Civil Action No. H-18-1347, 2018 WL 4701566, at *4 (S.D. Tex. Oct. 1, 2018) (Rosenthal, J.) (Appx. 38); see also Borneo Energy Sendirian Berhad v. Sustainable Power Corp., 646 F.Supp.2d 860 (S.D. Tex. Aug. 12, 2009) (Rosenthal, J.);

- COOPRIDER alleged the "where" to be via text message on February 3, 2025. Doc. 7, p. 5, ¶13(a), and at her home on April 5, 2025. Id., pp. 6-7, ¶14(3)–(j); see Kafi, Inc. v. Sand Canyon Corp., Civil Action No. 3:20-cv-00354, 2022 WL 3084480 (S.D. Tex. Aug. 3, 2022) (Edison, M.J.) (Appx. 39), Rep. & Rec. Appr. by, 2022 WL 4454395 (S.D. Tex. Sept. 23, 2022) (Brown, J.) (Appx. 40); see also Louisiana Oilfield Logistics, LLC v. Flotek Chemistry, LLC, Civil Action No. H-19-1272, 2020 WL 13240060, at *4 (S.D. Tex. Jun. 29, 2020) (Rosenthal, C.J.) (Appx. 41);

- COOPRIDER alleged the "how" to be her text message representation to him that she was pregnant on February 3, 2025. Doc. 7, p. 5, ¶13(a), and that she orally induced him on April 4, 2025, when she to lured him to her place for the proverbial "night of trust." Id., pp. 6-7, ¶14(3)–(j); see ClaimHub, Inc. v. Universal Risk Ins. Srvs., Inc., Civil Action No. H-10-2841, 2011 WL 13247456, at *4 (S.D. Tex. Jul. 25, 2011) (Rosenthal, J.) (Appx. 42); see also Zytax, Inc. v. Green Plains Renewable Energy, Inc., Civil Action No. H–09–2582, 2010 WL 4702303, at *8 (S.D. Tex. Nov. 10, 2010) (Rosenthal, J.) (Appx. 43).

In sum, COOPRIDER's detailed pleading meets the requirements of Thompson.

(B) DAVIS incorrectly complains that COOPRIDER did not plead an injury with the particularity required by Rule 9(b)

DAVIS writes that COOPRIDER "does not explain any injury that Cooprider might have suffered with the particularity required by Rule 9(b)." (Doc. 22, p. 7). At this pleading stage, "general factual allegations of injury resulting from the defendant's conduct may suffice, for on a motion to dismiss we presum[e] that general allegations embrace those specific facts that are necessary to support the claim." Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 561 (1992); "[W]hen the plaintiff is himself an object of the action (or foregone action) at issue there is ordinarily little question that the action or inaction has caused him injury, and that a judgment preventing or requiring the action will redress it." Id., at 561-62. Moreover, "[t]he Fifth Circuit has held that the Rule 8(a) and 12(b)(6) plausibility pleading standard, not heightened pleading, is sufficient to plead loss causation." Cabot Oil & Gas Corp., 620 F.Supp.3d 603, 632 (S.D. Tex. 2022) (Rosenthal, C.J.) (quoting Lormand). Pleadings as those here alleging a fraudulent statement by one party inducing a response from another are sufficient. See Diagnostic Affiliates of Northeast Houston, LLC v. United Healthcare Services, Inc., Civil Action No. 2:21-CV-00131, 2022 WL 214101, at *12 (S.D. Tex. Jan. 18, 2022) (Gonzales Ramos, J.) (Appx. 44) (rejecting argument that Plaintiff company "has not pled sufficient facts to show that acts caused its alleged injury," noting that the complaint alleging that the complained of conduct was "designed to" create a response created a " link between at least some of the conduct complained of and some of the injuries sustained is sufficiently direct to support proximate causation and survive Rule 12(b)(6) review."); William Marsh Rice University v. Arrowhead Research Corp., Civil Action No. 14-03496, 2016 WL 3223313, at *5 (S.D. Tex. Mar. 8, 2016) (Gilmore, J.) (Appx. 45) (denying dismissal of fraud claim over causation argument, because in "[v]iewing the pleadings in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, Defendants' alleged actions induced Rice…"). COOPRIDER too alleged specific facts that DAVIS's fraud caused his injury. (Doc. 7, p.5, ¶14(3); p. 5, p. 91, ¶3(d) ("Having already miscarried on April 4, 2025, Counter-Defendant DAVIS set up Counter-Plaintiff COOPRIDER by inviting him to her home – "the scene of the crime that wasn't" – for a daily later on April 5, 2025, the day after she had already likely miscarried her unborn child.").

(C) DAVIS's Alternative Causation Argument Fails at the Rule 12(b)(6) Stage

DAVIS initially argues that her lie to him that she was pregnant causing COOPRIDER to purchase abortion pills on February 6, 2025, could not have inflicted injury on COOPRIDER because he "would have purchased those abortion pills in response to DAVIS's actual pregnancy because he wanted to kill any unborn child that he conceived with DAVIS." Doc. 22, pp. 6-7, and says that because " he would have wound up purchasing anyway," the consequence of her lie therefore "does not qualify as an injury." This argument fails for three distinct reasons.

First, the causation link is properly pleaded by COOPRIDER. (Doc. 7, pp. 5-6, ¶ 14).

Second, the Court must accept COOPRIDER's allegation concerning causation. See Lee v. Samsung Electronics America, Inc., Case No. 4:21-cv-1321, 2023 WL 4240277, at *16 (S.D. Tex. Jun. 28, 2023) (Palermo, M.J.) (Appx. 46), Rep. & Rec. Adopted in Part & Rejected in Part by, 717 F.Supp.3d 585, 589-91 (S.D. Tex. Feb. 13, 2024) (Ellison, J.)(because "the Court must accept as true Plaintiffs' allegations…," "[t]he Court finds that Plaintiffs have sufficiently alleged reliance and causation"); Polanco v. Innovation Ventures, LLC, Civil Action No. 7:13-CV-568, 2014 WL 12599332, at *2 (S.D. Tex. May 5, 2014) (Crane, J.) (Appx. 47) (Complaint "offer[s] a theory of causation that the Court cannot simply assume to be implausible.").

Third, DAVIS's argument that causation doesn't exist because he would have bought the pills anyway is one for a jury, not now when the Court must accept as true COOPRIDER's factual allegations as pled. Borneo, 646 F.Supp.2d at 868-69, and "liberally construe the complaint in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, with every doubt resolved in the plaintiff's favor, dismissal is proper only if it "appear[s] beyond doubt that [COOPRIDER] can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief." Kafi, Inc., at *3.

(D) DAVIS's Illegitimately Uses Abridged Text Messages to Attempt to Characterize Who Initiated the "Night of Trust"

Knowing that COOPRIDER's pleaded allegation that DAVIS "made a material representation to Defendant COOPRIDER, that he should come over to her home for a 'night of trust' over hot cocoa and alcohol, when she intended to frame him with false allegations that he poisoned her," (Doc. 7, ¶ 14), DAVIS casts doubt on this allegation anyway with use of an extraneous text message. (Doc. 22, pp. 7-8, citing Exhibit 32 to her complaint) and a footnote citation to Walch v. Adjutant General's Dept. of Texas, 533 F.3d 289, 294 (5th Cir. 2008).

(1) Generally, the Court Must Confine its Rule 12(b)(6) Analysis to the Complaint

A Rule 12(b)(6) motion ... only tests whether the claim has been adequately stated in the complaint." 5A C. WRIGHT & A. MILLER, FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE: Civil 2d § 1356 at 298 (1990) (Appx. 48). The Fifth Circuit long held that a court's Rule 12(b)(6) review is to be confined to the pleadings.[7]

(2) The One Exception Recognized by the Fifth Circuit 25 Years Ago Requires the Extraneous Document to Be Central to the Claim

In 2000, the Fifth Circuit permitted, over no objection, documents attached to be considered in the Rule 12(b)(6) context, Collins v. Morgan Stanley Dean Witter, 224 F.3d 496, 498-99 (5th Cir. 2000), when the court noted approving that "various other circuits have specifically allowed that "[d]ocuments that a defendant attaches to a motion to dismiss are considered part of the pleadings if they are referred to in the plaintiff's complaint and are central to her claim." Id., at 498-99 (citing three circuit courts). Three years later in Scanlan v. Texas A& M University, 343 F.3d 533, 536 (5th Cir. 2003), that Court stated this Court "has recognized one limited exception" in Collins, and noted that "[i]n approving the district court's consideration of the documents attached to the motion to dismiss, this Court restricted such consideration to documents that are referred to in the plaintiff's complaint and are central to the plaintiff's claim." While the Walch

[7] 35 years ago, "[a] court which considers a motion for a 12(b)(6) or 12(c) dismissal must look only at the pleadings and accept all allegations in them as true," St. Paul Ins. Co. of Bellaire, Texas v. AFIA Worldwide Ins. Co., 937 F.2d 274, 279 (5th Cir. 1991), cert. denied, 502 U.S. 1030 (1992); 34 years ago, "We may not look beyond the pleadings," McCartney v. First City Bank, 970 F.2d 45, 47 (5th Cir. 1992); 32 years ago, "We may not go outside the pleadings," Colle v. Brazos County, Texas, 981 F.2d 227, 243 (5th Cir. 1993); 26 years ago, "This court will not look beyond the face of the pleadings to determine whether relief should be granted based on the alleged fact," Spivey v. Robertson, 197 F.3d 772, 774 (5th Cir. 1999).

opinion in 2008 admittedly failed to cite Collins, both the Fifth Circuit[8] and district courts within it[9] have continued to insist that such extraneous documents be central to the claims made in the petition to which they are attached. As Judge Barbara Lynn of the Northern District of Texas ably observed in striking exhibits proposed for consideration during a Motion to Dismiss in Kaye v. Lone Star Fund V (U.S.), L.P., 453 B.R. 645, (N.D. Tex. Apr. 26, 2011) (Lynn, J.), > [T]he case law suggests that documents are central when they are necessary to establish an element of one of the plaintiff's claims. … However, if a document referenced in the plaintiff's complaint is merely evidence of an element of the plaintiff's claim, then the court may not incorporate it into the complaint…. The Court does not read Walch as an expansion of the "limited exception" recognized in Collins and reinforced in Scanlan; rather, the Court reads Walch as presenting an entirely different situation that is not applicable….

Id., at 662-663. In Lopez v. Don Herring Ltd., Civil Action No. 3:16-CV-02663-B, 2018 WL 296063 (N.D. Tex. Jan. 4, 2018) (Boyle, J.) (Appx. 56), the Court cited Walch, but said,

---

[8] See Breton Energy, L.L.C. v. Mariner Energy Resources, Inc., 764 F.3d 394 (5th Cir. 2014) (this letter is referenced in the complaint and central to Appellants' claims); Lone Star Fund V (U.S.), L.P. v. Barclays Bank PLC, 594 F.3d 383, 387 (5th Cir. 2010) (citing Collins v. Morgan Stanley Dean Witter, 224 F.3d 496, 498-99 (5th Cir. 2000)) ("The court's review is limited to the complaint, any documents attached to the complaint, and any documents … that are central to the claim and referenced by the complaint."); In re Katrina Canal Breachers Litigation, 495 F.3d 191, 205 (5th Cir. 2007) (because the contracts referred to in the complaints were "central to the plaintiffs' claims, we may consider the terms of the contracts in assessing the motions to dismiss.").

[9] See Kent Distributors, Inc. v. Travelers Casualty and Surety Co. of America, 693 F.Supp. 726, 730 (W.D. Tex. 2023); Lin v. Veritex Community Bank, N.A., Civil Action No. H-20-1904, 2021 WL 3831986, at *3 (S.D. Tex. Jan. 4, 2021) (Atlas, J.) (Appx. 49); Enventure Global Technology, Inc. v. Weatherford, U.S., L.P., Civil Action No. H-19-2397, 2020 WL 6146565, at *1 (S.D. Tex. Oct. 2, 2020) (Atlas, J.) (Appx. 50); IIITec, Ltd. v. Weatherford Technology Holdings, LLC, Civil Action No. H-19-3386, 2019 WL 7037744, at *2 (S.D. Tex. Dec. 20, 2019) (Atlas, J.) (Appx. 51); Balcerowicz v. Sweetin, Civil Action No. H-12-0310, 2017 WL 1474093, at *2 (S.D. Tex. Apr. 6, 2017) (Ellison, J.) (Appx. 52); American General Life Ins. Co. v. Mickelson, Civil Action No. H–11–3421, 2012 WL 1355591, at *2 (S.D. Tex. Apr. 18, 2012) (Ellison, J.) (Appx. 53); Cortez v. Pharia L.L.C., Civil Action No. H–10–5068, 2011 WL 2455724 (S.D. Tex. May 18, 2011) (Stacy, M.J.) (Appx. 54). See also 5B CHARLES ALAN WRIGHT & ARTHUR R. MILLER, FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE § 1357, at 376 (3d ed. 2004) (Appx. 55).

> Nor can the Court consider the emails on the ground that they are central to Lopez's claim. Here, the emails on which Herring relies are like the report in Scanlan and unlike a contract in a contract case. Like the report the district court improperly considered in Scanlan, the emails Herring wants the Court to consider are "merely evidence," Kaye, 453 B.R. at 662; they do not give rise to Lopez's claim in the way a contract gives rise to a contract claim. Though the emails may be relevant, probative evidence in Lopez's case, they are not legally necessary for Lopez to prevail…. Thus, the Court declines to incorporate the emails….

Id., at 5. As such, Walch is distinguishable because the two documents allowed to be considered in Walch were "incident to his military service," id., at 293-94, or "central" to his claim. Exhibit 32 is not central to DAVIS's claim. Even if it were, and therefore considered by this Court, at most it creates a fact issue inappropriate for adjudication at this stage of the proceedings.

(3) Exhibit 32 is Not Central to DAVIS's Claim of Murder, and Therefore, Should Be Stricken from Consideration

Exhibit 32 is admittedly admissible at a later stage, but it is because it is merely evidentiary. Exhibit 32 is not "necessary to demonstrate" murder under Kaye, nor "legally necessary" for DAVIS to win under Lopez. As such, Exhibit 32 should be stricken from consideration.

(E) DAVIS's Last Argument That COOPRIDER's Claim Fails The Plausibility Requirement of Twombly and Iqbal Does Not Merit Dismissal

DAVIS's last argument is that "[i]t is implausible to believe that DAVIS intended to "frame" Cooprider for murder when she had no way of knowing or controlling whether or when she would begin hemorrhaging." Doc. 22, p. 9. This argument fails for four reasons.

First, this court can examine all the circumstances to determine plausibility and fraudulent intent. As the Supreme Court of Texas observed in Spoljaric v. Percival Tours, Inc., 708 S.W.2d 432 (Tex. 1986), "[s]ince intent to defraud is not susceptible to direct proof, it invariably must be proven by circumstantial evidence. 'Slight circumstantial evidence' of fraud, when considered with the breach of promise to perform, is sufficient to support a finding of fraudulent intent." Id., at 435; see also Tony Gullo Motors I, L.P. v. Chapa, 212 S.W.3d 299, 305 (Tex. 2007). Consequently, this Court approved language earlier this year saying, a "breach combined with slight circumstantial evidence of fraud is" sufficient to support a finding of fraudulent intent." Banquete I.S.D. v. Alliance for Community Solutions, Ltd., Civil Action No. 2:22-Cv-00094, 2024 WL 4720290, at *4 (S.D. Tex. Sept. 10, 2024) (Libby, M.J.) (Appx. 57), Rep. & Rec. Appr. in part, Denied in part, 2025 WL 957598 (S.D. Tex. Mar. 31, 2025) (Morales, J.).[10] Consequently, the Court must examine fraudulent intent by assuming as true each of the accusations COOPRIDER "hurls" at DAVIS over his "94-page pleading." (Doc. 7, p. 2).

Second, COOPRIDER alleges that DAVIS miscarried earlier – certainly by the day before the alleged fetal murder – than when she staged the alleged cocoa poisoning. (Doc. 7, p. 41, ¶127(g &h); p. 50, ¶142; pp. 57-61, ¶174-182; pp. 68-69, ¶188; p. 91, ¶2(c & d)). The plausibility that she negligently (or intentionally) induced a spontaneous abortion of her unborn child is set forth in 18 pages and 70 paragraphs of very detailed factual allegations of her contributory negligence. (Doc. 7, pp. 42-70, ¶¶120-190). The detailed, scientifically supported, fact allegations therein demonstrate not merely plausibility, but an epidemiological probability, that DAVIS induced her own miscarriage prior to or on April 4, 2025, when she asked COOPRIDER to come to her home for a night of trust that ended up being recorded inches away from a pre-staged cocoa cup.

Third, the "plausibility requirement" of Twombly and Iqbal is not intended to circumvent the jury's role to resolve fact disputes in civil cases enshrined in the Seventh Amendment of the United States Constitution ("In Suits at common law, … the right of trial by jury shall be preserved."). See Premier Holdings of Texas, LP v. Sterling Reit, Inc., Case No. A H-04-0916, 2006

[10] This came not from Banquete quoting Barge v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., Civil Action No. 1:23-CV-00189, 2024 WL 2520324, at *6 (E.D. Tex. Mar. 28, 2024) (Truncale, J.) (Appx. 58), but from Aquaplex, Inc. v. Rancho La Valencia, Inc., 297 S.W.3d 768, 775 (Tex. 2009) (per curiam) cited in Barge. Aquaplex, of course, is the case DAVIS cites to begin her assault on COOPRIDER's fraud claim. (Doc. 22, p. 6).

WL 2796387, at *5 (S.D. Tex. Sep. 26, 2006) (Gilmore, J.) (Appx. 59) ("Intent is a fact question uniquely within the realm of the trier of fact.").

Fourth, DAVIS's fraudulent intent in setting up COOPRIDER may be inferred by her conduct subsequent to the invitation for cocoa. Aquaplex, 297 S.W.3d at 775 ("intent … may be inferred from the party's subsequent acts after the representation is made.").

- The fact that she recorded the event by pre-placing a recording device right next to the cocoa (Doc. 7, p. 28, fn. 25; ¶79; p. 91, ¶2(e)). See United States ex rel. BakerRipley v. Kids U US, Inc., Civil Action No. 23-cv-1124, 2024 WL 3541499, at 6-7 (S.D. Tex. Jul. 25, 2024) (Rosenthal, J.) (Appx. 60) (detailing use of alternative device and means to engineer fraud).

- Her persistent spoliation of the evidence, deleting I-Phone data concerning her pregnancy (Doc. 7, p. 41, ¶118), see Xiongen Jiao v. Ningbo Xu, Case No.: 4:19-cv-01848, 2020 WL 6136265, at *2 (S.D. Tex. Jan. 29, 2020) (Ellison, J.) (Appx. 61), and after by discarding the poisoning evidence (Doc. 7, pp. 32-38, ¶103)). See Tony Gullo Motors, 306 ("spoliation of evidence … provides some circumstantial evidence of fraud in that process.").

4. Malice

Because "malice" is one of Texas's "standards for recovery of exemplary damages," Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code, § 41.003, COOPRIDER was right to plead "malice." Like malice, "[f]indings of recklessness or gross negligence would allow exemplary, rather than merely compensatory, damages were the underlying tort of misrepresentation found". Collins, 224 F.3d at 500-01 & n. 6. "Malice" means "a specific intent by the defendant to cause substantial injury or harm to the claimant," Id., § 41.001(7), and COOPRIDER will prove it so that "exemplary damages may be awarded*." Id*., § 41.003(a). Consequently, DAVIS's request that "[t]he Court should dismiss the counterclaim for 'malice' under Rule 12(b)(6) is not inappropriate.

5. Plaintiffs' Other Requested Remedies

In his Counterclaim (Doc. 7), COOPRIDER also pleaded for other requested remedies in Sections V(E) (punitive damages), Section V(F) (exceptions to Texas' limitations on exemplary damages), and Section V(G) (amount of damages sought). In her MTD, DAVIS does not suggest dismissal, but rather opines that "none of these qualify as causes of action or claims for relief," but instead are "merely the relief that Cooprider is asking this Court to impose in response to the torts that he has alleged," and then concludes merely that "Cooprider has failed to state a claim with respect to any of those torts, so the court should not consider his requested remedies." (Doc. 33, p. 10). But remedies are not torts, nor appropriate fodder for a Rule 12(b)(6) motion. Mott's LLP, at 791 ("Because "damages are remedies, not causes of action, a Rule 12(b)(6) motion is an improper vehicle for dismissing these specific requests for relief.").

C. LEAVE SHOULD BE GRANTED TO REPLEAD, IF NECESSARY

COOPRIDER and his attorneys took great care to meet the pleading requirements in Rules 8 and 9(b). However, if anything requires remedial work, COOPRIDER invokes FRCP 15(a)(2), and respectfully asks the Court to "freely give leave" to amend a complaint "when justice so requires." U.S. ex rel. Steury v. Cardinal Health, Inc., 625 F.3d 262, 270 (5th Cir. 2010). Given that two defendants have either not been served or have not yet appeared, DAVIS will not be "unduly prejudiced" by such an amendment. Id., at 270-71, citing Griggs v. Hinds Junior Coll., 563 F.2d 179, 180 (5th Cir.1977) (per curiam).

This Court's Order for Conference and Disclosure of Interested Parties (Doc. 4) proposes a schedule with an Amendment of Pleadings deadline of February 17, 2026. So, any amendment will not slow down this case at all. Consequently, if deemed necessary by the Court, COOPRIDER respectfully moves the Court to permit him to replead. Otherwise, this Court should permit a simple repleading of actual termination.

III. CONCLUSION

COOPRIDER respectfully moves the Court to deny DAVIS's Motion to Dismiss and enter the order doing so.

October 28, 2025

Respectfully submitted,

WATTS LAW FIRM LLP

By: /s/ Mikal C. Watts
Mikal C. Watts

WATTS LAW FIRM LLP
Texas State Bar No. 20981820
Federal Bar ID # 12419
mikal@wattsllp.com
811 Barton Springs #725
Austin, Texas 78704
Telephone: (512) 479-0500
Facsimile: (512) 479-0501

ATTORNEY-IN-CHARGE FOR
CHRISTOPHER COOPRIDER

James "Rick" Holstein
LAW OFFICE OF RICK HOLSTEIN, PLLC
Texas State Bar No. 09915150
Federal I.D. No. 426800
rickholstein@mac.com
P.O. Box 331655
Corpus Christi, TX 78463
Telephone: (361) 883-8649
Facsimile: (361) 717-7233

Beth Klein
BETH KLEIN, P.C.
Colorado Bar No. 17477
S.D. Tex. I.D. No. 3934133
beth@bethklein.com
350 Market Street, Suite 310
Basalt, Colorado 81621
Telephone: (303) 448-8884

ATTORNEYS FOR
CHRISTOPHER COOPRIDER

CERTIFICATE OF SERVICE

I certify that on October 28, 2025 I electronically filed the foregoing document(s) and that they are available for viewing and downloading from the Court's CM/ECF system, and that the participants in the case that are registered CM/ECF users will be served electronically by the CM/ECF system. I further certify that a copy of the foregoing document(s) was served via email on all counsel of record.

/s/ Mikal C. Watts
Mikal C. Watts

EXHIBIT 1

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS
CORPUS CHRISTI DIVISION

Liana Davis, Plaintiff,	*
v.	*	Case No. 2:25-cv-220
Christopher Cooprider, et al. Defendants.	*

DECLARATION OF MIKAL C. WATTS

I, Mikal C. Watts, declare the following pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 1746:

1. I am an attorney with the law firm of WATTS LAW FIRM L.L.P. I am the attorney-in-charge for Defendant Chris Cooprider ("COOPRIDER") in the above styled case.

2. I am legally competent to make this declaration. I have personal knowledge and am familiar with the matters stated in this declaration, and the facts contained herein are true and correct.

3. Attached as Exhibit A is a true and correct copy of an article written by Alex Swoyer entitled, Texan who was eight weeks pregnant files wrongful death suit after man drugs her with abortion pills, THE WASHINGTON TIMES, August 12, 2025, accessed on October 28, 2025, and available at https://www.washingtontimes.com/news/2025/aug/12/texan-sues-marine-drugging-abortion-pills-killing-baby/.

4. Attached as Exhibit B is a true and correct copy of an article written by Alexandra Petri entitled, Woman Claims Marine Laced Her Drink With Abortion Pills, THE NEW WORK TIMES, August 14, 2025, accessed on October 28, 2025, and available at. https://www.nytimes.com/2025/08/14/us/marine-abortion-pills-lawsuit-texas.html.

5. Attached as Exhibit C is a true and correct copy of an article written by Melissa Chan entitled, Marine files countersuit against Texas woman who claims he spiked her drink with abortion pills, NBC NEWS, Sept. 4, 2025, accessed on October 28, 2025, and available at https://www.nbcnews.com/news/us-news/marine-files-countersuit-texas-woman-claims-spiked-drink-abortion-pill-rcna229088.

6. Attached as Exhibit D is a true and correct copy of an article written by Irin Carmon entitled, The Explosive Lawsuit Challenging a Right-Wing Abortion-Pill Story, INTELLIGENCER, September 5, 2025, accessed on October 28, 2025, and available at https://nymag.com/intelligencer/article/christopher-cooprider-sues-over-abortion-pill-allegation.html.

7. Attached as Exhibit E is a true and correct copy of an article written by Garnet Henderson and Susan Rinkunas entitled, Texas Man Accused of Putting Abortion Pills in Partner's Drink Claims She Made It Up, Countersues for $100 million, AUTONOMY NEWS, September 3, 2025, 7:10 p.m., accessed on October 28, 2025, and available at https://www.autonomynews.co/texas-man-accused-of-putting-abortion-pills-in-partners-drink-claims-she-made-it-up-countersues-for-100-million/

I declare under penalty of perjury that the foregoing is true and correct.

Executed on October 28, 2025.

/s/ Mikal C. Watts
Mikal C. Watts, Declarant

EXHIBIT 1-A

This is more than 2 months old.

Texan who was eight weeks pregnant files wrongful death suit after man drug with abortion pills

Mifepristone tablets are seen in a Planned Parenthood clinic, July 18, 2024, in Ames, Iowa. (AP Photo/Charlie Neibergall, File) Mifepristone tablets are seen in a ... more >

By Alex Swoyer
The Washington Times
Tuesday, August 12, 2025

A Texas woman is suing her ex-lover and an abortion pill distributor after secretly being given the drug to abort her daughter after the tablets were dissolved in hot chocolate.

Liana Davis filed a wrongful death lawsuit against U.S. Marine Christopher Cooprider, Aid Access and its founder on Monday, arguing they broke Texas law by assisting in an illegal abortion.

"The wrongful-death statute allows surviving parents to sue those who cause the death of an unborn child by a wrongful act, neglect, carelessness, unskillfulness or default," read the complaint, filed in the Southern District of Texas. "Each of the defendants caused the death of Ms. Davis' unborn child through their wrongful acts, which violated the law."

Jonathan Mitchell, the lawyer for Ms. Davis, didn't immediately respond to a request for comment about the uniqueness of the legal battle.

In the 33-page complaint, Ms. Davis alleges Mr. Cooprider harassed her for months to get an abortion when, at eight weeks pregnant, he ordered mifepristone and misoprostol from Aid Access, an Austrian company, and urged her to take the drug.

When she refused, he suggested the two have a night together to rebuild trust, and at that time he mixed the pills in hot chocolate. According to the legal document, he used 10 doses of one of the drugs and left the packaging behind at her home. The prescription was made out to him.

She began hemorrhaging after 30 minutes, and Mr. Cooprider left her on her own to find a ride to the hospital where doctors were unable to save her unborn daughter, whom she had named Joy.

MY TIMES VIEW ALL

Trump doesn't plan to meet Canadian PM Mark Carney during Asia trip, leaving trade in turmoil
Abrego Garcia objects: Don't send me to Liberia
House autopen probe deems Biden's pardons void, asks DOJ to review legality of executive actions

According to the legal complaint, Mr. Cooprider and Aid Access broke Section 171 of Texas' health and safety code regulations by allowing someone other than a Texas-licensed provider to administer abortion drugs, which is a state felony. The complaint also asserts that federal law prohibits the mailing of abortion-inducing drugs.

ADVERTISEMENT

Advertisement

During the Biden administration, the Justice Department permitted the mailing of the drug. However, four states have outlawed it, according to the pro-choice Guttmacher Institute. Texas is one of them.

Texas law also makes abortion a felony unless the woman's life is at risk. A violation can result in two to five years in prison.

A spokesperson from Aid Access didn't immediately respond to a request for comment.

The Corpus Christi Police Department said it assigned a detective to the case who examined all evidence. The results of the probe were shared with the Nueces County District Attorney's Office and it declined to bring criminal charges.

"After careful review, both agencies concluded that the elements of a crime could not be established, and the investigation was subsequently closed as unfounded," a department spokesperson said. "The CCPD stands by the results of this investigation and is confident that any honest and objective third party review would reach a similar conclusion."

ADVERTISEMENT

Advertisement

Mr. Cooprider is a Marine pilot, according to the legal filing. A spokesperson from the U.S. Marine Corps said it knows of the civil lawsuit.

"Training Command is aware of a civil lawsuit involving a student at Marine Aviation Training Support Group 22 at Naval Air Station Corpus Christi, Texas. No further information is available, due to this being a civil matter," the spokesperson told The Washington Times in an email.

Another man in the state was charged for similar conduct and landed behind bars. The Houstonian got 180 days in jail and 10 years' probation after secretly drugging his wife with an abortion pill in an unsuccessful attempt to terminate the pregnancy.

Kelsey Pritchard, communications director for Susan B. Anthony Pro-Life America, said Ms. Davis' boyfriend "poisoned her with 10 doses of the abortion drug."

ADVERTISEMENT

Advertisement

"The drugs he mixed in Davis' hot chocolate ended her child's life and caused her to hemorrhage and need emergency medical attention within 30 minutes. As a nation, we should be horrified by this story and the Biden administration's reckless policy of mail-order abortion drugs that is fueling the rise of this new form of domestic violence," Ms. Pritchard said.

• Alex Swoyer can be reached at aswoyer@washingtontimes.com.

The Washington Times

THREAT STATUS

The world is a pretty scary place. We'll help you navigate the hazards at home -- and over the horizon.

SIGN UP

You may unsubscribe any time.

Copyright © 2025 The Washington Times, LLC. Click here for reprint permission.

Please read our comment policy before commenting.

COOLMEDIA
Premier SSP
Maximizing Revenue
through smarter advertising
Learn More

COOLMEDIA
Franchise Marketing
Done Differently
Learn More

MY TIMES

VIEW ALL

Navy loses two aircraft from USS Nimitz aircraft carrier within 30 minutes

Mamdani's socialist plan to wreck New York City's economy in the name of climate justice

COMMENTARY

Ohio ex-con who fatally punched teen in 2022 faces murder charges in shooting

GOP's Jack Ciattarelli endorsed by Democratic mayors, left-leaning groups in N.J. governor's race

Texas congressman accused of affair with staffer who died from setting herself on fire

For Japan's new leader, the key to connecting with Trump could be a Ford F-150 truck

Trump, Japan PM Takaichi hit it off in Tokyo, sign cooperation agreement on strategic rare earths

Tax the Whites: Mamdani pitches race-based property tax rates for New York City

A U.S. farmer rebellion is brewing

Judge orders Trump officials to stop talking bad about Kilmar Abrego Garcia

Cartels stand to capitalize as Mexico eyes big tobacco tax hike

Trump says he received MRI, raising fresh health questions

Two U.S. Navy fighter pilots shot down over Red Sea

‘He lost us’: Generals, senior officers say trust in Hegseth has evaporated

EXCLUSIVE

LATEST VIDEO

Advertisement

EXHIBIT 1-B

The New York Times https://www.nytimes.com/2025/08/14/us/marine-abortion-pills-lawsuit-texas.html

Woman Claims Marine Laced Her Drink With Abortion Pills

A Texas woman said in a lawsuit that a U.S. Marine got her pregnant and then, after she chose to keep the pregnancy, dissolved abortion pills in her hot chocolate.

Listen to this article · 5:34 min Learn more

By Alexandra E. Petri

Aug. 14, 2025

A Texas woman accused a U.S. Marine in a lawsuit on Monday of lacing her drink with abortion pills, terminating her pregnancy against her wishes.

The woman, Liana Davis, 37, claims that Christopher Cooprider, 34, a U.S. Marine Corps Captain from Arizona who she says impregnated her, secretly dissolved 10 pills of misoprostol, a drug used in medical abortions, in a hot chocolate he made for her on April 5.

She made the accusation in a civil complaint filed in a federal court in Texas.

Shortly after drinking the beverage, the complaint says, Ms. Davis began bleeding and went to the hospital, where she lost her pregnancy.

The lawsuit also names Aid Access, a major seller of abortion pills online, as a defendant. Ms. Davis said in the lawsuit that Mr. Cooprider used Aid Access to obtain the pills. The suit named the founder of Aid Access, the Dutch physician Rebecca Gomperts, as a third defendant.

Mr. Cooprider, a flight student with the U.S. Marines in Corpus Christi, Texas, declined to comment on the lawsuit or say if he had a lawyer.

The U.S. Marine Corps said in a statement that it was aware of a civil lawsuit involving one of its aviation students but that no additional information was available.

In a statement, Dr. Gomperts pointed to Aid Access's role in providing "essential, lifesaving health care" for vulnerable women.

The Dutch physician Rebecca Gomperts, who founded Aid Access, during a demonstration in front of the U.S. Supreme Court in Washington last year. The lawsuit filed by Liana Davis names Aid Access and Dr. Gomperts as defendants. Tom Brenner/The Washington Post, via Getty

Ms. Davis became pregnant by Mr. Cooprider in early 2025, the lawsuit claims. Text messages included in the lawsuit and said to be from Ms. Davis to Mr. Cooprider describe the pregnancy as “unplanned.” In one message she called herself Mr. Cooprider’s “mistress.”

The lawsuit says that Ms. Davis has three children with her husband, with whom she was in divorce proceedings.

According to the messages, Mr. Cooprider told Ms. Davis that he wanted her to have an abortion, even before she had confirmed her pregnancy with a test.

Ms. Davis texted Mr. Cooprider on Jan. 31, 2025, for his thoughts on her possible pregnancy, and he responded, “Get rid of it,” the lawsuit said.

Mr. Cooprider added that the two were not in love or a couple, and that bringing a child into the world would be “messed up,” according to the lawsuit.

On Feb. 3, Mr. Cooprider sent a text message saying that if the pregnancy test was “positive then we need to schedule a clinic visit and get an abortion pill asap,” according to the complaint.

On Feb. 5, Mr. Cooprider texted Ms. Davis and said he was going to order abortion pills for her, according to the complaint, a step it said Ms. Davis opposed. On Feb. 6, Mr. Cooprider purchased pills from Aid Access, according to the lawsuit.

“I’m not OK with you buying something like that w/o my permission,” Ms. Davis wrote him, according to the complaint.

Mr. Cooprider brought the pills to Ms. Davis’s home and repeatedly asked her to take them, according to the lawsuit. Pictures included in the lawsuit show two containers of abortion drugs labeled “Chris Cooprider.”

The text exchanges grew more heated over several weeks, then took an abrupt turn. In early April, the lawsuit says, Mr. Cooprider texted Ms. Davis to propose a "trust building night" where he would make them "warm relaxing tea."

Mr. Cooprider went to Ms. Davis's home on April 5, where he made her a hot chocolate, according to the lawsuit. Ms. Davis was eight weeks pregnant at the time, the lawsuit said.

According to the lawsuit, she began hemorrhaging and cramping within 30 minutes of drinking the beverage.

Mr. Cooprider said he would drive to get Ms. Davis's mother, who lived nearby, the lawsuit said. The plan was that she would mind Ms. Davis's three children, and Mr. Cooprider could then drive Ms. Davis to the emergency room.

But after leaving to get Ms. Davis's mother around 12:10 a.m., Mr. Cooprider stopped responding to calls and texts, and did not pick her up, according to the lawsuit. Screenshots of text messages included in the lawsuit show Ms. Davis repeatedly texting Mr. Cooprider, including one sent at 12:34 a.m. saying: "I'm gushing blood. Please hurry."

Ms. Davis sent her mother money for an Uber just before 1 a.m., around the same time Mr. Cooprider responded to the text messages, the lawsuit said. He apologized and told her he had a flight in the morning, according to the complaint, and then stopped answering.

Before leaving the house, Ms. Davis found the opened packets of pills, the lawsuit said.

A neighbor drove Ms. Davis to a Bay Area hospital's emergency room, where she lost the pregnancy, according to the complaint.

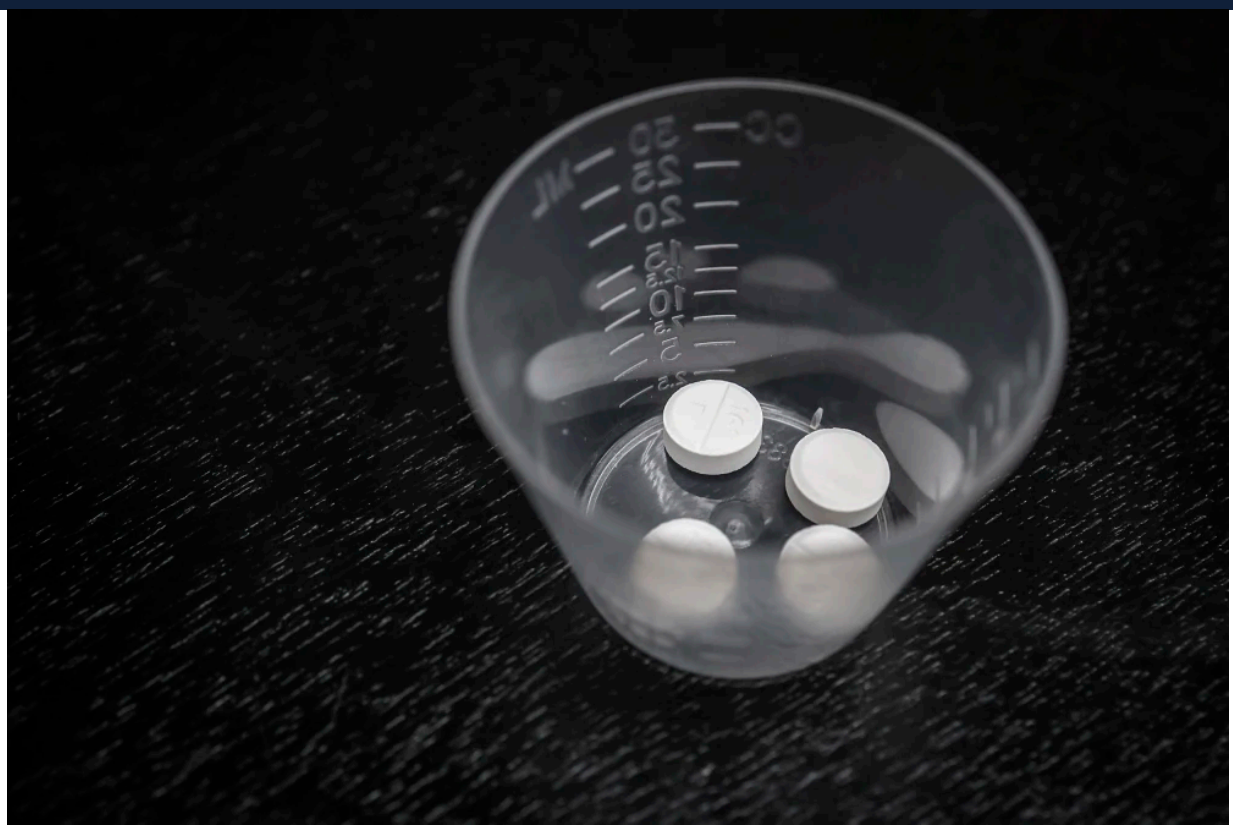
Ms. Davis brought the pill bottles with her to the emergency room and gave them to the Corpus Christi Police Department, according to the lawsuit.

The Police Department said a detective investigated the allegations and shared the results with the Nueces County District Attorney's Office.

"After careful review, both agencies concluded that the elements of a crime could not be established, and the investigation was subsequently closed as unfounded," Madeline Vaughn, a spokeswoman with the department, said in a statement.

Ms. Davis's suit seeks punitive damages from the defendants. It did not give a figure, but said the amount was greater than $75,000.

Sheelagh McNeill contributed research.



A version of this article appears in print on , Section A, Page 14 of the New York edition with the headline: In Lawsuit, Woman Claims a Marine Spiked Her Drink With Abortion Pills

EXHIBIT 1-C

U.S. NEWS

Marine files countersuit against Texas woman who claims he spiked her drink with abortion pills

Capt. Christopher Cooprider has accused the woman of lying and is seeking $100 million in damages.

Misoprostol tablets at a family planning clinic in Rockville, Md., in 2023.

Anna Moneymaker / Getty Images file

Sept. 4, 2025, 5:17 PM CDT

By Melissa Chan

A U.S. Marine who is being sued for allegedly spiking a Texas woman's drink with abortion pills has filed a countersuit, accusing the woman of lying and being personally responsible for a series of failures that killed their unborn child.

Capt. Christopher Cooprider, 34, said he did not drug Liana Davis' drink, causing her pregnancy to end in April, as she alleged in a wrongful death lawsuit filed in federal court last month.

ADVERTISING

Bang & Olufsen - Sponsored

Beoplay H100

When the time comes, don't just give a gift. Give a Bang & Olufsen.

Buy Now

Davis had accused Cooprider of secretly dissolving at least 10 abortion pills into a cup of hot chocolate that he prepared for her on April 5, when she was eight weeks pregnant, after she rebuffed his repeated requests to "get rid of it," her suit said. She said he left her Corpus Christi home that night and stopped responding to her texts when she reached out for help as she profusely bled.

In his countersuit, filed Wednesday in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Texas, Cooprider denied the allegations, saying Davis, 37, intended to frame him with false claims that he drugged her that night.

He alleges in his lawsuit that the pregnancy loss could be attributed to a series of factors, including her age, a sexually transmitted disease, a bacterial infection, alcohol consumption and failure to seek medical help when she experienced heavy cramping earlier.

Cooprider said in the suit that he ordered the abortion pills at Davis' request and gave some of them to her in February, two months before she alleges he drugged her drink, and discarded the rest.

Davis' attorney, Jonathan Mitchell, disputed that claim and said Cooprider ordered the drugs without his client's permission and "in defiance of her explicit instructions."

Mitchell said his team would disprove each of Cooprider's "abject lies" in court.

"Cooprider is guilty as sin and will be held to account for what he did," he said.

Cooprider requested that the court dismiss the woman's lawsuit, adding that the Corpus Christi Police Department declined to recommend criminal prosecution after investigating her claims.

The Corpus Christi Police Department told NBC News there are no active investigations involving Cooprider.

In a statement, the police department said an investigator with more than a dozen years of experience as a detective "conducted an extremely thorough investigation" into Davis' claim that she was drugged and that the investigation was closed as unfounded.

The investigator interviewed Davis, Cooprider, witnesses, hospital medical staff, Davis' OBGYN and the Nueces County Medical Examiner, as well as examined existing evidence and medical records, the department said.

"The results of the investigation were then shared with the Nueces County District Attorney's Office. After careful review, both agencies concluded that the elements of a crime could not be established," it said.

Corpus Christi police said it "stands by the results of this investigation and is confident that any honest and objective third-party review would reach a similar conclusion."

It encouraged media outlets to request further information about the case to file an open records request but denied a request by NBC News on Aug. 19, citing confidentiality laws.

Cooprider is seeking $100 million in damages from Davis, which he pledged to give to the Wounded Warrior Project, a nonprofit that helps ill and injured post-9/11 veterans and service members, according to the suit.

Davis' lawsuit, filed in the same court on Aug. 11, included text messages she alleges the pair exchanged for weeks, beginning Jan. 31, when Davis asked Cooprider for his input in case she is confirmed to be pregnant.

Cooprider said he "would like to get rid of it," the texts show, saying the two were "not in love" or together and that it would be "messed up to bring a child into the world without both parents raising them."

The following text messages cited in Davis' complaint show Cooprider telling Davis, without her approval, that he would order abortion pills online. The pills were purchased from Aid Access, an online service that ships abortion pills from abroad, according to the lawsuit.

Aid Access and Dr. Rebecca Gomperts, a Dutch physician who runs it, are also listed as defendants in the lawsuit. They did not return requests for comment.

On April 2, Cooprider proposed making them "some warm relaxing tea" in what they could call a "trust building night," according to screenshots shared in Davis' lawsuit.

Davis accepted. When the two met up at her home on April 5, Cooprider handed her a cup of hot chocolate shortly before midnight, according to the lawsuit. Within 30 minutes of drinking it, the suit says, Davis began hemorrhaging and cramping.

Davis knew she had to go to the emergency room, but she knew she could not leave her three children who were sleeping upstairs, the suit said. They came up with a plan for Cooprider to pick up Davis' mother, who lived nearby, so she could watch the children while Cooprider took Davis to the hospital, according to the suit.

But once Cooprider left the house, he became unreachable, the suit said.

"I am gushing blood. Please hurry," Davis texted him around 12:30 a.m.

Davis' mother took an Uber ride to her daughter's house around 1 a.m. Around that time, Cooprider apologized and said he had to catch a flight the next day, the suit said.

A neighbor drove Davis to the hospital, where the fetus did not survive, according to the suit.

Back home, Davis said she found the opened box of abortion pills and a pill bottle, which she turned over to the Corpus Christi police, according to the lawsuit. The suit claims Cooprider mixed 10 misoprostol pills into the hot chocolate.

The Marine Corps confirmed that Cooprider is an active-duty captain and a flight student

EXHIBIT 1-D

THE BODY POLITIC

The Explosive Lawsuit Challenging a Right-Wing Abortion-Pill Story

By Irin Carmon, a features writer at New York Magazine

SEPT. 5, 2025

Photo: Anna Moneymaker/Getty Images

Last month, an anti-abortion activist named Jana Pinson gave explosive testimony before a Texas Senate committee in support of HB7, a law that woul state's bounty-hunter abortion law, allowing lawsuits against anyone who facilitates a Texan getting abortion pills, including manufacturers, for up to $ a lawsuit filed that very day by Liana Davis against Christopher Cooprider, accusing him of smuggling abortion pills he ordered online into Davis's hot her pregnancy.

The case soon made international headlines for both its sordid details and its political valences. Like other red states that outlawed abortion as soon as them, Texas has been unable to stop tens of thousands of abortion pills — as many as 12,000 a month, according to the Society of Family Planning — f providers in blue states, where they enjoy protection under "shield laws." (Davis also sued Aid Access, a prominent provider of abortion pills to places v Attorney General Ken Paxton promptly issued cease-and-desist letters to shield providers, citing the Davis case. Meanwhile, the state senate passed HI governor's signature.

But a countersuit filed Thursday by Cooprider claims the sensationalistic drugging never happened. He says Davis had a spontaneous miscarriage, whi conduct, and that she vengefully framed him for a forced abortion. Cooprider is seeking an eyebrow-raising amount in damages — over $1 billion.

"I'm not here to castigate the pro-life position. I consider myself a pro-life individual, but we don't do political advocacy by criminal allegations that are disgusting," Cooprider's attorney, Mikal Watts, told me Thursday. "They used this situation to pass a law that, if it's based on this case, was passed based

Even as initially presented, the case raised questions. Cooprider wasn't criminally charged, even though Texas prosecutors have brought at least two otl accused of similar crimes — one of them for capital murder, which carries the death penalty. A second man was sentenced to 180 days in jail last year a giving his wife abortion pills, though her pregnancy continued.

Davis did go to the cops in Corpus Christi, where she and Cooprider were neighbors, but they declined to bring charges. When reporters asked why, the statement, saying the case had been assigned to a "highly experienced family violence detective" who had "conducted an extremely thorough investigati including an examination of the existing evidence and medical records, and interviews with the complainant, accused, witnesses, hospital medical staff OBGYN, and the Nueces County Medical Examiner." Along with the district attorney, the department said, they "concluded that the elements of a crim established, and the investigation was subsequently closed as unfounded." Unusually, the department added that it "highly encourages any media outle information regarding this case to file an open records request through the Police Department Open Records Unit," though when I filed one, it was dec the information would be "highly intimate or embarrassing" and "not of legitimate concern to the public."

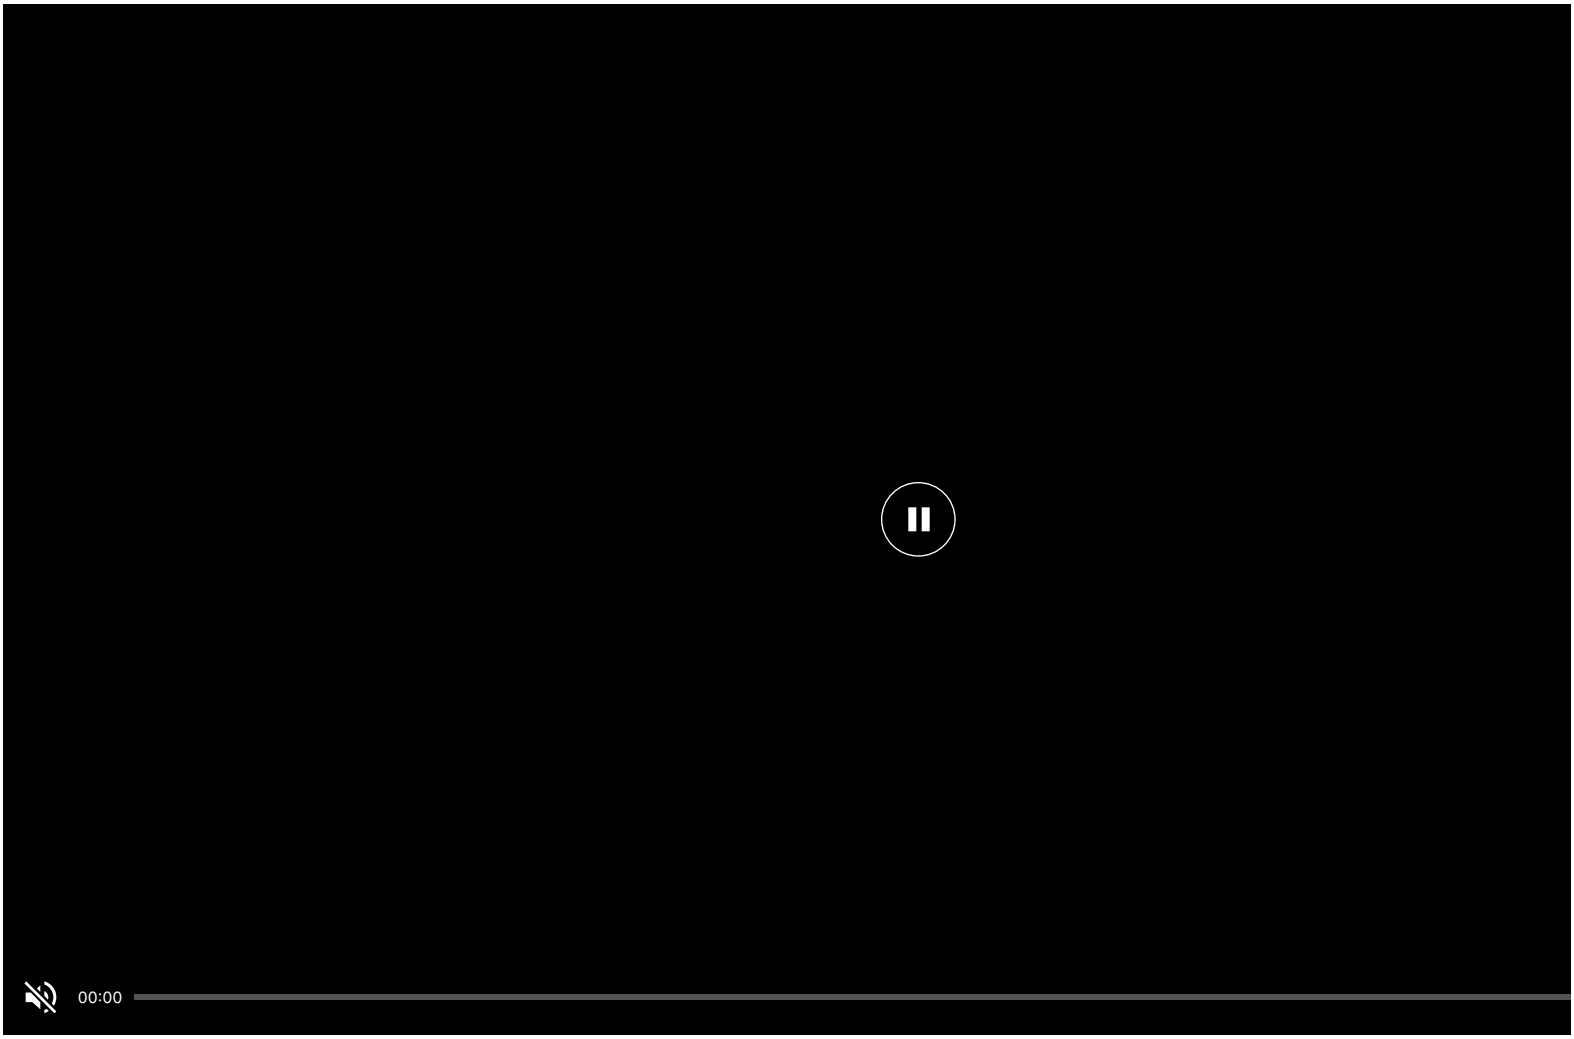
Even in Davis's filing, there are a few hints of uncertainty about the pregnancy's viability. She includes text messages that show that weeks before the h both Cooprider and Davis expressed doubts as to whether the fetus was still alive.

Cooprider's 99-page lawsuit says that Davis faked a first pregnancy, then tricked Cooprider into having sex with her when she was ovulating, telling hi remains of a miscarriage for a nonexistent pregnancy. It alleges that Davis's own negligence was a "proximate cause of the death of her unborn baby" a "properly" treating a sexually transmitted infection, causing fevers that can trigger miscarriage; of consuming alcohol, Red Bull, and medications contr pregnancy; and of ignoring cramping while staying in extreme heat with her kids, which is associated with greater miscarriage risk.

Cooprider's lawsuit also accuses Davis of erratic behavior, including, a month before the hot-chocolate incident, standing outside his house and "loudly threatening that she would charge Cooprider with sexual assault if he didn't speak to her." Cooprider includes a transcript of a call he says he made to t department in which he says Davis was threatening him and had taken abortion pills for a pregnancy he now says didn't exist.

Watts suggested that Davis's lawyer, Jonathan Mitchell, probably the best-known anti-abortion attorney in America and the father of the original Texa knew that Davis's case had major holes in it and pressed on even after the police concluded the claims were unfounded.

"There's Rule 11 that you have to do a reasonable investigation before you can sign your name to a federal court plea," says Watts, a well-known torts la was acquitted in 2016 of fraud in a case where he represented himself. "I'm not here to suggest that that rule has been violated yet, although I may be s some digging."



Mitchell didn't respond to a request for comment but told Autonomy News, "These are abject lies and we will disprove every one of them in court. Coo will be held to account for what he did, both in this civil suit and in the upcoming criminal proceedings." It's not clear what criminal proceedings he's r

RELATED

Abortion-Pilled

TAGS: ABORTION PILL ABORTION TEXAS THE BODY POLITIC MORE

SHOW 8 COMMENTS

THE Intelligencer FEED

6:00 A.M. EARLY AND OFTEN

Why Trump's Third-Term Talk Might Backfire

By ED KILGORE

He's leading MAGA supporters on, and J.D. Vance and the GOP could pay a price for it in 2028.

5:00 A.M. THE CITY POLITIC

The Final Leg of New York's Mayoral Race Has Gotten Ugly

By ERROL LOUIS

The last days have been marked by bigotry, bitterness, and broken friendships.

10/27/2025 POLITICS

New Lawsuit Seeks to Challenge NYC's Lone Republican District

By NIA PRATER

A group of Staten Island residents allege the boundaries of the 11th District dilute the voting power of the borough's Black and Latino voters.

MOST POPULAR

1. Lis Smith Thinks Democrats Treat Voters Like Children
   By BENJAMIN HART
2. Record-Breaking Early Voting Looks Good for Mamdani
   By NIA PRATER
3. Democrats Just Lost a Key Ally in the Shutdown Fight
   By ED KILGORE
4. The New Sign Trump Is Planning a Midterm-Elections Power Grab
   By ED KILGORE
5. What a Diabetes Diagnosis Taught Me About MAHA
   By SARAH JONES

10/27/2025 EARLY AND OFTEN

Democrats Just Lost a Key Ally in the Shutdown Fight

By ED KILGORE

As the shutdown pain spreads rapidly, the biggest federal union wants Democrats to cave. Can they find an off-ramp and claim some sort of victory?

10/27/2025 EARLY AND OFTEN

The New Sign Trump Is Planning a Midterm-Elections Power Grab

By ED KILGORE

His latest attacks on the Prop 50 vote in California once again show he'll do whatever it takes.

10/27/2025 POLITICS

Graham Platner Just Lost His Brand-New Campaign Manager

By NIA PRATER

Kevin Brown is the second high-profile exit from the campaign which has been plagued by numerous controversies concerning Platner's past.

10/27/2025 POLITICS

Record-Breaking Early Voting Looks Good for Mamdani

By NIA PRATER

Brooklyn smashed previous records.

10/27/2025 JUST ASKING QUESTIONS

Lis Smith Thinks Democrats Treat Voters Like Children

By BENJAMIN HART

The outspoken campaign strategist on this November's elections and how the Democratic Party can climb out of its rut.

10/26/2025 MAHA

What a Diabetes Diagnosis Taught Me About MAHA

By SARAH JONES

Self-mastery is free-market logic in another guise.

10/25/2025 SCREEN TIME

Why Is Amazon Watching Us?

By JOHN HERRMAN

The retail giant just can't help but monitor people!

10/24/2025 POLITICS

Jeffries Finally Endorses Mamdani in the Most Tepid Way Possible

By NIA PRATER

After holding out for months, at almost the last possible moment before early voting begins, the House minority leader finally gave his okay.

10/24/2025 EARLY AND OFTEN

Trump Is Attacking Canada When He Should Be Attacking Reagan

By ED KILGORE

Whether you agree with Trump's protectionism or think it's prehistoric, there's no question he reversed GOP free-trade orthodoxy.

10/24/2025 EARLY AND OFTEN

Trump Wants to 'Kill People' Without War

By ED KILGORE

By attacking "narco-terrorist" fishing boats, Trump shows the Jacksonian preference for instant violence rather than extended conflict.

10/24/2025 POLITICS

Letitia James Is Going After Lindsey Halligan

By NIA PRATER

James pleaded not guilty to two federal counts as her lawyers signaled plans to challenge Halligan's appointment as U.S. attorney.

10/24/2025 GAMES

The NBA Is Not Innocent in the Gambling Scandal

By WILL LEITCH

Players and coaches are charged, but look at what the league encourages.

10/24/2025 EARLY AND OFTEN

Trump's Redistricting Race Is Already Going Off the Rails

By ED KILGORE

Virginia is just the latest state to rush into an unscheduled remapping of congressional seats as Democrats try to counter Trump's power grabs.

10/24/2025 JUST ASKING QUESTIONS

'He Could Demolish the Entire White House'

By NIA PRATER

Historic-preservation expert Sara Bronin discusses President Trump's brazen East Wing destruction and whether anything can rein him in.

10/24/2025 EARLY AND OFTEN

Will Trump Back a Senate Candidate Who Called Him a 'Loser'?

By ED KILGORE

John E. Sununu may be the GOP's best shot at winning in New Hampshire and holding the Senate. But he insulted Trump as recently as last year.

10/24/2025 THE LAW

Can Anyone Stop Trump From Paying Himself Off?

By ELIE HONIG

He wants $230 million from his own Justice Department. Despite all the reasons that's wrong, he'll probably get it.

10/23/2025 PRESERVATION WATCH

Trump Used His Dad's Dirtiest Move on the East Wing

By CHRISTOPHER BONANOS

Knock it down before they can fight you.

10/23/2025 EARLY AND OFTEN

The Government Shutdown Will Get Very Real on November 1

By ED KILGORE

SNAP benefits will run out, Obamacare premiums will spike, and Trump will no longer be able to pretend the shutdown just hurts Democrats.

10/23/2025 POLITICS

Cuomo Laughed When He Was Told Mamdani Would Cheer Another 9/11

By NIA PRATER

Mamdani called the radio-show moment "disgusting." The Cuomo campaign swears it's not what it sounded like.

10/23/2025 THE CITY POLITIC

Eric Adams Is Endorsing 'Snake and Liar' Cuomo for Mayor

By CHAS DANNER

The soon-to-be former mayor and the former governor who wants to be mayor are making nice in the hopes of stopping Zohran Mamdani.

10/23/2025 ENCOUNTER

Ken Burns at the Barricades

By CHRISTOPHER BONANOS

Talking British New York and PBS cuts with the co-director of The American Revolution.

10/23/2025 NOTHING BUT BET

The NBA's Gambling Scandals Now Involve La Cosa Nostra

By MATT STIEB

Also, Hall of Famer Chauncey Billups.

READ MORE ON THE Intelligencer HOMEPAGE

Intelligencer

ABOUT INTELLIGENCER
NEWSLETTERS
CONTACT
MEDIA KIT PRIVACY
AD CHOICES

ABOUT NEW YORK MAGAZINE
HELP PRESS
WE'RE HIRING
TERMS
ACCESSIBILITY

DO NOT SELL OR SHARE MY PERSONAL DATA

INTELLIGENCER IS A VOX MEDIA NETWORK.
© 2025 VOX MEDIA, LLC. ALL RIGHTS RESERVED.

This story is free for a limited time. Subscribe to enjoy uninterrupted access.
SUBSCRIBE NOW

EXHIBIT 1-E

Welcome to Autonomy News! Learn more about us.

DARK

Autonomy News

SIGN IN Subscribe

ABOUT | SUPPORT US | TIP JAR | MERCH

ABORTION

Texas Man Accused of Putting Abortion Pills in Partner's Drink Claims She Made It Up, Countersues for $100 Million

The 34-year-old Marine alleges that the woman who sued him for wrongful death lied about a coerced abortion, and that there were political motives behind her lawsuit.

GARNET HENDERSON and SUSAN RINKUNAS

September 3, 2025 . 7:10 PM — 6 min read

Photo by Brett Jordan on Unsplash

Update 9/5/25, 8:25pm: This story has been updated with statements from the Corpus Christi Police Department and the Naval Criminal Investigative Service. It was previously updated with comment from attorney Jonathan Mitchell.

Last month, Autonomy News reported on a lawsuit filed by Liana Davis, a Texas woman who alleged that Christopher Cooprider, her male sex partner, had given her abortion-inducing medication without her knowledge or consent, causing her to lose her pregnancy. The case was filed in federal court in Corpus Christi, Texas. Davis is represented by anti-abortion legal activist and former Texas Solicitor General Jonathan Mitchell, and the case is thought to be the first instance of a woman suing for wrongful death from abortion pills.

On Wednesday, Cooprider countersued Davis in the same federal district, seeking $100 million in damages. When covering the initial complaint, Autonomy News did not name either party, but we are doing so now because Cooprider alleges the suit was fraudulent and initiated for retribution and political purposes. When reached for comment, Mitchell said "these are abject lies and we will disprove every one of them in court. Cooprider is guilty as sin and will be held to account for what he did, both in this civil suit and in the upcoming criminal proceedings."

Mitchell did not immediately respond to our questions about a possible criminal case. Autonomy News has contacted local and federal authorities to inquire about any ongoing investigations. On Friday, Corpus Christi Police Department confirmed it has "no open or active investigations involving these individuals at this time." A spokesperson for the Naval Criminal Investigative Service (NCIS), which covers the U.S. Navy and the Marine Corps, said: "I can confirm that the NCIS investigation has been closed. Out of respect for the investigative process, NCIS will not comment further at this time."

Cooprider, a 34-year-old Marine pilot, alleges that Davis' suit was malicious and intended to cause him emotional distress. He says he had a brief sexual relationship with Davis, a 37-year-old who was going through a divorce, and that her behavior escalated to harassment when he expressed that he didn't want the relationship to continue. After that, Cooprider claims Davis faked multiple pregnancies and miscarriages, and that after she actually became pregnant, she failed to treat medical conditions which themselves could have triggered a miscarriage.

Cooprider alleges that Davis concocted her suit after the Corpus Christi

Police Department declined to recommend charges based on her allegations against him.

He further alleges that Davis' lawsuit was filed early on August 11 "so it could be immediately and widely disseminated to national and Texas media outlets that morning" prior to a Texas Senate committee hearing on legislation that would supercharge the state's existing "bounty hunter" abortion ban, inviting citizens to sue manufacturers and providers of abortion pills and win $100,000 bounties. Davis' suit was cited in the hearing by Jana Pinson, executive director of Pregnancy Center of the Coastal Bend, a small "crisis pregnancy center" chain with locations in and around Corpus Christi.

"Just this morning, a lawsuit was filed for wrongful death where a military guy got a next-door neighbor pregnant, tried to force an abortion," Pinson said during the August 11 hearing. "He ordered in his own name from Aid Access, and then when she wouldn't take them, he … put 10 pills in her chocolate and she doubled over in pain about 30 minutes later. Then he left her to bleed out while she had to get help to get to the ER."

"This is another avenue of men being able to force abuse on women," Pinson continued. She mentioned the case again in a hearing on August 22, this time before a House committee.

Subscribe to Autonomy News

Davis' suit also named online abortion provider Aid Access and its founder, Rebecca Gomperts, as defendants. In addition to alleging that they violated wrongful death laws in Texas, the complaint accused them of violating the Comstock Act, a dormant 1873 law that Mitchell and other anti-abortion leaders argue outlaws the mailing of abortion pills. In 2025, the anti-abortion movement has made it a major priority to attack "shield" laws, which protect abortion providers like Aid Access who prescribe abortion pills via telehealth to patients in states where abortion is illegal.

Mark Lee Dickson, a prominent anti-abortion activist who was first to announce Davis' case on social media, also mentioned her case in the August 22 hearing. In his initial social media posts about Davis' lawsuit, Dickson connected it directly to anti-abortion legislation: "I hope these stories drive us to see more protections pass." At the time, Dickson said he first heard Davis' story from a CPC director in Corpus Christi. If Pinson was the person who told Dickson about the story, it's unclear how she came in contact with Davis in the first place. According to Dickson, he put Davis in touch with "my attorney"—meaning Mitchell, who has recently filed a spate of wrongful death suits related to the use of abortion pills, usually on behalf of men upset about their partners' abortions.

Versions of the abortion pill bounty bill have passed in both chambers of the Texas legislature in recent days. It appears poised to become law.

In his suit, Cooprider claims he didn't coerce Davis, and that she was the one threatening him. He said Davis asked him to order abortion pills for her in February 2025, which he alleges that she never took, and that she began harassing him after he expressed that he didn't want her to join him at his next military post in North Carolina. One night in early March, he claims, Davis stood outside his house and implied she'd accuse him of sexual assault if he didn't speak to her. He called 911 for police to do a wellness check and told operators that she'd called him 40 times that day, according to a transcript provided in the counterclaim. He told the operators he took video of her outside his home and added: "And she's also threatening… she's saying that I coerced her into taking the abortion pills against her will, and that's illegal in Texas."

Later on the call, he said Davis told him that she was miscarrying and was sitting "in a pile of her blood in the bathtub." Cooprider's filing then notes that "Law enforcement checked on [her] and she was not sitting in blood. She said that she was fine."

However, she was actually pregnant at this time, per an ultrasound on March 21, where a physician said that she had conceived about four weeks earlier. Cooprider claims that Davis invited him over on April 5, at which point she tried to frame him for a coerced abortion by alleging that he slipped abortion pills into her hot chocolate. She claimed she was bleeding profusely, and got a neighbor to drive her to the hospital, where she told staff that Cooprider "drugged" her.

Officers from Corpus Christi Police Department came to the emergency

Officers from Corpus Christi Police Department came to the emergency department and opened an investigation. CCPD told the New York Times in August that it shared results with Nueces County District Attorney's Office, but that, "after careful review, both agencies concluded that the elements of a crime could not be established, and the investigation was subsequently closed as unfounded."

Appreciated this post? Leave us a tip

According to Cooprider's admittedly melodramatic suit, Davis' "lethal lies in the malicious allegations now embedded in her made-up complaint read like the screenplay written for Glenn Close in the movie Fatal Attraction." Other salacious allegations featured in the complaint include that Davis failed to properly treat a sexually transmitted infection and typhoid fever, either of which could have led to natural miscarriage. Cooprider also alleges that Davis failed to take progesterone prescribed in late March due to a low embryonic heart rate, which his complaint presents as evidence that she did not want to continue the pregnancy. (However, while progesterone is commonly prescribed in an attempt to prevent first trimester miscarriage, evidence doesn't support the practice except in people with a history of three or more miscarriages.) He also claims she was a heavy drinker and that she continued to drink when her children were in her home despite being ordered not to by family court.

Cooprider's lead attorney is Mikal Watts, a puzzling figure who frequently donates to Democratic politicians, per Federal Election Commission records, but is also listed as a Federalist Society contributor. Watts faced a federal trial in 2016 on 96 counts of wire fraud, mail fraud, and identity theft after he was accused of inventing 40,000 victims of the 2010 Deepwater Horizon oil spill in order to file a class action suit that would have earned him an estimated $40 million. Watts fired his attorney on the eve of trial and chose to represent himself. A jury acquitted him.

Cooprider is seeking $100 million in damages, but pledges in his counterclaim to donate any proceeds to the Wounded Warrior Project. Watts and two other attorneys said they are working on the case pro bono.

This is a developing story and may be updated.

Follow Autonomy News on Instagram, Bluesky, TikTok, and LinkedIn.

gn up for Autonomy News

ker-owned reproductive rights and justice publication.

email Subscribe

wall. Unsubscribe anytime.

Comments

Related

ABORTION

Abortion Pill "Reversal" Is a Hoax. It's Also a Powerful Right-Wing Legal Strategy.

ABORTION

Exclusive: Plan C Doubles Down on Abortion Pill Info Amid Political Attacks

The online abortion pill

ABORTION

Planned Parenthood of Wisconsin to Halt Abortion Services

Sources say the affiliate isn't scheduling abortion

ABORTION

Planned Parenthood Confirms It Considered Allowing Some Affiliates to Drop

Speakers at a crisis pregnancy center conference made rare admissions about the challenges of providing so-called abortion “reversal,” and indicated its importance as a litigation tool.

GARNET HENDERSON and SUSAN RINKUNAS
October 15, 2025

guide has been redesigned to make it even easier to learn where to get pills, including at no cost.

SUSAN RINKUNAS
October 10, 2025

appointments after September 30 in an apparent attempt to avoid Medicaid "defunding."

GARNET HENDERSON and SUSAN RINKUNAS
September 24, 2025

Abortion Care

The organization’s CEO confirmed Autonomy News’ reporting from June—but a federal appeals court ruling makes the issue moot, a spokesperson said.

GARNET HENDERSON and SUSAN RINKUNAS
September 12, 2025

Latest

WEEKLY ROUNDUP

Wisconsin Planned Parenthood Resumes Abortions and More: October 27 News Roundup

Plus, what you missed on Autonomy News last week.

GARNET HENDERSON and SUSAN RINKUNAS
October 27, 2025

REPRODUCTIVE JUSTICE

The Associated Press Does Free PR for Crisis Pregnancy Centers

A recent story is a glaring example of how traditional journalistic “objectivity" is far from unbiased, and can even facilitate the spread of disinformation.

GARNET HENDERSON and SUSAN RINKUNAS
October 26, 2025

WEEKLY ROUNDUP

Birth Control Program Gutted and Trump's Weak IVF Policy Unveiled: October 20 News Roundup

Plus, what you missed on Autonomy News last week.

GARNET HENDERSON and SUSAN RINKUNAS
October 20, 2025

ABORTION

Abortion Pill “Reversal” Is a Hoax. It's Also a Powerful Right-Wing Legal Strategy.

Speakers at a crisis pregnancy center conference made rare admissions about the challenges of providing so-called abortion “reversal,” and indicated its importance as a litigation tool.

GARNET HENDERSON and SUSAN RINKUNAS
October 15, 2025

Autonomy News

Sign up Privacy Thanks Tip Jar

© 2025 Autonomy News – Published with Ghost & Tripoli

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS
CORPUS CHRISTI DIVISION

Liana Davis, Plaintiff,	*
v.	*	Case No. 2:25-cv-220
Christopher Cooprider, et al. Defendants.	*

ORDER DENYING LIANA DAVIS'S MOTION TO DISMISS CHRISTOPHER COOPRIDER'S COUNTERCLAIMS

Before the Court is Counter-Defendant Liana Davis's Motion to Dismiss Counter-Plaintiff Christopher Cooprider's Counterclaims pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure ("Motion"). Having considered the Motion, the applicable law, the arguments of counsel, and all other supporting and opposing papers, the Court is of the opinion that the Motion should be and hereby is DENIED.

SIGNED this ____ day of _____, 2025.

_____
DAVID S. MORALES
UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE

	APPENDIX OF UNPUBLISHED AUTHORITIES (p. 1 of 5) RESPONSE TO PLAINTIFF'S MOTION TO DISMISS DEFENDANT CHRISTOPHER COOPRIDERS COUNTERCLAIMS
	CASE/AUTHORITY NAME
1	Kafi, Inc. v. Sand Canyon Corp., Civil Action No. 3:20-cv-00354, 2022 WL 3084480 (S.D. Tex. Aug. 3, 2022) (Edison, M.J.)
2	Kafi, Inc. v. Sand Canyon Corp., Civil Action No. 3:20-cv-00354, 2022 WL 4454395 (S.D. Tex. Sept. 23, 2022) (Brown, J.)
3	5A CHARLES A. WRIGHT & ARTHUR R. MILLER, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1291 (4th ed.)
4	Maxim Crude Oil, LLC v. Noil Corp., Inc., Civil Action No. 2:21-CV-90, 2021 WL 12320541 (S.D. Tex. Nov. 16, 2021) (Morales, J.)
5	Crotts v. Healey, 2015 WL 5890103 (Tex. App. – Houston [1st Dist.] 2015), rev. denied (Feb. 26, 2016), reh'g of petition for review denied (April 8, 2016), cert denied, 580 U.S. 868 (2016)
6	Bond v. Nueces County, Texas, Civil Action No. 2:19-CV-43, 2019 WL 13221680 (S.D. Tex. Sept. 5, 2019) (Morales, J.)
7	Oliveros v. Oliveros, Case No. 5:23-CV-00402-FB-RBF, 2024 WL 875834 (W.D. Tex. Feb. 13, 2024) (Farrer, M.J.)
8	Oliveros v. Oliveros, Case No. 5:23-CV-00402-FB-RBF, 2024 WL 874145 (W.D. Tex. Feb. 29, 2024) (Biery, J.)
9	Smith v. MTGLQ Investors, L.P., 851 Fed. Appx. 514 (Mem) (5th Cir. June 30, 2021) (per curiam) (unpublished)
10	Peninsula Marine, Inc. v. Principle Industrial Services, LLC, Civil Action No. 2:23-CV-00104, 2024 WL 5036616 (S.D. Tex. Sept. 30, 2024)
11	Restatement (Second) of Torts § 46 cmt. d (1965)
12	Kumar v. Panera Bread Co., Case No. 23-20178, 2024 WL 1216562 (5th Cir. Mar. 21, 2024) (per curiam) (unpublished)
13	7X Cattle Co. LLC v. Brandstadt, Case No. 6:22-CV-00396-JDK-KNM, 2024 WL 4183301 (E.D. Tex. Jul. 22, 2024) (Mitchell, M.J.)
14	7X Cattle Co. LLC v. Brandstadt, Case No. 6:22-CV-00396-JDK-KNM, 2024 WL 3950677 (E.D. Tex. Aug. 27, 2024) (Mitchell, M.J.)

	APPENDIX OF UNPUBLISHED AUTHORITIES (p. 2 of 5) RESPONSE TO PLAINTIFF'S MOTION TO DISMISS DEFENDANT CHRISTOPHER COOPRIDERS COUNTERCLAIMS
	CASE/AUTHORITY NAME
15	Western Reserve Medtec Services, LLC v. Stryker Corporation, Civil Action No. 4:18-CV-2604, 2019 WL 13191641 (S.D. Tex. May 13, 2019) (Bryan, M.J.)
16	Garcia v. LCS Corrections Services, Inc., Civil Action No. C–09–334 2010 WL 2163284 (S.D. Tex. May 24, 2010) (Crane, J.)
17	Luebano v. Office Depot, L.L.C., Case No. 22-50767, 2023 WL 4249268 (5th Cir. Jun. 29, 2023) (per curiam) (unpublished)
18	Briceno-Belmontes v. Coastal Bend College, Civil Action No. 2:20-CV-00114, 2022 WL 673854 (S.D. Tex. Mar. 5, 2022) (Tipton, J.)
19	Perez v. Brooks County, Texas, Civil Action No. 2:19-CV-391, 2020 WL 4261253 (S.D. Tex. Jul. 24, 2020) (Gonzales Ramos, J.)
20	Henderson v. Wells Fargo Bank, 779 F.Supp.3d 910 (S.D. Tex. Mar. 31, 2025) (Morales, J.)
21	Stewart v. City of Arcola, Civil Action No. 4:23-cv-04387, 2024 WL 3297361 (S.D. Tex. Jul. 3, 2024) (Hanen, J.)
22	Garcia v. Oceans Healthcare, L.L.C., Civil Action No. 2:22-CV-00219, 2023 WL 6393885 (S.D. Tex. Sept. 30, 2023) (Tipton, J.)
23	M.D.C.G. v. United States, Civil Action No. 7:15–CV–552, 2016 WL 6638845 (S.D. Tex. Sept. 13, 2016) (Crane, J.)
24	Gaona v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., SA-23-CV-280-FB (HJB), 2025 WL 699353 (W.D. Tex. Feb 13, 2025) (Bemporad, M.J.)
25	Gaona v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., SA-23-CV-280-FB (HJB), 2025 WL 696546 (W.D. Tex. Mar. 4, 2025) (Biery, J.)
26	United States ex rel. Porter v. Magnolia Health Plan, Inc., 810 Fed. Appx. 237 (5th Cir. Apr. 15, 2020) (unpublished)
27	Gutierrez v. Corrections Corp. of America, 559 Fed. Appx. 406 (mem) (5th Cir. Apr. 3, 2014) (unpublished)
28	United States v. Basulto-Reina, 421 Fed. Appx. 349 (5th Cir. Apr. 5, 2011) (unpublished)
29	U.S. v. Kim, Criminal No. H-07-406, 2009 WL 29688 (S.D. Tex. Jan. 5, 2009) (Rosenthal, J.)

	APPENDIX OF UNPUBLISHED AUTHORITIES (p. 3 of 5) RESPONSE TO PLAINTIFF'S MOTION TO DISMISS DEFENDANT CHRISTOPHER COOPRIDERS COUNTERCLAIMS
	CASE/AUTHORITY NAME
30	Blair v. Pride Industries, Inc., Case No. EP-14-CV-00183-DCG, 2015 WL 11251771 (W.D. Tex. Jan. 27, 2015) (Guaderrama, J.)
31	Medford Co-Operative Bank v. Skerry, 2004 Mass. App. Div. 120, 2004 WL 1853343 (2004)
32	ASG Chemical Holdings, LLC v. Bisley Int'l, LLC, Civil Action No. H-23-4333, 2024 WL 5036568 (S.D. Tex. Nov. 18, 2024 (Bray, M.J.)
33	ASG Chemical Holdings, LLC v. Bisley Int'l, LLC, Civil Action No. H-23-4333, 2024 WL 5108450 (S.D. Tex. Dec. 13, 2024 (Lake, J.)
34	Specialties of Mexico, Inc. v. Masterfoods USA, Civil Action No. L–09–88, 2010 WL 2488031 (S.D. Tex. Jun. 14, 2010) (Alvarez, J.)
35	Albores v. Dimitri, Civil Action No. 18-6936, 2025 WL 871601 (E.D. La. Mar. 20, 2025) (Milazzo, J.)
36	Forum Subsea Rentals v. Globaltech Offshore, Civil Action No. H–13–885, 2014 WL 10751177 (S.D. Tex. Sept. 17, 2014) (Hittner, J)
37	Pointeast Pharma Consulting, Inc. v. Lenzing Aktiengesellschaft, Civil Action No. 4:21-CV-3654, 2024 WL 5048964 (S.D. Tex. Dec. 9, 2024) (Hanen, J.)
38	Katz v. Intel Pharma, LLC, Civil Action No. H-18-1347, 2018 WL 4701566 (S.D. Tex. Oct. 1, 2018) (Rosenthal, J.)
39	Kafi, Inc. v. Sand Canyon Corp., Civil Action No. 3:20-cv-00354, 2022 WL 3084480 (S.D. Tex. Aug. 3, 2022) (Edison, M.J.)
40	Kafi, Inc. v. Sand Canyon Corp., Civil Action No. 3:20-cv-00354, 2022 WL 4454395 (S.D. Tex. Sept. 23, 2022) (Brown, J.)
41	Louisiana Oilfield Logistics, LLC v. Flotek Chemistry, LLC, Civil Action No. H-19-1272, 2020 WL 13240060 (S.D. Tex. Jun. 29, 2020) (Rosenthal, C.J.)
42	ClaimHub, Inc. v. Universal Risk Ins. Srvs., Inc., Civil Action No. H-10-2841, 2011 WL 13247456 (S.D. Tex. Jul. 25, 2011) (Rosenthal, J.)
43	Zytax, Inc. v. Green Plains Renewable Energy, Inc., Civil Action No. H–09–2582, 2010 WL 4702303 (S.D. Tex. Nov. 10, 2010) (Rosenthal, J.)

	APPENDIX OF UNPUBLISHED AUTHORITIES (p. 4 of 5) RESPONSE TO PLAINTIFF'S MOTION TO DISMISS DEFENDANT CHRISTOPHER COOPRIDERS COUNTERCLAIMS
	CASE/AUTHORITY NAME
44	Diagnostic Affiliates of Northeast Houston, LLC v. United Healthcare Services, Inc., Civil Action No. 2:21-CV-00131, 2022 WL 214101 (S.D. Tex. Jan. 18, 2022) (Gonzales Ramos, J.)
45	William Marsh Rice University v. Arrowhead Research Corp., Civil Action No. 14-03496, 2016 WL 3223313 (S.D. Tex. Mar. 8, 2016)
46	Lee v. Samsung Electronics America, Inc., Case No. 4:21-cv-1321, 2023 WL 4240277 (S.D. Tex. Jun. 28, 2023) (Palermo, M.J.)
47	Polanco v. Innovation Ventures, LLC, Civil Action No. 7:13-CV-568, 2014 WL 12599332 (S.D. Tex. May 5, 2014) (Crane, J.)
48	5A C. WRIGHT & A. MILLER, FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE: Civil 2d § 1356 at 298 (1990)
49	Lin v. Veritex Community Bank, N.A., Civil Action No. H-20-1904, 2021 WL 3831986 (S.D. Tex. Jan. 4, 2021) (Atlas, J.)
50	Enventure Global Technology, Inc. v. Weatherford, U.S., L.P., Civil Action No. H-19-2397, 2020 WL 6146565 (S.D. Tex. Oct. 2, 2020) (Atlas, J.)
51	IIITec, Ltd. v. Weatherford Technology Holdings, LLC, Civil Action No. H-19-3386, 2019 WL 7037744 (S.D. Tex. Dec. 20, 2019) (Atlas, J.)
52	Balcerowicz v. Sweetin, Civil Action No. H-12-0310, 2017 WL 1474093 (S.D. Tex. Apr. 6, 2017) (Ellison, J.)
53	American General Life Ins. Co. v. Mickelson, Civil Action No. H–11–3421, 2012 WL 1355591 (S.D. Tex. Apr. 18, 2012) (Ellison, J.)
54	Cortez v. Pharia L.L.C., Civil Action No. H–10–5068, 2011 WL 2455724 (S.D. Tex. May 18, 2011) (Stacy, M.J.)
55	5B CHARLES ALAN WRIGHT & ARTHUR R. MILLER, FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE § 1357, at 376 (3d ed. 2004)
56	Lopez v. Don Herring Ltd., Civil Action No. 3:16-CV-02663-B, 2018 WL 296063 (N.D. Tex. Jan. 4, 2018) (Boyle, J.)
57	Banquete I.S.D. v. Alliance for Community Solutions, Ltd., Civil Action No. 2:22-Cv-00094, 2024 WL 4720290 (S.D. Tex. Sept. 10, 2024) (Libby, M.J.)
58	Barge v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., Civil Action No. 1:23-CV-00189, 2024 WL 2520324 (E.D. Tex. Mar. 28, 2024) (Truncale, J.)
59

	APPENDIX OF UNPUBLISHED AUTHORITIES (p. 5 of 5) RESPONSE TO PLAINTIFF'S MOTION TO DISMISS DEFENDANT CHRISTOPHER COOPRIDERS COUNTERCLAIMS
	CASE/AUTHORITY NAME
59	Case No. A H-04-0916, 2006 WL 2796387 (S.D. Tex. Sep. 26, 2006) (Gilmore, J.)
60	United States ex rel. BakerRipley v. Kids U US, Inc., Civil Action No. 23-cv-1124, 2024 WL 3541499 (S.D. Tex. Jul. 25, 2024) (Rosenthal, J.)
61	Xiongen Jiao v. Ningbo Xu, Case No.: 4:19-cv-01848, 2020 WL 6136265 (S.D. Tex. Jan. 29, 2020) (Ellison, J.)

CASE NO. 1

2022 WL 3084480
Only the Westlaw citation
is currently available.
United States District Court,
S.D. Texas, Galveston Division.

KAFI, INC. Plaintiff.
v.
SAND CANYON CORPORATION
F/k/a Option One Mortgage
Corporation, et al. Defendants.

Civil Action
No.
3
:
20
-
cv
-
00354
|
Signed August 3, 2022

Attorneys and Law Firms

Jeffrey Craig Jackson, Jeffrey Jackson & Associates, PLLC, Houston, TX, for Plaintiff.

Brett W. Schouest, Dykema Gossett PLLC, San Antonio, TX, Stephen Andrew Walsh, Weinberg Wheeler et al., Birmingham, AL, for Defendants Sand Canyon Corporation.

Kurt Lance Krolikowski, Ryan Benner Burns, Locke Lord LLP, Houston, TX, for Defendants Nationwide Title Clearing, Inc.

Neyma Edelyn Figueroa, Brett W. Schouest, Dykema Gossett PLLC, San Antonio, TX, for Defendants Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. as Trustee for ABFC 2006-OPT3 Trust, Asset Backed Funding Corporation Asset-Backed Certificates, Series 2006-OPT3, PHH Mortgage Corporation.

MEMORANDUM AND RECOMMENDATION

ANDREW M. EDISON, UNITED STATES MAGISTRATE JUDGE

1 Pending before me is Defendants' Joint Motion to Dismiss Fourth Amended Complaint. Dkt. 66. Having reviewed the briefing, the record, and the applicable law, and for the reasons explained below, I recommend the Court GRANT in part and DENY in part the motion.

I. FACTUAL BACKGROUND

In this lawsuit, Kafi, Inc. ("Kafi") seeks to avoid foreclosure of a property it owns at 810 Almond Pointe in League City, Texas (the "Property"). In June 2006, non-parties Joe and Kelly Richardson (the "Richardsons") purchased the Property. The transfer was memorialized by general warranty deed with a vendor's lien. The Richardsons financed their purchase with a loan from Sand Canyon Corporation f/k/a Option One Mortgage Corporation ("Sand Canyon"). The loan was secured by a deed of trust in favor of Sand Canyon. The deed of trust contains an optional acceleration clause, allowing Sand Canyon to "invoke the power of sale and/or any other remedies" should the Richardsons default. Dkt. 63-1 at 6.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

In January 2012, Sand Canyon purported to assign the deed of trust, along with "all interests secured thereby, all liens, and any rights due or to become due thereon" (the "Assignment"), to Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. ("Wells Fargo"). Dkt. 63-9. The Assignment was prepared by Nationwide Title Clearing, Inc. ("NTC"), notarized by Miranda Avila ("Avila"), and purportedly executed on behalf of Sand Canyon by Derrick White ("White") in his professed capacity as Sand Canyon's Vice President.[1] It is undisputed that, at the time of the Assignment, White and Avila were employees of NTC. See Dkt. 66 at 3. As discussed in greater detail in the following sections, the central issue in this case is Kafi's allegation that White's and Avila's signatures are forgeries.

By September 2012, the Richardsons were in default. Although the Property was noticed for sale multiple times, for reasons not explained, it was never sold at foreclosure. Kafi has attached to its pleadings four notices of trustee's sales:

Date of Notice	Date of Sale
September 5, 2012	October 2, 2012
November 6, 2012	December 4, 2012
June 19, 2017[2]	August 1, 2017
February 24, 2020	May 5, 2020

Kafi alleges that two of the notices—dated September 5 and November 6, 2012—were mailed to the Richardsons and filed in the real property records, thereby "unequivocally accelerat[ing]" the loan. Dkt. 63 at 14.

2 In September 2020, Kafi purchased the Property "as-is" from the Richardsons by general warranty deed, which provides, in relevant part:

> This conveyance is made subject-to any outstanding liens of record. Grantors understand that Grantee is in no way assuming or promising to pay any outstanding liens of record.

Dkt. 63-3 at 1–2. There is no allegation that Defendants have attempted to foreclose on the Property.

II. PROCEDURAL HISTORY

In October 2020, Kafi sued Defendants in Texas state court, seeking, among other things, a declaration that Defendants lack standing to foreclose and a judgment quieting title to the Property. Defendants timely removed the case to this Court on the basis of diversity jurisdiction.

Kafi has since amended its complaint multiple times. In its live pleadings, Kafi requests a bevy of declaratory relief concerning its alleged title to the Property,[3] the most relevant of which are its requests for declaratory judgments that: (1) the Assignment is a forgery and, therefore, void; and (2) the four-year limitations period to foreclose on the Property has expired. Kafi also brings claims to quiet title or, in the alternative, for the equitable right of redemption. See Dkt. 63 at 10–11, 16–17. Finally, against Sand Canyon and NTC, Kafi asserts common-law claims for "forgery." See id. at 12–13.

In December 2021, I granted Kafi's request to conduct limited, targeted discovery to develop facts supporting its forgery allegation. Specifically, I allowed Kafi to depose Avila and send written discovery to Sand Canyon and NTC. See Dkt. 57. In January 2022, I denied Kafi's request to depose White. See Dkt. 60. After completing its court-approved discovery, Kafi amended its complaint for a fourth time in February 2022. In support of the allegations mentioned above, Kafi's Fourth Amended Complaint includes over a dozen exhibits, most of which pertain to its claim that the Assignment is a forgery. I discuss the relevant exhibits later in the opinion, but it is worth mentioning upfront that one of the exhibits is a "Forensic Document Examination Preliminary Report," prepared by two forensic document examiners who analyzed dozens of White's and Avila's known signatures and compared them to the supposed forgeries. See Dkt. 63-14.

Defendants have jointly moved for dismissal under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6), arguing that Kafi's forgery claim is time-barred, as are Kafi's claims for declaratory relief based on the alleged forgery. See Dkt. 66 at 6–11. Even if the statute of limitations does not torpedo Kafi's claims, Defendants aver that Kafi has failed to sufficiently plead a claim for any of the relief sought. Sand Canyon and NTC further argue that they must be dismissed from the case, irrespective of whether Kafi has adequately pleaded a claim for relief, because they claim no interest in the underlying loan or Property. See id. at 29–30.

3 Kafi advances a handful of interrelated arguments in response, the most relevant of which are: (1) the Assignment is a forgery and, therefore, void ab initio—meaning Defendants lack standing to enforce the underlying deed of trust; (2) foreclosure is time-barred under Texas' four-year statute of limitations for real-property actions, see TEX. CIV. PRAC. & REM. CODE § 16.035(d); and (3) even if the Assignment was valid and foreclosure not time-barred, Kafi is entitled to equitably redeem the Property by paying off the loan's balance to the current mortgagee, Wells Fargo, or the current loan servicer, PHH.

III. LEGAL STANDARD

A. RULE 12(b)(6) MOTION TO DISMISS

Rule 12(b)(6) provides that a district court must dismiss a complaint that fails to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. See FED. R. CIV. P. 12(b)(6). This rule is read in conjunction with the pleading standard set forth in Rule 8(a), which requires "a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief." FED. R. CIV. P.

8(a)(2). To survive dismissal at this early stage, the complaint must state enough facts such that the claim to relief is plausible on its face. See Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 570 (2007). A claim is facially plausible when the plaintiff pleads enough facts to allow the district court to draw a reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged. See Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678 (2009). Although a complaint "does not need detailed factual allegations" to survive Rule 12(b)(6), a plaintiff must provide "more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555.

In deciding a Rule 12(b)(6) motion, I must accept all well-pleaded facts as true, viewing them in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. See Alexander v. AmeriPro Funding, Inc., 848 F.3d 698, 701 (5th Cir. 2017). I also must limit my inquiry "to the facts stated in the complaint and the documents either attached to or incorporated in the complaint." Lovelace v. Software Spectrum Inc., 78 F.3d 1015, 1017 (5th Cir. 1996). Here, all documents discussed in this opinion are both attached to and incorporated in Kafi's Fourth Amended Complaint.

The Fifth Circuit has repeatedly held that "[m]otions to dismiss are viewed with disfavor and are rarely granted." Test Masters Educ. Servs. v. Singh, 428 F.3d 559, 570 (5th Cir. 2005). Given my charge to liberally construe the complaint in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, with every doubt resolved in the plaintiff's favor, dismissal is proper only if it "appear[s] beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief." Id. (quotation omitted).

B. RULE 9(b)'S HEIGHTENED PLEADING STANDARD

Rule 9(b) imposes a heightened pleading standard for claims of fraud. Forgery is a type of fraud, and, therefore, Rule 9(b)'s heightened pleading standard applies. See Bynane v. Bank of N.Y. Mellon, 866 F.3d 351, 360 (5th Cir. 2017) (analyzing forgery allegations under Rule 9(b)'s heightened pleading standard). See also Lone Star Ladies Inv. Club v. Schlotzsky's Inc., 238 F.3d 363, 368 (5th Cir. 2001) ("Rule 9(b) applies by its plain language to all averments of fraud, whether they are part of a claim of fraud or not.").

Rule 9(b) requires that a party "state with particularity the circumstances constituting fraud." FED. R. CIV. P. 9(b). "What constitutes 'particularity' will necessarily differ with the facts of each case." Benchmark Elecs. v. J.M. Huber Corp., 343 F.3d 719, 724 (5th Cir. 2003) (cleaned up). Generally, Rule 9(b) requires that a complaint detail "the who, what, when, and where before access to the discovery process is granted." Hart v. Bayer Corp., 199 F.3d 239, 247 n.6 (5th Cir. 2000) (cleaned up). However, the Fifth Circuit has acknowledged that there is "no single construction of Rule 9(b) that applies in all contexts," U.S. ex rel. Grubbs v. Kanneganti, 565 F.3d 180, 188 (5th Cir. 2009), and that "Rule 9(b)'s ultimate meaning is context-specific." Williams v. WMX Techs., 112 F.3d 175, 178 (5th Cir. 1997).

4 Relatedly, "[i]f the facts pleaded in a complaint are peculiarly within the opposing party's knowledge, fraud pleadings may be based on information and belief." Tuchman v. DSC Commc'ns Corp., 14 F.3d 1061, 1068 (5th Cir. 1994). See Corley v. Rosewood Care Ctr., Inc., 142 F.3d 1041, 1051 (7th Cir. 1998) ("Rule 9(b) must be relaxed where the plaintiff lacks access to all facts necessary to detail his claim."). But the Fifth Circuit has cautioned that "this exception must not be mistaken for license to base claims of fraud on speculation and conclusory allegations." U.S. ex rel. Thompson v. Columbia/HCA Healthcare Corp., 125 F.3d 899, 903 (5th Cir. 1997) (quotation omitted). That is, "even where allegations are based on information and belief, the complaint must set forth a factual basis for such belief." Id.

C. DIVERSITY JURISDICTION

Because jurisdiction is based on diversity of citizenship, Texas substantive law and federal procedural law apply to Kafi's claims. See Ferguson v. Bank of N.Y. Mellon Corp., 802 F.3d 777, 780 (5th Cir. 2015).

IV. ANALYSIS

A. BECAUSE A FORGED SIGNATURE IS THE TYPE OF INJURY THAT IS INHERENTLY UNDISCOVERABLE, THE DISCOVERY RULE APPLIES

It is undisputed that the Assignment was filed in the real property records of Galveston County on January 18, 2012. Defendants insist that subsequent purchasers of real property, like Kafi, are charged with constructive notice of any title defects that could have been discovered through a reasonably diligent inspection of the public record. Defendants thus contend that Kafi's forgery claim accrued on January 18, 2012. Because Kafi did not file the underlying lawsuit until October 2020, Defendants argue that Kafi's forgery claim is time-barred under Texas's four-year statute of limitations for real-property actions. See TEX. CIV. PRAC. & REM. CODE §§ 16.004(a)(4), 16.051. Kafi counters that any claim based on the purportedly forged Assignment did not accrue until it acquired an interest in the Property or, alternatively, the discovery rule deferred accrual of its claim because its injury is the type of injury that is inherently undiscoverable.

A cause of action generally accrues when a wrongful act causes some legal injury, regardless of when the plaintiff learns of such injury. See Moreno v. Sterling Drug, Inc., 787 S.W.2d 348, 351 (Tex. 1990). "The discovery rule represents an exception to this general rule of accrual." Id. It applies when "the nature of the injury incurred is inherently undiscoverable and the evidence of injury is objectively verifiable." Comput. Assocs. Int'l, Inc. v. Altai, Inc., 918 S.W.2d 453, 456 (Tex. 1996). "This legal question is decided on a categorical rather than case-specific basis; the focus is on whether a type of injury rather than a particular injury was discoverable." Via Net v. TIG Ins. Co., 211 S.W.3d 310, 314 (Tex. 2006). When the discovery rule applies, the cause of action does not accrue, and, consequently, the limitations period does not begin to run until the plaintiff knows or, through the exercise of reasonable diligence, should know of the facts giving rise to the cause of action. See Wagner & Brown, Ltd. v. Horwood, 58 S.W.3d 732, 734 (Tex. 2001).

In Defendants' minds, "had Kafi owned the Property in 2012, before the supposedly fraudulent assignment was filed," the discovery rule would save Kafi's claim because property owners do not have a duty to continuously search the public record to ensure that no fraudulent instruments are subsequently recorded against their property. Dkt. 66 at 8. However, because "Kafi purchased the Property from the borrowers nearly nine (9) years after the allegedly forged assignment was executed and recorded," Defendants argue that Kafi is charged with "constructive notice [of the allegedly forged Assignment] for limitations purposes." Id. (quotation omitted).

5 Although Texas law may charge a buyer "with constructive notice of the actual knowledge that could have been acquired by examining the public records," Mooney v. Harlin, 622 S.W.2d 83, 85 (Tex. 1981), this includes only "knowledge of all facts that reasonable inquiry would have disclosed." Holmes v. P.K. Pipe & Tubing, Inc., 856 S.W.2d 530, 542 (Tex. App.—Houston [1st Dist.] 1993, no writ). At the time of its purchase, Kafi was placed on notice of the Assignment itself. Nothing on the face of the Assignment—nor anything else in the public record—should have alerted Kafi that White's or Avila's signatures are possible forgeries. To hold otherwise would be nothing short of demanding Kafi exercise clairvoyance. This far exceeds the concept of "reasonable diligence" required under Texas law. See Hooks v. Samson Lone Star, Ltd. P'ship, 457 S.W.3d 52, 60–61 (Tex. 2015) (holding where fraudulent information "taints the public record," the question of whether a property owner exercised "reasonable diligence remains a fact question" for the jury to decide);[4] Mooney, 622 S.W.2d at 85 ("When evidence of fraud may be disclosed by examination of public records ... limitations will begin to run from the time the fraud could have been discovered by the exercise of ordinary diligence.").

At this point in the litigation, one can only speculate on when Kafi learned of the supposed forgery. Under Texas law, where a plaintiff pleads the discovery rule, the defendant bears the burden of conclusively negating its application before dismissal is appropriate. See KPMG Peat Marwick v. Harrison Cnty. Hous. Fin. Corp., 988 S.W.2d 746, 748 (Tex. 1999) ("the defendant must ... negate the discovery rule, if it applies and has been pleaded or otherwise raised"); Jennings v. Burgess, 917 S.W.2d 790, 793 (Tex. 1996) ("If the nonmovant asserts that a tolling provision applies, the movant must conclusively negate the tolling provision's application to show his entitlement to summary judgment.").

Right now, any theory that Kafi knew or should have known of the forgery more than four years before filing suit is just that—a theory without factual support. For Rule 12(b)(6) purposes, I conclude that Kafi has sufficiently invoked the discovery rule, permitting it to proceed for the time being. However, at trial, Kafi, as "[t]he party seeking to benefit from the discovery rule must also bear the burden of proving and securing favorable findings thereon." Woods v. William M. Mercer, Inc., 769 S.W.2d 515, 518 (Tex. 1988).

B. FORGERY

1. Pleading Requirements for Kafi's Forgery Allegation

Although the parties agree that Rule 9(b)'s heightened pleading standard controls Kafi's forgery claim, they differ over how stringently it must be applied.

Rule 11(b)(3) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure allows a party to plead factual allegations that lack evidentiary support if it appears that they are "likely [to] have evidentiary support after a reasonable opportunity for further investigation or discovery." FED. R. CIV. P. 11(b)(3). Kafi contends that Rule 9(b)'s heightened pleading standard should be relaxed in this case because the facts in question are peculiarly within Defendants' knowledge. Regardless, Kafi insists that its Fourth Amended Complaint demonstrates its belief that White's signature is a forgery is well-grounded. Understandably, Defendants disagree. They argue, "Kafi's forgery allegations are purely speculative and fail to meet [Rule 9(b)'s] stringent pleading requirements." Dkt. 66 at 16.

Rule 9(b) does not require omniscience. As mentioned, the Fifth Circuit has held that "[i]f the facts pleaded in a complaint are peculiarly within the opposing party's knowledge, fraud pleadings may be based on information and belief." Tuchman, 14 F.3d at 1068. Cf., ABC Arbitrage v. Tchuruk, 291 F.3d 336, 354 (5th Cir. 2002) ("[T]he plaintiffs need not allege all facts that may be related to their claims, since such a requirement is impossible at the pleading stage because, in nearly every securities fraud case, only the defendants know all the facts related to the alleged fraud." (quotations omitted)).

6 That said, the Fifth Circuit warned that relaxation of Rule 9(b)'s requirements "must not be mistaken for license to base claims of fraud on speculation and conclusory allegations." Tuchman, 14 F.3d at 1068. That is, "while Rule 11(b)(3) may relax Rule 9(b)'s particularity requirement, it cannot be construed to eviscerate that requirement in its entirety by permitting rank speculation." Moon v. Harrison Piping Supply, 375 F. Supp. 2d 577, 593 (E.D. Mich. 2005), rev'd in part on other grounds, 465 F.3d 719 (6th Cir. 2006). So, even under a non-restrictive application of the rule where allegations are based on information and belief, "the complaint must set forth a factual basis for such belief." U.S. ex rel. Thompson, 125 F.3d at 903. See also Wexner v. First Manhattan Co., 902 F.2d 169, 172 (2d Cir. 1990) ("[A] complaint must adduce specific facts supporting a strong inference of fraud or it will not satisfy even a relaxed pleading standard.").

As one leading authority explains:

> Allegations of the circumstances of a fraud based on information and belief, which are commonplace and often a necessity in many litigation contexts, usually do not satisfy the particularity requirement of Rule 9(b), unless accompanied by a statement of the facts upon which the pleader's belief is founded or > by allegations that the necessary information lies within the defendant's control.

5A CHARLES A. WRIGHT & ARTHUR R. MILLER, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1298 (4th ed.) (emphasis added).

The prima facie elements of the claim will assist in determining whether the plaintiff has satisfied a relaxed application of Rule 9(b)'s "time, place, contents, and identity" standard. See Wagemann v. Dr.'s Hosp. of Slidell, LLC, No. CIV.A. 09-3506, 2010 WL 3168087, at *3 (E.D. La. Aug. 6, 2010). Put differently, the degree of particularity required is guided by the nature of the claim. See U.S. ex rel. Foster v. Bristol-Myers Squibb Co., 587 F. Supp. 2d 805, 819 (E.D. Tex. 2008) ("Just as the particularity requirements of Rule 9(b) are depend[e]nt on the facts of the case, they are also depend[e]nt on Rule 8.").

In sum, to satisfy Rule 9(b)'s heightened pleading requirement, Kafi must convince me that there is a reasonable basis for its belief that White's and Avila's signatures are forgeries and that evidentiary support will be forthcoming should the case proceed.

2. Kafi's Forgery Allegations

Keeping in mind that a plaintiff must plead specific facts and not mere conclusory allegations, but accepting as true the well-pleaded factual allegations of the complaint and reasonable inferences to be drawn from them, I turn to Kafi's Fourth Amended Complaint.

Below are the allegations that Kafi has "allege[d] upon information [are] reasonably likely to be discovered," see Dkt. 63 at 6, 12–13:

- "[T]he signature of Derrick White was not signed or affixed by Derrick White nor was the signature signed or affixed by someone else" with White's knowledge and authority. Id. at 6.
- "[T]he signature [of] Miranda Avila was not signed or affixed by Miranda Avila nor was the signature signed or affixed by someone else" with Avila's knowledge or authority. Id.
- "Sand Canyon and NTC altered, made, completed, executed, and authenticated the 2012 Assignment so that it purported to be signed by Derrick White and [notarized by] Miranda Avila when in fact Derrick White and Miranda Avila did not sign and did not authorize anyone else to sign for them." Id. at 12.
- "Sand Canyon and NTC issued, transferred, [possessed], registered, passed off, and published the 2012 assignment when it purported to be signed by Derrick White and Miranda Avila." Id. at 12–13.

3. The Basis for Kafi's Belief That White's Signature Is a Forgery

7 Kafi's Fourth Amended Complaint includes a handful of exhibits that it claims demonstrate a reasonable basis for its belief that the Assignment is a forgery. I will address the relevant exhibits, in turn.

i. Osceola County, Florida Records Audit

The first is a 2014 property records audit performed in Osceola County, Florida,[5] which identifies four property transactions where White, as an "alleged NTC employee," executed unrelated assignments in which he misrepresented his capacity to do so "as Assistant Secretary of MERS" on behalf of several now-defunct corporations. Dkt. 63-10 at 121–22.

Kafi relies on the Osceola County records audit to cast general aspersions on NTC's business practices. See Dkt. 63 at 6–7. Buried within the 332-page document are allegations brought by the Illinois Attorney General that implicate NTC in a "robosigning" scheme. See Dkt. 63-10 at 111. Ostensibly relevant here is an allegation that "[d]ocuments generated by NTC were ... signed by NTC employees who had no personal knowledge of the facts they were attesting to." Id. The records audit also describes NTC as "a known document manufacturing plant," engaged in a pattern of recording documents that were prepared but not executed by NTC employees. Id. at 109–12.

The report itself is replete with conclusory allegations. United States District Judge Gray Miller found the same records audit less than useful when considering a similar forgery allegation. See Reed v. Bank of Am., N.A., No. CV H-15-2005, 2016 WL 3058303, at *4 (S.D. Tex. May 31, 2016) ("Even considering the report, it simply makes the conclusory statement that Martha Munoz is a 'known Bank of America robosigner.' The report offers no support for this allegation. Moreover, the report is no evidence that the assignments at issue in this case were forged." (internal citation omitted)).

But even if I were to accept the allegations contained within the records audit as the gospel truth, they are not the silver bullet Kafi believes them to be. That is, the records audit does not lend support to Kafi's theory that White's signature is a forgery. If anything, it tilts the scales in the opposite direction, suggesting that White personally signed the Assignment but misrepresented his capacity to do so as Sand Canyon's Vice President.

Under Texas law, "a contract executed on behalf of a corporation by a person fraudulently purporting to be a corporate officer is, like any other unauthorized contract, not void, but merely voidable." Reinagel v. Deutsche Bank Nat'l Tr. Co., 735 F.3d 220, 226 (5th Cir. 2013). This is significant because, under Texas law, a non-party to a mortgage assignment (i.e., homeowner) may only challenge the assignment on grounds that would render it void, not merely voidable. See EverBank, N.A. v. Seedergy Ventures, Inc., 499 S.W.3d 534, 542 (Tex. App.—Houston [14th Dist.] 2016, no pet.) ("When the homeowner is just a third party to an assignment, the homeowner lacks standing to challenge the assignment on grounds that would merely render the assignment voidable."). Here, Kafi's standing to challenge the Assignment hinges on the fact that "[a] forged deed is void" under Texas law. Vazquez v. Deutsche Bank Nat'l Tr. Co., N.A., 441 S.W.3d 783, 787 (Tex. App.—Houston [1st Dist.] 2014, no pet.).

8 Said differently, allegations of White's supposed nefarious conduct found in the records audit are not comparable to the allegations made by Kafi in this case and do not provide a reasonable basis for its forgery allegations.

ii. AOL.com News Article

The second exhibit is an online news article similarly discussing NTC's "problematic" business practice of robosigning mortgage-related documents. Dkt. 63-11. In its briefing, Kafi specifically references an NTC employee mentioned in the article who, according to the article, testified at deposition that he notarized hundreds of documents at a time and, on occasion, signed documents as a vice president of various financial institutions. See id. at 3. That same employee, however, also apparently testified that he was unaware whether other NTC employees did the same. See id.

Cutting to the chase, the article makes no mention of White, Avila, or the Assignment at issue. Like the records audit, the article's general allegations regarding NTC's supposed business practices do nothing to demonstrate a reasonable basis for Kafi's forgery allegations in this case.

iii. Forensic Document Examination Preliminary Report

The third exhibit is the aforementioned "Forensic Document Examination Preliminary Report," prepared by forensic document examiners Dale Stobaugh ("Stobaugh") and Kenneth Crawford ("Crawford"), both of whom analyzed dozens of White's and Avila's "known signatures" and compared them to the supposed forgeries. See Dkt. 63-14. The report begins with the caveat, "[d]ue to the lack of detail and possible misinterpretation of foreign matter reflected in copies [of signatures], it is usually our policy not to base definite identification or elimination by handwriting comparison on any type of reproduction," and includes a disclaimer that ink originals of the known signatures "could provide a basis for a more definite determination." Id. at 1–2. Nonetheless, the report cites "consistent differences" between the known signatures and supposed forgeries before concluding that these inconsistencies "indicat[e]" White and Avila did not author their respective signatures on the Assignment. Id. at 2.

iv. Avila's Deposition Testimony

Avila testified her signature on the Assignment is authentic and that White signed the Assignment in front of her. See Dkt. 66-1 at 5–6. However, upon cross-examination, Avila conceded that she did not specifically remember White signing "this particular assignment" but could not recall an instance where she notarized a document where the signer was not in her presence. Id. at 6–7.

Predictably, the parties' view of Avila's testimony is considerably different. Defendants would have me look at Avila's seemingly unequivocal statement that White "signed [the Assignment] in front of [her]." Id. at 6. While Kafi emphasizes that Avila walked back her testimony, admitting she did not recall White signing the Assignment in question. See id. at 6–7 (Q: [A]re you saying that you specifically recall that this particular assignment from January 5, 2012, that you have specific recollection that [White] signed this in front of you?" A: "I don't remember specifically that day, but we sign in front of each other all the time.").

4. Kafi Has Pleaded Forgery with Sufficient Particularity

9 Defendants' flagship argument is that "the Fifth Circuit has repeatedly held that these types of signature comparison are insufficient to state a [forgery] claim." Id. at 14 (citing Bynane v. Bank of N.Y. Mellon, 866 F.3d 351, 360 (5th Cir. 2017) and Kreway v. Countrywide Bank, 647 F. App'x 437, 437–38 (5th Cir. 2016)).

The short of it is that the Fifth Circuit has never decided a case like this. In both Bynane and Kreway, the plaintiff's forgery allegations were premised solely on the plaintiff's own deduction that the assignment was a forgery because, according to the plaintiff, the signature on the assignment in question differed from the signer's signature on other unrelated assignments, which the plaintiff had attached to the complaint for the court to compare. See Bynane, 866 F.3d at 361; Kreway, 647 F. App'x at 438.

This case might have started out as a Bynane or Kreway-type signature-comparison case, but Kafi amended its pleadings and dropped the signature-comparison argument altogether. Now, Kafi's allegations chiefly rely on the preliminary forensic document examination report. Stobaugh and Crawford —professional forensic document examiners —compared dozens of versions of White's and Avila's "known signatures" that were produced by NTC with the supposed forgeries and found "consistent differences," which they concluded "indicat[e]" that White and Avila "did not write the signature in that name on the [Assignment]." Dkt. 63-14 at 2. While the Fifth Circuit has constructed an admittedly rigorous test for successfully pleading forgery allegations of this type, the preliminary report distinguishes Kafi's allegations from those made in Bynane and Kreway. Viewed in the light most favorable to Kafi, I find that the preliminary report demonstrates a reasonable basis for its allegation that the Assignment is a forgery. See Dkt. 63 at 6 (alleging that "[t]he forgery allegations ... in this complaint have evidentiary support and will likely have even more evidentiary support after a reasonable opportunity for further investigation or discovery").

Moreover, if I were to adopt the position Defendants would have me take, it is difficult to envision how a plaintiff in Kafi's shoes could ever surmount Rule 9(b)'s heightened pleading standard. Admittedly, Kafi does not allege who forged the signatures, when the signatures were forged, where the signatures were forged, or how the signatures were forged. However, there is no question that this information is "peculiarly within the opposing party's knowledge." Tuchman, 14 F.3d at 1068. To hold otherwise would essentially require Kafi first figure out who (allegedly) forged the signatures (without the benefit of discovery) and then drag them into court to explain when, where, and how they did so. This would be a draconian application of Rule 9(b) where, as here, Kafi has demonstrated a reasonable basis for its belief that the signatures are forgeries. See U.S. ex rel. Foster, 587 F. Supp. 2d at 819 ("the particularity requirements of Rule 9(b) are depend[e]nt on the facts of the case"); 5A CHARLES A. WRIGHT & ARTHUR R.

MILLER, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1291 (4th ed.) ("[T]hose portions of Rule 9 that require specific or detailed allegations should not be construed in an unduly strict fashion.").

10 Courts are intended as places of redress. For this reason, motions to dismiss are generally viewed with disfavor, as they tend to undermine the overarching public policy favoring merits-based disposition. See Test Masters, 428 F.3d at 570 ("Motions to dismiss are viewed with disfavor and are rarely granted."); 5B CHARLES ALAN WRIGHT & ARTHUR R. MILLER, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1356 (3d ed.) ("[A] motion under Federal Rule 12(b)(6) ... is not a procedure for resolving a contest between the parties about the facts or the substantive merits of the plaintiff's case."). Because I find that Bynane and Kreway are not binding on the facts of this case, I recommend the Court deny Defendants' motion to dismiss Kafi's claims for declaratory relief based on the supposed forgery and decide the merits of Kafi's forgery allegations at summary judgment or at trial. See Foley v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., 772 F.3d 63, 72 (1st Cir. 2014) ("[A] primary purpose of a Rule 12(b)(6) motion is to weed out cases that do not warrant reaching the (oftentimes) laborious and expensive discovery process because, based on the factual scenario on which the case rests, the plaintiff could never win." (emphasis added)).

C. TEXAS LAW DOES NOT RECOGNIZE FORGERY AS AN INDEPENDENT CIVIL CAUSE OF ACTION

In addition to seeking a declaratory judgment that the Assignment is a forgery, Kafi has pleaded an independent "forgery" cause of action against Sand Canyon and NTC. Thus, I must address whether "forgery" is a recognized civil claim under Texas law and, if so, whether Kafi has sufficiently pleaded such a claim. See Breitling v. LNV Corp., No. CV 3:15-CV-0703-B, 2015 WL 5896131, at *8 (N.D. Tex. Oct. 5, 2015) (observing that whether forgery qualifies as a tort under Texas "is unclear" and collecting conflicting authority).

Kafi's Fourth Amended Complaint cites a single state-court decision in support of its position that a common-law claim of forgery exists under Texas law, Saxer v. Nash Phillips-Corpus Co. Real Estate, 678 S.W.2d 736 (Tex. App.—Tyler 1984, writ ref'd n.r.e.). In that case, the court of appeals wrote as follows: "Forgery is an unlawful and unconscionable act for which a common law court may provide a civil remedy independent of the remedies provided by [the Deceptive Trade Practices Act]." Id. at 739 (footnote omitted). Critically, following the phrase "unconscionable act," the court included a footnote citation to Texas Penal Code § 32.21, which codifies forgery as a criminal offense. See id. at 739 n.2.

As United States District Judge Sim Lake aptly pointed out, "in order for a private right of action to exist under a criminal statute, there must be a statutory basis for inferring that a civil cause of action of some sort lay in favor of someone." Van Duzer v. U.S. Bank Nat'l Ass'n, 995 F. Supp. 2d 673, 699 (S.D. Tex.) (cleaned up), aff'd, 582 F. App'x 279 (5th Cir. 2014). What's more, Van Duzer considered the very question before me now—whether a private cause of action for "forgery" exists under Texas law. See id. In deciding that no such civil claim exists, Judge Lake explained: "Plaintiffs have not provided any statutory basis for inferring that they are entitled to bring a private cause of action on the basis of any criminal statute. Thus, any attempt by Plaintiffs to assert a cause of action under a criminal statute fails as a matter of law." Id.

Much like the plaintiff in Van Duzer, Kafi's forgery allegations track the language found in the Texas Penal Code—though Kafi does not cite to the Penal Code itself. Compare Dkt. 63 at 12–13, with Tex. Penal Code § 32.21(a)–(b). Kafi cannot create a civil cause of action simply by parroting the Texas Penal Code. Because there is no statutory basis for me to infer that Texas law recognizes a civil cause of action for violating the criminal forgery statute, I find that forgery is not a cognizable, stand-alone civil claim under Texas law. See Mathis v. DCR Mortg. III Sub, I, LLC, 952 F. Supp. 2d 828, 836 (W.D. Tex. 2013) (dismissing a forgery claim "to the extent it was asserted as any kind of freestanding cause of action"). Accordingly, I recommend the Court dismiss Kafi's forgery claims against Sand Canyon and NTC with prejudice.

D. STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS

11 Defendants label Kafi's claim for declaratory relief based on the expiration of the statute of limitations to foreclose on the Property as "nothing more than speculation," arguing that Kafi has pleaded no facts to support its allegations that the notices of trustee's sale[6] were ever mailed to the Richardsons or that the notices were proceeded by a notice of intent to accelerate. Dkt. 66 at 25–26.

Under Texas law, a suit for the foreclosure of a real property lien must be brought within four years of the maturity date of the last installment of an obligation payable in installments. TEX. CIV. PRAC. & REM. CODE §§ 16.035(a), (e). However, default alone does not automatically start the limitations clock. If a note or deed of trust secured by real property contains an optional acceleration clause—as in this case—"the action accrues only when the holder actually exercises its option to accelerate." Holy Cross Church of God in Christ v. Wolf, 44 S.W.3d 562, 566 (Tex. 2001).

Effective acceleration requires two acts: (1) notice of intent to accelerate; and (2) notice of acceleration. See id. Both notices must be "clear and unequivocal," Shumway v. Horizon Credit Corp., 801 S.W.2d 890, 893 (Tex. 1991), and notice of acceleration is ineffective unless preceded by proper notice of intent to accelerate. See Ogden v. Gibraltar Sav. Ass'n, 640 S.W.2d 232, 234 (Tex. 1982).

Kafi has sufficiently pleaded facts to assert a plausible claim that the statute of limitations to foreclose on the Property has expired. Kafi alleges that the debt was accelerated—and, therefore, the limitations period to bring a foreclosure action began—on September 5, 2012, when "notice of foreclosure sale was filed in the real property records and mailed to the Richardsons," or, in the alternative, "on November 6, 2012, when another notice of foreclosure sale was filed in the real property records and mailed to the Richardsons." Dkt. 63 at 14. Kafi further alleges the notices were "preceded by an unequivocal notice of intent to accelerate," though Kafi cabins this allegation by pleading it "will likely have evidentiary support after a reasonable opportunity for further investigation or discovery." Id. at 15. Accepting these facts as true for the purposes of the motion to dismiss, I find that Kafi has sufficiently pleaded the expiration of the statute of limitations to foreclose.

Accordingly, I recommend the Court deny Defendants' motion to dismiss Kafi's claim for declaratory relief based on the expiration of the statute of limitations to foreclose on the Property. See e.g., Kafi, Inc. v. Deutsche Bank Nat'l Tr. Co., No. CV H-20-3247, 2021 WL 5143309, at *4 (S.D. Tex. Oct. 5, 2021) (recommending the same result under near-identical circumstances).

E. QUIET TITLE

12 Under Texas law, an action to quiet title—also known as a suit to remove cloud from title—is one in which a superior title holder seeks to remove a challenge to that title. See Brumley v. McDuff, 616 S.W.3d 826, 835 (Tex. 2021). "A cloud on title exists when an outstanding claim or encumbrance is shown, which on its face, if valid, would affect or impair the title of the owner of the property." Gordon v. W. Houston Trees, Ltd., 352 S.W.3d 32, 42 (Tex. App.—Houston [1st Dist.] 2011, no pet.). "An action to remove a cloud from title exists to enable the holder of the feeblest equity to remove from his way to legal title any unlawful hindrance having the appearance of a better right." Hahn v. Love, 321 S.W.3d 517, 531 (Tex. App.—Houston [1st Dist.] 2009, pet. denied) (quotation omitted). In a suit to remove a cloud from his title, the plaintiff has the burden of supplying the proof necessary to establish his superior equity and right to relief. See Lance v. Robinson, 543 S.W.3d 723, 739 (Tex. 2018). "That is, the plaintiff must prove, as a matter of law, right, title, or ownership in himself with sufficient certainty to enable the court to see that he has a right of ownership and that the alleged adverse claim is a cloud on the title that equity will remove." Hahn, 321 S.W.3d at 531. "The effect of a suit to quiet title is to declare invalid or ineffective the defendant's claim to title." Essex Crane Rental Corp. v. Carter, 371 S.W.3d 366, 388 (Tex. App.–Houston [1st Dist.] 2012, pet. denied).

The elements of a claim for relief to quiet title are: (1) a valid equitable interest in a specific property, (2) title to the property is affected by a claim by the defendant, and (3) although facially valid, the defendant's claim is invalid or unenforceable. See id. To prevail, the plaintiff must demonstrate that she has superior title to the property at issue. See id.

Here, there is no question that Kafi has an interest in the Property. Moreover, Wells Fargo's claim of a right to foreclose and thereby transfer legal title to the Property constitutes a cloud on Kafi's title. E.g., Morales v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., No. SA-13-CV-410-XR, 2013 WL 6057853, at *6 (W.D. Tex. Nov. 14, 2013). See Lighthouse Church of Cloverleaf v. Tex. Bank, 889 S.W.2d 595, 603 (Tex. App.—Houston [14th Dist.] 1994, writ denied) ("Foreclosure transfers title ... to another party"). As for the third element, either of Kafi's two principal arguments—forgery[7] or limitations[8]—if proven, would demonstrate Wells Fargo's claimed interest in the Property is invalid or unenforceable, and that Kafi has a superior title.

For these reasons, I find that Kafi has alleged facts that, if true, would permit it to recover on the strength of its own title and has demonstrated the existence of a potentially invalid charge against that title. Accordingly, I recommend the Court deny Defendants' motion to dismiss Kafi's claim to quiet title to the Property without prejudice to re-urging the issue at summary judgment.

F. EQUITABLE RIGHT OF REDEMPTION

13 In the alternative, Kafi has also pleaded a claim for equitable redemption. A right of redemption is the right to redeem the property subject to foreclosure within a reasonable time of default by paying off the full amount owed on the mortgage. See Scott v. Dorothy B. Schneider Estate Tr., 783 S.W.2d 26, 28 (Tex. App.—Austin, 1990 no writ). In order to state a claim for equitable redemption, a plaintiff must allege: (1) it has a legal or equitable interest in the property subject to the mortgage; (2) it is ready, able, or willing to redeem the property in question by paying off the amount of the liens to which the property is subject; and (3) that the equity of redemption was asserted before a foreclosure sale occurred. See id.

Kafi's alleged right to equitable redemption is based on its allegations that: (1) it is the "legal owner of the Property"; (2) it "would suffer a loss of ownership and the right to possession and control of the Property if Wells Fargo and PHH are allowed to foreclose"; and (3) it "is ready, able or willing to redeem the Property ... by paying off the amount of any valid and subsisting liens to which the Property is subject." Dkt. 63 at 17. Regarding the latter, Kafi pleads that it has a net worth of $7 million, which dwarfs the loan's principal amount ($260,248), and would "pay any valid and subsisting liens in cash." Id. Finally, Kafi represents that the current amount owed under the loan agreement is unknown and subject to discovery. See id.

Defendants maintain that Kafi has failed to sufficiently plead a claim for equitable redemption because it has not tendered all amounts due on the underlying note. See Owens v. Bank of Am., NA, No. CIV.A. H-11-2552, 2012 WL 912721, at *3 (S.D. Tex. Mar. 16, 2012) ("Thus, within the context of the plaintiffs' equitable redemption claim, the plaintiffs must tender the redemption amount (including the full amount of the defendant's lien) either to the defendant or the Court.").

Simply pleading willingness and the ability to pay the amount owed has been rejected by just about every court to consider the issue. Nonetheless, some courts have decided that alleging facts that adequately explain the plaintiff's ability to pay off the amount owed on the subject property is sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss. Compare, DBDFW 3 LLC v. JPMorgan Chase Bank, N.A., No. 3:18-CV-3148-C-BN, 2019 WL 823810, at *8 (N.D. Tex. Feb. 6, 2019) ("Stating that the plaintiff is willing to satisfy the lien is insufficient to state a claim for equitable redemption. The plaintiff must provide additional details such as the value of the lien, how it would pay, its own net worth or assets, or any other information from which the court could infer that plaintiff's right to relief is plausible."), with 330 Cedron Tr. v. Citimortgage, Inc., No. SA-14-CV-933-XR, 2015 WL 1566058, at *3 (W.D. Tex. Apr. 8, 2015) ("Cedron offers no facts in its complaint that demonstrate it is [ ] 'ready, willing, and able' to pay off the amount of the existing liens to which the Property is subject .... Cedron offers no facts about the value of such lien, how it would pay, its own net worth or assets, etc. The conclusory statement that merely recites an element of the cause of action is not enough to raise the right to relief above a purely speculative level.").

Here, Kafi has pleaded that it is ready, willing, and able to pay off "any valid and subsisting liens to which the Property is subject." Dkt. 63 at 17. Standing alone, this would be insufficient. But Kafi has also pleaded that "it has a net worth of $7 million and would pay any valid and subsisting liens in cash." Id. Moreover, although Kafi offers no facts about the amount due, it does include the loan's principal amount: $260,248. Given that Kafi claims a net worth of $7 million, Kafi has sufficiently alleged that it has the assets to pay off whatever remains on the loan.

14 In my mind, these extra allegations nudge Kafi's equitable redemption claim above a purely speculative level. See Green for 2016 Wolf Tr. v. Bank of Am., N.A., No. CV H-17-0772, 2017 WL 1424332, at *2 (S.D. Tex. Apr. 20, 2017) ("Plaintiff has plead sufficient facts to state a claim for its equitable right of redemption that is plausible on its face."); id. ("Although the cases on which Defendant relies correctly identify tender of the amount owed as a condition precedent to recovery of title, tender is not required in order to state a legally cognizable claim." (quotation omitted)).

G. KAFI CANNOT OBTAIN ANY RELIEF FROM NTC OR SAND CANYON BECAUSE NEITHER PARTY CLAIMS A CURRENT INTEREST IN THE MORTGAGE

It is undisputed that PHH is the current loan servicer, and, since 2012, Wells Fargo has been the assignee of record of the deed of trust. There are no allegations that Sand Canyon has a current interest in the loan or deed of trust, nor are there any allegations that NTC has ever claimed such an interest. Moreover, there are no allegations that Sand Canyon or NTC is attempting to foreclose on the Property. Thus, even if Kafi ultimately succeeds on any of its claims for declaratory relief, it could not obtain any of the requested relief from NTC or Sand Canyon. Accordingly, I recommend the Court dismiss Kafi's claims against Sand Canyon and NTC.

H. KAFI'S CLAIMS FOR EXEMPLARY DAMAGES

Kafi alleges that Defendants' conduct in making, presenting, or using the Assignment and the post-2008 notices of sale constitute fraud, malice, or gross negligence, entitling Kafi to exemplary and punitive damages. See Dkt. 63 at 18 (citing TEX. CIV. PRAC. & REM. CODE § 41.003(a)).

An independent tort must be separately pleaded and proved to recover exemplary damages. See Amoco Prod. Co. v. Alexander, 622 S.W.2d 563, 571 (Tex. 1981) (holding that exemplary damages were "not recoverable because the [Appellees] failed to plead and prove a tort allowing recovery of exemplary damages"); Sharpe v. Kilcoyne, 962 S.W.2d 697, 703 n.5 (Tex. App.—Fort Worth 1998, no pet.) ("To support an award of exemplary damages, the plaintiff must prove a 'distinct' tortious injury with actual damages arising from that injury."). Because Kafi's forgery allegations live on only through its requests for declaratory relief, it is unable to obtain exemplary damages. Accordingly, I recommend the Court dismiss Kafi's request for exemplary damages.

CONCLUSION

For the above reasons, I recommend that the Court GRANT in part and DENY in part Defendants' Joint Motion to Dismiss (Dkt. 66). Specifically, I recommend the Court dismiss (1) Kafi's civil forgery claim against all Defendants; (2) Kafi's claim for exemplary damages; and (3) all claims against NTC and Sand Canyon. All other requested relief is denied without prejudice to re-urging at summary judgment.

The Clerk shall provide copies of this Memorandum and Recommendation to the respective parties who have 14 days from receipt to file written objections pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 72(b) and General Order 2002–13. Failure to file written objections within the time period mentioned shall bar an aggrieved party from attacking the factual findings and legal conclusions on appeal.

All Citations

Not Reported in Fed. Supp., 2022 WL 3084480

Footnotes

1 Kafi's Fourth Amended Complaint alleges that White executed the Assignment as "an 'Assistant Secretary' for" Mortgage Electronic Registration Systems, Inc. Dkt. 63 at 5–6. However, the Assignment identifies White as Sand Canyon's Vice President. See Dkt. 63-9. Whatever the case may be, the capacity in which White executed the Assignment has no bearing on my decision.

2 The June 2017 notice of sale identifies Ocwen Loan Servicing, LLC ("Ocwen") as the Richardsons loan servicer. Dkt. 63-7 at 2. Kafi alleges Ocwen merged with PHH Mortgage Corporation in 2019, and that "PHH now claims to be the [loan's] mortgage servicer." Dkt. 63 at 9.

3 Specifically, Kafi seeks the following declarations that: (1) Defendants lack "legal or contractual" standing to conduct a foreclosure sale; (2) the Assignment is void as a forgery; (3) the Assignment is void because Sand Canyon had no right, title, or interest in the mortgage on the date of the Assignment; (4) the Assignment is void because it violates the public policy favoring identification of lienholders and avoidance of "secret liens"; (5) there is no complete and unbroken chain of assignments and transfers of the deed of trust or mortgage documents from Sand Canyon to any of the other Defendants; (6) not all assignments and transfers of the mortgage were properly recorded in the public record, in violation of TEX. LOC. GOV'T CODE § 192.007; (7) the deed of trust is null and void; and (8) the limitations period to foreclose has expired. Dkt. 63 at 10, 13–15.

4 Hooks concerned the fraudulent-concealment doctrine. Although the discovery rule and fraudulent-concealment doctrine are separate tolling doctrines that are "characterized by different substantive and procedural rules," S.V. v. R.V., 933 S.W.2d 1, 4 (Tex. 1996), "cases discussing fraudulent concealment are relevant to the meaning of reasonable diligence" under the discovery rule. Hooks, 457 S.W.3d at 58 n.9.

5 The 332-page records audit is part one of a two-part forensic examination of Osceola County, Florida's real property and circuit court records.

6 Defendants cite a decision out of the Houston Division for the proposition that I should dismiss Kafi's limitations claim because nothing in the record indicates the Richardsons actually received the notices of trustee's sale. See Dkt. 66 at 25–26 (citing Ther & Co. v. U.S. Bank, N.A., No. CV H-18-2916, 2019 WL 5684226, at *3 n.1 (S.D. Tex. Oct. 31, 2019)). Critically, Ther was decided at summary judgment. In contrast, Rule 8's liberal pleading standard does not require that a plaintiff produce evidence supporting the facts alleged; "it simply calls for enough fact to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence" to support what is alleged. Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556.

7 "A void contract of assignment confers no right to foreclose under the deed on the purported assignee[.]" Puente v. CitiMortgage, Inc., No. 3:11-CV-2509-N, 2012 WL 4335997, at *6 n.14 (N.D. Tex. Aug. 29, 2012) (applying Texas law). See Wright v. Matthews, 26 S.W.3d 575, 578 (Tex. App.—Beaumont 2000, pet. denied) ("Any deed, contract, judgment or other instrument not void on its face that purports to convey any interest in or make any charge upon the land of a true owner, the invalidity of which would require proof, is a cloud upon the legal title of the owner.").

8 "It is established law in Texas that, when a debt is barred, an action to foreclose a lien or mortgage given as security for it is barred also." Dupree v. Mansur, 214 U.S. 161, 166 (1909). See Wolf, 44 S.W.3d at 567 ("Under state law, a sale of real property under a power of sale in a mortgage or deed of trust that creates a real-property lien must be made not later than four years after the day the cause of action accrues. When this four-year period expires, the real-property lien and the power of sale to enforce the lien become void." (internal citations omitted)).

End of Document

© 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

CASE NO. 2

2022 WL 4454395
Only the Westlaw citation
is currently available.
United States District Court,
S.D. Texas, Galveston Division.

KAFI, INC., Plaintiff.
v.
SAND CANYON CORPORATION
f/k/a Option One Mortgage
Corporation, et al., Defendants.

No.
3
:
20
-
cv
-
00354
|
Signed September 23, 2022

Attorneys and Law Firms

Jeffrey Craig Jackson, Charles Daniel Brooks, Jeffrey Jackson & Associates, PLLC, Houston, TX, for Plaintiff.

Brett W. Schouest, Dykema Gossett PLLC, San Antonio, TX, Stephen Andrew Walsh, Weinberg Wheeler et al, Birmingham, AL, for Defendant Sand Canyon Corporation.

Kurt Lance Krolikowski, Ryan Benner Burns, Locke Lord LLP, Houston, TX, for Defendant Nationwide Title Clearing, Inc.

Neyma Edelyn Figueroa, Brett W. Schouest, Dykema Gossett PLLC, San Antonio, TX, for Defendants Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. as Trustee for ABFC 2006-OPT3 Trust, Asset Backed Funding Corporation Asset-Backed Certificates, Series 2006-OPT3, PHH Mortgage Corporation.

ORDER ADOPTING MAGISTRATE JUDGE'S MEMORANDUM AND RECOMMENDATION

JEFFREY VINCENT BROWN, UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE

1 On February 24, 2021, all dispositive and non-dispositive pretrial matters in this case were referred to United States Magistrate Judge Andrew M. Edison under 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1)(A) and (B). See Dkt. 38. Judge Edison filed a memorandum and recommendation on August 3, 2022, recommending that the court grant in part and deny in part the defendants' joint motion to dismiss claims brought against them by Kafi, Inc. ("Kafi") for failure to state a claim. See Dkt. 72. Specifically, Judge Edison recommended the court dismiss: (1) Kafi's forgery claim against all defendants; (2) Kafi's claim for exemplary damages; and (3) Kafi's claims against Nationwide Title Clearing ("NTC") and Sand Canyon Corporation f/k/a Option One Mortgage Corporation ("Sand Canyon"). In all other respects, Judge Edison recommended the court deny the relief sought by the defendants in their joint motion to dismiss without prejudice to re-urging at summary judgment.

On August 17, 2022, the defendants timely filed their objections to the memorandum and recommendation. See Dkt. 73. In accordance with 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1)(C), this court is required to "make a de novo determination of those portions of the [magistrate judge's] report or specified proposed findings or recommendations to which objection [has been] made." 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1)(C). After conducting this de novo review, the court may "accept, reject, or modify, in whole or in part, the findings or recommendations made by the magistrate judge." Id.; see also Fed. R. Civ. P. 72(b)(3).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

The court has carefully considered the objections, the memorandum and recommendation, the pleadings, and the record. The court accepts Judge Edison's memorandum and recommendation and adopts it as the opinion of the court. It is therefore ordered that:

(1) Judge Edison's memorandum and recommendation (Dkt. 72) is approved and adopted in its entirety as the holding of the court;

(2) The defendants' joint motion to dismiss (Dkt. 66) is granted in part and denied in part.

(3) Kafi's forgery claim against all defendants is dismissed with prejudice;

(4) Kafi's claim for exemplary damages is dismissed is dismissed with prejudice;

(5) Kafi's claims against NTC and Sand Canyon are dismissed with prejudice, and those parties are dismissed from the case; and

(6) All other relief sought by the defendants in their joint motion to dismiss is denied without prejudice to re-urging at summary judgment.

All Citations

Not Reported in Fed. Supp., 2022 WL 4454395

End of Document

© 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

CASE NO. 3

5A Fed. Prac. & Proc. Civ. § 1291 (4th ed.)

Federal Practice and Procedure (Wright & Miller) | September 2025 Update

Federal Rules of Civil Procedure

Chapter 4. Pleadings and Motions

Rule 9. Pleading Special Matters
Author: A. Benjamin Spencer

A. Pleading Special Matters—In General

---

§ 1291 Pleading Special Matters—In General

Primary Authority

- Fed. R. Civ. P. 9

In contrast to the broad general pleading principles in Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8,[1] Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 9 contains a number of provisions designed to solve or ameliorate several pleading problems that historically have been dealt with in special ways. In some instances, Rule 9 preserves prior practice regarding the detail with which certain matters must be pleaded—for example, with regard to fraud and mistake (Rule 9(b))[2]—but in other respects the rule alleviates the stringency of past pleading practice—for example, in the case of capacity (Rule 9(a))[3] or conditions precedent (Rule 9(c)).[4]

Courts and commentators have traditionally noted that Rule 9 must be read in light of the basic pleading philosophy set forth in Rule 8[5] and in conjunction with the directives as to the form of the pleadings that appear in Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 10.[6] This has traditionally meant that those portions of Rule 9 that require specific or detailed allegations should not be construed in an unduly strict fashion. Although the federal rules in their inception contemplated a de-emphasis of the pleadings and a general simplicity in pleading practice,[6.50] the Supreme Court's decisions in Bell Atlantic Corporation v. Twombly[7] and Ashcroft v. Iqbal[8] have modified this understanding to some extent by requiring the pleading of nonconclusory factual allegations sufficient to state a plausible claim for relief.[9] These modified strictures of Rule 8—not simply the classic liberal pleading philosophy of the federal rules—must be kept in mind when interpreting the requisites and allowances of Rule 9.[10] That said, the Court has stood by the notion that "[t]he federal rules effectively abolish the restrictive theory of the pleadings doctrine" and indicated that stating facts that entitle a litigant to relief "simply, concisely, and directly" will suffice to stave off a dismissal.[11] Thus, although Rule 9(b) calls for fraud (and mistake) to be pleaded with particularity, the allegations still may be short, plain, simple, direct, and concise.[12]

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Westlaw. © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works.

Footnotes

1 Rule 8
See §§ 1201 to 1286.

2 Rule 9(b)
See §§ 1296 to 1301.1.

"Admittedly, Kafi does not allege who forged the signatures, when the signatures were forged, where the signatures were forged, or how the signatures were forged. However, there is no question that this information is peculiarly within the opposing party's knowledge. To hold otherwise would essentially require Kafi first figure out who (allegedly) forged the signatures (without the benefit of discovery) and then drag them into court to explain when, where, and how they did so. This would be a draconian application of Rule 9(b) where, as here, Kafi has demonstrated a reasonable basis for its belief that the signatures are forgeries." Kafi, Inc. v. Sand Canyon Corporation, 2022 WL 3084480 (S.D. Tex. 2022) (magistrate judge) (citations and internal quotation marks omitted), citing Wright & Miller, report and recommendation adopted, 2022 WL 4454395 (S.D. Tex. 2022).

3 Rule 9(a)
See §§ 1292 to 1294.

4 Rule 9(c)
See §§ 1302 to 1304.

5 Pleading philosophy
See §§ 1202, 1215 to 1223, 1281 to 1286.

6 Form of pleading
See §§ 1321 to 1327.

6.50 Simplicity in pleading
Charles E. Clark, The New Federal Rules of Civil Procedure: The Last Phase—Underlying Philosophy Embodied in Some of the Basic Provisions of the New Procedure, 23 A.B.A.J. 976 (1937) ("There is certainly no longer reason to force the pleadings to take the place of proof, and to require other ideas than simple concise statements, free from the requirement of technical detail.").

7 Twombly case
550 U.S. 544, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007).

8 Iqbal case
556 U.S. 662, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009).

9 Twombly and Iqbal pleading standard
See Johnson v. City of Shelby, Miss., 135 S. Ct. 346, 347, 190 L. Ed. 2d 309 (2014) ("A plaintiff, [Twombly and Iqbal] instruct, must plead facts sufficient to show that her claim has substantive plausibility.").

10 Rule 9 subject to Rule 8
Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 686–687 ("Rule 9 * * * does not give [a party] license to evade the less rigid—though still operative—strictures of Rule 8."), citing Wright & Miller.

11 Court's pleading philosophy
Johnson v. City of Shelby, 135 S. Ct. at 347, quoting Wright & Miller.

See also
Amalgamated National Health Fund v. Hickey Freeman Tailored Clothing, Inc., 2024 WL 1333569, *8 (S.D. N.Y. 2024) ("[T]hose portions of Rule 9 that require specific or detailed allegations should not be construed in an unduly strict fashion. * * * [T]he Rule itself requires only 'particularity,' and it is the language of the federal rules, not judicial interpretation, that governs. Therefore, in keeping with the purpose of Rule 9(b), courts tolerate certain ambiguities in a pleading, provided that the allegations about the fraud are sufficient to give notice to the defendant and allow it to prepare its defense.") (citations omitted), quoting Wright & Miller, report and recommendation adopted, 2024 WL 1330049 (S.D. N.Y. 2024).

Deveraux v. Meadowlark of Billings LLC, 2023 WL 2330311, *2, (D. Mont. 2023) ("Rule 9(b)'s requirement of specificity and detailed allegations 'should not be construed in an unduly strict fashion.' * * * Though Plaintiffs do not plead the exact date of the conversation, their identification of the month and year within the case's timeline * * * is sufficiently particular for notice.") (citations omitted), quoting Wright & Miller.

12 Pleading fraud

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

See §§ 1296 to 1298.

Pleading mistake See § 1299.

End of Document

© 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

CASE NO. 4

2021 WL 12320541
Only the Westlaw citation
is currently available.
United States District Court, S.D.
Texas, Corpus Christi Division.

MAXIM CRUDE OIL, LLC, Plaintiff,
v.
NOIL CORP., INC., et al., Defendants.

Civil Action
No.
2
:
21
-
CV
-
90

|
Signed November 16, 2021
|
Entered November 17, 2021

Attorneys and Law Firms

Antonio Ortiz, Shelby A. Jordan, Jordan & Ortiz, PC, Corpus Christi, TX, for Plaintiff.

Michael Lynn Navarre, Matthew R. Beatty, Beatty Navarre Strama, PC, Austin, TX, Marty J. Schwartz, Three First National Plaza, Chicago, IL, for Defendant.

ORDER

DAVID S. MORALES, UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE

1 Before the Court is Defendant Morrell Steve Neely's ("Neely") motion to dismiss Plaintiff Maxim Crude Oil, LLC's second amended complaint. (D.E. 8; D.E. 29). Neely seeks dismissal under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(2) for lack of personal jurisdiction, 12(b)(6) for failure to state a claim, and 9(b) for failure to plead fraud with particularity. (D.E. 8); see FED. R. CIV. P. 12(b)(2), 12(b)(6), 9(b). After considering Plaintiffs second amended complaint (D.E. 29), Neely's motion (D.E. 8), Plaintiff's responses (D.E. 18, D.E. 34), and Neely's reply and surreply (D.E. 24, D.E. 31), the Court DENIES Neely's motion to dismiss. (D.E. 8).

I. Background

On April 23, 2021, Plaintiff filed this lawsuit in state court against Defendant Noil Corporation, Inc. ("Noil") and Neely. (D.E. 1). Neely is Noil's CEO and President. (D.E. 8, p. 2). On May 3, 2021, Defendants removed to this Court based on diversity jurisdiction. (D.E. 1). Plaintiff's second amended complaint sets forth several allegations, including that Noil and Neely fraudulently converted $600,000 from Plaintiff. See (D.E. 29). Plaintiff's second amended complaint presents the following factual allegations (D.E. 29), which are taken as true for purpose of the Rule 12(b)(6) motion.[1] Ramming v. United States, 281 F.3d 158, 161 (5th Cir. 2001) (per curiam) (quoting Oppenheimer v. Prudential Sec. Inc., 94 F.3d 189, 194 (5th Cir. 1996) ("[T]he plaintiff's complaint is to be construed in a light most favorable to the plaintiff [when deciding a Rule 12(b)(6) motion], and the allegations contained therein are to be taken as true.")).

In early March 2021, Plaintiff contacted Neely regarding procuring a fuel product, Naptha, in the Nueces County area. (D.E. 29, p. 9). Neely represented that he could, in fact, procure Naptha for Plaintiff. Id. Relying on Defendants' representations and promises, Plaintiff and Noil entered into a crude products agreement dated March 15, 2021 (the "Agreement"), whereby Plaintiff would purchase Naptha from Defendants on a monthly basis. Id. A material term of the Agreement required that the funds Plaintiff tendered Defendants for Naptha be held in an escrow account until Plaintiff obtained the product. Id. at 10. Noil agents represented in several text messages and emails that the funds would be held in an escrow account. Id. at 10–15. Relying on these representations, Plaintiff wired $2,000,000 to Noil's bank account. Id. at 14.

2 According to Plaintiff, the representations that the funds would be held in an escrow account were false. Id. at 13. Noil did not and never intended to keep the funds in an escrow account. Id. Significantly, Plaintiff never received the product nor assurance that his funds were in an escrow account. Id. at 14–15. Ultimately, Plaintiff terminated the Agreement and demanded the funds be returned. Id. at 15. After Plaintiff threatened to file suit, Defendants returned $1,400,000 of Plaintiff's money, withholding $600,000. Id. at 16.

Plaintiff alleges that Noil is a sham company created by Neely to perpetuate fraud, including inducing people into wiring funds to Noil with no intention of performing its contractual obligations. Id. at 16–17. Plaintiff contends that Neely used Noil to protect his individual liability, knowing that when his fraud is discovered, he will have already drained the corporation's assets. Id. at 17. Stated differently, Plaintiff alleges that Neely—as owner, control person, and alter ego of Noil—converted at least $440,000 in fraudulent transfers out of Maxim's $600,000 for his own benefit and now refuses to return the funds, despite claiming that Noil is a highly successful business. Id.

The Court will first consider the Rule 12(b)(2) jurisdictional attack before considering the Rule 12(b)(6) merits challenge. See Wilson v. Hous. Comm. Coll. Sys., 955 F.3d 490, 494 (5th Cir. 2020).

II. Motion to Dismiss for Lack of Personal Jurisdiction

A. Legal Standard – Rule 12(b)(2)

Under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(2), a court must dismiss a claim if the court lacks personal jurisdiction over the defendant. FED. R. CIV. P. 12(b)(2). In a diversity case, a federal court may exercise personal jurisdiction over a non-resident defendant if the forum state's long-arm statute extends to a particular defendant and exercising jurisdiction over that defendant would comport with due process. Carmona v. Leo Ship Mgmt., Inc., 924 F.3d 190, 193 (5th Cir. 2019). Texas's long-arm statute extends to the limits of due process, so the federal due process analysis is used in determining personal jurisdiction. Halliburton Energy Servs., Inc. v. Ironshore Specialty Ins. Co., 921 F.3d 522, 539 (5th Cir. 2019). Federal due process permits the exercise of specific jurisdiction if:

> (1) the defendant has minimum contacts with the forum state, i.e., it purposely directed its activities toward the forum state or purposefully availed itself of the privileges of conducting activities there; (2) the plaintiff's cause of action arises out of or results from the defendant's forum-related contacts; and (3) the exercise of personal jurisdiction is fair and reasonable.

Carmona, 924 F.3d at 193 (quoting Seiferth v. Helicopteros Atuneros, Inc., 472 F.3d 266, 271 (5th Cir. 2006)).

When a district court rules on a Rule 12(b)(2) motion without a hearing, it is the plaintiff's burden to make a prima facie showing of jurisdiction. Johnston v. Multidata Sys. Int'l Corp., 523 F.3d 602, 609 (5th Cir. 2008). Proof by preponderance of the evidence is not required. Id. Moreover, "uncontroverted allegations in the plaintiff's complaint must be taken as true." Id. However, a court need not credit a plaintiff's conclusory allegations, even if uncontroverted. Panda Brandywine Corp. v. Potomac Elec. Power Co., 253 F.3d 865, 869 (5th Cir. 2001).

B. Plaintiff has made a prima facie showing of personal jurisdiction over Neely via Plaintiff's fraudulent transfer claims.

Neely moved to dismiss the suit against him for lack of personal jurisdiction, contending that he does not have minimum contacts with Texas. (D.E. 8, p. 3–5). Plaintiff argues that Neely has established minimum contacts with Texas, including through Neely's activities as alleged in Plaintiff's fraudulent transfer claims. (D.E. 29, p. 4–7). In those claims, Plaintiff alleges that Neely's minimum contacts with Texas are established under the Texas Uniform Fraudulent Transfer Act ("TUFTA"), with Noil as the fraudulent transferor and Neely as the fraudulent transferee. Id. at 27–30. Neely disagrees, raising the following counter arguments. See (D.E. 31).

3 First, Neely contends that Plaintiff's allegations are "conclusory." (D.E. 31, p. 2). Second, Neely argues that Plaintiff does not identify a fraudulent transfer and does not and cannot allege that the unidentified transfer was initiated in Texas, occurred in Texas, or involved a Texas bank. Id. at 3. Neely relies on his own declaration to controvert Plaintiff's allegations, in which he avers that:

> Since at least January 1, 2021, Noil has not had a bank account with a bank that is based in Texas or has a branch in Texas. Since at least January 1, 2021, I have > not had a bank account with a bank that is based in Texas or has a branch in Texas. I do not reside in Texas and have never lived in Texas.... Noil is not insolvent and has not been insolvent at any time in 2021.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

(D.E. 31-1, p. 1).

Intentional conduct designed to cause harm in the forum state is a basis for finding minimum contacts. Sourcing Mgmt., Inc. v. Simclair, Inc., 118 F. Supp. 3d 899, 911 (N.D. Tex. 2015) (citing Calder v. Jones, 465 U.S. 783, 787–90 (1984) (explaining that defendants "reasonably anticipate[d] being haled into court [in the forum state]" because "their intentional, and allegedly tortious actions were expressly aimed at" the forum state and "they knew the brunt of th[e] injury would be felt" in the forum state). Under this standard, the Fifth Circuit has upheld a district court's finding of personal jurisdiction over a party that had "no contacts with the forum state, Texas, other than its involvement in a fraudulent scheme that affected 'a known, major creditor in Texas whose right to payment arises out of contacts that share a strong connection with Texas.' " Id. (quoting Mullins v. TestAmerica, Inc., 564 F.3d 386, 402 (5th Cir. 2009)); see, e.g., Dontos v. Vendomation NZ Ltd., 582 F. App'x 338, 345–48 (5th Cir. 2014) (holding that personal jurisdiction existed where plaintiff alleged that out-of-state defendants fraudulently transferred assets to prevent a Texas creditor/plaintiff from collecting a pre-existing Texas judgment).

Taking all Plaintiff's uncontroverted allegations as true, the Court determines that Plaintiff has made a prima facie showing that Noil fraudulently transferred Plaintiff's assets to Neely to prevent Plaintiff from recovering those assets should Plaintiff prevail in this case. See (D.E. 15; D.E. 29). Specifically, Plaintiff alleges that "Noil is insolvent" and that the transfers were made "for less than reasonably equivalent value" in exchange for the transfer. (D.E. 15, p. 28; D.E. 29, p. 29). In support, Plaintiff makes several specific factual allegations, including that:

- Another corporation that Neely owned and operated was sued in Texas, the plaintiff in that case was awarded a judgment, and that judgment was never collected.
- Neely created Noil to perpetuate similar fraudulent conduct.
- The address Noil uses as its office space is vacant and has been for over a year.
- Noil only retains possession of $160,000 out of $600,000 of Plaintiff's funds.
- Noil's fraudulent transfers include the transfer of at least $440,000 of Plaintiff's funds that Noil converted from Plaintiff.
- Noil did not receive reasonably equivalent value for the funds because only $160,000 remains in Noil's account.

(D.E. 29, p. 8, 18, 27–29). Through these specific factual allegations, Plaintiff carries its burden of making a prima facie showing of personal jurisdiction.

4 Respecting Neely's declaration, the Court finds that it does not controvert Plaintiff's specific factual allegations. See Johnston v. Multidata Sys. Int'l Corp., 523 F.3d 602, 609 (5th Cir. 2008) ("[O]n a motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction, uncontroverted allegations in the plaintiff's complaint must be taken as true, and conflicts between the facts contained in the parties' affidavits must be resolved in the plaintiff's favor for purposes of determining whether a prima facie case for personal jurisdiction exists."). Importantly, Neely does not dispute that the $440,000 in transfers were made, that he was the transferee of any of the $440,000, nor that the transfers were made for less than reasonably equivalent value. On each of these points, Plaintiff makes specific factual allegations that support a fraudulent transfer claim on the pleadings and is enough, using a prima facie standard, to establish personal jurisdiction over Neely via the TUFTA. See, e.g., Mullins., 564 F.3d at 402; Sourcing Mgmt., Inc., 118 F. Supp. 3d at 911. Neely's conclusory allegation that Noil is not insolvent does not controvert Plaintiff's allegations.

For these reasons, the Court may exercise personal jurisdiction over Neely and, accordingly, the Court DENIES Neely's motion to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction.

III. Motion to Dismiss for Failure to State a Claim

A. Legal Standard – Rule 12(b)(6)

To survive a motion to dismiss under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6), "a complaint must contain sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to 'state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.' " Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678 (2009) (quoting Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 570 (2007)). A claim is facially plausible "when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Id. (citing Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556). The facial plausibility standard is not a probability standard, but it requires the plaintiff's factual allegations "to raise a right to relief above the speculative level." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555. While a court must take all factual allegations in the complaint as true and draw all reasonable inferences in the plaintiff's favor, a court is not bound "to accept as true a legal conclusion couched as a factual allegation." Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678 (citing Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555).

Here, Neely argues that the Court should dismiss all claims against him because Plaintiff fails to plead specific factual allegations as to Neely, individually. (D.E. 8, p. 7). In response, Plaintiff states that he has pled sufficient facts to recover on all claims against Neely through Plaintiff's alter ego claim, which alleges that Neely was the control person of Noil and created Noil to defraud Plaintiff, and, as such, is jointly liable for Noil's misconduct. See (D.E. 18, p. 2–4, 16). The Court first addresses Plaintiff's alter ego theory and then each of Plaintiff's remaining claims.

B. Piercing the Corporate Veil – Noil as the Alter Ego of Neely

Neely argues that Plaintiff's piercing the corporate veil claim does not state a claim for relief against Neely. (D.E. 24, p. 10). Neely states that the claim is merely a recitation of the elements and lacks specific factual allegations. Id.

i. Choice of Law

Where federal court jurisdiction is based on diversity, courts apply the conflict of laws rule of the state in which it sits to determine which state's substantive law should be applied. Alberto v. Diversified Grp., Inc., 55 F.3d 201, 203 (5th Cir. 1995). Under Texas law, "[o]nly the laws of the jurisdiction of incorporation of a foreign corporation shall govern ... the liability, if any, of shareholders of the foreign corporation for the debts, liabilities, and obligations of the foreign corporation for which they are not otherwise liable by statute or agreement." Id.

Here, Plaintiff seeks to pierce the corporate veil of Noil, an Illinois corporation, to hold Neely, an officer of Noil, personally liable for debts that Noil allegedly owes Plaintiff. See (D.E. 29, p. 26). Applying Texas choice of law rules, Neely's liability is governed by the laws of the jurisdiction of Noil's incorporation, which is Illinois. See Alberto, 55 F.3d at 203–04; (D.E. 1, p. 4) (stating that Noil is incorporated and has its principal place of business in Illinois).

ii. Piercing the Corporate Veil

5 To pierce the corporate veil under Illinois law, a plaintiff must satisfy a two-pronged test. Laborers' Pension Fund v. Lay-Com, Inc., 580 F.3d 602, 610 (7th Cir. 2009) (applying Illinois state law). First, a plaintiff must prove that there is a unity of interest and ownership such "that the separate personalities of the corporation and the individual or other corporation no longer exist." Id. at 569–70. Second, a plaintiff must show that circumstances exist "such that adherence to the fiction of [a] separate corporate existence would sanction a fraud or promote injustice." Id.

Here, Plaintiff states a plausible claim upon which relief could be granted. Plaintiff alleges that Noil is sham corporation that Neely formed only after dissolving his last corporation because it had judgments against it from another fraud lawsuit. (D.E. 15, p. 2). Plaintiff then alleges that Neely, through Noil and Noil's agents, illegally converted Plaintiff's money, which Defendants had represented was held in an escrow account and which Plaintiff was owed because Plaintiff canceled the contract per the Agreement's terms. Id. at 3. After accepting all the factual allegations as true, construing the complaint in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, and drawing reasonable inferences in Plaintiff's favor, Plaintiff's theory is that: (1) Neely used Noil as his alter ego; (2) to protect him from personal liability beyond the corporate veil; (3) and directed his agents to misrepresent the nature of the escrow account; (4) to induce Plaintiff into wiring money; (5) which he illegally converted by refusing to refund $600,000 to which Plaintiff was entitled. Plaintiff does more than restate the claim's elements and sufficiently supports the complaint with enough factual allegations to narrate a plausible theory. Accordingly, Neely's Rule 12(b)(6) motion is denied with respect to Plaintiff's alter ego theory.

C. Breach of Contract

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Neely argues that Plaintiff cannot state a breach of contract claim against Neely because Neely is not a party to the contract. (D.E. 8, p. 2). However, as explained above, Plaintiff has sufficiently alleged that Noil was Neely's alter ego. Accordingly, the only remaining allegation Plaintiff must state is that Noil breached its contract with Plaintiff.[2] Under Texas law, the elements of a breach of contract claim are "(1) the existence of a valid contract; (2) performance or tendered performance by the plaintiff; (3) breach of the contract by the defendant; and (4) damages sustained by the plaintiff as a result of the breach." Smith Intern, Inc. v. Egle Grp., LLC, 490 F.3d 380 (5th Cir. 2007) (citing Valero Mktg. &Supply Co. v. Kalama Int'l, L.L.C., 51 S.W.3d 345, 351 (Tex. App.—Houston [1st Dist.] 2001, pet. denied)).

Here, Plaintiff alleges a breach of contract claim against Noil because Plaintiff alleges that there is a valid and enforceable contract, the contract required an escrow structure, and that Noil breached the agreement by converting the funds for its own use and dispersing the funds from the account prior to Plaintiff receiving any product from Noil. (D.E. 29, p. 23). Noil's failure to deliver Plaintiff the product and to put the funds in an escrow account caused Plaintiff's injury, the $600,000 that Plaintiff wired Noil. Id. As such, Plaintiff has stated a breach of contract claim and Neely's Rule 12(b)(6) motion is denied on this claim.

D. Unjust Enrichment

6 Neely argues that Plaintiff cannot plead an unjust enrichment claim against Neely because Noil, not Neely, received the money from Plaintiff. (D.E. 24, p. 9). Under Texas law, unjust enrichment allows recovery "when one person has obtained a benefit from another by fraud, duress, or the taking of an undue advantage." Perales v. Bank of America, N.A., 2014 WL 3907793, *3 (S.D. Tex. Aug. 11, 2014) (citing Heldenfels Bros., Inc. v. City of Corpus Christi, 832 S.W.2d 39, 41 (Tex. 1992)). Unjust enrichment includes a plaintiff's transfer to a defendant, resulting in the defendant's material gain and the plaintiff's material loss. Id.

Here, accepting all factual allegations as true and construing them in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, Plaintiff sufficiently alleges an unjust enrichment claim against Neely. As explained above, Plaintiff articulates a theory in which Neely directed his alter ego, Noil, to fraudulently convert $600,000 belonging to Plaintiff. (D.E. 29, p. 16–17). As such, Neely's Rule 12(b)(6) motion is denied regarding Plaintiff's unjust enrichment claim.

E. Money Had & Received

Neely's argument to dismiss this claim fails for the same reason explained for Plaintiff's unjust enrichment claim. The elements of a claim for money had and received are that (1) the defendant holds money and (2) the money in equity and good conscience belongs to plaintiff. Bank of Saipan v. CNG Fin. Corp., 380 F.3d 836, 840 (5th Cir. 2004) (citing Staats v. Miller, 243 S.W.2d 686, 687–88 (Tex. 1951)). Accepting all factual allegations as true and construing them in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, Plaintiff plausibly alleges that Plaintiff owned the $600,000 wired to Noil, which Neely converted for his own direct benefit and to perpetuate fraud. (D.E. 29, p. 24).

Neely's Rule 12(b)(6) motion is denied on this claim.

F. Breach of Fiduciary Duty & Conversion

Neely argues that Plaintiff fails to plead any facts that would establish a fiduciary relationship between Plaintiff and Neely. (D.E. 24, p. 9). However, an escrow agent owes a fiduciary duty to escrow contract parties. Alexander O & G, LLC v. Nomad Land & Energy Resources, LLC, 313 F. Supp. 794, 801 (S.D. Tex. 2018) (quoting Bell v. Safeco Title Ins. Co., 830 S.W.2d 157, 160 (Tex. App.—Dallas 1992, writ denied)). Here, taking all Plaintiff's factual allegations as true and construing them in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, Plaintiff plausibly alleges a fiduciary relationship between Neely and Plaintiff, asserting that Noil represented that funds would be placed into an escrow account while Noil secured the product. (D.E. 29, p. 12–18). Neely, as Noil's control person, breached his fiduciary duty when he withdrew funds from the account and converted them for his own use. Id. at 19. Neely's Rule 12(b)(6) motion is denied on this claim

G. Fraudulent Transfer under Texas Uniform Fraudulent Transfer Act §§ 24.005 & 24.006(a)

Neely argues that Plaintiff fails to state a claim for fraudulent transfer because Plaintiff fails to allege specific factual allegations against Neely. (D.E. 31, p. 5). Under the TUFTA, a fraudulent transfer may be actual or constructive. Matter of Life Partners Holdings, Inc., 926 F.3d 103, 117, 119 (5th Cir. 2019). The elements of an actual fraudulent transfer claim are: (1) a creditor; (2) a debtor; (3) the debtor transferred assets shortly before or after the creditor's claim arose; (4) with actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud any of the debtor's creditors. Id. at 117 (citing Nwekedi v. Unlimited Restoration Specialists, Inc., 428 S.W.3d 191, 204–05 (Tex. App.—Houston [1st Dist.] 2014, pet. denied)). Constructive fraudulent transfer has the same elements, except that instead of actual intent, a plaintiff can show that (1) the debtor did not receive reasonably equivalent value for the transfer and (2) the transferor was financially vulnerable or insolvent at the time of the transaction. Id. at 119–120 (citing Janvey v. Golf Channel, Inc., 487 S.W.3d 560, 562, 566 & n.21 (Tex. 2016); TEX. BUS. & COMM. CODE § 24.006(a)).

7 Here, Plaintiff has sufficiently alleged both actual and constructive fraudulent transfer claims. First, Plaintiff alleges that he is a creditor owed money that Noil converted from Plaintiff at Neely's direction and for Neely's benefit. (D.E. 29, p. 27). This is supported by Plaintiff's allegation that Plaintiff wired $600,000 to Noil, $440,000 of which Noil no longer possesses. Id. Second, Neely directed Noil to transfer the funds between March 2021 and May 20, 2021, shortly after Plaintiff's claims arose so that Noil would have no cash or assets from which Plaintiff could recover. (D.E. 34, p. 6; D.E. 29, p. 18). Plaintiff alleges that Noil was insolvent during the transfer, and received less than fair value for the transfer, since Noil only has $160,000 left of the funds. (D.E. 29, p. 27–28). Neely's Rule 12(b)(6) motion is denied on this claim.

Overall, taking all factual allegations in the complaint as true and drawing all reasonable inferences in Plaintiff's favor, the Court determines that Plaintiff has plausibly stated claims for relief against Neely. Neely's Rule 12(b)(6) motion is therefore DENIED.

IV. Motion to Dismiss for Failure to Plead Fraud with Particularity

A. Legal Standard – Rule 9(b)

To satisfy Rule 9(b)'s heightened pleading standards, a plaintiff must specifically plead the statements contended to be fraudulent, identify the speaker, state when and where the statements were made, and articulate a theory that would render the statement fraudulent. See ABC Arbitrage Plaintiffs Grp. v. Tchuruk, 291 F.3d 336 (5th Cir. 2002); Williams v. Bell Helicopter Textron, Inc., 417 F.3d 450, 453 (5th Cir. 2005). Additionally, "[i]n cases concerning fraudulent misrepresentation and omission of facts, Rule 9(b) typically requires the claimant to plead the type of facts omitted, the place in which the omissions should have appeared, and the way in which the omitted facts made the representations misleading." Carroll v. Fort James Corp., 470 F.3d 1171, 1174 (5th Cir. 2006) (citations omitted).

B. Fraudulent Misrepresentations by Neely

Neely argues that Plaintiff fails to allege fraud with particularity because Plaintiff does not plead that Neely made the statement, when he made the statement, where he made the statement, what Neely obtained from the statement, and why the statement was fraudulent. (D.E. 8, p. 8). A plaintiff asserting a fraudulent misrepresentation claim must allege that (1) a material misrepresentation was made; (2) the representation was false; (3) when the representation was made, the speaker knew it was false or made it recklessly without any knowledge of the truth and as a positive assertion; (4) the speaker made the representation with the intent that the plaintiff act upon it; (5) the plaintiff acted in reliance on the representation; and (6) the plaintiff thereby suffered injury. SGK Properties, LLC v. U.S. Bank Nat'l Ass'n for Lehman Bros. Small Balance Com. Mortg. Pass-Through Certificates, Series 2007-3, 881 F.3d 933, 943 (5th Cir. 2018) (citing Texas law)).

Here, Plaintiff's second amended complaint specifically includes the requisite allegations, including the "who, what, when, and how" of the alleged misrepresentations. See (D.E. 15); see also Tchuruk, 291 F.3d 336. First, Plaintiff alleges that Defendants made fraudulent statements misrepresenting Noil's ability to secure Naptha and that the prepaid funds would be held in an escrow account. (D.E. 15, p. 9–10). Second, Plaintiff specifically identifies Neely and his agents as speakers of the fraudulent statements. Id. at 9–12. Plaintiff's complaint includes emails and text messages, indicating where the statements were made. Id. While Jennifer Watson, not Neely, made these communications, Plaintiff articulates a theory that would render the statement fraudulent by alleging that Neely directed the sham organization as a scheme to perpetuate fraud. See id. at 27. As such, the Court finds that Plaintiff has sufficiently stated a fraudulent misrepresentation claim under Rule 9's heightened pleading standards.

C. Fraud by Non-Disclosure and Omission by Neely

8 Neely argues that Plaintiff fails to identify the omission, that Neely was the speaker, what Neely obtained from the omission, and why the omission was fraudulent. (D.E. 8, p. 8). "Under Texas law, fraud by non-disclosure requires: (1) a deliberate failure to disclose material facts; (2) a duty to disclose; (3) that the plaintiff was ignorant and did not have an equal opportunity to discover; (4) that the defendant intended the plaintiff to act or refrain from acting; and (5) injury." Savoia-McHugh v. McCrary, 2021 WL 4066992, *4 (S.D. Tex. Sept. 7, 2021) (citing Bombardier Aerospace Corp. v. SPEP Aircraft Holdings, LLC, 572 S.W.3d 213, 219–20 (Tex. 2019)).

Here, Plaintiff's second amended complaint sufficiently demonstrates the elements of fraud by non-disclosure and omission. Plaintiff alleges that Neely, in directing Noil, intentionally failed to disclose that the funds Plaintiff wired Noil would not be kept in an escrow account nor be treated as escrow funds. (D.E. 29, p. 13). Plaintiff alleges this failure was material because Plaintiff transferred Noil the funds while relying on the promise that they would be put in an escrow account. Id. at 14. But-for Neely's omissions and failure to correct Plaintiff's understanding that the funds would be in an escrow account, Plaintiff would not have transferred Noil the money. Id. As a result, Plaintiff was injured in the amount of $600,000. Id. at 16. Thus, the Court finds that Plaintiff has sufficiently stated a fraud by omission claim.

For these reasons, the Court determines that Plaintiff has satisfied the heightened pleading standard on its fraudulent misrepresentation and fraudulent omission claims. Accordingly, Neely's Rule 9(b) motion is DENIED.

V. Conclusion

For the reasons stated herein, the Court DENIES Defendant Neely's motion to dismiss in its entirety. (D.E. 8).

SO ORDERED.

All Citations

Not Reported in Fed. Supp., 2021 WL 12320541

Footnotes

1 Neely also moves to dismiss himself under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(2) for lack of personal jurisdiction, see (D.E. 18, p. 13), which holds a different standard of review than Rule 12(b)(6). See Johnston v. Multidata Sys. Int'l Corp., 523 F.3d 602, 609 (5th Cir. 2008) (providing that when a district court rules on a Rule 12(b)(2) motion without an evidentiary hearing, it is the plaintiff's burden to make a prima facie showing of jurisdiction over a non-resident). Proof by a preponderance of the evidence is not required. Id. "Moreover, on a motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction, uncontroverted allegations in the plaintiff's complaint must be taken as true, and conflicts between the facts contained in the parties' affidavits must be resolved in the plaintiff's favor for purposes of determining whether a prima facie case for personal jurisdiction exists." Id. (quoting D.J. Invs., Inc. v. Metzeler Motorcycle Tire Agent Gregg, Inc., 754 F.2d 542, 546 (5th Cir. 1985)).

2 Illinois law, which would be the choice of law in determining whether Noil is the alter ego of Neely, permits courts to apply alter ego liability to contractual claims. See UIRC-GSA Holdings Inc. v. William Blair & Co., 289 F. Supp. 3d 852 (N.D. Ill. 2018) (citing Illinois law).

End of Document

© 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

CASE NO. 5

2015 WL 5890103
Only the Westlaw citation
is currently available.

SEE TX R RAP RULE 47.2
FOR DESIGNATION AND SIGNING OF OPINIONS.

Court of Appeals of Texas, Houston (1st Dist.).

Alan Nelson CROTTS, Appellant
v.
John F. HEALEY, Jr. and Jeff Strange, Appellees

NO. 01–15–00076–CV
|
Opinion issued October 8, 2015

On Appeal from the 268th District Court, Fort Bend County, Texas, Trial Court Case No. 14–DCV–217232

Attorneys and Law Firms

Crotts, Alan Nelson, for Appellant.

Randall W. Morse, for Appellees.

Panel consists of Justices Jennings, Higley, and Brown.

MEMORANDUM OPINION

Harvey Brown, Justice

1 Alan Nelson Crotts sued his local district attorney and assistant district attorney for refusing to prosecute a theft allegedly committed against him by Jessalyn Cole, the mother of his children, in a dispute over child support payments. The defendants filed a plea to the jurisdiction, which the trial court granted. Crott's case was dismissed. In three issues, Crotts contends that (1) the trial court erred in granting the plea because the district attorney and assistant district attorney are not entitled to prosecutorial immunity, (2) this lawsuit is not an impermissible collateral attack on his child support proceeding, and (3) the trial court should not have dismissed the lawsuit "with prejudice." Because the defendants are entitled to absolute prosecutorial immunity, we affirm.

Background

Jessalyn Cole, the mother of Alan Nelson Crotts's children, claimed Crotts owed child support. The Child Support Division of the Office of the Attorney General garnished nearly $7,000 from Crotts's income tax return for child support payments. Crotts argued that Cole was not entitled to the $7,000.

In a lawsuit for modification of the child support order, the trial court denied Crotts's request for a $7,000 credit for the alleged overpayment resulting from the garnishment. About a year after that order, Crotts reported Cole to the Sugar Land Police for theft of the $7,000 in child support Crotts claimed he did not owe. Jeff Strange, the Assistant District Attorney for Fort Bend County, informed the police he would not prosecute Cole for theft.

Crotts filed this lawsuit against John F. Healey, Jr., the Fort Bend District Attorney, and Strange for failure to prosecute Cole, alleging civil rights violations, breach of contract, and abuse of process. Healey and Strange filed a plea to the jurisdiction, which the trial court granted. Crotts appeals.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Standard of Review

A plea to the jurisdiction challenges the trial court's subject-matter jurisdiction over a case. Bland Indep. Sch. Dist. v. Blue, 34 S.W.3d 547, 554 (Tex.2000); Pineda v. City of Houston, 175 S.W.3d 276, 279 (Tex.App.—Houston [1st Dist.] 2004, no pet.). Subject-matter jurisdiction is required for a court to have authority to decide a case and is never presumed. Tex. Ass'n of Bus. v. Tex. Air Control Bd., 852 S.W.2d 440, 443–45 (Tex.1993). The plaintiff has the burden to allege facts affirmatively demonstrating that the trial court has subject-matter jurisdiction. Id. at 446; Richardson v. First Nat'l Life Ins. Co., 419 S.W.2d 836, 839 (Tex.1967).

The existence of subject-matter jurisdiction is a question of law. State Dep't of Highways & Pub. Transp. v. Gonzalez, 82 S.W.3d 322, 327 (Tex.2002); Mayhew v. Town of Sunnyvale, 964 S.W.2d 922, 928 (Tex.1998). Therefore, we review de novo the trial court's ruling on a plea to the jurisdiction. Mayhew, 964 S.W.2d at 928.

Prosecutorial Immunity

Healey and Strange argue they are entitled to "the defense of absolute prosecutorial immunity from any suit for damages," for their conduct performing discretionary duties.

2 Crotts disagrees, arguing that "prosecutors enjoy absolute immunity only when initiating a prosecution and in presenting the State's case." Crotts argues Healey and Strange never initiated a case, instead they "advised the Sugar Land Police Department that they would not prosecute a case.... In essence, [Healey and Strange] performed no duties related to their office."

A. Healey and Strange are entitled to absolute prosecutorial immunity

A prosecutor, in certain circumstances, is entitled to absolute immunity from a lawsuit for damages. Imbler v. Pachtman, 424 U.S. 409, 411, 96 S.Ct. 984, 986 (1976); Bradt v. West, 892 S.W.2d 56, 71 (Tex.App.—Houston [1st Dist.] 1994, writ denied). Absolute immunity extends to both a prosecutor and to the prosecutor's deputies. See Imbler, 424 U.S. at 411, 96 S.Ct. at 986 (applying absolute prosecutorial immunity to deputy district attorney). To determine when a prosecutor is entitled to immunity, Texas applies a "functional approach." Bradt, 892 S.W.2d.at 69. This approach "focuses on the nature of the official acts of which the plaintiff complains" and shields a prosecutor for acts "intimately associated with the judicial phase of the criminal process." Id. at 69–70. In applying the functional approach, "Texas courts follow federal jurisprudence." Clawson v. Wharton Cnty., 941 S.W.2d 267, 271 (Tex.App.—Corpus Christi 1996, writ denied); see Bradt, 892 S.W.2d at 69; Brown v. Lubbock Cnty. Comm'rs Court, 185 S.W.3d 499, 505 (Tex.App.—Amarillo 2005, no pet.); Oden v. Reader, 935 S.W.2d 470, 474 (Tex.App.—Tyler 1996, no writ).

The decision on whether to initiate a prosecution is a "quintessential function" of a prosecutor "intimately associated with the judicial phase of the criminal process." Bradt, 892 S.W.2d at 70. Thus, "in initiating a prosecution ... the prosecutor is immune from a civil suit for damages." Imbler, 424 U.S. at 430, 96 S.Ct. at 995. A prosecutor receives absolute immunity because civil liability "for his decision to initiate and pursue a prosecution could skew his decisionmaking, tempting him to consider the personal ramifications of his decision rather than rest that decision purely on appropriate concerns." Bradt, 892 S.W.2d at 70 (quoting Schloss v. Bouse, 876 F.2d 287, 289–90 (2d Cir.1989)).

Texas law does not support Crotts's distinction between initiating and declining to initiate a prosecution. "[T]he decision not to prosecute ... is the quintessential function of a prosecutor." Clawson, 941 S.W.2d at 272; see Font v. Carr, 867 S.W.2d 873, 876 (Tex.App.—Houston [1st Dist.] 1993, writ dism'd w.o.j.) (citing Miller v. Curry, 625 S.W.2d 84, 87 (Tex.App.—Fort Worth 1981, writ ref'd n.r.e.)) (recognizing "absolute prosecutorial immunity for decisions to prosecute or not prosecute criminal complaints"). Public policy supports applying prosecutorial immunity when a prosecutor chooses not to initiate a prosecution because, "if the prosecutor were not immune ... suits for civil damages could be expected with considerable frequency from disgruntled, frustrated citizens whose complaints and grievances the prosecutor, in exercising his best judgment, chose not to file and prosecute. His time, energies and resources would be seriously affected." Miller, 625 S.W.2d at 87. Eleven federal circuits have reached the same conclusion. Pugh v. Balish, 564 Fed.Appx. 1010, 1013 (11th Cir.2014); Smith v. McCarthy, 349 Fed.Appx. 851, 859 (4th Cir.2009); Nedab v. Litten, 184 Fed.Appx. 261, 262 (3d Cir.2006); Botello v. Gammick, 413 F.3d 971, 976 (9th Cir.2005); Steele v. City of Bemidji, 257 F.3d 902, 906 (8th Cir.2001); Ireland v. Tunis, 113 F.3d 1435, 1446 (6th Cir.1997); Mendenhall v. Goldsmith, 59 F.3d 685, 691 n.10 (7th Cir.1995); Guzman–Rivera v. Rivera–Cruz, 55 F.3d 26, 31 (1st Cir.1995); Schloss, 876 F.2d at 290; Morrison v. City of Baton Rouge, 761 F.2d 242, 248 (5th Cir.1985); Dohaish v. Tooley, 670 F.2d 934, 938 (10th Cir.1982).

3 Under Texas law, Healey and Strange are entitled to absolute prosecutorial immunity for their decision not to prosecute Cole. Crotts attempts to circumvent prosecutorial immunity by alleging that he in only complaining of "legal advice" Strange gave the police to not file a police report. A prosecutor is not protected by absolute immunity when giving legal advice to law enforcement. Burns v. Reed, 500 U.S. 478, 496, 111 S.Ct. 1934, 1944–45 (1991); Font, 867 S.W.2d at 875. In Font v. Carr, a bondsman sued a prosecutor for advising the sheriff to require the bondsman to show additional proof of sufficiency of security for bonds he posted. Font, 867 S.W.2d at 875. This Court held that this advice was not "bound up with the judicial process" and, thus, the prosecutor was not entitled to absolute prosecutorial immunity. Id. at 874, 876. In contrast, the advice here was intertwined with the decision not to prosecute. Crotts's petition makes clear that Healey and Strange's decision not to prosecute Cole underlies all of his asserted causes of action. [1]

This "advice" Strange gave the police was connected with the district attorney's office's decision not to prosecute. See Koubriti v. Convertino, 593 F.3d 459, 469–70 (6th Cir.2010) (holding prosecutor's recommendation to police officer that he need not disclose certain evidence to defendant was not "legal advice" but rather part of decisions for which the prosecutor was entitled to prosecutorial immunity). Because Healey and Strange did not give the police any legal advice and Crotts only complains of their decision not to prosecute Cole, Healey and Strange are entitled to absolute prosecutorial immunity.

To the extent absolute prosecutorial immunity may not shield Healey and Strange from liability for breach of contract, Crotts cannot successfully assert a breach-of-contract claim against them. To successfully assert a claim for breach of contract, a contract must exist between the parties. Graves v. Logan, 404 S.W.3d 582, 584 (Tex.App.—Houston [1st Dist.] 2010, no pet.). Crotts claims that Healey and Strange's oaths of office constitute a contract between them and the public. No contract, however, has been entered into between Crotts and Healey and Strange; thus, Crotts cannot sue them for breach of contract. See Price v. Schnaufer, 81 S.W.2d 160, 160–61 (Tex.Civ.App.—Fort Worth 1935, no writ) (holding that member of public cannot assert breach-of-contract claim against police officer based on contract formed by police officer's oath of office).

Because Healey and Strange are entitled to absolute immunity, we overrule his first issue. We do not reach the issues of qualified immunity, state sovereign immunity, or Eleventh amendment immunity. Nor do we reach Crotts's second issue of whether this lawsuit constituted an improper collateral attack on the child support proceedings.

B. Dismissal with prejudice

In his third issue, Crotts argues that the trial court should have dismissed his lawsuit without prejudice. Ordinarily, if the trial court grants a plea to the jurisdiction, it should not dismiss the lawsuit with prejudice until it first affords the plaintiff a reasonable opportunity to amend the jurisdictionally defective pleading. Univ. of Tex. M.D. Anderson Cancer Ctr. v. Eltonsy, 451 S.W.3d 478, 482 (Tex.App.—Houston [14th Dist.] 2014, no pet.). "Incurably defective claims, however, must be dismissed with prejudice." Tex. A & M Univ. Sys. v. Koseoglu, 233 S.W.3d 835, 846 (Tex.2007). A dismissal of a lawsuit by granting a plea to the jurisdiction on the grounds of immunity "is with prejudice because a plaintiff should not be permitted to relitigate jurisdiction once that issue has been finally determined." Harris Cnty. v. Sykes, 136 S.W.3d 635, 639 (Tex.2004). Here, the jurisdictional defects are incurable: no amount of repleading will overcome absolute immunity. Accordingly, we conclude that the trial court did not err in dismissing Crotts's lawsuit with prejudice. We overrule his third and final issue.

Conclusion

4 We affirm the judgment of the trial court.

All Citations

Not Reported in S.W. Rptr., 2015 WL 5890103

Footnotes

1 In his cause of action for violation of his civil rights, Crotts complains that Healey and Strange "have refused to prosecute crimes committed against the Plaintiff in the same manner as crimes committed against others." In his cause of action for breach of contract, Crotts complains that "the Defendants substantially breached [their employment] contract, failing in whole or in part, to faithfully perform their duties, which include, but are not limited to, the diligent prosecution of crimes committed within their jurisdiction, refusing to prosecute crimes not supported by probable cause, and to see that justice is done, not merely seek convictions." In his cause of action for abuse of process, Crotts complains that "[t]he Defendant's perverted the proper use of legal process by refusing to prosecute crimes committed against the Plaintiff, thereby violating the Plaintiff's civil rights."

End of Document

© 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

CASE NO. 6

2019 WL 13221680
Only the Westlaw citation
is currently available.
United States District Court, S.D.
Texas, Corpus Christi Division.

Diana BOND, Plaintiff,
v.
NUECES COUNTY,
TEXAS, et al., Defendants.

Civil Action
No.
2
:
19
-
CV
-
43
|

Signed September 5, 2019

Attorneys and Law Firms

Christopher J. Gale, Amie Augenstein, Gale Law Group PLLC, Corpus Christi, TX, for Plaintiff.

Calvin Trey Scott, Kennedy Attorneys and Counselors at Law, Dallas, TX, for Defendant Jackie Blevins.

Nichol L. Bunn, Lewis Brisbois Bisgaard & Smith, Calvin Trey Scott, Kennedy Attorneys and Counselors at Law, Dallas, TX, for Defendant Wellpath LLC.

ORDER GRANTING MOTION TO DISMISS

DAVID S. MORALES, UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE

1 In this civil rights action brought under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, Plaintiff Diana Bond claims that Nueces County employees denied adequate medical attention to Plaintiffs daughter, Tami Bond ("Bond"), who died while detained at the Nueces County Jail. (D.E. 29). Before the Court is Defendants' Supplemental Motion to Dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. (D.E. 33). The Motion to Dismiss was filed by Nueces County, Texas ("Nueces County"), Elizabeth Alvarado, Jasmine Drake, Michael Alvarez, Anthony Munoz, Jose Rodriguez, Luis Rivera, Jose Aguayo, and Chris Gomez (together "Individual County Defendants"). For the reasons stated below, Defendants' Motion to Dismiss is GRANTED. Plaintiff may file for leave to amend on or before September 19, 2019.

I. Procedural Background

On February 5, 2019, Plaintiff filed her Original Complaint alleging that Defendants did not provide adequate medical care to treat Plaintiff's serious medical needs in violation of her constitutional rights.[1] (D.E. 1). She named as Defendants: (1) Nueces County, Texas; (2) two John Doe defendants; and (3) two Jane Doe defendants. (D.E. 1). On February 11, 2019,

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Plaintiff filed her First Amended Complaint naming the same defendants. (D.E. 3).

On April 22, 2019, Nueces County filed a 12(b)(6) Motion to Dismiss. (D.E. 10). The Plaintiff responded on May 28, 2019, (D.E. 17), and Nueces County replied on June 4, 2019. (D.E. 21). In Plaintiff's response, she requested leave to amend, which the Court granted on June 12, 2019. (D.E. 22).

On July 1, 2019, Plaintiff filed her Second Amended Complaint ("the Complaint"), naming as defendants: (1) Nueces County, Texas; (2) Elizabeth Alvarado; (3) Jasmine Drake; (4) Michael Alvarez; (5) Anthony Munoz; (6) Jose Rodriguez; (7) Luis Rivera; (8) Jose Aguayo; (9) Chris Gomez; (10) Wellpath, LLC; and (11) Jackie Blevins. (D.E. 29). On July 12, 2019, Defendants filed a Supplemental 12(b)(6) Motion to Dismiss. (D.E. 33). Plaintiff filed her Response to the Supplemental Motion to Dismiss on August 7, 2019. (D.E. 39).

II. Standard of Review

Under Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, a defendant may move to dismiss a complaint for failure to state a claim upon which relief may be granted. The district court, however, must construe the complaint in a light most favorable to the plaintiff, and the allegations contained therein must be taken as true. In re Katrina Canal Breaches Litig., 495 F.3d 191, 205 (5th Cir. 2007) (citation omitted). To survive a motion to dismiss, a complaint must contain sufficient factual matter to "state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face" and must plead those facts with enough specificity "to raise a right to relief above the speculative level, on the assumption that all the allegations in the complaint are true (even if doubtful in fact)." Id. (citing Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 555, 570 (2007)). "A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678 (2009). Moreover, a complaint will not be dismissed merely because it contains an "imperfect statement of the legal theory supporting the claim asserted." Johnson v. City of Shelby, 574 U.S. 10, 10 (2014) (per curiam) (citations omitted).

III. Plaintiff's Allegations

2 The following allegations were made in Plaintiffs Second Amended Complaint and are taken as true for the purposes of a 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss. Katrina Canal Breaches, 495 F.3d at 205.

On February 6, 2017, Tami Bond was arrested, charged with possession of a controlled substance and tampering with evidence, and placed in the Nueces County Jail. (D.E. 29, ¶ 15). During intake, Bond was calm, focused, and oriented. (D.E. 29, ¶ 15). Soon thereafter, however, Bond became uncooperative because she had swallowed two lethal-sized baggies of methamphetamine or amphetamines. (D.E. 29, ¶ 15). When the medical personnel provided by Nueces County Sheriff's Department asked about any medical concerns, Bond answered "no" to all questions. (D.E. 29, ¶ 16). However, Bond was unable to follow verbal commands, and she was placed in a holding cell until she could sufficiently cooperate and finish the booking process. (D.E. 29, ¶ 16).

During Bond's time in holding, she required help from other inmates to use the bathroom and get up from the floor, and she was seen grabbing unseen objects from the air. (D.E. 29, ¶ 17). Because of Bond's behavior, guards were sent into the cell to search for narcotics. (D.E. 29, ¶ 17). After the search, Bond was seen acting as if she was in pain and continued to require assistance from other inmates. (D.E. 29, ¶ 18). Defendants saw she was stumbling, had slurred speech, and needed assistance, and when Defendants again tried to complete Bond's booking, they were unable to because of her behavior. (D.E. 29, ¶ 18). Both Bond and other inmates sought further medical attention for her. (D.E. 29,¶ 20). Despite Bond's behavior and requests for help, Defendants took no action to have Bond medically reassessed. (D.E. 29, ¶ 18).

Defendants eventually moved Bond to another cell—and then to an isolation cell—because of erratic behavior, such as sitting on a pregnant woman and hallucinating. (D.E. 29, ¶ 19). Though she was placed in isolation and was supposed to be checked on every fifteen minutes, jail personnel neither monitored Bond nor provided medical treatment. (D.E. 29, ¶ 19). Bond died from an overdose the following morning. (D.E. 29, ¶ 20). Plaintiff alleges that Defendants' failure to provide adequate medical attention to Bond's serious medical condition resulted in Bond's death. (D.E. 29, ¶ 20).

Based on these factual allegations, Plaintiff brings suit under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 against Nueces County, eight individual county employees, Wellpath, LLC (the jail medical provider), and Wellpath's employee, Blevins. (D.E. 29). Plaintiff alleges that Defendants violated Bond's Fourth Amendment rights "by acting with deliberate indifference to a substantial and known risk of harm" to Bond, "failing to intervene, where such intervention would have prevented further injury, including [Bond]'s death," ignoring Bond's "serious medical needs," and "failing to impose proper and sufficient policies and/or procedures as to the screening of inmates/detainees/arrestees in regard to their medical needs and/or training concerning same." (D.E. 29, ¶ 25). Plaintiff advances her theory of municipal liability by asserting ten customs or persistent practices that Plaintiff alleges have become Nueces County policy. (D.E. 29, ¶ 27). The allegations include that Nueces County does not properly supervise detainees and ignores their serious medical needs, does not provide adequate staff or discipline employees who violate procedures, does not comply with standards concerning proper cell checks, and does not have proper policies and procedures for screening or reassessing the medical needs of detainees. (D.E. 29, ¶ 27).

3 Nueces County moves to dismiss Plaintiff's claims asserting Plaintiff has failed to state any plausible claim for governmental liability. (D.E. 33). The Individual County Defendants move to dismiss claiming the suit against them is barred by the statute of limitations. (D.E. 33).

IV. Section 1983 & Municipal Liability

"To state a claim under [42 U.S.C.] § 1983, a plaintiff must allege the violation of a right secured by the Constitution and laws of the United States, and must show that the alleged deprivation was committed by a person acting under color of state law." West v. Atkins, 487 U.S. 42, 48 (1988) (citations omitted). A municipality will be liable for the constitutional violations of its employees only if the alleged constitutional deprivations resulted from municipal policy. Monell v. Dep't of Soc. Servs., 436 U.S. 658, 694 (1978). To establish municipal liability, a plaintiff must identify three elements: (1) an official policy or custom (2) promulgated by the municipal policymaker (3) was the moving force behind the violation of a constitutional right. Peterson v. City of Fort Worth, 588 F.3d 838, 847 (5th Cir. 2009) (citation omitted). Together, these three elements "distinguish individual violations perpetrated by local government employees from those that can be fairly identified as actions of the government itself." Piotrowski v. City of Hous., 237 F.3d 567, 578 (5th Cir. 2001). A "facially innocuous policy will support liability if it was promulgated with deliberate indifference to the 'known or obvious consequences' that constitutional violations would result." Id. at 579 (quoting Bd. of Cty. Comm'rs v. Brown, 520 U.S. 397, 407 (1997)).

Plaintiff does not allege that Nueces County is liable because of an official policy but alleges ten customary practices that Plaintiff claims have become policy. Defendants argue that Plaintiff did not plead sufficient factual content to show a custom or practice of failing to protect or provide adequate medical care. In response, Plaintiff challenges the pleading standard, stating that the Fifth Circuit "blatantly ignore[s]" the proper pleading standard for a section 1983 municipal claim. (D.E. 39, p. 7). Specifically, Plaintiff pleads that "generic and boilerplate" assertions are sufficient at this stage.[2] (D.E. 39, p. 11).

A. Leatherman Does Not Eliminate Twombly & Iqbal in Section 1983 Cases

The Supreme Court in Leatherman made it clear that the pleading of a section 1983 claim is not governed by Rule 9 the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, but by Rule 8, which at the time was treated as a notice pleading standard. Leatherman v. Tarrant Cty. Narcotics Intelligence Coordination Unit, 507 U.S. 163, 164, 168 (1993). The Court agrees with Plaintiff that the main point of Leatherman survived Twombly in that section 1983 pleadings are evaluated under Rule 8(a). But Twombly announced new law that altered the interpretation of Rule 8(a), and that new interpretation applies to every case going forward that would have previously permitted formulaic pleadings. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544; see, e.g., Evans v. City of Meridian, 630 F. App'x 312, 315 (5th Cir. 2015) (per curiam) (applying Twombly & Iqbal to a municipal section 1983 claim without mentioning Leatherman); Hatcher ex rel. T.H. v. Nueces Cty., No. 2:17-CV-155, 2017 WL 2985639, at *2 (S.D. Tex. July 13, 2017) (applying Twombly & Iqbal to municipal section 1983 claims); Gonzales v. Nueces Cty., 227 F. Supp. 3d 698, 701 (S.D. Tex. 2017) (same); Flanagan v. City of Dall, 48 F. Supp. 3d 941, 950-51 (N.D. Tex. 2014) (same); White v. City of Dall, No. 3:12-cv-2145-0(BH), 2013 WL 821992, at *4 (N.D. Tex. Feb. 8, 2013)

(same); Wright v. City of Dall, No. 3:09-cv-1923-B, 2010 WL 3290995, at *2–4 (N.D. Tex. July 19, 2010) (same). This Court does not hold Plaintiff to a Rule 9(b) or a summary judgment standard. Rather, this Court holds Plaintiff to the pleading standards set forth under Rule 8, Twombly, Iqbal, and Leatherman.

B. Official Policy or Custom

4 The first element of a municipal liability claim under section 1983 requires Plaintiff to adequately plead an official policy or custom. Peterson, 588 F.3d at 847. "[A] policy can be shown through evidence of an actual policy, regulation, or decision that is officially adopted and promulgated by lawmakers or others with policymaking authority." Valle v. City of Hous., 613 F.3d 536, 542 (5th Cir. 2010) (citing Burge v. St. Tammany Parish, 336 F.3d 363, 369 (5th Cir. 2003)). A custom is "a persistent, widespread practice of [municipal] officials or employees, which, although not authorized by officially adopted and promulgated policy, is so common and well-settled as to constitute a custom that fairly represents municipal policy." Piotrowski, 237 F.3d at 579 (citing Webster v. City of Hous., 735 F.2d 838, 841 (5th Cir. 1984) (en banc) (per curiam)). To establish a custom, a plaintiff must demonstrate "a pattern of abuses that transcends the error made in a single case." Id. at 582 (citing Brown, 520 U.S. at 410–11). Prior incidents "cannot simply be for any and all 'bad' or unwise acts, but rather must point to the specific violation in question. That is, notice of a pattern of similar violations is required." McCully v. City of N. Richland Hills (In re Estate of Davis), 406 F.3d 375, 383 (5th Cir. 2005) (footnote omitted); see also Oporto v. City of El Paso, No. EP-10-CV-110-KC, 2010 WL 3503457, at *6 (W.D. Tex. Sept. 2, 2010) (holding that to survive a motion to dismiss on an unconstitutional unwritten policy or customary-practice claim, a plaintiff must plead sufficient facts to "allow the court to draw the reasonable inference that [the municipality has] engaged in a pattern of misconduct").

Plaintiff alleges that the following customary policies caused the violations of constitutional rights and form the basis of the Defendants' liability under section 1983:

> (1) ignoring the serious medical needs of those entrusted to its care based either on expedience or ignorance to the consequences, (2) failing to discipline those persons [who] are found to have ignored the medical needs of such individuals, (3) failing to adequately supervise and/or observe its inmates/detainees/arrestees, (4) failing to provide adequate manpower to supervise and/or observe inmates/detainees/arrestees, (5) failing to provide adequate staff to handle situations stemming from the medical needs of inmates/detainees/arrestees, (6) failing to impose proper and sufficient policies and/or procedures as to the screening of inmates/detainees/arrestees in regard to their medical needs,

> (7) failing to act in compliance with and failing to enforce the policy (of Texas Jail Standards or otherwise) concerning proper cell checks and/or the importance of same, and (8) failing to act in compliance with and failing to enforce the policy (of Texas Jail Standards or otherwise) requiring visual "checks" every 15 minutes for persons in isolation and/or under medical review, (9) failing to train and/or discipline those employees whom are found to have violated any of the above-noted policies, and (10) failing to train and/or supervise concerning medical reassessments for inmates/detainees/arrestees who – even while initially may not have signs of obvious medical problems – begin to exhibit obvious signs of medical problems, including but not limited to, those stemming from the use of illicit drugs.

(D.E. 29, ¶ 27).

Plaintiffs allegations one through five, seven, and eight are those of customary policies, while allegations six, nine, and ten pertain to failure to train and are addressed separately.[3] Defendants move to dismiss asserting that Plaintiff did not establish the existence of an unconstitutional policy or custom by Nueces County. The Court addresses each customary policy allegation below, focusing solely on the issue of governmental liability.

i. Alleged Customs One, Three, Seven and Eight

5 Plaintiff alleges that Nueces County ignores the serious medical needs of those entrusted to its care based either on expedience or ignorance of the consequences and that the County does not adequately supervise and observe its inmates, detainees, or arrestees. (D.E. 29, ¶ 27). Plaintiff also alleges that Defendants do not comply with or enforce policies (of the Texas Jail Standards,[4] or otherwise) concerning proper cell checks, specifically for persons in isolation or under medical review. (D.E. 29, ¶ 27).

All of Plaintiff's alleged facts on these allegations deal exclusively with Bond. No other instances involving other inmates, detainees, or arrestees are alleged. But a pattern "requires 'sufficiently numerous prior incidents,' as opposed to 'isolated instances.' " Peterson, 588 F.3d at 850.

> If actions of [municipal] employees are to be used to prove a custom for which the municipality is liable, those actions must have occurred for so long or so frequently that the course of conduct warrants the attribution to the governing > body of knowledge that the objectionable conduct is the expected, accepted practice of [municipal] employees.

Webster, 735 F.2d at 842; see Rivera v. Hous. Indep. Sch. Dist., 349 F.3d 244, 247 (5th Cir. 2003) ("[I]solated unconstitutional actions by municipal employees will almost never trigger liability" (citing Piotrowski, 237 F.3d at 578)). [5]

Persuasive here are rulings from other federal district courts where claims of an unconstitutional policy or custom against a municipality were dismissed. See Hatcher, 2017 WL 2985639, at *3–4 (finding insufficient facts to infer a policy or custom for failure to provide adequate medical treatment in part because plaintiff did not plead a pattern of denial of medical care); Gonzales, 227 F. Supp. 3d at 705 (dismissing claims against a county because lists of internal investigations were devoid of facts showing any similarity); Carter v. Diamond URS Huntsville, LLC, 175 F. Supp. 3d 711, 753 (S.D. Tex. 2016) (dismissing claims against a city because alleging only three isolated incidents was insufficient to plead a custom or practice); Moreno v. City of Dall, No. 3:13-cv-4106-B, 2015 WL 3890467, at *9 (N.D. Tex. June 18, 2015) (dismissing claims against a city because eight prior incidents over five years did not establish a pattern).

Holdings where the plaintiff was found to have met the pleading standard are also instructive. See, e.g., Sanchez v. Gomez, 283 F. Supp. 3d 524, 536-37 (W.D. Tex. 2017) (finding a sufficient pattern of excessive force against persons with mental illness when nine similar incidents were alleged and statistics suggested that the city's proportion of individuals killed by police who had visible mental health issues were double and quadruple the national average); Flanagan, 48 F. Supp. 3d at 952-54 (finding a "close call" that plaintiffs had pled sufficient facts in alleging that a police department had a policy to shoot first and ask questions later after the city acknowledged training issues existed and numerous statistics showed high levels of a variety of misconduct compared to the national averages); Oporto, 2010 WL 3503457, at *6 (finding allegations of thirty-two prior incidents of deadly force spanning fifteen years sufficient to infer a custom or practice).

6 In the case at hand, Plaintiff does not even allege a bare list of prior incidents. Though she must allege a pattern with "similarity and specificity," Peterson, 588 F.3d at 851, Plaintiff fails to allege any other instances where Nueces County allegedly ignored the serious medical needs of someone entrusted to its care, let alone similar or specific instances. The Complaint is devoid of any facts suggesting a persistent practice existed as to these four alleged policies.

Plaintiff alleges:

> The actions and/or inactions taken in this case were taken pursuant to the customary practices and/or policies or procedures that were sanctioned by > Defendants. Liability for Defendants is established under § 1983 because its "ignore all policies" attitude is a persistent, widespread practice of the county employees —namely deputies/officers/ agents—that, although not authorized by officially adopted policy, is so common and well settled as to constitute a custom that fairly represents official policy. Defendants had actual or constructive knowledge of each practice, custom, and/or policy or procedure and numerous prior incidents of such conduct and/or inaction as to establish accession to that custom by the policy makers. Defendants' unspoken policies above is a decision that reflects deliberate indifference to the risk that a violation of a particular constitutional or statutory right will follow the decision.

(D.E. 29, ¶ 28).

These allegations are almost verbatim quotes from the elements of municipal liability and are too conclusory and general to assert an actionable claim. See Spiller v. City of Tex. City, Police Dept., 130 F.3d 162, 167 (5th Cir. 1997) ("[The] assertion that [the municipality] is liable because '[defendant] was acting in compliance with the municipality's customs, practices or procedures' is insufficient because it is conclusory."). "It is the conclusory nature of respondent's allegations ... that disentitles them to the presumption of truth." Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 681.

Plaintiff points to Balle v. Nueces County, where the Fifth Circuit found a pattern was sufficiently pled. 690 F. App'x 847, 850-53 (5th Cir. 2017) (finding the complaint asserted a pattern when jail personnel did not provide Balle with "even minimally adequate medical care for his acute and emergency needs and made little effort to transfer him to a hospital, despite his numerous complaints that he was experiencing a medical emergency."). Balle is distinguishable from this. The plaintiff in Balle was detained for six days and subject to mistreatment on several days across several shifts of employees. See id. at 848. By contrast, Bond was detained for one night in Nueces County Jail. As such, this Court relies on the numerous published Fifth Circuit precedents requiring plaintiffs to allege a pattern of mistreatment to sufficiently show a policy. See Peterson, 588 F.3d at 850; Rivera, 349 F.3d at 247; Webster, 735 F.2d at 842. Accordingly, Plaintiff's amended pleadings are insufficient to allege a pattern of similar abuses.

ii. Alleged Customs Two, Four and Five

Plaintiff alleges that Nueces County does not discipline employees who ignore the medical needs of individuals entrusted to its care, but Plaintiff offers no facts to support this allegation. Plaintiff also alleges Nueces County is liable for failing to provide adequate manpower to supervise and observe inmates, detainees, and arrestees and failing to provide adequate staff to handle situations stemming from the medical needs of those individuals. Again, the Complaint is entirely devoid of facts to support these conclusory allegations for either Bond's case or to establish a pattern. See Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678 ("Threadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements, do not suffice.") (citation omitted). "While legal conclusions can provide the framework of a complaint, they must be supported by factual allegations to be entitled to the assumption of truth." Id. at 679. As such, these customs are likewise insufficiently pled.

iii. Alleged Customs Six, Nine, and Ten: Failure to Train

7 The failure to train municipal employees may also constitute a "policy," but only when it "reflects a 'deliberate' or 'conscious' choice by a municipality." City of Canton v. Harris, 489 U.S. 378, 389 (1989). Plaintiffs allegations six, nine, and ten assert that Nueces County is liable for failure to train. Defendants move to dismiss, arguing that Plaintiff pled insufficient factual content to show a failure to train. (D.E. 33, p. 9–10). Plaintiff's response did not address the argument. However, the Court has reviewed the merits of this claim.

"A municipality's culpability for a deprivation of rights is at its most tenuous where a claim turns on a failure to train." Connick v. Thompson, 563 U.S. 51, 61 (2011) (citation omitted). To establish liability for failure to train, a plaintiff must show that: "(1) the municipality's training policy or procedure was inadequate, (2) the inadequate training policy was a 'moving force' in causing violation of the plaintiff's rights; and (3) the municipality was deliberately indifferent in adopting its training policy." Valle, 613 F.3d at 544 (citation omitted). "Moreover, 'for liability to attach based on an inadequate training" claim, a plaintiff must allege with specificity how a particular training program is defective.' " Goodman v. Harris Cty., 571 F.3d 388, 395 (5th Cir. 2009) (quoting Roberts v. City of Shreveport, 397 F.3d 287, 293 (5th Cir. 2005)). To show a municipality's deliberate indifference, the plaintiff is required to demonstrate a municipality had "notice of a pattern of similar violations." McCully, 406 F.3d at 383.

Plaintiff alleges that Nueces County failed "to train and/or discipline those employees [who] are found to have violated any of the above-noted policies." (D.E. 29, ¶ 27). The Complaint contains no other information related to this alleged custom and is therefore insufficient and shall be dismissed.

Plaintiff also pled two customary policies of:

> failing to impose proper and sufficient policies and/or procedures as to the screening of inmates/detainees/arrestees in regard to their medical needs .. and [ ] failing to train and/or supervise concerning medical reassessments for inmates/detainees/arrestees who—even while initially may not have signs of > obvious medical problems —begin to exhibit obvious signs of medical problems, including but not limited to, those stemming from the use of illicit drugs.

(D.E. 29, ¶ 27). The alleged facts supporting these policies are those surrounding Bond's time in jail, which would be sufficient if analyzing the Individual County Defendants' liability. For governmental liability, more facts are needed to establish a persistent, widespread practice of failing to protect or provide adequate medical care. See Piotrowski, 237 F.3d at 579. To that point, Plaintiff alleges:

> Defendants are aware that during each and every shift of every single day, that the possibility that someone (especially someone that is accused of tampering with evidence by ingestion) could very well have complications associated with the use/ ingestion of same. The possibility that overdoses (leading to death or otherwise) will occur is without question and any jail should be training their employees/agents to observe signs of same, how to react to same and actually utilize medical technology at hand. Based on information and belief, Plaintiff would proffer that such "overdoses" are a regular event and that very often, medical (either internal or outside ambulance services) is called for persons suffering same. Even in the last few months, such occurrence has been repetitive and resulted in multiple persons being treated and/or hospitalized.

8 (D.E. 29, ¶ 21).

Taken as true, Defendants knew of regular overdoses that very often required medical services by their detainees. Plaintiff fails to allege anything further that could meet the elements for failure to train. Plaintiff does not allege that Nueces County had notice "of a pattern of similar violations" to show Bond's death was a "plainly obvious consequence" of the decision not to provide her medical care. See Brown v. Bryan Cty., 219 F.3d 450, 457 (5th Cir. 2000). Plaintiff alleged that overdoses requiring medical attention are a pattern, but she did not allege a pattern of Nueces County failing to provide medical care during those overdoses. In fact, Plaintiff seems to allege the opposite—that medical care is being provided—in that such occurrences have "been repetitive and resulted in multiple persons being treated and/or hospitalized." (D.E. 29, ¶ 21).

Plaintiff did not plead any prior incidents allowing the Court to draw the reasonable inference that Nueces County was deliberately indifferent to constitutional violations like those Bond suffered. See Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678. Accordingly, Plaintiff did not plead sufficient facts to hurdle the deliberate indifference element. Because Plaintiff fails to factually plead deliberate indifference, she has not met the pleading standard as to any of the failure to train elements.

After considering all ten "policies" Plaintiff put forth, the Court concludes that none are sufficient to establish that Nueces County maintained a wide-spread custom or policy that caused Bond's death. Because the Court finds Plaintiff's claim fails on element one of municipal liability—an official policy or custom—there is no need to consider the other two elements: policy maker and moving force. Without an official policy or custom, Plaintiff's section 1983 claim against Nueces County must be dismissed. The. Court notes that Plaintiff made compelling and detailed allegations against at least some of the individual officers. But alleging liability against Nueces County is beyond the inferences afforded this Complaint.

V. Statute of Limitations & the Individual Defendants

Defendants argue that Rule 15 does not allow Plaintiff to add named defendants in for the Doe defendants after the limitations period. (D.E. 33, p. 11–12). The statute of limitations for a section 1983 claim "is determined by the general statute of limitations governing personal injuries in the forum state." Piotrowski, 237 F.3d at 576 (citing Pete v. Metcalfe, 8 F.3d 214, 217 (5th Cir. 1993)). Texas's statute of limitations for personal injury actions is two years after the day the cause of action accrues. TEX. CIV. PRAC. & REM. CODE § 16.003; Piotrowski, 237 F.3d at 576. The cause of action for injury resulting in death accrues on the death of the injured person, in this case February 7, 2017. TEX. CIV. PRAC. &REM. CODE § 16.003(b). As such, limitations ran on February 7, 2019.

Plaintiff's Original Complaint was filed on February 5, 2019. (D.E. 1). Her Second Amended Complaint, which substituted names of individual defendants for John and Jane Doe, was filed on July 1, 2019. (D.E. 29). However, changing the parties' names from "Doe" to named individuals does not relate back to the date of the Original Complaint filed within the limitations period. Accordingly, as discussed below, these claims must be dismissed as barred by limitations.

A. Applicable Law

9 Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 15(c)(1) allows for an amendment to a complaint to relate back to the date of the original complaint if certain conditions are met.

> An amendment to a pleading relates back to the date of the original pleading when:
>
> (A) the law that provides the applicable statute of limitations allows relation back;
>
> (B) the amendment asserts a claim or defense that arose out of the conduct, transaction or occurrence set out—or attempted to be set out—in the original pleading; or

> (C) the amendment changes the party or the naming of the party against whom a claim is asserted, if Rule 15(c)(1)(B) is satisfied and if, within the period provided by Rule 4(m) for serving the summons and complaint, the party to be brought in by amendment:
>
> i. received such notice of the action that it will not be prejudiced in defending on the merits; and
>
> ii. knew or should have known that the action would have been brought against it, but for a mistake concerning the proper party's identity.

FED. R. CIV. P. 15(c)(1) (emphasis added).

In Jacobsen v. Osborne, the Fifth Circuit held that an attempted substitution for a "John Doe" defendant does not relate back to the date of the original complaint for limitations purposes. 133 F.3d 315, 320-21 (5th Cir. 1998). Rule 15(c) requires a " 'mistake concerning the identity of the proper party' and our Circuit held that "use of a John Doe moniker does not constitute a 'mistake.' " Whitt v. Stephens Cty., 529 F.3d 278, 282-83 (5th Cir. 2008) (denying leave to amend after the limitations period because naming Doe defendants is not a mistake and did not relate back (quoting Jacobsen, 133 F.3d at 321–22)).

In some circumstances, a court may preserve a claim that is otherwise untimely under the doctrine of equitable tolling. "The doctrine of equitable tolling preserves a plaintiff's claims when strict application of the statute of limitations would be inequitable." Lambert v. United States, 44 F.3d 296, 298 (5th Cir. 1995) (citation omitted). "Traditional equitable principles preclude a court from invoking equitable tolling, however, when the party seeking relief has an adequate legal or statutory remedy to avoid the consequences of the statute of limitations." Id. at 299 (citations omitted).

B. Analysis

Plaintiff does not dispute that both Balle, 690 F. App'x 847, and Jacobsen, 133 F.3d 315, hold that substituting for "John Doe" defendants does not relate back for limitations periods. Instead, Plaintiff argues that the Fifth Circuit's caselaw is incorrect on this matter and ostensibly urges the Court to follow other circuit courts. (D.E. 39, p. 3–4). To be sure, Fifth Circuit caselaw is binding upon this Court. Plaintiff substituted named individuals for "John Doe" and "Jane Doe" in her Second Amended Complaint—over six months after the limitations period expired. (D.E. 29). That substitution does not relate back to the date of her original complaint. See Jacobsen, 133 F.3d at 321-322. Therefore, the claims against the substituted individual defendants are time-barred.

Additionally, equitable tolling does not apply. Because the Texas statute of limitations is borrowed in section 1983 cases, "Texas's equitable tolling principles control this litigation." Myers v. Nash, 464 F. App'x 348, 349 (5th Cir.2012) (per curiam) (citing Rotella v. Pederson, 144 F.3d 892, 897 (5th Cir.1998)). "Texas courts sparingly apply equitable tolling and look, inter alia, to whether a plaintiff diligently pursued his rights; litigants may not use the doctrine to avoid the consequences of their own negligence. Federal courts also apply the doctrine sparingly." Id. at 349 (citations and internal quotation marks omitted).

10 The Fifth Circuit has spoken on this issue. In Balle, the court found that the delay in determining identities of "Doe" defendants did not warrant equitable tolling. 690 F. App'x at 851. In contrast, in Green v. Doe, the Fifth Circuit instructed that equitable tolling was appropriate "because the delay in determining the identity of 'John Doe' [was] not attributable to" the plaintiff's actions. 260 F. App'x 717, 719 (5th Cir. 2007) (per curiam) (emphasizing that the plaintiff had filed motions for discovery twice before limitations expired, which the district court denied). The Fifth Circuit in Green was careful to distinguish the case from Jacobsen, noting that Green had filed his lawsuit "almost eleven months before the running of the statute." Green, 260 F. App'x at 719. In contrast, the Jacobsen and Balle plaintiffs filed the suit just a few days before the limitations period had run, and the Fifth Circuit instructs that "there was no justification for equitable tolling" in those cases. Id. (citing Jacobsen, 133 F.3d at 321); Balle, 690 F. App'x at 851.

The Court finds equitable tolling is not applicable here. Plaintiff's inability to timely determine the identities of the "Doe" defendants was attributable to her own decision to file this suit two days before the end of the limitations period. By choosing to file that close to the deadline, Plaintiff failed to utilize the discovery mechanisms of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Plaintiff states she "attempted—prior to hiring counsel—to determine the identity of the employees at issue to no avail." (D.E. 39, p. 6). No further facts were alleged about this attempt. Because the court's discovery mechanisms are a legal remedy available to Plaintiff and she did not utilize them by filing so close to the end of the limitations period, the Court cannot conclude that Plaintiff "diligently pursued [her] rights" and does not find that equitable tolling is appropriate. Myers, 464 F. App'x at 349; see also Lambert, 44 F.3d at 299.

As such, all claims against Individual County Defendants Elizabeth Alvarado, Jasmine Drake, Michael Alvarez, Anthony Munoz, Jose Rodriguez, Luis Rivera, Jose Aguayo, and Chris Gomez are untimely and are dismissed.

VI. Leave to Amend

Plaintiff included in her response a request for leave to amend should the Court find her pleading deficient. The Court notes that this Order is not dispositive of the entire case because claims against Wellpath, LLC and Jackie Blevins remain. The Court will permit Plaintiff to file a renewed motion for leave to amend with the proposed amended pleading attached as an exhibit. The motion shall include any necessary briefing to show that the amended pleading complies with Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a) and Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, & Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662. The motion for leave to amend may be filed on or before September 19, 2019. No extensions shall be granted.

VII. Conclusion

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Defendants' Motion to Dismiss, (D.E. 33), is GRANTED. All claims against Elizabeth Alvarado, Jasmine Drake, Michael Alvarez, Anthony Munoz, Jose Rodriguez, Luis Rivera, Jose Aguayo, and Chris Gomez are time-barred and DISMISSED. The claims against Nueces County, Texas are DISMISSED for failure to state a claim. Defendant's first Motion to Dismiss, (D.E. 10), is DENIED as moot. Plaintiff may request leave to amend on or before September 19, 2019.

SIGNED and ORDERED this 5th day of September 2019.

All Citations

Not Reported in Fed. Supp., 2019 WL 13221680

Footnotes

1 Plaintiff also initially brought a claim under the Americans with Disabilities Act, but she did not include an ADA claim in her Second Amended Complaint.

2 Plaintiff relies on Gearin v. Rabbett, No. 10-CV-2227 (PJS/AJB), 2011 WL 317728, at *9 (D. Minn. Jan. 28, 2011); Charles v. Galliano, No. 10-811, 2010 WL 3430519, at *6 (E.D. La. Aug. 26, 2010); Abdulkhalik v. City of San Diego, No. 08CV1515-MMA(NLS), 2009 WL 4282004, at *10 (S.D. Cal. Nov. 25, 2009); and Dwyer v. City of Corinth, No. 4:09-CV-198, 2009 WL 3856989, at *9 (E.D. Tex. Nov. 17, 2009).

3 Plaintiff also alleges that "[a]t all pertinent times, Defendant Nueces County, Texas (by and through the Nueces County Sheriff's Department) authorized and ratified the wrongful and tortuous acts and/or omissions of its officers/deputies/agents." (D.E. 29, ¶ 22). Neither side briefed the issue of ratification, but "[Fifth Circuit] precedent has limited the theory of ratification to 'extreme factual situations.' " Peterson, 588 F.3d at 848 (citing Snyder v. Trepagnier, 142 F.3d 791, 798 (5th Cir. 1998)). Plaintiff alleges no facts to support a ratification claim beyond this conclusory statement.

4 Plaintiff does not state which chapter of the Texas Jail Standards she is referring to, but the Texas Jail Standards are found in Title 37, Part 9, of the Texas Administrative Code.

5 The Court notes that the posture of this case is distinguishable from much of the Fifth Circuit case law on establishing a pattern. Discovery has not usually begun at the motion to dismiss stage, unlike in Peterson, Rivera, and Webster, which were at the summary judgment or jury stage. Those cases discussed the need for evidence beyond a bare list of prior incidents. See Peterson, 588 F.3d at 850; Rivera, 349 F.3d at 247; Webster, 735 F.2d at 842. In contrast, here at the motion to dismiss stage, the Court "must only evaluate whether Plaintiff has pled sufficient facts that would allow it to draw the reasonable inference that Defendants are liable for the alleged misconduct." Ramirez v. Jim Wells Cry., No. CC-09-CV209, 2010 WL 2598304, at *2 (S.D. Tex. June 25, 2010).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

End of Document

© 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

CASE NO. 7

2024 WL 875834
Only the Westlaw citation
is currently available.
United States District Court, W.D.
Texas, San Antonio Division.

Christine OLIVEROS, Plaintiff,
v.
David Rene OLIVEROS, Ross Molina Oliveros PC, James Michael Oliveros, Defendants.

5
:
23
-
CV
-
00402
-
FB
-
RBF
|

Signed February 13, 2024

Attorneys and Law Firms

Mark Andrew Nelson, Law Office of Mark A. Nelson, Vista, CA, for Plaintiff.

Mark J. Barrera, The Barrera Firm, San Antonio, TX, Ana Luisa Zabalgoitia, Matthiesen, Wickert, Lehrer, S.C., Austin, TX, for Defendants David Rene Oliveros, Ross Molina Oliveros PC, James Michael Oliveros.

REPORT AND RECOMMENDATION OF UNITED STATES MAGISTRATE JUDGE

RICHARD B. FARRER, UNITED STATES MAGISTRATE JUDGE

To the Honorable United States District Judge Fred Biery:

1 This Report and Recommendation concerns Defendants' Motions for Summary Judgment (originally filed as Motions to Dismiss). See Dkt. Nos. 33, 34, & 35; see also Dkt. No. 47 (Order converting Motions to Dismiss to Motions for Summary Judgment). Also before the Court is Plaintiff's Motion to Set Aside Mutual Release. See Dkt. No. 58. All pretrial matters in this action have been referred for resolution, pursuant to Rules CV-72 and 1 of Appendix C to the Local Rules for the United States District Court for the Western District of Texas. See Dkt. No. 14. Authority to enter this recommendation stems from 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1)(B).

For the reasons set forth below, the Motions for Summary Judgment, Dkt. Nos. 33, 34, & 35, are converted back to Motions to Dismiss, and those motions to dismiss should be GRANTED IN PART and DENIED IN PART, as discussed below. The Court will take up Plaintiff's Motion to Set Aside Mutual Release by a separate order.

Factual and Procedural Background

This case centers around a divorce between Plaintiff Christine Oliveros and Defendant

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

David Rene Oliveros. Defendant James Oliveros is David's brother. James is a partner at Defendant law firm Ross Molina Oliveros PC, and David is a non-partner attorney working at the firm.

Plaintiff Christine filed for divorce from David on March 3, 2020, in Bexar County, Texas. Dkt. No. 32, Second Amended Complaint, at 3-4 ("2d Am. Compl.") According to Christine, she decided to end the 22-year marriage "after learning that Defendant David Oliveros had sexually assaulted her while she was 'not cognizant' due to taking prescribed sleeping medication." Id.

Three documents and one alleged incident are pertinent to the present motions. On March 18, 2021, while the then year-long divorce proceedings were pending, Christine, David, and James all signed and entered into a Mediated Settlement Agreement. It includes a release provision that states:

> Mutual Release by all parties and Jim Oliveros as to all claims that are known or reasonably could have been known.

Dkt. No. 33, Exhibit I, Mediated Settlement Agreement at 7.

But then in April of 2021, an incident occurred at the Ross Molina Oliveros PC law firm. 2d Am. Compl. at 11. According to Christine's recounting of events, she was the victim of a physical assault by David. Id.

In November of 2021, Christine, David, and James all signed and executed an Agreement Incident to Divorce. The Agreement Incident to Divorce styles itself, "a merger of [the] mediated settlement agreement dated March 18, 2021, between the parties." Dkt. No. 33, Exhibit N ("Agreement Incident to Divorce") at 18. The Agreement Incident to Divorce, like the preceding Mediated Settlement Agreement, includes a release provision. See Dkt. No. 33, Exhibit I ("Mediated Settlement Agreement"). The release in the Agreement Incident to Divorce provides in pertinent part the following:

> Save and except the obligations contained in this Agreement or in the Final Decree of Divorce, each party to this Agreement releases each other party to this Agreement for all claims, liabilities, debts, obligations, and causes of action of any and every character, whether asserted or unasserted, at law or equity, whether sounding in contract, tort, or arising under any federal or state statute, that each party may have against the other and that are known or reasonably could have been known.

Agreement Incident to Divorce at 15. As an aside, Christine now takes issue with the validity of this release, claiming the "release was obtained under both emotional and financial duress, duress of property, through fraudulent means, and should be deemed invalid." 2d Am. Compl. at 8; Dkt. No. 38 at 14; Dkt. No. 39 at 6.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

2 In January of 2022, the state court entered a final decree of divorce. Dkt. No. 33, Exhibit O ("Final Divorce Decree"). The decree incorporates by reference the Agreement Incident to Divorce, using the following language:

> The Court finds that the Parties have entered into an Agreement Incident to Divorce, in a document separate from the Final Decree of Divorce. The Court approves the agreement and incorporates it by reference as part of this decree as if it were recited herein verbatim and orders the parties to do all things necessary to effectuate the agreement.

Final Divorce Decree at 2. The divorce decree also includes a mutual release, which states:

> Save and except the obligations contained in this Final Decree of Divorce and the obligations contained in the parties' Agreement Incident to Divorce, CHRISTINE OLIVEROS and DAVID OLIVEROS have fully and forever released each other from all claims and causes of action of any and every character, whether asserted or unasserted, at law or in equity, whether sounding in contract, tort, or arising under any federal or state statute, that each party may have against the other and that are known or reasonably could have been known. This release does not apply to any claims or causes of action that may arise after March 18, 2021.

Final Divorce Decree at 28 (emphasis added).

Plaintiff Christine filed her complaint against Defendants David Oliveros, James Oliveros, and the Ross Molina Oliveros PC law firm on April 1, 2023. Dkt. No. 1. Against her former husband, Defendant David, Christine raises claims of sexual assault, physical assault, and civil conspiracy to defraud. 2d Am. Compl. at 6-8, 11-12, & 22-35. Against David's brother, Defendant James, Christine raises claims for sexual assault (as an accessory after the fact), fraud, civil conspiracy to defraud, knowing participation in breach of fiduciary duty, tortious interference with a contract or business relationship, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Id. at 8-10 & 15-35. Against Ross Molina Oliveros PC, Christine alleges vicarious liability for physical assault, negligent retention, fraud, and civil conspiracy to defraud. Id. at 12-15 & 22-35. In the present Motions to Dismiss, filed on August 8, 2023, Defendants ask the Court to dismiss Plaintiff's various claims on the basis of res judicata and due to pleading deficiencies. See generally Dkt. Nos. 33, 34 & 35.

In their Original Answer, Defendants David, James, and Ross Molina Oliveros PC raise counterclaims against Christine for breach of contract and trespass. Dkt. No. 11 at 15-16. These claims, however, are not at issue in the present motions and, indeed, are not presently the subject of any dispositive motion.

Upon its initial review of the present motions to dismiss, the Court observed that Defendants attached to those motions a significant amount of evidentiary material that had not been attached to or referenced in the live complaint. See id.; see also 2d Am. Compl. Accordingly, the Court ordered the motions converted to motions for summary judgment and ordered the parties to submit any additional summary judgment evidence they believed the Court should consider when resolving the motions in a summary judgment posture. See Dkt. No. 47.

3 But having spoken with the parties at a December 1, 2023, hearing on a motion to quash depositions, the Court will now—at the parties' request—convert the motions back to motions to dismiss and exclude from consideration when addressing those motions any evidence not properly before the Court under Rule 12(b)(6). See Dkt. No. 52.

Analysis

The Court will first explain why the motions are being converted back to motions to dismiss and, second, what the scope of the record is in connection with the Court's consideration of those motions. The Court then will address the motions' merits. As discussed further below, some of Plaintiff's claims warrant dismissal under the doctrine of res judicata, some warrant dismissal due to pleading deficiencies, and some survive Defendants' dismissal arguments. The surviving claims are Christine's claims against James Oliveros and Ross Molina Oliveros PC law firm for fraud and civil conspiracy to defraud, as well as Christine's claim against James for intentional infliction of emotional distress and her direct negligence claim against Ross Molina Oliveros PC law firm. Also still alive are all of Defendants' counterclaims, as none are the subject of a dispositive motion.

A. Defendants' Present Motions Should Be Converted Back to Motions to Dismiss.

Although the Court initially converted Defendants' motions to dismiss into motions for summary judgment, the parties both requested at the December 1 hearing that the motions be treated as motions to dismiss and that the Court exclude from consideration any evidence not properly before the Court in a Rule 12(b)(6) posture. Dkt. Nos. 52 & 53. In light of this request, the Court converts the motions to motions to dismiss.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Accordingly, IT IS ORDERED that Defendants' Motions for Summary Judgment, Dkt. Nos. 33, 34, & 35, are converted back to Motions to Dismiss.

B. The Court Considers Only Such Evidence as Is Properly Before It on a Rule 12(b)(6) Motion.

In reviewing the present motions to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6), the Court will "accept[ ] all well-pleaded facts as true, viewing them in the light most favorable to the plaintiff." Martin K. Eby Const. Co. v. Dallas Area Rapid Transit, 369 F.3d 464, 467 (5th Cir. 2004) (quotation marks omitted). The Court, however, need not credit conclusory allegations or allegations that merely restate the legal elements of a claim. Chhim v. Univ. of Tex. at Austin, 836 F.3d 467, 469 (5th Cir. 2016) (citing Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678). In resolving the motions to dismiss, the Court does not consider any evidence outside the pleadings, except for documents that are attached or referred to in the live complaint or are central to the complaint. See Villarreal v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., 814 F.3d 763, 766 (5th Cir. 2016).

At the motion hearing on December 1, Defendants agreed to file a brief explaining which of the documents attached to their Motions to Dismiss could properly be considered under a 12(b)(6) standard. Dkt. No. 52. Christine agreed that she would respond with her position on the issue. Id. Both sides filed their respective briefs outlining which materials should be considered at this juncture. Dkt. Nos. 55 & 56. While the parties disagree on whether some documents can be considered, they agree that certain documents filed as part of the record in the state court divorce case may be considered. See id. Those documents—specifically, the Final Divorce Decree, Agreement Incident to Divorce, and Mediated Settlement Agreement—will be considered by the Court. The three documents are referred to in Christine's complaint, and the Final Divorce Decree and Mediated Settlement Agreement are attached to her complaint. See generally 2d Am. Compl. The Court will also take judicial notice of matters of public record, including all documents publicly filed as part of the divorce case. See Dkt. No. 56 at 4; see also Dorsey v. Portfolio Equities, Inc., 540 F.3d 333, 338 (5th Cir. 2008) ("A court [ruling on a motion to dismiss] is permitted ... to rely on documents incorporated into the complaint by reference, and matters of which a court may take judicial notice.") (internal quotations omitted).

4 The parties also agree that a Correction Instrument may be considered. See Dkt. Nos. 55 & 56; see also Dkt. No. 33, Exhibit K ("Correction Instrument.") Christine's complaint refers to the Correction Instrument, which is central to her fraud claims. See 2d Am. Compl. at 15-17, 31. Accordingly, it is also properly considered by the Court at this stage.

No argument seeking the Court to consider any other evidence in connection with the Rule 12(b)(6) motions convinces the Court. To consider the motions, the well-pleaded allegations in Christine's live complaint will be taken as true and modified only by conclusive or uncontested evidence in the Final Divorce Decree, the Agreement Incident to Divorce, the Mediated Settlement Agreement, or the Correction Instrument. All other evidence is excluded from the Court's consideration at this Rule 12(b)(6) stage of the case.

C. Plaintiff's Claims Against David Should Be Dismissed.

Defendant David's argument that Christine's claims are barred under the principles of res judicata is well taken. Res judicata "prevents relitigation of a claim or cause of action that has been finally adjudicated, as well as related matters that, with the use of diligence, should have been litigated in the prior suit." Barr v. Resolution Trust Corp., 837 S.W.2d 627, 628 (Tex. 1992). When federal courts determine the preclusive effect of Texas judgments, Texas law applies. Basic Capital Mgmt., Inc. v. Dynex Capital, Inc., 976 F.3d 585, 591 (5th Cir. 2020). Under Texas law, "res judicata bars assertion of a claim in a subsequent case when: (1) there is a prior final judgment on the merits by a court of competent jurisdiction; (2) the parties in the second action are the same or in privity with those in the first action; and (3) the second action is based on the claims as were raised or could have been raised in the first action." Id. (citing Weaver v. Tex. Capital Bank, N.A., 660 F.3d 900, 906 (5th Cir. 2011) (internal quotes omitted)). "To determine what claims could have been raised in the first action, Texas follows a transactional approach, under which a final judgment on an action extinguishes the right to bring suit on the transaction, or series of connected transactions, out of which the action arose." Id. (citing Barr, 837 S.W. at 631 (internal quotes omitted)).

The three requirements for res judicata under Texas law are met here with respect to Christine's claims against David. The Final Divorce Decree is a final judgment. Under Texas law, res judicata "applies to a final divorce decree to the same extent that it applies to any other final judgment." Baxter v. Ruddle, 794 S.W.2d 761, 762 (Tex. 1990). The divorce decree itself bars relitigation of any claims by Christine against David that could have been raised in the divorce case. See Barr, 837 S.W.2d at 628. Further, the decree includes a release that, on its face, bars any claims against David predating March 18, 2021. Christine, therefore, cannot assert any claims against David that relate to the divorce as a matter of law. The parties in the present case and in the divorce —Christine and David—are the same. Finally, Christine could have raised her claims against David in the state divorce proceedings but did not. The claims all relate to the same transaction, the divorce. In sum, Christine is seeking to relitigate her divorce and raise claims against David—for assault, for fraud, for sexual assault—that she could have raised in her divorce case that wasn't final until January of 2022. Texas's transactional approach to res judicata bars these claims regardless of the various releases that were executed, although those releases do nothing to assist Christine's efforts.

5 Christine's argument that her claims against David are not barred do not convince the Court, including her argument that although she could have sued David in the divorce she didn't. Through this argument she urges, "Texas is a state in which joinder of such actions in tort in divorce proceedings in [sic] permissive, not mandatory ... [so that] Christine ... could have sued David for his rape during the marriage in the divorce proceedings, and may have even threatened to, but did not do so, and she did not recover damages for, nor was she compensated for the rape or physical assault in any way." Dkt. No. 38 at 2. Christine further emphasizes that none of her claims against David were actually adjudicated in the divorce case. Id. at 8-10. This argument cannot be reconciled with Texas's transaction approach to res judicata, and Christine does not dispute that Texas follows that transactional approach.

The principal case Christine cites in support of her argument, Brinkman, actually undercuts her argument. Id. at 12 (citing Brinkman v. Brinkman, 966 S.W.2d 780, 782 (Tex. App.—San Antonio 1998, pet. denied). In Brinkman, the Court of Appeals cited Twyman, noting that "the Texas Supreme Court adopted the less extreme permissive approach, whereby the joinder of tort causes of action with divorce proceedings is permitted but not required." Brinkman, 966 S.W.2d at 782 (citing Twyman v. Twyman, 855 S.W.2d 619, 624 (Tex. 1993)). However, the court noted immediately thereafter that in Twyman, "the court cautioned that while joinder of the two actions is permissive, the principles of res judicata remain applicable." Id. (citing Twyman, 855 S.W.2d at 625) (emphasis added). Accordingly, the transactional approach to res judicata, as set out in Barr, still applies. 837 S.W.2d at 631.

Christine's claims all arise out of the same transaction (or at the very least, a "series of connected transactions, out of which the action arose")—the divorce. See id. Indeed, Christine pleads that the alleged sexual assault was the instigating cause of the divorce. 2d Am. Compl. at 3-4. Because she could have brought all her connected claims against David relating to the divorce in the divorce case, those claims are now barred by res judicata.

As Christine's claims against David are barred by res judicata, the Court need not address David's fairly conclusory argument that the claims are also barred by the narrow Rooker-Feldman doctrine.

D. Plaintiff's Claims Against Defendant James Oliveros Are Not Barred.

Plaintiff Christine alleges claims against Defendant James for the following: sexual assault as an accessory after the fact, fraud, knowing participation in breach of fiduciary duty, tortious interference with a contract or business relationship, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and civil conspiracy to defraud. See generally 2d Am. Compl. James responds that Christine's claims against him are barred by res judicata and the Rooker-Feldman doctrine. Dkt. No. 34 at 2-5 & 13.

1. Christine's claims against James are not barred by res judicata. Res judicata applies when "the parties in the action are the same or in privity with those in the first action." Basic Capital, 976 F.3d at 591 (emphasis added). Christine's claims against James are not barred by res judicata because James was not a party to the divorce case or the divorce decree.

Moreover, James's argument that he was in privity with David in the divorce case does not convince the Court under a 12(b)(6) standard. Under Texas law, there are "three ways" someone can be in privity with a judgment they are not a party to: "(1) they can control an action even if they are not parties to it; (2) their interests can be represented by a party to the action; or (3) they can be successors in interest, deriving their claims through a party to the prior action." E.E.O.C. v. Jefferson Dental Clinics, PA, 478 F.3d 690, 694 (5th Cir. 2007), quoting Amstadt v. U.S. Brass Corp., 919 S.W.2d 644, 653 (internal quotations omitted). James invokes the first two of these, arguing that he was in privity with the divorce case because he controlled it and because David represented his interest in the case. He fails to convince on both.

6 Privity through control exists when "an individual actively and openly participated in the prior proceedings to such an extent that it was clear that the individual had the right to direct them." E.E.O.C., 478 F.3d at 695, quoting Maxson v. Travis Cty. Rent Account, 21 S.W.3d 311, 316 (Tex. App.—Austin 1999). James argues that Christine's complaint itself establishes privity through control because she alleges James "maliciously inserted himself into the divorce case" and wrongfully took control. Dkt. No. 34 at 4. James also argues that he was in privity because David represented non-party James's interest in Christine's home that was involved in the divorce case. Id.

Privity is a fact-bound inquiry. Reading Christine's complaint fairly, the Court would be required to draw several inferences to conclude on the basis of the complaint's allegations that James "actively and openly participated" in the divorce case "to such an extent that it was clear that [he] had the right to direct" it. See E.E.O.C., 478 F.3d at 695 (emphasis added). Keep in mind, Christine alleges that James's participation in the divorce case was malicious and wrongful. See 2d Am. Compl. at 16-17. It is undisputed that James participated in the divorce case to some degree, but "mere participation" does not suffice to establish privity for res judicata. E.E.O.C., 478 F.3d at 695, quoting Brown v. Zimmerman, 160 S.W.3d 695, 703 (Tex. App.—Dallas 2005). While Christine's complaint and the documents properly before the Court suggest James had an interest in the marital home, it is not clear that part of David's role in the divorce was to represent that interest. See Correction Instrument, Mediated Settlement Agreement at 4, Agreement Incident to Divorce at 3, 2d Am. Compl. at 16. Conversely, James's involvement in signing and acting as a party to several of the agreements involved in the divorce proceedings indicates that perhaps David did not fully or significantly represent James's interest. Drawing all inferences in favor of Christine under Rule 12(b)(6)'s standard, the facts she alleges do not affirmatively establish that James was in privity.

James was, however, a signatory to two of the releases in the divorce case but this does little to assist him at this stage. See Mediated Settlement Agreement & Agreement Incident to Divorce. Christine's claims against James based on facts predating March 18, 2021, are arguably brought in violation of the Mediated Settlement Agreement's release. See Mediated Settlement Agreement at 7. And claims against him that arose prior to the November 12, 2021, date of the Agreement Incident to Divorce arguably violate that agreement's release. See Agreement Incident to Divorce at 15. But invoking these releases to bar Christine's claims is James' burden under Texas law, see Tex. R. Civ. P. 94, and thus the Court can only grant dismissal if the releases are valid on the face of the live complaint. See, e.g., Clark v. Amoco Prod. Co., 794 F.2d 967, 970 (5th Cir. 1986). Christine, however, takes issue with the validity of these releases in her complaint, claiming inter alia that they were procured by fraud. 2d Am. Compl. at 7-8.

2. Christine's claims against James are not barred by the Rooker-Feldman doctrine. James argues, in conclusory fashion, that the narrow Rooker-Feldman doctrine bars Christine's claims against him. Dkt. No. 34 at 13. James' argument is devoid of analysis; indeed, he does not even provide the applicable four-part test adopted by the Supreme Court. See Exxon Mobil Corp. v. Saudi Basic Indus. Corp., 544 U.S 280, 284 (2005). On that basis alone, the Court rejects James's argument for failure to carry his burden under a 12(b)(6) standard. Regardless, Christine's claims against James are not Rooker-Feldman barred.

7 Rooker-Feldman is a complex, incredibly narrow doctrine that only applies in cases "[1] brought by state-court losers [2] complaining of injuries caused by state-court judgments [3] rendered before the district court proceedings commenced and [4] inviting district court review and rejection of those judgments." Land & Bay Gauging, L.L.C. v. Shor, 623 Fed. Appx. 674, 678 (5th Cir. 2015) (emphasis added); citing Exxon Mobil, 544 U.S. at 284. Here, James does not explain how Christine's alleged injuries were caused by the divorce decree.

To the extent that any fraud claim Christine brings against James seeks to change the divorce decree, that relief would likely be barred. But resolving all ambiguities in Christine's favor, she alleges injuries distinct from the decree and asks for money damages, not to re-open or change the decree. Accordingly, the "second hallmark of the Rooker-Feldman inquiry" is not met. See Truong v. Bank of America, N.A., 717 F.3d 377, 382 (5th Cir. 2013). In Truong, the Fifth Circuit gave several examples of cases not barred by Rooker-Feldman because the plaintiffs' alleged injuries were not caused by the state-court judgment, and James has not done enough to explain why such cases don't control the issue here. [1]

Furthermore, to determine whether a plaintiff is complaining of injuries caused by state-court judgments, courts have looked at the timing of the alleged injuries. See Land & Bay Gauging, 623 Fed. Appx. at 679; citing Great Western Mining & Mineral Co. v. Fox Rothschild LLP, 615 F.3d 159, 172 (observing that a "useful guidepost is the timing of the injury"). Here, the timing indicates that the divorce decree itself was not the source of Christine's alleged injuries—all the facts she alleges giving rise to her claims occurred prior to the Final Divorce Decree judgment on January 11, 2022. See generally 2d Am. Compl.; see also Final Divorce Decree. James has not carried his burden to demonstrate that Christine's claims against him are barred by res judicata or Rooker-Feldman.

Whether James could benefit from any preclusion principles as to the validity of the releases based on the divorce decree—as opposed to only res judicata—is an issue the parties do not raise or brief. In sum, James has not demonstrated that Chirstine's claims against him are barred pursuant to either of the two arguments raised in his motion.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

E. Some of Plaintiff's Claims Should Be Dismissed for Pleading Deficiencies or Failure to State a Viable Claim.

Christine also brings claims against Defendants James and the Ross Molina Oliveros PC law firm that fail for pleading deficiencies. Again, under a Rule 12(b)(6) standard, the Court "accepts all well-pleaded facts as true, viewing them in the light most favorable to the plaintiff." Martin, 369 F.3d at 467 (5th Cir. 2004). But the Court will not accept conclusory allegations or allegations that merely restate the legal elements of a claim. Chhim, 836 F.3d at 469.

8 1. Christine's claim against James for sexual assault as an accessory after the fact should be dismissed. In her apparently criminal claim against James, Christine relies on § 38.05 of the Texas Penal Code and 18 U.S.C. §§ 3, 1512, & 1513. There is no private cause of action under the Texas Penal Code or under the federal criminal statutes Christine cites. See Hanna v. Home Ins. Co., 281 F.2d 298, 303 (5th Cir. 1960); Jones v. Chevron Phillips Chem. Co., No. A-14-CV-761-DAE at *4 (W.D. Tex. 2014); Spurlock v. Johnson, 94 S.W.3d 655, 658 (Tex. App.—San Antonio 2002, no pet.). Christine does not plead any facts or make any arguments explaining how she could recover via criminal charges raised in a civil case. This claim against James should be dismissed.

2. Christine's claim against James for knowing participation in breach of fiduciary duty should be dismissed. Knowing participation in breach of fiduciary duty is a derivative claim that depends on a claim for breach of fiduciary duty. See Matter of Estate of Poe, 648 S.W.3d 277, 286 (Tex. 2002). Under Texas law, "where a third party knowingly participates in the breach of duty of a fiduciary, such third party becomes a joint tortfeasor with the fiduciary and is liable as such." Kinzbach Tool Co. v. Corbett-Wallace Corp., 160 S.W.2d 509, 574 (Tex. 1942) (emphasis added). Christine alleges that James "maliciously inserted himself into the dealings and participated in Charles Hardy [Christine's divorce attorney]'s breach of fiduciary duty to Christine." 2d Am. Compl. at 17. But a defendant's liability for a derivative tort "depends on participation in some underlying tort for which the plaintiff seeks to hold at least one of the named defendants liable." Tilton v. Marshall, 925 S.W.2d 672, 681 (Tex. 1996) (emphasis added). Christine has not sued her divorce attorney, Charles Hardy, for breach of fiduciary duty. Therefore, the derivative claim against James fails. This claim should be dismissed.

3. Christine's claim against James for tortious interference with a contract should be dismissed. In Texas, a person "must be a stranger to a contract to tortiously interfere with it." In re Vesta Ins. Group, Inc., 192 S.W.3d 759, 761 (Tex. 2006) (quoting Morgan Stanley & Co., Inc. v. Texas Oil Co., 958 S.W.2d 178, 179 (Tex. 1997)). Christine's complaint alleges that James was a party to the Mediated Settlement Agreement and Agreement Incident to Divorce, and the documents properly considered by the Court confirm her allegations in that regard. See 2d Am. Compl. at 19; see also Mediated Settlement Agreement & Agreement Incident to Divorce. Taking Christine's complaint as true, she has failed to successfully plead a claim against James for tortious interference. Since James was a party to the contracts mentioned by Christine in her complaint, he was not a "stranger" to the contracts and cannot be liable for tortious interference with them. See id.; see also In re Vesta, 192 S.W.3d at 761. Therefore, this claim should be dismissed.

4. Christine's claim against Ross Molina Oliveros PC law firm for vicarious liability for physical assault should be dismissed. In Texas, claims for vicarious liability are considered "liability-spreading theories [that] depend upon liability for an underlying tort, and they survive or fail alongside that tort." Nettles v. GTECH Corporation, 606 S.W.3d 726, 738 (Tex. 2020). Christine's claim for vicarious liability against the law firm for physical assault is based on her underlying claim against David for physical assault. 2d Am. Compl. at 12-14. Christine's claims against David are barred, as explained above. Without direct liability against David for the alleged assault, there can be no vicarious liability against his employer for the same alleged incident. See Nettles, 606 S.W.3d at 738. This claim should be dismissed.

F. Some of Plaintiff's Claims Survive Defendants' Motions to Dismiss.

9 Some of Christine's claims survive at this stage.

1. Christine's complaint against James for fraud should not be dismissed under a 12(b)(6) standard. In her complaint, Christine alleges various facts supporting her claim against James for fraud, and at this stage the Court takes those facts as true. See Martin, 369 F.3d at 467 (5th Cir. 2004). In his motion to dismiss, James argues that Christine's fraud claim is "nonsensical" because she cannot establish a critical element of fraud: reliance. See Dkt. No. 34 at 6; see also Zorrilla v. Aypco Constr. II, LLC, 469 S.W.3d 143, 153 (Tex. 2015) ("A common-law fraud claim requires a material misrepresentation, which was false, and which was either known to be false when made or was asserted without knowledge of its truth, which was intended to be acted upon, which was relied upon, and which caused injury."). James also argues "it is obvious" that Christine's pleadings affirmatively disprove her reliance on James' alleged misrepresentations because she "immediately disputed" them. Dkt. No. 34 at 6. James also argues that Christine failed to establish that James intended to induce her reliance and that she suffered damages. Id. at 7-8. These arguments fall short because they all implicate disputed fact issues.

The question before this Court is not whether Christine has established each element of fraud, but whether she has sufficiently pleaded a plausible claim for relief that can survive a motion to dismiss. Christine alleges that James fraudulently added his name to the title of her house, that she "was deceived and acted upon that deception," and that she "suffered great damages emotionally, mentally and financially ... and she had to hire a property attorney." 2d Am. Compl. at 16. These allegations, taken as true, plead not only reliance but also James's intent and Christine's damages.

2. For the same reason that Christine's claims for fraud against James don't fail, her fraud claim against Ross Molina Oliveros PC law firm doesn't fail. Christine alleged that James, a partner at the law firm, used the law firm's mailing envelope to send the allegedly fraudulent document adding James to the title of her house. See 2d Am. Compl. at 16. She also alleges that another employee of Ross Molina Oliveros PC law firm was involved in the fraud by notarizing the allegedly fraudulent document. Id. Under a Rule 12(b)(6) standard that resolves all inferences in favor of Christine, her claim survives the law firm's motion to dismiss.

In its response and reply, the law firm argues only that Christine's fraud claim against James is barred, which then also bars her fraud claim against the firm. Dkt. Nos. 35 & 46. The firm, like James, also argues that Christine failed to show the essential element of reliance. However, as explained above, Christine pleads various allegations supporting reliance or a reasonable inference to that effect, and the Court takes her pleading as true at this stage and draws such inferences in her favor. See 2d Am. Compl. at 16. Accordingly, for the same reasons that Christine's fraud claim against Jame survives, so does her fraud claim against Ross Molina Oliveros PC law firm.

10 3. Christine's claims for civil conspiracy to defraud against James and Ross Molina Oliveros PC law firm survive. In Texas, a civil conspiracy is defined as "a combination of two or more persons to accomplish an unlawful purpose, or to accomplish a lawful purpose by unlawful means." Tilton v. Marshall, 925 S.W.2d 672, 681 (Tex. 1996). It is a derivative tort, meaning that "a defendant's liability for conspiracy depends on participation in some underlying tort for which the plaintiff seeks to hold at least one of the named defendants liable." Id. Here, Christine has alleged that two or more persons, namely, James and the law firm,[2] conspired to defraud her. 2d Am. Compl. at 22-35. She has also alleged various facts supporting her underlying fraud claim; for example, she alleges that James sent her a fraudulent document which she detrimentally relied on, and that the document was sent via a law firm envelope and notarized by a law firm employee. See id. at 16. Therefore, this claim, as to James and the law firm, survives.

4. Christine's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against James should not be dismissed at this stage. In Texas, the elements of intentional infliction of emotional distress are: "(1) the defendant acted intentionally or recklessly; (2) its conduct was extreme and outrageous; (3) its actions caused the plaintiff emotional distress; and (4) the emotional distress was severe." Hersh v. Tatum, 526 S.W.3d 462, 468 (Tex. 2017). In support of this claim Christine alleges, inter alia, that James "interrogated [her] ... about being raped," "mocked ... her pain and trauma and tried to tell her that it did not count as rape," "mocked [her] fragile mental state," "yelled at [her] children," and "instructed David ... to use physical force to throw Christine out of [the Defendant law firm] with aggression and cruelty." 2d Am. Compl. at 20-21. Christine further alleges that this conduct was extreme and outrageous, and that it caused her severe emotional distress. Id. at 22. ("James [sic] maliciousness and cruelty towards Christine nearly caused her to commit suicide and it ended up causing her to move away from Texas and her children suffered daily... [t]his is very disruptive and traumatizing to Christine as a mother to see her children so traumatized.").

James argues that Christine's claim should be dismissed as a matter of law because it is "nothing more than a regurgitated summary of her other claims against James." Dkt. No. 34 at 13-14. But Christine alleges various facts to support her intentional-infliction-of-emotional-distress claim that are not stated anywhere else in her complaint. See 2d Am. Compl. at 20-22 ("James interrogated Christine via text and ... phone call about her being raped," "James mocked Christine and ...tried to tell her that it did not count as rape," "James had called and yelled at [Christine's children]."). It is not, as James argues, based on the exact same conduct she alleges in her other claims against James. And although the Court need not credit her legal conclusions or conclusory allegations, there are sufficient specific facts alleged to describe a plausible claim.

James' argument that Christine's claim should be dismissed because his alleged conduct is not sufficiently extreme and outrageous fails under the Rule 12(b)(6) standard. Dkt. No. 34 at 15-16. In Texas, "[w]hether a defendant's conduct is extreme and outrageous is a matter of law." Bradford v. Vento, 48 S.W.3d 749, 758 (Tex. 2001). James argues that the conduct Christine alleges against him, as a matter of law, cannot satisfy this element of her tort claim. Dkt. No. 24 at 15-16. James cites several Texas Supreme Court cases to support his contention that Christine's claims fail as a matter of law. See Bradford, 48 S.W.3d at 758; Tiller v. McLure, 121 S.W.3d 709, 713 (Tex. 2003); Kroger Texas Ltd. Partnership v. Suberu, 216 S.W.3d 788, 798 (Tex. 2006); Twyman, 855 S.W.2d at 622. One of the cases is inapplicable: in Twyman, the Texas Supreme Court held that the plaintiff could not recover because the trial court did not make findings of outrageousness or extreme emotional distress —but this was because, at the trial court, the plaintiff's claim was negligent infliction of emotional distress. See 855 S.W.2d at 625-26. The Court in Twyman remanded the case for a new trial. Id. at 626.

11 The other cases are distinguishable. In Bradford, the defendant was the landlord of a store at a mall. 48 S.W.3d at 752-53. After an altercation between the plaintiff and a third party, the defendant told the police that the third party owned the store and that "he did not want [the plaintiff] in the mall since he was causing a scene." Id. at 753. The plaintiff believed that he was the store's proper tenant and brought an intentional infliction of emotional distress claim against the defendant. Id. The facts Christine alleges in her complaint, taken as true, are more egregious than the facts in Bradford.

Kroger is also distinguishable. In Kroger, the plaintiff was acquitted of a misdemeanor theft charge for alleged shoplifting. 216 S.W.3d at 791. Then, the plaintiff sued the grocery store where the alleged incident occurred, claiming intentional infliction of emotional distress and urging that the grocery store "knowingly provid[ed] false information to police so that an innocent person is prosecuted." Id. at 791, 796. The Court found that such behavior would be sufficiently extreme and outrageous if the evidence supported it. Id. at 796. But the Court found that the evidence was insufficient to show that "Kroger did not honestly and reasonably believe [the plaintiff] was guilty." Id. The facts Christine alleges in her complaint are also more egregious than the facts in Kroger. And whether Christine has provided sufficient evidence to support her factual allegations is not appropriately considered by the Court on a motion to dismiss.

Tiller presents a factual scenario most comparable to that before the Court, but it is still distinguishable. The plaintiff in Tiller owned a construction company with her husband. 121 S.W.3d at 711. Their company contracted with the defendant to complete a construction project. Id. The plaintiff's husband became ill and died during the project, and the plaintiff increasingly took over more management duties of the company. Id. The plaintiff sent a letter to the defendant letting him know that the project would nevertheless be completed, but that it was a hard time for her. Id. at 711-12. Throughout the project, the defendant called the plaintiff and her children at home many times at odd hours, including late at night, on Sunday mornings, and over holidays. Id. at 712. He "raised hell" with her, and was "rude, demanding and curt." Id. At one point, when the construction site was shut down for one day, the day of the plaintiff's husband's funeral, the defendant threatened to terminate the contract. Id. The Court held that this threat was the most egregious of the defendant's actions, but even so, it was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous as a matter of law. Id. at 713-14. The Court highlighted that "to determine whether certain conduct is extreme and outrageous, [courts] consider the context and the relationship between the parties." Id. at 714 (citing GTE Southwest, Inc. v. Bruce, 998 S.W.2d 605, 612 (Tex. 1999)). The Court determined that in the context of a business relationship, where the plaintiff was designated as a contact person for complaints relating to the project, and especially because the defendant only complained about the project and did not insult the plaintiff personally or threaten to harm her, the defendant's conduct was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous. Id. at 714.

Like in Tiller, the conduct Christine complains of involves phone calls by James and alleged cruel comments made to her and her children. However, Christine also alleges that James incited David to "use physical force to throw Christine out" of the law firm. 2d Am. Compl. at 20-21. Taking this allegation as true, it distinguishes Christine's allegations from the facts in Tiller. Additionally, the context in the two cases is different: Tiller involved a business relationship with a plaintiff who opted to receive customer complaints by phone, while this case involves a family relationship and allegations of highly personal statements about an alleged sexual assault. Based on the facts at hand, the Court cannot apply the same reasoning as the court in Tiller.

12 Here, the question before the Court is whether Christine has pleaded sufficient factual allegations to state a "plausible" claim to relief and survive a motion to dismiss. Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 570 (2007). Taking Christine's allegations as true, she has described extreme and outrageous conduct. She alleges intentional cruelty and incitement to violence in the aftermath of an intentional sexual assault. Nothing in Defendants' arguments convince the Court that Christine has failed to plead sufficient facts to raise a plausible claim for relief.

5. Christine's claim against Ross Molina Oliveros PC law firm for negligent retention should not be dismissed. The claim against Ross Molina Oliveros PC law firm for negligent retention should not be dismissed because Christine has pleaded facts plausibly demonstrating a claim for relief. The Texas Supreme Court has not ruled definitively on the existence or elements of a negligent-retention cause of action. Pagayon v. Exxon Mobil Corp., 536 S.W.3d 499, 505 (Tex. 2017) (citing Waffle House, Inc. v. Williams, 313 S.W.3 796, 804 n.27 (Tex. 2010)). Various Texas Courts of Appeals have recognized a claim for negligent retention and "have often held employers to very general duties, but they have not weighed the factors that determine whether a duty exists, and what it is." Id. at 505-06. Common law negligence, however, is recognized under Texas law, and has three elements: "1) a legal duty owed by one person to another; 2) a breach of that duty; and 3) damages proximately resulting from the breach. Greater Hous. Transp. Co. v. Phillips, 801 S.W.3d 523, 525 (Tex. 1990).

The five relevant factors in determining whether a defendant owed a duty to a third party are "risk, foreseeability, and likelihood of injury weighed against the social utility of the actor's conduct, the magnitude of the burden guarding against the injury, and the consequences of placing the burden on the defendant." Id. at 525; see also Pagayon, 536 S.W.3d at 507-08. In Pagayon, the Texas Supreme Court assessed a negligent retention claim by analyzing various factors that determine whether an employer in certain situation owes a duty to third parties to supervise its employees. See id. at 507-508. There, the Court considered various facts relevant to the legal question of whether the employer owed a duty to a third party. Id. In applying the facts to the Phillips factors mentioned above, the Court found that the employer owed no duty as a matter of law and reversed the jury verdict. Id.

In her complaint, Christine alleges various facts surrounding the circumstances under which David allegedly physically assaulted her on the premises of the law firm. See 2d Am. Compl. at 11-12. She also alleges that Ross Molina Oliveros PC had a "legal duty to hire, supervise, train, and retain competent employees" and to "protect the public ... from ... abuse." 2d Am. Compl. at 14. Christine also alleges that the law firm "was made aware of the events alleged herein and that [David] had a history of domestic violence and sexual assault" and that the firm "breached its duty ... due to the fact that it retained [David] as an employee without any limitations or supervision or remedies to ensure the safety of anyone in the general public on company property or the environment after becoming aware of his history of domestic violence and sexual assault." Id. at 14-15.

Defendant Ross Molina Oliveros PC law firm admits that Christine's claim is "a claim for direct liability against [the law firm], not vicarious liability." Dkt. No. 35 at 3. Therefore, it does not necessarily fail because the claim against David fails. Cf. Nettles, 606 S.W.3d at 738. In arguing why this claim should be dismissed, however, the law firm claims that "the existence of a legal duty is a threshold question of law for the court to decide based on the facts surrounding the occurrence in question." Dkt. No. 35 at 3-4 (citing Greater Hous. Transp. Co., 801 S.W.3d at 525) (emphasis added). But the law firm does not provide further analysis under a Rule 12(b)

(6) standard, which requires the Court to accept as true facts alleged in the complaint. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544 at 556; see also Martin, 369 F.3d at 467 (5th Cir. 2004). This claim, and the law firm's response to it, raise a fact issue which the Court cannot properly resolve at this stage of the litigation.

13 The law firm contends that Christine's negligent retention claim must be dismissed because she is required to allege facts showing that her injury relates to "David's competence or fitness to perform his job [at the law firm]"—specifically, his legal work as an attorney, though the Court finds this unpersuasive. Dkt. No. 35 at 4. The law firm cites Houser v. Smith for this proposition. 968 S.W.2d 542, 544 (Tex. App—Austin 1998, no pet.) (noting, "the theory of negligent hiring and supervision does require that a plaintiff's harm be the result of the employment." (emphasis added)). But Houser doesn't appear to support the law firm's reading of it, and the firm has provided no Texas Supreme Court case or other binding authority to support its contention. Considering Pagayon's hesitance to clearly recognize or set out elements for negligent retention, Christine's claim is more fairly read as a simple negligence claim. Pagayon, in fact, also involved a claim that an employer owed a duty to a third party, and the Court there declined to find that the negligence claim must relate to the nature of the employee's job. See generally Pagayon, 968 S.W.2d 542.

Considering the facts that Christine alleged and applying those to the five factors Texas courts use in determining the existence of a legal duty, her claim survives the law firm's motion to dismiss. Christine's allegations that prior to the incident in question the law firm was "aware ... that [David] had a history of domestic violence and sexual assault," and that the firm had no "limitations or supervision or remedies to ensure the safety of anyone in the general public on company property" inform the Court's weighing of the risk, foreseeability, likelihood, and consequence factors. See 2d Am. Compl. at 14; see also Pagayon, 536 S.W.3d at 507-08. These allegations support Christine's claim that the firm owed her a legal duty. At this stage, considering all facts Christine alleges as true, the law firm has failed to carry its burden to show that Christine's direct negligence claim warrants dismissal.

Conclusion and Recommendation

For the reasons discussed above, it is recommended that Defendants' Motions to Dismiss, Dkt. Nos. 33, 34, & 35, be GRANTED IN PART and DENIED IN PART. Plaintiff's Motion to Set Aside Mutual Release, Dkt. No. 58, will be taken up by the Court in due time by a separate order.

The surviving claims are Christine's claims against James Oliveros and Ross Molina Oliveros PC law firm for fraud and civil conspiracy to defraud, as well as Christine's claim against James for intentional infliction of emotional distress and her direct negligence claim against Ross Molina Oliveros PC law firm.

Also surviving are the three defendants' two counterclaims against Christine for trespass and breach of contract, as neither counterclaim has been the subject of a dispositive motion. See Dkt. No. 11.

The Court anticipates motions for summary judgment will be filed. Accordingly, the Court will by separate order extend the deadlines for discovery and to file motions for summary judgment. The parties need not wait until the completion of those deadlines to file motions.

Instructions for Service and Notice of Right to Object/Appeal

The United States District Clerk shall serve a copy of this report and recommendation on all parties by either (1) electronic transmittal to all parties represented by attorneys registered as a "filing user" with the clerk of court, or (2) by mailing a copy by certified mail, return receipt requested, to those not registered. Written objections to this report and recommendation must be filed within fourteen (14) days after being served with a copy of same, unless this time period is modified by the district court. 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1); Fed. R. Civ. P. 72(b). Objections, responses, and replies must comply with the same page limits as other filings, unless otherwise excused by the district court's standing orders. See Rule CV-7. The objecting party shall file the objections with the clerk of the court, and serve the objections on all other parties. A party filing objections must specifically identify those findings, conclusions, or recommendations to which objections are being made and the basis for such objections; the district court need not consider frivolous, conclusory, or general objections. A party's failure to file written objections to the proposed findings, conclusions, and recommendations contained in this report shall bar the party from a de novo determination by the district court. Thomas v. Arn, 474 U.S. 140, 149-52 (1985); Acuña v. Brown & Root, Inc., 200 F.3d 335, 340 (5th Cir. 2000). Additionally, failure to timely file written objections to the proposed findings, conclusions, and recommendations contained in this report and recommendation shall bar the aggrieved party, except upon grounds of plain error, from attacking on appeal the unobjected-to proposed factual findings and legal conclusions accepted by the district court. Douglass v. United Servs. Auto. Ass'n, 79 F.3d 1415, 1428-29 (5th Cir. 1996) (en banc).

14 IT IS SO ORDERED.

All Citations

Not Reported in Fed. Supp., 2024 WL 875834

Footnotes

1 See id. at 382-83 (citing Noel v. Hall, 341 F.3d 1148, 1164 (9th Cir. 2003) (noting that if a plaintiff asserts as a legal wrong an allegedly illegal act or omission by an adverse party, rather than an allegedly erroneous decision by a state court, Rooker-Feldman does not bar the case), Scott v. Fortenberry, 278 Fed. Appx. 440, 441

(5th Cir. 2008) ("Rooker-Feldman does not bar a 1983 plaintiff's claim for damages arising from court reporter's failure to prepare a trial transcript and consequent delay of his criminal appeal because the suit did not challenge his conviction."); and Mosley v. Bowie Cnty. Tex., 275 Fed. Appx. 327, 328-29 (5th Cir. 2008) ("Rooker-Feldman bars a claim that a state child support order is void, but not a claim that state government defendants violated the federal plaintiffs' constitutional rights in the course of enforcing the order.")).

2 No party discusses whether and to what extent a law firm can conspire with its own employee in circumstances such as those alleged here, and so the Court declines to address that topic.

End of Document

© 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

CASE NO. 8

2024 WL 874145
Only the Westlaw citation
is currently available.
United States District Court, W.D.
Texas, San Antonio Division.

Christine OLIVEROS, Plaintiff,
v.
David Rene OLIVEROS; Ross Molina Oliveros, P.C.; and James Michael Oliveros, Defendants.

CIVIL ACTION NO. SA-23-CA-402-FB
|
Signed February 29, 2024

Attorneys and Law Firms

Mark Andrew Nelson, Law Office of Mark A. Nelson, Vista, CA, for Plaintiff.

Mark J. Barrera, The Barrera Firm, San Antonio, TX, Ana Luisa Zabalgoitia, Matthiesen, Wickert, Lehrer, S.C., Austin, TX, for Defendants.

ORDER ACCEPTING REPORT AND RECOMMENDATION OF UNITED STATES MAGISTRATE JUDGE

FRED BIERY, UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE

1 Before the Court is the Report and Recommendation of United States Magistrate Judge (docket no. 62), filed in the above-captioned cause on February 13, 2024, concerning Defendants' Motions for Summary Judgment (originally filed as Motions to Dismiss). See (docket nos. 33, 34, & 35); see also (docket no. 47) (Order converting Motions to Dismiss to Motions for Summary Judgment). Also before the Court is Plaintiff's Motion to Set Aside Mutual Release. (Docket no. 58). To date, no objections to the Report and Recommendation have been received. [1]

Because no party has objected to the Magistrate Judge's Report and Recommendation, the Court need not conduct a de novo review. See 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1) ("A judge of the court shall make a de novo determination of those portions of the report or specified proposed findings and recommendations to which objection is made."). The Court has reviewed the Report and Recommendation and finds its reasoning to be neither clearly erroneous nor contrary to law. United States v. Wilson, 864 F.2d 1219, 1221 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 492 U.S. 918 (1989).

IT IS THEREFORE ORDERED that the Report and Recommendation of United States Magistrate Judge (docket no. 62) is ACCEPTED pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1) such that Defendants' Motions to Dismiss (docket nos. 33, 34 & 35) are GRANTED IN PART and DENIED IN PART. Plaintiff's Motion to Set Aside Mutual Release (docket no. 58) will be taken up by the Court in due time by a separate order.

The surviving claims are Plaintiff's claims against Defendants James Oliveros and Ross Molina Oliveros PC law firm for fraud and civil conspiracy to defraud, as well as Plaintiff's claim against Defendant James Oliveros for intentional infliction of emotional distress and her direct negligence claim against Defendant Ross Molina Oliveros PC law firm. This case continues to be referred to the Magistrate Judge for further pretrial proceedings.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

It is so ORDERED.

All Citations

Not Reported in Fed. Supp., 2024 WL 874145

Footnotes

1 Any party who desires to object to a Magistrate's findings and recommendations must serve and file his, her or its written objections within fourteen days after being served with a copy of the findings and recommendation. 28 U.S.C. § 635(b)(1). If service upon a party is made by mailing a copy to the party's last known address, "service is complete upon mailing." FED. R. CIV. P. 5(b)(2)(C). If service is by electronic means, "service is complete upon transmission." Id. at (E).

End of Document © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

CASE NO. 9

851 Fed.Appx. 514 (Mem)
This case was not selected for publication in West's Federal Reporter. See Fed. Rule of Appellate Procedure 32.1 generally governing citation of judicial decisions issued on or after Jan. 1, 2007. See also U.S.Ct. of App. 5th Cir. Rules 28.7 and 47.5.
United States Court of Appeals, Fifth Circuit.

Wayne SMITH, Plaintiff-Appellant,
v.
MTGLQ INVESTORS, L.P., Defendant-Appellee.

No. 19-20665
|
Summary Calendar
|
FILED June 30, 2021

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Southern District of Texas, USDC No. 4:19-CV-1888

Attorneys and Law Firms

Wayne Smith, Pro Se

Robert Brandon Hakari, McCarthy & Holthus, L.L.P., Plano, TX, for Defendant-Appellee

Before Higginbotham, Jones, and Costa, Circuit Judges.

Opinion

Per Curiam: [*]

Wayne Smith appeals the district court's dismissal of his case under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. Smith asserted claims of violation of the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act, negligence, fraudulent concealment, fraudulent inducement, slander of title, and rescission under the Truth in Lending Act. The relief he sought included a declaratory judgment, injunctive relief, and monetary damages.

We review "a district court's dismissal under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) de novo, accepting all well-pleaded facts as true and viewing those facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff." Harris Cty. Texas v. MERSCORP Inc., 791 F.3d 545, 551 (5th Cir. 2015) (internal quotation marks and citation omitted). Smith argues that the district court erred by dismissing the case without first requiring the defendant, MTGLQ Investors, L.P. (MTGLQ), to provide documents proving that it had the authority to foreclose on his property.

The Deed of Trust and assignment records relating to Smith's property were public records, and the district court was permitted to take judicial notice of those unrebutted records in granting MTGLQ's motion to dismiss. See Norris v. Hearst Tr., 500 F.3d 454, 461 n.9 (5th Cir. 2007). Smith's argument fails to show that his allegations stated a claim upon which relief could be granted. See MERSCORP, 791 F.3d at 551; Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6). Smith does not brief any other argument challenging the district court's reasons for dismissing his claims, and he has thus waived any such arguments. See Yohey v. Collins, 985 F.2d 222, 224-25 (5th Cir. 1993) (recognizing that even pro se litigants must brief arguments in order to maintain them).

Accordingly, the district court's judgment is AFFIRMED. Smith's motion seeking an order to prevent the collection of payment from him is DENIED.

All Citations

851 Fed.Appx. 514 (Mem)

Footnotes

* Pursuant to 5th Circuit Rule 47.5, the court has determined that this opinion should not be published and is not precedent except under the limited circumstances set forth in 5th Circuit Rule 47.5.4.

End of Document

© 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

CASE NO. 10

2024 WL 5036616
Only the Westlaw citation
is currently available.
United States District Court, S.D.
Texas, Corpus Christi Division.

PENINSULA MARINE, INC., Plaintiff,
v.
PRINCIPLE INDUSTRIAL SERVICES, LLC, et al., Defendants.

Civil Action
No.
2
:
23
-
CV
-
00104

|

Signed September 30, 2024

Attorneys and Law Firms

Michael Savan Prejean, Michael Prejean, Pearland, TX, Brenton Joel Allison, Gilman Allison, LLP, Pearland, TX, for Plaintiff.

Joshua L. Hedrick, Spencer Fane LLP, Dallas, TX, Kevin Gerard Corcoran, Rebecca Lynne Gibson, Spencer Fane LLP, Houston, TX, for Defendants Principle Industrial Services, LLC.

Stephen Eric Irving, Peckar & Abramson PC, Houston, TX, for Defendants TTL, Inc.

MEMORANDUM OPINION GRANTING IN PART AND DENYING IN PART DEFENDANT'S MOTION TO DISMISS

DAVID S. MORALES, UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE

1 Before the Court is Defendant Principle Industrial Services, LLC's ("Principle") Motion to Dismiss Plaintiff's First Amended Original Complaint. (D.E. 20). Plaintiff Peninsula Marine ("Peninsula") brings myriad claims against Principle—including breach of contract, promissory estoppel, quantum meruit, sworn account, and fraud—arising out of two agreements.[1] Peninsula states a valid claim for breach of contract under the first, express agreement. Therefore, Peninsula's quasi-contract claims under the first contract fail because of the express contract doctrine. With respect to the second agreement, because Principle disputes the existence of a contract, Peninsula can proceed under alternative theories at the motion to dismiss stage, and it has sufficiently alleged both breach of contract and quasi-contract claims under the second agreement. Finally, Peninsula states a valid claim for fraud because it sufficiently pled that Principle made false statements that Peninsula detrimentally relied on. As such, the Court GRANTS in part and DENIES in part the motion to dismiss. (D.E. 20).

I. Background

In May of 2022, Defendant Principle and TTL, Inc., ("TTL") contracted for Principle to remove pipelines in the Corpus Christi Ship Channel. (D.E. 17, p. 3–4). Lucas Pappas, an officer of Principle (and now-dismissed Defendant in this matter, see (D.E. 28)), signed this contract.. (D.E. 17, p. 3). Later that month, Pappas approached Peninsula "to supply labor, equipment, and services" regarding the pipeline removal. Id. at 4. Peninsula gave Principle a bid for the work and negotiated payment, ("the first contract"), which included a clause requiring Peninsula's work invoices to be paid when TTL paid Principle. Id. Later that year, Peninsula started work under the first contract and submitted monthly invoices to Principle. Id. Principle paid some, but not all, of the amounts owed. Id. In November 2022, Principle told Peninsula to stop working under the first contract because there was a "lack of an approved permit." Id. at 5. Peninsula obliged. Id. Pappas then proposed to Peninsula that it remain on site "at a reduced standby and holiday rate" and any work performed from that day "until the permit issue was resolved would be" Defendants' responsibility ("the second agreement"). Id. Peninsula agreed, accepted those terms, and began complying with the terms of this second agreement by working. Id. at 5–6. In January 2023, Principle and the now-dismissed Defendants told Peninsula to stop working, and Peninsula left the worksite on January 16, 2023. Id. at 6. Peninsula submitted invoices for the standby time and work performed. Id. Peninsula calculates the outstanding principal amount under the second agreement (i.e., work from November 2022–January 2023) as approximately $740,000. Id. In total, Peninsula alleges Principle owes them $1,085,150.65. Id. [2]

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

2 Peninsula then sued, alleging breach of contract and promissory estoppel as to the first contract, id. at 8–9, breach of contract and promissory estoppel as to the second agreement, id. at 9–11, quantum meruit, id. at 11, sworn account as to the second agreement, id. at 11–12, and fraud, id. at 12–13.

Principle and two now-dismissed Defendants move to dismiss the amended complaint. (D.E. 20). [3] Principle first argues that Peninsula cannot state a breach-of-contract claim for the first contract because the condition precedent —that TTL pay Principle—was not satisfied. Id. at 15. For the second agreement, Principle argues that Peninsula's breach-of-contract claim fails because the second agreement lacked all the essential requirements to form a contract: offer, acceptance, mutual assent, delivery, and execution. Id. at 16–17. Principle argues that Peninsula's promissory estoppel claims fail (1) for similar reasons as the first contract claim—namely, that Peninsula's alleged reliance was neither foreseeable nor justifiable because Peninsula knew (via the first contract) that TTL had to pay Principle before Principle would pay Peninsula—and (2) because the express contract doctrine bars any estoppel claims. Id. at 17–18. Principle argues Peninsula's quantum meruit claim is barred by the express contracts doctrine, id. at 18, and that the sworn account claim fails because Peninsula has no outstanding claim for payment (because, as above, the condition precedent that TTL pay Principle has not occurred) and because Peninsula never alleges the prices charged, id. at 19–20. Finally, with respect to fraud, Principle argues that Peninsula's claims fail because: (1) the allegations are not particular enough under the heightened pleading standard; and (2) because the alleged fraudulent statement about TTL not paying is not false, id. at 21–22. Alternatively, Principle argues the fraud claims are barred because they arise solely from duties within the contract and are barred by the economic loss rule. Id. at 23–24.

II. Legal Standard

To survive a motion to dismiss under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6), "a complaint must contain sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to 'state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.' " Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678 (2009) (quoting Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 570 (2007)). A complaint is facially plausible when it "pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Id. (citing Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556). To permit a reasonable inference, the complaint must demonstrate "more than a sheer possibility" of unlawful behavior but not a particular probability. Id.

At the motion to dismiss stage, the Court examines only "the pleadings and 'any documents attached to the motion to dismiss that are central to the claim and referenced by the complaint.' " Perry v. Minn. Life Ins. Co., No. 6:23-CV-00018, 2023 WL 11802193, at *2 (S.D. Tex. July 14, 2023) (Morales, J.) (quoting PHI Grp., Inc. v. Zurich Am. Ins. Co., 58 F.4th 838, 841 (5th Cir. 2023) (citations and internal quotations omitted)). Although the Court accepts the allegations of the complaint as true and views them "in the light most favorable to the plaintiff[,]" Allen v. Vertafore, Inc., 28 F.4th 613, 616 (5th Cir. 2022) (citation and internal quotations omitted), the Court does not accept as true "conclusory allegations, unwarranted factual inferences, or legal conclusions[,]" Gentilello v. Rege, 627 F.3d 540, 544 (5th Cir. 2010) (quoting Plotkin v. IP Axess Inc., 407 F.3d 690, 696 (5th Cir. 2005)) (citing Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 679). [4]

3 Rule 8 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure requires all pleadings that state a claim for relief to contain "a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief." FED. R. CIV. P. 8(a)(2). Rule 9(b) lays out a heightened pleading standard for fraud claims. FED. R. CIV. P. 9(b) ("[A] party must state with particularity the circumstances constituting fraud or mistake."). The applicable pleading standard for Peninsula's fraud claims is Rule 9(b), but all claims are subject to Rule 8. See (D.E. 17, p. 8–14).

III. Analysis

A. First Contract

i. Breach of Contract

In its complaint, Peninsula alleges Principle "has materially breached the [f]irst [c]ontract by failing to make payment to [Peninsula] in the principal amount of $346,643.69, despite having received payment for such [w]ork from TTL." (D.E. 17, p. 9). Principle moved to dismiss, arguing that because the condition precedent—that TTL pay Principle—has not been met, Peninsula has failed to state a claim for breach of contract. (D.E. 20, p. 15). To support this argument, Principle points to language in the contract which states "[f]inal payment will not become due to [Peninsula] until final payment is received in full by Principle." (D.E. 20-4, p. 4). In response, Peninsula first argues that Principle's assertion that TTL had not paid Principle is "demonstrably untrue." (D.E. 29, p. 4). In other words, the condition precedent that Principle identifies has been met. Id. But Peninsula also goes further, arguing no such condition precedent exists. (D.E. 29, p. 8). Rather, according to Peninsula, "the plain unambiguous language of the [f]irst [c]ontract" provides that once Peninsula submitted invoices to Principle for Peninsula's work, Principle would pay Peninsula within thirty days of receiving the invoice. Id. And Peninsula contends that condition precedent was met: it performed work for Principle under the first contract and then "invoiced Principle in accordance with those contractual terms." Id.

Under Texas law, a breach of contract claim consists of "(1) the existence of a valid contract; (2) performance or tendered performance by the plaintiff; (3) breach of the contract by the defendant; and (4) damages to the plaintiff resulting from that breach." Villarreal v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., 814 F.3d 763, 767 (5th Cir. 2016) (quoting Wright v. Christian & Smith, 950 S.W.2d 411, 412 (Tex. App.—Houston [1st Dist.] 1997, no writ)). "A condition precedent is 'an event that must happen or be performed before a right can accrue to enforce an obligation.' " Conn Credit I, L.P. v. TF LoanCo III, L.L.C., 903 F.3d 493, 500 (5th Cir. 2018) (citing Associated Indem. Corp. v. CAT Contracting, Inc., 964 S.W.2d 276, 283 (Tex. 1998)). To make performance conditional, courts typically require the contract to contain conditional language like " 'if', 'provided that', 'on condition that', or some similar phrase of conditional language." Id. (quoting Solar Applications Eng'g, Inc. v. T.A. Operating Corp., 327 S.W.3d 104, 109 (Tex. 2010)).

Both parties do not appear to dispute the validity of the first, written contract, nor do they dispute that Peninsula tendered performance. (D.E. 20; D.E. 29). Principle's motion to dismiss only raises argument that there was no breach of the contract—Principle does not make argument regarding the contract's essential elements, like offer or consent. See (D.E. 20, p. 15–16)). And neither party appears to dispute that Peninsula suffered damages. See (D.E. 29; D.E. 20, p. 15–16). As such, the Court need only determine whether Peninsula's complaint alleges facts sufficient to support an inference that the contract was breached. [5]

4 Peninsula's first breach of contract claim passes Rule 12(b)(6) muster. Principle hangs its hat on its assertion that the contract does not require any payment to Peninsula until " 'final payment is received in full' by Principle from TTL." (D.E. 31, p. 3) (citation and emphasis omitted). Even assuming Principle's interpretation is correct, Peninsula has stated a claim for breach of contract. [6] The complaint notes that Peninsula received word from Principle's agent "that TTL has in fact paid [Principle] for all" of Peninsula's work. (D.E. 17, p. 4). Peninsula reasserts this point in its response, arguing that Principle has in fact been "paid in full by TTL." (D.E. 29, p. 8). In sum, Peninsula alleges that: (1) it had a contract with Principle providing that once TTL fully paid Principle, Principle would pay Peninsula; and (2) TTL did pay Principle and Principle did not pay Peninsula. (D.E. 17, p. 4; D.E. 29, p. 8). Viewing these allegations "in the light most favorable to" Peninsula, Peninsula has sufficiently alleged that Principle breached the first contract. See Allen, 28 F.4th at 616. Accordingly, the Court DENIES Principle's motion as to this claim. (D.E. 20, p. 15-16).

ii. Promissory Estoppel as to the First Contract

Principle argues that Peninsula fails to state a claim for promissory estoppel as to the first contract because the written contract covers the conduct at issue. (D.E. 20, p. 17–18). Peninsula's complaint alleges, "in the alternative," that Principle promised to pay Peninsula for its work, that Peninsula substantially relied on those promises, and finally, that Principle owes Peninsula $346,643.69. (D.E. 17, p. 9).

"The elements of a promissory-estoppel claim are (1) a promise; (2) foreseeability of reliance by the promisor; (3) actual, substantial, and reasonable reliance by the promisee to its detriment; and (4) injustice that can be avoided only by enforcement of the promise." Alvarado v. PNC Bank Nat'l Ass'n, 660 F. Supp. 3d 612, 619 (S.D. Tex. 2023) (Alvarez, J.) (quoting George-Baunchand v. Wells Fargo Home Mortg., Inc., No. H-10-3828, 2011 WL 6250785, at *8 (S.D. Tex. Dec. 14, 2011) (Rosenthal, J.)). "But promissory estoppel 'is not applicable to a promise covered by a valid contract between the parties.' " OPF Enters., LLC v. Evanston Ins. Co., No. 4:21-CV-01835, 2021 WL 4710948, at *6 (S.D. Tex. Oct. 7, 2021) (Ellison, J.) (quoting Trevino & Assocs. Mech., L.P. v. Frost Nat'l Bank, 400 S.W.3d 139, 146 (Tex. App.—Dallas 2013, no pet.)). "In other words, the doctrine of promissory estoppel may be invoked only where no contract on the subject matter exists." Id. (quoting Elite Ctr. for Minimally Invasive Surgery, LLC v. Health Care Serv. Corp., 221 F. Supp. 3d 853, 863 (S.D. Tex. 2016) (Smith, Mag. J.), adopted, 221 F. Supp. 3d 853, 855 (S.D. Tex. 2016) (Hughes, J.)); see also Jhaver v. Zapata Off-Shore Co., 903 F.2d 381, 385 (5th Cir. 1990) (citations omitted) ("Under Texas law, a contract comprising the disputed promise precludes recovery under promissory estoppel.").The express contract doctrine "is an affirmative defense" to equitable claims under Texas law. Shanghai Hailian Elec. Tools Co., Ltd. v. Home Depot Int'l, Inc., No. 3:16-CV-1451-D, 2016 WL 5815896, at *2 (N.D. Tex. Oct. 5, 2016) (Fitzwater, J.) (citations omitted). "Although dismissal under Rule 12(b)(6) is ordinarily determined by whether the facts alleged in the complaint, if true, give rise to a cause of action, a claim may also be dismissed if a successful affirmative defense appears clearly on the face of the pleadings." Id. (collecting cases) (internal citations omitted).

Here, Peninsula first argues that Principle both misrepresents the contract terms and contradicts its own performance under the contract—arguing that the contract provides for regular progress payments that both parties abided by. (D.E. 29, p. 10–11). Further, Peninsula notes that its "pleading identifies that it agreed to perform the Work for Principle in exchange for payment, and that [Peninsula] did so." Id. at 11. Finally, Peninsula concedes that the express contract doctrine normally bars promissory estoppel claims when there is an express contract. Id. Peninsula attempts to distinguish the instant case by summarily arguing that "there is no agreement between the parties as to the existence of the express contract upon which the suit is brought," meaning a cause of action for promissory estoppel is permitted, id. at 11–12.

5 The Court disagrees with Peninsula as to its last point. Peninsula alleges that it performed work for Principle under the first contract's terms and that it "invoiced Principle in accordance with those contractual terms." (D.E. 29, p. 8). Accordingly, Peninsula's promissory estoppel claim as to work performed under the first contract "is founded upon precisely the same promise as that which undergirds its breach of contract claim." Elite Ctr. for Minimally Invasive Surgery, 221 F. Supp. 3d at 863.

Peninsula summarily states that the parties disagree as to whether an express contract exists. (D.E. 29, p. 11). Peninsula fails to cite to anywhere in the record where it disputes the existence of the first, express contract.[7] Indeed, Peninsula's complaint suggests the opposite—as Principle's reply points out. See (D.E. 31, p. 6) ("The parties do dispute the existence of a contract as to [the second agreement], but not as to [the first contract]; both parties agree to the validity and existence of the Agreement."). Put another way, Peninsula's allegations demonstrate that an express, written contract covering the work that underlies Peninsula's promissory estoppel claim "clearly appears on the face of the complaint." See Shanghai Hailian Elec. Tools Co., 2016 WL 5815896, at *2–3 (finding express contract did not bar quasi-contract claim because the allegations did not clearly demonstrate that the contract covered the work at issue); see also (D.E. 17, p. 4) (defining "the Work" as work conducted under the first contract); (D.E. 17, p. 9) (premising promissory estoppel claim on work conducted under the first contract)). Finally, at the most recent status conference in this matter, Peninsula proceeded with argument that the first contract exists and governs the work at issue. See March 6, 2024 Minute Entry.

In sum, the Court must look at Peninsula's complaint. Peninsula's complaint states that the parties agreed to an express contract—the first contract, according to Peninsula—and that Peninsula worked in accordance with that contract. (D.E. 17, p. 3–5). The complaint facially contains an express contract covering the work at issue in Peninsula's promissory estoppel claim. See (D.E. 17, p. 3–5, 8).[8] While Peninsula may plead claims in the alternative, FED. R. CIV. P. 8(d)(2), Peninsula cannot do so when "there is a contract that governs" the work at issue. See Optiv Sec. Inc. v. Iheartmedia Mgmt. Servs., Inc., No. SA-20-CV-01273-ESC, 2021 WL 2156410, at *8 (W.D. Tex. May 27, 2021) (Chestney, Mag. J.). "That is because parties should be bound by their express agreements." Id. (quoting Fortune Prod. Co. v. Conoco, Inc., 52 S.W.3d 671, 684 (Tex. 2000)) (dismissing promissory estoppel and unjust enrichment claims at the 12(b)(6) stage).

6 This means that Peninsula cannot state a claim for promissory estoppel for the first contract. See Ears & Hearing, P.A. v. Blue Cross & Blue Shield of Tex., No. 1:18-CV-00726, 2019 WL 3557349, at *4 (W.D. Tex. Aug. 5, 2019) (Austin, Mag. J.) (dismissing promissory estoppel claim at the 12(b)(6) stage when the plaintiff failed to allege a promise distinct from the contract's promise), adopted, No. A-18-CV-00726, 2019 WL 6037271 (W.D. Tex. Sept. 17, 2019) (Yeakel, J.).; Cotton v. Tex. Express Pipeline, LLC, No. 6:16-CV-00453-RP-JCM, 2017 WL 3709093, at *9 (W.D. Tex. July 19, 2017) (Manske, Mag. J.) (citing*Christus Health v. Quality Infusion Care, Inc.*, 359 S.W.3d 719, 722–23 (Tex. App.—Houston [1st Dist.] 2011, no pet.))(dismissing promissory estoppel claim at the 12(b)(6) stage because a valid express contract governed the dispute), adopted, No. 6:16-CV-453-RP-JCM, 2018 WL 1419346 (W.D. Tex. Mar. 22, 2018) (Pitman, J.). As such, the Court GRANTS Principle's motion to dismiss as to this claim. (D.E. 20, p. 17–18).

B. Second Agreement

i. Breach of Contract

Principle next argues that Peninsula cannot state a claim under the second agreement, because the second agreement did not give rise to a second contract. (D.E. 20, p. 16). According to Principle, none of the essential contract requirements arose: no offer, acceptance, mutual assent, delivery, or execution. Id. at 16–17. Principle frames the second agreement as "mere discussion of rates for [Peninsula]'s work" rather than a promise to do anything. Id. at 16. In response, Peninsula argues that "[w]hat is relevant is [Peninsula]'s pleading and the facts alleged" there. (D.E. 29, p. 9). And those facts include that Principle proposed "an agreement and terms" to Peninsula; Peninsula accepted those terms; Peninsula performed according to those terms; and Peninsula incurred damages because of Principle's nonpayment. Id.[9] Given the necessary inferences that the Court must make at the motion to dismiss stage, see Allen, 28 F.4th at 616, Peninsula argues that its complaint "contains sufficient allegations to state a claim." (D.E. 29, p. 9). The Court agrees.

The Court first considers whether the second agreement gave rise to a contract. "The following elements are required for the formation of a valid and binding contract: (1) an offer, (2) acceptance in strict compliance with the terms of the offer, (3) a meeting of the minds, (4) each party's consent to the terms, and (5) execution and delivery of the contract with the intent that it be mutual and binding." Gallier v. Woodbury Fin. Servs., Inc., 171 F. Supp. 3d 552, 567 (S.D. Tex. 2016) (Ronsenthal, J.) (quoting Thornton v. Dobbs, 355 S.W.3d 312, 316 (Tex.App.—Dallas 2011, no pet.)). Under Texas law, the Court determines the existence of these elements using an "objective standard." See Fernandes v. Dillard's Inc., 997 F. Supp. 2d 607, 609 (S.D. Tex. 2014) (Atlas, J.) (citations omitted). The Court considers each element in turn.

a. Offer

Peninsula has sufficiently alleged that Principle made an offer. "To prove a valid offer, a party must show that (1) the offeror intended to make an offer, (2) the terms of the offer were clear and definite, and (3) the offeror communicated the essential terms of the offer to the offeree." Cano v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 425 F. Supp. 3d 779, 790 (W.D. Tex. 2019) (Rodriguez, J.) (citing Domingo v. Mitchell, 257 S.W.3d 34, 39 (Tex. App.—Amarillo 2008, pet. denied)).

7 Principle challenges whether its proposal was an offer. See (D.E. 20, p. 16).[10] Principle frames the second agreement as "a mere discussion of rates[,]" and argues that this discussion "[did] not reflect that [Principle] agreed or promised to do anything." (D.E. 20, p. 16).

However, Peninsula's complaint alleges that Lucas Pappas, an officer of Principle, "made a separate and new proposal for" Peninsula to do work at a specific rate. (D.E. 17, p. 5). Viewing this allegation through an "objective standard of what the parties said and did and not [based on] their subjective state of mind[,]" DeClaire v. G & B Mcintosh Fam. Ltd. P'ship, 260 S.W.3d 34, 44 (Tex. App.—Houston [1st Dist.] 2008, no pet.), an officer of Principle (the offeror), intending to come to an agreement, communicated terms for Peninsula to work at definite rates (the terms of the offer), and Peninsula (the offeree) understood that agreement as an offer for specific terms. See Cano, 425 F. Supp. at 790. As such, the Court finds that Peninsula sufficiently alleged that Principle made an offer.

b. Acceptance

Principle argues that the new agreement "does not reflect that any Defendant agreed ... to do anything." (D.E. 20, p. 16). But Peninsula alleges that it accepted the new terms. (D.E. 17, p. 5–6) (indicating that Peninsula "agreed to the reduced standby and holiday rates and accepted [the] proposal"). Again, the Court determines the presence of acceptance using an objective standard. Jordan v. Bank of Am., N.A., No. 4:23-CV-01092, 2024 WL 420903, at *4 (S.D. Tex. Feb. 5, 2024) (Ellison, J.). Under Texas law, a party may accept a contract through "acts, conduct, or acquiescence in the terms of the contract." DeClaire, 260 S.W.3d at 44 (collecting cases). Here, after Peninsula received the offer of the new rates, it "accepted" and began working. (D.E. 17, p. 5–6).

8 Accepting the complaint's allegations as true and making all reasonable inferences for Peninsula, see Allen, 28 F.4th at 616, Peninsula sufficiently alleges that it accepted Principle's offer for a second agreement, either by accepting the terms or by commencing performance in accordance with the terms. As such, this element is satisfied.

c. Meeting of the Minds

Principle argues that the second agreement contains no "mutual assent." (D.E. 20, p. 16–17). But as Peninsula points out, its complaint alleges that Principle and Peninsula mutually agreed to specific terms for "agreed upon rates." (D.E. 29, p. 9) Under Texas law, "[f]or an agreement to be enforceable, there must be a meeting of the minds with respect to its subject matter and essential terms." Tyco Valves & Controls, L.P. v. Colorado, 365 S.W.3d 750, 771 (Tex. App.—Houston [1st Dist.] 2012), aff'd, 432 S.W.3d 885, 894 (Tex. 2014) (citation omitted).

Here, taking Peninsula's allegations as true, Peninsula and Principle discussed a new agreement to perform work for compensation —this reflects a meeting of the minds as to the subject matter (Peninsula performing work for Principle, see (D.E. 29, p. 9)) and the essential terms (billing at the holiday and standby rates, see id.). See Tyco Valves, 365 S.W.3d at 771. As such, this element is satisfied.

d. Consent

Each party must consent to the contract terms. Gallier, 171 F. Supp. 3d at 567. Neither party appears to dispute the element of consent. See (D.E. 20; D.E. 29; D.E. 31). As such, the Court finds this element satisfied for purposes of resolving the instant motion to dismiss.

e. Execution

Principle asserts that the second agreement "d[id] not show ... execution[.]" (D.E. 20, p. 16). Peninsula responds by arguing that once it accepted and began performing (i.e., by working and "remaining on standby, billing at the agreed upon rates, [and] invoicing Principle"), the contract became enforceable. See (D.E. 29, p. 9).

"The execution of a contract includes the performance of all acts necessary to render it complete as an instrument." Tyco Valves, 365 S.W.3d at 771 (citation omitted). Here, the acts necessary to complete the contract as an instrument include (1) that the parties reached an agreement as to the terms of the contract and (2) at least one party began to perform under those terms. See Saum v. City of Coll. Station, No. 10-17-00408-CV, 2020 WL 7688033, at *6 (Tex. App.—Waco Dec. 22, 2020, pet. denied) (mem. op.) (noting that Texas law does not require a contract to be signed to be executed); Mullins v. TestAmerica, Inc., 564 F.3d 386, 418 (5th Cir. 2009) (noting performance is an essential element). The Court has already determined that Peninsula has alleged that the parties reached an agreement as to the contractual terms. Supra section III.B.i.c. Peninsula alleges that it performed the work "as instructed by" Principle (and the now-dismissed Defendants). (D.E. 17, p. 10). Given the inferences the Court must make at this stage in the proceedings, see Allen, 28 F.4th at 616, Peninsula sufficiently alleges that the second agreement shows execution of a contract.

In sum, the Court finds that Peninsula has sufficiently alleged that the second agreement gave rise to a contract. See (D.E. 17, p. 5–6). Because Peninsula has alleged a valid contract, the Court must now turn to the other breach of contract elements.

f. Breach of Contract Elements

9 "Under Texas law, the elements of a breach of contract claim are: 1) the existence of a valid contract; 2) performance or tendered performance by the plaintiff; 3) breach of the contract by the defendant; and 4) damages to the plaintiff resulting from the breach." Jordan, 2024 WL 420903, at *4 (cleaned up). Peninsula sufficiently alleges all four elements. See (D.E. 17, p. 5–6). The Court has already determined that Peninsula has sufficiently alleged the existence of a valid contract, satisfying the first element. See supra sections III.C.i–vii.

As to the second element, Peninsula alleges that it "commenced performance under" this new agreement, satisfying the second element. See (D.E. 17, p. 6); (D.E. 29, p. 9) (arguing Peninsula performed work under the agreed terms). As to the third and fourth elements, Peninsula alleges that Principle breached their second agreement by refusing to pay the balance for Peninsula's work, (D.E. 17, p. 6), and that Peninsula has suffered damages of at least "the value of the invoices and work" under this second agreement, id. at 10. In sum, Peninsula alleges that the second agreement constitutes a valid contract and that Principle breached that contract by refusing to pay in accordance with the parties' agreement. Accordingly, the Court DENIES Principle's motion to dismiss as to this claim. (D.E. 20, p. 16–17).

ii. Promissory Estoppel

Principle argues that Peninsula fails to adequately plead "any" of the promissory estoppel elements as to the second agreement. (D.E. 20, p. 18) (emphasis omitted). Peninsula responds that its complaint alleges all elements of a promissory estoppel claim. (D.E. 29, p. 12).

The Court has already determined that Peninsula states a breach of contract claim as to the second agreement. Supra Section III.C. However, "[g]enerally, promissory estoppel is a viable alternative to a claim for breach of contract." Mann v. Robles, No. 13-14-00190-CV, 2016 WL 1274690, at *4 (Tex. App.—Corpus Christi-Edinburg Mar. 31, 2016, pet denied) (mem. op.) (citation omitted). In other words, "[a] party can plead legal and equitable claims in the alternative," when—as is the case here—a "party disputes the existence of a contract governing the dispute." Johnson v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., 999 F. Supp. 2d 919, 929 (N.D. Tex. 2014) (Lynn, J.). Here, Principle disputes the existence of a contract governing the work at issue under the second agreement. See (D.E. 20, p. 18) (arguing that Peninsula fails to state a claim for breach of contract because the second agreement never gave rise to a legally binding contract). And Peninsula pled its promissory estoppel claim "in the alternative" to its breach of contract claim. (D.E. 17, p. 10). Further, while Peninsula could not recover at trial on both a breach of contract claim and a promissory estoppel claim, at this stage, Peninsula may proceed on alterative theories of liability. FED. R. CIV. P. 8(d)(2).

As the Court stated above, supra section III.B, the promissory estoppel elements are "(1) a promise; (2) foreseeability of reliance by the promisor; (3) actual, substantial, and reasonable reliance by the promisee to its detriment; and (4) injustice that can be avoided only by enforcement of the promise." Alvarado, 660 F. Supp. 3d at 619 (citation omitted). Peninsula's complaint alleges that Principle promised to pay if Peninsula worked from November 2022 to January 2023; that Peninsula then foreseeably and "reasonably and substantially relied on" this promise by continuing to work; and that it would be unjust to not enforce such promise. (D.E. 17, p. 10–11).

10 In sum, Peninsula alleges that Principle's agent proposed a new arrangement and promised a specific rate for Peninsula to work. (D.E. 17, p. 5). Peninsula had been working for Principle for the previous several months and anticipated that it would continue working under this new arrangement. See id. at 5–6. Peninsula then allegedly relied on Principle's promise to pay a "reduced standby and holiday rate" to continue working. See id. at 5. Accepting the allegations as true and viewing them "in the light most favorable to" Peninsula, see Allen, 28 F.4th at 616, the Court finds that Peninsula sufficiently alleges a promissory estoppel claim as to the second agreement. Accordingly, the Court DENIES Principle's motion to dismiss as to this claim. (D.E. 20, p. 17). [11]

C. Quantum Meruit

Principle argues that Peninsula's quantum meruit claim fails because (1) it is barred by the express, valid contract that already covers the work at issue and (2) Principle "did not have 'reasonable notice that' " Peninsula expected to be paid for its work. (D.E. 20, p. 18) (citations omitted). In response, Peninsula points out that (1) its quantum meruit theory is presented in the alternative, and no magic words are required to establish that fact; and (2) it would not have given "over $700,000.00 worth of equipment, labor, and manpower to Principle" without expecting to be paid for it. (D.E. 29, p. 13).

Texas law recognizes the "principle of recovery on quantum meruit [that] is founded on the rule that it is inequitable for a party to refuse to pay for benefits received or for work performed for him with his knowledge and consent by someone who is authorized to expect remuneration therefor." Channel Source Inc. v. CTI Indus. Corp., No. 3:15-CV-0271-P, 2015 WL 13118198, at *3 (N.D. Tex. Oct. 26, 2015) (Solis, J.) (quoting Camacho v. Sullivan Transfer Co., 577 S.W.2d 793, 794 (Tex. App.—Waco 1979, no writ)). "While a plaintiff may seek recovery under quantum meruit and breach of contract, a plaintiff may only recover under one claim." Port Elevator-Brownsville, L.C. v. Ivonne Soto Vega, No. B-98-23, 2008 WL 5435563, at *3 (S.D. Tex. Dec. 30, 2008) (Tagle, J.) (emphasis added) (citation omitted). And "quantum meruit applies where no express contract exists." Id. (citations omitted). In other words, "[i]f the parties reached an express agreement allocating payments, services, and risks—that is, a contract—then a court should not step in and impose its view of what would constitute an equitable arrangement." D2 Excavating, Inc. v. Thompson Thrift Constr., Inc., 973 F.3d 430, 436 (5th Cir. 2020).

11 However, "it is well-established [that] the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure allow a party to assert separate claims under alternative theories of liability." Fulcrum Credit Partners LLC v. ChipMOS Techs. Inc., No. A-10-CA-060-SS, 2010 WL 11444280, at *8 (Sparks, J.) (citing FED. R. CIV. P. 8(d)(2)). And a plaintiff does not need to "include the magic words 'in the alternative' " to successfully plead an alternative theory. Id. (citation omitted).

To the extent Peninsula brings a quantum meruit claim as to actions arising under the first, express contract, these claims are barred because "quantum meruit applies where no express contract exists." Port Elevator-Brownsville, L.C., 2008 WL 5435563, at *3; Cotton, 2017 WL 3709093, at *9 (noting that when an "express contract governs" the parties' disagreement, plaintiff fails to state a quantum meruit claim under the 12(b)(6) standard); Shanghai Hailian Elec. Tools Co., 2016 WL 5815896, at *2 (noting that if a defendant asserts the express contract doctrine as an affirmative defense to quantum meruit claim, and the express contract covers the dispute at issue, the quantum meruit claim is subject to 12(b)(6) dismissal). As such, the Court GRANTS Principle's motion to dismiss to the extent that it seeks to dismiss Peninsula's quantum meruit claim as to actions arising under the first, express contract. (D.E. 20, p. 18).

But to the extent Peninsula brings a quantum meruit claim as to actions arising under the second agreement—in the alternative to breach of contract—these claims pass Rule 12(b)(6) muster. See (D.E. 17, p. 11). As previously stated, plaintiffs can assert claims under alterative theories of liability. FED. R. CIV. P. 8(d)(2). And Peninsula alleges that Principle is refusing "to pay for benefits received [and] for work performed for [Principle] with [Principle's] knowledge and consent." See Camacho, 577 S.W.2d at 794; (D.E. 17, p. 5–6, 11) (alleging Peninsula worked for Principle for months under its agreement where Principle's agent proposed a specific rate at which Peninsula would work). While Principle argues that it "did not have 'reasonable notice that' " Peninsula expected to be paid for its work under the second agreement, (D.E. 20, p. 18) (citation omitted), Peninsula's allegation that it agreed to work for Principle at a specified rate (the "reduced standby and holiday rate") is sufficient to state that Principle had reasonable notice that Peninsula expected payment for its work. See (D.E. 17, p. 6). As such, the Court DENIES Principle's motion to dismiss to the extent that it seeks to dismiss Peninsula's quantum meruit claim as to actions arising under the second agreement. See (D.E. 20, p. 18–19). [12]

D. Sworn Account as to the Second Agreement

12 Principle argues that Peninsula's claim under sworn account fails because Peninsula does not adequately plead whether the prices were in accordance with an agreement or were "reasonable and customary." (D.E. 20, p. 19) (citation omitted). In response, Peninsula first argues that it can plead this claim in the alternative to a breach of contract claim, and that it rendered work for Principle and that the agreed price for the work was usual and customary. See (D.E. 29, p. 14). [13]

In Texas, the elements of a sworn account claim are "(1) ... the rendering of personal services; (2) the prices charged are in accordance with the parties' agreement or, in the absence of an agreement, the prices are usual, customary and reasonable; and (3) the amount remains unpaid." Nat'l Oilwell Varco, L.P. v. Elite Coil Tubing Sols., LLC, No. H-13-0374, 2014 WL 12619323, at *3 (S.D. Tex. Oct. 17, 2014) (Atlas, J.) (citations omitted).

Here, only the second element appears to be at issue. See (D.E. 20, p. 19) (arguing Peninsula fails to allege second element); see also (D.E. 17, p. 5–6) (alleging Peninsula rendered services for Principle and Principle has not paid Peninsula for that work). Principle appears to argue that the prices for the second agreement were not made in accordance with an agreement, which means that the prices would not be assessed under the "reasonable and customary" standard. See (D.E. 20, p. 19–20).

Principle is correct that Peninsula's complaint states that the prices for the second agreement "were reasonable and customary." See (D.E. 17, p. 11). But Peninsula's sworn account section also incorporates by reference every previous allegation "as though fully restated verbatim[,]" id., and Peninsula's complaint previously states that the parties agreed to "a reduced standby and holiday rate" at which Peninsula would work, see (D.E. 17, p. 5). Accepting these allegations as true and construing them in the light most favorable to Peninsula, see Allen, 28 F.4th at 616, Peninsula has sufficiently alleged there was an agreement regarding prices and those prices were in accordance with that agreement—satisfying the second element for sworn account. As such, the Court DENIES Principle's motion to dismiss as to this claim. (D.E. 20, p. 19).

E. Fraud

Peninsula's fraud claim is subject to a heightened pleading standard. See FED. R. CIV. P. 9(b) ("In alleging fraud or mistake, a party must state with particularity the circumstances constituting fraud or mistake."). Principle argues that Peninsula fails to state a claim under this heightened standard. (D.E. 20, p. 20–23). In the alternative, Principle argues that the economic loss doctrine bars any fraud claims because the claims are based on a duty that arises out of the contract and because the loss is the subject of the contract. Id. at 23–24. In response, Peninsula argues that despite the heightened pleading standard, fraud claims do "not require absolute particularity" and that the heightened fraud pleading "standard is not a straightjacket." (D.E. 29, p. 15–16) (citation omitted). Peninsula also argues that the economic loss doctrine does not bar fraud and fraudulent inducement claims and does not apply when a party to a contract has an independent legal duty (here, the duty to avoid fraud). (D.E. 29, p. 21) (citations omitted). [14]

13 Under Texas law, fraud "requires (1) a material misrepresentation; (2) that was false; (3) that the employer knew to be false when made or asserted without knowledge of its truth; (4) intended to be acted upon; (5) detrimentally relied upon; and [(6)] resulting in injury." Gilbert v. Driven Brands Shared Servs., LLC, No. 4:23-CV-01747, 2023 WL 9316919, at *6 (S.D. Tex. Dec. 11, 2023) (Ho, Mag. J.) (citing Formosa Plastics Corp. USA v. Presidio Eng'rs & Contractors, Inc., 960 S.W.2d 41, 47 (Tex. 1998)), adopted, No. 4:23-CV-01747, 2024 WL 407497 (S.D. Tex. Feb. 2, 2024) (Bennett, J.). However, the "mere failure to perform contractual obligations as promised does not constitute fraud but is instead breach of contract.... To be actionable as fraudulent inducement, a breach must be coupled with a showing that the promisor never intended to perform under the contract." Kevin M. Ehringer Enters., Inc. v McData Servs. Corp., 646 F3d 321, 325 (5th Cir. 2011) (citations omitted). Such a representation "must be a representation of a material fact." Trenholm v. Ratcliff, 646 S.W.2d 927, 930 (Tex. 1983) (citation omitted).

In the Fifth Cirucit, "[p]leading fraud with particularity ... requires 'time, place, and contents of the false representations, as well as the identity of the person making the misrepresentation and what [that person] obtained thereby.' " Ascend Performance Materials Operations LLC, v. Mastec Power Corp., No. 4:22-CV-03932, 2024 WL 3497931, at *2 (S.D. Tex. July 22, 2024) (Eskridge, J.) (quoting Williams v. WMX Tech., Inc., 112 F3d 175, 177 (5th Cir. 1997)).

Before turning to the elements of fraud, the Court considers whether the economic loss doctrine bars this claim. Principle cites Hurd v. BAC Home Loans Servicing, LP, 880 F. Supp. 2d 747, 763 (N.D. Tex. 2012) (Lynn, J.) (adopting magistrate judge's recommendation, 880 F. Supp. 2d 747, 753–769 (N.D. Tex. 2012) (Ramirez, Mag. J.)), in support of its argument that a claim is barred by the economic loss doctrine if the claim arises from a breach of the contract or from "the subject of the contract itself." (D.E. 20, p. 23) (citing Hurd, 880 F. Supp. 2d at 763). But Hurd also notes "that the economic loss rule does not bar fraud and fraudulent inducement claims." Hurd, 880 F. Supp. 2d at 763 (collecting cases). Further, Peninsula's fraud claim does not arise solely from Peninsula and Principle's first contract—as Peninsula's complaint states, see (D.E. 17, p. 13), Peninsula alleges Principle committed fraud in order to convince Peninsula to begin and to keep working under the second agreement, see id. (stating that Principle made its representation "with the intent that" Peninsula would later perform the work for Principle). As such, Principle's argument that the economic loss doctrine bars Peninsula's fraud claims is inapposite, and the Court declines to dismiss Peninsula's fraud claims on those grounds. See (D.E. 20, p. 23–24).

Now, the Court turns to the fraud claim itself, considering each element in turn, viewing the allegations in the light most favorable to Peninsula, and making all reasonable inferences in Peninsula's favor. See Allen, 28 F.4th at 616.

i. Principle made a material misrepresentation.

To be actionable, Peninsula must allege Principle made "a representation of a material fact" and not merely an opinion. See Trenholm, 646 S.W.2d at 930. To start, Peninsula's allegations state that Principle represented to Peninsula "that [Principle] had not received payment from TTL for all the [w]ork completed by [Peninsula] under the [f]irst [c]ontract." (D.E. 17, p. 12). Peninsula contends this is a misrepresentation because it alleges that Principle "had no intention of compensating" Peninsula for its work, even though TTL had paid Principle. Id; see also id. at 4 (alleging that "TTL has in fact paid ... Principle") This representation is more than a mere opinion—Peninsula alleges that Principle stated as a fact that TTL had not submitted final payment. Further, this representation was not ancillary; it was material enough that it induced Peninsula to continue working for at least two months. See (D.E. 17, p. 5–6) (alleging that Peninsula worked for approximately two and a half months after Principle's representation); (D.E.

29) (arguing that Principle's representation to Peninsula was material).

ii. The representation was false.

14 Principle argues that its statement to Peninsula was "not materially false" because "Principle never was paid in full by TTL[.]" (D.E. 20, p. 22). Nevertheless, the Court accepts Peninsula's allegations as true. See Allen, 28 F.4th at 616. And those allegations say that TTL paid Principle. In support of the allegation that TTL paid Principle, Peninsula notes that Principle's agent Pappas "affirmed receipt of the payments from TTL by executing sworn Conditional Waiver of Release of Liens attesting to receipt of the payments and that subcontractors, such as [Peninsula], would be paid in full for their work." (D.E. 17, p. 13). It appears that Principle made this alleged representation sometime in the fall of 2022. See id. at 4–5. As such, this element is satisfied.

iii. Principle knew the representation was false.

Peninsula alleges that Principle knew its representation was untrue because TTL had paid Principle; Peninsula notes that Principle's agent Pappas "affirmed receipt of the payments from TTL by executing sworn conditional waiver of release of liens attesting to receipt of the payments" and that those receipts meant "that subcontractors, such as [Peninsula], would be paid in full for their [w]ork." (D.E. 17, p. 13) (cleaned up); see e.g. (D.E. 29-4, p. 23) (signature of Lucas Pappas as agent of Principle swearing that Principle received payment from TTL). At the same time, Peninsula alleges that Principle said that TTL had not paid Principle. Id. at 4. Because Peninsula alleges that Principle made this representation at a time during or after it allegedly received payment from TTL, Peninsula sufficiently alleges that Principle knew its representation that TTL had not paid was false. As such, this element is satisfied.

iv. Principle made a representation with the intent that Peninsula would rely on it, and Peninsula reasonably and detrimentally relied on this representation.

Peninsula alleges that it detrimentally relied on Principle's representation: Principle allegedly misrepresented that TTL had not paid Principle to induce Peninsula to work under the second agreement. See (D.E. 17, p. 13) (stating that Principle made its representation "with the intent that [Peninsula] would rely upon [it] and act thereon and perform the [w]ork" and that Peninsula did rely on such statement). Peninsula must have reasonably relied on this representation to be actionable under Texas law. See LeTourneau Techs. Drilling Sys., Inc. v. Nomac Drilling, LLC, 676 F. Supp. 2d 534, 546 (S.D. Tex. 2009) (Lake, J.) (stating that reliance on an oral representation must be reasonable for fraud claim to be proper under Texas law).

Here, viewing the allegations in the light most favorable to Peninsula, see Allen, 28 F.4th at 616, the Court finds Peninsula has sufficiently alleged that its reliance was both reasonable and detrimental. Peninsula alleges that it "relied on [Principle]'s representation because it believed ... Principle would compensate" Peninsula for Peninsula's work—which is why it came to an agreement with Principle—the second agreement, see Section III.B—to continue to work. (D.E. 17, p. 5–6, 13). Because Peninsula alleges that Principle gave Peninsula a reason it needed to enter into a new contract (that TTL had not yet paid Principle) and that Principle had previously paid Peninsula in the parties' course of dealing, see (D.E. 17, p. 4), the Court finds Peninsula has sufficiently alleged reasonable reliance. Additionally, because Peninsula alleges damages resulting from this reliance, see (D.E. 17, p. 6, 13), the Court finds Peninsula has sufficiently alleged detrimental reliance. As such, this element is satisfied.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

v. Peninsula was injured as a result.

Finally, Peninsula alleges that it spent significant resources and incurred expenses for its labor, equipment, and services and forewent other work opportunities as a result of entering into the second agreement. (D.E. 17, p. 13). The amount Principle allegedly owes Peninsula includes $738,506.96 worth of damages. Id. at 6. These injuries were a direct result of Peninsula's continuing to work for Principle (and forgoing other work opportunities). See id. at 4–6, 13. Accordingly, Plaintiff has sufficiently alleged it was injured.

vi. In total, Peninsula sufficiently alleges fraud.

15 In short, Peninsula alleges that Principle, through its agent, made a false representation with the intent that Peninsula would rely upon it, and Peninsula ultimately relied upon the representation, resulting in Peninsula's injury. See (D.E. 17, p. 4, 5–6, 12–13). Indeed, Peninsula's chronology of alleged events supports the inference of fraud: Principle told Peninsula that TTL had not paid Principle at around the same time that TTL had in fact paid Principle, assuming the allegation's truth and holding all inferences in favor of Peninsula, see Allen, 28 F.4th at 616. Cf. Gilbert, 2023 WL 9316919, at *6 (finding fraud claim failed when plaintiff's pleadings were conclusory and "the chronology of events undermine[d]" plaintiff's theory of fraud). While Peninsula could have alleged in more detail how Principle was fraudulent, the Court finds that each of the fraud elements under Texas law are met.

Finally, in addition to alleging the elements of fraud, Peninsula also meets the Fifth Circuit's test: Peninsula alleges the time-frame (fall 2022), the place (occurring in the Corpus Christi, Texas area)[15], the contents (that TTL had not paid Principle), and the identity of the person making the alleged false statement (Pappas, an agent of Principle). See Williams, 112 F3d at 177. This is sufficient at this early stage in the proceedings. Allen, 28 F.4th at 616. As such, the Court DENIES Principle's motion to dismiss as to this claim. (D.E. 20, p. 20–21).

F. Fraud Claims against now-dismissed Defendants

Peninsula's complaint includes claims of fraud against the now-dismissed Pappas and Southern. (D.E. 17, p. 13–14). Principle moves to dismiss these claims. (D.E. 20, p. 20–24). Given that Southern and Pappas are no longer defendants in this action, (D.E. 28), the Court DENIES as moot Principle's motion to dismiss as to these claims. (D.E. 20, p. 20–24).

IV. Conclusion

For the reasons above, the Court GRANTS in part and DENIES in part the motion to dismiss. (D.E. 20). Accordingly, the Court ORDERS the following:

- Peninsula has plausibly alleged a breach of contract claim as to the first contract. As such, Principle's motion to dismiss as to this claim is DENIED.
- Peninsula has not plausibly alleged a promissory estoppel claim as to the first contract. As such, Principle's motion to dismiss as to this claim is GRANTED.
- Peninsula has plausibly alleged a breach of contract claim as to the second agreement. As such, Principle's motion to dismiss as to this claim is DENIED.
- Peninsula has plausibly alleged a promissory estoppel claim as to the second agreement. As such, Principle's motion to dismiss as to this claim is DENIED.
- Peninsula has failed to plausibly allege a quantum meruit claim as to the first, express contract, but Peninsula has plausibly alleged a claim as to quantum meruit claim as to the second agreement. As such, Principle's motion to dismiss as to this claim is GRANTED in part and DENIED in part.
- Peninsula has plausibly alleged a claim as to sworn account as to the second agreement. As such, Principle's motion to dismiss as to this claim is DENIED.
- Peninsula has plausibly alleged a claim of fraud, which the Court construes as a fraudulent inducement claim. As such, Principle's motion to dismiss as to this claim is DENIED. Further, the Court DENIES as moot Principle's motion to dismiss Peninsula's fraud claims against Pappas and Southern.
- Principle's motion to dismiss with respect to personal jurisdiction and failure to state a claim as to Southern and Pappas, see (D.E. 20, p. 5–14), is DENIED as moot.

SO ORDERED.

All Citations

Not Reported in Fed. Supp., 2024 WL 5036616

Footnotes

1 For clarity, in this Order, the Court refers to the first, written agreement between the parties as the “first contract” and the second agreement (that Peninsula alleges is a contract) as the "second agreement." Since Principle has not moved to dismiss the first breach of contract claim on the grounds that it was not a contract, both parties appear to agree that the first agreement is a contract. However, given that Principle disputes whether the second agreement is a contract, the Court refers to it as the "second agreement."

2 Peninsula submitted four invoices (totaling $738,506.96) for this time (from November 2022–January 2023) for standby time and work performed payable on "Net 30 days" with a past due penalty of 1.5% interest each month until the invoice is paid in full. Id. at 6. Peninsula submitted these invoices under the parties' previous course of dealing and "arrangement." Id.

3 The motion to dismiss includes a Rule 12(b)(2) argument for lack of personal jurisdiction and Rule 12(b)(6) argument for failure to state a claim as to the now-dismissed Defendants Southern Road & Bridge, LLC ("Southern") and Pappas. (D.E. 20, p. 5–14). Given that Southern and Pappas are no longer defendants in this action, (D.E. 28), the Court finds those arguments moot and declines to address them. (D.E. 20, p. 5–14).

4 The Court applies Texas law in this diversity case. (D.E. 17, p. 1–2); Am. Gen. Life Ins. Co. v. Vega, No. H-11-1720, 2012 WL 13042660, at *4 (S.D. Tex. Dec. 12, 2012) (Gilmore, J.).

5 Principle attaches the first contract to its motion to dismiss. (D.E. 20-4). At the motion to dismiss stage, the Court examines "the pleadings and ... 'any documents attached to the motion to dismiss that are central to the claim and referenced by the complaint.' " PHI Grp., Inc., 58 F.4th at 841 (quoting Lone Star Fund V (U.S.), L.P. v. Barclays Bank PLC, 594 F.3d 383, 387 (5th Cir. 2010)). Given that this contract gives rise to Peninsula's first breach of contract claim and that Peninsula refers to the contract in its complaint, (D.E. 17, p. 3–5, 8–9), the Court considers the contract in ruling on the motion to dismiss. See Wellness Walk In Tubs, LLC v. Scripps Media, Inc., 607 F. Supp. 3d 1167, 1171 n.2 (D. Colo. 2022) (Blackburn, J.) (citations omitted) ("This [contract] document, although not attached to the [a]mended [c]omplaint, is referenced therein and central to plaintiff's claims. It therefore is properly considered in resolving the motion to dismiss.").

6 At the most recent status conference in this matter, Peninsula noted the final payment issue is a fact dispute on which Peninsula needs to conduct discovery. See March 6, 2024 Minute Entry. The Court agrees that whether TTL did in fact issue a final payment is a dispute better reserved for the summary judgment stage. At the motion to dismiss stage, the Court must take Peninsula's allegations as true. Allen, 28 F.4th at 616.

7 In the alternative, the Court could also decline to consider this one-sentence argument for inadequate briefing, because "[c]ourts have consistently held that inadequate briefing results in a waiver of a party's arguments." Ronaldo Designer Jewelry, Inc. v. Cox, No. 1:17-CV-2, 2018 WL 1370610, at *2 (N.D. Miss. Mar. 16, 2018) (Brown, J.) (quoting TGIP, Inc. v. AT&T Corp., 512 F.Supp.2d 696, 712 (E.D. Tex. 2007) (Clark, J.)).

8 Indeed, Peninsula's complaint states that the parties "entered into a contract" that each party signed. (D.E. 17, p. 3). The parties agreed that Texas law would control the contract and that the parties would work in accordance with this contract. See id. at 3–4. This contract is an express contract, as "the contractual terms are stated by the parties[.]" Haws & Garrett Gen. Contractors, Inc. v. Gorbett Bros. Welding Co., 480 S.W.2d 607, 609 (Tex. 1972) (citation omitted). This is in contrast to an implied contract, where a contract arises from the parties' conduct. Id. (citation omitted).

9 Peninsula confirmed at the most recent status conference in this matter that the second agreement was comprised of both verbal assertions (with Principle requesting that Peninsula remain on site at the standby rate) and later written confirmation via email. See March 6, 2024 Minute Entry.

10 In support of its argument, Principle cites to an email exchange between Lucas Pappas and Peninsula Marine that occurred on December 29, 2022. See (D.E. 20, p. 16) (citing (D.E. 20-5, p. 1)). In ruling on a motion to dismiss, the Court may consider documents attached to the motion to dismiss, if those document "are 'referred to in the plaintiff's complaint and are central to [the] claim.' " Stoller Enterprises, 2022 WL 1238547, at *1 (citations omitted). In reviewing the live complaint, the Court fails to find a December 29, 2022 conversation—indeed, the Court fails to find a conversation from December 2022. See (D.E. 17). To be sure, the complaint implicitly references that the parties may have communicated during this time, see (D.E. 17, p. 6 (indicating that from November 14, 2022 to January 16, 2023, the parties had a course of dealing)), but the Court declines to determine whether this specific conversation is both referred to in the complaint and central to Plaintiff's claims. See (D.E. 20-5, p. 1); Stoller Enterprises, 2022 WL 1238547, at *1. As such, the Court declines to consider this conversation in ruling on the motion to dismiss and focuses instead on the allegations in Plaintiff's live complaint. See (D.E. 17). Determining whether a fact issue about the formation of a second contract exists based on the possible December 29, 2022 conversation is a determination better suited for the summary judgment stage.

11 Whereas the Court has determined that Peninsula's complaint alleges that an express contract governs the conduct at issue for claims arising under the first contract, supra Section III.A.ii, the second agreement does not clearly give rise to an express contract. The second agreement may ultimately turn out to be an implied, rather than express, contract. See Balfour Beatty Rail, Inc. v. Kan. City S. Ry. Co., 173 F. Supp. 3d 363, 400 (N.D. Tex. 2016) (Lindsay, J.) (noting that an implied contract arises "[w]hen the evidence consists of the conduct of the parties and their course of dealing with one another"), aff'd as modified and remanded, 725 F. App'x 256 (5th Cir. 2018); see also (D.E. 17, p. 5–6) (alleging that Peninsula commenced performance by working under the second agreement's terms and the parties' "course of dealing"). At this juncture, the Court need not decide the unbriefed issue of whether the second agreement was an express or implied contract. Further, Principle disputes the existence of a contract arising from the second agreement, see (D.E. 20, p. 18), so Peninsula can properly plead its "equitable claim[ ] in the alternative[,]" see Johnson, 999 F. Supp. 2d at 929. Accordingly, although the express contract doctrine bars Peninsula's promissory estoppel claims on the first contract, the express contract doctrine does not bar Peninsula's promissory estoppel claims on the second agreement—at least, at the motion to dismiss stage.

12 Again, while Peninsula cannot recover at trial on both a breach of contract claim and a quantum meruit claim as to damages under the second agreement, at this stage, Peninsula may proceed on alterative theories of liability. See FED. R. CIV. P. 8(d)(2); supra Section III.D. n.6; see also SCP Distribs., L.L.C. v. Tex. Pool Grp., L.L.C., No. H-22-4522, 2024 WL 534617, at *6 n.40 (S.D. Tex. Feb. 9, 2024) (Lake, J.) (holding that plaintiff was "entitled to summary judgment on the breach of contract claim" which precluded plaintiff's "recovery in quantum meruit"). The difference between Peninsula's quantum meruit claim under the first contract and its claim under the second agreement is that Peninsula's complaint clearly alleges that an express contract covers work under the first contract, whereas the parties disagree whether the second agreement ultimately formed a legally binding contract. As such, the first contract bars Peninsula's quasi-contract claims (like quantum meruit) as a matter of law, whereas Peninsula may proceed to summary judgment to prove either breach of contract or quasi-contract claims as to the second agreement.

13 Principle appears to argue that Peninsula cannot bring a claim for sworn account under the first contract. See (D.E. 20, p. 20). But Peninsula has clarified that it brings a claim for sworn account only under services provided under the second agreement —not the first. See (D.E. 29, p. 14). As such, Peninsula's complaint only brings a claim for sworn account under actions arising under the second agreement, so the Court declines to address any argument that Peninsula cannot bring a claim for sworn account under the first contract. See (D.E. 20, p. 20).

14 While Peninsula styles this claim as a 'fraud' claim, the Court construes this claim as a fraudulent inducement claim. See W. Afr. Ventures Ltd. v. Fleming, 634 F. Supp. 3d 391, 398 (S.D. Tex. 2022) (Rosenthal, C.J.) (quoting Bohnsack v. Varco, L.P., 668 F.3d 262, 277 (5th Cir. 2012) ("Fraud claims that depend on the existence of an enforceable contract are properly styled as fraudulent inducement claims, not common law fraud claims."). Fraudulent inducement claims are "a 'species of common-law fraud' that" arise when a defendant makes a "false promise [that] 'induces' the plaintiff to agree to a contract the plaintiff would not have agreed to if the defendant had not made the false promise." Id. (quoting Anderson v. Durant, 550 S.W.3d 605, 614 (Tex. 2018)). Given that the alleged fraud at issue arises in the context of Principle inducing Peninsula into a second agreement, see (D.E. 29 p. 15) (arguing the fraud arose out of Principle's misrepresentation that TTL had not paid Principle to avoid paying Peninsula under the first contract); (D.E. 17, p. 13) (alleging Principle made representations to Peninsula so that Peninsula would begin work under the "standby and holiday rate[,]" i.e. the second agreement), the Court thus construes Peninsula's claim as a fraudulent inducement claim. Regardless, that does not alter the analysis because the essential elements remain the same: a material misrepresentation that was false, that the defendant intended the plaintiff to rely on; that the plaintiff did rely on; and that caused the plaintiff injury. W. Afr. Ventures Ltd., 634 F. Supp. 3d at 398.

15 Peninsula's complaint notes that TTL employees (as well as Peninsula and Principle) worked out of Corpus Christi, Texas during the time when the allegations occurred. See (D.E. 17, p. 5).

End of Document

© 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

CASE NO. 11

Restatement (Second) of Torts § 46 (1965)

Restatement of the Law - Torts | September 2025 Update

Restatement (Second) of Torts

Division One. Intentional Harms to Persons, Land, and Chattels

Chapter 2. Intentional Invasions of Interests in Personality

Topic 5. The Interest in Freedom from Emotional Distress

---

§ 46 Outrageous Conduct Causing Severe Emotional Distress

Comment:
Reporter's Notes
Case Citations - by Jurisdiction

(1) One who by extreme and outrageous conduct intentionally or recklessly causes severe emotional distress to another is subject to liability for such emotional distress, and if bodily harm to the other results from it, for such bodily harm.
(2) Where such conduct is directed at a third person, the actor is subject to liability if he intentionally or recklessly causes severe emotional distress
(a) to a member of such person's immediate family who is present at the time, whether or not such distress results in bodily harm, or
(b) to any other person who is present at the time, if such distress results in bodily harm.

See Reporter's Notes.

Caveat:

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

The Institute expresses no opinion as to whether there may not be other circumstances under which the actor may be subject to liability for the intentional or reckless infliction of emotional distress.

Comment:

a. This Section is concerned only with emotional distress which is inflicted intentionally or recklessly. As to the negligent infliction of emotional distress, see §§ 312, 313, 436, and 436A.

b. As indicated in Chapter 47, emotional distress may be an element of damages in many cases where other interests have been invaded, and tort liability has arisen apart from the emotional distress. Because of the fear of fictitious or trivial claims, distrust of the proof offered, and the difficulty of setting up any satisfactory boundaries to liability, the law has been slow to afford independent protection to the interest in freedom from emotional distress standing alone. It is only within recent years that the rule stated in this Section has been fully recognized as a separate and distinct basis of tort liability, without the presence of the elements necessary to any other tort, such as assault, battery, false imprisonment, trespass to land, or the like. This Section may be regarded as an extension of the principle involved in the rules stated in §§ 21- 34 as to the tort of assault.

c. The law is still in a stage of development, and the ultimate limits of this tort are not yet determined. This Section states the extent of the liability thus far accepted generally by the courts. The Caveat is intended to leave fully open the possibility of further development of the law, and the recognition of other situations in which liability may be imposed.

d. Extreme and outrageous conduct. The cases thus far decided have found liability only where the defendant's conduct has been extreme and outrageous. It has not been enough that the defendant has acted with an intent which is tortious or even criminal, or that he has intended to inflict emotional distress, or even that his conduct has been characterized by "malice," or a degree of aggravation which would entitle the plaintiff to punitive damages for another tort. Liability has been found only where the conduct has been so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious, and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Generally, the case is one in which the recitation of the facts to an average member of the community would arouse his resentment against the actor, and lead him to exclaim, "Outrageous!"

The liability clearly does not extend to mere insults, indignities, threats, annoyances, petty oppressions, or other trivialities. The rough edges of our society are still in need of a good deal of filing down, and in the meantime plaintiffs must necessarily be expected and required to be hardened to a certain amount of rough language, and to occasional acts that are definitely inconsiderate and unkind. There is no occasion for the law to intervene in every case where some one's feelings are hurt. There must still be freedom to express an unflattering opinion, and some safety valve must be left through which irascible tempers may blow off relatively harmless steam. See Magruder, Mental and Emotional Disturbance in the Law of Torts, 47 Harvard Law Review

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

1033, 1053 (1936). It is only where there is a special relation between the parties, as stated in § 48, that there may be recovery for insults not amounting to extreme outrage.

Illustrations:

1. As a practical joke, A falsely tells B that her husband has been badly injured in an accident, and is in the hospital with both legs broken. B suffers severe emotional distress. A is subject to liability to B for her emotional distress. If it causes nervous shock and resulting illness, A is subject to liability to B for her illness.

2. A, the president of an association of rubbish collectors, summons B to a meeting of the association, and in the presence of an intimidating group of associates tells B that B has been collecting rubbish in territory which the association regards as exclusively allocated to one of its members. A demands that B pay over the proceeds of his rubbish collection, and tells B that if he does not do so the association will beat him up, destroy his truck, and put him out of business. B is badly frightened, and suffers severe emotional distress. A is subject to liability to B for his emotional distress, and if it results in illness, A is also subject to liability to B for his illness.

3. A is invited to a swimming party at an exclusive resort. B gives her a bathing suit which he knows will dissolve in water. It does dissolve while she is swimming, leaving her naked in the presence of men and women whom she has just met. A suffers extreme embarrassment, shame, and humiliation. B is subject to liability to A for her emotional distress.

4. A makes a telephone call but is unable to get his number. In the course of an altercation with the telephone operator, A calls her a God damned woman, a God damned liar, and says that if he were there he would break her God damned neck. B suffers severe emotional distress, broods over the incident, is unable to sleep, and is made ill. A's conduct, although insulting, is not so outrageous or extreme as to make A liable to B.

e. The extreme and outrageous character of the conduct may arise from an abuse by the actor of a position, or a relation with the other, which gives him actual or apparent authority over the other, or power to affect his interests. Thus an attempt to extort money by a threat of arrest may make the actor liable even where the arrest, or the threat alone, would not do so. In particular police officers, school authorities, landlords, and collecting creditors have been held liable for extreme abuse of their position. Even in such cases, however, the actor has not been held liable for mere insults, indignities, or annoyances that are not extreme or outrageous.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Illustrations:

5. A, a private detective, calls on B and represents himself to be a police officer. He threatens to arrest B on a charge of espionage unless B surrenders letters of a third person which are in her possession. B suffers severe emotional distress and resulting illness. A is subject to liability to B for both.

6. A, the principal of a high school, summons B, a schoolgirl, to his office, and abruptly accuses her of immoral conduct with various men. A bullies B for an hour, and threatens her with prison and with public disgrace for herself and her parents unless she confesses. B suffers severe emotional distress, and resulting illness. A is subject to liability to B for both.

7. A, a creditor, seeking to collect a debt from B, sends B a series of letters in lurid envelopes bearing a picture of lightning about to strike, in which A repeatedly threatens suit without bringing it, reviles B as a deadbeat, a dishonest man, and a criminal, and threatens to garnish his wages, to bother his employer so much that B will be discharged, and to "tie B up tight as a drum" if he does not pay. B suffers severe emotional distress. A is subject to liability to B.

8. A, a creditor, seeking to collect a debt, calls on B and demands payment in a rude and insolent manner. When B says that he cannot pay, A calls B a deadbeat, and says that he will never trust B again. A's conduct, although insulting, is not so extreme or outrageous as to make A liable to B.

f. The extreme and outrageous character of the conduct may arise from the actor's knowledge that the other is peculiarly susceptible to emotional distress, by reason of some physical or mental condition or peculiarity. The conduct may become heartless, flagrant, and outrageous when the actor proceeds in the face of such knowledge, where it would not be so if he did not know. It must be emphasized again, however, that major outrage is essential to the tort; and the mere fact that the actor knows that the other will regard the conduct as insulting, or will have his feelings hurt, is not enough.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Illustrations:

9. A, an eccentric and mentally deficient old maid, has the delusion that a pot of gold is buried in her back yard, and is always digging for it. Knowing this, B buries a pot with other contents in her yard, and when A digs it up causes her to be escorted in triumph to the city hall, where the pot is opened under circumstances of public humiliation to A. A suffers severe emotional disturbance and resulting illness. B is subject to liability to A for both.

10. A knows that B, a Pennsylvania Dutch farmer, is extremely superstitious, and believes in witchcraft. In order to force B to sell A his farm, A goes through the ritual of putting a "hex" on the farm, causing B to believe that it is bewitched so that crops will not grow on it. B suffers severe emotional distress and resulting illness. A is subject to liability to B for both.

11. A, who knows that B is pregnant, intentionally shoots before the eyes of B a pet dog, to which A knows that B is greatly attached. B suffers severe emotional distress, which results in a miscarriage. A is subject to liability to B for the distress and for the miscarriage.

12. A is in a hospital suffering from a heart illness and under medical orders that he shall have complete rest and quiet. B enters A's sick room for the purpose of trying to settle an insurance claim. B's insistence and boisterous conduct cause severe emotional distress, and A suffers a heart attack. B is subject to liability to A if he knows of A's condition, but is not liable if he does not have such knowledge.

13. A is an otherwise normal girl who is a little overweight, and is quite sensitive about it. Knowing this, B tells A that she looks like a hippopotamus. This causes A to become embarrassed and angry. She broods over the incident, and is made ill. B is not liable to A.

g. The conduct, although it would otherwise be extreme and outrageous, may be privileged under the circumstances. The actor is never liable, for example, where he has done no more than to insist upon his legal rights in a permissible way, even though he is well aware that such insistence is certain to cause emotional distress. Apart from this, there may perhaps be situations in which the actor is privileged to resort to extreme and outrageous words, or even acts, in self-defense against the other, or under circumstances of extreme provocation which minimize or remove the element of outrage. Such cases have not arisen; but an analogy may be found in decisions under the actionable words statutes of Mississippi, Virginia, and West Virginia.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Illustration:

14. A and her children are destitute, ill, and unable to pay their rent. B, their landlord, calls on A and threatens to evict her if the rent is not paid. Although B's conduct is heartless, he has done no more than the law permits him to do, and he is not liable to A for her emotional distress.

h. Court and jury. It is for the court to determine, in the first instance, whether the defendant's conduct may reasonably be regarded as so extreme and outrageous as to permit recovery, or whether it is necessarily so. Where reasonable men may differ, it is for the jury, subject to the control of the court, to determine whether, in the particular case, the conduct has been sufficiently extreme and outrageous to result in liability.

i. Intention and recklessness. The rule stated in this Section applies where the actor desires to inflict severe emotional distress, and also where he knows that such distress is certain, or substantially certain, to result from his conduct. It applies also where he acts recklessly, as that term is defined in § 500, in deliberate disregard of a high degree of probability that the emotional distress will follow.

Illustrations:

15. During A's absence from her home, B attempts to commit suicide in A's kitchen by cutting his throat. B knows that A is substantially certain to return and find his body, and to suffer emotional distress. A finds B lying in her kitchen in a pool of gore, and suffers severe emotional distress. B is subject to liability to A.

16. The same facts as in Illustration 15, except that B does not know that A is substantially certain to find him, but does know that there is a high degree of probability that she will do so. B is subject to liability to A.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

j. Severe emotional distress. The rule stated in this Section applies only where the emotional distress has in fact resulted, and where it is severe. Emotional distress passes under various names, such as mental suffering, mental anguish, mental or nervous shock, or the like. It includes all highly unpleasant mental reactions, such as fright, horror, grief, shame, humiliation, embarrassment, anger, chagrin, disappointment, worry, and nausea. It is only where it is extreme that the liability arises. Complete emotional tranquillity is seldom attainable in this world, and some degree of transient and trivial emotional distress is a part of the price of living among people. The law intervenes only where the distress inflicted is so severe that no reasonable man could be expected to endure it. The intensity and the duration of the distress are factors to be considered in determining its severity. Severe distress must be proved; but in many cases the extreme and outrageous character of the defendant's conduct is in itself important evidence that the distress has existed. For example, the mere recital of the facts in Illustration 1 above goes far to prove that the claim is not fictitious.

The distress must be reasonable and justified under the circumstances, and there is no liability where the plaintiff has suffered exaggerated and unreasonable emotional distress, unless it results from a peculiar susceptibility to such distress of which the actor has knowledge. See Comment f.

It is for the court to determine whether on the evidence severe emotional distress can be found; it is for the jury to determine whether, on the evidence, it has in fact existed.

Illustrations:

17. The same facts as Illustration 1, except that B does not believe A's statement, and is only sufficiently disturbed to telephone to the hospital to find out whether it could possibly be true. A is not liable to B.

18. As a practical joke, A dresses himself in woman's clothing in order to surprise and startle B. B, who has a pathological fear of men in women's clothing, is badly frightened, becomes hysterical, and suffers a shock which results in illness. A is not liable to B unless A knows of B's peculiar susceptibility.

k. Bodily harm. Normally, severe emotional distress is accompanied or followed by shock, illness, or other bodily harm, which in itself affords evidence that the distress is genuine and severe. The rule stated is not, however, limited to cases where there has been bodily harm; and if the conduct is sufficiently extreme and outrageous there may be liability for the emotional distress alone, without such harm. In such cases the courts may perhaps tend to look for more in the way of outrage as a guarantee that the claim is genuine; but if the enormity of the outrage carries conviction that there has in fact been severe emotional distress, bodily harm is not required.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Illustrations:

19. A, a police officer, arrests B on a criminal charge. In order to extort a confession, A falsely tells B that her child has been injured in an accident and is dying in a hospital, and that she cannot be released to go to the hospital until she confesses. B suffers severe emotional distress but no physical consequences. A is subject to liability to B.

20. A organizes a mob, and brings it to B's door at night. A tells B that unless he leaves town within ten days the mob will return and lynch him. B suffers severe emotional distress, but no physical consequences. A is subject to liability to B.

l. Conduct directed at a third person. Where the extreme and outrageous conduct is directed at a third person, as where, for example, a husband is murdered in the presence of his wife, the actor may know that it is substantially certain, or at least highly probable, that it will cause severe emotional distress to the plaintiff. In such cases the rule of this Section applies. The cases thus far decided, however, have limited such liability to plaintiffs who were present at the time, as distinguished from those who discover later what has occurred. The limitation may be justified by the practical necessity of drawing the line somewhere, since the number of persons who may suffer emotional distress at the news of an assassination of the President is virtually unlimited, and the distress of a woman who is informed of her husband's murder ten years afterward may lack the guarantee of genuineness which her presence on the spot would afford. The Caveat is intended, however, to leave open the possibility of situations in which presence at the time may not be required.

Furthermore, the decided cases in which recovery has been allowed have been those in which the plaintiffs have been near relatives, or at least close associates, of the person attacked. The language of the cases is not, however, limited to such plaintiffs, and there appears to be no essential reason why a stranger who is asked for a match on the street should not recover when the man who asks for it is shot down before his eyes, at least where his emotional distress results in bodily harm.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Illustrations:

21. In the presence of A, a bystander, B quarrels violently with C, draws a pistol, and threatens to kill C. B knows that A is pregnant, and that it is highly probable that his conduct will cause severe emotional distress to A. A suffers severe emotional distress, which results in a miscarriage. B is subject to liability to A.

22. The same facts as in Illustration 21, except that A is concealed in an adjoining room, and B does not know of her presence. B is not liable to A.

Reporter's Notes

This Section was revised, and the Comments rewritten, in the 1948 Supplement to the Restatements. It has again been revised, and the Comments rewritten, to keep pace with the continued development of the law. As to this development, see Magruder, Mental and Emotional Disturbance in the Law of Torts, 49 Harv.L.Rev. 1033 (1936); Prosser, Intentional Infliction of Mental Suffering: A New Tort, 37 Mich.L.Rev. 874 (1939); Eldredge, Modern Tort Problems, 71-102 (1941); Smith, Relation of Emotions to Injury and Disease: Legal Liability for Psychic Stimuli, 30 Va.L.Rev. 194 (1944); Wade, Tort Liability for Abusive and Insulting Language, 4 Vand.L.Rev. 63 (1950); Prosser, Insult and Outrage, 44 Cal.L.Rev. 40 (1956).

Extreme and outrageous conduct: Illustration 1 is based on Wilkinson v. Downton, 2 Q.B.D. 57 [1897]. See also Bielitski v. Obadisk, 15 Sask.L.R. 155, 61 Dom.L.Rep. 494, 23 A.L.R. 351 (1921); Savage v. Boies, 77 Ariz. 355, 272 P.2d 349 (1954). Cf. Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. v. Roch, 160 Md. 189, 153 A. 22 (1931).

Illustration 2 is taken from State Rubbish Collectors Association v. Siliznoff, 38 Cal.2d 330, 240 P.2d 282 (1952).

Illustration 3: Compare Samms v. Eccles, 11 Utah 2d 289, 358 P.2d 344 (1961); Mitran v. Williamson, 21 Misc.2d 106, 197 N.Y.S.2d 689 (1960); Halio v. Lurie, 15 App.Div.2d 62, 222 N.Y.S.2d 759 (1961).

Illustration 4 is taken from Brooker v. Silverthorne, 111 S.C. 553, 99 S.E. 350, 5 A.L.R. 1283 (1919). Cf. Martin v. Lincoln Park West Corp., 219 F.2d 622 (7 Cir.1955); Ex parte Hammett, 259

Ala. 240, 66 So.2d 600 (1953); Halliday v. Cienkowski, 333 Pa. 123, 3 A.2d 372 (1939); Flowers v. Price, 190 S.C. 392, 3 S.E.2d 38 (1939); Atkinson v. Bibb Mfg. Co., 50 Ga.App. 434, 178 S.E. 537 (1935); Kramer v. Ricksmeier, 159 Iowa 48, 139 N.W. 1091, 45 L.R.A.N.S. 928 (1913); Galvin v. Starin, 132 App.Div. 577, 116 N.Y.Supp. 919 (1909); Stavnezer v. Sage-Allen & Co., 146 Conn. 460, 152 A.2d 312 (1959); Slocum v. Food Fair Stores of Florida, 100 So.2d 396 (Fla.1958).

Illustration 5 is taken from Janvier v. Sweeney [1919] 2 K.B. 316 (C.A.).

Illustration 6 is taken from Johnson v. Sampson, 167 Minn. 203, 208 N.W. 814, 46 A.L.R. 772 (1926).

Illustration 7 is taken from La Salle Extension University v. Fogarty, 126 Neb. 457, 253 N.W. 424, 91 A.L.R. 1491 (1934) and Barnett v. Collection Service Co., 214 Iowa 1303, 242 N.W. 25 (1932). See also Kirby v. Jules Chain Stores Corp., 210 N.C. 808, 188 S.E. 625 (1936); Clark v. Associated Retail Credit Men, 70 App.D.C. 183, 105 F.2d 62 (1939); Bowden v. Spiegel, Inc., 96 Cal.App.2d 793, 216 P.2d 571 (1950); Duty v. General Finance Co., 154 Tex. 16, 273 S.W.2d 64 (1954); Christensen v. Swedish Hospital, 59 Wash.2d 545, 368 P.2d 897 (1962); Moore v. Savage, 359 S.W.2d 95 (Tex.Civ.App.), affirmed per curiam, 362 S.W.2d 298 (Tex.1962); Quina v. Robert's, 16 So.2d 558 (La.App.1944); and cf. House v. Peth, 165 Ohio St. 35, 59 Ohio Ops. 60, 133 N.E.2d 340 (1956), privacy; Wiggins v. Moskins Credit Clothing Store, 137 F.Supp. 764 (E.D.S.C.1956), nuisance.

As to the similar bullying tactics of insurance adjusters, see Interstate Life & Accident Ins. Co. v. Brewer, 56 Ga.App. 599, 193 S.E. 458 (1937); National Life & Accident Insurance Co. v. Anderson, 187 Okl. 180, 102 P.2d 141 (1940); Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Tetirick, 185 Okl. 37, 89 P.2d 774, 5 N.C.C.A.N.S. 544 (1938); Continental Casualty Co. v. Garrett, 173 Miss. 676, 161 So. 753 (1935). Compare, as to forcing settlement of a claim, Curnutt v. Wolf, 244 Iowa 683, 57 N.W.2d 915 (1953).

For cases of a landlord's liability, see Wood v. Young, 20 Ky.L.Rep. 1931, 50 S.W. 541 (1899); Preiser v. Wielandt, 48 App.Div. 569, 62 N.Y.Supp. 890 (1900); Nordgren v. Lawrence, 74 Wash. 305, 133 P. 436 (1913); Duncan v. Donnell, 12 S.W.2d 811 (Tex.Civ.App.1929); Emden v. Vitz, 88 Cal.App.2d 313, 198 P.2d 696 (1948); Richardson v. Pridmore, 97 Cal.App.2d 124, 217 P.2d 113, 17 A.L.R.2d 929 (1950); Louisville & N.R. Co. v. Roberts, 207 Ky. 310, 269 S.W. 333 (1925); Stockwell v. Gee, 121 Okl. 207, 249 P. 389 (1926); Levine v. Tramwell, 41 S.W.2d 334 (Tex.Civ.App.1928), error refused.

Illustration 8 is based on Maze v. Employees' Loan Society, 217 Ala. 44, 114 So. 574 (1927). See also People's Finance & Thrift Co. v. Harwell, 183 Okl. 413, 82 P.2d 994, 4 N.C.C.A.N.S. 242 (1938).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Illustration 9 is taken from Nickerson v. Hodges (Raley v. Hodges), 146 La. 735, 84 So. 37, 9 A.L.R. 361 (1920). Compare, as to bullying a child, Delta Finance Co. v. Ganakas, 93 Ga.App. 297, 91 S.E.2d 383 (1956).

Illustration 11 is taken from Alabama Fuel & Iron Co. v. Baladoni, 15 Ala.App. 316, 73 So. 205 (1916). See also Richardson v. Pridmore, 97 Cal.App.2d 124, 217 P.2d 113, 17 A.L.R.2d 929 (1950); Vargas v. Ruggiero, 197 Cal.App.2d 709, 17 Cal.Rptr. 568 (1961). Compare Allen v. Camp, 14 Ala.App. 341, 70 So. 290 (1916), where there were no such circumstances of aggravation.

Illustration 12 is taken from Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Tetirick, 185 Okl. 37, 89 P.2d 774, 5 N.C.C.A.N.S. 544 (1939). See also Clark v. Associated Retail Credit Men, 70 App.D.C. 183, 105 F.2d 62 (1939); Interstate Life & Accident Co. v. Brewer, 56 Ga.App. 599, 193 S.E. 458 (1937); Patapsco Loan Co. v. Hobbs, 129 Md. 9, 98 A. 239 (1916); Continental Casualty Co. v. Garrett, 173 Miss. 676, 161 So. 753 (1935); National Life & Accident Ins. Co. v. Anderson, 187 Okl. 180, 102 P.2d 141 (1940).

Where the defendant is ignorant of the plaintiff's peculiar susceptibility, and the conduct is not otherwise extreme and outrageous, there is no liability. Braun v. Craven, 175 Ill. 401, 51 N.E. 657, 42 L.R.A. 199 (1898); Carrigan v. Henderson, 192 Okl. 254, 135 P.2d 330 (1943); Haas v. Metz, 78 Ill.App. 46 (1898); Kramer v. Ricksmeier, 159 Iowa 48, 139 N.W. 1091, 45 L.R.A.N.S. 928 (1913).

Illustration 14 is taken from Smith v. Gowdy, 196 Ky. 281, 244 S.W. 678, 29 A.L.R. 1353 (1922). See also Stratton v. Posse Normal School of Gymnastics, 265 Mass. 223, 163 N.E. 905 (1928); People's Finance & Thrift Co. v. Harwell, 183 Okl. 413, 82 P.2d 994, 4 N.C.C.A.N.S. 242 (1938); Bechtel v. Combs, 70 Pa.Super. 503 (1918).

Intention and recklessness: Illustrations 15 and 16 are based on Blakeley v. Shortal's Estate, 236 Iowa 787, 20 N.W.2d 28 (1945). Compare Bielitski v. Obadisk, 15 Sask.L.R. 155, 61 Dom.L.Rep. 494, 23 A.L.R. 351 (1921); Price v. Yellow Pine Paper Mill Co., 240 S.W. 588 (Tex.Civ.App.1922); Boyle v. Chandler, 33 Del. 323, 138 A. 273 (1927); Lindh v. Great Northern R. Co., 99 Minn. 408, 109 N.W. 823, 7 L.R.A.N.S. 1018 (1906); Mahnke v. Moore, 197 Md. 61, 77 A.2d 923, 29 N.C.C.A.N.S. 237 (1951); Anderson v. Knox, 297 F.2d 702 (9 Cir.1961), certiorari denied, 370 U.S. 915, 8 L.Ed.2d 498, 82 S.Ct. 1555.

Severe emotional distress: As to Illustration 17, compare Taft v. Taft, 40 Vt. 229, 94 Am.Dec. 389 (1867).

Illustration 18 is taken from Nelson v. Crawford, 122 Mich. 466, 81 N.W. 335, 80 Am.St.Rep. 577 (1899). Cf. Oehler v. L. Bamberger & Co., 103 N.J.L. 703, 137 A. 425 (1927), affirming by an equal division, 4 N.J.Misc. 1003, 135 A. 71 (1926); March v. Cacioppo, 37 Ill.App.2d 235, 185 N.E.2d 397 (1962).

Bodily harm: Illustration 19 is based upon Savage v. Boies, 77 Ariz. 355, 272 P.2d 349 (1954).

Illustration 20 is taken from Wilson v. Wilkins, 181 Ark. 137, 25 S.W.2d 428 (1930). Cf. Ruiz v. Bertolotti, 37 Misc.2d 1067, 236 N.Y.S.2d 854 (1962).

Other cases in which recovery has been allowed for emotional distress without physical consequences are Barnett v. Collection Service Co., 214 Iowa 1303, 242 N.W. 25 (1932); La Salle Extension University v. Fogarty, 126 Neb. 457, 253 N.W.2d 424, 91 A.L.R. 1491 (1934); Quina v. Roberts, 16 So.2d 558 (La.App.1944); State Rubbish Collectors Association v. Siliznoff, 38 Cal.2d 330, 240 P.2d 282 (1952); Curnett v. Wolf, 244 Iowa 683, 57 N.W.2d 915 (1953); Herman Saks & Sons v. Ivey, 26 Ala.App. 240, 157 So. 265 (1934); Delta Finance Co. v. Ganakas, 93 Ga.App. 297, 91 S.E.2d 383 (1956); Samms v. Eccles, 11 Utah 2d 289, 358 P.2d 344 (1961); Mitran v. Williamson, 21 Misc.2d 106, 197 N.Y.S.2d 689 (1960). Contra, Duty v. General Finance Co., 154 Tex. 16, 273 S.W.2d 64 (1954).

Conduct directed at a third person: Illustration 21 is taken from Rogers v. Williard, 144 Ark. 587, 223 S.W. 15, 11 A.L.R. 1115 (1920). See also Young v. Western & Atlantic Railroad, 39 Ga.App. 761, 148 S.E. 414 (1929); Lambert v. Brewster, 97 W.Va. 124, 125 S.E. 244 (1924); Hill v. Kimball, 76 Tex. 210, 13 S.W. 59, 7 L.R.A. 618 (1890); Duncan v. Donnell, 12 S.W.2d 811 (Tex.Civ.App.1928); Jeppsen v. Jensen, 47 Utah 536, 155 P. 429, L.R.A. 1916D 614 (1916); Purdy v. Woznesensky, 2 West. Week. Rep. (Sask.) 116 [1937]. A clear case of intent is Knierim v. Izzo, 22 Ill.2d 73, 174 N.E.2d 157 (1961).

Illustration 22 is taken from Reed v. Ford, 129 Ky. 471, 112 S.W. 600, 19 L.R.A.N.S. 225 (1908). See also Goddard v. Watters, 14 Ga.App. 722, 82 S.E. 304, 7 N.C.C.A. 1 (1914); Phillips v. Dickerson, 85 Ill. 11, 28 Am.Rep. 607 (1877); McGee v. Vanover, 148 Ky. 737, 147 S.W. 742, Ann.Cas. 1913E 500 (1912); Ellsworth v. Massacar, 215 Mich. 511, 184 N.W. 408 (1921); Hutchinson v. Stern, 115 App.Div. 791, 101 N.Y.Supp. 145, appeal dismissed, 189 N.Y. 577, 82 N.E. 1128 (1906); Koontz v. Keller, 52 Ohio App. 265, 6 Ohio Ops. 334, 21 Ohio L.Abs. 544, 3 N.E.2d 694 (1936); Taylor v. Vallelunga, 171 Cal.App.2d 107, 339 P.2d 910 (1959).

Case Citations - by Jurisdiction

—

U.S.
C.A.1,
C.A.1,
C.A.1
C.A.2,
C.A.2
C.A.3
C.A.4,

C.A.4
C.A.5,
C.A.5
C.A.6
C.A.6,
C.A.6
C.A.6,
C.A.6
C.A.6, Bkrtcy.App.
C.A.7,
C.A.7
C.A.8,
C.A.8
C.A.9
C.A.9, Bkrtcy.App.
C.A. 10,
C.A.10
C.A.11
C.A.11,
C.A.11
C.A.D.C.
Ct.Fed.Cl.
M.D.Ala.
N.D.Ala.
S.D.Ala.
D.Ariz.
E.D.Ark.
W.D.Ark.
C.D.Cal.
E.D.Cal.
E.D.Cal.Bkrtcy.Ct.
N.D.Cal.
S.D.Cal.
D.Colo.
D.Colo.Bkrtcy.Ct.
D.Conn.
D.Del.
D.D.C.
M.D.Fla.
N.D.Fla.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

S.D.Fla.
M.D.Ga.
N.D.Ga.
S.D.Ga.
D.Hawaii
D.Hawaii,
D.Hawaii
D.Idaho
D.Idaho Bkrtcy.Ct.
C.D.Ill.
N.D.Ill.
S.D.Ill.
N.D.Ind.
S.D.Ind.
N.D.Iowa,
N.D.Iowa
S.D.Iowa
S.D.Iowa
D.Kan.
E.D.Ky.
W.D.Ky.
E.D.La.
M.D.La.
W.D.La.
D.Me.
D.Md.
D.Mass.
E.D.Mich.
W.D.Mich.
W.D.Mich.Bkrtcy.Ct.
D.Minn.
N.D.Miss.
S.D.Miss.
E.D.Mo.
W.D.Mo.
D.Mont.
D.Neb.
D.Nev.
D.N.H.
D.N.J.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

D.N.M.
D.N.M.Bkrtcy.Ct.
E.D.N.Y.
E.D.N.Y.Bkrtcy.Ct.
N.D.N.Y.
S.D.N.Y.
S.D.N.Y.Bkrtcy.Ct.
W.D.N.Y.
W.D.N.Y.Bkrtcy.Ct.
E.D.N.C.
M.D.N.C.
W.D.N.C.
D.N.D.
N.D.Ohio,
N.D.Ohio
N.D.Ohio.
N.D.Ohio
N.D.Ohio,
N.D.Ohio
N.D.Ohio.Bkrtcy.Ct.
N.D.Ohio Bkrtcy.Ct.
S.D.Ohio,
S.D.Ohio
S.D.Ohio,
S.D.Ohio
N.D.Okl.
W.D.Okl.
D.Or.
E.D.Pa.
E.D.Pa.Bkrtcy.Ct.
M.D.Pa.
M.D.Pa.Bkrtcy.Ct.
W.D.Pa.
D.P.R.
D.R.I.
D.R.I.Bkrtcy.Ct.
D.S.C.
D.S.D.
E.D.Tenn.
E.D.Tenn.Bkrtcy.Ct.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

M.D.Tenn.
W.D.Tenn.
E.D.Tex.
N.D.Tex.
S.D.Tex.
W.D.Tex.
D.Utah
D.Vt.
E.D.Va.
E.D.Va.Bkrtcy.Ct.
W.D.Va.
D.V.I.
E.D.Wash.
W.D.Wash.
N.D.W.Va.
S.D.W.Va.
W.D.Wis.
D.Wyo.
Ala.
Ala.App.
Ala.Civ.App.
Alaska
Ariz.
Ariz.App.
Ark.
Ark.App.
Cal.
Cal.App.
Colo.
Colo.App.
Conn.
Conn.App.
Conn.Super.
Del.
Del.Super.
D.C.App.
Fla.
Fla.App.
Ga.
Ga.App.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Hawaii
Hawaii App.
Idaho,
Idaho
Idaho App.
Ill.
Ill.App.
Ind.
Ind.App.
Iowa,
Iowa
Iowa App.
Kan.
Kan.App.
Ky.
Ky.App.
La.
La.App.
Me.
Md.
Md.Spec.App.
Mass.
Mass.App.
Mich.
Mich.App.
Minn.
Minn.App.
Miss.
Miss.App.
Mo.
Mo.App.
Mont.
Neb.
Neb.App.
Nev.
N.H.
N.J.
N.J.Super.App.Div.
N.J.Super.
N.M.

N.M.App.
N.Y.
N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.
N.Y.Sup.Ct.
N.Y.Ct.Cl.
N.Y.Dist.Ct.
N.Y.City Civ.Ct.
N.C.
N.C.App.
N.D.
Ohio
Ohio App.
OhioApp.
Ohio App.
Ohio Com.Pl.
Ohio Ct.Cl.
Okl.
Okl.App.
Or.
Or.App.
Pa.
Pa.Super.
Pa.Cmwlth.
R.I.
S.C.
S.C.App.
S.D.
Tenn.
Tenn.App.
Tex.
Tex.App.
Utah,
Utah
Utah App.
Utah.App.
Vt.
Va.
Va.App.
Wash.
Wash.App.

W.Va.
W.Va.App.
Wis.
Wis.App.
Wyo.

U.S.

U.S.2011. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in diss. op., illus. 1 cit. in diss. op. Father of marine killed in Iraq in the line of duty sued members of church who picketed near decedent's funeral with signs declaring their church's view that God hated the United States for its tolerance of homosexuality, particularly in its military, and that decedent had died in shame as a curse from God. The district court entered judgment on a multimillion-dollar jury verdict for plaintiff on his claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress, intrusion upon seclusion, and civil conspiracy. The court of appeals reversed. This court affirmed, holding, as to the IIED claim, that defendants' speech was entitled to "special protection" under the First Amendment, and that protection could not be overcome by a finding that the picketing was outrageous. The dissent argued that when grave injury was intentionally inflicted by means of a malevolent and vicious verbal attack such as the one at issue in this case, the First Amendment should not be a bar to recovery. Snyder v. Phelps, 562 U.S. 443, 464, 465, 131 S.Ct. 1207, 1223, 179 L.Ed.2d 172.

U.S.2002. Subsec. (2)(a) quot. in ftn. Widow of a murdered Guatemalan citizen sued the former Secretary of State and other government officials, alleging that defendants intentionally concealed that her husband was being detained and tortured in Guatemala by Guatemalan military officers who were paid by the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) and that this deception denied her access to a lawsuit that might have saved husband's life. District court dismissed plaintiff's claims, and court of appeals reversed in part. The Supreme Court reversed and remanded, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state a claim for denial of judicial access. The court noted that it was unclear whether plaintiff's allegations met either the "intent" or the "presence" requirements of the emotional-distress cause of action where CIA defendants did not intend husband's situation to become known to the public, but sought to conceal it. Christopher v. Harbury, 536 U.S. 403, 419, 122 S.Ct. 2179, 2189, 153 L.Ed.2d 413, on remand 44 Fed.Appx. 522 (Fed.Cir.2002).

U.S.1987. Cit. in ftn., subsec. (1) cit. in ftn., coms. (d) and (k) cit. in ftn. A railroad employee sued a railroad under the Federal Employer's Liability Act (FELA) for emotional distress caused by his fellow employees. The federal district court granted summary judgment for the railroad and the court of appeals reversed. Vacating and remanding in part, this court held that the Railway Labor Act did not deprive the railroad employee of his right to bring a FELA action for damages. The court recognized the doctrinal divergence in the area of recovering for intentional infliction of emotional distress, such as the different degrees of intent required to establish liability and the abandonment in most jurisdictions of the "impact rule," and concluded that the record had insufficient facts for this Court or the court of appeals to decide whether the employee's emotional injury claim would permit recovery under the FELA. Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Ry. Co. v.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Buell, 480 U.S. 557, 568-571, 107 S.Ct. 1410, 1416-1418, 94 L.Ed.2d 563, on remand 818 F.2d 868 (9th Cir.1987).

C.A.1,

C.A.1, 2023. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Pregnant resident of an apartment that was the subject of a search warrant filed claims for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against police officers who executed the warrant, alleging that defendants caused her to go into labor prematurely and to suffer from post-traumatic stress disorder by entering unannounced and pointing their firearms at plaintiff during the search. The district court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding that plaintiff's IIED claim failed as a matter of law. The court explained that defendants' entry into plaintiff's home, even if conducted without knocking and with weapons raised, could not be classified as going beyond all possible bounds of decency, as required to sustain a claim for IIED under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d. Penate v. Sullivan, 73 F.4th 10, 23.

C.A.1,

C.A.1, 2022. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup.; coms. (e) and (f) quot. in sup. Male student sued university for intentional infliction of emotional distress and other claims in connection with its handling of a sexual-assault complaint filed against him by a female classmate. The district court granted summary judgment for university. This court reversed in part and remanded, holding that there were questions of fact as to whether university's actions were extreme and outrageous, as required to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court pointed out that university's dean and vice president knew that student had been hospitalized for a recent suicide attempt but insisted on meeting with him hours after he was discharged to discuss new, facially dubious, and seemingly trivial allegations that the classmate had raised against him. Doe v. Brown University, 43 F.4th 195, 210, 211.

C.A.1

C.A.1, 2010. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. As part of a § 1983 action filed by several residents against town and various police officers employed by town, two minor plaintiffs brought, inter alia, pendent state-law claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against police officer and police chief. The district court entered judgment on jury verdicts for plaintiffs on their IIED claims. This court vacated the judgments as to those claims and directed entry of judgment for defendants, holding that the minors' fear of going to court, fear of the police, nightmares, and loss of sleep, after one minor's arrest and after the filing of an application for a complaint against the other minor, did not constitute severe emotional distress for purposes of this claim under Massachusetts law, i.e., the kind of distress that no reasonable man could be expected to endure. Kennedy v. Town of Billerica, 617 F.3d 520, 530, 531.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.1, 2009. Com. (i) cit. in sup. Former prisoners and estates of two deceased prisoners sued the United States under the Federal Tort Claims Act after their state-court murder convictions were vacated based on the discovery that the FBI had suppressed reliable intelligence undercutting a witness's account of the murder. After a bench trial, the district court found for plaintiffs. Affirming as to plaintiffs' claim for intention infliction of emotional distress, this court held, inter alia, that, while a finding of extreme and outrageous conduct under Massachusetts law could be grounded either on actual knowledge or on a defendant's deliberate disregard of a substantial probability that his actions would produce severe emotional distress, the district court's finding that the FBI had actual knowledge that plaintiffs were not involved in the murder was, in any event, unassailable. Limone v. U.S., 579 F.3d 79, 95.

C.A.1, 2008. Cit. in sup., cit. in case cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. Former employee who was terminated for violating company rules sued former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, alleging that defendant had wrongfully accused him of using company facilities to ship drugs, subjected him to a security interview, and had conducted an inadequate investigation of the charges against him. After the jury returned a verdict awarding plaintiff damages, the district court ordered a remittitur of the IIED award. This court vacated the jury verdict on the IIED claim, holding that the claim failed because defendant's actions upon which plaintiff based his IIED claim were insufficient to support a finding of extreme and outrageous conduct. Soto-Lebron v. Federal Express Corp., 538 F.3d 45, 57, 58.

C.A.1, 2005. Cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in sup., com. (g) quot. in case quot. in sup. Woman whose 23-year adulterous relationship broke up sued former male lover for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Trial court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to establish a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress; merely breaking up an extramarital affair did not constitute outrageous conduct as required for such claim. Norton v. McOsker, 407 F.3d 501, 509-511.

C.A.1, 2002. Cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. Former archery counselor at a summer camp sued camp director for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that defendant falsely stated to an assistant counselor that he had received a complaint regarding plaintiff through state of New Hampshire concerning inappropriate contact with boys, as well as two complaints from camp parents. District court dismissed plaintiff's complaint. This court affirmed in part, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff did not state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress; while defendant's statement could be considered offensive, it was not so outrageous or extreme as to go beyond all bounds of decency. Moss v. Camp Pemigewassett, Inc., 312 F.3d 503, 510-511.

C.A.1, 2002. Quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Objecting to his portrayal in a book that focused on toxic-tort litigation over contaminated well water, a tannery owner and his wife sued the author and his publisher for, inter alia, defamation and intentional infliction of emotional distress. District court granted defendants partial summary judgment, holding that New Hampshire law did not recognize emotional-distress claim where the factual predicate sounded in defamation. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that the book's statements that plaintiff did not give truthful testimony during the litigation and that plaintiff experienced episodes of depression were not extreme and outrageous. Riley v. Harr, 292 F.3d 282, 299.

C.A.1, 1997. Com. (g) quot. in sup. A truck driver sued his employer after he was fired for refusing to participate in a drug-testing procedure, alleging negligence, negligent infliction of emotional distress, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff, but the federal district court granted defendant's motion for judgment as a matter of law. This court affirmed, holding that the resolution of each of plaintiff's state law claims required an examination of the terms of the parties' collective-bargaining agreement, and, as a result, the claims were preempted under § 301 of the Labor Management Relations Act. If defendant was within its rights to require plaintiff to take a drug test at the designated site and to terminate him when he refused to do so, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress could not lie. Resolution of this issue necessitated examination of the collective-bargaining agreement. Flibotte v. Pennsylvania Truck Lines, Inc., 131 F.3d 21, 27, certiorari denied 523 U.S. 1123, 118 S.Ct. 1806, 140 L.Ed.2d 945 (1998).

C.A.1, 1996. Adopted in case cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. City worker who refused to continue a work assignment on a boat at a city pond due to his fear of capsizing and who was subsequently terminated sued the city for negligent or intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Affirming in part the district court's grant of directed verdicts for defendant, this court held, in part, that, despite the fact that plaintiff was discharged only several days prior to the expiration of his probationary period, the evidence presented was insufficient to warrant a finding that defendant's actions in terminating plaintiff rose to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to support plaintiff's claim. Marques v. Fitzgerald, 99 F.3d 1, 7.

C.A.1, 1995. Cit. in headnote, cit. and quot. in sup. Cashier at an Army Post Exchange Store was questioned for violating the store's policy prohibiting employees from transporting merchandise through the front door and was later terminated; she brought an action under the Federal Tort Claims Act for intentional infliction of emotional distress. On remand, the district court granted defendant's motion to dismiss. Affirming, this court held that plaintiff, who alleged that she was questioned for 45 minutes, was shown a videotape supposedly taken at the store where she worked, was told that if she did not cooperate "all of this could be taken to the F.B.I.," and signed a statement after the interview, failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, since there was no allegation that the questioning was abusive, extreme, or outrageously intimidating and the questioning was a necessary incident of employment. Therefore, the action was barred by the exclusivity provision of Puerto Rico's workers' compensation act. Santiago-Ramirez v. Secretary of Defense, 62 F.3d 445, 446, 448.

C.A.1, 1993. Cit. in disc., com. (d) cit. in ftn. Oil tanker engineer whose employment was terminated when employer adopted a new policy barring employees who had ever participated in an alcohol rehabilitation program from holding certain designated jobs sued employer in contract and in tort. The district court entered judgment for plaintiff on his breach of contract claim but refused to submit plaintiff's punitive damages claim to the jury, inter alia. Affirming in part, this court stated that even if maritime law permitted a limited role for punitive damages in a contract setting when the breaching party acted with the state of mind that accompanied an intentional tort and even if the court accepted plaintiff's argument that the standard for punitive damages under maritime tort law was less demanding than the standard for intentional infliction of emotional distress, the court nevertheless declined to hold that punitive damages could be awarded for breach of contract under the circumstances of this case in which the jury specifically rejected plaintiff's accompanying intentional tort claims. Ellenwood v. Exxon Shipping Co., 984 F.2d 1270, 1283, 1284, cert. denied ___ U.S. ___, 113 S.Ct. 2987, 125 L.Ed.2d 682 (1993).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.1, 1993. Com. (h) cit. in ftn. Former police officer who was placed under surveillance by insurer in connection with his receipt of disability benefits under an insurance policy sued insurer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Affirming the district court's entry of a directed judgment as a matter of law for defendant, this court held that since defendant's behavior amounted to not much more than an insurance company's efforts to determine the activities of a claimant whose receipt of benefits was conditioned on his total disability and since investigations of this sort were commonplace and to be expected where disability claims were involved, defendant's surveillance of plaintiff was not extreme or outrageous or utterly intolerable in a civilized society and thus did not violate the tort standard for plaintiff's claim. Thorpe v. Mutual of Omaha Ins. Co., 984 F.2d 541, 545.

C.A.1, 1991. Cit. in disc. com. (d) cit. in sup. An insured misrepresented material facts regarding his medical history and employment when he applied for a health insurance policy. After learning that the insured had misrepresented his employment, the insurer switched the insured's policy with a downgraded policy, and delayed benefit payments to induce the insured to sign a new contract agreeing to the switch. The insured sued the insurer, claiming intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. The district court entered judgment for plaintiff, awarding compensatory and punitive damages. Defendant argued that its conduct, although intentional, was not sufficiently extreme or outrageous, and that plaintiff's emotional distress was not accompanied by significant physical ills that a rational juror could have found satisfied the elements of the tort. Affirming, this court held that defendant's conduct was sufficiently extreme and outrageous, and that two migraine headaches suffered by the insured demonstrated physical injury sufficient to prevent a directed verdict. Borden v. Paul Revere Life Ins. Co., 935 F.2d 370, 380, 381.

C.A.1, 1991. Cit. in ftn., quot. in case cit. in sup., coms. (h) and (j) quot. in disc. and cit. in case cit. in disc. A worker who claimed to have been exposed to excessive radiation in his job as foreman for an independent contractor at a nuclear power plant sued the power plant in state court for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. The case was removed to federal district court, which granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that there was no evidence of willful and wanton misconduct by the defendant, the defendant's delay in determining the problem with the plaintiff's contradictory dosimeter readings was not extreme and outrageous behavior, and there was no causal link between the defendant's conduct and the plaintiff's depression. Caputo v. Boston Edison Co., 924 F.2d 11, 13-15.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.1, 1991. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. The plaintiff was mistakenly identified and arrested as an escaped felon, suffering minor physical injuries during the arrest. He was released after a 30-minute detention when the police officers discovered their mistake. Two years later, he sued the arresting police officers and the city for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. The district court entered summary judgment for the defendants. Affirming, this court held that, since the officers' conduct in effecting the intended arrest was objectively reasonable in the circumstances, the claim must fail. Dean v. City of Worcester, 924 F.2d 364, 369.

C.A.1, 1989. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (i) cit. in case quot. in disc. After hitchhikers falsely accused a driver who picked them up of armed robbery, the driver was arrested in a neighboring town by the police, who verbally and physically abused him and returned him to the city where the incident occurred. The driver sued, among others, the city police lieutenant who charged him, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. At the close of the evidence, the district court directed a verdict for the defendant on this claim. Affirming, this court held that the plaintiff's testimony that the defendant failed to advise him of the charges against him, failed to give him the Miranda warnings, refused the plaintiff's request for hospital care, and ordered him to remove all his clothing did not provide evidence of the extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to sustain the plaintiff's claim. Kinan v. City of Brockton, 876 F.2d 1029, 1036, 1037.

C.A.1, 1989. Quot. and cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (g) and illus. 14 cit. in ftn., illus. 13 quot. in ftn. An overweight nursing student who was harassed about her weight and was pressured by school administrators to sign a contract to attend Weight Watchers and lose two pounds a week voluntarily left the school and sued it for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. The district court entered a directed verdict for the defendant on that claim. Affirming, this court held that the defendant's conduct was unprofessional but was not so far removed from the bounds of civilization as to meet the necessary standards of extreme and outrageous behavior necessary for the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Russell v. Salve Regina College, 890 F.2d 484, 487, 488, judgment reversed 499 U.S. 225, 111 S.Ct. 1217, 113 L.Ed.2d 190, on remand 938 F.2d 315 (1st Cir.1991).

C.A.1, 1988. Cit. in sup., coms. cit. in sup., coms. (d) and (h) quot. in sup. A newspaper story included a picture of four elementary school girls who protested the principal's decision to segregate the sexes during recess periods. When a sexually explicit magazine republished the photograph and referred to them as “amazons,” the girls and their parents sued it for false light portrayal and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court dismissed the complaint. Affirming, this court stated that defamation and false light claims had much in common and that the threshold determination of whether the story implied that the girls had consented to the publication was for the court. It was also for the court to determine whether the defendant's conduct might be regarded as so extreme and outrageous as to permit recovery. The court reasoned that even if the publication had caused severe emotional distress, there was no liability because the defendant's conduct could not be regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Fudge v. Penthouse Intern., Ltd., 840 F.2d 1012, 1021, cert. denied 488 U.S. 821, 109 S.Ct. 65, 102 L.Ed.2d 42 (1988).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.1, 1987. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. An employee sued his former employer for intentional infliction of mental distress after he was fired from his job. The trial court found for the employee. Reversing, this court held that the employer's conduct was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support a claim for intentional infliction of mental distress where a report the employer sent to the Division of Employment Security, stating that the employee had been fired for willful misconduct, delayed but did not prevent an award of unemployment benefits to the plaintiff. Brown v. Freedman Baking Co., Inc., 810 F.2d 6, 10.

C.A.1, 1987. Com. (d) cit. in disc. An arrestee sued the arresting officers and a private individual, asserting various civil rights and pendent tort claims, including intentional infliction of emotional distress as a result of his unlawful commitment to a mental institution. The trial court entered judgment for the plaintiff and awarded compensatory and exemplary damages. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that the arrestee could recover damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress, reasoning that the defendants had every reason to know that wrenching psychic harm was a likely result of arresting and imprisoning an innocent man on the eve of his daughter's wedding, and committing him, though sane, to a mental institution; the defendants' conduct was clearly outrageous and it was the direct cause of the plaintiff's acute emotional distress. Wagenmann v. Adams, 829 F.2d 196, 214.

C.A.1, 1978. Cit. in disc. A former pantryman on a vessel brought an action in negligence against the vessel owner. The jury awarded the pantryman a $300,000 judgment on his claim. The district court entered judgment n.o.v. in favor of the vessel owner, and the pantryman appealed. The appellate court vacated the judgment and remanded the case to the district court for reconsideration of defendant's motion for a new trial. The court held that evidence of negligence of the captain who directed his anger at the pantryman, threatened and insulted him, and threw a spoon at him, which incident allegedly resulted in the pantryman's mental breakdown, was for the jury, and the case should not have been taken from it. In ruling on the motion for a judgment n.o.v., the court could not substitute its views for those of the jury. The court stated that a defendant is liable not only for the emotional consequences flowing from the injury itself, but also for those flowing from the conduct that causes the injury, and that the relevant conduct in this case included not only the throwing of the spoon, but also the captain's manner and manifestations at the time he threw it. The expert testimony of plaintiff's examining physician could be understood as stating a causal connection between plaintiff's mental collapse and the fear and shock resulting from having an angry captain throw a spoon at him. Viewing the evidence in plaintiff's favor, the court found sufficient evidence of some connection between the relevant conduct and the purported psychosis to support the verdict. The court held further that under the circumstances of this case, it could not say that either granting or denying a new trial on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the weight of the evidence would be an abuse of discretion, and that the district court should have a further opportunity to pass on the matter. Borras v. Sea-Land Service, Inc., 586 F.2d 881, 885.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.2,

C.A.2, 2019. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup., adopted in case cit. in sup.; com. (f) cit. and quot. in sup., cit. in cases cit. in ftn.; com. (j) quot. in disc., cit. in cases cit. in ftn.; coms. (g) and (h) quot. in sup. Parents brought, among other things, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against news network and journalists, alleging that defendants engaged in a deliberate and malicious campaign of harassment during their journalistic investigation into the murder of plaintiffs' son. The district court granted defendants' motion to dismiss. This court vacated and remanded, holding that plaintiffs stated a claim for IIED. The court explained that defendants knowingly published a false article about the son's death, exploited plaintiffs' trust by falsely representing to them that their investigator was independent and using the investigator to fabricate false information, and knew plaintiffs' emotional vulnerability to such conduct, which constituted extreme and outrageous behavior sufficient for an IIED claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court noted that, under § 46, Comment g, defendants' conduct was not privileged, because they did not insist on their legal rights in a permissible way. Rich v. Fox News Network, LLC, 939 F.3d 112, 122-126.

C.A.2

C.A.2, 2014. Subsec. (1) adopted in case cit. in ftn., com. (d) quot. in sup. and in ftn. Employee brought an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, against employer, among others, alleging that he suffered from a hostile and abusive work environment where he was subjected to racial insults, intimidation, and degradation over a period of more than three years. The district court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiff. The court of appeals affirmed as to liability for IIED. Affirming that part of the judgment, this court held that the jury did not err in finding defendant vicariously liable for IIED committed by plaintiff's supervisor. The court remarked that, unlike other intentional torts—such as those of battery and false imprisonment as described in Restatement Second of Torts §§ 18 and 35—IIED did not proscribe specific conduct, but instead imposed liability based on after-the-fact judgments about the actor's behavior. Here, supervisor was liable for IIED as set out in Restatement Second of Torts § 46, because his behavior—which included being a personal witness to the torment to which plaintiff was subjected, blocking others' efforts to investigate serious threats, and, at times, seeming to encourage further harassment—was extreme and outrageous conduct that so transcended the bounds of decency as to be regarded as atrocious and intolerable in a civilized society. Turley v. ISG Lackawanna, Inc., 774 F.3d 140, 157, 158.

C.A.2, 2011. Cit. and quot. in disc., subsec. (1) quot. in disc. Former employee of railroad brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) under the Federal Employers' Liability Act (FELA) against railroad and two co-employees, alleging that, while employed by railroad, he suffered severe emotional distress after defendant co-employee posted plaintiff's sick-leave form on a bulletin board at railroad's facility disclosing that plaintiff was HIV positive. The district court dismissed plaintiff's complaint. Affirming, this court held that, while the common law no longer imposed a zone-of-danger test on IIED claims, that test still applied to such claims brought under FELA; thus, in this case, plaintiff's claim failed because he did not assert that he sustained a physical impact as a result of defendants' alleged conduct or was placed in immediate risk of physical harm by that conduct, as required by the zone-of-danger test. Goodrich v. Long Island Rail Road Co., 654 F.3d 190, 196, 198.

C.A.2, 2003. Subsec. (1) cit. in disc. After enduring physical and verbal harassment from her supervisor, railroad employee sued employer for liability under Federal Employers' Liability Act, negligent failure to provide safe workplace, negligent supervision, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. District court granted railroad summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that the four alleged incidents of work-related yelling and cursing that could be imputed to railroad under doctrine of respondeat superior were insufficient to make out a case for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because the incidents did not involve extreme and outrageous conduct. Higgins v. Metro-North R. Co., 318 F.3d 422, 426.

C.A.2, 1999. Com. (b) cit. in conc. and diss. op. Wife of former Ghanaian trade representative to the United States brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against Ghana, after defendant summoned plaintiff's husband home, where he allegedly was detained and tortured. The district court dismissed for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (FSIA), and this court affirmed in part. The concurring and dissenting opinion argued that plaintiff's emotional-distress claim could not be characterized as a claim for misrepresentation or any other noncommercial tort with respect to which a foreign state could still claim immunity under the FSIA. Cabiri v. Government of Republic of Ghana, 165 F.3d 193, 203, cert. denied 527 U.S. 1022, 119 S.Ct. 2368, 144 L.Ed.2d 772 (1999).

C.A.2, 1999. Cit. in headnote, com. (d) quot. and cit. in disc., com. (h) cit. in disc. Postal worker whose disability benefits were terminated sued local branch of the Office of Workers' Compensation Programs for violations of the Federal Tort Claims Act, alleging, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court dismissed the complaint. Affirming, this court held, in part, that the conduct complained of, which included ignoring dispositive medical evidence and pressuring plaintiff to return to work, did not rise to the level of outrageousness necessary to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Stuto v. Fleishman, 164 F.3d 820, 822, 827.

C.A.2, 1996. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Arrestee brought § 1983 and pendent state-law claims for false arrest, malicious prosecution, battery, and intentional infliction of emotional distress against city and police officers. The district court entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding plaintiff $300,700. Reversing and remanding unless plaintiff accepted remittitur of $150,000, this court held, inter alia, that police officer's actions, as determined by the jury, in striking plaintiff in the mouth and wrongfully initiating an assault charge based on the false claim that plaintiff bit officer could be regarded as sufficiently outrageous to satisfy the conduct element of the emotional-distress tort; the aggregate award, however, was excessive and was highly likely to have been artificially inflated by duplication of awards among causes of action and among defendants. Bender v. City of New York, 78 F.3d 787, 791.

C.A.2, 1996. Cit. in disc. Pipe fitter who was exposed to asbestos while working in steam tunnels for railroad sued railroad for negligent infliction of emotional distress under the Federal Employers' Liability Act. Vacating the district court's grant of defendant's motion for judgment as a matter of law and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's testimony about his anger and fear of dying satisfied his burden of introducing evidence of his particular fears with some specificity, including, as a threshold matter, evidence of his particular fear of developing cancerous conditions. The court said that emotional distress must be severe only when a plaintiff had not suffered a physical impact, in which case the severity of the emotional distress served to guarantee the genuineness of the claim; here, however, a reasonable jury could find that plaintiff had suffered a physical impact with asbestos and thus was entitled to damages flowing from the impact, including his reasonable emotional distress. Buckley v. Metro-North Commuter R.R., 79 F.3d 1337, 1346, reversed 521 U.S. 424, 117 S.Ct. 2113, 138 L.Ed.2d 560 (1997).

C.A.2, 1988. Subsec. (1) cit. in disc. A sergeant with the police department's absence control unit allegedly was transferred as a result of a conspiracy by the police union, the department, and other officers to blame him for the suicide of a police officer. The sergeant sued the union and the union president, alleging federal civil rights violations and state tort law claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding the plaintiff substantial damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress and prima facie tort. Affirming in part and reversing in part, this court held that the jury charge as to intentional infliction of emotional distress, requiring extreme and outrageous conduct, conformed in all respects to New York's strict requirements for that tort and that reasonable jurors could have determined that the plaintiff prevailed on each required element to establish the commission of the tort. Hughes v. Patrolmen's Benev. Ass'n of City of N.Y., 850 F.2d 876, 883, cert. denied 488 U.S. 967, 109 S.Ct. 495, 102 L.Ed.2d 532 (1988).

C.A.2, 1986. Cit. in sup. A retired laborer was denied a pension when his union misinformed him that he was not eligible. In a suit against the union, the jury awarded the laborer lost pension benefits and a large verdict for emotional distress because of the union's fraudulent concealment of his pension rights. However, the trial court set aside the award for emotional distress. Affirming in part, vacating, and remanding in part, this court upheld the award of pension benefits on the ground that, regardless of its relationship to the plaintiff, the defendant had a duty to properly inform the plaintiff about his rights. The court also upheld the setting aside of the large emotional distress award, but it stated that the plaintiff should have received a new trial on that issue based on the principle of allowing only compensatory damages for extreme and outrageous conduct. Baskin v. Hawley, 807 F.2d 1120, 1133.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.2, 1986. Cit. in sup. An attorney, who was a landlord, sued a tenant's father on a prima facie tort theory after a heated phone conversation between the parties regarding the plaintiff's refusal to return a security deposit. The trial court dismissed the action on the grounds that it was frivolous and brought in bad faith to harass the defendant. Affirming, this court stated that the facts revealed a total absence of intent or purpose to do harm to the plaintiff or evidence that making the telephone call to the plaintiff was without any purpose of legitimate communication or with an intent to cause injury. The court reasoned that trivial intrusions were an inevitable product of modern existence and only when the conduct complained of was malicious or so outrageous in character as to exceed the bounds of decency would the law recognize it as an actionable tort. Fox v. Boucher, 794 F.2d 34, 38.

C.A.2, 1985. Subsec. (1) cit. in disc. A bank employee sued her employer for employment discrimination, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and constructive discharge as a result of an incident in which the employee underwent a polygraph test as part of an investigation of an in-bank theft. The trial court dismissed the constructive discharge claim but awarded damages on the discrimination and emotional distress claims. This court affirmed the denial of the constructive discharge claim but reversed the rest of the judgment, holding that there was no discrimination because the evidence presented at trial plainly established that there was good cause for investigating the employee. The court held that there was no intentional infliction of emotional distress since the employer's conduct was not "outrageous in character" or "extreme in degree." The court also noted that the conduct must be intentionally directed at the plaintiff and lack any reasonable justification. Martin v. Citibank, N.A., 762 F.2d 212, 220.

C.A.2, 1983. Cit. but not fol. and subsec. (1) quot. but not fol. Parents sued under a New York wrongful death statute to recover pecuniary loss, property damage, and compensation for emotional distress suffered due to the murder of their daughter. Although the parents did not witness the attack by the defendant, they found their daughter barely alive the next day. The trial court granted damages based on the theory of reckless infliction of emotional distress. On appeal, the court discussed the Restatement formulation allowing recovery for emotional distress inflicted recklessly as well as intentionally, but found no authority for this formulation in the state's highest court. Even if New York adopted the Restatement formulation, plaintiff's recovery would be limited to pecuniary loss prescribed by the relevant wrongful death statute. Reversed, remanded with instructions to dismiss the action to recover for emotional distress. Garland v. Herrin, 724 F.2d 16, 18.

C.A.3

C.A.3, 2010. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in ftn. Student brought a § 1983 suit against public university and others, alleging that university's student code of conduct violated the First Amendment. After a bench trial, the district court entered judgment in favor of defendants. Reversing in part, this court held, among other things, that a provision in the code prohibiting conduct that caused emotional distress was an unconstitutional infringement on students' First Amendment right to free speech. The court reasoned that "emotional distress" was driven by the subjective experience of the individual, and that the extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to assert a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress did not bear any clear relationship to free speech; not all extreme and outrageous conduct involving speech was necessarily unprotected by the First Amendment. McCauley v. University of the Virgin Islands, 618 F.3d 232, 251.

C.A.3, 2005. Com. (d) quot. in disc. School nurse filed civil-rights action against school officials, claiming that they violated her rights by harassing her and giving her an unsatisfactory rating in retaliation for her advocacy on behalf of disabled students and her reports to state authorities regarding school's failure to follow various state requirements. The district court granted defendants' motions for summary judgment. This court affirmed in part, holding, inter alia, that, although plaintiff's work environment was unpleasant and stressful, defendants' actions toward her were not outrageous enough to satisfy Pennsylvania's definition of intentional infliction of emotional distress, particularly since plaintiff was never given degrading work and she consistently received pay raises. McGreevy v. Stroup, 413 F.3d 359, 371.

C.A.3, 2004. Quot. in sup., coms. (i) and (j) quot. in case cit. in sup. After being severely injured and psychologically traumatized from an accident at a jobsite, lineman collected workers' compensation, and sued employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress. District court entered judgment for lineman. Reversing with instructions, this court held, inter alia, that lineman failed to prove that, as a result of employer's intentional, extreme, and outrageous conduct, he suffered from emotional distress, excluded by the Workers' Compensation Act, that was so severe that no reasonable man could be expected to endure it. Eddy v. Virgin Islands Water and Power Authority, 369 F.3d 227, 231-232, 235.

C.A.3, 2001. Cit. in case cit. in disc., cit. in case cit. but dist., subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in sup., subsec. (2) quot. in ftn., com. (i) quot. in ftn. in sup. Dog owner brought suit for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress against police officer who shot her pet dog. The district court granted defendant summary judgment. Reversing in part and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's allegations that defendant, without any justification whatsoever, shot her dog five times in front of her, deliberately ignoring the fact that she was screaming in protest and pleading with him not to shoot, were sufficient to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court said that a reasonable trier of fact could conclude that defendant acted intentionally to cause plaintiff severe emotional distress. Brown v. Muhlenberg Tp., 269 F.3d 205, 217-219, rehearing and rehearing en banc denied 273 F.3d 390 (3d Cir.2001).

C.A.3, 2000. Quot. in case quot. in disc., cit. in ftn. Employee with multiple sclerosis sued former employer for violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court entered summary judgment for defendant. Affirming, this court held, in part, that plaintiff had failed to establish that any of the challenged conduct was motivated by a discriminatory or retaliatory intent, and that allegations that plaintiff's co-workers had behaved in an extreme and outrageous manner by acting to worsen his condition were not supported by the evidence. Shaner v. Synthes, 204 F.3d 494, 507, 508.

C.A.3, 1998. Cit. in disc., cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. Administrator of estate of individual who died as a result of inhaling fumes from a butane canister brought strict liability failure-to-warn action against distributor of butane can found next to decedent's body. Plaintiff also asserted a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Defendant filed third-party complaint against manufacturer of butane, and defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held that material factual issues existed as to the adequacy of the warnings printed on the butane can; that plaintiff was entitled to raise the rebuttable presumption that decedent would have heeded adequate warnings of the dangers of inhaling butane; and that a jury could determine whether the heeding presumption was rebutted by the fact that decedent's mother had warned him that butane was dangerous; however, defendants' conduct was not so extreme and outrageous as to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Pavlik v. Lane Limited/Tobacco Exporters Intern., 135 F.3d 876, 890.

C.A.3, 1996. Cit. in disc. HIV-positive employee who claimed he was discharged because of his medical condition sued former employer for, inter alia, violations of the Americans With Disabilities Act, invasion of privacy, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court granted employer's motion for summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that employee was judicially estopped from asserting that he was qualified to perform his essential job functions where he had already secured state and Social Security benefits based on his representation that he was permanently and completely disabled; employer's inquiry as to employee's HIV status did not constitute an intrusion upon his seclusion; employer did not publicize that employee was HIV-positive when it told one person of that fact; and the discharge was not so outrageous as to be considered utterly intolerable in a civilized society. McNemar v. Disney Store, Inc., 91 F.3d 610, 623, cert. denied 519 U.S. 1115, 117 S.Ct. 958, 136 L.Ed.2d 845 (1997).

C.A.3, 1996. Cit. in case cit. in sup. and cit. generally in headnote, coms. (d) and (f) quot. in sup. An insurance salesperson sued her former employer and former supervisor for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that the supervisor instructed his sales managers to verbally attack plaintiff so as to intimidate plaintiff and force her to resign. New Jersey federal district court granted defendants summary judgment. This court reversed and remanded, holding that defendants' conduct was sufficiently outrageous, because the supervisor essentially set out to put plaintiff under unnecessary stress to force her out of the company, all the while knowing that her physician had stated specifically that her condition required her to avoid such stress. Subbe-Hirt v. Baccigalupi, 94 F.3d 111, 112, 114, 115.

C.A.3, 1995. Cit. in headnote and disc., quot. in ftn., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Former employees sued employer in Pennsylvania state court for breach of contract, fraud, RICO violations, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. After removal to federal court, employees moved to withdraw the RICO claims and remand to state court. District court granted employees' motion. This court denied employer's petition for a writ of mandamus to direct the federal district court judge to rescind his order. The court held that the contract, fraud, and emotional-distress claims asserted substantive rights independent of the collective-bargaining agreement. Employees' allegations that they suffered severe mental distress did not implicate any analysis of terms or rights created by the collective-bargaining agreement, since the state law analysis would only focus on employer's conduct while inducing employees to enter into a guarantee agreement and on the employees' response. Trans Penn Wax Corp. v. McCandless, 50 F.3d 217, 219, 232.

C.A.3, 1994. Cit. in case quot. in disc. Former employee brought a § 1983 claim against former employer for violation of his civil rights, arising from his discharge for suspected drug use. On remand, the district court entered judgment awarding plaintiff emotional-distress damages. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that expert medical evidence was not required to prove emotional distress in § 1983 cases. The court rejected defendant's argument that a § 1983 case in which damages for emotional distress were claimed must be analogized to a common-law action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, which, under Pennsylvania law, required expert medical confirmation that plaintiff actually suffered the claimed distress, noting that this case more closely resembled a defamation case. Bolden v. SEPTA, 21 F.3d 29, 35.

C.A.3, 1993. Cit. in ftn., com. (j) cit. in disc. Railroad employee whose friend and co-worker died of a heart attack brought on by extreme heat and humidity while they repaired a stretch of track sued the railroad under the Federal Employers' Liability Act for negligent infliction of emotional distress. Reversing the district court's granting of summary judgment for defendant and remanding, this court held that the totality of the circumstances, including plaintiff's 40-pound weight loss and institutionalization for medical care, provided sufficient indicia of the genuineness of plaintiff's emotional injury to survive threshold requirements for a trial on the merits and plaintiff presented genuine issues of material fact as to whether there was a breach of duty, injury, and causation. Gottshall v. Consolidated Rail Corp., 988 F.2d 355, 363, 370, cert. granted ___ U.S. ___, 114 S.Ct. 299, 126 L.Ed.2d 247 (1993), judgment reversed ___ U.S. ___, 114 S.Ct. 2396, 129 L.Ed.2d 427 (1994).

C.A.3, 1990. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) cit. in disc. Four railroad employees sued their employer, alleging that its policies and practices in eliminating manpower and increasing their responsibilities required them to work in an environment that was unreasonably stressful, as a result of which they suffered various illnesses, injuries, and disabilities. The district court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment on the grounds that the plaintiffs did not make a case for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because the conduct alleged did not meet the test of outrageous behavior, and that their claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress failed to meet the requirements of such a claim. This court granted the defendant's motion to dismiss the plaintiffs' appeal because it was untimely filed. The court said that it was not an appropriate case for it to exercise its authorization to accept an untimely appeal under the unique-circumstances doctrine. Kraus v. Consolidated Rail Corp., 899 F.2d 1360, 1361.

C.A.3, 1990. Cit. in disc. and in ftn., com. (d) and illus. 2 quot. in ftn. The principal of a construction company sued a subcontractor for intentional interference with existing and prospective contractual relations and intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, arguing that the defendant filed, without probable cause, a petition for involuntary bankruptcy against the plaintiff's construction company because of a dispute between the parties over payments allegedly due to the defendant, as a result of which the plaintiff suffered financial injuries. The district court dismissed the complaint and entered judgment for the defendant. Reversing and remanding in part, this court held that the plaintiff stated a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, even though it was speculative whether Pennsylvania law recognized the tort. The court said that the extortionate threats made by the defendant constituted outrageous behavior. Silver v. Mendel, 894 F.2d 598, 606, certiorari denied 496 U.S. 926, 110 S.Ct. 2620, 110 L.Ed.2d 641 (1990).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.3, 1989. Cit. in case quot. in disc., subsec. (1) quot. in disc. and cit. generally in disc. A female university student brought, inter alia, a civil rights action against a university and one of its professors, alleging sexual harassment by the professor. Her complaint also asserted a state claim against the professor for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court granted the university and professor summary judgment on the ground that the plaintiff's right to be free of unwanted sexual advances did not rise to the level of a constitutional right or federal substantive due process right. The circuit court affirmed on different grounds, holding that the student had no cause of action, because neither defendant committed any actionable wrong within the two-year statute of limitations period preceding the filing of the complaint. The emotional distress claim was dismissed on the same procedural ground. The court also noted that the professor's alleged acts of staring at the plaintiff in a menacing manner on two occasions at a public restaurant were not so outrageous as to constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress. Bougher v. University of Pittsburgh, 882 F.2d 74, 80.

C.A.3, 1989. Cit. in disc., cit. in case quot. in disc., quot. in ftn., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. and cit. in case cit. in disc. A police lieutenant sued a township, police chief, and township supervisor for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that the police chief and township supervisor took numerous steps to harass the plaintiff and make his job difficult. The district court entered judgment on a jury verdict for the plaintiff. Reversing and remanding, this court held that the defendants' conduct of forwarding charges against the plaintiff to the district attorney, showing disparaging reports about the plaintiff in public, and changing his duties and depriving him of privileges did not constitute the extreme and outrageous conduct necessary for the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Clark v. Township of Falls, 890 F.2d 611, 622, 623.

C.A.3, 1989. Quot. in ftn., cit. in case quot. in disc., cit. in disc., cit. in case cit. in disc., cit. in case quot. in ftn., cit. in case cit. in ftn. A former tenant sued his former landlord and its employee, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, stemming from his eviction from an apartment complex. The jury awarded the tenant $25,000 on his emotional distress claim. This court affirmed the district court's entry of judgment on the jury's verdict, concluding that absent a clear statement from the Pennsylvania Supreme Court, it would continue to predict that Pennsylvania would impose liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress. It also opined that Pennsylvania would limit the scope of liability by requiring competent medical evidence of causation and severity. The court held that the landlord's conduct was sufficiently outrageous to present the case to the jury, in that he had the door removed from the tenant's apartment, told a police officer that the tenant was a trespasser, publicly announced that the tenant was a pimp, and threw his belongings into the street. The plaintiff also put forward medical testimony that these events contributed to a severe set of depressive symptoms. Williams v. Guzzardi, 875 F.2d 46, 50, 51.

C.A.3, 1988. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in ftn. in sup., com. (h) cit. in case cit. in sup. and quot. in ftn. Upon returning to work after triple bypass surgery, an employee was dismissed, allegedly because the employer wished to avoid medical benefit payments. He sued the employer for interference with the attainment of employee benefits and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court directed a verdict for the employer on the emotional distress claim and entered judgment on a verdict for the plaintiff on the interference with the attainment of employee benefits claim and ruled that the employee was not entitled to a jury trial. This court affirmed the emotional distress ruling, holding that the conduct was insufficiently outrageous, but remanded the interference with the attainment of employment benefits ruling, holding that a jury trial may be available under the Employee Retirement Income Security Act. The court said that an improper motive for dismissal, without more, could not provide a basis of recovery for emotional distress. Cox v. Keystone Carbon Co., 861 F.2d 390, 395, appeal after remand 894 F.2d 647 (3d Cir.1990), cert. denied 498 U.S. 811, 111 S.Ct. 47, 112 L.Ed.2d 23 (1990).

C.A.3, 1988. Subsec. (1) quot. in disc., com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. A county detective sued the county prosecutor for violation of his First Amendment rights, wrongful retaliation, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that various disciplinary actions were taken against him because he criticized the prosecutor's reorganization plan for the department. The district court granted the prosecutor's motion for summary judgment on the ground that the detective's expressions were not on a matter of public concern and hence were outside the ambit of First Amendment protection. This court reversed as to the First Amendment and wrongful retaliation claims but affirmed as to the intentional infliction of emotional distress claim, holding that the detective had not alleged behavior that rose to the level of outrageousness necessary for the tort. Zamboni v. Stamler, 847 F.2d 73, 80, cert. denied 488 U.S. 899, 109 S.Ct. 245, 102 L.Ed.2d 233 (1988).

C.A.3, 1987. Cit. in case quot. in ftn., quot. in part in disc.; subsec. (2)(a) quot. but dist.; com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc., cit. in ftn.; com. (e) cit. in disc.; com. (l) cit. but dist. Relatives of deceased workers sued an asbestos manufacturer for damages, alleging that the manufacturer had exposed the relatives to asbestos dust through the workers' clothing or tools, and that they suffered severe emotional distress as a result of their fears of contracting asbestos-related diseases. The district court granted judgment for the manufacturer. This court affirmed, stating that the manufacturer's conduct was not sufficiently outrageous or reckless to sustain a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress in the absence of evidence that the manufacturer knew that its products posed a danger to those indirectly exposed through contact with a worker who handled asbestos products. In addition, plaintiffs could not recover for emotional harm from observing the worker's illnesses and deaths where the injuries were gradual and nontraumatic. Wisniewski v. Johns-Manville Corp., 812 F.2d 81, 85-89.

C.A.3, 1986. Cit. but not fol., com. (d) quot. in case cit. in disc. The estate of a deceased former employee sued the employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress arising out of the employer's firing and potential rehiring of the employee. The trial court held that the plaintiff failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming, this court held that the state law which governed the claim placed substantial restrictions on the cause of action beyond just extreme and outrageous conduct that was intentional and/or reckless which caused severe distress. The court stated that the conduct must be beyond the bounds of decency to recover for intentional infliction of emotional distress in the state. Bradshaw v. General Motors Corp., Fisher Body Div., 805 F.2d 110, 114.

C.A.3, 1986. Quot. and cit. but dist., coms. (d), (j), and (k) quot. and cit. in sup. A car buyer in the Virgin Islands sued the seller for intentional infliction of emotional distress for failing to be reasonable in honoring the terms of a warranty and for failing to treat her in a professional manner. The territorial court dismissed the claim, and the district court affirmed the dismissal on the ground that the plaintiff had failed to state a cause of action. Affirming, this court reasoned that the alleged facts, showing an absence of bodily harm, were insufficient to meet the standard of extreme and outrageous conduct required to state a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Heywood v. Cruzan Motors, Inc., 792 F.2d 367, 371, 372.

C.A.3, 1985. Cit. in disc., quot. in ftn., cit. in diss. op., com. (d) quot. in part in diss. op. The wives and children of a number of men who had died from exposure to asbestos sued the manufacturers and vendors of the asbestos on theories that included products liability and negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Applying Pennsylvania law, the district court dismissed the claims for emotional distress for failure to state a claim on which relief could be granted. This court affirmed as to the claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress, but ruled that the appellants had stated a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress based upon their fear they would suffer future illness because of exposure in their homes to asbestos occasioned by the conditions of their decedents' employment. A dissent argued that Pennsylvania courts would allow recovery under such a claim only when the plaintiff's injuries resulted directly and immediately from conduct directed at those plaintiffs. Wisniewski v. Johns-Manville Corp., 759 F.2d 271, 275, 276, 278, 279, on remand 1986 WL 3858 (E.D.Pa.1986).

C.A.3, 1982. Cit. in disc. and com. (k) cit. in disc. The plaintiff brought suit against his employer, seeking damages on a variety of tort and contract theories because his employer terminated his employment and failed to offer him permanent employment. The district court dismissed the plaintiff's complaint. On appeal, the plaintiff contended that the district court erred in holding that the plaintiff's intentional infliction of emotional distress claim was time-barred. The plaintiff argued that he was entitled to the benefit of the state's discovery rule because his physical symptoms did not fully manifest themselves until over two years after his alleged injury. This court stated that bodily harm was not an essential element of the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Therefore, the plaintiff's cause of action was complete before he experienced any physical symptoms. This court further found that since the plaintiff was aware of all the operative facts of his injury prior to the filing of his complaint, the plaintiff could not use the discovery rule to toll the statute of limitations. The judgment was affirmed. Bruffett v. Warner Communications, Inc., 692 F.2d 910, 914.

C.A.3, 1982. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. In a suit by insureds against a fire insurer, the plaintiffs appealed from the final judgment of the district court. On appeal the plaintiffs contended, inter alia, that the trial court erred in refusing to submit to the jury their claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. In response, this court stated that New Jersey recognized an independent cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Recovery was conditioned on a showing that the conduct causing the emotional distress was so extreme and outrageous as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency and be regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Since the jury found no breach of the insurer's duty of good faith, the plaintiffs could hardly have prevailed on a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress under the standard above. Thus the court held that error, if any, in the district court's refusal to submit the plaintiffs' separate tort claim to the jury was harmless. The verdict in favor of the insurer precluded an award of damages for emotional distress. Judgment was affirmed as to this issue, but the court reversed and remanded for a new trial on the plaintiffs' breach of contract claim and counsel fees. Polito v. Continental Cas. Co., 689 F.2d 457, 464.

C.A.3, 1980. Cit. in sup. and coms. (h) and (j) cit. in sup. Plaintiff brought an action against an innkeeper for false arrest and intentional infliction of emotional harm after being subjected to citizen's arrest for refusing to leave the hotel for violating its dress code. A jury awarded plaintiff compensatory and punitive damages, and defendant appealed. The court reversed on the emotional harm issue, holding that the District Court erred in not determining whether plaintiff had established that defendant's conduct could be reasonably regarded as so extreme and outrageous as to permit recovery before submitting the case to the jury, and it found that defendant's conduct was not extreme or outrageous, and that plaintiff's embarrassment and humiliation did not constitute severe emotional distress. Moolenaar v. Atlas Motor Inns, Inc., 616 F.2d 87, 89.

C.A.3, 1979. Quot. and fol., illus. (1) quot. in ftn. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup., com. (j) cit. in sup., coms. (h) and (i) quot. Plaintiff former professional football player sued former employer to recover salary, allegedly due, and damages for defamation and intentional infliction of emotional distress, allegedly resulting from statements made to the press by the team doctor. In the trial court, the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff on the breach of contract and intentional infliction of emotional distress claims, and against plaintiff on the defamation claim. After judgment was entered, both parties appealed denials of their motions for a judgment notwithstanding the verdict. This court affirmed and held, in regard to the breach of contract claim, that the evidence warranted a finding that the parties had intended to compensate the plaintiff for a three-year period, not a one-year period as contended by defendant. In regard to the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, the court held that a jury could reasonably have concluded that defendant's statements were extreme and outrageous, and that they had been made with the requisite intent; it was viewed as irrelevant as to whether defendant was aware of the consequences of his words. In addition, the court held that punitive damages can be awarded for the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress, and that under Pennsylvania law the team could be held vicariously liable for its physician's statements. In regard to the claim for defamation, this court held that the remarks in question were not defamatory, as a matter of law, and that the issue should not have gone to the jury. In doing so, the court rejected the contentions of plaintiff that the remarks imputed a loathsome disease or affected his business, trade, profession, or office. Accordingly, the judgment of the district court was affirmed. The dissent objected to the finding of the court that the evidence did not support the defamation count as a matter of law. It was suggested by the dissent that the allegedly defamatory remarks could be construed as affecting plaintiff's business, trade, profession, or office and, therefore, could have formed the basis for his claim. Thus, the dissent concluded that this error necessitated a new trial limited to the defamation claim. Chuy v. Philadelphia Eagles Football Club, 595 F.2d 1265, 1273-1275, 1277.

C.A.4,

C.A.4, 2016. Cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former university graduate student brought claims for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress against university and others in connection with allegations that defendants caused false and misleading statements to be included in her permanent academic record, and denied or conspired to deny her academic credit. The district court granted defendants' motions to dismiss. Affirming, this court held that defendants' conduct did not rise to the exacting standard for intentional infliction of emotional distress imposed by West Virginia law. The court noted that West Virginia courts followed Restatement Second of Torts § 46, which provided that, in order for the "outrageous" standard to be met, the conduct had to be so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Kerr v. Marshall University Board of Governors, 824 F.3d 62, 78.

C.A.4

C.A.4, 2004. Com. (i) cit. in case quot. in disc. Female security guard sued employer for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, after supervisor permitted plaintiff's boyfriend, against whom plaintiff had obtained a restraining order, access to her, and the boyfriend kidnapped plaintiff at gunpoint and raped her. The district court granted summary judgment for defendant on the emotional-distress claim. Reversing in part and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that summary judgment was precluded on the portion of the claim growing out of supervisor's intentional assignment of plaintiff to an unsecured post. The court said that a jury could infer that supervisor, despite her awareness of boyfriend's abuse of plaintiff, believed it all-important that plaintiff and her boyfriend talk, and so deliberately determined to inflict on plaintiff any emotional distress she might suffer from talking to him. Gantt v. Security, USA, 356 F.3d 547, 552, cert. denied ___ U.S. ___, 125 S.Ct. 51, 160 L.Ed.2d 20 (2004).

C.A.4, 1999. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. and cit. in headnote, coms. (e) and (f) quot. in sup. and cit. in headnote. A middle school student and her mother sued the student's former teacher, the school principal, and the school board for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that student was excluded from participating in show choir because of her depression. District court granted defendants' motion to dismiss. This court reversed in part, holding, inter alia, that the district court improperly dismissed plaintiffs' emotional-distress claim, because plaintiffs' assertion that the teacher intentionally attempted to humiliate a child knowing that she was suffering from clinical depression was sufficient to allege outrageous conduct. Baird v. Rose, 192 F.3d 462, 472.

C.A.4, 1998. Cit. in headnote, cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. Airline passenger who was denied permission to board a connecting flight from Cincinnati to Minneapolis because airline personnel in Roanoke, his point of origin, failed to ask for photo identification sued airline for breach of contract, false imprisonment, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that the contract claim was preempted by the Airline Deregulation Act; that, to the extent the tort claims were based on defendant's refusal to allow plaintiff to board, they too were preempted; and that, to the extent the tort actions were based on other conduct, they failed to state a claim. Smith v. Comair, Inc., 134 F.3d 254, 255, 260.

C.A.4, 1994. Cit. in headnotes, cit. in sup. Employee who was dismissed for allegedly stealing some painting equipment sued former employer in state court for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. On removal to federal district court, the district court entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding plaintiff damages. Reversing in part, this court held, inter alia, that although defendant's human resources manager's verbal abuse of plaintiff during a 40-minute meeting during which plaintiff became very upset was despicable, it did not rise to the level of being atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized community; thus, plaintiff failed to establish the element of outrageous conduct necessary for a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Barber v. Whirlpool Corp., 34 F.3d 1268, 1269, 1277.

C.A.4, 1994. Coms. (d), (i), and (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Motorist arrested for failing to appear in court as required by a parking ticket sued the issuing county and its maintenance man, who had filed an affidavit to obtain the arrest warrant, alleging civil rights violations and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding plaintiff damages. Reversing, this court held, inter alia, that, under South Carolina law, plaintiff could not recover emotional-distress damages, even though her brief detention caused her some distress and even if a jury could have found that the maintenance man's submission of an allegedly false affidavit caused that distress, as there was no evidence that the maintenance man intentionally or recklessly inflicted any harm, the conduct was not extreme and outrageous, and the distress suffered was not so severe that no reasonable man could be expected to endure it. Wilkes v. Young, 28 F.3d 1362, 1366, certiorari denied 513 U.S. 1151, 115 S.Ct. 1103, 130 L.Ed.2d 1069 (1995).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.4, 1991. Com. (g) quot. generally in disc. An employee who had sued his former employer in a Virginia state court for intentional infliction of emotional distress, negligent infliction of emotional distress, conversion, and negligence in the care of a bailment moved to remand the action to state court following the employer's successful motion to remove the action to federal court. The district court denied the motion to remand and granted summary judgment in favor of the employer, holding that the employee's state law claims were preempted by § 301 of the Labor Management Relations Act (LMRA). Affirming, this court held that because resolution of the state law claims would require interpretation of the collective bargaining agreement, the state law claims were preempted. The court stated that if the collective bargaining agreement authorized the employer to clean out the terminated employee's locker and throw away the employee's personal belongings, those actions could not simultaneously be considered outrageous and intolerable, and therefore punishable as intentional infliction of emotional distress, under Virginia law. McCormick v. AT & T Technologies, Inc., 934 F.2d 531, 537, certiorari denied 502 U.S. 1048, 112 S.Ct. 912, 116 L.Ed.2d 813 (1992).

C.A.4, 1989. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. An employee sued her employer for wrongful discharge and intentional infliction of emotional distress after she was terminated after being denied disability benefits and then refusing to work. After the employee injured her finger while installing a telephone for the employer, she was awarded temporary total disability benefits, but she was denied permanent disability benefits based on her work-related psychiatric and physical disabilities. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants, holding that the plaintiff's state law claims were preempted and that her federal claims were barred for failure to file a timely action. Affirming, this court held that a federal court has discretion to dismiss state claims on the merits before resolving the preemption inquiry if the underlying state claims are patently without merit. The court denied relief for emotional distress since the plaintiff's allegations did not rise to the requisite level of "outrageous" conduct. It reasoned that the defendant merely exercised its legal rights in a permissible way in contesting the plaintiff's workers' compensation claims, insisting that the plaintiff be examined by a psychiatrist of the defendant's choosing, and ordering her to return to work. Childers v. Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co., 881 F.2d 1259, 1266.

C.A.4, 1989. Com. (d) quot. in sup. An employee sued her employer and her supervisor, in part, for sexual harassment, constructive discharge, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, asserting that the supervisor made unwelcome sexual advances toward her both on and off the job. The district court granted the defendants summary judgment. Reversing in part while affirming the grant of summary judgment on the intentional infliction of emotional distress claim, this court held, inter alia, that summary judgment on that claim was proper, not because the plaintiff could not pursue simultaneous claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress and assault and battery, as the district court reasoned, but because the harassment the plaintiff alleged did not rise to the level of outrageousness required by state law to support such a claim. Paroline v. Unisys Corp., 879 F.2d 100, 112, opinion vacated in part on rehearing 900 F.2d 27 (4th Cir.1990).

C.A.4, 1987. Com. (d) cit. in sup. A country and western singer singled out and made allegedly racially disparaging comments about a black security guard during one of her concerts. The security guard sued the singer for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming the trial court's grant of the defendant's motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, this court held that the singer's behavior did not meet the stringent requirement of outrageousness, central to the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court concluded that the singer's conduct fell among those intended or unintended hurts that persons in our still "rough-edged" society must simply abide without judicial remedy. Gaiters v. Lynn, 831 F.2d 51, 53, 54.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.4, 1976. Com. (b) quot. in part. in disc. (erron. cit. as com. (a)), cit. in sup. Plaintiffs, customers of defendant carrier, brought an action for breach of duty of nondiscrimination imposed by the Interstate Commerce Act. Defendant delivered plaintiffs' furniture after the date designated in the contract, apparently giving preference to other shippers. Plaintiffs appealed from the district court's order striking all allegations from their complaint supporting recovery of punitive damages and damages for mental distress. The court, in reversing, held that a private right of action existed for violation of the nondiscrimination provision of the Interstate Commerce Act. The court relied in part on aeronautics cases. The court held that plaintiffs' allegations that defendant acted recklessly in callous disregard of plaintiffs' rights was sufficient to allow plaintiffs to introduce further evidence and, if proven, to entitle them to punitive damages. Plaintiffs and defendant occupy a special relationship, that of shipper and common carrier, which creates a strong duty to safeguard plaintiffs' interests. Although the court noted that delay in shipment is generally not such grossly outrageous conduct as to be offensive to a person of normal sensibilities, the court ruled that plaintiffs may introduce proof on the issue of mental distress. Hubbard v. Allied Van Lines, Inc., 540 F.2d 1224, 1229, 1230.

C.A.5,

C.A.5, 2018. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former high-school nurse brought claims for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against school district and others, alleging that she was shunned, subjected to unfounded reprimands, involuntarily transferred to another school, and threatened after she expressed concerns regarding the school's handling of the health needs of a diabetic student who had committed suicide because of her classmates' bullying. The district court granted summary judgment for defendants. Affirming, this court held that plaintiff failed to state an IIED claim, because she failed to show that any of defendants' conduct was extreme and outrageous, or more than a reasonable person could be expected to endure, as required to state such a claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Rayborn v. Bossier Parish School Board, 881 F.3d 409, 420.

C.A.5

C.A.5, 2002. Com. (j) quot. in sup. Employee sued former employer and former supervisors for Title VII violations and intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, arising from defendants' sexual advances and their racial and sexist comments. District court granted defendants summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that employee's emotional-distress claim failed, because although defendants' conduct involved persistent verbal and physical sexual harassment and employee suffered emotional distress and lost her job due to the harassment, evidence did not show that distress was unendurable. While employee testified that she felt angry, embarrassed, disgusted, humiliated, horrified, and repulsed by defendants' actions and that she suffered from depression, headaches, and loss of appetite, employee's emotional distress did not satisfy requisite severity prong. Smith v. Amedisys Inc., 298 F.3d 434, 450.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.5, 2001. Quot. in sup., cit. in ftn. Insurer sought declaratory judgment that the liability policies it sold to insured company afforded no coverage or defense for 21 Mississippi lawsuits alleging that insured's male employee had surreptitiously videotaped female customers in dressing room at insured's photography studio. District court granted insurer summary judgment. This court reversed and remanded, concluding that insurer was obligated to defend and indemnify insured in underlying state suits. The court determined, inter alia, that Mississippi Supreme Court would decide that employee committed the torts of invasion of privacy and extreme and outrageous conduct upon plaintiffs in underlying suits. American Guarantee and Liability Ins. Co. v. 1906 Co., 273 F.3d 605, 614, 615.

C.A.5, 2001. Com. (f) quot. in case quot. in disc. Employee sued former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress that caused her to leave her employment. District court vacated arbitration award for employee, holding that employer's decision to immediately continue employee's time-sensitive evaluation on her return from medical leave due to stroke-like symptoms was not extreme and outrageous conduct. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that, although employer's conduct was insensitive to employee's peculiar physical susceptibility to stress, its instructions that employee resume the evaluation were not extreme and outrageous conduct. Hughes Training Inc. v. Cook, 254 F.3d 588, 595, cert. denied 534 U.S. 1172, 122 S.Ct. 1196, 152 L.Ed.2d 135 (2002).

C.A.5, 2001. Com. (d) cit. in case cit. in sup. African-American store customer sued store, store's insurer, and security guard for unlawful search and seizure, discrimination, false arrest, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. Suspecting plaintiff of shoplifting based on eyewitness report, security guard had followed plaintiff through the store and to the parking lot, copied down her car's license plate number, handcuffed her, and transported her to the police station. District court granted defendants summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's emotional-distress claim failed, because defendants' conduct did not rise to the requisite level of extreme and outrageous conduct. Morris v. Dillard Dept. Stores, Inc., 277 F.3d 743, 757.

C.A.5, 2001. Cit. in disc., com. (f) cit. in case cit. in disc. Doctor fired from university medical school's residency program sued the school, the director of school's residency program, and psychiatrist who examined her, alleging state and federal claims including intentional infliction of emotional distress. District court denied director's motion for summary judgment. This court reversed in part, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff did not prove emotional distress, because director's alleged statements to plaintiff about plaintiff's childhood sexual abuse were not extreme and outrageous, as plaintiff was not exposed to those remarks over a protracted period of time or physically threatened. Furthermore, director's effort to obtain information about plaintiff's mental illness and to seclude plaintiff, while ill-motivated, was not actionable infliction of emotional distress. Shaboon v. Duncan, 252 F.3d 722, 734.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.5, 2000. Com. (d) cit. in case cit. in disc. Two African-American former employees sued employer and its vice president and office manager for, in part, racial discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming in part the district court's grant of summary judgment for defendants, this court held, inter alia, that defendants' racial harassment of plaintiffs in the form of racist remarks did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Texas law. Walker v. Thompson, 214 F.3d 615, 628.

C.A.5, 1999. Cit. in case cit. in disc. A Louisiana cigarette smoker and his wife sued several tobacco manufacturers' trade associations for misrepresentation and fraud, among other claims. Louisiana federal district court dismissed plaintiffs' claims. This court reversed and remanded, holding, inter alia, that plaintiffs made an adequate prima facie case for intentional and nonintentional torts. Each defendant intentionally and negligently communicated to the plaintiffs and other Louisiana residents false representations of material facts as to the addictive and cancer-causing effects of their tobacco products. Guidry v. United States Tobacco Company, Inc., 188 F.3d 619, 627.

C.A.5, 1999. Com. (d) cit. generally in headnote and quot. in case quot. in disc. Former employee sued employer, the employer's parent company, and a coemployee for intentional infliction of emotional distress and Title VII violations arising from sexual harassment by the coemployee. District court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiff. This court vacated in part, reversed in part, and remanded, holding, inter alia, that there was sufficient evidence to support the jury verdict against the coemployee on plaintiff's emotional-distress claim, because the coemployee's behavior went well beyond unwanted sexual advances in the workplace where he subjected plaintiff to sexually suggestive touching, made constant sexual remarks, and asked plaintiff to leave her husband for him. Skidmore v. Precision Printing and Packaging, Incorporated, 188 F.3d 606, 613.

C.A.5, 1997. Com. (d) quot. in sup. and cit. generally in headnote. An employee who suffered from temporomandibular joint disease and underwent jaw surgery was fired. The employee sued her employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress and violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act. Plaintiff alleged that her supervisor became angry when she requested time off for additional surgery, that he told her he would no longer tolerate her health problems, that he pressured her to return to work, and that he excluded her from business meetings and transferred assignments away from her. The district court granted defendant summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's emotional-distress claim failed because she did not prove that defendant acted in a manner that was extreme or outrageous. Even if the supervisor was in fact generally cruel and unfair and threatened to fire plaintiff, this did not pass muster as the type of utterly indecent, intolerable, and atrocious behavior necessary to prevail on a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. McConathy v. Dr. Pepper/Seven Up Corp., 131 F.3d 558, 560, 564.

C.A.5, 1997. Cit. in headnotes, cit. in case cit. in disc. An African-American engineer sued her former employer, alleging workplace discrimination based on her sex, race, and national origin, as well as several state law claims, including intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiff had supervised an employee who resented being supervised by an African-American woman and who physically threatened her after being reassigned to a different engineering project. District court granted defendant summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to raise a fact question as to whether defendant's conduct was extreme and outrageous. The employee's harassment of plaintiff was not ratified, in light of defendant's decisive actions to remove the employee from plaintiff's work site and to prevent him from harassing her. Ward v. Bechtel Corp., 102 F.3d 199, 201, 203.

C.A.5, 1996. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. University student who claimed at a meeting attended by several professors and students that she had been sexually assaulted by another student at a party brought, in part, a state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against one of the professors who, after the meeting, allegedly engaged in a course of conduct intended to intimidate her. Reversing the district court's denial of defendant's motion for summary judgment and rendering, this court held, inter alia, that defendant's alleged acts of following plaintiff in the hallways, obstructing her passage from a water fountain, showing up in a class and positioning himself where plaintiff usually sat so that she could not avoid encountering him, and repeatedly going in and out of a room where she was taking a make-up exam did not rise to the level of outrageous conduct necessary for a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress, and thus defendant was entitled to state official immunity from plaintiff's claim. Cantu v. Rocha, 77 F.3d 795, 810.

C.A.5, 1996. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Fifty-one-year-old salesman who was fired after 22 years on the job sued his former employer for violations of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act (ADEA) and for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court granted employer's motion for judgment as a matter of law on the emotional-distress claim but entered judgment on a jury verdict for salesman on his ADEA claim. Affirming, this court held that the evidence was sufficient to support a finding that salesman's age was the reason for his dismissal, but that a supervisor's failure to remove language from salesman's personnel files indicating that salesman had been placed on probation was not so outrageous as to give rise to an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Haun v. Ideal Industries, Inc., 81 F.3d 541, 548.

C.A.5, 1996. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. An Amtrak ticket and baggage clerk sued Amtrak, alleging a violation of Title VII and a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. After plaintiff and her co-workers had received a series of obscene and threatening anonymous phone calls and notes, defendant had called upon four law enforcement agencies to investigate. District court granted defendant summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that defendant's response to her complaints was not extreme and outrageous conduct, as the evidence demonstrated that defendant took plaintiff's complaints seriously and conducted a prompt and thorough investigation. Hirras v. National R.R. Passenger Corp., 95 F.3d 396, 400.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.5, 1996. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Discharged employees sued former employer and supervisor, asserting claims for age discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming the district court's grant of summary judgment for defendants, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiffs failed to show that defendants' actions in terminating plaintiffs' employment rose to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct or caused plaintiffs severe emotional distress, as required to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Texas law, where plaintiffs alleged only that one plaintiff's discharge interview occurred in an office so that he and a manager could speak privately, after which defendant supervisor did nothing to cause plaintiff emotional distress, and that defendant supervisor had a smile or smirk on his face when he met with the other plaintiff to discuss plaintiff's work record following his discharge and failed to call plaintiff after promising to do so. Stults v. Conoco, Inc., 76 F.3d 651, 658.

C.A.5, 1995. Subsec. (1) cit. in case cit. in ftn. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup., quot. in case cit. in ftns. in sup. Texas employee brought state court action for intentional infliction of emotional distress against his Virginia-based corporate employer and two of his Texas supervisors. Plaintiff was reclassified as a staff employee after serving as a manager and, although his responsibilities decreased, his salary remained the same. Defendants successfully removed the case to federal court, but plaintiff moved to remand it, arguing that complete diversity was absent. The district court retained jurisdiction, explaining that supervisors were fraudulently joined, then dismissed the claim against them. Affirming, this court held that supervisors' conduct was not extreme and outrageous and, since plaintiff could not possibly win his case against them, their joinder, for the purpose of defeating removal to federal court, was clearly fraudulent. Burden v. General Dynamics Corp., 60 F.3d 213, 218, 220.

C.A.5, 1995. Cit. in case cit. in disc., subsec. (1) cit. in headnote and quot. in disc., coms. (b) and (j) cit. in disc. Former manager of a convenience store sued her former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress and slander stemming from her employment termination. After the district court entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding plaintiff damages, this court reversed as to the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, affirmed as to the claim for slander, and remanded for apportionment of the damages. On remand, the district court apportioned the entire damages award to the slander claim. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that, while the evidence of emotional injuries did not rise to the level of severity to support an independent tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress, plaintiff's emotional injuries were compensable as damages for her slander claim. Burroughs v. FFP Operating Partners, L.P., 70 F.3d 31, 32, 33.

C.A.5, 1995. Cit. in headnotes, cit. in case cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (g) cit. in sup. Railroad company employee sued employer for, inter alia, Title VII violations and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that she received verbal abuse from co-workers and abusive phone calls and notes from anonymous sources. Texas federal district court dismissed, holding, in part, that the Title VII and intentional-infliction-of-emotional-distress claims were preempted by Railway Labor Act (RLA). Reversing and remanding, this court held, in part, that plaintiff's state law claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress was independent of the collective-bargaining agreement (CBA) because its resolution did not require an interpretation of the CBA; therefore, this claim was not preempted by the RLA. CBA contained no provision related to sexual harassment or the right to work in a nonhostile environment. Hirras v. National R.R. Passenger Corp., 44 F.3d 278, 279, 283, appeal after remand 95 F.3d 396 (5th Cir.1996).

C.A.5, 1995. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. and cit. in headnote. A female research laboratory technician at a university sued the university health center and two doctors for, inter alia, Title VII retaliation and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Jury awarded damages on the emotional-distress claim. Reversing as to the emotional-distress award, this court held, in part, that, although defendant doctor may have lost control, behaved intemperately, rudely reprimanded plaintiff or overreacted in reporting her mistake to her supervisor, the evidence did not demonstrate conduct and actions so unjustifiable, so uncivilized, or so based on malice that they rose to the level of outrageous conduct. In response to each incident involving plaintiff's carelessness or incompetence, defendant doctor had a plausible basis to become upset with plaintiff's conduct. MacArthur v. University of Tex. Health Center Tyler, 45 F.3d 890, 891, 898.

C.A.5, 1994. Cit. in case cit. in sup. Employee of electric cooperative sued employer and its general manager in state court for intentional infliction of emotional distress arising from a job reassignment. On removal to federal district court, the district court denied plaintiff's motion to remand the action to state court and dismissed the action without prejudice. Affirming as modified, this court held, inter alia, that, because plaintiff's claim required analysis of the collective bargaining agreement to determine whether defendants' actions in reassigning plaintiff to a maintenance position were extreme and outrageous, a necessary element of his state law claim, his claim was preempted by a section of the Labor Management Relations Act vesting jurisdiction in federal courts to hear claims for violation of labor contracts and thus the district court did not err in denying plaintiff's motion to remand. Baker v. Farmers Elec. Co-op., Inc., 34 F.3d 274, 280.

C.A.5, 1994. Com. (k) cit. in disc., com. (j) quot. in sup. Former manager of a convenience store sued her employer in state court after the employer accused her of embezzlement, asserting intentional infliction of emotional distress and other claims. The case was removed to federal district court, which entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiff on the emotional-distress claim. Reversing in part and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that defendant's failure to contact plaintiff prior to initiating criminal proceedings against her was not extreme and outrageous conduct sufficient to support the emotional-distress claim and plaintiff's emotional injuries were not severe enough, as a matter of law, to meet the standard for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Burroughs v. FFP Operating Partners, L.P., 28 F.3d 543, 546, 549, appeal after remand 70 F.3d 31 (5th Cir.1995).

C.A.5, 1994. Cit. in headnotes, cit. and quot. in sup., coms. (d) and (h) cit. in case quot. in sup. Beneficiary of annuity sued insurer for stopping payment on his annuity check, alleging various causes of action, including intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming the district court's dismissal of the complaint, this court held that the determination in a prior state court action that insurer's conduct in not delivering the disputed funds to plaintiff did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress barred plaintiff's instant claim on the ground of collateral estoppel. Daniels v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. of U.S., 35 F.3d 210, 211, 216.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.5, 1994. Cit. in headnotes, cit. in sup., coms. (d), (e), and (f) quot. in sup. Company office insurance agent who suffered mental breakdown sued employer in state and federal court alleging, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Insurer had realized that its new "neighborhood office agent" program would disrupt existing company offices and agents that stayed in them, but it believed that new system was best way to facilitate growth. District court granted employer judgment as a matter of law on plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming in part, this court held, inter alia, that defendant's alleged mistreatment of plaintiff was not sufficiently thoughtless to rise to level of outrageousness necessary to impose liability under Louisiana law. Plaintiff was not targeted for specific abuse and his grievances were a foreseeable result of application of defendant's new system. Furthermore, defendant did not abuse its position of trust or power and was not aware of plaintiff's preexisting health problems. Deus v. Allstate Ins. Co., 15 F.3d 506, 507, 508, 514-517, cert. denied ___ U.S. ___, 115 S.Ct. 573, 130 L.Ed.2d 490 (1994).

C.A.5, 1994. Cit. in disc. A vendor at an Air Force commissary sued the government under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA), alleging that her supervisor had created a hostile work environment by making off-color sexual remarks and dirty jokes and by giving the vendor winks and nods, resulting in mental anguish, anxiety, embarrassment, and humiliation. The district court granted the government summary judgment. This court reversed and remanded, holding that plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress was not excluded from the reach of the FTCA. The court determined that plaintiff's claims did not arise out of an assault, a battery, or a slander. It noted that the components necessary to establish assault, battery, and slander were distinct from the elements of intentional infliction of emotional distress, and that the goals of these torts were also different. Truman v. U.S., 26 F.3d 592, 595.

C.A.5, 1993. Coms. (d) and (h) quot. in case quot. in sup. Independent contractor for public utility sued utility and its supervisory employee to recover damages for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that he was defamed by supervisor's statements to others that he was discharged for falsifying a work-related document. Affirming the district court's dismissal of the claim, this court held, inter alia, that supervisor's conduct, as a matter of law, was not so extreme and outrageous as to permit recovery, since it did not exceed all possible bounds of decency and was not utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Danawala v. Houston Lighting & Power Co., 14 F.3d 251, 256.

C.A.5, 1993. Com. (d) cit. in headnote and quot. in case cit. in sup. A former police officer sued his former supervisors and the city that terminated him, asserting civil rights and state tort claims, including one for intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court, affirming the trial court's entry of judgment against the officer, held, inter alia, that, under Texas law, none of the defendants had acted outrageously in discharging the officer, as their statements were either accurate descriptions of the controversy surrounding the officer or, at worst, hyperbolic ramblings. Gillum v. City of Kerrville, 3 F.3d 117, 122, cert. denied ___ U.S. ___, 114 S.Ct. 881, 127 L.Ed.2d 76 (1994).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.5, 1993. Subsec. (1) cit. in sup., com. (j) quot. in case cit. in sup. A retired sales manager sued his former employer and others for intentional infliction of emotional distress and other damage claims allegedly arising out of derogatory comments made by a presenter at an awards ceremony. The district court entered judgments for defendants. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that the employer's conduct, in failing to take corrective action after the ceremony and in retracting its offer of continued employment after the manager retired, was not sufficiently extreme to support an intentional infliction of emotional distress claim. The court noted that the comments conveyed, at worst, a message that the manager had not earned top performance recognition. McKethan v. Texas Farm Bureau, 996 F.2d 734, 741, 742.

C.A.5, 1993. Com. (d) quot. in part in case cit. in sup. A Hispanic employee who was referred to as a "Mexican" and a "wetback" by his supervisor sued the employer, asserting claims for constructive discharge under Title VII and for intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court affirmed a grant of the employer's motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that the supervisor's conduct, though repeated over a period of time, was not so extreme and outrageous as to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Ugalde v. W.A. McKenzie Asphalt Co., 990 F.2d 239, 243.

C.A.5, 1992. Quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. An at-will employee who was fired sued his former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress and wrongful termination. The district court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment, finding that defendant's conduct of constantly criticizing plaintiff and threatening to terminate him was not extreme and outrageous and did not cause plaintiff to suffer severe emotional distress. This court affirmed, holding that the conduct complained of was within the realm of ordinary employee disputes, which under Texas law would not give rise to a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. While the defendant's alleged act of telling plaintiff's current employer that plaintiff was under psychiatric care fell outside the category of a nonactionable employment dispute, the court did not find this factually accurate report to rise to the level of extreme and outrageous behavior. Johnson v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 965 F.2d 31, 33.

C.A.5, 1992. Com. (d). cit. in case quot. in sup. Employee who was demoted, reduced from a salary to an hourly wage, and eventually terminated sued former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. The district court entered judgment on jury verdict for employee. Reversing and remanding for the district court to enter judgment for defendant, this court held that while defendant's actions may have been illegal and discriminatory, they did not constitute extreme and outrageous conduct, since plaintiff was not subjected to intentional and systematic humiliation. Moreover, plaintiff's duties following demotion were not menial or demeaning but were duties that defendant required its other supervisors to do on occasion, and, indeed, were duties that defendant had often called on plaintiff to do himself before his demotion. Ramirez v. Allright Parking El Paso, Inc., 970 F.2d 1372, 1375.

C.A.5, 1991. Com. (d) quot. in sup. The father of a juvenile who committed suicide after being detained by a police officer for driving an automobile without a license sued the officer alleging, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court directed a verdict for the defendant. Affirming in part, this court held that statements made by the officer to the plaintiff's decedent and his friends were not sufficiently outrageous to warrant the imposition of liability. White v. Walker, 950 F.2d 972, 978.

C.A.5, 1991. Cit. in ftn.; com. (g) quot. in ftn.; com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc., quot. in disc. An employee sued his former employer for age discrimination, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and termination of long term disability benefits in retaliation for filing age discrimination charges under the Age Discrimination in Employment Act. The district court denied the defendant's motions for a directed verdict, judgment n.o.v., a new trial, and remittitur, and entered judgment on the jury award of damages for age discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming, this court held that the jury determination on age discrimination was reasonable. It held, moreover, that demoting an executive manager to an entry-level warehouse position with menial janitorial duties was extreme and outrageous conduct demonstrating an intentional infliction of emotional distress; the demotion was contrived to humiliate the employee in the hope that he would quit. Wilson v. Monarch Paper Co., 939 F.2d 1138, 1141, 1143, 1144.

C.A.5, 1989. Com. (d) quot. in disc. An employee sued her supervisor, alleging claims under Title VII and a pendent state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court found for the plaintiff on the emotional distress claim, but dismissed the Title VII claims for failure to prove a retaliatory discharge. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that the defendant's intentional placement of two checks in the plaintiff's purse to make it appear that she was a thief constituted outrageous conduct giving rise to a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court said that the supervisor's subjecting the innocent plaintiff to an accusation of theft passed the bounds of tolerated conduct and was therefore outrageous. Dean v. Ford Motor Credit Co., 885 F.2d 300, 306.

C.A.5, 1989. Quot. in case quot. in disc. A woman who was portrayed in a book as assisting in her 45-year-old brother's marriage to an 11-year-old girl sued the book's publisher to recover damages for libel, for “false light” invasion of privacy, and for intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress. The trial court dismissed the complaint for failure to state a claim. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that in order to prevail on her defamation claim, the plaintiff had to establish a false and defamatory statement concerning another, an unprivileged publication to a third party, fault amounting at least to negligence on the part of the publisher, and the existence of either “per se” actionability or special harm. Mitchell v. Random House, Inc., 865 F.2d 664, 672.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.5, 1973. Cit. in sup. A tugboat owner filed a petition seeking exoneration or limitation of liability following the boat's crash into a bridge. The bridge operator sought damages and the representative of the deceased boat pilot sought damages for the pilot's death. The trial court held the ship's owner liable to the other two parties, finding that the owner was negligent in providing an unseaworthy vessel and that fit was responsible for the negligence of some of its employees. The appellate court reversed in part, holding that, as a matter of law, the pilot was chargeable with having knowledge of certain navigational hazards which in fact he did not have, and that he was thus contributorily negligent in not informing himself of the special hazards attendant upon the conditions known to him. The court remanded the issue of whether the owner was entitled to indemnification from the pilot's estate. The court also held, with regard to the suit of the bridge operator, that parol evidence was admissible to show, contrary to express contractual terms, that railroads, who had to use another bridge while the damaged one was being repaired, expected to be reimbursed for their extra expenses, the court finding that the contracts in question were not complete. In addition, the court denied grief damages to the pilot's survivors, finding this result indicated by the relevant federal laws. Petition of M/V Elaine Jones, 480 F.2d 11, 25, amended 513 F.2d 911 (5th Cir.1975), cert. denied 96 S.Ct. 71, (1975) 46 L.Ed.2d 60.

C.A.6

C.A.6, 2021. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Mortgage borrower filed a class action against law firm and its principals, who sent him a letter regarding the possible foreclosure of his loan without first having an attorney provide a meaningful review of his foreclosure files, alleging that the letter violated federal and state statutes because it falsely represented or implied that it was from an attorney. The district court dismissed borrower's claims, finding that borrower failed to show that he suffered an injury in fact. Affirming, this court held that borrower's bare allegations of confusion and anxiety did not qualify as injuries in fact that could give rise to standing. The court cited Restatement Third of Torts: Liability for Physical and Emotional Harm § 46 and Restatement Second of Torts § 46 in explaining that liability for emotional distress arose only where the distress was extreme, and borrower did not make any allegations regarding the severity of his anxiety. Garland v. Orlans, PC, 999 F.3d 432, 440.

C.A.6,

C.A.6, 2020. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in sup. Debtor who received letters from law firm about certain debts that he admittedly owed to bank sued law firm, alleging that it violated the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act by giving the impression that an attorney had reviewed his case and determined that he owed the debts, which made him anxious and afraid that law firm would sue him if he did not promptly pay. The district court granted law firm's motion to dismiss. Affirming, this court held that debtor lacked standing to sue, because he had not shown any injury-in-fact that was traceable to law firm's challenged conduct. The court noted that it was skeptical as to whether debtor's bare allegations of anxiety were sufficient to establish an injury in fact consistent with common-law requirements to recover for emotional harm under Restatement Second of Torts §

46, but explained that it did not need to resolve that issue, because debtor's anxiety, as alleged, amounted to a fear of a future harm, which was rarely cognizable as an injury in fact. Buchholz v. Meyer Njus Tanick, PA, 946 F.3d 855, 864, 870.

C.A.6

C.A.6, 2014. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Parents of arrestee brought, inter alia, a state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against officers of a private medical clinic's police department. The district court granted defendants' motion for judgment on the pleadings. Reversing as to this claim and remanding, this court held that, at this stage in the proceedings, plaintiffs alleged sufficient facts to make plausible a claim that, under Ohio law, defendants' conduct was extreme and outrageous, as required for an IIED claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d. The court pointed to evidence that defendants broke into plaintiffs' home late at night without a warrant or exigent circumstances in attempting to arrest plaintiffs' son for minor traffic violations, blindly deployed stun guns through a broken window into plaintiffs' occupied home, verbally abused them, and used racial epithets throughout the encounter. Hayward v. Cleveland Clinic Foundation, 759 F.3d 601, 619.

C.A.6, 2014. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Tenants brought a claim for outrageous infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, against purchaser that acquired tenants' rental home at a foreclosure sale, alleging that purchaser's actions in evicting them were outrageous and caused them severe emotional distress. The district court dismissed the complaint. Affirming in part, this court held that the conduct alleged by plaintiffs was not sufficiently extreme or atrocious to be considered outrageous under Kentucky law. The court explained that, while defendant's alleged conduct—which included having the local sheriff's office place plaintiffs' possessions in the yard, where more than $38,000 worth of their property was damaged or destroyed by rain—was unfortunate, the procedure that defendant followed to evict plaintiffs generally conformed to Kentucky law, providing support for the conclusion that it was not atrocious, and, in fact, was considered acceptable. Mik v. Federal Home Loan Mortg. Corp., 743 F.3d 149, 169.

C.A.6,

C.A.6, 2014. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee brought, inter alia, a state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against employer and supervisor, alleging that supervisor had sexually harassed her. The district court granted summary judgment for defendants. Affirming in part, this court held that plaintiff's IIED claim failed under Kentucky law, because, while supervisor's alleged comments that plaintiff's appearance sexually aroused him were offensive to her, they were not sufficiently outrageous, under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, to support a claim for IIED. Montell v. Diversified Clinical Services, Inc., 757 F.3d 497, 510.

C.A.6, 2013. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Arrestee who was detained for driving under the influence brought, inter alia, a pendent state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against two county deputy sheriffs who searched him at the county jail, alleging that, even though he was physically compliant during the search, defendants knocked him unconscious and broke his tooth immediately after he asked one of them"while you're down there, you want to give me a blow job?" The district court granted summary judgment for defendants. Reversing as to this claim and remanding, this court held that a genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether defendants' assault of plaintiff for the sole transgression of goading defendants by making an off-color jibe was utterly intolerable in a civilized community, noting that a jury could reasonably conclude that defendants assaulted plaintiff with the intent not just to hurt him physically but to reprimand him for his remark—that is, to humiliate him. Burgess v. Fischer, 735 F.3d 462, 480.

C.A.6

C.A.6, 2011. Subsec. (1) cit. in disc. and adopted in case quot. in disc., subsec. (2) cit. and quot. in disc. Arrestee's daughter brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against city police officer, alleging that she suffered severe emotional distress as a result of witnessing a highly charged incident during which defendant placed her mother in a chokehold, dragged her to his police car, and sprayed her with pepper spray. At trial, the district court granted defendant's motion for judgment as a matter of law on plaintiff's IIED claim. Affirming as to that claim, this court held that the district court correctly found that defendant's conduct was not directed at plaintiff, as required by Restatement Second of Torts § 46(1), and that, while the situation fit within the parameters of § 46(2), which subjected an actor to liability where the conduct was directed at a third person, Kentucky had not yet adopted that provision, and plaintiff never asked the district court to anticipate whether the Supreme Court of Kentucky would adopt § 46(2) if it were squarely presented with a case meeting its requirements. Arnold v. Wilder, 657 F.3d 353, 368.

C.A.6, 2011. Quot. in case quot. in sup. Participant in state's pretrial release program, who agreed to undergo random drug testing in order to participate in the program, sued private corporation that conducted the testing, alleging, among other things, that it subjected him to an unreasonable search in violation of the Fourth Amendment, as well as intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), by requiring him to provide a urine sample while directly facing one of its employees. The district court granted summary judgment for defendant. Affirming, this court held that defendant's use of the direct observation method of obtaining a urine sample did not constitute IIED. The court, citing its earlier conclusion that the direct observation method used here was reasonable under the Fourth Amendment, reasoned that such conduct did not go beyond all possible bounds of decency and would not be regarded as atrocious or as intolerable in a civilized community. Norris v. Premier Integrity Solutions, Inc., 641 F.3d 695, 703.

C.A.6, 2010. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Father/personal representative of inmate who died of cancer while he was being held at a county jail as a pretrial detainee sued county, nurses, and corrections officers in connection with the medical care that was provided to inmate. The district court, among other things, granted defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). Affirming that portion of the decision, this court held that, although nurses' purported conduct in ignoring for several months medical request forms from inmate that claimed he was seriously ill could reasonably be construed as deliberately indifferent to inmate's serious medical needs, it did not establish that nurses acted intentionally or in a manner that was sufficiently extreme or outrageous to satisfy an IIED claim under Michigan law. Jones v. Muskegon County, 625 F.3d 935, 948.

C.A.6, 2005. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. Pretrial detainee sued municipality and others for failing to provide her with insulin following her arrest, after which she was hospitalized with diabetic ketoacidosis. The district court granted municipality's motion for summary judgment against her claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court affirmed in part, holding that a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress required actual emotional distress characterized by some egregious misconduct. Detainee failed to show that her arrest was sufficiently distressful, particularly since she had been arrested five times before and had experienced a similar diabetic attack at another jail. Garretson v. City of Madison Heights, 407 F.3d 789, 799.

C.A.6, 2005. Cit. in sup., cit. in case quot. in sup., subsec. (1) quot. in sup. Employee brought, inter alia, claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against former corporate employer, alleging that she suffered serious mental injury from outrageous discriminatory conduct against her at work by co-workers. The district court entered judgment for plaintiff on the claim and awarded punitive damages. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that corporate supervisor' and officials' reckless disregard of and utter refusal to address plaintiff's repeated complaints and requests for help in regard to a hostile work environment that subjected her to daily instances of outrageous sexual harassment for over a year and a half rendered corporate employer directly, rather than vicariously, liable for intentional or reckless infliction of emotional distress. Pollard v. E.I. DuPont De Nemours, Inc., 412 F.3d 657, 664, 667.

C.A.6, 2005. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former police officer accused of stealing official funds brought numerous claims, including a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, against municipality and others after he was arrested at his new place of employment—an event, along with his subsequent arraignment, covered by the media—and the charges against him were ultimately dropped. The district court dismissed or granted summary judgment for defendants on all claims. This court affirmed in part, holding, inter alia, that routine police conduct stemming from officer's arrest and detention did not rise to the level of outrageousness required to establish a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Ohio law. Voyticky v. Village of Timberlake, Ohio, 412 F.3d 669, 678.

C.A.6, 2005. Com. (h) quot. in disc. Elected union representative brought suit against union and its officials, alleging, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, as the result of acts of reprisal against plaintiff after opposing a specific union agreement. District court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to sufficiently show that the insults and indignities to which he was subjected created a genuine issue of material fact as to whether defendants' conduct was so "extreme and outrageous" as to go beyond the bounds of decency and be considered intolerable in a civilized society. Webster v. United Auto Workers, Local 51, 394 F.3d 436, 442-443, cert. denied 546 U.S. 935, 126 S.Ct. 421, 163 L.Ed.2d 321 (2005).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.6, 2003. Adopted in case cit. in disc., coms. (d) and (h) quot. in sup. Former family services worker with the Kentucky Cabinet for Families and Children sued Cabinet and male former supervisor for sexual harassment, discrimination, hostile work environment, retaliation, and the tort of outrage. District court dismissed all claims against supervisor, and dismissed claims of discrimination, retaliation, and outrage against Cabinet. This court reversed in part, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff satisfied elements of her tort-of-outrage claim against supervisor. Supervisor's behavior was outrageous, in that it went far beyond sexual jokes, comments, and innuendoes. There was sufficient evidence to send issues of causation and severity to the jury, as plaintiff testified that she experienced depression and sought psychological counseling after leaving her job. Akers v. Alvey, 338 F.3d 491, 496.

C.A.6, 2002. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Husband of deceased prison employee sued state department of corrections and prison officials, alleging violation of his wife's substantive due-process rights by failing to prevent her murder by prisoner, sexually hostile work environment, and intention infliction of emotional distress. The district court granted prison summary judgment. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that defendants' conduct was not intentional and did not rise to level of extreme and outrageous sufficient to support claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Sperle v. Michigan Dept. of Corrections, 297 F.3d 483, 496.

C.A.6, 2000. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (j) quot. in case quot. in conc. op. Motorist who was stopped, questioned, and eventually released sued police officers involved, among others, for violations of 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court entered summary judgment for defendants. Affirming, this court held that the facts and circumstances known to defendants at the time gave them reasonable suspicion justifying the stop, and that plaintiff had failed to establish that the manner in which defendants conducted themselves was extreme or outrageous. Concurrence would not have reached the issue of defendants' behavior, noting that plaintiff could not show that he suffered severe emotional distress as a result of the incident. Watkins v. City of Southfield, 221 F.3d 883, 890, 893.

C.A.6, 1999. Quot. in case quot. in disc. After a company fired its marketing director, the director sued the company for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. District court granted defendant summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that defendant's conduct was not outrageous. The company's president was courteous to plaintiff and never tried to humiliate him, and plaintiff's upset stomach, loss of sleep, and financial concerns did not constitute a severe emotional injury. Godfredson v. Hess & Clark, Inc., 173 F.3d 365, 376.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.6, 1999. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup. Borrowers brought suit for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress against bank and bank officers, arising from defendants' disclosure of plaintiffs' loan file to opposing attorney in underlying state court action. Affirming the district court's grant of summary judgment for defendants, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiffs failed to set forth all of the elements of a prima facie case under Ohio law, since plaintiffs did not allege that defendants' actions were outrageous, or that plaintiffs' resulting emotional distress was severe. Hahn v. Star Bank, 190 F.3d 708, 718, cert. denied 529 U.S. 1020, 120 S.Ct. 1423, 146 L.Ed.2d 314 (2000).

C.A.6, 1998. Cit. in headnote, com. (d) quot. in case cit. in disc. Securities brokers sued securities dealer for defamation and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendant filed false Uniform Termination Notice of Securities Industry Regulation, or U-5, forms with the National Association of Securities Dealers. The district court entered summary judgment for defendant. Affirming, this court held, in part, that plaintiffs' defamation claim failed because the statements contained in the U-5 forms were true, and that the publication of truthful and accurate statements could not be considered extreme or outrageous. Andrews v. Prudential Securities, Inc., 160 F.3d 304, 305, 309.

C.A.6, 1997. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in disc. Plaintiff brought an action under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 against a state trooper for an illegal search that resulted in plaintiff's arrest on drug charges. The district court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiff. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff did not have to prove that he suffered severe emotional distress to recover for nonphysical injury under § 1983. Chatman v. Slagle, 107 F.3d 380, 384.

C.A.6, 1997. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Female former employee who was sexually harassed by three supervisors sued supervisors and employer for violations of Title VII and the Kentucky Civil Rights Act (CRA). Employee also asserted a claim for the tort of outrage. The district court granted defendants' motions for summary judgment. Affirming, this court held, in part, that supervisors could not be found individually liable under either Title VII or the CRA, that employer was not liable for sexual harassment where it took prompt action to remedy the situation, and that supervisors' conduct, while crude and wholly inappropriate, was not atrocious and utterly intolerable as a matter of law. Wathen v. General Elec. Co., 115 F.3d 400, 407.

C.A.6, 1996. Cit. in ftn., com. (d) quot. but dist. Sales representative who claimed to have been sexually harassed by a co-worker brought civil-rights action against former employer, seeking recovery for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that co-worker's conduct, which included telephoning plaintiff, sending her cards and notes, and asking her to join him on weekend getaways, was not sufficiently outrageous or atrocious as to support a claim for damages. Hartleip v. McNeilab, Inc., 83 F.3d 767, 769, 777.

C.A.6, 1995. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. The daughter of a nursing-home patient sued her brother, her brother's attorney, and the nursing home for, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendants interfered with her visits with her mother. District court granted defendants' motion to dismiss this claim. This court reversed and remanded, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff stated an emotional-distress cause of action, because it was within the realm of imagination that hiding a 98-year-old, physically infirm mother from her adult daughter, and causing the daughter to be arrested for attempting to visit her mother, could constitute extreme and outrageous conduct. Miller v. Currie, 50 F.3d 373, 378.

C.A.6, 1994. Cit. in sup. and in disc., cit. generally in sup., quot. in case quot. in sup., coms. (d) and (g) quot. in case quot. in sup. Employee who was also a union official sued his employer and several co-workers in state court, asserting intentional infliction of emotional distress and other claims allegedly arising from administrative charges of sexual harassment having been brought against employee. After the case was removed to federal court, this court affirmed the district court's dismissal of the action, holding, inter alia, that, the Labor Management Relations Act preempted the emotional-distress claim, as reference to the collective-bargaining agreement would be required to determine whether employer and co-workers acted outrageously or whether they merely had pursued their legal rights in a permissible way. DeCoe v. General Motors Corp., 32 F.3d 212, 218-220.

C.A.6, 1994. Cit. in headnote, adopted in case cit. in disc., cit. generally in sup., subsec. (1) quot. in sup., com. (d) cit. in headnote and quot. in sup., com. (h) quot. in sup. Male employee who was demoted and transferred for violating employer's sexual-harassment policy sued employer for reverse discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming the district court's grant of summary judgment for defendant, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress was properly dismissed, since defendant's conduct in investigating allegations of sexual harassment against plaintiff and demoting him was not so extreme and outrageous as to support plaintiff's claim under Kentucky law, even though the alleged false statements of defendant's officials regarding plaintiff's behavior during years past might have been tortious and defendant's investigators' crude statements, comparing plaintiff's acts to the perpetration of heinous crimes, were insulting and vulgar. Pierce v. Commonwealth Life Ins. Co., 40 F.3d 796, 798, 805, 806.

C.A.6, 1993. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in disc., subsec. (1) quot. in sup. An accountant sued his former client and business associate for intentional infliction of emotional distress after the client allegedly deliberately misinformed the plaintiff's other associates that the plaintiff had engaged in criminal behavior and had threatened the safety of the client and his family. This court, reversing the district court's dismissal of the claim and remanding, held that this was a sufficient allegation of extreme and outrageous conduct under Michigan law to state an emotional distress claim. Mroz v. Lee, 5 F.3d 1016, 1017, 1019.

C.A.6, 1991. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. and quot. in case quot. in sup. A nuclear engineer formerly employed by the Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA) sued the TVA and some of its officials and employees alleging, among other claims, violation of his First and Fifth Amendment rights and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court dismissed the plaintiff's claims. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that the district court correctly dismissed the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress because the actions by the TVA and its officers and employees were not sufficiently outrageous to support such an action. The court stated that while assigning the nuclear engineer to menial tasks, unfairly reprimanding him, giving him low performance appraisals, and barring him from promotions, bonuses, and raises may have been tortious conduct, it did not go beyond the pale of decency. Jones v. Tennessee Valley Authority, 948 F.2d 258, 266.

C.A.6, 1991. Subsec. (1) quot. in case cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (g) quot. in sup. An employee terminated after 35 years of service to his employer sued his employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. The district court granted the employer summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that the plaintiff had alleged no action on the part of the defendant that was sufficiently outrageous to constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress, noting that the plaintiff was terminated after being unable to explain discrepancies between his submission of expense account receipts and actual restaurant records showing that the amount spent was less than his receipts showed. The court concluded that falsification of expense account records was a serious breach of responsibility on the part of the employee and constituted just cause for termination. Rush v. United Technologies, Otis Elevator Div., 930 F.2d 453, 456, 457.

C.A.6, 1989. Cit. in disc., com. (g) quot. in disc. A former railroad employee who lost health benefits because his employer wrongfully told the group health insurer that the employee had quit his job sued his former employer and the insurer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. The district court dismissed one count and removed the case to state court for lack of jurisdiction. Reviewing the case by way of mandamus, this court remanded the case to the district court with directions to vacate the order remanding the case to the state court and to dismiss the claim without prejudice. The court held that the plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress fell within the exclusive jurisdiction of the National Railroad Adjustment Board because the claim required interpretation of the collective bargaining agreement. The court stated that, because an actor was not liable when he had done no more than insist on his legal rights in a permissible way, a determination of the defendant employer's legal rights required resort to the provisions of the collective bargaining agreement. Beard v. Carrollton R.R., 893 F.2d 117, 122.

C.A.6, 1989. Com. (j) quot. in case cit. in disc. A terminated claims representative sued her employer insurance agency for age discrimination and tortious infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, after she was terminated following a series of verbal and written negative admonitions concerning her work performance. The only evidence of age discrimination was a solitary remark by her supervisor that he “needed younger blood.” This court affirmed the district court's award of summary judgment to the employer on the ground that the solitary remark was insufficient to create a triable issue of age discrimination. Additionally, the court held that the crude and sexually suggestive remarks allegedly made by her supervisor to her did not give rise to an actionable claim of tortious infliction of emotional distress. The court noted that she had never consulted a physician for assistance and never missed work during the time when these alleged outrageous episodes had occurred. Gagne v. Northwestern Nat. Ins. Co., 881 F.2d 309, 318.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.6, 1988. Cit. and quot. in disc., quot. in case quot. in disc., coms. (d), (g), (j), and (k) quot. in disc. The plaintiff was discharged by his employer when he refused to apologize to an upper-level manager after accusing him of making obscene and threatening telephone calls to the plaintiff's wife. Months later, when the plaintiff attempted to regain his job, the employer, during a series of meetings, imposed several conditions, including the requirements that he refuse to talk about the incident and that he work with the alleged obscene phone caller. When, at the end of the meetings, the plaintiff was told that the manager had confessed to making the phone calls, the plaintiff's demand for an out-of-court settlement for damages was refused and he sued the employer for wrongful discharge and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court entered judgment on the jury's verdict for the plaintiff. This court reversed the wrongful discharge award and affirmed the emotional distress award, holding that the company's conditioning the plaintiff's reemployment in such a manner was outrageous behavior that caused the plaintiff to suffer severe emotional distress. Pratt v. Brown Mach. Co., 855 F.2d 1225, 1238-1242.

C.A.6, 1987. Quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. A real estate developer sued a city and its officials for malicious prosecution, infliction of emotional distress, and violation of due process. The trial court directed a verdict for the defendants. Affirming, this court held that the plaintiff had failed to establish a case of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court reasoned that the efforts of the city officials to require the plaintiff to obtain permits before construction may have been misguided, but they did not remotely approach extreme and outrageous conduct. Coogan v. City of Wixom, 820 F.2d 170, 173, 174.

C.A.6, 1986. Cit. in disc. Two paraplegic prison inmates were treated abusively by a guard and confined under unhygienic conditions. The inmates sued the guard and various other defendants, alleging that the conditions of confinement were unconstitutional and that the guard's conduct had violated their constitutional rights. The trial court held that the conditions of confinement were unconstitutional and that the constitutional rights of one of the inmates had been violated; however, the court awarded that plaintiff only nominal damages, reasoning that injunctive relief was a more appropriate remedy than damages. This court reversed and remanded, holding that on remand the inmate might be able to recover damages based on the defendant guard's verbal abuse. The court reasoned that, in the absence of physical injury, the inmate would be required to prove that the guard's conduct was both extreme and outrageous and caused severe emotional distress in order to recover. Parrish v. Johnson, 800 F.2d 600, 611.

C.A.6, 1986. Quot. in disc., coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (g) quot. in sup. After an employer discharged an employee, the employee sued her former employer for race discrimination, breach of an implied employment agreement, retaliatory discharge, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered judgment for the defendant on the race discrimination claim but for the plaintiff on all of the other claims. This court reversed in part and remanded, holding that the evidence did not show that the plaintiff had suffered actual emotional distress of sufficient magnitude to allow her to recover from the defendant on her claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court reasoned that the plaintiff did not display any emotional reactions that were atypical of those of any employee faced with an unpleasant work situation and that, to a certain extent, her distress was self-inflicted. Polk v. Yellow Freight System, Inc., 801 F.2d 190, 195, 196, appeal after remand 876 F.2d 527 (1989).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.6, 1986. Quot. in part in sup. Three employees were discharged by their employer without a showing of good cause. One of the former employees sued the employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that her employment contract required the employer to show good cause before the employee could be terminated. The trial court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that, because the plaintiff's employment contract was terminable at will either with or without cause, the employer was not liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress when it had simply exercised its legal right to discharge the employee without cause. The court reasoned that the discharge of the employee without cause, regardless of the reasons for the termination, did not constitute extreme and outrageous wrongful conduct. Reid v. Sears, Roebuck and Co., 790 F.2d 453, 462.

C.A.6, 1980. Quot. in part and fol. and com. (d) cit. in sup. Newspaper reporters brought this action against undercover police officer, alleging violation of their civil rights, assault, battery, false imprisonment, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Defendant officer counterclaimed, alleging that publication of his photograph by the reporters amounted to invasion of privacy and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court entered judgment for the defendant on his counterclaim. Plaintiffs appealed from the entry of this judgment, asserting that, in regard to the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, the evidence at trial was insufficient as a matter of law to permit submission to the jury. This court accepted plaintiffs' assertion and reversed that portion of the district court's holding. In doing so the court stated that defendant's evidence of his photograph being published, in conjunction with news articles expressing strong political views, failed to satisfy the requirement of extreme and outrageous conduct described in the Restatement (Second) of Torts as being one of the four distinct elements of proof necessary to sustain a claim. In all other respects the judgment of the district court was affirmed. Ross v. Burns, 612 F.2d 271, 273.

C.A.6, Bkrtcy.App.

C.A.6, Bkrtcy.App.2000. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in disc. Ex-wife who had successfully sued now-bankrupt ex-husband for intentional infliction of emotional distress sought to have husband's judgment debt to her declared nondischargeable as one arising from a willful and malicious injury. The district court entered summary judgment for wife. Affirming, this court held, in part, that the lower court correctly gave collateral-estoppel effect to the finding by the jury in the earlier tort action that husband either intended to cause, or was substantially certain of bringing about, the consequences of his actions. In re Moffitt, 252 B.R. 916, 922.

C.A.7,

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.7, 2022. Subsec. (1) quot. in diss. op. Consumer brought a putative class action against debt-collection agency, alleging that defendant violated the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act when it sent plaintiff a collection letter informing her that she was pre-approved for a discount payment plan for the payment of her debts, for which the statute of limitations had passed. The district court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiff. This court vacated, remanded, and denied plaintiff's petition for en banc rehearing. The dissent argued that the majority erred in finding that plaintiff's psychological distress induced by defendant's attempt to collect expired debts did not constitute a concrete injury-in-fact granting her standing under the Act, because plaintiff's intangible harms had a close relationship to the common-law tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress as set forth by Restatement Second of Torts § 46(1). Pierre v. Midland Credit Management, Inc., 36 F.4th 728, 732-733.

C.A.7, 2022. Subsec. (1) quot. in diss. op. Consumer brought a putative class action against debt-collection agency, alleging that defendant violated the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act when it sent plaintiff a collection letter informing her that she was pre-approved for a discount payment plan for the payment of her debts, for which the statute of limitations had passed. The district court granted plaintiff's motion for summary judgment. This court vacated and remanded, holding that plaintiff's confusion and emotional distress, which arose from her concern about being sued for what appeared to be a restarted debt, did not constitute a concrete injury giving her standing to bring suit under Article III. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46(1), the dissent argued that plaintiff's intangible injuries closely followed those found in common-law torts contemplated by the Act, because, under the common law, plaintiff could recover for defendant's extreme and outrageous conduct that intentionally caused her severe emotional distress. Pierre v. Midland Credit Management, Inc., 29 F.4th 934, 947.

C.A.7, 2017. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former police officer for village sued village and three members of its police department for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) in connection with allegations that defendants fired him in retaliation for his exercise of protected speech at a community board meeting. The district court granted summary judgment for defendants. This court affirmed the dismissal of plaintiff's IIED claim, holding that plaintiff failed to offer any evidence that defendants' conduct was extreme and outrageous or caused him severe emotional distress. The court noted that, under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, the law intervened only where the distress inflicted was so severe that no reasonable person could be expected to endure it, and plaintiff admitted in his own brief that the "severity" of his emotional distress was "probably of the garden variety," which was insufficient to meet that standard. McGreal v. Village of Orland Park, 850 F.3d 308, 315.

C.A.7

C.A.7, 2016. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. and quot. in sup. Arrestees brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, against law-enforcement officers, among others, as a result of defendants' interrogation tactics. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of defendants. This court affirmed, holding that plaintiffs failed to show behavior that was sufficiently outrageous, under the standard set forth in Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, to support an IIED claim. The court rejected plaintiffs' argument that defendants' conduct during the interrogation was outrageous due to defendants' position of power and due to the emotional susceptibility of one of the plaintiffs due to a learning disability, concluding that defendants were entitled to try to solve crimes by investigating and interrogating suspects, and, here, acted appropriately in questioning plaintiffs using nothing more than ordinary interrogation tactics. Cairel v. Alderden, 821 F.3d 823, 836.

C.A.7, 2009. Com. (d) cit. in disc. Black inmate of state prison filed a federal civil-rights action against state department of corrections and prison personnel in connection with an incident in which a white guard hung a noose from the ceiling for plaintiff and others to see. The district court dismissed the suit. Affirming in part, this court held that the district court properly dismissed plaintiff's claim that the incident constituted cruel and unusual punishment in violation of his federal constitutional rights. The court noted that, while plaintiff stated that he was afraid that the guard would "snap" and "go postal," the incident did not justify such a fear, because it was not a credible threat to kill or to inflict any other physical injury; the test for what constituted "cruel and unusual punishment" was an objective one—not the actual fear of the victim, but what a "reasonable" victim would fear. Dobbey v. Illinois Dept. of Corrections, 574 F.3d 443, 445.

C.A.7, 2008. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Employees brought state-law claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against employer, as part of their suit for discrimination and retaliation in violation of the Family and Medical Leave Act (FMLA). The trial court, inter alia, granted summary judgment for defendant on plaintiffs' IIED claims. Affirming as to that portion of the judgment, this court held that the IIED claims failed for lack of merit, since none of the conduct complained of by plaintiffs, which included being demoted, questioned, or criticized upon return from FMLA leave, passed over for raises or given reduced raises, denied tuition reimbursements, or given unexcused absences met the standard of extreme and outrageous behavior required to state an IIED claim under Illinois law. Breneisen v. Motorola, Inc., 512 F.3d 972, 983.

C.A.7, 2006. Cit. in case cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. (general cite). Former assistant professor at state university sued university's board of trustees for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress under the Indiana Tort Claims Act, after university failed to reappoint him for another academic year. The district court granted summary judgment for defendant. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress failed, since defendant's decision not to reappoint plaintiff was not extreme or outrageous in light of the accusations against him of inappropriate behavior with his students and of unsatisfactory teaching, and plaintiff presented no evidence that he suffered severe emotional distress as a result of defendant's decision. Keri v. Board of Trustees of Purdue University, 458 F.3d 620, 650, cert. denied 549 U.S. 1210, 127 S.Ct. 1331, 167 L.Ed.2d 83 (2007).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.7, 2003. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. After a man was arrested and unsuccessfully prosecuted for home invasion and rape, he brought 42 U.S.C. § 1983 suit against police detectives who caused his arrests. He and his wife also brought state-law claims for false arrest, defamation, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. District court granted defendants summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that wife's emotional-distress claim against one of the detectives failed, because even if officer called wife a "bitch" in connection with searching her home in an alleged outrageous fashion, his use of profanity was not extreme and outrageous conduct. Although she alleged rough treatment by police, she did not identify this officer as one of those who mistreated her. Beauchamp v. City of Noblesville, Ind., 320 F.3d 733, 747.

C.A.7, 2003. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. After bank closed the savings account of a customer who had a series of epileptic seizures in the bank branch lobby, customer sued bank for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court granted bank's motion for judgment as a matter of law. This court affirmed, holding that plaintiff's emotional-distress claim failed, because there was no evidence that bank intended to cause plaintiff severe emotional distress or knew that such distress was likely to result from closing the account. The court did not need to resolve whether bank's conduct was extreme and outrageous, but it noted that bank had control over plaintiff's entire savings and that it acted in a callous way to handle the serious medical condition of a long-time customer. Sanglap v. LaSalle Bank, FSB, 345 F.3d 515, 518.

C.A.7, 2001. Cit. in disc. Chapter 7 debtor sued creditor for alleged violation of automatic stay, claiming that creditor sought reaffirmation of its debt too aggressively. The bankruptcy court granted creditor summary judgment. The district court affirmed. Affirming, this court held that debtor could not recover damages for purely emotional injuries under the damages section of stay provision. Aiello v. Providian Financial Corp., 239 F.3d 876, 880.

C.A.7, 2001. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. and cit. generally in disc. Homeowner sued village mayor and fire chief for violations of 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendant caused fire that destroyed his house and did not use best efforts to fight it. District court granted defendant judgment as a matter of law on emotional-distress claim and granted defendant's motion for judgment n.o.v. on § 1983 claim. This court reversed and remanded as to emotional-distress claim, holding, inter alia, that whether defendant was responsible for setting fire, such that he could be said to have engaged in extreme and outrageous conduct, was jury question where the house burned under questionable circumstances and property's condition was a source of longstanding animosity in village. Honaker v. Smith, 256 F.3d 477, 490, 496.

C.A.7, 2000. Quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (d) cit. in case cit. in disc. Employee sued employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, asserting that his co-workers and supervisors tormented him because he was mentally ill. District court granted employer summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding that plaintiff's emotional-distress claim failed, because he could not show that the employer intended to harm him, a requirement under state law. Plaintiff did not assert that the persons who tormented him were acting pursuant to a decision or policy made through employer's regular decision making channels by persons authorized to do so. The employer's refusal to allow him to work overtime and the denial of a position change did not constitute outrageous conduct. However, the court rendered no opinion as to whether the other acts committed by plaintiff's co-workers and supervisors constituted extreme and outrageous conduct. Holbrook v. Lobdell-Emery Mfg. Co., 219 F.3d 598, 600-602, certiorari denied 531 U.S. 1013, 121 S.Ct. 570, 148 L.Ed.2d 489 (2000).

C.A.7, 1998. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. Individual sued host of nationally syndicated television talk show for tortious interference with contract, tortious interference with prospective economic advantage, defamation, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendant thwarted his plans to sell the tabloid press a story detailing their illicit drug use. The district court dismissed the complaint. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held that plaintiff's allegations were sufficient to state claims for tortious interference and defamation; however, defendant's conduct, which was not extreme and outrageous, did not give rise to a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Cook v. Winfrey, 141 F.3d 322, 331.

C.A.7, 1998. Quot. in case quot. in disc. Employee sued employer and union for breach of the duty of fair representation under the Labor Management Relations Act (LMRA) and for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court entered summary judgment for defendants. Affirming, this court held that union did not act arbitrarily, discriminatorily, or in bad faith in pursuing and processing plaintiff's grievances against employer, and that the LMRA displaced state law with regard to the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress, because resolution of the claim, specifically whether defendants' conduct was extreme and outrageous, required interpretation of the parties' collective-bargaining agreement. Filippo v. Northern Indiana Public Service Corp., 141 F.3d 744, 750.

C.A.7, 1997. Adopted in case quot. in disc. Former employee who had injured his back at work sued employer for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court granted summary judgment for plaintiff. Affirming in part, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's supervisor's act of yelling at plaintiff out of the presence of others about his work restrictions and defendant's refusal to reassign plaintiff to the quality control department to accommodate his disability were not the sort of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Indiana law. McCreary v. Libbey-Owens-Ford Co., 132 F.3d 1159, 1167.

C.A.7, 1997. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Former employee who was diagnosed with bipolar disorder sued former employer for violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), alleging that he was terminated because of his illness. Employee also asserted a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with the manner in which he was dismissed. The district court entered judgment on a jury verdict for employer on the ADA claim, and for employee on the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held, in part, that employer's actions in dismissing employee, which included calling him at home during his vacation and lying about the reasons for the dismissal, were not so outrageous as to support recovery for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Van Stan v. Fancy Colours & Co., 125 F.3d 563, 567.

C.A.7, 1995. Com. (j) cit. in headnote and cit. and quot. in sup., com. (p) quot. in sup. Associate producer of play sued playwright-employer for sex discrimination, breach of contract, and tortious infliction of emotional distress, after she was discharged. The district court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiff on the emotional-distress claim. Affirming in part, this court held, inter alia, that defendant's conduct in firing plaintiff between 12 and 40 times and promptly rehiring her (all but the last time), following her around at work, stalking her during nonworking hours, banging on her apartment door late at night, calling her 10 to 30 times a night, and leaving messages on her answering machine that he hated her and wished her dead was extreme and outrageous, and the emotional distress that it inflicted was sufficiently severe to support the jury's verdict. Bristow v. Drake Street Inc., 41 F.3d 345, 346, 349, 350.

C.A.7, 1993. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in cases cit. in disc. A black former employee sued her employer, alleging race discrimination in her transfer from a managerial to a nonmanagerial position. Affirming a grant of summary judgment for the employer, the court of appeals held, inter alia, that, under Illinois law, allegations that the employee was not allowed to supervise white subordinates, was reprimanded for no reason, was refused participation in a management incentive fund, was forced out of her management position, was falsely accused of poor sales and threatened with discipline, and was excluded from office activities did not establish the level of extreme and outrageous conduct needed to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Harriston v. Chicago Tribune Co., 992 F.2d 697, 703.

C.A.7, 1993. Com. (d) quot. in part in disc. A plaintiff sued her brother for intentional infliction of emotional distress allegedly resulting from his preventing reconciliation with her mother and breaching a fiduciary duty to convince the mother to give money to plaintiff. Affirming the district court's grant of summary judgment for the brother, this court held, inter alia, that, under Illinois law, the brother's denial of entry to his home so that plaintiff could visit her mother and his preventing the mother from taking a handful of plaintiff's telephone calls over the course of a year were not extreme and outrageous conduct that would support the emotional distress claim. The court noted that plaintiff showed up unannounced at the brother's home in the company of one of the brother's ex-wives and that plaintiff had telephoned while her mother was napping. Lopacich v. Falk, 5 F.3d 210, 212.

C.A.7, 1989. Coms. (d) and (g) quot. in cases quot. in disc., com. (j) quot. in case quot. in ftn. An employee sued her employer in state court for intentional infliction of emotional distress arising from actions allegedly in retaliation for a back injury that restricted the employee's work hours and prevented her from performing voluntary stress-laden work. Upon removal, the district court dismissed the claim for failure to exhaust grievance and arbitration remedies under the collective bargaining agreement as required under federal law. This court affirmed, holding that since the emotional distress claim consisted of allegedly extreme and outrageous acts directly related to the terms and conditions of her employment, resolution of her claim would depend on an analysis of the terms of the collective bargaining agreement. Since the employee did not exhaust her grievance procedures, the claim was preempted by federal law and was properly dismissed. Douglas v. American Information Technologies Corp., 877 F.2d 565, 570-571.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.7, 1982. Com. (d) cit. in conc. and diss. op. The plaintiff brought a diversity action against officers of the insurance company with whom her husband had been employed, seeking damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The plaintiff alleged that the termination of her husband's employment was a retaliatory action taken against the plaintiff on account of the plaintiff's exercise of loan privileges. The lower court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss the claim upon the ground that the husband was merely an employee at will of the defendants and the defendants had a legal right to terminate his employment without reasonable cause. The plaintiff appealed and this court reversed and remanded. It was determined that the lower court erred in finding that a cause of action for emotional distress could not be sustained where the defendants' conduct was the exercise of a legal right. The majority held that because the defendants had no right to punish the plaintiff, the alleged fact that they did so by firing the plaintiff's husband made the defendants' conduct extreme or excessive. The concurring and dissenting judge disagreed, arguing that the defendants' action was not so outrageous as to go beyond all bounds of decency to sustain a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, nor were the defendants taking advantage of a known vulnerability of the plaintiff. Geist v. Martin, 675 F.2d 859, 864.

C.A.7, 1972. Subsec. (1) and com. (e) and (f) cit. in sup. The plaintiff was the beneficiary of her husband's accidental death policy with the defendant. She alleged that her husband died accidentally and that defendant had no valid defense to her claim; yet defendant, knowing of the financial distress, repeatedly refused payment and attempted to thereby coerce her into compromising her claim. Plaintiff sought, in Count I, payment on the policy, and in Counts II and III damages for intentional infliction of severe emotional distress. The lower court dismissed Counts II and III; Count I was dismissed without prejudice and later settled in a state court. The Circuit Court reversed as to Counts II and III, holding that the Illinois Supreme Court had recognized the “new tort” of intentional infliction of emotional distress, and if plaintiff's allegations proved true she could be awarded compensatory, but not punitive damages. Eckenrode v. Life of America Insurance Company, 470 F.2d 1, 4.

C.A.8,

C.A.8, 2021. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee of a state agency filed a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against former employer, state, and certain former supervisors and coworkers, alleging that defendants suspended and later terminated her on the pretextual ground that she had engaged in insurance fraud, in retaliation for her testimony before a state oversight committee that had launched an unrelated investigation of the agency. The district court granted summary judgment for defendants. Affirming, this court held that defendants' conduct was not sufficiently outrageous to satisfy the outrageousness prong of her claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court reasoned, in part, that while one supervisor's testimony about her might have not been precisely accurate, it was hardly "beyond all possible bounds of decency." Ackerman v. State of Iowa, 19 F.4th 1045, 1061.

C.A.8

C.A.8, 2009. Adopted in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (j) quot. in sup. Male former employee brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against former employer, alleging that two of defendant's managers falsely accused him of making homosexual advances to a co-worker, and that, as a result, he began having panic attacks and was diagnosed with posttraumatic stress disorder. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant. Affirming, this court held that, under Missouri law, managers' alleged conduct was not sufficiently outrageous to state a claim for IIED. The court further held that plaintiff's reaction was not one consistent with a reasonable person under the circumstances; the decline of plaintiff's mental health was unfortunate, but there was no evidence that either manager, or anyone else, knew or suspected how strongly he would react to the allegation or realized that he was in a fragile or vulnerable state. Bailey v. Bayer CropScience L.P., 563 F.3d 302, 310, 311.

C.A.8, 2006. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee sued former employer and supervisor for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that she suffered a miscarriage and depressive symptoms due to the distressing manner in which supervisor, knowing that she was pregnant, informed her that her position was being eliminated and that she would be forced to relocate. The district court granted summary judgment for defendants. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that the facts of this case did not support the tort, since termination from a job, while potentially upsetting, did not in itself constitute extreme or outrageous conduct, and employee did not additionally allege a severe medical problem that made her vulnerable to emotional distress or that supervisor was hostile to her when he informed her of the news. Reynolds v. Ethicon Endo-Surgery, Inc., 454 F.3d 868, 873.

C.A.8, 2001. Coms. (d)-(f) cit. and quot. in conc. and diss. op. Student and her parents sued band teacher, among others, for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming the district court's dismissal of the claim, this court held that defendant's actions in calling student “retarded,” “stupid,” and “dumb” in front of her classmates and throwing a notebook at her face, while unworthy of one entrusted with the responsibility of educating students, did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Concurring and dissenting opinion argued that, because defendant intentionally publicly humiliated student, knowing that she was susceptible given her youth and the fact that she was undergoing mental-health counseling, his conduct met the extreme-and-outrageous element of plaintiffs' claim. Costello v. Mitchell Public School Dist., 266 F.3d 916, 927.

C.A.8, 1998. Com. (b) cit. in sup. Meatcutter who claimed that employer allowed its supervisors to harass him and transfer him to a store farther away from his home in retaliation for his criticism of employer's failure to enforce proper sanitation procedures in the meat departments of employer's stores sued employer in state court for, in part, slander and intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress. Employer removed the case to federal district court, which granted employer's motion for summary judgment. Vacating and remanding, this court held that none of plaintiff's claims was preempted by the Labor Management Relations Act and that the district court thus had no removal jurisdiction over the case. The court said that the fact that the collective-bargaining agreement prohibited transfer of employees without justification or for discriminatory reasons had no legal significance in the context of this case, since plaintiff's claims were not dependent on interpretation of the collective-bargaining agreement, but on consideration of employer's conduct and motives and the effect of its behavior on plaintiff. Meyer v. Schnucks Markets, Inc., 163 F.3d 1048, 1052.

C.A.8, 1997. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. Employees at a residential program for developmentally disabled individuals sued the for-profit organization that operated the program, alleging sexual harassment due to the organization's failure to respond appropriately to the conduct of a mentally incapacitated resident toward program employees. District court granted the organization summary judgment. This court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded, holding, inter alia, that plaintiffs presented insufficient evidence to prove a claim of either intentional or negligent infliction of emotional distress under Minnesota law. The organization's response to plaintiffs' concerns was not extreme and outrageous conduct. Crist v. Focus Homes, Inc., 122 F.3d 1107, 1112.

C.A.8, 1997. Cit. in disc., com. (f) quot. in disc. Employees sued their former employer for, among other claims, the tort of outrage, alleging that the employer tolerated various forms of sexual harassment and other clearly inappropriate behavior by its supervisors and employees. The district court granted judgment as a matter of law to the employer on two of the plaintiffs' outrage claims. This court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded, holding, inter alia, that Arkansas courts would continue to adhere to the traditional elements of outrage, and that notice of peculiar susceptibility to emotional distress would merely be one factor given special emphasis when an aggrieved employee asserted an outrage claim. The court was confident that the Arkansas Supreme Court would hold that the right to be free from conduct of this sort extended to every person and not just to those known to possess temperaments that were peculiarly fragile. Manning v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., Inc., 127 F.3d 686, 690, 691.

C.A.8, 1991. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. A landlord sued the city and several police officers for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that he suffered illness and mental anguish as a result of police action in a civil dispute over abandoned property that led to the plaintiff's wrongful arrest. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. Affirming in part, this court held that the plaintiff's claim failed to meet the requirement that the emotional distress be so severe that no reasonable person could be expected to endure it. Peterson v. City of Plymouth, Minn., 945 F.2d 1416, 1421.

C.A.8, 1987. Com. (d) cit. in sup. A blind black attorney sued a legal services organization for employment discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress after the attorney was discharged from his position for violating his employment contract. The district court found for the organization, stating that since there was no basis for other discrimination claims, there was no support for the claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court affirmed in part, concluding that the conduct complained of was not sufficiently outrageous to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, but it reversed and remanded on plaintiff's claim of retaliatory discharge. Johnson v. Legal Services of Arkansas, Inc., 813 F.2d 893, 901.

C.A.8, 1987. Com. (d) cit. in sup. The scores of a teacher who did very well on a state-mandated test were mistakenly sent to someone else. The teacher sued the testing company for intentional infliction of emotional distress and invasion of privacy. The trial court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that the defendant's conduct, albeit negligent, did not begin to meet the standard of extreme and outrageous conduct and that the simple disclosure of private information to one other person did not involve publicity of a highly objectionable kind. Wood v. National Computer Systems, Inc., 814 F.2d 544, 545.

C.A.8, 1986. Com. (d) quot. in part in case cit. in sup. After arson destroyed a home, the owner's insurer requested her to submit personal and business financial records as part of its investigation. She refused to submit her business records, and the insurer sought a declaratory judgment that she had breached the insurance policy. She counterclaimed for, among other things, emotional distress. The lower court ruled in favor of the insurer on all issues, and this court affirmed. The owner alleged that her distress was solely attributable to the insurer's failure to pay her claim. This statement, however, failed to raise a material issue of fact sufficient to preclude the award of summary judgment, since Missouri law required conduct so outrageous in character and extreme in degree as to exceed all possible bounds of decency. Safeco Ins. Co. of America v. Costello, 799 F.2d 412, 414.

C.A.8, 1982. Cit. in disc., com. (j) cit. in disc. and quot. in part in disc. A former air traffic controller sued the air controllers union to recover for damages allegedly caused by the outrageous conduct of the union's agents. The plaintiff alleged that he had been shunned by several of the controllers after a disagreement he had with the local over its approach to labor/management relations, and that another union member tried to cause a systems error to “get at” the plaintiff. The plaintiff also claimed that the union tortiously attempted to interfere with his employment relationship with the Federal Aviation Administration, and caused him to suffer great mental anguish. The lower court entered judgment for the plaintiff. This court vacated the lower court and remanded. The court admitted that Missouri recognized the tort of emotional distress, having the following elements: extreme and outrageous conduct, intent or recklessness, and severe emotional distress. It noted that while the facts underlying the outrageous conduct and intent were collaterally estopped due to their litigation and adjudication in an earlier administrative proceeding, the union was not estopped from denying liability for the resulting emotional distress, as this element was not an issue in the administrative proceeding. The court stated that it was a jury issue to determine whether severe emotional distress existed; although proof of emotional distress could be inferred from extreme and outrageous conduct, this inference was simply evidence and did not establish the necessary proof of emotional distress as a matter of law. The lower court's failure to decide the liability issue, because it felt that it was fully adjudicated in the administrative proceeding, was error. The court asserted that the element of emotional distress must be proved for the purposes of liability as well as damages. The court remanded on the issue of all damages, asserting that the total damage award seemed overgenerous, and suggested that the award of damages be itemized. Anthan v. Professional Air Traffic Controllers, 672 F.2d 706, 709-711.

C.A.8, 1982. Cit. generally in ftn. A farmer brought an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress against the federal government under the Federal Tort Claims Act alleging that the local Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service Committee (ASCS) had denied him the right to participate in the United States Department of Agriculture's feed grain program and had demanded repayment for the funds he had received from the program for certain prior years which it now claimed the plaintiff was not entitled to. The lower court granted partial summary judgment for the federal government, finding that the plaintiff was collaterally estopped from asserting that the feed program regulations were violated because, in an earlier case in the Court of Claims, it had already been determined that ASCS officials had not violated the regulations. The lower court held, however, that ASCS actions could constitute intentional emotional distress apart from being a violation of the feed program regulations, and that these acts were not protected by the discretionary function exception to the Federal Tort Claims Act. This court vacated the lower court decision and remanded because it could not determine whether the last act of the continuing tortious activity complained of occurred within the statute of limitations for the Federal Tort Claims Act. The court also found that the discretionary function exception to the Federal Tort Claims Act did not bar the plaintiff's suit as the decision to drop him from the program was made at an operational level not a policy or planning level. Gross v. United States, 676 F.2d 295, 304, appeal after remand 723 F.2d 609 (8th Cir.1983).

C.A.8, 1981. Cit. in ftn. and subsec. (2) cit. and quot. in ftn. Action was brought against a religious foundation and its principals seeking to recover for alienation of the affections of the plaintiffs' son and for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The lower court granted that defendants' motion to dismiss and the plaintiffs appealed. This court stated that generally a parent has no right to recover for the alienation of a child's affection. The court also stated that the plaintiffs, in order to state a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, must show extreme and outrageous conduct, willfully or wantonly performed, which caused severe emotional distress. However, the court held that the plaintiffs' claims, even if they would otherwise be recognized, were barred by the applicable statute of limitations. The judgment of the lower court granting the defendants' motion to dismiss was affirmed. Orlando v. Alamo, 646 F.2d 1288, 1291.

C.A.8, 1976. Subsec. (1) quot. and fol. and coms. (d) and (h) quot. and fol. and com. (i) cit. in sup. A customer brought this action against a moving company, alleging that the company had inflicted emotional distress by repeatedly misrepresenting, for a period of over 100 days, the time when the customer's household goods would be delivered. The district court had entered summary judgment dismissing the complaint. On appeal, the defendant contended, inter alia, that as a matter of law, his conduct was not sufficiently outrageous to impose liability. In rejecting this argument and remanding for further proceedings, this court found that, in the absence of any explanation by the defendant, a reasonable jury could infer that the repeated misrepresentations were knowing falsehoods. Additionally, the court observed that a jury could find the likelihood that the plaintiff would suffer emotional distress was substantially certain, and, therefore, the defendant intended this result. It might also be inferred that the defendant realized at an early time that the plaintiff was experiencing distress from being deprived of her belongings, and that the repeated false assurances were made in reckless disregard of the plaintiff's emotional state. Hanke v. Global Van Lines, Inc., 533 F.2d 396, 399, 400.

C.A.9

C.A.9, 2016. Com. (j) cit. in case quot. in sup.; com. (f) quot. in sup. Student who had behavioral disabilities, and her parents, filed, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against school district and its employees, alleging that defendants failed to research and provide appropriate interventions and accommodations for student, attempted to restrain student, escorted student to an intervention room, and enlisted the assistance of a school security guard—an off-duty police officer—who ultimately restrained and arrested student. The district court granted summary judgment for defendants. This court affirmed in part, holding that there was no genuine issue of material fact as to whether defendants' conduct was extreme and outrageous. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comments f and j, the court noted that the determinations of whether a defendant's conduct was outrageous and whether a plaintiff's emotional distress was severe were affected by the defendant's knowledge that the plaintiff was particularly susceptible to emotional distress. A.G. v. Paradise Valley Unified School Dist. No. 69, 815 F.3d 1195, 1209.

C.A.9, 2007. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Former employee brought various claims against former supervisor and employer, alleging sexual harassment by supervisor. The district court granted summary judgment for defendants. Reversing and remanding plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against supervisor, this court held that a reasonable trier of fact could find that supervisor's actions, particularly in an employment context, rose to the level of extreme or outrageous conduct necessary to state such a claim under Arizona law, in light of plaintiff's allegations that supervisor repeatedly propositioned her both inside and outside of the office, and on one occasion followed her into a bathroom and waited for her to exit a toilet stall before grabbing her and sticking his tongue in her mouth. Craig v. M & O Agencies, Inc., 496 F.3d 1047, 1059.

C.A.9, 2007. Cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Mother of suspect who was shot and killed by police officer brought a state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), as part of her civil-rights action under § 1983, against city, county, and police officer. The district court granted summary judgment for defendants. Affirming, this court held that police officer's behavior could not have been outrageous, because officer acted in an objectively reasonable manner, and thus plaintiff's IIED claim failed. The court noted that, when fellow officers radioed that suspect was yelling threats at them and shooting at them, defendant officer, who had observed suspect's agitated behavior, saw him carrying a rifle, and knew that he had earlier that night shot at a car full of people, had probable cause to believe that suspect posed an immediate danger to those officers. Long v. City and County of Honolulu, 511 F.3d 901, 908.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.9, 2004. Com. (h) quot. in case cit. in disc. Employee terminated for violating employer's harassment policy sued employer for religious discrimination, constitutional violations, wrongful discharge, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court granted summary judgment for employer. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that employee's intentional-infliction-of-emotional-distress claim failed because employer's actions in terminating plaintiff without pay, accusing plaintiff of having performed an "exorcism," and accusing her of proselytizing and harassing a gay subordinate could not be regarded as so "extreme and outrageous" as to permit recovery. Bodett v. CoxCom, Inc., 366 F.3d 736, 747.

C.A.9, 2003. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. After a range fire that started on railroad's right-of-way destroyed two families' mobile homes and personal property, the two families sued railroad for negligence and negligent infliction of emotional distress. Montana federal district court entered judgment on jury verdict for plaintiffs. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that one of the families presented sufficient evidence to prove their claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress, as district court correctly allowed jury to determine whether family suffered distress so severe that no reasonable person could be expected to endure it. During trial, the jury heard extensive testimony from the family members about their emotional health. Turner v. Burlington Northern Santa Fe R. Co., 338 F.3d 1058, 1062.

C.A.9, 2002. Com. (d) quot. in sup. (Erron. cit. as § 46(d).) Airline ground personnel who were fired after they were involved in an accident that resulted in damage to an airplane sued airline for violations of federal and state employment discrimination laws and for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming the district court's grant of summary judgment for defendant, this court held, inter alia, that, even if defendant were liable for Title VII violations, its conduct in firing plaintiffs was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Villiarimo v. Aloha Island Air, Inc., 281 F.3d 1054, 1068.

C.A.9, 2000. Com. (b) quot. in case quot. in disc. After insurer withdrew its defense of insured real-estate developers in a construction-defect suit and refused to pay the resulting default judgment, developers sued insurer for bad-faith refusal to defend, seeking, in part, consequential damages for emotional distress. Affirming in part the district court's entry of judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiffs, this court held, inter alia, that, since there was evidence that plaintiffs suffered substantial financial loss, they were entitled, under California law, to recover damages for their emotional distress incident to defendant's bad-faith denial of coverage. Pershing Park Villas v. United Pacific Ins., 219 F.3d 895, 903.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.9, 1996. Com. (g) cit. in sup. Construction contractor's employee at electric utility's nuclear power plant was terminated after utility summarily barred him from its plant following its undercover investigation linking employee to conversations at the plant regarding an off-site drug transaction; employee sued utility for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. On remand, the district court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiff on his emotional distress claim and denied defendant's motion for judgment as a matter of law. Reversing in part, this court held that the district court erred in denying defendant's claim for judgment as a matter of law, since defendant did not assert in outrageous fashion or in bad faith its right to exclude plaintiff from its property but merely asked him to leave. Mathis v. Pacific Gas and Elec. Co., 75 F.3d 498, 505.

C.A.9, 1994. Cit. in sup. Plane owners who refused consent to warrantless seizure of logbooks were arrested and told that U.S. Customs seizure of plane included logbooks, which plaintiffs had removed. Although U.S. attorney advised Customs officers that his office would not prosecute, they continued bookings, telling plaintiffs that charges would be filed. Arrestees sued federal government for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. This court affirmed the district court's dismissal on ground of sovereign immunity to extent claim involved plane's seizure and prosecutorial decisions but reversed dismissal to extent claim involved arrests. Noting that Customs supervisor's admission of arresting plaintiffs because they "made us mad," along with plaintiffs' allegation that they were paraded handcuffed through airport lobby, created material fact issue whether Customs officers arrested plaintiffs intending to inflict emotional distress, the court held that, if plaintiffs could prove that intent, they could assert both false-arrest and emotional-distress claims. Gasho v. U.S., 39 F.3d 1420, 1434.

C.A.9, 1994. Quot. in sup., com. (e) cit. in sup. A female casino employee sued the casino for, among other claims, sexual harassment and intentional infliction of emotional distress, after her supervisor publicly humiliated her through crude sexually explicit remarks. The Nevada federal district court granted defendant summary judgment. Reversing and remanding, this court concluded, inter alia, that it was unprepared to hold as a matter of law that public humiliation of an employee by her employer, accomplished through rude, crude sexually explicit remarks and actions, could not constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress. Steiner v. Showboat Operating Co., 25 F.3d 1459, 1466, cert. denied 513 U.S. 1082, 115 S.Ct. 733, 130 L.Ed.2d 636 (1995).

C.A.9, 1993. Com. (d) quot. in part in disc. A former employee sued her employer and several individual coemployees, alleging sex and age discrimination. Affirming dismissal of the claims against the coemployees, this court held that liability did not extend to them. A claim for emotional distress damages from denial of unemployment benefits was time-barred under California law, but even if it were not, such a denial was a common business decision and was simply not outrageous conduct sufficient to support an emotional distress claim. Miller v. Maxwell's Intern., Inc., 991 F.2d 583, 586.

C.A.9, 1992. Com. (d) cit. in sup. A county employee sued the county and other employees for age and sex discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming the district court's dismissal, the court of appeals held that plaintiff's allegation of a co-worker's romantic involvement with a supervisor did not state a claim for "hostile work environment" sex discrimination, that the county's actions regarding plaintiff's overtime, job responsibility, job reclassification, and transfer were not due to age-based discrimination where the county had legitimate nondiscriminatory reasons for its actions, and that plaintiff had not alleged sufficiently extreme and outrageous conduct by defendants to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Candelore v. Clark County Sanitation Dist., 975 F.2d 588, 591.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.9, 1992. Com. (d) cit. and quot. in disc., com. (g) cit. in disc. Foreign seamen discharged in foreign ports sued the shipowners for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, after the shipowners told them to lie to their union about their substandard wages and noted in their seafarers' books that the seamen were discharged for requesting repatriation upon filing a wages claim to arrest the vessel. Washington federal district court entered judgment for seamen and Oregon federal district court entered judgment for shipowners. Upon consolidation, this court held, in part, that a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress could not lie where shipowners were legally entitled to record accurate statements as to the employees' performance and the reason for discharge. The court also found that the act of making the seamen lie to the union was not beyond all possible bounds of decency and utterly intolerable in a civilized society. Su v. M/V Southern Aster, 978 F.2d 462, 473, 474, cert. denied ___ U.S. ___, 113 S.Ct. 2331, 124 L.Ed.2d 244 (1993).

C.A.9, 1990. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. A boiler operator, who worked under a collective bargaining agreement (CBA), was transferred to a lower position and subsequently fired when his employer could no longer reasonably accommodate the employee's religious need to observe his sabbath. The employee sued the employer for, among other things, wrongful termination and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court granted the employer's motion for summary judgment holding that the claims were preempted by the statute of limitations of § 301 of the Labor Management Relations Act. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that § 301 preempted the plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because such a claim arose out of his discharge and the defendant's conduct leading up to it and would require the court to decide whether the discharge was justified under the terms of the CBA. The court would have to examine and interpret the terms of the CBA dealing with "just cause" discharge and loss of seniority rights to determine whether the defendant's behavior was extreme and outrageous. Cook v. Lindsay Olive Growers, 911 F.2d 233, 239.

C.A.9, 1990. Cit. in ftn. An army civilian employee who alleged that she was sexually harassed by her supervisor sued the government under the Federal Tort Claims Act for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. The district court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment. Reversing and remanding, this court held that the plaintiff's claim was not excluded as a matter of law from the Federal Tort Claims Act, since the conduct on which the plaintiff's claim relied did not involve a threat of imminent battery, an essential element of assault, which was excluded from the Federal Tort Claims Act. Sheehan v. U.S., 896 F.2d 1168, 1171, opinion amended 917 F.2d 424 (9th Cir.1990).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.9, 1989. Com. (d) quot. in disc. and in sup. A deputy's report of alleged violations of departmental rules and state criminal laws involving three co-workers led to a department-wide investigation. The deputy requested to be transferred to ensure his own safety, but the request was not honored. He sued the county and the deputy who authorized the investigation, claiming, inter alia, that the defendants' response to his whistle-blowing activities constituted an intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court awarded summary judgment to the defendants. Affirming, this court held in part that the plaintiff failed to prove that the defendants' actions were so extreme or outrageous as to cause the plaintiff severe emotional distress. The court stated that there was no evidence that the defendants acted to punish or retaliate against the plaintiff. In addition, a statement by a corrections officer that he wished he knew who had reported the violations because "his ass is grass" was a mere threat and was not made directly to the plaintiff. Thomas v. Douglas, 877 F.2d 1428, 1435.

C.A.9, 1985. Cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. The plaintiffs brought a federal claim under § 1983 for use of excessive force during their arrests and pendent state claims for assault and battery and intentional infliction of emotional distress against a sheriff's department for alleged intentional violation of their constitutional rights while they were being taken to jail. The court of appeals affirmed a jury verdict for the plaintiffs, holding that a violation of the Fourth Amendment may support a § 1983 claim despite the availability of state causes of action. The court noted that in an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, the defendant's conduct must have been extreme and outrageous in degree, and that there was ample evidence in the present case to go to the jury on this issue. Robins v. Harum, 773 F.2d 1004, 1010.

C.A.9, 1982. Cit. and quot. in sup. The plaintiff's barn was burned under circumstances indicating that the fire might have been set. The plaintiff told the fire marshall that he had had trouble with juveniles vandalizing his property. He also told the fire marshall and the defendant insurance company that the barn might have double coverage under policies he held with the defendant and another insurer. The defendant's adjuster did not look at the other policy, although offered, but reported the double coverage to the state police. The police suggested to the defendant that the plaintiff might be charged with arson and that a deposition would aid their investigation. The defendant's agent obtained a sworn statement from the plaintiff by assuring him that the information gathered would be used only to determine coverage. Thereafter, the defendant's attorney delivered a copy of the plaintiff's statement to the police. The police investigation terminated with the conclusion that there was insufficient evidence to charge the plaintiff with arson. The defendant knew this, but an agent of the defendant identified himself as a state policeman, questioned the plaintiff's neighbors concerning the fire, and implied that the plaintiff had set it. The defendant insurer then warned the plaintiff that if he pursued his claim, the defendant would have him charged with arson. After the plaintiff filed a claim, he was summoned before a grand jury; the grand jury refused to indict. The plaintiff eventually collected on the policy and sued the defendant for outrageous conduct, alleging severe emotional distress. The lower court awarded both general and punitive damages. The defendant argued on appeal, inter alia, that its conduct had not been outrageous. This court stated that Oregon recognized the tort of outrageous conduct as defined by the Restatement. The court found that the evidence supported the conclusion that the defendant had not acted reasonably for an insurer investigating a claim. Affirmed. Green v. State Farm Fire And Cas. Co., 667 F.2d 22, 23-24.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.9, 1972. Cit. and quot. in part but dist. Plaintiff sought to recover against an oil company for mental anguish when his car rolled into an intersection out of control after a service station attendant allegedly added something other than brake fluid to the braking system of plaintiff's car. The court held that plaintiff could not recover damages for mental anguish without bodily harm, or compensable damage flowing from emotional distress or contact between his car and another object, or without showing malice, intentional introduction of defective brake fluid, extreme and outrageous conduct, or conduct involving an unreasonable risk of causing distress. Wetzel v. Gulf Oil Corporation, 455 F.2d 857, 860, 861.

C.A.9, Bkrtcy.App.

C.A.9, Bkrtcy.App.2003. Cit. and quot. but dist., cit. in case quot. in disc., quot. in diss. op. Chapter 13 debtor sued creditor for willfully violating the automatic stay by obtaining a state judgment against it, asserting, in part, a claim for severe emotional distress. The bankruptcy court awarded emotional-distress damages and attorney's fees, but refused to award punitive damages. Vacating in part, this court remanded for a determination of whether debtor suffered a significant economic loss caused by the stay violation, and whether any loss he suffered caused him emotional injury. The dissent argued that emotional-distress damages could be awarded regardless of whether there was economic loss. In re Stinson, 295 B.R. 109, 121, 125.

C.A. 10,

C.A.10, 2016. Cit. in sup.; subsec. (1) cit. in case cit. in sup.; com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup.; coms. (e) and (f) cit. in sup. Former employee brought claims sounding in, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress against former employer in connection with allegations that he was repeatedly sexually harassed by various supervisors and co-workers over the eight years of his employment. The district court granted summary judgment for employer. This court reversed as to employee's emotional-distress claim and remanded, holding that reasonable persons could differ as to whether the alleged conduct was extreme and outrageous under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court pointed to evidence that employee's direct and indirect supervisors abused their power over employee, that the sexual harassment took place over a considerable period of time, that employee was the victim of unwelcome and non-negligible physical contact, and that employee's tormentors knew that he suffered from PTSD but targeted him anyway. Hansen v. SkyWest Airlines, 844 F.3d 914, 926-928.

C.A.10

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.10, 2007. Quot. in sup., cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (i) quot. in sup. Two former undercover police officers sued television station for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, after it broadcast their identities and undercover status in the context of their suspected involvement in an incident of sexual assault for which they were later cleared. The district court granted defendant's motion to dismiss. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that the mere broadcast of plaintiffs' identities and undercover status, as facts revealed in the course of accurate publication of newsworthy events, was not "so outrageous" as to be actionable under New Mexico law, even if defendant was aware that its actions could result in third parties making threats to plaintiffs. Alvarado v. KOB-TV, L.L.C., 493 F.3d 1210, 1222, 1224.

C.A.10, 2007. Coms. (e) and (j) quot. in conc. and diss. op. Husband and wife brought federal civil-rights action against police officers alleging, among other things, use of excessive force, after officers physically separated wife from her telephone, escorted her from her home, and kept her in a locked patrol car for nearly an hour in connection with the arrest of husband. The trial court, inter alia, denied defendants' motions for summary judgment asserting qualified immunity. This court affirmed. A concurring and dissenting opinion noted that the only injury alleged by wife was a temporary sense of intimidation and argued that, as with cases asserting intentional infliction of emotional distress, excessive-force claims asserting only nonphysical injury should only be available where outrageous conduct caused severe emotional distress. Cortez v. McCauley, 478 F.3d 1108, 1148.

C.A.10, 2007. Cit. and adopted in case cit. in sup., com. (h) cit. and quot. in sup. and adopted in case cit. in sup., com. (d) cit. and quot. in ftn. and quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee of oilfield equipment manufacturer brought Title VII claim alleging a racially hostile work environment against manufacturer, and an additional state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court granted summary judgment for defendant. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held that while there was a triable issue as to whether defendant created a racially hostile work environment under Title VII, the trial court did not err in concluding as a matter of law that plaintiff's supervisors' conduct, which included subjecting plaintiff to insults about his Mexican ancestry over a period of four years, was not sufficiently outrageous to sustain a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Herrera v. Lufkin Industries, Inc., 474 F.3d 675, 686-688.

C.A.10, 2006. Quot. in case quot. in sup. As part of a wider sexual-harassment suit, former college student sued former professor for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. After a jury found in favor of professor, the district court denied plaintiff's motions for judgment as a matter of law or for a new trial. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that a reasonable jury could have concluded that defendant's alleged conduct, including the fondling of plaintiff's breasts, was not extreme and outrageous or beyond all possible bounds of decency. The court noted, among other things, that plaintiff admitted that she never objected to defendant's conduct, that she voluntarily went to his office on a number of occasions, that she gave him back massages and a Valentine's Day card, that she consented to a "sternum adjustment," and that she remained in his office after the adjustment. Escue v. Northern OK College, 450 F.3d 1146, 1158.

C.A.10, 2005. Cit. in case cit. in sup., cit. and quot. in ftn., coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (i) quot. in sup. After prison inmate committed suicide by hanging himself, his estate and family sued government under Federal Tort Claims Act for intentional infliction of emotional distress. District court entered judgment on jury verdict for plaintiffs. This court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded, holding that, since district court did not make explicit findings as to severity of each plaintiff's emotional distress, remand was necessary. Plaintiffs proved elements of outrageousness and causation, in light of defendant's treatment of family, including initial nondisclosure of death's unusual circumstances and obstinacy as to authorization for autopsy. Estate of Trentadue ex rel. Aguilar v. U.S., 397 F.3d 840, 855, 856.

C.A.10, 2004. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Terminated police officer sued city, police union, and district attorney, alleging constitutional violations and intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Plaintiff alleged that, after he refused to sign a union letter of no confidence against the police chief, his office was ransacked, he was no longer allowed to work flexible hours, and he did not receive requested backup assistance during an incident involving gang members. District court granted defendants summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that police union's actions did not amount to intentional infliction of emotional distress, because none of the circumstance alleged by plaintiff remotely approached extreme conduct. Montgomery v. City of Ardmore, 365 F.3d 926, 942.

C.A.10, 2004. Cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (i) cit. in case quot. in sup. Supermarket employee sued employer for sexual harassment and retaliation, as well as store manager and another employee for extreme and outrageous conduct. The district court entered judgment in favor of employer and individual employees on the retaliation and conduct claims, but in favor of plaintiff on the sexual-harassment claim. This court reversed and remanded, holding, inter alia, that the conduct of the manager was so close to the bounds of decency that a jury should determine whether it constituted extreme and outrageous conduct designed to inflict severe emotional distress on plaintiff. Riske v. King Soopers, 366 F.3d 1085, 1089, 1090.

C.A.10, 2003. Cit. in case cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Parents of eight preschool children sued Head Start agency and others for constitutional violations and intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that their children were subjected to intrusive physical examinations, including genital examinations and blood tests, on school premises without parental notice or consent. District court granted defendants summary judgment. This court affirmed in part, holding, inter alia, that plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress failed, because defendants' actions did not rise to the requisite level of extreme outrageousness. Plaintiffs' own expert opined that the examinations did not go beyond the reasonable bounds of standard well-child examinations. Dubbs v. Head Start, Inc., 336 F.3d 1194, 1218, cert. denied 540 U.S. 1179, 124 S.Ct. 1411, 158 L.Ed.2d 79 (2004).

C.A.10, 2001. Com. (e) cit. in case quot. in disc. Patient sued dentist and dental assistant for negligence and intentional infliction of emotional distress, after allegedly suffering injuries during a dental procedure. The district court granted dental assistant judgment as a matter of law, but entered judgment on jury verdict in favor of patient against dentist. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that dentist's conduct, which included losing consciousness as many as 10 to 15 times during plaintiff's medical procedure, satisfied the standard of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Macsenti v. Becker, 237 F.3d 1223, 1242, cert. denied 533 U.S. 950, 121 S.Ct. 2593, 150 L.Ed.2d 752 (2001).

C.A.10, 2000. Cit. in case quot. in sup., subsec. (1) cit. in headnotes and quot. in sup., com. (j) cit. in headnote and quot. in case quot. in sup. After hoax victim whose business phone number was listed on an Internet bulletin board posting that announced the availability for sale of offensive T-shirts crudely referring to the Oklahoma City bombing received 80 angry, obscenity-laced phone calls, including death threats, he brought an action for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress against radio station whose talk-show host had urged listeners to call victim's phone number to express their opinions of the posting. The district court granted defendant summary judgment. Affirming in part, this court held, inter alia, that the emotional-distress claim failed because plaintiff failed to show that defendant behaved in an extreme and outrageous way toward him and that he suffered severe emotional distress. There was no evidence that the distress plaintiff suffered interfered with his ability to conduct his daily life affairs. Zeran v. Diamond Broadcasting, Inc., 203 F.3d 714, 720, 721.

C.A.10, 1999. Quot. in case cit. in disc. Delivery truck driver who was discharged for job abandonment after he failed to return to work following back surgery sued former employer for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court granted defendant summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that there was no evidence that employer engaged in extreme and outrageous conduct. Taylor v. Pepsi-Cola Co., 196 F.3d 1106, 1111.

C.A.10, 1998. Cit. in headnote, subsec. (1) quot. in case cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Insured bean farmer sued insurer for, inter alia, negligent misrepresentation, abuse of process, and intentional infliction of emotional distress after defendant refused to adjust plaintiff's crop loss at the 999-pound-per-acre figure allegedly agreed upon by the parties. The district court entered summary judgment for defendant. Affirming, this court held, in part, that defendant did not intend to supply the figure at issue for the guidance of plaintiff in his business, nor, given his actual production, could plaintiff claim a payable loss under his policy with this figure; that defendant did not commit an abuse of process by bringing suit to collect premium payments from plaintiff, a Wyoming resident, in Iowa, since such a course of action was company policy; and that defendant's actions did not rise to the level necessary to support recovery under a theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Meyer v. Conlon, 162 F.3d 1264, 1266, 1275.

C.A.10, 1995. Cit. in case cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Insured homeowners sued their insurer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that insurer should be held liable for the conduct of several guards, hired to conduct surveillance of plaintiffs' property, who allegedly shot plaintiffs' pet dog. District court entered judgment on jury verdict for plaintiffs. This court reversed, holding that there was insufficient evidence for a reasonable jury to hold insurer responsible for the guards' conduct under the doctrines of principal-agent liability. Noting that the alleged surveillance, by itself, could not be considered outrageous as a matter of law, the court stated that only by considering both the surveillance and the shooting of plaintiffs' dog could the alleged conduct be regarded as sufficiently outrageous to submit the tort claim to the jury. Clark v. Brien, 59 F.3d 1082, 1086, cert. denied 516 U.S. 1084, 116 S.Ct. 800, 133 L.Ed.2d 747 (1996).

C.A.10, 1995. Cit. in headnote, quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (j) quot. in sup. Store manager whose employment was terminated during the store's investigation of an alleged petty-cash shortfall sued the store for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, arising from her confrontation with the store's employee conducting the investigation. Affirming in part the district court's grant of summary judgment for defendant, this court held, inter alia, that the investigator's behavior did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to sustain an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, since plaintiff acknowledged that the meeting did not last long and that she felt free to interrupt the confrontation twice and since the investigator's questions, while loud and pointed, and his alleged physical conduct in touching her arm and pushing her back in her chair did not cross the bounds between what was merely objectionable and what was actionable. Starr v. Pearle Vision, Inc., 54 F.3d 1548, 1550, 1558.

C.A.10, 1994. Cit. in case cit. in sup. An African-American electrician sued his former employer for employment discrimination and the tort of outrage. District court granted defendant summary judgment. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state a viable outrage claim because the conduct of plaintiff's co-workers was not so extreme and outrageous as to permit recovery. Although plaintiff was called a variety of rude or vulgar names, he was not alone in facing such insults; almost everyone in the shop was called such names and similarly badgered. Bolden v. PRC Inc., 43 F.3d 545, 554.

C.A.10, 1994. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in ftn. (Erron. cit. as com. (d) to § 49.) Residents who had lived across a road from a waferboard-manufacturing plant sued the plant, asserting negligence and common-law nuisance claims arising from noise and various substances that were atmospherically transported to their property. The district court entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding plaintiffs compensatory and punitive damages. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that, under Colorado law, defendant was not entitled to dismissal of the punitive damages claim following dismissal of a claim for the tort of outrageous conduct, as the standard for awarding punitive damages was not the same as that for the tort of outrageous conduct. Orjias v. Stevenson, 31 F.3d 995, 1012, cert. denied 513 U.S. 1000, 115 S.Ct. 511, 130 L.Ed.2d 418 (1994).

C.A.10, 1992. Cit. in disc., cit. in diss. op., quot. in ftn. to diss. op., subsecs. (1), (2), coms. (d), (e), (h), (i), (j), illus. 15, 16, and 1966 Appendix at 48 cit. in diss. op. Employee sued employer and co-worker for intentional or reckless infliction of emotional distress when co-worker used racial slurs against plaintiff while he was not present and plaintiff heard about the slurs through other workers. This court reversed and remanded the district court's finding for plaintiff, holding that because statements were not made directly to plaintiff, co-worker was not liable. The court reasoned that there was little probability that plaintiff would hear of slurs because they were made in confidence; hence, conduct was not outrageous or reckless. A dissent argued that co-worker was reckless in making frequent slurs against plaintiff to other workers, increasing the probability that plaintiff would discover insults; moreover, common law did not support majority's requirement that plaintiff be present when slurs were made. Bouie v. Autozone, Inc., 959 F.2d 875, 878, 880-883.

C.A.10, 1992. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup. At-will employee sued his former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, after he was terminated without notice and was told by the employer not to seek other employment. Employee alleged discrimination on the basis of his handicap, multiple sclerosis. The district court granted employer summary judgment. This court reversed in part and remanded on other grounds but affirmed summary judgment for employer on the claim for emotional distress. It said that plaintiff had not provided evidence showing defendant's conduct to be extreme; moreover, plaintiff admitted in his testimony that the conduct was not outrageous. The court also noted that employer terminated plaintiff due to concerns for his safety in light of his deteriorating physical condition. Katzer v. Baldor Elec. Co., 969 F.2d 935, 939.

C.A.10, 1991. Subsec. (1) cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. and cit. in ftn., com. (h) cit. in disc., coms. (j) and (k) quot. in disc. An employee resigned from his job, alleging that his employer discriminated against him due to his Iranian national origin, by calling him derogatory names, compelling him to terminate his Iranian subordinates, and accusing him of criminal acts. The employee sued his former employer for several claims including federal civil rights violations and intentional infliction of emotional distress. After a bench trial, the Oklahoma federal district court ruled for the employer. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that the employee's assertions of discrimination were legally inadequate to meet the narrow standard of extreme and outrageous conduct, and that the evidence as to the severity of his emotional distress was legally insufficient under Oklahoma law. The court reasoned that mere insults were not actionable under the intentional infliction of emotional distress tort, and that the distress of anxiety and a sick stomach was not of such a character that no reasonable person could be expected to endure it. Daemi v. Church's Fried Chicken, Inc., 931 F.2d 1379, 1387, 1389.

C.A.10, 1991. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Alleging violation of the Colorado Auto Accident Reparations Act (CAARA), bad faith breach of contract, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, a passenger injured in an automobile accident sued the driver's insurance company when the insurance company failed to pay statutorily mandated personal injury protection benefits. The district court dismissed the bad faith claim, directed a verdict for the insurance company on the issue of intentional infliction of emotional distress, and entered judgment on a jury verdict for the plaintiff on her CAARA claims. Affirming in part and reversing and remanding in part, this court held, inter alia, that while the insurance company's refusal to make payments within the statutorily required 30 days and derogatory remarks made by an insurance agent concerning the plaintiff's gender and American Indian heritage were inconsiderate and unkind, they were not extreme and outrageous conduct sufficient to create a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Wilson v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 934 F.2d 261, 266.

C.A.10, 1990. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. An employee was terminated by a newly appointed supervisor for alleged insubordination and poor communication skills. The employee sued his employer for violating the Age Discrimination in Employment Act, breach of employment contract, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. He also sued the supervisor for emotional distress damages and she counterclaimed, alleging emotional distress damages and prima facie tort. The district court granted summary judgment dismissing all of the claims. Affirming, this court held, inter alia: 1) the employee had not shown that the reasons for his dismissal were pretextual, from which a jury could infer age discrimination; 2) the employee was an at-will employee with no contractual rights; 3) the employee and the supervisor were involved in an ordinary employer-employee conflict incapable of supporting the emotional distress claims; and 4) the state of Oklahoma would not extend a prima facie tort action to private sex discrimination between co-workers. The court indicated that the parties' allegations of insubordination, yelling, cursing, criticizing, hostile reactions, and the hurt feelings naturally accompanying such conduct did not give rise to a cause for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Merrick v. Northern Natural Gas Co., 911 F.2d 426, 432.

C.A.10, 1989. Com. (b) quot. in case cit. in sup. An engineer was recruited by an Oklahoma company to work for an Italian corporation. In Italy the engineer was injured during a work-related car trip. He was unable to obtain workers' compensation benefits from his employer, consulted an attorney, and was fired shortly thereafter. He sued, inter alia, the recruiting company, its insurer, and the Italian corporation for breach of contract, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and wrongful discharge. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment on the emotional distress count. Affirming, this court said that the employer's conduct in handling the workers' compensation claim and in discharging the plaintiff while he was in the hospital did not, as a matter of law, constitute outrageous behavior, especially where the employer paid the plaintiff's medical expenses. Pytlik v. Professional Resources, Ltd., 887 F.2d 1371, 1379.

C.A.10, 1988. Cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (e) cit. in ftn. Two former employees sued their former employer for age discrimination and for intentional infliction of emotional distress after their positions were eliminated. The trial court granted the employees' claim for the intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court reversed, holding that the trial court should have directed a verdict for the employer on the claim for emotional distress. The court reasoned that there was insufficient evidence for a jury to find that the employer had exceeded the requisite threshold of liability for the intentional infliction of emotional distress; the plaintiffs had alleged nothing more than age discrimination, the manner of discharge had not been particularly unfair or abusive, and outrageous conduct by the employer had not been established. Grandchamp v. United Air Lines, Inc., 854 F.2d 381, 383, 384, cert. denied 489 U.S. 1080, 109 S.Ct. 1534, 103 L.Ed.2d 838 (1989).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.10, 1988. Subsec. (1) cit. in disc. The brother of a decedent sued the beneficiary of the decedent's will, the attorney who drafted the will, and a brokerage firm for, inter alia, intentional interference with inheritance and intentional infliction of emotional distress, based on allegedly fraudulent stock transfers. The trial court granted summary judgment to the attorney and the brokerage firm on all claims. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that the plaintiff could not bring the claim for intentional interference with inheritance because he had no prospect of inheriting the transferred stock, and that neither the attorney's drafting the will nor the brokerage firm's transferring the stock pursuant to a letter apparently signed by the owner of the stock was conduct sufficiently extreme or outrageous to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. McKibben v. Chubb, 840 F.2d 1525, 1532.

C.A.10, 1987. Com. (h) cit. in case quot. in disc. In an effort to repossess a computer pursuant to a state court order, certain members of a city police department made a warrantless search of the home and office of a married couple. The couple sued the individual members of the police department, alleging, inter alia, that the officers' illegal search amounted to outrageous conduct and therefore the couple was entitled to punitive damages. The trial court entered a judgment on a jury verdict that found the defendants liable for the outrageous conduct claim and awarded the plaintiffs punitive damages. Affirming, this court held that the evidence was sufficient to support the jury's finding and punitive damages award. The court stated that, where reasonable men may differ, it was for the jury to determine whether the defendant's conduct was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to result in liability. Specht v. Jensen, 832 F.2d 1516, 1525.

C.A.10, 1984. Cit. in disc., com. (d) cit. in disc. A stepson sued in a diversity action individuals who had brought a conservatorship action against his stepfather and a number of individuals who had managed his stepfather's financial affairs. The district court dismissed the action for failure to state a claim. This court affirmed. The court noted that, while the tort of intentional or reckless infliction of emotional distress is recognized in Colorado, the stepson had not alleged outrageous conduct by the defendants sufficient to support a claim for relief on that theory. Swanson v. Bixler, 750 F.2d 810, 814, 815.

C.A.10, 1983. Cit. and quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case cit. in sup., coms. (f), (i), and (j) cit. in sup., coms. (h) and (i) quot. in case quot. in sup., subsec. (2) cit. in disc., illus. 9-13, 15, and 16 cit. in sup. The plaintiff, an illiterate Korean woman, commenced this action as the result of transactions between her husband and an account executive of the defendant investment company. The transactions were related to an account with the defendant which was solely in the plaintiff's name; they resulted in a loss of $30,000 to the account. The plaintiff alleged, inter alia, that the defendant's actions in making unauthorized transfers in her account constituted an intentional infliction of emotional distress because the loss of her savings threw the plaintiff into a deep depression which rendered her temporarily infertile and caused her to become a religious fanatic. The trial court entered judgment awarding the plaintiff $1,030,000 as compensatory damages and $3,000,000 as punitive damages. On appeal, the court examined the evidence in the case: the account executive avoided consulting the plaintiff before making unauthorized transactions in her account, knowing that such transactions were directly contrary to her wishes; he convinced her husband to misrepresent the facts to her and used the husband as a pawn, knowing that the plaintiff insisted on having the account in her name alone because of her husband's gullibility; the account executive continued to suggest high-risk investment decisions to the husband, knowing that the plaintiff was concerned with financial security; finally, even when the account showed a $30,000 loss, the executive persisted in trying to conduct other transactions with what remained of the plaintiff's savings. The court held that this evidence was sufficient to submit the case to the jury on a theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court pointed out that although the plaintiff's reaction was somewhat extreme, it could not find as a matter of law that the evidence was wholly insufficient for the jury to find the defendant liable for the injury to the plaintiff. The judgment was affirmed, provided that the plaintiff accepted a reduction in the punitive damages award to $1,000,000. Malandris v. Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith, 703 F.2d 1152, 1158, 1159, 1165, 1166, certiorari denied 464 U.S. 824, 104 S.Ct. 92, 78 L.Ed.2d 99 (1983).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.10, 1982. Cit. in sup., com. (d), illus. 1 cit. in disc. The plaintiff was a 21-year-old man who joined a religious cult in Oklahoma. His father obtained a court order giving him temporary guardianship over the plaintiff, and hired professional deprogrammers to attempt to induce the plaintiff to leave the cult. The deprogrammers held the plaintiff in a motel room for a week where he alleged that he suffered various abuses. The plaintiff brought an action against the deprogrammers, alleging, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court directed a verdict for the defendants on that claim because the judge did not think that deprogramming per se was sufficient to constitute the outrageous conduct as required in the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. On appeal, this court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that under the facts of the case, the issue of whether the defendants' conduct had been significantly extreme and outrageous enough to result in liability should have been submitted to the jury. Taylor v. Gilmartin, 686 F.2d 1346, 1353, 1354, certiorari denied 459 U.S. 1147, 103 S.Ct. 788, 74 L.Ed.2d 994 (1983), rehearing denied 463 U.S. 1249, 104 S.Ct. 37, 77 L.Ed.2d 1456 (1983).

C.A.10, 1979. Subsec. (1) cit. in disc. Plaintiff physician brought action against a former patient who had brought a medical malpractice suit against him, claiming negligence in prosecution, abuse of process, invasion of privacy, and wanton misconduct in filing suit. The underlying malpractice action had not been disposed of at the time plaintiff filed his suit. The trial court dismissed, ruling that there was no recognizable negligence tort which arose from prosecuting a lawsuit, that plaintiff failed to set forth a legal cause of action for abuse of process, and that the claim sounding in invasion of privacy was not cognizable under the law of Kansas. The claim alleging wanton behavior was also summarily dismissed, and plaintiff appealed dismissal of all four claims. In regard to the complaint for invasion of privacy, the court stated that, under Kansas law, such action may have elements in common with that for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court noted, however, that, in the situation here, there was no conduct so outrageous in character or extreme in degree to satisfy the elements of that tort, and, therefore, the trial court properly dismissed the claim. Regarding the other claims, the court held that the rulings of the trial court were correct and, accordingly, affirmed the judgment. Tappen v. Ager, 599 F.2d 376, 381.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.10, 1968. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup. The plaintiff members of the family of a passenger who was killed on an airplane of the defendant when the plane crashed not only successfully sued the defendant for the decedent's wrongful death, but also sought to recover for emotional distress inflicted upon them by the defendant's agents for (1) failing to identify the decedent as a passenger and repeatedly suggesting that she may have gone off with a man somewhere and missed the flight; (2) failing to inform them promptly that the decedent was aboard; and (3) retaining the decedent's body for 27 hours. The court affirmed a dismissal of the last two claims, but remanded a dismissal of the first claim because the record did not provide sufficient factual background to permit a determination as to whether the conduct of the defendant's agents was outrageous under the circumstances. Wood v. United Air Lines, Inc., 404 F.2d 162,165.

C.A.11

C.A.11, 2021. Cit. in case cit. in sup.; com. (d) cit. in case cit. in sup. Passengers of a cruise liner brought a putative class action against cruise operator, alleging, inter alia, that defendant negligently inflicted severe emotional distress on plaintiffs when they canceled a voyage due to an approaching hurricane on the day the ship was to set sail, resulting in plaintiffs being forced to travel to the ship and endure the hurricane in order to avoid preemptively canceling the trip themselves and suffering financial losses. The district court rejected a magistrate judge's report and recommendation and dismissed plaintiffs' action sua sponte. This court reversed and remanded, holding that the district court erred in failing to consider whether it had maritime jurisdiction over the action. In considering whether federal law recognized a claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress in maritime actions, the court noted that federal maritime law recognized claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. McIntosh v. Royal Caribbean Cruises Ltd., 5 F.4th 1309, 1315.

C.A.11,

C.A.11, 2015. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. and quot. in sup. Arrestee brought a claim for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress against officer who arrested him while he was wearing a towel wrapped around his waist, alleging that, although the towel fell off while he was walking from his apartment to the police car, officer refused to allow anyone to bring him clothes until after he reached the police station. The district court granted summary judgment for officer. Affirming, this court held that, even if officer's actions in forcing arrestee to be naked and refusing to allow him to put on clothing were extreme and outrageous, arrestee failed to show that he suffered severe emotional distress as a result of officer's actions, as required to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Moore v. Pederson, 806 F.3d 1036, 1053.

C.A.11, 2015. Coms. (d) and (e) quot. in case quot. in sup. Arrestee filed, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against deputy sheriff who arrested plaintiff in response to a breach-of-the-peace call, alleging that he was wearing only a towel when he was arrested, he dropped his towel during the walk from his apartment to the patrol car and was not permitted to retrieve it, and he was not provided with clothing until after he was taken to the police station and booked. The district court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding that defendant failed to state a claim for IIED. The court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comments d and e, for an explanation of the claim's outrageous-conduct element, but explained that it did not need to determine if the plaintiff made such as showing, because plaintiff failed to show that he suffered severe emotional distress as a result of defendant's actions. Moore v. Pederson, 801 F.3d 1325, 1335.

C.A.11, 2012. Cit. and quot. in sup., adopted in case cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. and cit. in ftn., coms. (e) and (f) cit. in ftn. and cit. in case cit. in ftn. Hispanic male customer brought a § 1981 claim and a state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against store and its white female cashier, alleging that cashier refused to serve him based on his race and publicly humiliated him by turning him away from her register in a loud and rude tone of voice. The district court granted defendants' motion to dismiss. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that, although reprehensible, cashier's alleged conduct—verbal abuse that did not involve any obscenities, racial epithets, or threats of violence—did not meet the extremely high standard required to state a claim for IIED under Florida law. Lopez v. Target Corp., 676 F.3d 1230, 1236, 1237.

C.A.11

C.A.11, 2005. Quot. in case cit. in disc. Passenger sued airline for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that a male airline employee made sexually explicit comments towards her when she was asked to remove batteries from a vibrating sex toy in her checked luggage, causing other male employees to laugh. The trial court dismissed this claim for failure to state a cause of action. Affirming, this court held that airline employee's alleged comments and gesture of licking his lips, while distasteful, were insufficient to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, which, under Florida law, required more than a showing of insults and indignities. Koutsouradis v. Delta Air Lines, Inc., 427 F.3d 1339, 1344.

C.A.11, 1996. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. After an employee of a pulp and paper plant told his supervisor of toxic chemical overexposure of employees, employee suffered continuous harassment, threats of termination, humiliation, supervisory indifference, and malicious discharge. Employee sued employer for, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress. District court denied employer's motion for summary judgment on the emotional distress claim, stating that an employer's threats and retaliatory activities satisfied the requisite element of outrageousness supportive of a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court affirmed, holding that employee stated an emotional-distress claim. Harris v. Procter & Gamble Cellulose Co., 73 F.3d 321, 323.

C.A.11, 1994. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. After disgruntled investors sent principal of general partner of limited partnership in which investors owned interests a demand letter threatening to file a lawsuit against principal implicating him in fraudulent practices unless he paid them $75,000, plus accrued interest, principal sued investors for libel and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming in part the district court's grant of summary judgment for defendants, this court held, inter alia, that, as a matter of law, plaintiff failed to show that defendants' conduct rose to the level of outrageousness and egregiousness necessary to sustain a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Hammer v. Slater, 20 F.3d 1137, 1144.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.11, 1993. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employees sued their employer alleging that they were discharged in violation of ERISA; one employee also alleged that his involuntary early retirement violated the Age Discrimination in Employment Act and constituted intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court granted summary judgment to the employer on all claims. Affirming as to all claims except the ADEA claim, this court held, inter alia, that, under Georgia law, forcing an employee to retire early was not such extreme and outrageous conduct as would support a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Clark v. Coats & Clark, Inc., 990 F.2d 1217, 1229.

C.A.11, 1993. Com. (d) quot. in conc. and diss. op., coms. cit. generally in ftn. to conc. and diss. op. Black former telephone company employee brought suit for employment discrimination against her former employer and asserted a state law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court affirmed the district court's order directing a verdict for defendant on the state law claim. The concurring and dissenting opinion argued that the case should be remanded for retrial of the state law claim on the ground that disputed facts existed, requiring the jury to decide whether defendant's conduct was outrageous enough to rise to the level required by the tort. Vance v. Southern Bell Tel. & Tel. Co., 983 F.2d 1573, 1581, 1583, cert. denied ___ U.S. ___, 115 S.Ct. 1110, 130 L.Ed.2d 1075 (1995).

C.A.11, 1991. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. and cit. generally in sup. A supervisor at a manufacturing plant was the subject of rumors alleging that he was a homosexual, was sexually promiscuous, used or sold drugs, and harassed or physically fondled female employees at the plant. The supervisor sued, among others, the manufacturer, alleging excessive publication of rumors by company representatives and failure of the manufacturer to take corrective action once company officials were made aware of the rumors. The district court entered an order of summary judgment for the manufacturer and dismissed the action. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that the reported omissions of the manufacturer fell far below the level of outrageous conduct necessary to maintain an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, especially since the supervisor was never discharged or disciplined. The court stated that the alleged failure of the manufacturer to investigate the rumors in a complete and timely fashion constituted mere negligence at most. Martin v. Baer, 928 F.2d 1067, 1073, 1074.

C.A.11, 1990. Cit. in case cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Relatives of a serviceman shot down in Vietnam sued the United States for intentional infliction of emotional distress under the Federal Tort Claims Act after it allegedly falsely identified the man's remains, improperly issued an ultimatum about burial of the remains, and refused to return the man's name to unaccounted-for status after rescinding his identification. The district court granted the plaintiffs' motion for partial summary judgment. This court reversed and remanded, holding that the government's conduct was neither intentional nor outrageous. The court found no evidence that the government's acts in identifying, classifying, or attempting to bury the remains were done with the knowledge that they would cause the plaintiffs severe distress. Hart v. U.S., 894 F.2d 1539, 1548, certiorari denied 498 U.S. 980, 111 S.Ct. 509, 112 L.Ed.2d 521 (1990).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.11, 1990. Coms. (d) and (e) quot. in cases quot. in disc. A landlord was arrested for continuing to lease a unit in a shopping center after becoming aware that the leased property was being used for prostitution. Continuing to lease the property with such knowledge violated a state statute. The charge against the landlord was eventually nolle prossed because the landlord agreed to testify in a felony case against the lessee and because the operation on the leased premises was being closed down. The landlord subsequently brought this action against the county sheriff and three sheriff's deputies who were present when he was arrested, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. The district court denied the defendants' motions for directed verdict and for judgment n.o.v. Reversing, this court held that the district court erred in denying the defendants' motions, stating that the defendants did not act unreasonably in arresting the plaintiff for violating the statute and that a reasonable jury could not have found that the defendants' conduct was legally impermissible or was otherwise so extreme and indecent as to warrant tort damages under Florida law. Von Stein v. Brescher, 904 F.2d 572, 584.

C.A.11, 1986. Quot. in case quot. in disc. After two individuals were injured in a collision with a vehicle owned by a city, the injured individuals sued the city and its insurer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that the insurer had misrepresented the limits of its liability under the insured's policy. The trial court dismissed the plaintiffs' claim and entered judgment in favor of the defendants. Affirming, this court held that as a matter of law the facts alleged did not constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court stated that the insurer could not be held liable for simply honoring its duty to defend its insured against claims that obviously exceeded policy limits. Davis v. Travelers Indem. Co. of America, 800 F.2d 1050, 1054.

C.A.11, 1982. Coms. (g) and (d) cit. in disc. The administratrix of an employee's estate brought an action against the decedent's employer for an alleged “tort of outrage” arising from the arbitrary reduction of the employee's monthly disability pay. The jury found for the plaintiff; the employer appealed from the trial court's denial of his motion for a judgment n.o.v. The appellate court reasoned that a “tort of outrage” existed when an individual's conduct went beyond all bounds of decency and resulted in severe emotional distress to another. The court affirmed the lower court's holding, reasoning that the defendant's behavior constituted the “extreme conduct” anticipated by the tort. Holmes v. Oxford Chemicals, Inc. Etc., 672 F.2d 854, 857.

C.A.D.C.

C.A.D.C.2021. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup.; com. (j) quot. in sup. United States citizen who was arrested by agents of the Islamic Republic of Iran and held hostage for 100 days sued Iran under the "state sponsors of terrorism" exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, seeking to hold it liable for torture, hostage taking, assault, battery, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and false imprisonment. After Iran failed to appear or respond, this court granted plaintiff's motion for a default judgment, holding that plaintiff sufficiently proved theories of liability found in well-established principles of law in support of her claims under the Act. The court reasoned, in part, that plaintiff established that defendant's agents intentionally inflicted emotional distress upon her within the meaning of Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Saberi v. Government of Islamic Republic of Iran, 541 F.Supp.3d 67, 82.

C.A.D.C.2019. Cit. in case quot. in sup. (general cite); subsec. (2)(a) cit. in case cit. in sup. American victims of terrorist bombings of U.S. embassies and victims' family members brought a lawsuit under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act against the Republic of Sudan, alleging that defendant was liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), because it materially supported the terrorist organizations responsible for the bombings. The district court entered judgment for plaintiffs. After certifying a question to state court, this court affirmed, holding that the state court's interpretation of Restatement Second of Torts § 46, which permitted family members of bombing victims to pursue IIED claims despite not being physically present at the bombings, did not violate the Act's non-discrimination principle that required foreign states to be held no more liable than a private individual would under like circumstances. The court explained that the state court's construction of § 46 relied on reasoning that applied equally to state actors and non-state actors, because it provided exceptions to the physical-presence requirement for claims against non-state actors. Owens v. Republic of Sudan, 924 F.3d 1256, 1258, 1259.

C.A.D.C.2017. Cit. and quot. in sup. and in cases cit. in sup.; caveat and com. (l) quot. in sup., cit. in cases cit. in sup. Victims of U.S. embassy bombings brought an action against Republic of Sudan and Islamic Republic of Iran, asserting jurisdiction under the terrorism exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act based on allegations that defendants provided material support to a terrorist organization, and alleging, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). The district court denied Sudan's motion to vacate a default judgment entered against it. This court affirmed in part and vacated in part, and certified to the D.C. Court of Appeals the question of whether the presence requirement set forth in Restatement Second of Torts § 46 would preclude recovery for an IIED claim arising from a terrorist attack where the claimant was not present at the scene. The court analyzed § 46's presence requirement, noting that D.C. courts had applied § 46 in limiting recovery to the immediate family of a victim physically injured or killed, and pointed out that § 46's Caveat and Comment l left open the possibility of a situation where presence was not required. Owens v. Republic of Sudan, 864 F.3d 751, 807, 810-812.

C.A.D.C.2015. Com. (d) cit. in sup., com. (k) quot. in sup. Veteran brought an action against the United States, seeking damages under the Federal Tort Claims Act for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), alleging that the Department of Veterans Affairs (VA), through the doctrine of respondeat superior, was liable for the actions of, among others, VA police officers, who used excessive force and injured plaintiff while attempting to remove him from a group-therapy session for veterans. The district court granted summary judgment for defendant. Reversing in part, this court held that questions of material fact remained as to whether plaintiff's arrest was effectuated with reasonable force, noting that a serious case of excessive force could constitute outrageous behavior such that it satisfied an IIED claim. The court reasoned that plaintiff's allegations that he endured multiple hospital visits for a fractured rib and other injuries, that he suffered substantial trauma, and that his existing post-traumatic stress disorder was aggravated as a result of the incident were potentially sufficient to establish severe emotional distress under the standard set out in Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Harris v. U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs, 776 F.3d 907, 916, 917.

C.A.D.C.2014. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Parties who opposed construction of an Islamic community center near the site of the September 11th terrorist attacks brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, against a proponent of the center and proponent's attorney, alleging that statements made in proponent's motion to dismiss an underlying action brought against him by plaintiffs, and in attorney's affidavit in that action, were defamatory. This court granted defendants' special motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiffs failed to show that they were likely to succeed on the merits of their IIED claim. Quoting Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, the court explained that plaintiffs needed to show that defendants' conduct was extreme and outrageous, beyond the mere insults present in this case. Forras v. Rauf, 39 F.Supp.3d 45, 56.

C.A.D.C.2007. Adopted in cases quot. in sup., subsec. (2) quot. in sup. As part of their § 1983 action for false arrest and malicious prosecution, arrestee and his wife brought a common-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against the District of Columbia and three police officers. After the jury returned a verdict finding the District liable but the officers not liable on the emotional-distress claim, the district court denied defendants' motion for judgment as a matter of law on that claim as to wife. Reversing with respect to wife's claim and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that wife could not recover under District of Columbia tort law because she was not physically present when the allegedly extreme and outrageous conduct—the filing of a false and misleading affidavit and possible evidence tampering—took place. Pitt v. District of Columbia, 491 F.3d 494, 507.

C.A.D.C.2004. Cit. in case cit. in disc. Adult children and siblings of former hostage of terrorist group that was an agent of Iran's Ministry of Information and Security brought suit for intentional infliction of emotional distress and loss of solatium against government of Iran under terrorist exception to Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act. The district court dismissed plaintiffs' claims, holding, in part, that a third-party claimant had to be present at the scene of victim's torment to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming and remanding, this court held that neither the terrorist exception, which waived a foreign state's immunity without creating a cause of action against it, nor the Flatow Amendment, which provided a private right of action against only officials, employees, and agents of a foreign state, nor the two considered in tandem, created a private right of action against a foreign government. Cicippio-Puleo v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 353 F.3d 1024, 1029.

C.A.D.C.2003. Cit. and quot. in sup., subsec. (1) cit. and quot. in sup., subsecs. (2) and (2)(a) cit. in sup., subsec. (2)(b) cit. in disc., coms. (b) and (c) quot. in sup., com. (l) quot. in sup., caveat quot. in sup. Priest was held hostage by terrorist organization in Lebanon for 564 days and then suffered physically and emotionally for years. After his death, his estate, siblings, and nieces and nephews sued government of Iran for intentional infliction of emotional distress for providing support to terrorist organization. District court awarded damages to estate and siblings, but rejected claims of nieces and nephews. This court affirmed, holding that nieces and nephews could not recover, since they were not direct victims or immediate family members. Bettis v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 315 F.3d 325, 327, 331, 333-338.

C.A.D.C.2002. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Former President's alleged mistress, whose attempt to publish "semiautobiographical" novel based on her relationship with President was allegedly stymied by President and his agents, sued President and agents for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, after President's attorney stated in the media that litigation against President by another purported mistress, as well as statements by witnesses in that case, including plaintiff, were scurrilous, salacious, a web of deceit and distortion, and "garbage." District court dismissed plaintiff's claims. This court affirmed dismissal of emotional-distress claim, holding, inter alia, that attorney's statements did not go beyond all possible bounds of decency. Furthermore, alleged threats by former Deputy White House Counsel did not amount to conduct utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Browning v. Clinton, 292 F.3d 235, 248.

C.A.D.C.1998. Quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. and quot. in case quot. in disc. Automobile passenger was arrested when she refused police officer's order to remain in the car while he administered sobriety test to driver; she sued city and officer for, inter alia, violations of her Fourth Amendment rights and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court entered summary judgment for defendants. Affirming, this court held, in part, that it was reasonable for officer to order plaintiff to stay in the car in order to maintain control of the situation, and therefore he did not violate her Fourth Amendment rights, and that officer's alleged actions in threatening to arrest plaintiff, yelling at her, and detaining her for an unnecessarily long period of time were not sufficiently extreme and outrageous as to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Rogala v. District of Columbia, 161 F.3d 44, 58.

C.A.D.C.1990. Quot. in case cit. in disc. An airline passenger who missed his appointment because the plane was delayed on the runway for three hours prior to takeoff sued the airline for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, after the pilot refused to grant his request to deplane. The district court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment on the ground that the plaintiff failed to establish specific facts showing a genuine issue of fact to be tried. This court affirmed, holding that no reasonable juror would find that the pilot's refusal of the plaintiff's request constituted outrageous behavior or behavior that was so extreme as to go beyond all bounds of decency. Abourezk v. New York Airlines, Inc., 895 F.2d 1456, 1459.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.A.D.C.1987. Com. (d) quot. in disc. A blind attorney who had been denied a seat in the emergency exit row of an airplane by the airline sued the airline under the Rehabilitation Act, the Federal Aviation Act, and the United States Constitution and alleged that the airline had committed the tort of outrage and breached its contract of transportation. The trial court granted summary judgment for the airline. Affirming, this court held that the trial court correctly concluded that the plaintiff failed to state a relievable claim under any of the asserted theories. The court stated that the trial court properly found that the plaintiff had not alleged facts sufficient to show that the airline's conduct was so atrocious or intolerable as to constitute a tort of outrage. Anderson v. USAir, Inc., 818 F.2d 49, 56.

C.A.D.C.1986. Com. (e) quot. in sup. The plaintiffs sued policemen, a police chief, and a municipality for intentional infliction of mental distress, among other constitutional and common law tort claims, alleging that the police officers deliberately made false reports of criminal activity on the part of the plaintiffs. The trial court denied the defendants' motion for a directed verdict on the claim for emotional distress. Although this court reversed the trial court's decisions on the other claims, it affirmed the denial of the directed verdict, holding that an abuse of a position of authority, particularly by a police officer could constitute outrageous conduct and that it was for a jury to gauge whether the police in this case had acted so egregiously, intentionally, or recklessly as to cause the suspects severe emotional distress. Carter v. District of Columbia, 795 F.2d 116, 139.

C.A.D.C.1983. Cit. in ftn. in sup. Certain prison inmates brought a class action against the District of Columbia and several of its officials and employees, alleging that the conditions of their confinement violated their constitutional rights, the common law duty of due care owed them, and the statutory duty to provide inmates with safekeeping, care, protection, and instruction. After a jury verdict awarded the inmates damages, this appeal was taken. The judgment was reversed and the cause remanded. The court first held that the trial court had abused its discretion in granting a protective order that had sharply curtailed the ability of the defendants' counsel to discuss with their clients information obtained during discovery. The court noted that the order clearly disadvantaged the defendants and held that alternative methods of protection, less intrusive on the attorney-client relation, could have been used in safeguarding the inmates. In response to another contention by the defendants, the court also held that the trial court had erred in working a charge to the jury on the question of damages. The court indicated that inmates alleging violations of the constitutional rights could be compensated only to the extent that their interests protected by the Constitution had been infringed, and went on to hold that the inmates were entitled to recovery for the infringement of such interests as peace of mind and future earning capacity as protected by the constitutional prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment. Accordingly, the court found that a trial court instruction that seemed to indicate that the jury might award damages on the intrinsic value of a constitutional right was improper. Doe v. District of Columbia, 697 F.2d 1115, 1124.

Ct.Fed.Cl.

Ct.Fed.Cl.2012. Quot. in sup. Owner of property located in Tennessee sued the United States, alleging that defendant fraudulently misrepresented itself as the administrative division of the State of Tennessee in order to collect property taxes from plaintiff. Granting defendant's motion to dismiss, this court held, among other things, that it lacked subject-matter jurisdiction over plaintiff's claims alleging fraud and seeking compensation for emotional distress, because those claims sounded in tort and did not fall within the court's Tucker Act jurisdiction. Maxwell v. U.S., 104 Fed.Cl. 112, 118.

Ct.Fed.Cl.2002. Cit. and quot. in sup. In congressional-reference action arising from private bill to consider the amount, if any, of relief legally or equitably due from United States to former federal employee, employee based his entitlement to compensation on, in part, the Whistleblower Protection Act and the common-law theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting in part government's motion for summary judgment, the court held that employee's allegations that his supervisor yelled at him and became increasingly abusive and irascible failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court said that there was no evidence of motive on supervisor's part, and, moreover, supervisor's conduct in yelling at employee was not sufficiently outrageous to support the claim. Barlow v. U.S., 51 Fed.Cl. 380, 392, 394.

M.D.Ala.

M.D.Ala.2011. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. White male employee of an Alabama manufacturing plant sued employer's Korean parent corporation, alleging discrimination based on race and national origin, retaliation, and other claims. This court granted summary judgment for defendant on plaintiff's claim under Alabama law for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that the conduct alleged was not sufficiently outrageous to support liability. The court noted that plaintiff based the claim on defendant's alleged discrimination and retaliation against him, and that such claims did not fall within the three limited circumstances recognized by the Alabama Supreme Court for the tort of outrage: cases having to do with wrongful conduct in the context of family burial; cases where insurance agents employed heavy-handed, barbaric means to coerce a settlement; and cases involving egregious sexual harassment. Short v. Mando American, 805 F.Supp.2d 1246, 1276, 1277.

M.D.Ala.2006. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. After university discovered a scoring error and took title to the crown of university beauty pageant away from entrant, entrant and parents sued university and administrators for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress—the tort of "outrage" in Alabama. Granting defendants' motion to dismiss this claim, this court held, inter alia, that the alleged conduct did not rise to the level of outrage as defined under Alabama law. The court reasoned that university's decision to correct the error, even after plaintiffs had been assured by an administrator in unequivocal terms that no investigation would be launched, did not offend all bounds of decency and could not be considered intolerable in a civilized society. Sykes v. Payton, 441 F.Supp.2d 1220, 1222.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

M.D.Ala.1998. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. A hotel housekeeper whose workers' compensation coverage was discontinued sued the hotel's insurer's claims management company for the tort of outrage, among other claims. This court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment on the outrage claim, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to show: (1) that defendant intended to inflict emotional distress on plaintiff; (2) that plaintiff failed to establish that defendant knew or should have known that its actions would result in severe emotional distress to plaintiff; (3) that plaintiff failed to produce evidence of the extreme and outrageous nature of the conduct or the severity of her emotional distress; and (4) that plaintiff had not produced any evidence of her severe emotional distress. Wiggins v. Risk Enterprise Management Ltd., 14 F.Supp.2d 1279, 1284.

M.D.Ala.1996. Com. (d) cit. in disc. An insurer brought suit seeking a declaration that it had no contractual duty, under a policy insuring against negligent administration of an employee benefit program, either to defend or indemnify a store in a lawsuit brought by the store's former manager. The underlying lawsuit alleged outrageous conduct by the store through its intentional failure to timely report plaintiff's on-the-job injury to the claims adjuster, and through firing her under false pretexts. This court granted the insurer's request for a declaration that it had no duty to defend, holding, inter alia, that the policy explicitly excluded coverage for malicious or criminal acts or omissions, which conduct was but the departure point for an outrage claim. It noted that while an intentional-infliction-of-distress claim may be brought against an insurer who outrageously denies a clam, this obligation has no bearing on an insurer's duty to defend against such a claim under a policy limited on its terms to defense of negligence actions. Guaranty Nat. Ins. Co. v. Beeline Stores, Inc., 945 F.Supp. 1510, 1514.

M.D.Ala.1989. Quot. in disc. A husband and wife sued the contractor who built their home for, inter alia, breach of contract and the tort of outrage when, after completion of their home, numerous defects existed that the contractor refused to remedy. This court awarded the defendant summary judgment on these claims and stated that the defendant's failure to make repairs was not so extreme in degree, atrocious, or utterly intolerable as to subject him to liability based on outrage. Clark v. Jim Walter Homes, Inc., 719 F.Supp. 1037, 1046.

M.D.Ala.1988. Cit. in ftn., com. (i) cit. in ftn. A woman gave birth after doctors had assured her that her stomach pain was nothing more than a urinary-tract infection and a case of hemorrhoids. The woman provided details of the unexpected birth to a local newspaper. A national men's magazine reprinted the article, entitling it “Birth of a Hemorrhoid.” The woman sued the magazine for, inter alia, defamation and intentional infliction of emotional harm. This court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding that the plaintiff could not recover on her defamation claim because the article was not materially false. The court also held that the plaintiff could not recover on the emotional distress claim because the republication of the story was not egregious behavior, the plaintiff did not suffer any severe emotional distress, and there was no evidence that the defendants knew, or should have known, that their conduct was likely to result in emotional distress to the plaintiff. Grimsley v. Guccione, 703 F.Supp. 903, 906, 907, 909.

M.D.Ala.1981. Cit. in sup., com. (f) quot. in sup. and com. (g) quot. in part in sup. Erron. cit. as Torts. The plaintiff's employer, whose disability plan did not require the plaintiff to seek Social Security benefits and did not authorize a reduction of plaintiff's monthly disability check in anticipation of those benefits, reduced the plaintiff's check from $500 to $49.10, advising the plaintiff to seek the balance from the Social Security Administration. The plaintiff alleged that the employer committed the tort of outrage when it reduced the amount of the check, knowing that the plaintiff had a severe heart condition and permanent disability and was already distraught over his physical and financial condition. This proceeding was instituted on the employer's motion for a judgment n.o.v. or, in the alternative, for a new trial and on the plaintiff's motion for attorney's fees. The court stated that the Supreme Court of Alabama referred, with approval, to the Restatement of the Law of Torts, Section 46, to aid in determining when the facts warrant a finding of the tort of outrage. The court held that there was evidence that the jury could find that the defendant's deliberate and wrongful act of reducing the benefits of the plaintiff to $49 a month was callous and "utterly intolerable in a civilized society" and that the defendant had therefore committed the tort of outrage under the law of Alabama. The court found that the damages awarded were within the jury's discretion and were not excessive in light of the defendant's acts and the medical testimony as to the plaintiff's emotional suffering. The court also held that the attorney for the plaintiff was entitled to a fee of $4,500. Accordingly, the defendant's motion was denied and the plaintiff's motion was granted. Holmes v. Oxford Chemicals, Inc., 510 F.Supp. 915, 919, judgment affirmed 672 F.2d 854 (11th Cir.1982). See above case.

N.D.Ala.

N.D.Ala.2016. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. Former employee brought civil-rights claims against former employer in connection with her termination, alleging sexual harassment, disparate treatment, retaliation, and the state law tort of outrage. This court granted summary judgment for employer on employee's outrage claim, holding that employee's allegations that her supervisor engaged in sexually suggestive touching and made inappropriate sexual comments to employee did not amount to the type of "particularly egregious" sexual harassment that would support a claim of outrage under Alabama law. The court reasoned, in part, that, under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, the law would not hold a defendant liable in tort for behavior that amounted to mere insults, indignities, threats, or annoyances. Dates v. Frank Norton, LLC, 190 F.Supp.3d 1037, 1075.

N.D.Ala.2015. Com. (e) cit. in sup. Customer filed, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against electronics store, alleging that defendant's technical-support provider's employees viewed and retained nude photographs of plaintiff without her permission while servicing her external hard drives. This court denied in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding that there were genuine issues of material fact. The court explained that the alleged misconduct could be considered by a jury as sufficiently outrageous under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment e, because plaintiff alleged that an employee abused the authority, access, or trust afforded to him by his position with defendant by viewing and downloading the photographs and showing them to at least two other employees. March v. Best Buy Stores, LP, 111 F.Supp.3d 1236, 1246.

N.D.Ala.2014. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Pharmacist brought a state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, against former employer and supervisor, claiming that supervisor engaged in harassing conduct by repeatedly questioning him about when he planned to retire and by reporting him to the Alabama Pharmacy Board for allegedly improperly refilling a prescription. Granting in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, this court held that the facts relied upon by plaintiff to show harassing behavior did not come anywhere close to the level of egregiousness necessary to support an IIED claim. The court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, in noting that, for purposes of an IIED claim, a defendant's conduct had to be so outrageous in character and so extreme in degree as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency. King v. CVS Caremark, Corp., 2 F.Supp.3d 1252, 1273.

N.D.Ala.2013. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Terminated employee brought a state-law claim for outrage, inter alia, against former employer, seeking to hold defendant vicariously liable for a supervisor's alleged acts of inappropriately touching plaintiff on three separate occasions in such a way that plaintiff felt as though other employees thought that he was homosexual and were laughing at him as a result. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, this court held that plaintiff's complaint failed to reach the level of egregiousness required to state a claim for outrage under Alabama law. The court noted that, under Alabama law and Restatement Second of Torts § 46"mere insults, threats, annoyances, petty oppressions, or other trivialities" were insufficient to create liability for outrage. Burback v. BNSF Ry. Co., Inc., 963 F.Supp.2d 1255, 1267.

N.D.Ala.2013. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. African-American former employee of insurance agency sued agency and its principal, alleging, inter alia, a state-law claim for outrage. Granting summary judgment for defendants, this court held that, plaintiff's claim for outrage failed, because, while hitting employees and grabbing them by the arm, as plaintiff alleged that principal did in the instant case, was not acceptable conduct, that conduct and the other conduct alleged in this case, such as principal's racial statements, were. not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support plaintiff's outrage claim. Foy v. Pat Donalson Agency, 946 F.Supp.2d 1250, 1276.

N.D.Ala.2013. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. Guardian and next friend of a 14-year-old female middle-school student who allegedly was raped in a boys' restroom by a 16-year-old male student at the school sued, among others, school teachers, asserting, inter alia, a claim for the tort of outrage. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment, this court held, among other things, that, although it was negligent and perhaps wanton for defendants to send female student to meet with male student in order to catch him "in the act" of sexual harassment, defendants' conduct was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support plaintiff's outrage claim. The court noted that the tort of outrage was a limited remedy to be applied only in flagrantly egregious circumstances. Hill v. Madison County School Bd., 957 F.Supp.2d 1320, 1349.

N.D.Ala.1999. Com. (d) cit. in case cit. in disc. Participant in county food-stamp program brought, in part, a claim for the tort of outrage against state and county departments of human resources, county food-stamp office, and government employees. Granting defendants' motion to dismiss, the court held, inter alia, that defendants' alleged conduct of withholding the homeless shelter deduction and failing to average plaintiff's income did not rise to the level of egregiousness necessary to state a claim of outrage under Alabama law. Sanders v. Jefferson County Dept. of Human Resources, 117 F.Supp.2d 1199, 1209.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

N.D.Ala.1997. Cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Employee brought state court wrongful-discharge action against railroad, his former employer, alleging that he was terminated solely because of his participation as a member of a jury that returned a large verdict against railroad. Plaintiff also asserted a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Defendant removed the case to this court on the ground that plaintiff's action was preempted by the Railway Labor Act (RLA). Granting plaintiff's motion to remand, the court held that a determination of whether defendant acted outrageously when it discharged plaintiff did not require interpretation or consideration of his collective-bargaining agreement, and thus his action was not preempted by the RLA. Johnson v. Norfolk Southern Corp., 953 F.Supp. 364, 367.

N.D.Ala.1982. Com. (d) cit. in sup. An employee sought damages from her employer for emotional distress, alleging that her manager had threatened her with termination, charged her with malicious gossip, talked to her in an ugly way, and suspended her. The defendant moved for summary judgment. This court found that the plaintiff may have been subject to insults and indignities; however, insults, indignities and threats did not amount to a cause of action under Alabama law entitling the plaintiff to damages for emotional distress. Therefore, the court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment. Cushing v. General Time Corp., 549 F.Supp. 768, 770.

S.D.Ala.

S.D.Ala.2020. Cit. in sup., cit. in cases cit. and quot. in sup.; subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in sup. Former captain of a ship that was involved in a collision sued former employers, alleging that, after he declined defendants' offer for a new contract and began working for a new employer, defendants made false, misleading, and defamatory statements to his new employer regarding his professional competency and his responsibility for the collision. This court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment on plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that, even accepting plaintiff's allegations that defendants' statements were vindictive, they failed to describe behavior extreme and outrageous enough to support such a claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Sangha v. Navig8 Ship Management PTE Ltd., 440 F.Supp.3d 1286, 1300, 1301.

S.D.Ala.1993. Quot. in ftn., subsec. (1) quot. in ftn. Former police officer sued mayor and police chief for retaliatory discharge in violation of First Amendment and the tort of outrage, alleging, in part, that defendants ordered a fellow police officer, who was subpoenaed by plaintiff to testify before county personnel board, not to appear at plaintiff's personnel board hearing. This court granted in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that, as a matter of law, defendants' action of ordering police officer to ignore a subpoena to testify at plaintiff's personnel board hearing was not conduct sufficiently extreme and outrageous as to constitute the tort of outrage. Angle v. Dow, 822 F.Supp. 1530, 1545.

D.Ariz.

D.Ariz.2022. Com. (h) quot. in sup., cit. in case quot. in sup. Employees of hospital, which operated under a contract with the federal government, brought, among other things, an action against the United States under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), alleging that hospital failed to investigate the lies of information-technology specialist's about specialist's criminal history of "attempted surreptitious videotaping," and failed to promptly and fully investigate cameras found in hospital bathrooms. This court denied defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding that there were triable issues of fact that precluded summary judgment on plaintiffs' claim. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment h, the court noted that it was for the jury to decide whether hospital's conduct was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to result in liability. Anthony v. United States, 632 F.Supp.3d 1017, 1042.

D.Ariz.2022. Cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Individual who was arrested for misdemeanor assault before the charges against him were dropped for lack of cooperation from the victim sued city and police officers for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), alleging that officers, who were responding to a report of a "male vs. female" physical altercation at arrestee's apartment, repeatedly used stun guns against him, even after he was physically unable to move, stunning him a total of seven times. This court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding that, under state law and Restatement Second of Torts § 46, defendants were not liable for IIED. The court explained that officers' conduct was objectively reasonable given that they were responding to a call of domestic abuse, officers heard children crying loudly in arrestee's apartment, and arrestee repeatedly failed to comply with officers' commands. Oakry v. Tempe, City of, 629 F.Supp.3d 974, 988.

D.Ariz.2022. Subsec. (1) and com. (b) quot. in disc., com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Parents of students in a public school district, who formed a private social-media group to discuss issues related to district's policies, sued, among others, father of a member of district's school board, alleging that they suffered serious emotional distress when they discovered that father had collected voluminous sensitive and personal information about parents in an online account and shared that information with district and others. This court granted in part father's motion to dismiss, holding that parents failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Arizona law. The court reasoned, in part, that, while one parent alleged that she vomited when she reviewed the information about her and other parents, that single instance was a "transient" emotional response to an upsetting situation and was insufficient to show severe emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Wray v. Greenburg, 646 F.Supp.3d 1084, 1108, 1109.

D.Ariz.2019. Cit. in case cit. in sup. (general cite); com. (h) cit. in sup. Passengers brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against airline, alleging that defendant lost a funerary urn containing the ashes of plaintiffs' deceased daughter. This court granted in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding that the record indicated that plaintiffs were not sufficiently emotionally distressed to succeed on their IIED claim. The court explained that, according to Arizona caselaw, plaintiffs had to demonstrate that their extreme mental and emotional distress was accompanied by physical ailments, such as headaches, in order to succeed on an IIED claim as set forth in Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court further explained that, under § 46, Comment h, it was for the court to determine as a matter of law whether a defendant's acts could be sufficiently extreme and outrageous to state a claim for relief. Pierre-Canel v. American Airlines, 375 F.Supp.3d 1044, 1055, 1056.

D.Ariz.2019. Com. (h) cit. in disc. Festival attendee brought a lawsuit against, among others, public university's governing body and university's law-enforcement officers, alleging that defendants committed intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) when they arrested him for violating a university policy that banned speech amplified by microphones during the festival. This court granted defendant's motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that defendants' conduct was not extreme and outrageous, as required for a successful IIED claim. The court explained that, under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment h, it was entitled to decide whether defendants' alleged acts reasonably constituted extreme and outrageous conduct without making findings of fact. Spears v. Arizona Board of Regents, 372 F.Supp.3d 893, 921.

D.Ariz.2017. Com. (b) quot. in case quot. in sup. Following a physical altercation between patrons at a motocross park, plaintiff who was injured in the altercation brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against defendants who were also involved in the altercation. This court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment on plaintiff's claim, holding that plaintiff failed to proffer evidence upon which a jury reasonably could conclude that he experienced severe mental anguish as a result of defendants' actions. The court explained that, under Arizona law and Restatement Second of Torts § 46, a plaintiff had to show that a defendant engaged in extreme and outrageous conduct, that the defendant intended to cause emotional distress or recklessly disregarded the near certainty that such distress would result, and that severe emotional distress occurred as a result of the defendant's conduct. Lewis v. Dirt Sports LLC, 259 F.Supp.3d 1039, 1047.

D.Ariz.2013. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in sup. Former employee sued former employer that was self-insured for workers' compensation and subsidiary of employer that handled adjustment of employees' workers' compensation claims, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress and other claims in connection with defendants' handling of her claim for a work-related injury to her right hand; among other things, plaintiff asserted that her supervisor falsely informed her physician that employer had surveillance video of employee pushing a shopping cart with both hands after the accident. Denying defendants' motion for summary judgment on plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held that, if a jury found that supervisor lied to physician in an attempt to influence the care that physician was providing to employee, it could also find that such conduct rose to the level of outrageousness necessary for such a claim. The court reasoned that Arizona courts had recognized the unique relationship between insured and insurer, and that a jury could find that an insurer's exploitation of that power relationship for purposes of financial gain was outrageous. Demetrulias v. Wal-Mart Stores Inc., 917 F.Supp.2d 993, 1012.

D.Ariz.2012. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. In consolidated cases, members of county board of supervisors, county court judges, and county staff members sued members of county sheriff's office and county attorney's office, asserting, among other things, claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). This court denied defendants' motions to dismiss these claims, holding that the alleged retaliatory conduct of defendants, as officials vested with governmental authority, against plaintiffs, as well as their alleged targeted harassment of plaintiffs, including their filing of a federal civil Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act suit against plaintiffs, was sufficiently outrageous to state an IIED claim, and, further, plaintiffs sufficiently alleged that defendants acted against them with the intention of causing, or at least with reckless disregard of the risk of, emotional injury. Donahoe v. Arpaio, 869 F.Supp.2d 1020, 1061.

D.Ariz.2002. Com. (d) quot. in sup. After employee was fired for alleged substance abuse, she sued employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that employer required her to submit to drug screening, required her to give urine sample, and conducted interview that covered inappropriate subjects. This court dismissed in part, holding, inter alia, that the emotional-distress claim was preempted by § 301 of Labor Management Relations Act. The court stated that any claim for extreme and outrageous conduct related to enforcement of employer's substance-abuse policy must arise from terms of collective-bargaining agreement (CBA), and that without interpreting CBA's terms, the court could not determine if employer's conduct was extreme and outrageous in view of substance-abuse policy. Robinson v. Fred Meyers Stores, Inc., 252 F.Supp.2d 905, 915.

D.Ariz.1997. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. A taxpayer sued the government, alleging intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress as a result of its harassment in attempting to collect unpaid tax assessments made against him. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiff failed, as a matter of law, to establish that defendant's agents committed any acts that were extreme and outrageous so as to state a claim for relief for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Rayes v. U.S., 967 F.Supp. 1162, 1165.

D.Ariz.1996. Cit. in headnotes, cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Medical laboratory, its owner, and owner's wife sued television network for, inter alia, public disclosure of private facts and intentional infliction of emotional distress after network secretly taped owner's admission that his employees were fatigued, then aired a news program in which its reporter stated that laboratory had misread pap smear slides. Network moved for summary judgment. Granting the motion, the court held that laboratory, as a corporation, could not maintain an action for invasion of privacy; wife's privacy action failed because her claim was merely derivative of her husband's; owner could not recover for invasion of privacy because the disclosed facts were matters of public record and could not be considered highly offensive to a reasonable person; and the use of hidden cameras to record owner's comments was neither atrocious nor outrageous. Matter of Medical Laboratory Management Consultants, 931 F.Supp. 1487, 1489, 1493, 1494.

D.Ariz.1995. Cit. generally in disc., cit. generally in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. but dist., com. (h) cit. in case quot. in sup. Disabled airline passenger sued airlines, airport, and skycap service, alleging federal and state law causes of action, including intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiff, who was 73 years old and suffered from severe arthritis of the knees, contended that defendants acted outrageously when a skycap pushed his wheelchair to a shuttle bus stop, then forced him out without providing handicapped facilities or handicapped access to the bus. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held that they acted neither obnoxiously nor intolerably by failing to treat plaintiff as more incapacitated than he appeared to be. The evidence indicated that plaintiff was not forced from the wheelchair but stepped out of it without protest and, moreover, rejected fellow passengers' offers for a seat and boarded the bus without requesting assistance. Adiutori v. Sky Harbor Intern. Airport, 880 F.Supp. 696, 707, affirmed 103 F.3d 137 (9th Cir.1996).

E.D.Ark.

E.D.Ark.1995. Cit. in ftn., coms. (g)-(i) cit. in disc. Owner of a store located in front of a county detention facility was raped by an unsupervised "trusty" pretrial detainee, who had been directed by the county deputy sheriff to unload groceries from a police car behind the store. Store owner brought a § 1983 civil-rights claim, as well as pendent state-law tort claims, against the county, the deputy sheriff, and others. Granting in part defendants' motion to dismiss, the court held that plaintiff failed to state a claim against defendants under Arkansas' tort of outrage, since defendants' conduct in granting detainee trusty status and allowing him to leave the detention facility unsupervised was pursuant to county policy and thus did not constitute outrageous conduct; even if that conduct were sufficiently egregious to be actionable, defendants were not liable absent an allegation that they intended harm to befall plaintiff or that the attack was a substantially certain or highly probable consequence of the unsupervised release. Davis v. Fulton County, Ark., 884 F.Supp. 1245, 1262, 1264, affirmed 90 F.3d 1346 (8th Cir.1996).

E.D.Ark.1984. Cit. in disc., quot. in case cit. in sup., coms. (d) and (i) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (f) and illus. 9-13 cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (h) quot. in disc. and cit. in case quot. in disc. Plaintiff sued her broker, alleging that she was defrauded into purchasing securities that were not suited to her needs, and as a result she suffered severe emotional distress. Defendant moved for partial summary judgment on the emotional distress claim, arguing, inter alia, that plaintiff had failed to adequately establish her claim. The court granted summary judgment, noting that the court was to determine whether conduct may reasonably be regarded as so outrageous as to permit recovery. Here plaintiff had not alleged conduct on the part of defendants that was so outrageous as to trigger liability, such as subterfuges, threats, exploitation, or speculative investment. LeCroy v. Dean Witter Reynolds, Inc., 585 F.Supp. 753, 762, 764-766.

W.D.Ark.

W.D.Ark.1995. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (h) cit. in case quot. in disc. Employee who was accused of theft and was terminated after he admitted that he had given away property belonging to his employer without permission or authorization brought a claim for the tort of outrage against employer. Granting employer's motion for summary judgment, the court held, in part, that employer's actions did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct and employee failed to present sufficient evidence that he suffered emotional distress as a result of that conduct to establish a claim for the tort of outrage. Crenshaw v. Georgia-Pacific Corp., 915 F.Supp. 93, 97.

W.D.Ark.1994. Cit. in headnotes, cit. and quot. in disc., cit. in case quot. in disc., subsecs. (1) and (2) cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in sup., cit. in disc. and cit. in case quot. in disc., coms. (g) and (j) cit. in disc. and cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (l) cit. in disc. (erron. cit. as com. 1). Former member of bible study group sued group leader for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that leader brainwashed him and caused the separation of plaintiff and his wife, also a group member. After the court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiff, defendant moved for judgment as a matter of law. Granting the motion, the court held that the alleged brainwashing was nothing more than religious indoctrination and was insufficient to establish outrageousness, and that plaintiff could not recover under a theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress for the extreme conduct he alleged was directed at his now ex-wife, a third party. Poindexter v. Armstrong, 934 F.Supp. 1052, 1052-1057.

W.D.Ark.1986. Coms. (d) and (j) cit. in sup. A teacher who received another teacher's score report on a competency examination and whose own score was sent to another sued the computer service that provided the scores for negligence, mental anguish, extreme emotional distress, and invasion of privacy. This court granted the service's motion for summary judgment, finding that the inadvertent switching of test scores fell far short of the wilful and wanton conduct necessary to support a claim for emotional distress, particularly when the plaintiff, instead of hiding in embarrassment, called other teachers and appeared on local television. The invasion of privacy claim failed because she never contended that the defendant had ever communicated the plaintiff's scores to anyone except the person who had inadvertently received them. Wood v. National Computer Systems, Inc., 643 F.Supp. 1093, 1097, judgment affirmed 814 F.2d 544 (8th Cir.1987). See above case.

C.D.Cal.

C.D.Cal.2009. Com. (h) cit. in disc. Debtor sued debt collectors for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) allegedly caused by defendants' attempts to collect on plaintiff's debt. This court, concluding that the complaint failed to allege any facts showing how plaintiff suffered emotional distress, dismissed the IIED claim with leave to amend to include allegations regarding the nature of plaintiff's distress. The court, however, rejected defendant's argument that plaintiff did not properly plead the elements of the claim, since plaintiff's complaint explicitly recited each of the four elements, and also rejected defendant's argument that the court should find, without benefit of a fuller record, that defendants' alleged conduct was not sufficiently "outrageous" as a matter of law. Robinson v. Managed Accounts Receivables Corp., 654 F.Supp.2d 1051, 1062.

C.D.Cal.2001. Com. (d) cit. in sup. Equal-opportunity-housing association and African-American building manager sued city and director of landlord association that practiced tenant screening, alleging that defendants engaged in unfair housing practices in violation of federal and state laws, and asserting a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Denying defendant director's motion for summary judgment on plaintiff manager's emotional-distress claim, the court held, inter alia, that a genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether director's discriminatory remarks at a landlord-association meeting attended by manager transcended the bounds of behavior usually tolerated in a civilized society, and might be considered outrageous conduct. Inland Mediation Bd. v. City of Pomona, 158 F.Supp.2d 1120, 1157.

C.D.Cal.1999. Com. (d) quot. in disc. Attorney brought state-court suit against trustee of trust with which his client had a partnership relationship, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. Upon removal, this court denied the attorney's motion to amend his complaint to add a trustee of another trust as a nondiverse defendant. Plaintiff alleged that the other trustee had sent him faxes advising him to contact his insurance company regarding claims that other trustee knew were not covered by insurance. The court held, inter alia, that other trustee's conduct was insufficient to support an emotional distress claim. Clinco v. Roberts, 41 F.Supp.2d 1080, 1084.

C.D.Cal.1997. Com. (d) cit. generally in headnote and quot. in disc. A former employee of a store brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under California law against the store manager, among others, alleging that defendant failed to investigate incidents of harassment against him by co-workers and told him that the incidents were "all in his head," and also alleging that he overheard defendant say to another employee, "I wish Danny would quit." Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held that plaintiff failed to establish a prima facie case for intentional infliction of emotional distress, since defendant's conduct in making the alleged offensive statements was not outrageous and there was no evidence that defendant intended to inflict emotional harm on plaintiff. Dove v. PNS Stores, Inc., 982 F.Supp. 1420, 1421, 1424.

C.D.Cal.1996. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Applicant brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, as well as other causes of action, against insurer, alleging that insurer's denial of his application for life insurance was based solely and improperly on his wife's HIV-positive status. Granting in part defendant's motion to dismiss, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress because the denial of insurance coverage did not rise to the requisite level of outrageous conduct. Kotev v. First Colony Life Ins. Co., 927 F.Supp. 1316, 1324.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

C.D.Cal.1987. Cit. in disc., com. (h) cit. in ftn. An antipornography lecturer filed suit against a magazine, its publisher, and the publisher's corporation, asserting claims under the United States Constitution and state obscenity statutes and suing for intentional infliction of emotional injury, libel, invasion of privacy, and outrage. A Wyoming federal court dismissed the constitutional and statutory claims and granted the defendants' motion for change of venue. This court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment on the remaining claims, holding that the plaintiff failed to state claims for libel and invasion of privacy, that the emotional injury and outrage claims were identical, and that since defamation was the gravamen of the action, a separate action for emotional injury was not sustainable. The court dismissed the invasion of privacy claim, which was based on the public disclosure of private facts, because that tort was not recognized under the applicable state law and no facts were disclosed. The court dismissed the outrage claim because the tort of outrage embodied the state's tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Dworkin v. Hustler Magazine, Inc., 668 F.Supp. 1408, 1420, 1421, judgment affirmed 867 F.2d 1188 (9th Cir.1989), cert. denied 493 U.S. 812, 110 S.Ct. 59, 107 L.Ed.2d 26 (1989).

E.D.Cal.

E.D.Cal.2015. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. Female arrestee brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, in connection with her arrest and booking for possession of a controlled substance against, among others, male police officer who entered the strip-search area and began questioning her while she was still undressed. This court denied officer's motion to dismiss that claim, holding that arrestee pleaded specific facts that a reasonable trier of fact could find extreme and outrageous under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court pointed to arrestee's allegations that officer resumed questioning her while she was undressed in retaliation for her earlier resistance to answering his questions. Blanco v. County of Kings, 142 F.Supp.3d 986, 1102.

E.D.Cal.2010. Cit. in sup., com. (e) quot. in sup. City police officer who was range master for city's police-training shooting range sued county and county sheriff, asserting, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) in connection with sheriff's investigation of an accidental shooting of a county resident with a stray bullet from the training range. Granting summary judgment for defendants as to plaintiff's IIED claim, this court held that plaintiff's contention that defendants abused a relation or position of power over him by disclosing his personal information, including his home address, driver's license number, and telephone numbers, to the news media did not assert conduct that was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support his IIED claim, in the absence of any evidence that a special relationship existed between plaintiff, as a witness in the investigation, and sheriff's office. Clark v. County of Tulare, 755 F.Supp.2d 1075, 1091.

E.D.Cal.2008. Com. (j) cit. in case cit. in sup. Insured homeowners sued insurer in connection with its alleged bad-faith response to their claims for a flooding incident involving contaminated water that resulted in their being unable to remain in their home for almost a year. Denying summary judgment for insurer on insureds' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held, inter alia, that, while plaintiffs had not pointed to any evidence of severe emotional distress, and the facts that they presented did not individually show extreme and outrageous conduct, whether the facts were sufficient collectively was better resolved at the close of insureds' evidence. The court noted that, under California law, the duration of the emotional distress was one of the factors to be considered in determining its severity. Hergenroeder v. Travelers Property Cas. Ins. Co., 249 F.R.D. 595, 621.

E.D.Cal.Bkrtcy.Ct.

E.D.Cal.Bkrtcy.Ct.2015. Cit. in sup., subsec. (1) quot. in ftn. Judgment creditor brought an adversary proceeding against Chapter 13 debtor who had uploaded a private video of her to a pornography website without her permission, seeking a determination that the debt represented by her judgment against him for invasion of privacy and intentional infliction of emotional distress was nondischargeable because it arose from his willful or malicious conduct. This court denied debtor's motion to dismiss, holding that the torts of intentional infliction of emotional distress and invasion of privacy constituted "personal injury to an individual," as required to except the debt from discharge. The court reasoned that the conduct required to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46 constituted a personal injury under the Bankruptcy Code. In re Grossman, 538 B.R. 34, 43.

E.D.Cal.Bkrtcy.Ct.2011. Illus. 12 cit. in case cit. in sup. Chapter 7 debtor husband and wife filed a motion seeking damages and other relief against lender that held three deeds of trust on their home, alleging that, after they had already received a discharge in bankruptcy and surrendered the home to lender, lender violated the discharge by sending them 24 letters over a 10-month period in which it demanded that they continue to honor their obligations in connection with the home. Granting the motion in part, this court held that debtors were entitled to recover damages for emotional distress. The court reasoned, in part, that whether a defendant knew that a plaintiff had a special susceptibility to emotional distress was a factor that could be considered in determining whether the alleged conduct was outrageous, and pointed out that lender did not halt its communication with husband even after his psychiatrist sent a letter to lender asking it to do so. In re Nordlund, 494 B.R. 507, 524.

N.D.Cal.

N.D.Cal.2019. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Passenger brought, among other things, claims of intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against airline and airline employee, alleging that he suffered severe emotional distress after defendants improperly removed him from a flight and subjected him to questioning by law-enforcement officers after another passenger reported overhearing him speaking in Arabic and using words such as "inshallah," "shahid," and "ISIS." This court granted in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding that defendants' conduct was not extreme or outrageous enough to sustain an IIED claim. The court explained that defendants' conduct was discriminatory, distressing, and embarrassing, but discriminatory conduct alone was not sufficiently atrocious or utterly intolerable under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, to sustain an IIED claim. Makhzoomi v. Southwest Airlines Co., 419 F.Supp.3d 1136, 1161.

N.D.Cal.2011. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup. Airline passenger sued airline for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), alleging that flight attendant yelled at her in close proximity, resulting in saliva hitting her face, and punched her in the arm, causing her to scream and feel numb, because she impermissibly used the first class restroom. This court denied in part defendant's motion for judgment on the pleadings, holding that, at the pleadings stage, plaintiff only needed to allege facts that could support a claim of IIED, and she had done this by putting forth evidence of behavior that could be interpreted as extreme, and by alleging that she suffered extreme emotional distress as a result. Keum v. Virgin America Inc., 781 F.Supp.2d 944, 953.

N.D.Cal.1988. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. The former secretary of a federal district court judge sued the judge and a private association of judges for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, after she was discharged. The court dismissed the claim as to the private association and partially dismissed as to the judge, holding that the plaintiff did not allege sufficient facts to establish that the conduct of the defendants, in regard to their insistence that she perform work for the private association and that she not discuss or complain of that work, was extreme and outrageous. The court held, however, that the plaintiff's allegations against the judge of offensive touching, frequent demented tirades of obscenities, and threats of a bad recommendation did assert facts sufficient to allow a trier of fact to conclude that his conduct was extreme and outrageous. Garcia v. Williams, 704 F.Supp. 984, 1003.

N.D.Cal.1977. Cit. but dist. Plaintiff, a probationary tympanist for a symphony orchestra, who was denied tenure with the orchestra, brought a suit alleging that the orchestra players' committee vote denying her tenure violated the express requirement of a previous settlement agreement that provided for the holding of a second vote on plaintiff's tenure. (On a previous vote, plaintiff had been denied tenure.) Plaintiff further alleged that the second vote against her was an intentional wrongful act which caused her emotional distress and anguish. In granting summary judgment for the defendants, the court held, inter alia, that the simple vote of the committee, even if it occurred exactly as alleged in plaintiff's complaint did not amount to the kind of outrageous conduct beyond all bounds of decency that is required for the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Jones v. Musicians Union of S.F. Local No. 6, Etc., 446 F.Supp. 391, 395.

S.D.Cal.

S.D.Cal.2010. Com. (d) quot. in sup. As part of his § 1983 action against his ex-wife's attorneys, city, city police officers, and others, arising from an alleged conspiracy to have him arrested in order to obtain incriminating child-custody evidence against him, former husband brought a claim for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against process server, alleging that, while serving him with divorce papers, defendant angrily warned plaintiff, "you have no idea who you're fucking with." Granting defendant's motion to dismiss the IIED claim, this court held that the claim failed because plaintiff did not adequately allege that defendant's conduct was extreme or outrageous, or that he suffered severe emotional distress as a result of her conduct; while plaintiff urged the court to infer a threat of physical or other particular sorts of harm from defendant's language, defendant's threat could, at best, be described as cryptic or vague. Steel v. City of San Diego, 726 F.Supp.2d 1172, 1190.

S.D.Cal.2007. Cit. in disc. (general cite). Former employee of subcontractor that provided services at a nuclear electric generating station sued former employer over his termination. Granting in part defendant's motion to dismiss, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) was barred by the federal enclave doctrine, because the station was located on a military base that was within the exclusive territorial jurisdiction of the federal government. The court explained that California's recognition of this tort followed the amendment of the Restatement of Torts in 1947, and the government acquired the base no later than 1942; thus, because an IIED claim did not come within a reservation of jurisdiction by California and had not been adopted by Congress, it was inapplicable here. Stiefel v. Bechtel Corp., 497 F.Supp.2d 1138, 1149.

S.D.Cal.1999. Com. (d) cit. in disc. and quot. in case quot. in disc. Former employee sued former employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that she suffered retaliation after complaining about a supervisor's behavior. After the jury returned a verdict for plaintiff, defendant moved for judgment as a matter of law and for a new trial. Entering judgment as a matter of law and conditionally granting the motion for a new trial, the court held, in part, that the conduct complained of constituted everyday management decisions and, while disagreeable to plaintiff, did not rise to the level of outrageousness necessary to support an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Helgeson v. American Intern. Group, Inc., 44 F.Supp.2d 1091, 1095.

S.D.Cal.1986. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. After an employer demoted an employee, the employee sued the employer and his immediate supervisors, alleging, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss the plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that dismissal of the claim was inappropriate at the present stage of the litigation. The court noted, however, that the plaintiff was required to satisfy a heavy burden to prove that he was entitled to recover under the emotional distress theory and that it appeared inherently improbable that he would be able to prove what he had alleged under this set of facts. Clement v. American Greetings Corp., 636 F.Supp. 1326, 1331.

D.Colo.

D.Colo.2023. Com. (j) quot. in sup. and cit. in case cit. in sup. Former director at an electronic voting-systems company sued owner and host of a podcast for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendants repeatedly invited a guest onto the podcast who falsely alleged that plaintiff had fraudulently rigged a presidential election, despite knowing that people were harassing plaintiff based on the guest's accusations. This court denied defendants' special motion to dismiss under the state's anti-SLAPP statute, holding that plaintiff sufficiently alleged that he was likely to succeed on the merits of his claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court reasoned, in part, that plaintiff met his burden of showing that he experienced severe emotional distress by submitting evidence to show that he had endured credible fear for his own life and the lives of his family, in addition to suffering significant anxiety and depression. Coomer v. Make Your Life Epic LLC, 659 F.Supp.3d 1189, 1206.

D.Colo.2014. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Owner of pornographic films sued individuals who allegedly infringed on plaintiff's copyrighted work by using the internet and a peer-to-peer file sharing protocol to reproduce, distribute, display, or perform plaintiff's protected films; defendant counterclaimed, claiming, among other things, outrageous conduct. This court granted plaintiff's motion to dismiss defendant's counterclaims, holding that plaintiff did not engage in outrageous conduct within the meaning of Restatement Second of Torts § 46 when it filed its copyright-infringement claim against defendant and offered to settle for an amount within the statutory-damages parameters. The court reasoned that the embarrassing nature of plaintiff's work was insufficient to give rise to an claim for outrageous conduct where, as here, there was a factual basis supporting plaintiff's allegations that the work was protected by copyright laws, and an infringement was traced to defendant's Internet Protocol (IP) address. Purzel Video GmbH v. Smoak, 11 F.Supp.3d 1020, 1029.

D.Colo.2014. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Owner of pornographic films sued individuals who allegedly infringed on plaintiff's copyrighted work by using the internet and a peer-to-peer file sharing protocol to reproduce, distribute, display, or perform plaintiff's protected films; defendant counterclaimed, claiming, among other things, outrageous conduct. This court granted plaintiff's motion to dismiss defendant's counterclaims, holding that plaintiff did not engage in outrageous conduct within the meaning of Restatement Second of Torts § 46 when it filed its copyright-infringement claim against defendant and offered to settle for an amount within the statutory-damages parameters. The court reasoned that the embarrassing nature of plaintiff's work was insufficient to give rise to an claim for outrageous conduct where, as here, there was a factual basis supporting plaintiff's allegations that the work was protected by copyright laws, and an infringement was traced to defendant's Internet Protocol (IP) address. Purzel Video GmbH v. St. Pierre, 10 F.Supp.3d 1158, 1167.

D.Colo.2009. Com. (d) quot. in disc. Investors who were swindled in a Ponzi scheme by licensed securities broker sued broker's employer, a broker-dealer, as well as its alter ego, asserting, among other things, a claim for outrageous conduct. This court dismissed the claim, holding, inter alia, that, regardless of the egregiousness of broker's conduct, no reasonable person could find that the conduct of defendants rose to the extreme level of outrageousness required to sustain this tort; plaintiffs pointed to no cases finding outrageous conduct in a broker-dealer's failure to report or stop misconduct leading to financial losses, and the court's own research revealed none. Dolin v. Contemporary Financial Solutions, Inc., 622 F.Supp.2d 1077, 1090.

D.Colo.2009. Adopted in case cit. in disc., com. (j) cit. and quot. in sup. Corporation and its shareholders brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, against insurer, alleging that defendant knew that plaintiffs were suffering financially, and purposely chose to delay and deny insurance benefits to them on an insurance claim. Granting summary judgment for defendant on the IIED claim by corporation and husband/shareholder, but not on the claim by wife/shareholder, this court held that wife's reference in her deposition testimony to "unreal" physical and emotional stress, coupled with the allegations that defendant's adjuster threatened to delay payment of insurance benefits after a fire that effectively closed the business that provided wife's livelihood, was sufficient to permit a reasonable factfinder to conclude that the distress she suffered was severe. Johnstown Feed & Seed, Inc. v. Continental Western Ins. Co., 641 F.Supp.2d 1167, 1179, 1180.

D.Colo.2009. Com. (b) cit. in disc. Borrower sued lender after defendant provided negative credit information regarding plaintiff's payment history to various credit-reporting agencies, thereby adversely affecting plaintiff's credit rating, despite having been correctly informed by plaintiff that the loan had been paid in full. This court denied defendant's motion to dismiss plaintiff's claim under Colorado law for outrageous conduct (intentional infliction of emotional distress), holding that the claim was not preempted by the federal Fair Credit Reporting Act; an outrageous-conduct claim was not a claim for "defamation, invasion of privacy, or negligence," nor was it necessarily "in the nature of" such a claim, since outrageous-conduct claims occupied a well-established niche in the common law, discrete from the claims specifically described in the statute. Llewellyn v. Shearson Financial Network, Inc., 622 F.Supp.2d 1062, 1069.

D.Colo.2009. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. State prisoner brought a pro se Bivens action against Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) agent in his individual capacity, alleging, among other things, that defendant's lodgment of an immigration detainer against him was outrageous conduct sufficient to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Adopting the recommendations of the magistrate judge, this court granted summary judgment for defendant. The magistrate judge found that there were no facts alleged showing that defendant's conduct was extreme and outrageous, or that he acted recklessly with the intent of causing plaintiff severe emotional distress; defendant simply followed standard procedures after plaintiff lied to him about his nationality. Nasious v. Two Unknown B.I.C.E. Agents at Arapahoe County Justice Center, 657 F.Supp.2d 1218, 1232.

D.Colo.2008. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Former employee brought employment-discrimination action against, among others, two former supervisors and a senior manager, alleging that defendants conspired to force his co-workers to create false documentation of his poor performance and then used it to discipline him, leaving him with no choice but to quit. Granting in part defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiff's claim for outrageous conduct, this court held, inter alia, that defendants' alleged conspiracy to build a case for his termination was not so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious, and utterly intolerable in a civilized community; while the alleged conduct was contemptible, conduct that could be illegal or that some might consider reprehensible was not necessarily actionable under Colorado law. Preston v. Atmel Corp., 560 F.Supp.2d 1035, 1039.

D.Colo.2007. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. As part of her sexual-harassment/wrongful-termination suit, former teacher's assistant at school brought claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against school counselor and supervisor, alleging that, after sharing certain personal information with counselor in confidence, counselor passed the information to principal, who then used the information to prey upon her emotions and start a sexual relationship, and that, after she ended the relationship with principal, supervisor retaliated against her. This court dismissed plaintiff's IIED claims against both defendants, holding that a breach of trust by a supposed confidant was a commonplace in society and not sufficiently outrageous conduct to support an IIED claim, and supervisor's alleged actions—withdrawing his good treatment of her after she ended the relationship with principal, restricting her movements in the school, and terminating her employment—were also not sufficiently outrageous. Silver v. Primero Reorganized School District No. 2, 619 F.Supp.2d 1074, 1078.

D.Colo.2006. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. After charges against her were dropped for lack of probable cause, woman who was arrested for interference with police authority sued three officers who arrested her, their supervisor, the chief of police, city attorney, deputy city attorney, and mayor for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court, inter alia, adopted the magistrate's recommendation to grant summary judgment on this claim for supervisor, chief of police, and mayor on ground that there was no evidence that any of those defendants were involved in the alleged illegal search and seizures or the alleged use of excessive force against plaintiff, and for city attorney and deputy city attorney on ground that they were absolutely immune from liability for their prosecutorial acts. Barton v. City and County of Denver, 432 F.Supp.2d 1178, 1212, affirmed 2007 WL 3104909 (10th Cir.2007).

D.Colo.2000. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Terminated police officer sued city, among others, for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with his discharge pursuant to defendant's policy on sexual harassment. Dismissing the complaint, the court held, in part, that neither the manner of discharge nor defendant's conduct was sufficiently egregious to allow plaintiff to recover under a theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Katz v. City of Aurora, 85 F.Supp.2d 1012, 1032, judgment affirmed 13 Fed.Appx. 837 (10th Cir.2001).

D.Colo.2000. Com. (d) quot. in disc. Former employee sued former employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. After entry of summary judgment for defendant, defendant moved for sanctions and fees incurred in fighting the meritless action. Granting the motion in part and denying it in part, the court held, among other things, that plaintiff's mistaken belief as to whether the conduct complained of constituted outrageous behavior did not render her claim a frivolous one. Shackelford v. Courtesy Ford, Inc., 96 F.Supp.2d 1140, 1146.

D.Colo.1999. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Former district attorney's office employee sued the district attorney under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 for First Amendment retaliatory discharge, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and intentional interference with prospective business advantage. Plaintiff alleged that defendant fired him because plaintiff had refused to participate in a conspiracy to remove the city police chief and had expressed concerns to defendant about defendant's excessive drinking. This court accepted the magistrate's recommendation that defendant's motion for summary judgment be granted in part and denied in part. The court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's emotional-distress claim failed, because, although plaintiff's allegations supported an inference that his discharge was unfair, he failed to establish outrageous conduct. Jandro v. Foster, 53 F.Supp.2d 1088, 1097.

D.Colo.1998. Cit. in disc., com. (f) cit. in sup. Judgment creditors who prevailed as plaintiffs in personal-injury action sued tortfeasor's insurer for, inter alia, breach of contract, willful breach of contract, and intentional infliction of emotional distress after insurer refused to satisfy the $3 million judgment entered against tortfeasor. Creditors also sought recovery under a theory of promissory estoppel. Insurer moved to dismiss. Granting the motion in part and denying it in part, this court held that creditors lacked standing to sue for bad-faith breach of an insurance contract, that creditors could sue to recover amounts not exceeding the limits of tortfeasor's insurance policy, that creditors' allegations that they detrimentally relied on insurer's promise to post an appeal bond in the underlying litigation survived the motion to dismiss, and that creditors had established that insurer engaged in a pattern of extreme and outrageous conduct. Cassidy v. Millers Cas. Ins. Co. of Texas, 1 F.Supp.2d 1200, 1213.

D.Colo.1997. Cit. in headnotes, adopted in case quot. in disc., com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. Female former employee sued former employer for, inter alia, gender-based discrimination and discriminatory termination in violation of Title VII, violations of the Equal Pay Act, and the common law tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Defendant moved for summary judgment. Granting the motion, the court held, in part, that plaintiff could not sustain her Title VII or Equal Pay Act claims, and that the conduct complained of, namely, discharge from employment, did not constitute outrageous conduct sufficient to give rise to a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Noel v. Medtronic Electromedics, Inc., 973 F.Supp. 1206, 1208, 1216.

D.Colo.1997. Cit. in headnote, adopted in case quot. in disc. In employment-discrimination action, workers alleged, among other things, that employer committed the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Defendant moved to dismiss. Granting the motion in part and denying it in part, the court held, inter alia, that, where the allegations forming the basis of their claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress were the same as those supporting their discrimination claim, plaintiffs had failed to state an independently cognizable claim for which relief could be granted. Visor v. Sprint/United Management Co., 965 F.Supp. 31, 32, 33.

D.Colo.1996. Com. (d) cit. in sup. College professor who alleged that he was denied tenure in retaliation for his intervention on behalf of an applicant rejected for a teaching position brought an action for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress against the college and college trustees and officials. Granting defendants' motion to dismiss, the court held, inter alia, that, especially in the context of this particular employment dispute, plaintiff failed to show that defendants' conduct was so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, so as to state a claim under Colorado law for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Thornton v. Kaplan, 937 F.Supp. 1441, 1458.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

D.Colo.1995. Cit. in headnotes, adopted in case cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Former male employee who was dismissed for sexually harassing a female co-worker sued employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiff maintained that the harassment charges against him were bogus and defendant acted outrageously in fabricating them. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held that where, as here, other employees corroborated defendant's conclusion that plaintiff created a hostile work environment for his co-worker and, at the time of his termination, plaintiff was on final written warning for sleeping on the job, defendant's decision to discharge him could not be considered atrocious or utterly intolerable to a civilized society. Bellairs v. Coors Brewing Co., 907 F.Supp. 1448, 1451, 1459, affirmed 107 F.3d 880 (10th Cir.1997).

D.Colo.1994. Cit. in sup. Sales representative who was fired after allegedly falsifying cigarette sales records sued her employer for civil-rights violations, fraud, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. Plaintiff alleged that her supervisor misled her with respect to a “gratis,” a free product entry on plaintiff's documentation records, that he lied about having spoken with a customer about the gratis, and that he misrepresented his conversation with one of the managers of plaintiff's allegedly falsified accounts, who had tried in vain to state his opinion to the supervisor that someone inside the company was out to get plaintiff. Granting in part and denying in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff stated a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, citing the alleged lies, together with the fact that supervisor had been disciplined in the past for altering an audit of an employee in order to fire that employee. Davies v. Philip Morris, USA, 863 F.Supp. 1430, 1440.

D.Colo.1993. Cit. in headnote, subsec. (a) quot. in part in disc. Insured and her spouse sued insurer for benefits under an insurance policy and for bad faith and outrageous conduct. Dismissing spouse's claims, the court held, inter alia, that spouse's secondhand distress resulting from insurer's nonpayment of benefits to insured was not a sufficient basis for spouse's claims; moreover, insurer's implied promise of good faith applied only to insured, and spouse was neither a target nor a witness of any alleged outrageous conduct by insurer. Dean v. Allstate Ins. Co., 878 F.Supp. 1397, 1398, 1400.

D.Colo.1993. Cit. in case cit. in disc. Man convicted of murder and sexual assault of a mother and murder of her one-and-one-half-year-old daughter, who died of dehydration before mother's body was discovered, sued murdered woman's husband and two men husband had hired to kill his wife for negligence, negligent infliction of emotional distress, malicious prosecution, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. Plaintiff spent nine years in prison before hired killer confessed that he and other defendant had killed the woman at husband's direction. Noting that husband had participated in the investigation of the murders and had testified as a witness for the state at the trial in which plaintiff was convicted, the court denied husband's motion to dismiss, stating that there was a duty on the part of a knowingly guilty party not to actively facilitate an innocent man's conviction and imprisonment and a duty not to lie under oath, and that, without husband's actions, plaintiff would not have spent nine years behind bars. Purvis v. Hamwi, 828 F.Supp. 1479, 1483.

D.Colo.1991. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. A woman who had a group insurance policy was diagnosed with lung cancer. The insurer terminated the group policy but continued to pay the woman's medical expenses, although it subsequently contended that it was not required to do so. The woman sued the insurer for a declaratory judgment that she was covered under the policy and for damages under several claims, including breach of contract, negligent misrepresentation, and outrageous conduct. Granting the insured's motion for summary judgment on her declaratory judgment claim and the insurer's motion for summary judgment on the various damages claims, this court held, inter alia, as a matter of law that the insurer's conduct in this case was not sufficiently outrageous to permit recovery under the outrageous conduct claim. Buell v. Security General Life Ins. Co., 779 F.Supp. 1573, 1578, affirmed in part, reversed in part 987 F.2d 1467 (10th Cir.1993).

D.Colo.1991. Quot. in case cit. in sup., com. (i) quot. in case quot. in disc. Individuals and businesses who owned land near a nuclear weapons plant sued the companies that formerly operated the plant, alleging that the plaintiffs incurred injury and damages caused by releases or threatened releases of hazardous substances. The court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss the plaintiffs' outrageous conduct claim, provided that the plaintiffs filed an adequate amended complaint within 20 days. The court found that the plaintiffs failed to plead that they suffered severe emotional distress and that the defendants intended to inflict severe emotional distress or acted recklessly in the deliberate disregard of the high probability that emotional distress would follow. Cook v. Rockwell Intern. Corp., 755 F.Supp. 1468, 1478, 1479.

D.Colo.1991. Quot. in case quot. in sup. A National Football League (NFL) referee sued the NFL for claims under the Age Discrimination in Employment Act and for outrageous conduct, alleging that he had been demoted because of his age. Denying the NFL's motion to dismiss, the court held, inter alia, that reasonable jurors could differ on whether the NFL's conduct was outrageous when the referee alleged that the NFL's demotion was an attempt to humiliate him during nationally televised football games and to justify firing him based on inadequate performance in a new position. Dreith v. National Football League, 777 F.Supp. 832, 838.

D.Colo.1991. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in disc. A former employee who was discharged after she refused to sign a consent form disclosing any medications she was taking sued her employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. The court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding that the defendant's conduct was not outrageous, since neither the defendant's request that the plaintiff provide, prior to taking a drug test, a list of medications prescribed by her physician nor the manner in which she was terminated was so extreme as to be beyond the bounds of decency and to be regarded as intolerable. Mares v. Conagra Poultry Co., Inc., 773 F.Supp. 248, 253, affirmed 971 F.2d 492 (10th Cir.1992).

D.Colo.1991. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in disc. A former employee sued her employer for outrageous conduct, inter alia, alleging that the defendant discriminated against her because of her sex by denying her promotions, pay, and benefits commensurate with those of her male coworkers and subjecting her to a sexist work environment. Granting in part the defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held that the plaintiff's allegation that the defendant wrongfully obtained her bank statement did not support her claim for outrageous conduct, even though the action might have caused her to feel outraged and agitated. The court also stated that the pleadings contained no evidence that the defendant obtained the statement unlawfully, and, since the plaintiff's affidavit that the defendant gained access to her account and ordered a printout of her bank statement was not based on her personal knowledge, it did not create a material issue of fact. Robyn v. Phillips Petroleum Co., 774 F.Supp. 587, 591.

D.Colo.1991. Cit. in sup. On the way to a sales call, the insured was injured when he slipped and fell in a parking lot. He sought to recover for his injuries from the defendant, his automobile insurance carrier. The defendant initially started to pay benefits, but then denied coverage because it contended that the insured's employer's workers' compensation policy was primary. The insured and his wife sued the defendant for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that their large outstanding medical bills caused them mental and physical anxiety, including dizziness and stomach pains. The court granted defendant summary judgment and dismissed with prejudice. It held that plaintiffs failed to demonstrate as a matter of law that defendant's conduct met the minimum threshold of outrageousness needed to maintain an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Schultz v. Allstate Ins. Co., 764 F.Supp. 1404, 1411.

D.Colo.1991. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. The children of a man who died of a gunshot wound to the head and whose death was originally reported as a suicide but later found by a grand jury to have been a homicide sued the county coroner's office, the city police department, county and city officers, and their father's widow alleging, among other state and federal claims, defamation and outrageous conduct. Granting motions to dismiss in part and denying them in part, this court held, inter alia, that dismissal of the outrageous conduct claim would be inappropriate since the children had alleged conduct, such as initially refusing entry to the accident scene to the county coroner, failing to conduct an autopsy, and failing to conduct ballistics or trace metal detection tests, that in the context of all the trial evidence, a jury could deem outrageous. Stump v. Gates, 777 F.Supp. 808, 826.

D.Colo.1990. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. A sales employee who was terminated after refusing to sign a no-compete agreement sued the employer for outrageous conduct, inter alia. The court granted in part the defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding that the defendant's conduct, implementing its business judgment to include no-compete clauses, was not so outrageous in character or so extreme in degree as to go beyond all bounds of decency and be regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized community; moreover, the manner of the discharge was not outrageous. Vaske v. Ducharme, McMillen & Associates, Inc., 757 F.Supp. 1158, 1164.

D.Colo.1989. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. A sheriff's lieutenant pursued and pulled over a speeding car. The driver's father became agitated and kept coming out of the car after repeatedly being told not to interfere with the officer's duty. Finally, the father was arrested and taken into custody. He sued the police officer under federal and state law, namely for civil rights violations, invasion of privacy, assault, false arrest and outrageous conduct. This court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendant, holding, inter alia, that the defendant was immune from liability for reasonable actions taken while he was working within the scope of his official duty and authority. The court also rejected the outrageous conduct claim. Noting that outrageous conduct is presumably the result of an aggregation of all the other torts alleged, the court concluded that there was no genuine issue of material fact that the officer went beyond the bounds of reasonable police procedure in making an arrest, or that the arrest or any of the associated acts were willful and wanton. Navratil v. Parker, 726 F.Supp. 800, 806-807.

D.Colo.1988. Com. (g) quot. and cit. in disc. After a woman brought a civil suit against a man who had been convicted of sexually assaulting her, during discovery the defendant's psychiatrist examined the plaintiff. When the defendant's lawyer and the defendant's insurer's lawyer used the testimony of the psychiatrist about the plaintiff to obtain a new trial for the defendant in the criminal proceedings, the plaintiff sued the defense attorneys for negligence, outrageous conduct regarding the misuse of discovery, and invasion of privacy. The court granted the defense attorneys' motions for summary judgment only as to the invasion of privacy claim because the information revealed by the attorneys was in the public record. The court concluded that there was an inference of abuse of the discovery process because the defense could not have obtained the psychiatric testimony in the criminal case. Rohda v. Franklin Life Ins. Co., 689 F.Supp. 1034, 1044.

D.Colo.1987. Quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (e) cit. in sup. A teacher who claimed that her strongly expressed support for an expansion of the school district's foreign language program evoked retaliatory actions against her sued the school district and district officials, asserting a federal claim for infringement of her First Amendment rights and pendent state law claims of assault and outrageous conduct. The court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding in part that fact issues existed as to whether the alleged demotion to substitute teacher and the alleged harassment and assault constituted outrageous conduct. The court stated that those allegations, if proven, might be adjudged to constitute extreme and outrageous conduct and that any of the defendants' permissible conduct might have become extreme and outrageous because they were in positions of authority over the plaintiff. Kirk v. Smith, 674 F.Supp. 803, 810-812.

D.Colo.1987. Com. (e) cit. in disc. (Erron. cit. as Contracts 2d.) An employee sued his employer for breach of employment contract and for emotional distress inflicted by the employer's outrageous conduct and abuse of its position of authority over the plaintiff, alleging that he was harassed, coerced into accepting a lateral transfer, and constructively discharged as a result of his participation in the prosecution of a race discrimination claim brought against the employer by a former employee. This court granted in part and denied in part the defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that the plaintiff failed to show that the defendant's conduct reached the level of egregiousness necessary to sustain a claim for outrageous conduct, and that the claim for liability based on abuse of a position of authority also failed, where the plaintiff had already established a claim and remedy for the conduct complained of under his breach of contract claim. Price v. Federal Exp. Corp., 660 F.Supp. 1388, 1397.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

D.Colo.1987. Cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in part in disc. A staff legal officer in the state court administrator's office was pressured into resigning by the state court administrator shortly after a confrontation between the two at a staff meeting. The state court administrator gave an unfavorable account of the former legal officer's job performance to the latter's prospective employer. The former legal officer sued the state court administrator under a federal civil rights statute and under state law for defamation and several other claims. The court granted summary judgment to the defendant on every claim except the defamation claim. The court held that fact issues existed as to whether the defendant's communication to the plaintiff's prospective employer was made maliciously or with reckless disregard as to its veracity. The court noted that if it was not, then the communication was a valid exercise of the defendant's qualified privilege. Steinberg v. Thomas, 659 F.Supp. 789, 795.

D.Colo.1987. Cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) cit. and quot. in sup., coms. (g) and (j) quot. in sup., cit. in case quot. in ftn. An airline pilot sued his former employer after he was abruptly discharged, alleging, inter alia, breach of an implied contract of employment, promissory estoppel, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted the employer's motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that the employer's conduct was not sufficiently outrageous to impose liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress because the employer had the right to terminate the plaintiff without cause. Therrien v. United Air Lines, Inc., 670 F.Supp. 1517, 1523-1525.

D.Colo.1986. Coms. (f) and (h) cit. in sup. The plaintiff sued her insurer on a variety of theories, including outrageous conduct and negligence, for mishandling her daughter's group health insurance claim. After initially refusing payment, the insurer recanted. This court denied in part and granted in part the insurer's motion for summary judgment. It concluded that the plaintiff's reliance on trust law principles was misplaced; that the insurance company's conduct could, however, be considered outrageous, in view of the vulnerable mental condition of the plaintiff; and that her negligence claim was precluded by the state's unfair or deceptive practices act. Simmons v. Prudential Ins. Co. of America, 641 F.Supp. 675, 683, 684.

D.Colo.1984. Subsec. (1) cit. in disc. After the defendant private investigator accused the plaintiff priest of certain improper conduct, the priest and his religious order sued for outrageous conduct. When the defendant did not appear, the plaintiffs moved for a default judgment on this issue. The court determined that the defendant's conduct did not rise to a level of outrageousness that was actionable, basing its determination partly on the existence of other remedies for the plaintiffs. Bolduc v. Bailey, 586 F.Supp. 896, 902.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

D.Colo.1984. Cit. in sup., subsec. (1) quot. in ftn. in sup., com. (d) quot. in ftn. in sup. The plaintiff sued for negligent and intentional infliction of severe emotional distress and for defamation after the defendant directed derogatory comments at him and allegedly assaulted him with a soft drink bottle. This court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment. The defendant's conduct may have been unsavory, said the court, but it was not so "outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree" to go beyond the bounds of human decency—the criteria for conduct that amounts to infliction of severe emotional distress. King v. Burris, 588 F.Supp. 1152, 1155-1157.

D.Colo.1983. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in ftn. The plaintiff brought an age discrimination case against his former employer, and added claims for breach of contract and outrageous conduct. The defendant moved for summary judgment, which this court granted as to certain damages requested and as to the breach of contract claim, but denied as to the claim for outrageous conduct and for certain compensation requested. This court found that the issues relating to the outrageous conduct claim were factual, and were to be resolved by a jury according to the conscience of the community. Smith v. Montgomery Ward & Co., Inc., 567 F.Supp. 1331, 1335.

D.Colo.1982. Cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in sup. An employee brought an action against the federal Department of Education and individual employees, alleging outrageous conduct, breach of contract, and other claims. Shortly after the plaintiff was hired as a collection agent for the Office of Student Financial Assistance, increased manual tasks were added to her duties. The plaintiff claimed that she informed her supervisor that the additional duties exacerbated her rheumatoid arthritis, but the supervisor rejected her requests for reasonable accommodations. The court dismissed the plaintiff's claim of outrageous conduct based on its finding that the defendants' acts were not "outrageous." The court concluded that the plaintiff was entitled to go to the jury with her other claims. Gelman v. Department of Educ., 544 F.Supp. 651, 653.

D.Colo.1982. Cit. in case quot. in sup., subsec. (2) cit. in sup. and cit. in case quot. in ftn. in sup., subsec. (2)(a) cit. and quot. in sup., com. (l) quot. but not fol. The plaintiffs brought an action against the employees of a county emergency service board, seeking damages for the death of their husband and father. The plaintiffs alleged that the defendants had received notice that the decedent required emergency ambulance service but failed to respond promptly, and that this delay proximately caused the death of the decedent. The plaintiffs alleged that the defendants caused the decedent and themselves intentional infliction of emotional distress. The plaintiffs also sought to charge the county and the emergency services board for the emotional harm caused under the doctrine of respondeat superior. This court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss in part and denied it in part. The court held that because the Colorado survival statute provided for the tort action of intentional infliction of emotional distress to survive the injured party, the plaintiffs could bring that action. But it stated that under Colorado law, the plaintiffs could not recover for their own emotional distress where they were not present at the scene of the alleged outrageous conduct. The court stated that although the Colorado supreme court had recently rejected the impact rule in cases seeking damages for the negligent infliction of emotional distress, allowing a plaintiff to recover if he was in danger of receiving bodily harm from the defendant's negligence, it had not indicated a willingness to forego the requirement that a family member be present at the time of the alleged outrageous conduct to collect damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Healy v. Counts, 536 F.Supp. 600, 602, 603.

D.Colo.1982. Cit. in ftn. The plaintiff, whose criminal trial ended in a mistrial, brought a civil rights action against the federal district judge who presided at the trial, the federal prosecutors, various court officials, city police, and state district attorneys. The complaint alleged that the conduct of the defendants violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights. The plaintiff also sought to recover damages for false arrest, malicious prosecution, outrageous conduct, and defamation. This court dismissed the plaintiff's complaint against all defendants, finding, inter alia, that the federal defendants were immune from liability, that the plaintiff failed to plead sufficient facts for some claims, and that he failed to exhaust administrative remedies. The plaintiff's state law claims, including outrageous conduct, were best dealt with by the state courts, and with the dismissal of the plaintiff's federal claims, the court ceded jurisdiction over them. Martinez v. Winner, 548 F.Supp. 278, 336.

D.Colo.1982. Cit. and quot. in part in sup., com. (d) quot. in part in sup. The plaintiff alleged that he had been wrongfully fired from his employment with the defendant company and, alternatively, that the defendant had wrongfully refused to allow him to resign. The defendant moved to dismiss all of the plaintiff's claims, arguing that none of them stated a claim upon which relief could be granted. The plaintiff alleged, inter alia, that the defendant's conduct had been outrageous, and that it was intended to cause and did cause the plaintiff severe emotional distress. This court found that Colorado had adopted the Restatement (Second) of Torts, so that there was a cause of action in Colorado for the intentional or reckless infliction of emotional distress. This court stated that such claims will normally be cognizable only in cases where the defendant has engaged in a pattern of conduct which either intended to cause, or recklessly did cause, severe emotional distress. The court found that the plaintiff's allegations were insufficient to state a claim for extreme and outrageous conduct; therefore, these claims were dismissed, although other claims were found to be sufficient. Rawson v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 530 F.Supp. 776, 779, 780.

D.Colo.1982. Cit. and quot. in disc. Com. (d) cit. in ftn. in disc. The plaintiff executed an order for service with the defendant, through an agent, whereby it was agreed that the defendant would move the plaintiff's household goods from Chicago to Seabrook, Maryland during a specified time period. Two weeks before shipment was to take place, the defendant notified the plaintiff that delivery could not be completed by the specified date. Plaintiff made alternate arrangements resulting in the goods arriving later than originally planned and forcing the plaintiff to begin work in a new job several days later than planned. The plaintiff brought suit for breach of contract and fraudulent misrepresentation, seeking compensatory and punitive damages. Reviewing the plaintiff's claim for damages for mental distress occasioned by the defendant's conduct, the court held, inter alia, that because the mental distress doctrine requires extreme conduct performed intentionally or recklessly, the defendant's advance notification to the plaintiff, which enabled alternate arrangements to be made, reflected favorably upon the defendant's consideration for the plaintiff and removed the defendant from the ambit of the mental anguish doctrine. Rothenberg v. Aero Mayflower Transit Co., 495 F.Supp. 399, 407.

D.Colo.1977. Cit. in op. Plaintiff, football player brought an action against defendant player on an opposing team for negligence and reckless misconduct. During the course of a professional football game, defendant struck plaintiff in the back of the head out of frustration and anger due to the interception of a pass intended for him. The court held that the level of violence and the frequency of emotional outbursts in professional football games were such that plaintiff must have recognized and accepted the risk that he would be injured by such an act as that committed by defendant, and that even if defendant breached a duty which he owed to him, plaintiff could not recover because he must be held to have assumed the risk of such an occurrence. Hackbart v. Cincinnati Bengals, Inc., 435 F.Supp. 352, 356, judgment rev'd 601 F.2d 516 (9th Cir.), cert. denied 444 U.S. 931, 100 S.Ct. 275, 62 L.Ed.2d 188 (1979).

D.Colo.Bkrtcy.Ct.

D.Colo.Bkrtcy.1992. Com. (a) quot. in sup. Businessman contributed money as part of his partnership with a pet food business. Dispute existed as to whether the money was a loan or a capital infusion. Pet food company president and his wife were induced to sign guaranty notes and loan documents. They were not informed of the content of the documents that they signed, but relied on representations of businessman and his attorney. Later, businessman withdrew from the partnership, and pet food company filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection. Businessman filed an adversary proceeding, seeking, inter alia, a declaratory judgment to enforce the notes and loan documents. This court held, in part, that businessman and his attorney were liable for extreme and outrageous conduct because they falsely represented their intentions and deliberately took advantage of couple's trust in them. Their conduct was reckless and with intent to cause severe harm, which was evidenced by damage to couple's marriage and social life. In re S & D Foods, Inc., 144 B.R. 121, 169.

D.Conn.

D.Conn.2020. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Father, who had obtained custody of his minor children in family court, brought, among other things, claims of intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against unlicensed social worker, alleging that defendant published false statements on her website claiming that plaintiff had viciously abused his minor children and was an accused child abuser, and comparing him to other prominent child abusers despite knowing plaintiff's case history suggesting the contrary, which resulted in plaintiff suffering from headaches, weight loss, and sleeplessness. While denying defendant's motion for judgment on partial findings on other grounds, this court held that plaintiff's IIED claim failed because he did not demonstrate that he suffered from severe emotional distress. The court explained that, although defendant's conduct given the circumstances and her intent to "out" plaintiff as a child abuser on a public website was extreme and outrageous as defined by Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, plaintiff failed to carry his burden of proof that he suffered severe emotional distress, because he did not seek medical treatment for his symptoms or testify as to their intensity and frequency. Powell v. Jones-Soderman, 433 F.Supp.3d 353, 377-378.

D.Conn.2015. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee sued former employer for age discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendant overreacted to a single incident in which employee lost his temper in order to terminate his employment on the basis of his age. This court granted summary judgment for employer, holding that employer's conduct did not rise to the level of atrocity and intolerability required to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court pointed out that, by his own account, employee was terminated after he became embroiled in a workplace dispute and used profanity, and nothing employee described was sufficiently outrageous that it would cause a reasonable juror to consider employer's conduct outrageous. Fetcho v. Hearst Connecticut Post, LLC, 103 F.Supp.3d 207, 220.

D.Conn.2014. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Tenant, along with his conservator, filed a claim for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against police officers, alleging that defendants mistakenly believed that the suspect of a violent crime was present and living in his apartment, battered down his door, searched him and the apartment, destroyed some of his possessions, and derided him when he asked to speak to his mother, causing him severe emotional distress. This court denied defendants' motion for summary judgment for the IIED claim. Quoting Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, the court pointed out that plaintiff needed to show that defendants' conduct was outrageous and extreme, and concluded that, after viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, defendants acted with sufficiently extreme and outrageous conduct to support the IIED claim. Waller v. City of Middletown, 50 F.Supp.3d 171, 199.

D.Conn.2013. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Former employee brought, inter alia, a pendent state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against former employer, alleging that his co-workers repeatedly made offensive comments and drawings based on his Romanian national origin and ethnicity over a period of several years, and that defendant failed to address his complaints of harassment. Granting summary judgment for defendant, this court, applying Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, held that plaintiff's IIED claim failed because, while this alleged behavior was shameful and reprehensible, it was not so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency and be regarded as atrocious. Kovaco v. Rockbestos-Surprenant Cable Corp., 979 F.Supp.2d 252, 262.

D.Conn.2011. Com. (d) quot. in sup. and in case quot. in sup., com. (e) quot. in ftn. After medical school terminated African American resident, resident sued school, hospital, and residency director and associate director, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia. Denying defendants' motion to dismiss as to IIED, this court held that it was at least more plausible than speculation that defendants' conduct could be viewed as an abuse of a hierarchical power relationship, rising to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct. The court pointed to evidence that, among other things, plaintiff was in a subordinate relationship to the individual defendants, defendants assigned plaintiff high-risk patients that he could not properly treat and gave him failing grades for procedures he never performed, and defendants interfered with plaintiff's ability to be part of any other residency program. Craig v. Yale University School of Medicine, 838 F.Supp.2d 4, 10-12.

D.Conn.2009. Com. (d) cit. in case cit. in disc. Principal of public elementary school brought intentional-infliction-of-emotional-distress (IIED) and other claims against school superintendent, alleging that he threatened and intimidated her, publicly accused her of illegal activity in front of the teachers and staff of her school, and, after accessing her e-mail account without permission, read a communication that she had sent to her lawyer and forwarded it to his own e-mail account. This court denied defendant's motion for summary judgment on the IIED claim, holding that it was unwilling to find, as a matter of Connecticut law, that defendant's alleged conduct was not extreme or outrageous. The court noted, however, that, in order for plaintiff to prevail, the recitation of defendant's alleged conduct had to arouse the anger of the average representative of the community and cause him or her to exclaim, "Outrageous!" Brown-Criscuolo v. Wolfe, 601 F.Supp.2d 441, 454.

D.Conn.2009. Com. (d) quot. in sup. African-American teacher's aide at city's public middle school brought federal employment-discrimination claims and a state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against white school principal, school system, and city, alleging, among other things, that principal subjected her to constant harassment targeted at her professional competence and socioeconomic status, publicly insulted her in highly personal ways, failed to act on her complaints that a white teacher was verbally abusing underperforming minority children in her presence, and took charge of supervising her personally in order to give her poor evaluations and instigate her transfer. Denying summary judgment for defendants on the IIED claim, this court held, inter alia, that, while some of principal's alleged conduct fell short of being actionable in isolation, a reasonable jury could find that principal's actions were outrageous in the larger context. Davis v. City of Hartford, 601 F.Supp.2d 488, 494.

D.Conn.2009. Coms. (d), (e), (f), and (h) quot. in sup. Administrator of estate of employee who committed suicide brought various claims against employer in connection with supervisor's handling of employee's requests for leave under the Family and Medical Leave Act. Denying summary judgment for defendant on plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held, inter alia, that a genuine issue of material fact remained as to whether defendant's conduct was extreme and outrageous, in light of evidence that supervisor was in a position of actual authority over employee, that supervisor had knowledge that employee was particularly susceptible to emotional distress, and that supervisor had, among other things, subjected employee to verbal abuse in front of co-workers. Delise v. Metro-North R. Co., 646 F.Supp.2d 288, 291.

D.Conn.2009. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in ftn. City police department employee who was terminated for absenteeism arising from her alcoholism brought federal discrimination claims against city, as well as a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Connecticut law.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

This court dismissed the distress claim on statutory governmental immunity grounds, but noted that the claim would have failed in any event, since there was nothing in the record to demonstrate that the conduct of the chief of police, which plaintiff sought to impute to city, was atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Nanos v. City of Stamford, 609 F.Supp.2d 260, 267.

D.Conn.2009. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Bar patrons who were arrested after they were involved in an altercation with two allegedly intoxicated off-duty police officers in the bar's parking lot sued city and off-duty officers, as well as a police sergeant and the officers who arrested plaintiffs and investigated the incident, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress, as part of their § 1983 action against defendants. This court granted in part and denied in part defendants' motion for partial summary judgment, holding that plaintiffs' emotional-distress claims, insofar as they were based on allegations of unreasonable force, denial of medical treatment, and false arrest/false imprisonment against various defendants, failed as a matter of law, but that genuine issues of material fact existed as to the emotional-distress claims based on unreasonable force against off-duty officers, and those based on malicious prosecution against various officers. Zainc v. City of Waterbury, 603 F.Supp.2d 368, 392.

D.Conn.2008. Com. (j) quot. in sup., cit. in case cit. in sup. Former employee of town sued town and former co-worker for racial discrimination, alleging, among other things, that co-worker made inappropriate and offensive remarks to her and others at their place of employment. Granting summary judgment for defendants, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against co-worker failed because plaintiff failed to show that co-worker's remarks caused her severe emotional distress under Connecticut law. The court pointed out that plaintiff admitted in a deposition that her emotional distress was caused not by co-worker, but rather by town's inadequate response, noting that plaintiff initially claimed that she was "okay with everything" and that she "wanted to let it go," after co-worker apologized for the remarks. Buster v. City of Wallingford, 557 F.Supp.2d 294, 302.

D.Conn.2008. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Mother of the only African-American student in his kindergarten and first-grade classes sued school superintendent, principal, her son's teachers, and others, alleging that her son was the target of racial slurs and racially motivated physical abuse by his classmates and that defendants did nothing to stop the discriminatory conduct. Denying defendants' motions for summary judgment as to plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), this court held that, if the jury were to find that defendants knew about allegations of racial discrimination, and yet failed to respond to them adequately, the average member of the community would regard that conduct as extreme and outrageous, and thus could find the defendants liable for IIED. DiStiso v. Town of Wolcott, 539 F.Supp.2d 562, 569.

D.Conn.2008. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Foreign national sued the United States under the Federal Tort Claims Act, alleging, among other things, that United States Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents arrested and detained him even though he was in a lawful immigration status, and then detained him for an additional 42 days after he agreed to voluntarily depart from the country. This court denied the government's motion to dismiss plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding, inter alia, that agents' conduct in arresting plaintiff and taking him into custody, alongside a general prison population, even though they knew or should have known that he had committed no immigration violation, could be deemed sufficiently outrageous to state a claim under Connecticut law, as could the additional detention. El Badrawi v. Department of Homeland Sec., 579 F.Supp.2d 249, 279.

D.Conn.2008. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. Former dispatcher for same-day package-delivery company brought disability-based discrimination claims against company, and an additional Connecticut-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). This court, inter alia, granted summary judgment for defendant on the IIED claim, holding that while plaintiff's co-workers' alleged conduct in, among other things, ribbing plaintiff over bowel accidents caused by his multiple sclerosis, leaving a scatological children's book near his work station, and posting a caricature of him running in the Special Olympics with a cane could be viewed as unpleasant and insensitive, it was not sufficient to satisfy the claim's requirement of extreme and outrageous conduct as a matter of law. Murphy v. BeavEx, Inc., 544 F.Supp.2d 139, 155.

D.Conn.2008. Com. (d) cit. in case cit. in sup. Former state employee brought, as part of her § 1983 action, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against two of her co-workers, alleging that defendants falsely accused her of violating employer's clock-in policy. Granting summary judgment for defendants, this court held that plaintiff failed to produce evidence creating a genuine issue of material fact as to whether defendants' conduct was sufficiently extreme and outrageous. The court explained that, in the context of the workplace, where an employer had an interest in having employees report improper conduct by fellow employees, the mere making of a false accusation, without more, did not constitute extreme and outrageous conduct; here, there was no evidence of anything more, such as, for example, fabrication of evidence to support a false accusation. Torres-Hicks v. Connecticut Housing Finance Authority, 575 F.Supp.2d 393, 407.

D.Conn.2007. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Town employee brought, as part of her civil-rights action, a state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against town and co-workers. Granting summary judgment for defendants, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's emotional-distress claim failed because her allegations that her co-workers and supervisors had questioned her about her chronic medical condition and about her leave under the Family and Medical Leave Act, critiqued her work, treated her coldly and possibly rudely, ordered her to remove her father from her work area when he came to pick her up, and asked her to identify supervisors who had allowed her father to remain in the work area did not state the extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to support her claim. Goldfarb v. Town of West Hartford, 474 F.Supp.2d 356, 376.

D.Conn.2007. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Terminated employee brought age-discrimination suit under state and federal statutes, and an additional claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting summary judgment for defendant on the emotional-distress claim, this court held that defendant's conduct was, at most, insulting, not extreme and outrageous, and thus plaintiff could not proceed with the claim under Connecticut law; while it was possible that plaintiff was terminated because of his age, and employment discrimination was illegal, such discrimination did not per se give rise to a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Koestner v. Derby Cellular Products, 518 F.Supp.2d 397, 403.

D.Conn.2006. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. As a part of a wider discriminatory-workplace action, former employee sued her former supervisor and a co-worker for intentional infliction of emotional distress, after she was arrested for breach of the peace based on these defendants' allegations. Denying in part defendants' motions for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that a fact issue existed as to whether defendants' alleged actions in calling the city police department and knowingly reporting false information to a police officer so as to give the impression that plaintiff was stalking or threatening them constituted the extreme and outrageous conduct required to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Crocco v. Advance Stores Co. Inc., 421 F.Supp.2d 485, 503.

D.Conn.2005. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. White worker formerly employed by city brought a civil-rights action against city, raising several causes of action related to discriminatory treatment he received, and his subsequent termination, following his involvement in an action alleging that city had engaged in discriminatory practices against minority employees. Granting summary judgment for city, this court held, inter alia, that worker's allegations did not, as a matter of law, meet the standard for outrageous conduct to support his claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Although there was evidence that worker had been disciplined by city, this evidence did not support the charge that city's employees, in disciplining him, acted in an extreme and outrageous manner. Bond v. City of Middletown, 389 F.Supp.2d 319, 342.

D.Conn.2005. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. African-American nurse's aide who was fired from a nursing home sued the home for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that she was falsely accused of patient abuse twice, falsely disciplined, disciplined for behavior for which others were not disciplined, and was the subject of offensive remarks and a campaign to fire her or make her resign. This court granted defendant summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that defendant's conduct was not extreme and outrageous. While defendant's actions might have been offensive, insulting, and hurtful, no reasonable person could view them as atrocious and utterly intolerable. Jackson v. Health Resources of Rockville, Inc., 357 F.Supp.2d 507, 521.

D.Conn.2005. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Former employees sued food manufacturer and their former supervisor for sexual harassment. Defendants moved for summary judgment on plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and plaintiffs responded that it was a jury question whether defendants' conduct was extreme and outrageous to permit recovery. Granting in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court found that this claim failed as a matter of law, as no reasonable jury could conclude that manufacturer's inadequate response to plaintiffs' allegations of sexual harassment was extreme and outrageous, even if the allegations were true and even if manufacturer handled the allegations in a negligent manner. Presley v. Pepperidge Farm, Inc., 356 F.Supp.2d 109, 137.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

D.Conn.2004. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. Homeowners brought action for damages arising from allegedly unconstitutional entry and search of their home by police sergeant and officers. Granting in part defendants' summary-judgment motions, this court held, inter alia, that defendants' acts did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The facts showed that multiple police officers acted without proper legal justification to enter and search home; however, they behaved politely and did not threaten or abuse homeowners, and there was no showing of any intent to cause emotional harm. Abdella v. O'Toole, 343 F.Supp.2d 129, 140.

D.Conn.2004. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. Deputy sheriff sued sheriff's department and his supervisors for age discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Plaintiff alleged that defendants engaged in a pattern of discrimination against employees on the basis of age, and that his age motivated defendants to demote him from full-time status to part-time status. This court granted in part defendants' motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that defendants' conduct was not extreme and outrageous. The court stated that, although employment discrimination was illegal, it did not per se give rise to a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress in this case. Allen v. Egan, 303 F.Supp.2d 71, 78.

D.Conn.2004. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. After an African-American firefighter was fired, he sued the town, the town manager, the fire chief, and the assistant fire chief for race discrimination, retaliation, and harassment, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Plaintiff alleged that defendants failed to maintain a work environment safe and free from harassment, retaliation, and discrimination, that the breach of this duty caused plaintiff's work-related stress disorder, and that defendants acted in reckless disregard of plaintiff's civil rights. This court granted defendants summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that defendants' conduct was not so extreme and outrageous as to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Diggs v. Town of Manchester, 303 F.Supp.2d 163, 185.

D.Conn.2004. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Terminated employee sued employer for Title VII discrimination, hostile work environment, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that her supervisor told her that she did not speak proper English, that her co-workers often followed her around the office, that supervisor used profanity on at least one instance when speaking with her, that supervisor relocated her to a cubicle where there was more office traffic, and that a co-worker once searched her desk. This court granted defendant summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that none of defendant's actions were so egregious or oppressive as to rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct. Rose v. Panolam Industries International Inc., 301 F.Supp.2d 239, 247.

D.Conn.2004. Com. (d) quot. in disc., com. (h) cit. in disc. Resident brought action against two towns after they changed their common border, resulting in resident's property being switched from one town to the other. Resident alleged violations of due process, equal protection, takings clause, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting towns' motion to dismiss all claims, this court found, inter alia, that resident's intentional-infliction-of-emotional-distress claim failed because she could not show that the towns' actions constituted "extreme and outrageous" conduct that went beyond all grounds of decency or caused resident severe mental distress. Scott v. Town of Monroe, 306 F.Supp.2d 191, 199.

D.Conn.2003. Com. (h) cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. and cit. in ftn. Teacher sued city, state board, and various other school defendants following nonrenewal of his employment contract, alleging, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting defendants' motion to dismiss, this court held, inter alia, that defendants' actions in connection with decision not to renew teacher's employment contract, which included evaluations and recommendations, questions regarding teacher's qualifications, rude behavior, and hearing appeals, did not rise to level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to sustain claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Golnik v. Amato, 299 F.Supp.2d 8, 15.

D.Conn.2003. Com. (d) quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. in sup. Estranged lover sued former girlfriend, who was police officer, and another officer who had investigated plaintiff's complaints against girlfriend, alleging civil rights violations and intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. This court denied in part girlfriend's motion for summary judgment, holding that there were fact issues as to whether girlfriend's conduct was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support emotional-distress claim. Jury could determine that girlfriend physically threatened plaintiff with harm from herself and members of police department, that she used her department connections to stop the investigation into her conduct, that she lied under oath, and that she used her connections to attack plaintiff's credibility and character and to improperly influence a court. Stack v. Perez, 248 F.Supp.2d 106, 110.

D.Conn.2003. Com. (d) quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. in sup. Estranged lover sued former girlfriend, who was police officer, and another officer who had investigated plaintiff's complaints against girlfriend, alleging civil rights violations and intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. District court granted defendants summary judgment. This court granted in part plaintiff's motion for reconsideration, holding that there were fact issues as to whether investigating officer's conduct was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support emotional-distress claim. Although officer believed plaintiff told the truth, he contacted district court, FBI, and plaintiff's employer, advising them that plaintiff had set forth no truthful allegations against former girlfriend and that he would not recommend that girlfriend be disciplined. He also discouraged plaintiff from pursuing legitimate claim. Stack v. Jaffee, 248 F.Supp.2d 100, 104-105.

D.Conn.2002. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. A secretary in a town's building department sued town's personnel director and a town burgess for 42 U.S.C. § 1983 violations and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Personnel director had issued a disciplinary warning in retaliation for secretary's faxing to a state official an inquiry questioning whether the requirements listed in a town job posting were in accordance with state statute. This court granted in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that while personnel director's conduct might have been unlawful, its unlawfulness did not automatically make it extreme and outrageous. While director's warning might have been a sufficient predicate for First Amendment retaliation liability, it was not, in and of itself, extreme and outrageous. Aquavia v. Goggin, 208 F.Supp.2d 225, 237.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

D.Conn.2002. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Nurse at locked nursing facility in correctional center sued her supervisor for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, after defendant physically prevented her from leaving the facility despite plaintiff's pleas that she be allowed to depart for medical reasons. Denying in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether defendant's coercive exercise of power, during which plaintiff was deprived of her liberty and became extremely agitated, was sufficiently outrageous to state a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Barstow v. Shea, 196 F.Supp.2d 141, 150.

D.Conn.2002. Cit. in sup., cit. in case cit. and quot. in sup., cit. in case cit. in ftn., com. (i) quot. in sup. Female employee sued former employer for Title VII sex and race discrimination, retaliation, intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress, and negligent supervision. This court denied employer's motion for summary judgment as to sex-discrimination and negligent-supervision claims, but granted summary judgment to employer on the other claims. Plaintiff's claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress failed, because employer's alleged failure to investigate or warn others about plaintiff's co-worker's offensive conduct was not intentional or reckless. The court stated that the Connecticut Supreme Court did not intend to engraft a simple negligence standard onto this intentional tort. Brunson v. Bayer Corp., 237 F.Supp.2d 192, 207, 208.

D.Conn.2002. Com. (d) quot. in sup. and ftn., com. (h) cit. in sup. Insurance-company employee who was fired sued employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. This court granted defendant summary judgment on the claim, holding, inter alia, that defendant's conduct was not extreme or outrageous. Plaintiff failed to show that her termination was carried out in an unreasonable, humiliating, or embarrassing manner. She was not terminated in front of her co-workers, she was not yelled at or denigrated during the termination process, she was not forced to clean out her work area in front of co-workers, and she was not paraded to building's main entrance in front of others. Davis v. Liberty Mutual Ins. Co., 218 F.Supp.2d 256, 265.

D.Conn.2002. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Insured sued liability insurer for, in part, bad-faith tort, alleging that defendant failed to provide her with coverage and a defense in an underlying state-court action. Granting defendant's motion to dismiss, the court held, inter alia, that, to the extent that plaintiff's bad-faith claim implicitly contained a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, plaintiff failed to allege that any of the actions taken by defendant were done in a manner that was so egregious or oppressive as to rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct, and thus failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Martin v. American Equity Ins. Co., 185 F.Supp.2d 162, 165.

D.Conn.2001. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Employee who claimed that he had been sexually harassed by a male supervisor brought, in part, a pendent common-law state claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against employer. Granting in part defendant's motion to dismiss, the court held, inter alia, that defendant's alleged negligent failure to prevent the sexual harassment did not rise to the level of intentional, extreme, and outrageous conduct that would support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Abate v. Circuit-Wise, Inc., 130 F.Supp.2d 341, 348.

D.Conn.2001. Coms. (d), (h), and (j) cit. in disc. Public school teacher sued board of education, board members, and certain school employees for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, arising from defendants' response to her wearing to school a tee shirt with the words "JESUS 2000—J2K." Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that defendants' requiring plaintiff to change or cover her tee shirt and vice principal's conduct in pounding on plaintiff's classroom door to get her attention and contacting the assistant superintendent before going to see plaintiff were not sufficiently extreme or outrageous to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Downing v. West Haven Board of Ed., 162 F.Supp.2d 19, 33, 34.

D.Conn.2001. Com. (d) quot. in sup. and cit. in ftn. in sup., com. (h) cit. in disc. African-American employee who quit his job after he was accused of stealing and was demoted sued his former employer for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's interview by defendant and his suspension and demotion did not exceed all bounds of decency, and were not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support his claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Etienne v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 186 F.Supp.2d 129, 136, 137.

D.Conn.2001. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Surgeon brought action for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress against medical school and other physicians in connection with school's conduct in failing to reappoint him and allowing privatization of cardiothoracic surgery practice to the exclusion of plaintiff. Granting defendants summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that school's actions did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to sustain claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Franco v. Yale University, 161 F.Supp.2d 133, 141.

D.Conn.2001. Com. (d) quot. in ftn. Prison counselor sued department of corrections for Title VII violations, equal protection and due process violations, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that she was threatened and harassed for pursuing grievance procedures available to her in challenging poor job-performance evaluations. This court granted in part defendant's motion for judgment on the pleadings, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to satisfy the "extreme and outrageous" standard required to prove a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The average member of the community would not find plaintiff's supervisors' actions of entering plaintiff's office and locking the door to prevent her from leaving to be extreme and outrageous. Garris v. Department of Corrections, 170 F.Supp.2d 182, 189.

D.Conn.2001. Com. (d) quot. in ftn. Driver sued city police officer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that the officer found her at fault in a 1996 accident in retaliation for her complaint against him to the department of motor vehicles in 1990. This court granted defendant summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to satisfy the requirement of extreme and outrageous conduct to sustain a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The average member of the community would not find defendant's acts in investigating routine traffic accidents and attributing fault to one of the drivers to be extreme and outrageous. Menon v. Frinton, 170 F.Supp.2d 190, 198.

D.Conn.2001. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Female employee sued employer after she was terminated, alleging age and gender discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that the mere act of firing plaintiff did not satisfy the requirements of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to support claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Pascal v. Storage Technology Corp., 152 F.Supp.2d 191, 214.

D.Conn.2001. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Employee sued employer for sexual harassment and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that her supervisor made sexual comments and performed highly offensive and unwelcome touchings, including his rubbing up against her, touching her shoulders and back, and pulling her bra strap. This court dismissed plaintiff's emotional-distress claim, holding, inter alia, that employer's conduct and/or inaction in failing to act sooner to prevent supervisor's harassment did not rise to the requisite level of extreme and outrageous conduct. Roberts v. Circuit-Wise, Inc., 142 F.Supp.2d 211, 218.

D.Conn.2001. Com. (d) quot. in disc. and cit. in ftn., com. (h) cit. in disc. Arrestee who was forcibly removed from his vehicle by police officers during an investigative traffic stop after he refused to exit the car and one of the officers drew her gun on him sued city and police officers for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that defendants' actions did not constitute the extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Smith v. City of New Haven, 166 F.Supp.2d 636, 645.

D.Conn.2001. Com. (d) quot. in disc. and cit. in ftn., com. (h) cit. in disc. Former employee sued employer for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting defendant's motion to dismiss, the court held that defendant's alleged actions in intentionally assigning difficult and tedious work in a discriminatory manner, implying that plaintiff's work was "slow," and using plaintiff in order to remain eligible for state contracts under federal and state civil-rights laws did not constitute the extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Whitaker v. Haynes Const. Co., Inc., 167 F.Supp.2d 251, 254, 255.

D.Conn.2000. Com. (d) quot. in disc. Female municipal employee sued city for sex discrimination and retaliation in violation of Title VII, alleging that she was transferred to a less desirable position and even threatened with physical harm after she complained of a sexually hostile workplace. Plaintiff also asserted a state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting in part and denying in part defendant's motion to dismiss, the court held, in part, that plaintiff's sex-discrimination claim was untimely, that she could proceed on her claim for retaliation, and that the conduct complained of, though offensive, was not so egregious as to support recovery under a theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Ericson v. City of Meriden, 113 F.Supp.2d 276, 292, decision affirmed 55 Fed.Appx. 11 (2d Cir.2002).

D.Conn.2000. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Educational consultant sued former employer for breach of contract and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that defendant severely harassed and mistreated him, unfairly placed him on a 60-day performance-improvement plan, and then constructively fired him. This court denied in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that fact issues existed as to whether defendant's conduct was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress. Grossman v. Computer Curriculum Corp., 131 F.Supp.2d 299, 310.

D.Conn.2000. Cit. generally in disc. Female former police officer sued town in which she was employed and male supervisor for, among other things, sexual harassment and intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress. The district court granted defendant town summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that town's alleged refusal to protect plaintiff from male supervisor's sexual harassment was not sufficiently extreme or outrageous to support plaintiff's claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Miner v. Town of Cheshire, 126 F.Supp.2d 184, 195.

D.Conn.2000. Com. (d) cit. in disc. Chief legal counsel for the state department of environment protection sued her superiors for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress and 42 U.S.C. § 1983 violations, alleging that defendants retaliated against her for giving the department certain legal advice. This court denied in part defendants' motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state a viable claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress because defendants' conduct was not extreme and outrageous. Rapkin v. Rocque, 97 F.Supp.2d 244, 246.

D.Conn.1999. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Former employee brought employment discrimination action against employer, asserting claims under federal law and a pendent state-law claim for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held that defendant's alleged negligent failure to prevent sexual harassment of plaintiff by her co-workers did not rise to the level of intentional, extreme, and outrageous conduct that would support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Dobrich v. General Dynamics Corp., Electric Boat Div., 40 F.Supp.2d 90, 104.

D.Conn.1999. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Scientific-affairs coordinator for drug company sued company for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. This court granted in part company's motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's emotional-distress claim failed, because no rational factfinder could conclude that the alleged conduct of yelling at, reprimanding, and transferring plaintiff for work-related issues was extreme and outrageous conduct. Farricielli v. Bayer Corp., 116 F.Supp.2d 280, 286.

D.Conn.1999. Com. (d) quot. in disc. Female former employee sued co-workers and employer for, inter alia, "hostile work environment" sexual harassment, retaliation, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Defendants moved for summary judgment. Granting the motion as to individual defendants and granting in part and denying in part employer's motion, the court held, among other things, that material factual issues existed as to whether offensive epithets used by plaintiff's supervisor could serve as a basis for her "hostile work environment" claim against employer, and that a reasonable juror could conclude that plaintiff was terminated in retaliation for complaining about supervisor's conduct; however, plaintiff had failed to establish that any action taken by employer was so outrageous as to support recovery under a theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Newtown v. Shell Oil Co., 52 F.Supp.2d 366, 375.

D.Conn.1999. Cit. generally in sup. Former employee who was injured during an assault in his office sued his former employer, among others, alleging, in part, that defendant's termination of his employment after he filed a worker's compensation claim constituted intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting in part defendant's motion to dismiss, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's allegations that he was wrongfully terminated and falsely accused by defendant of "disagreeable conduct" did not state the extreme or outrageous conduct that was necessary to sustain a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Venterina v. Cummings & Lockwood, 117 F.Supp.2d 114, 119.

D.Conn.1998. Com. (d) quot. in disc. Sixty-year-old former employee who believed that his position was eliminated because of his age sued former employer for violations of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act. Plaintiff also asserted common law claims for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Defendant moved for summary judgment. Granting the motion in part and denying it in part, the court held that, while plaintiff had established a prima facie case of age discrimination, he had failed to show that defendant's conduct was so extreme and outrageous as to rise to the level necessary to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Rose v. James River Paper Co., 2 F.Supp.2d 245, 253.

D.Conn.1998. Com. (d) quot. in disc. An African-American radiology technician for a hospital sued the hospital for, among other claims, wrongful termination and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted in part and denied in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that, although defendant may not have applied the hospital's progressive discipline policies in an ideal manner, its behavior did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct. Plaintiff was an at-will employee who was terminated because her supervisors believed her performance violated hospital policies relating to patient care. Instances in which plaintiff's supervisor stated to her, "How could you, a black, single mother, go away on vacation?" and "How could you, a single mother, afford to send your children to private school?" constituted conduct that was merely insulting, reflected bad taste, or resulted in bad feelings. Thomas v. St. Francis Hosp. and Medical Center, 990 F.Supp. 81, 91, affirmed 198 F.3d 235 (2d Cir.1999).

D.Conn.1998. Com. (h) cit. in disc. A male nurse sued his employer for Title VII violations and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that he endured harassment and a delay in his promotion because of his gender and his homosexuality. This court granted defendant summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's allegations that defendant discriminated against him, disciplined him, denied him a promotion, and harassed him failed to allege extreme or outrageous conduct. White v. Martin, 23 F.Supp.2d 203, 208, affirmed 198 F.3d 235 (2d Cir.1999).

D.Conn.1997. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. City employee sued a city council member, among others, for violations of her civil rights under § 1983 and for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Connecticut common law, alleging that defendant's cruel and abusive treatment as her supervisor caused her to have a nervous breakdown. Granting in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that defendant's alleged conduct in ordering plaintiff to purchase illegal drugs and to stand guard while defendant ingested them, ordering plaintiff to perform personal errands and tasks for defendant's private employer, making repeated telephone calls to plaintiff at her home, threatening to terminate plaintiff's employment and replace her with an individual of another race, implementing discriminatory sick-time policies, monitoring work attendance, and repeatedly criticizing plaintiff in the presence of others was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to sustain a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. DeLeon v. Little, 981 F.Supp. 728, 738.

D.Conn.1997. Com. (d) quot. in sup. An employee brought a state-law employment discrimination lawsuit against her employer and asserted, in part, a common law cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's allegations that she received 25 cents per hour less than other security guards and that, when she brought this to the attention of defendant and began investigating, she was subjected to adverse employment conditions, including being transferred to two other locations, being disciplined, and being reprimanded, failed to assert conduct on the part of defendant that was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Hill v. Pinkerton Sec. & Investigation Services, 977 F.Supp. 148, 160.

D.Conn.1997. Cit. in disc., com. (d) cit. in disc. In wrongful-discharge action, former employee sued former employer for, inter alia, negligent infliction of emotional distress. After the court entered judgment on a jury verdict for employee, employer renewed its motion for judgment as a matter of law. Denying the motion, the court, after providing a brief history of the torts of intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress, held that to support a workplace claim for the latter, a worker was required to prove that the employer's conduct in the termination process was unreasonable, and that, in this case, the evidence was sufficient to support such a finding. Malik v. Carrier Corp., 986 F.Supp. 86, 90, affirmed in part, reversed in part 202 F.3d 97 (2d Cir.2000).

D.Conn.1996. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. in sup. Employee who allegedly was advised that he was being terminated for poor performance and then was escorted out of the building “like a criminal” sued his former employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held, in part, that defendant's alleged conduct did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Johnson v. Chesebrough-Pond's USA Co., 918 F.Supp. 543, 552, affirmed 104 F.3d 355 (2d Cir.1996).

D.Conn.1996. Com. (d) quot. in disc. Former employee of town waste-water treatment plant who was allegedly terminated because of his age sued plant superintendent and first selectman, among others, for, inter alia, violations of 42 U.S.C. §§ 1983 and 1985, and for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Defendants moved to dismiss. Granting the motion in part and denying it in part, the court held that plaintiff was entitled to proceed with his § 1983 claim, and that plaintiff could pursue his claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress based on his bare allegations of defendants' extreme and outrageous conduct; however, plaintiff had failed to allege sufficient facts to state a claim of conspiracy under § 1985. Reed v. Town of Branford, 949 F.Supp. 87, 92.

D.Conn.1996. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. A white female police officer in a town's police department sued the town and a police lieutenant, alleging violations of her constitutional rights and asserting a state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Dismissing the complaint, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress because plaintiff's allegations that the lieutenant made derogatory comments about plaintiff's marriage to a black man, referred to plaintiff as “bitch,” gave her an assignment babysitting a group of young children because it was considered unfitting for a male officer, and disciplined her more severely than a male officer did not describe conduct that met the “extreme and outrageous” standard necessary to assert such a claim under Connecticut law. Williams v. Perry, 960 F.Supp. 534, 541.

D.Conn.1995. Com. (i) cit. in disc. In civil rights action, individual sued municipality and municipal employees for, inter alia, unintentional infliction of emotional distress. Defendants moved to dismiss. Granting in part and denying in part the motion, the court held that plaintiff's emotional-distress claims were based on defendants' negligence and, therefore, barred by the qualified immunity that protected municipal employees from liability for negligent performance of discretionary acts. To the extent that plaintiff's complaint could be read as stating a claim for intentional, willful, wanton, or reckless infliction of emotional distress, it was merely duplicative of the other counts. Karbowicz v. Borough of Naugatuck, 921 F.Supp. 77, 77-78.

D.Conn.1994. Quot. in case cit. in disc. Female employee of telephone company brought Title VII sex-discrimination claim against employer and individual supervisors. Plaintiff also alleged various state law claims, including intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting in part and denying in part defendants' motion to dismiss, the court dismissed one supervisor from the case and held that plaintiff's claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress against employer was barred by the exclusive provisions of the state workers' compensation statute, but she could proceed against the remaining supervisor. The court could not say that the behavior plaintiff described and complained of was not so outrageous as to be actionable. Gregory v. Southern New England Telephone Co., 896 F.Supp. 78, 85.

D.Conn.1993. Com. (d) quot. in disc. A discharged teacher's assistant sued the school and its director of personnel, alleging wrongful discharge, breach of contract, and other state law claims. Granting in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that discharge of the plaintiff for writing an anonymous letter alleging an incident of child abuse at the school was not extreme and outrageous conduct sufficient to support a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress, even if, as plaintiff alleged, defendants failed to conduct an adequate investigation before dismissing her and even if defendants knew or should have known that the dismissal was not justified. Ziobro v. Connecticut Institute for the Blind, 818 F.Supp. 497, 502.

D.Conn.1987. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. A senior executive whose employment was terminated with entitlement to three years' salary and benefits sued the company on contract and fraud claims, and for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging denial of reimbursement of his daughter's medical expenses under a basket plan additional coverage policy. This court granted summary judgment for the defendant, holding that the plaintiff had failed to prove the existence of the additional coverage, and the allegations, even if proved, did not approach the outrageous character required to maintain the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Economu v. Borg-Warner Corp., 652 F.Supp. 1242, 1253, affirmed 829 F.2d 311 (2d Cir. 1987).

D.Conn.1987. Com. (d) quot. in disc. An employee sued his former employer for fraudulent representations and intentional infliction of emotional distress following his termination from his sales position. This court granted the defendant's motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that the plaintiff's allegations were insufficient as a matter of law to support a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, where the claims were based for the most part on misrepresentations regarding the plaintiff's prospects and the company's past performance, which did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to support a claim on this tort. Kintner v. Nidec-Torin Corp., 662 F.Supp. 112, 114.

D.Conn.1986. Cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. in sup. The general manager of a company resigned when he was denied a leave of absence for medical reasons. When he later reapplied for his vacant position, the company refused to hire him. He sued the company for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment, stating that the defendant's conduct could not be reasonably regarded as so extreme and outrageous as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency. In addition, the court noted that the plaintiff had not sustained severe emotional distress. Reed v. Signode Corp., 652 F.Supp. 129, 136, 137.

D.Conn.1985. Subsec. (1) cit. in disc., coms. (d) and (h) cit. in disc. After the employment of a foreign national was terminated, he sued his former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and his wife sued for loss of consortium. The defendant moved to dismiss a number of counts of the complaint, and this court granted the motion. It ruled that the plaintiff had failed to introduce facts from which a jury would be permitted to infer that the defendant's conduct had been sufficiently extreme and outrageous to recover for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court also ruled that the wife's claim for loss of consortium, allegedly the result of her husband's emotional strain and job-hunting trips outside this country, necessarily failed because Connecticut would not recognize such a claim in the absence of physical injury to the spouse. Collins v. Gulf Oil Corp., 605 F.Supp. 1519, 1521, 1522, 1524.

D.Del.

D.Del.2011. Cit. in sup. Former employee brought a state-law claim for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against employer, its subsidiary, and headhunter, alleging that his employment was terminated because he refused to provide pre-employment medical records, engaged in protected whistle-blowing activities, and was subjected to racial profiling and discrimination. This court granted headhunter's motion to dismiss the IIED claim, holding that plaintiff failed to allege facts indicating that defendants' conduct was extreme or outrageous, or that plaintiff suffered emotional distress so severe as to give rise to an actionable claim. Tani v. FPL/Next Era Energy, 811 F.Supp.2d 1004, 1024.

D.Del.2008. Quot. in sup. Supermarket deli worker brought federal civil-rights and Delaware common-law claims against supermarket, alleging discrimination and harassment. This court, inter alia, granted defendant's motion for summary judgment on plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that plaintiff failed to escape the exclusivity provision of the Delaware Workers' Compensation Act by showing defendant's deliberate intent to bring about an injury to her. The court found no evidence that defendant intended to cause plaintiff emotional distress, concluding that, at worst, plaintiff showed only that defendant negligently failed to investigate her complaints of harassment and discrimination by her supervisors and co-workers. Nieves v. Acme Markets, Inc., 541 F.Supp.2d 600, 611.

D.Del.2006. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. State prisoner infected with the Hepatitis C Virus brought pro se civil-rights suit against state department of corrections officers and contract medical company's employees, including a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendants' failure to provide him with a medical evaluation by a liver specialist and a liver biopsy amounted to outrageous conduct that had caused him great emotional distress and anxiety. This court granted summary judgment for defendants, holding, inter alia, that, despite evidence from outside doctor that the biopsy was needed, defendants' conduct in denying the treatment was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support the distress claim, because it was in line with medical standards adopted by the department of corrections and medical company. Jordan v. Delaware, 433 F.Supp.2d 433, 444.

D.Del.1999. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. and quot. in ftn., coms. (h) and (j) cit. in cases quot. in disc. Contract employee for state agency sued employees of another state agency, alleging, among other things, that defendants' actions caused her employment contract to be terminated. Entering partial summary judgment for defendants, the court held, inter alia, that a confrontation during which defendants grabbed plaintiff could not serve as a basis for recovery under a theory of negligent or intentional infliction of emotional distress, or false imprisonment. Lloyd v. Jefferson, 53 F.Supp.2d 643, 673, 674.

D.Del.1996. Subsec. (1) cit. in disc. Female former bank employees sued former supervisor for, inter alia, violations of Title VII, intentional infliction of emotional distress, tortious interference with contract, and tortious interference with another's performance of his own contract. Defendant moved to dismiss. Granting the motion in part and denying it in part, this court held that defendant could not be found individually liable under Title VII; that the exclusivity provision of the state Workers' Compensation Act barred the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress; that defendant could be found to have tortiously interfered with plaintiffs' at-will employment agreements; and that material factual issues existed as to whether defendant was acting within the scope of his employment when he allegedly induced the contract breaches. Nelson v. Fleet Nat. Bank, 949 F.Supp. 254, 259.

D.Del.1993. Cit. in headnote, quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. A man suffered permanent injury to his foot after hospital personnel labelled him homosexual and transferred him to another hospital because of his perceived sexual orientation and HIV status. Man sued hospital and treating physician for intentional infliction of emotional distress and discrimination under the Rehabilitation Act. This court denied in part defendants' motions for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff stated cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress because jury could find that doctor's alleged refusal to render medical treatment to plaintiff for unacceptable discriminatory reasons based on hospital staff members' derogatory comments that plaintiff was homosexual was extreme and outrageous conduct, especially in light of the fact that doctor knew that his refusal to treat plaintiff could cause plaintiff serious permanent injury. Furthermore, hospital could be liable for emotional distress because jury could find extreme and outrageous defendant's actions in branding plaintiff a homosexual, thereby causing doctor's refusal to treat plaintiff, and in transferring plaintiff for inappropriate discriminatory reasons. Miller v. Spicer, 822 F.Supp. 158, 159, 168.

D.Del.1985. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in disc. Two injured employees who were entitled to disability benefits sued an insurance company for its failure to pay or its delay in making payments for compensable medical treatment, alleging wrongful termination of benefits without a hearing on the merits in violation of a state compensation statute, and intentional infliction of emotional distress suffered from loss of reputation and impaired credit ratings. The district court dismissed the statutory claim, holding that the nonpayment of bills in itself did not constitute a “termination of compensation” within the meaning of the statute. The court denied the insurance company's motion for summary judgment on the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that there was insufficient evidence on the record to say that no reasonable fact finder could determine that the insurance company's intentional withholding of payments constituted extreme and outrageous conduct. Correa v. Pennsylvania Mfrs. Ass'n Ins. Co., 618 F.Supp. 915, 928.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

D.Del.1982. Com. (d) quot. in part in sup., subsec. (1) quot. in sup. The plaintiff brought an action alleging that her former employer had violated her constitutional rights and committed breach of contract and various state torts by constructively discharging her through forced resignation. On motion for summary judgment by the defendant, the court dismissed the constitutional claims, noting that they were based on the Fourteenth Amendment and ruling that the conduct of the defendant with respect to the plaintiff was not state action. The court also granted the defendant summary judgment on the breach of contract claim, indicating that the plaintiff's employment was at will and that the terms of her employment had not been altered by guarantees contained in an employee handbook published after her hiring. After holding that the libel, slander, and defamation claims were barred by the statute of limitations, the court also granted judgment to the defendant on the plaintiff's other state law claims. The court noted that the plaintiff's own admissions showed that the elements for intentional and/or negligent infliction of mental distress were lacking. The plaintiff's testimony demonstrated she had suffered neither emotional problems nor bodily or physical harm as a result of the defendant's actions, and the defendant's actions were insufficient, as a matter of law, to constitute the outrageous conduct on which liability for such claims was founded. Avallone v. Wilmington Medical Center, Inc., 553 F.Supp. 931, 938.

D.D.C.

D.D.C.2023. Cit. in sup. In an action arising from terrorist attacks in Iraq and Afghanistan, victims of the attacks and their family members filed claims under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act against the Islamic Republic of Iran, alleging that defendant provided material support and resources to the terrorists who were responsible for the attacks. Granting in part plaintiffs' motion for default judgment, the court held that plaintiffs sufficiently alleged a claim for solatium, which, under the Act, were indistinguishable from claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court reasoned, in part, that acts of terrorism were by definition extreme and outrageous conduct intended to cause emotional distress, and that the attacks at issue were directed at victims, and the Act exempted the requirement that family members be present at the time of the attack when the attackers were terrorists. Roth v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 651 F.Supp.3d 65, 94, 95.

D.D.C.2023. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in sup. U.S. Navy sailors, who were injured in a terrorist bombing of a U.S. Navy ship, and their family members brought, among other things, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against Iran, alleging that defendant provided material support and resources to terrorist group responsible for the attack. This court granted plaintiffs' motion for default judgment, holding that defendant would be held liable for damages on plaintiffs' IIED claim under the state-sponsored terrorism exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act. The court noted that acts of terrorism by their very definition were extreme and outrageous conduct and intended to cause severe emotional distress, such that defendants were liable under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Taitt v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 664 F.Supp.3d 63, 90.

D.D.C.2022. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup., subsec. (2) cit. in case cit. in sup. Family of 16-year-old victim who was shot and killed by member of terrorist group filed wrongful-death and survival claims against the Syrian Arab Republic and Islamic Republic of Iran, seeking to hold defendants liable for materially supporting the group in carrying out the attack under the state-sponsored terrorism exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act. This court granted plaintiffs' motion for default judgment against defendants, holding, among other things, that plaintiffs established that defendants intentionally inflicted emotional distress, such that defendants would be held liable to plaintiffs for solatium damages. The court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46 in reasoning that presence was not required in cases involving terrorism, because terrorism was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to demonstrate that it was intended to inflict severe motional harm on those not present at the site of the attack. Ben-Yishai v. Syrian Arab Republic, 642 F.Supp.3d 110, 129.

D.D.C.2022. Subsecs. (1) and (2) quot. in sup. Victims of terrorist attacks in Israel and victims' families, who were citizens of the United States and Israel, sued Iran and Syria, seeking compensatory and punitive damages under the terrorism exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act based on allegations that defendants provided material support and resources to the terrorists who carried out the attacks. This court granted in part plaintiffs' motion for a default judgment after defendants failed to respond or appear, holding that defendants were liable to all United States plaintiffs who were related to victims of the attacks for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, regardless of whether they were present at the attacks. The court pointed to evidence that defendants supported the terrorists with the intent to cause harmful contact, that acts of terrorism were inherently extreme and outrageous, and that those plaintiffs suffered mental anguish hand trauma as a result of the attacks. Borochov v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 589 F.Supp.3d 15, 36, 37.

D.D.C.2022. Cit. in sup., subsec. (1) quot. in sup., subsec. (2) cit. and quot. in sup. Victims of terrorist attack in Israel and victims' family members filed claims for battery and loss of solatium against Iran under the terrorism exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, alleging that Iran provided material support to the terrorists who committed the attack. This court granted in part plaintiffs' motion for a default judgment after defendant failed to respond, holding, among other things, that plaintiffs had established defendant's liability the federal private right of action for their solatium claims. The court noted that, under the Act, a claim for loss of solatium was indistinguishable from a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46; here, the court reasoned, plaintiffs sufficiently alleged that defendant provided material support to the terrorists with the understanding and intent that the terrorists would carry out attacks in Israel, and plaintiffs suffered severe emotional distress as a result. Mark v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 626 F.Supp.3d 16, 34.

D.D.C.2022. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup., subsec. (2)(a) cit. in case cit. in sup. As part of a wider action, family of American servicemembers and a military contractor who were injured or killed in terrorist attacks while serving in Iraq sued the Islamic Republic of Iran under the terrorism exception of the Foreign Sovereign Immunity Act, seeking damages for loss of solation based on allegations that defendant's support of the attacks caused plaintiffs extreme emotional distress. This court granted plaintiffs' motion for a default judgment, holding that plaintiffs stated a valid theory of recovery as to their claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court noted that IIED claims under the Act could be brought by immediate family members of victims of terrorist attacks even if the family members were not present at the site of the attack. Stearns v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 633 F.Supp.3d 284, 352, 353.

D.D.C.2021. Cit. in sup.; com. (d) cit. in sup. Convicted motorist brought, among other things, claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) and use of excessive force against police officer and the District of Columbia, alleging that police officer, upon stopping plaintiff for his unregistered vehicle, attempted to stop plaintiff from fleeing while police officer was holding onto the engine hood by injuring him with a firearm. This court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding that plaintiff's IIED claim failed as a matter of law, because police officer's conduct was not extreme or outrageous. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, the court explained that police officer's conduct was not unreasonable under the circumstances for the purposes of the excessive-force claim, and plaintiff did not contest defendants' assertion that a finding of reasonableness precluded a finding of extreme and outrageous conduct. Bushrod v. District of Columbia, 521 F.Supp.3d 1, 30.

D.D.C.2021. Cit. in sup., cit. in case cit. in sup. (general cite). Family members of deceased terrorist-attack victims, among others, brought a claim for solatium under the terrorism exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act against the Islamic Republic of Iran, alleging that defendant trained, funded, and supported the terrorist attack that killed decedents. This court granted plaintiffs' motion for default judgment, holding that plaintiffs sufficiently alleged a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). The court pointed out that a claim for solatium under the terrorism exception of the Act was indistinguishable from an IIED claim as set forth in Restatement Second of Torts § 46, and explained that terrorist acts were by their nature extreme and outrageous, the attack caused severe emotional distress in plaintiffs, defendant's conduct was directed at decedents, and plaintiffs were decedents' immediate family members. Selig v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 573 F.Supp.3d 40, 63.

D.D.C.2020. Quot. in case quot. in sup.; subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup.; com. (i) and caveat cit. in case cit. in sup. Immediate family members and estates of deceased victims of bombings at the U.S. embassy in Lebanon filed an action under the terrorism exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act against Iran, alleging that defendant sponsored and supported the terrorist bombings, and seeking damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). This court granted in part plaintiffs' motion for default judgment, holding, inter alia, that they established the basis of defendant's liability for injuries directly inflicted on decedents and injuries indirectly on family members. The court explained that it was self-evident that defendant's role in the bombings was intended to cause a high degree of emotional distress to both decedents and immediate family members, and noted that an act of terrorism, by its very definition, was an extreme and outrageous act that met the requirement for an IIED claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Barry v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 437 F.Supp.3d 15, 44, 50, 51.

D.D.C.2020. Com. (d) cit. in sup. Former patient filed claims for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress against fertility clinic after it dismissed her as a patient. This court granted in part and denied in part clinic's motion for summary judgment, holding that, while patient could go forward on her claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress based on her allegations that clinic discriminated against her and retaliated against her, she could not proceed based on allegations that clinic's regional manager used "aggressive language" during a phone call in which she presented patient with the option of leaving the clinic's practice. The court reasoned that, while the regional manager's call was undoubtedly distressing, her tone and choice of language was not plausibly outrageous enough to have added to that distress in an actionable way under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. E.M. v. Shady Grove Reproductive Science Center P.C., 496 F.Supp.3d 338, 408.

D.D.C.2020. Subsec. (1) and (2) quot. in case quot. in sup. Family of U.S. Marines service member who was stationed at the U.S. embassy in Lebanon brought claims of intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) under the terrorism exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act against the Islamic Republic of Iran, alleging that defendant provided material support to the terrorists who perpetrated the bombing, and that the attack severely traumatized service member and substantially deteriorated plaintiffs' relationship with him. This court granted plaintiffs' motion for entry of default judgment, holding that plaintiffs provided satisfactory evidence for their IIED claim. The court observed that, under federal caselaw, plaintiffs did not need to show that they were present at the site of the attack to sustain their claim for IIED under Restatement Second of Torts § 46 so long as they were the immediate family members of service member, because terrorism by its nature was directed at both service member and his family. Ewan v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 466 F.Supp.3d 236, 245, 246.

D.D.C.2020. Quot. in sup. U.S. citizens residing in Israel, among others, brought claims of intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against Syria and Iran, asserting jurisdiction under the terrorism exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, alleging that defendants provided material support to a terrorist group whose attack destroyed plaintiffs' home while plaintiffs were away. This court denied in part plaintiffs' motion for entry of default judgment, holding that plaintiffs failed to establish a waiver of sovereign immunity under the Act, because they failed to satisfactorily prove the elements of an IIED claim. The court explained that the emotional distress plaintiffs suffered when they witnessed the destruction of their home, without evidence that they also suffered any physical injury or were the direct targets of the attack, could not form the basis of an IIED claim under Restatement Second of Torts §§ 46 and 47. Force v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 464 F.Supp.3d 323, 362.

D.D.C.2020. Quot. in sup.; subsec. (2)(a) cit. in case cit. in sup.; com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup.; com. (i) quot. in sup. (erron. quot. as com. (d)). Brother of deceased U.S. Army service member brought a state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) under the terrorism exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act against the Islamic Republic of Iran, among others, alleging that defendant provided material support to terrorist groups who abducted, tortured, and murdered service member. This court granted plaintiff's motion for entry of default judgment, holding that plaintiff substantiated his IIED claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court explained that plaintiff satisfactorily established that he was the immediate family member of service member, that defendant's conduct was extreme, outrageous, and intentional, and that he suffered devastating emotional trauma from the loss of his brother; furthermore, plaintiff was not required to have been present for defendant's outrageous conduct against service member, because caselaw established that family members did not need to personally witness the tortious action to sustain an IIED claim under § 46. Fritz v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 466 F.Supp.3d 13, 17-19.

D.D.C.2020. Subsecs. (2)(a) and (2)(b) quot. in case quot. in sup. Family members of employee of the U.S. embassy in Kenya, who was injured in a terrorist bombing of the embassy, brought, among other things, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against the Republic of Iran and the Iranian Ministry of Information and Security, asserting jurisdiction under the terrorism exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, and alleging that defendants provided material support to the terrorists that bombed the embassy, which resulted in plaintiffs suffering severe emotional damages. This court granted plaintiffs' motion for default judgment, holding that plaintiffs demonstrated that they were entitled to solatium damages caused by defendants' support of the terrorists. The court explained that, although plaintiffs were not the direct victims of the bombing, they had a valid IIED claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, because they established that the terrorist bombing was outrageous and extreme, they suffered severe emotional distress, and they were the immediate family members of the victim. Kinyua v. Republic of Sudan, 466 F.Supp.3d 1, 9.

D.D.C.2020. Subsecs. (1), (2)(a), and (2)(b) quot. in cases quot. in sup. In an action arising from the 1998 bombing of a U.S. Embassy in Kenya, U.S. nationals or employees of the U.S. government who were direct victims of the bombings, along with their immediate family members, filed claims under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act against the Islamic Republic of Iran, among others, alleging that defendants provided material support to the terrorists that perpetrated the bombings. On remand, this court held that Iran was liable to victims' family members for solatium damages stemming from victims' injuries. The court noted that immediate family members of injured victims were not required to independently satisfy the "presence" requirement to recover for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, because a terrorist attack, by its nature, was directed not only at the victims but also at the victims' families. Sheikh v. Republic of Sudan, 485 F.Supp.3d 255, 266.

D.D.C.2019. Quot. in sup., cit. in case cit. in sup.; subsecs. (1) and (2)(a) cit. in case cit. in sup. Former captive and his sister brought, among other things, claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) under the terrorism exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act against the Islamic Republic of Iran, alleging that defendant's threats against and torture of former captive for more than three years while he was detained in Iran caused plaintiffs severe emotional distress. This court entered a default judgment against defendant, holding that plaintiffs adequately alleged sufficient facts to support their IIED claim. The court explained that, under Restatement

Second of Torts § 46, torture, threats, and keeping a person in inhumane conditions for more than three years constituted extreme and outrageous conduct, and that, under § 46, sister was entitled to bring an IIED claim, because defendant's conduct was directed at her immediate family. Abedini v. Government of Islamic Republic of Iran, 422 F.Supp.3d 118, 133, 135.

D.D.C.2019. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup., cit. in case cit. in sup. (general cite). Victims of a terrorist bombing of a U.S. embassy brought an action against the Islamic Republic of Iran, asserting jurisdiction under the terrorism exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act based on allegations that defendant sponsored the terrorist bombing, and alleging, inter alia, a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). This court granted in part plaintiffs' motion for default judgment, holding that plaintiffs articulated the elements of an IIED claim by establishing that defendant provided material support for the terrorists and caused plaintiffs' injuries and trauma. The court explained that acts of terrorism were by definition extreme and outrageous conduct as defined by Restatement Second of Torts § 46, because such acts were intended to cause the highest degree of emotional distress. Barry v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 410 F.Supp.3d 161, 176, 177.

D.D.C.2019. Cit. in sup.; subsec. (1) cit. in sup. Family of an American war journalist who was killed in Syria by an artillery attack launched by the Syrian military brought an action under the state-sponsored terrorism exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act against the Syrian Arab Republic. After defendant failed to plead or otherwise defend against the complaint, this court granted plaintiffs' motion for a default judgment against defendant, finding that plaintiffs had provided more than satisfactory evidence to demonstrate that journalist's death resulted from an extrajudicial killing committed by defendant. The court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46 in noting that plaintiffs could recover under a theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress even though they were not personally present at the scene, because defendant intentionally carried out an attack that caused plaintiffs severe emotional distress. Colvin v. Syrian Arab Republic, 363 F.Supp.3d 141, 157.

D.D.C.2019. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup.; subsec. (2)(a) and com. (j) quot. in sup.; caveat cit. in sup. United States servicemembers and others filed a private cause of action against the North Korean government in connection with allegations that defendant was liable as a state sponsor of terrorism for the actions of its agents, who kidnapped, imprisoned, and tortured servicemembers for almost a year. After defendant failed to respond or appear, this court granted plaintiffs' motion for a partial default judgment, holding that defendant was liable to plaintiffs under the terrorism exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act. The court reasoned, in part, that plaintiffs showed that defendant was liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, given the uncontroverted evidence that defendant's actions were extreme and outrageous and were intended to cause—and did cause—extreme distress and terror in servicemembers, their estates, and their families. Doe v. Democratic People's Republic of Korea Ministry of Foreign Affairs Jungsong-Dong, 414 F.Supp.3d 109, 128.

D.D.C.2019. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup. Journalist, brother, and mother brought, among other things, claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) under the terrorism exception of the Foreign Sovereign Immunity Act against the Islamic Republic of Iran, alleging, inter alia, that plaintiffs suffered severe emotional distress when defendant took journalist hostage, threatened him, and tortured him for more than a year. This court granted plaintiffs' motion for default judgment, holding that plaintiffs sufficiently established the elements of their IIED claims. The court reasoned that journalist's detention and torture constituted extreme and outrageous conduct that inflicted severe emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46(1), and explained that brother and mother were entitled to bring an IIED claim for the torture inflicted upon journalist, because they were the immediate family members of the target of defendant's outrageous conduct. Rezaian v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 422 F.Supp.3d 164, 179.

D.D.C.2019. Cit. in sup. (general cite). Estate and family of deceased Iraqi contractor brought claims under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act against the Islamic Republic of Iran, alleging that defendant formed, trained, funded, supplied, and directed the terrorist organization that kidnapped, tortured, and killed contractor. This court granted in part plaintiffs' motion for a default judgment, holding that certain plaintiffs stated claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress under the applicable District of Columbia law. The court noted that the District of Columbia had adopted the standard in Restatement Second of Torts § 46 for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and concluded that plaintiffs had satisfied all of the elements in § 46, because acts of terrorism were, by their very definition, extreme and outrageous, and five of the six plaintiffs had presented evidence that they suffered severe emotional distress due to the acts of terrorism directed at contractor. W.A. v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 427 F.Supp.3d 117, 140.

D.D.C.2018. Subsec. (1) and com. (l) quot. in sup. In an action arising from the bombing of a residential complex in Saudi Arabia, surviving victims and their family members brought an action under the terrorism exception of the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act against the Islamic Republic of Iran and a branch of its armed forces, alleging that defendants provided material support to the terrorist organization that carried out the bombing. After defendants failed to appear, this court granted in part plaintiffs' motion for a default judgment, holding that defendants were liable to both surviving victims and their families for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, because plaintiffs alleged that defendants engaged in extreme and outrageous conduct by providing material support to a known terrorist organization, and the organization's attack caused plaintiffs extreme emotional distress. The court noted that, although victims' family members were not present at the time of the attack, defendants' conduct was sufficiently outrageous and intended to inflict severe emotional harm on persons who were not present, such that family members were not required to have been present to recover for their emotional distress. Akins v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 332 F.Supp.3d 1, 36, 37.

D.D.C.2018. Subsec. (1) quot. in disc.; subsec. (2)(a) cit. in case cit. in disc.; com. (l) quot. in disc. After United States citizen was killed in a terrorist attack in Jerusalem, decedent's parents and siblings filed a lawsuit under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (FSIA) against the Islamic Republic of Iran, alleging that defendant had supported and caused the terrorist attack that resulted in decedent's death. This court granted plaintiffs' motion for default judgment, holding, inter alia, that the FSIA permitted plaintiffs to bring various tort claims against foreign governments. The court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46 in explaining that plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress was meritorious because the extreme and outrageous nature of the terrorist attack waived the general requirement of their physical presence at the time of the wrongful act. Estate of Hirshfeld v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 330 F.Supp.3d 107, 141.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

D.D.C.2018. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Employee filed a breach-of-contract action against former employer, and, more than 11 years later, sought to add a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) based on allegations that defendant failed to maintain health insurance for plaintiff's family, threatened a public smear campaign against plaintiff, and misrepresented the grounds for plaintiff's departure from employment. This court denied plaintiff's motions for leave to amend the complaint and for reconsideration, holding that plaintiff's IIED claim did meet the plausibility standard for surviving a motion to dismiss, because it lacked specific allegations about defendant's allegedly extreme and outrageous behavior. The court quoted Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, in explaining that the proposed amended complaint lacked factual details to show that defendants conduct was sufficiently outrageous to support an IIED claim. Klayman v. Judicial Watch, Inc., 296 F.Supp.3d 208, 216.

D.D.C.2017. Cit. in case quot. in sup.; subsec. (1) quot. in sup.; com. (l) cit. in sup. Parents, grandparents, and estate of infant killed in a terrorist attack by Hamas brought an action under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (FSIA) against the Islamic Republic of Iran and the Syrian Arab Republic, claiming that defendants provided material support to the terrorists and were liable under several tort theories, including wrongful death, assault, battery, and intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). This court granted plaintiffs' motion for default judgment, holding that plaintiffs demonstrated satisfactory evidence establishing the elements of the terrorism exception to the FSIA and that the attack was an extrajudicial killing for which defendants acted as state sponsors. Relying on Restatement Second of Torts § 46 in discussing the IIED claims, the court explained that parents were permitted to recover as members of infant's immediate family who were present at the attack and grandparents were permitted to recover, even though they were not physically present, because defendants' support of terrorism was sufficiently outrageous and specifically intended to inflict severe emotional harm on those not present. Braun v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 228 F.Supp.3d 64, 81.

D.D.C.2017. Com. (d) quot. in cases quot. in sup. Customer filed a pro se action against pharmacy and its chief executive officer, seeking to assert claims for negligence and intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with various incidents in which a pharmacist gave her the incorrect medication or medical supplies and delayed her ability to receive the correct medication and supplies. Granting summary judgment for defendants, this court held, among other things, that plaintiff failed to allege facts that, if proven true, established conduct by defendants that was extreme and outrageous, as required to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court explained that, under District of Columbia law and Restatement Second of Torts § 46, the conduct alleged had to be so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency. Carty v. CVS Pharmacy, LLC, 264 F.Supp.3d 190, 196.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

D.D.C.2017. Subsec. (2)(a) cit. in disc.; com. (j) quot. in sup. U.S. citizen, her husband, and her five children injured in a Hamas bus attack in Israel brought an action under the terrorism exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act against the Islamic Republic of Iran, alleging that defendant had long-provided material support and resources to Hamas' terroristic activities. This court granted plaintiffs' motion for default judgment, holding that they demonstrated defendant's liability for their injuries under theories of battery, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and solatium. The court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46 for various forms of demonstrating emotional distress, noting that liability was imposed only where the distress inflicted was so severe that no reasonable man could be expected to endure it, and pointed out that the extreme and outrageous character of a defendant's conduct was important evidence of the existence of emotional distress. Cohen v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 238 F.Supp.3d 71, 84, 85.

D.D.C.2017. Cit. in ftn. and cit. in case quot. in ftn. (general cite). Family of U.S. citizen who was kidnapped and murdered in Israel by members of a terrorist organization brought an action under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act against the Islamic Republic of Iran and others, alleging that defendants assisted the organization and were therefore liable for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with the kidnapping and murder. After a hearing, this court entered a default judgment against defendants in favor of plaintiffs. In making its decision, the court noted that the Act provided a private right of action against responsible foreign states to U.S. citizens who were victims of state-sponsored terrorism, and that federal courts looked to Restatement Second of Torts § 46 as the controlling substantive law in claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress arising under the Act. Fraenkel v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 248 F.Supp.3d 21, 34.

D.D.C.2017. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Individual who suffered from physical and mental impairments filed, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against law firm that had represented clients in an action against plaintiff, alleging that defendant discriminated against him on the basis of his disability by ignoring his counsel's request that a computer or tablet be provided for his use during a deposition because of his disability and reliance on visual aids, and that defendant's failure to provide him with either of those items caused him stress and led him to seek help from a health-care facility. This court granted defendant's motion to dismiss, holding that, even if defendant was aware of plaintiff's particular susceptibility, its failure to provide him with a laptop or tablet was not the type of behavior required to support an IIED claim. The court quoted Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, in describing the type of outrageous and extreme behavior necessary to establish liability for an IIED claim. Jefferson v. Stinson Morrison Heckler LLP, 249 F.Supp.3d 76, 84.

D.D.C.2017. Coms. (d) and (f) quot. in case quot. in sup. Elderly couple brought, inter alia, an action against healthcare worker who was hired to provide services to plaintiffs in their home, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress based on claims that defendant had robbed them. This court denied defendant's motion to dismiss plaintiffs' IIED claim, holding that the alleged conduct, if proven, was sufficient to rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to support an IIED claim. The court explained that, under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, mere indignities or threats were not sufficiently outrageous and that the relationship between the parties was relevant especially where a defendant had knowledge that a victim was peculiarly susceptible, and reasoned that, here, plaintiffs' alleged that defendant was hired and given permission to enter the home in order to provide medical care to physically disabled plaintiffs and was not permitted to intrude into locked areas in order to steal plaintiffs' property. Mann v. Bahi, 242 F.Supp.3d 6, 10, 11.

D.D.C.2017. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former security officer for university police department brought claims for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress against university in connection with its suspension and termination of his employment after he was charged with driving while impaired by alcohol. This court granted defendant's partial motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiff's allegations—that defendant suspended and terminated his employment, confiscated his security license and keys, and denied him access to its properties—fell short of the high standard required to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. While defendant's actions might have been distressing to plaintiff, none of defendant's actions constituted extreme or outrageous conduct or rose above a normal employment decision, and the law did not impose a general duty of care to avoid causing mental distress. Nono v. George Washington University, 245 F.Supp.3d 141, 148.

D.D.C.2017. Com. (j) quot. in sup. Individual who was arrested after he got into an altercation with employees of a liquor store sued arresting officers, police department, and the District of Columbia, alleging that one officer used excessive force against him after he was restrained, by beating him such that he suffered a broken nose, a head contusion, and a subgaleal hematoma. This court denied in part defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that plaintiff presented sufficient evidence that he experienced severe emotional distress, as required to state a claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court pointed to plaintiff's deposition testimony that he experienced nightmares and flashbacks about the arrest, and that they continued for years after it occurred. Williams v. District of Columbia, 268 F.Supp.3d 178, 195.

D.D.C.2017. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Ticket agent of Chinese descent who worked for a bus company in the District of Columbia brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against the District of Columbia, alleging that she suffered emotional distress when, within a six-month period, she had four incidents with defendant's police department, including two arrests arising from disputes between plaintiff and bus patrons and "would-be robbers;" that the police department failed to send a Chinese-speaking officer or interpreter, used excessive force in handling her, and retaliated against her; and that she was afraid of being arrested again and was extremely anxious whenever she saw a police officer. This court denied defendant's motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiff sufficiently pleaded the elements of an IIED claim. The court quoted Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, in explaining the "extreme and outrageous conduct" element of an IIED claim, and concluded that, here, the police officer's conduct as alleged in the complaint was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to state an IIED claim. Xingru Lin v. District of Columbia, 268 F.Supp.3d 91, 103.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

D.D.C.2016. Subsec. (2)(a) cit. case quot. in sup. Injured victim of a terrorist attack carried out by Hamas at his yeshiva in Gaza, and his family members, brought an action under the "state-sponsored terrorism" exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act against the Islamic Republic of Iran and the Iranian Ministry of Information and Security, alleging that defendants financially funded and provided tactical support and equipment to Hamas. This court granted plaintiffs' motion for default judgment due to defendants' failure to respond to the complaint, holding that plaintiffs established their claims for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). The court explained that defendants were liable for IIED if they acted consistent with the criteria set forth in Restatement Second of Torts § 46(2)(a), and that acts of terrorism were per se extreme and outrageous conduct. Bluth v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 203 F.Supp.3d 1, 21.

D.D.C.2016. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former graduate student, acting pro se, brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against university in connection with allegations that, on two occasions, university denied her application for readmission to complete her doctorate degree in history based either on her credentials or her lack of progress and possible plagiarism. Granting university's motion to dismiss, this court held that student failed to state an IIED claim against university, because, while she might have experienced pain and suffering as a result of her inability to complete her graduate studies through university, it could not be said that university's decision to deny her readmission rose to the level of extreme or outrageous conduct required to state such a claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Holloway v. Howard University, 206 F.Supp.3d 446, 453.

D.D.C.2016. Cit. in sup., cit. in case quot. in sup., adopted in case cit. in sup.; Caveat cit. and quot. in sup.; com. (l) cit. in sup. In consolidated actions, victims who were injured and estates and families of victims who were injured or killed in terrorist bombings sued, among others, the Republic of Sudan, alleging that defendant provided assistance to the terrorist organization that carried out the bombings. After conducting hearings, this court entered final judgments against defendant, and denied defendant's subsequent motion to vacate the judgments as to certain family-member plaintiffs, holding that it was not clear that District of Columbia law required those plaintiffs to have been present at the bombings in order to recover for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). Although the District of Columbia had adopted the standard laid out in Restatement Second of Torts § 46, which suggested that presence was usually required for family members to recover on an IIED claim, § 46 also contained a Caveat on which courts in the district had relied in holding that terrorist attacks were a form of outrageous conduct to which the presence requirement did not apply. Owens v. Republic of Sudan, 174 F.Supp.3d 242, 287.

D.D.C.2016. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup. After a terrorist organization shot down an airplane and took survivors of the crash hostage, former hostages and family of hostage who was killed sued the Republic of Cuba, alleging that, under the terrorism exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunity Act, defendant was liable for sponsoring the organization. This court granted plaintiffs' motion for a default judgment and awarded plaintiffs damages, holding that plaintiffs sufficiently alleged that defendant provided the organization with the materials, training, and resources necessary to carry out torts against the hostages, including the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress as set forth in Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court pointed to evidence that the hostages were forcibly marched through the jungle, denied medical care, refused communication with their loved ones, kept in cages, chained to trees and one another, prevented from performing basic bodily functions and needs, mock executed, and regularly told they would be killed, and that the hostages suffered extreme emotional anguish as a result. Stansell v. Republic of Cuba, 217 F.Supp.3d 320, 343.

D.D.C.2016. Subsecs. (1) and (2) and com. (d) quot. in sup. Families and estates of two American victims of a terrorist attack in Jordan brought an action under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (FSIA) against Syrian Arab Republic and Syrian Military Intelligence, alleging that defendants sponsored the attack and were therefore responsible for victims' deaths. After defendants failed to enter appearances or defend against plaintiffs' claims, this court granted plaintiffs' motion for a default judgment, finding that defendants were jointly and severally liable for victims' deaths, and awarded damages. The court reasoned, in part, that plaintiffs were entitled to recover damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, because they were members of victims' immediate families and defendants' conduct was sufficiently outrageous and intended to inflict severe emotional harm upon persons who were not present. Thuneibat v. Syrian Arab Republic, 167 F.Supp.3d 22, 39.

D.D.C.2015. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in sup. Kenyan, Tanzanian, and United States citizens who were injured or killed in suicide bombings of the United States embassies in Kenya and Tanzania, and their immediate family members, sued the Republic of Sudan, the Islamic Republic of Iran, and related entities, seeking to hold defendants responsible for their alleged roles in supporting, funding, and carrying out the attack. After granting summary judgment on liability against defendants, this court awarded plaintiffs damages, holding that, under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, all plaintiffs who were injured in the bombings could recover for their pain and suffering as well as their economic losses, and their immediate family members—if U.S. nationals—could recover for solatium. The court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46 in reasoning that acts of terrorism, by their very definition, amounted to extreme and outrageous conduct and were thus compensable by analogy under the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Amduso v. Republic of Sudan, 61 F.Supp.3d 42, 47.

D.D.C.2015. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. African American and Hispanic former employees of hotel sued owner of the hotel and past and present managers of the hotel, alleging racial discrimination in violation of federal and District of Columbia laws, and intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress (IIED). Granting in part defendants' motion to dismiss, this court held that the allegations in plaintiffs' complaint, which consisted solely of run-of-the-mill discrimination claims, failed to approach the demanding standard required to state an IIED claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. While plaintiffs claimed that they were called “trash” on at least two occasions, that an offensive poster appeared in their workspace, that they were fired from their jobs, and that they were replaced by non-minorities, the court reasoned that courts had repeatedly held that conduct more egregious than these "mere insults" and employment-related slights did not meet the exacting IIED bar. Asare v. LM-DC Hotel, LLC, 62 F.Supp.3d 30, 36.

D.D.C.2015. Subsecs. (1) and (2)(a) cit. in sup. Family of sailor who was killed during the terrorist bombing of a U.S. Navy ship in Yemen brought claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act against, among others, the states of Iran and Sudan, alleging that defendants provided material support and resources to the terrorists that carried out the attack. After plaintiffs obtained default judgments against the Iranian and Sudanese defendants, this court awarded plaintiffs damages, holding that plaintiffs established that defendants enabled the terrorists to perpetrate the attack, thereby causing sailor's death and plaintiffs' resulting mental anguish, bereavement, and grief. The court noted that, under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, a defendant was potentially liable for IIED to family members of injured persons if the defendant engaged in extreme and outrageous conduct that was directed at the persons and intentionally or recklessly caused severe emotional distress, but not necessarily bodily harm, to such persons' immediate family members. Flanagan v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 87 F.Supp.3d 93, 115.

D.D.C.2015. Com. (d) quot. in sup. and quot. in case quot. in sup. Black off-duty police officer brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against white on-duty police officer following an incident in which defendant raced his car to block plaintiff's path, forcefully handcuffed him, and detained him despite the fact that he had committed no crime, while threatening, berating, and insulting him and other officers who identified him as a police officer. This court denied defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding that genuine disputes of material facts existed as to whether defendant's actions were sufficiently extreme and outrageous to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court noted that, under District of Columbia law, a police officer's abuse of a position of authority could be considered outrageous conduct, but that a police officer who abused a position of power was still not liable for mere insults, indignities, or annoyances that were not extreme or outrageous. Greene v. Shegan, 123 F.Supp.3d 88, 92.

D.D.C.2015. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in sup. Kenyan citizens who were injured or killed in a suicide bombing of the United States embassy in Kenya sued the Republic of Sudan, the Islamic Republic of Iran, and related entities, seeking to hold defendants responsible for their roles in allegedly supporting, funding, and carrying out the attack. After granting summary judgment on liability against defendants, this court awarded plaintiffs damages, holding that foreign national U.S.-government-employee plaintiffs who were injured in the bombing were entitled to recover under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act for pain and suffering caused by the attack. The court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46 in reasoning that acts of terrorism, by their very definition, amounted to extreme and outrageous conduct and were thus compensable by analogy under the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Onsongo v. Republic of Sudan, 60 F.Supp.3d 144, 148.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

D.D.C.2015. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in sup. Kenyan, Tanzanian, and United States citizens who were injured or killed in suicide bombings of the United States embassies in Kenya and Tanzania sued the Republic of Sudan, the Islamic Republic of Iran, and related entities, seeking to hold defendants responsible for their roles in allegedly supporting, funding, and carrying out the attacks. After granting summary judgment on liability against defendants, this court awarded plaintiffs damages, holding that United States citizens and foreign national U.S.-government-employee plaintiffs who were injured in the bombing were entitled to recover under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act for pain and suffering caused by the attack. The court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46 in reasoning that acts of terrorism, by their very definition, amounted to extreme and outrageous conduct and were thus compensable by analogy under the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Opati v. Republic of Sudan, 60 F.Supp.3d 68, 76.

D.D.C.2015. Subsec. (1) cit. and quot. in case cit. and quot. in sup.; subsec. (2)(a) cit. in case cit. in sup. Family members and administrators of estate of victim who was killed in a bombing in Jerusalem filed, inter alia, an intentional-infliction-of-emotional-distress (IIED) claim under the "terrorism exception" of the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (FSIA) against the Islamic Republic of Iran and its ministry of information and security, alleging that defendants supported and funded the bombing. This court granted in part plaintiffs' motion for default judgment as to liability and damages, holding that plaintiffs stated a valid theory of recovery for an IIED claim. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, the court explained that acts of terrorism, by their very definition, amounted to extreme and outrageous conduct and, because they were intended to inflict severe emotional harm on those not present at the site of the attack, plaintiffs did not need to be present at the time of the attack to recover. Roth v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 78 F.Supp.3d 379, 400.

D.D.C.2015. Cit. in sup. Motorist brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against the United States, following the dismissal of assault charges that were filed against him in connection with an incident in which he "intentionally almost struck" an officer with the U.S. Capital Police. Granting defendant's motion to dismiss, this court held that the allegations in plaintiff's complaint failed to mount the high bar of outrageousness that a plaintiff had to meet in order to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court noted that, under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, whether the conduct complained of was sufficiently outrageous to permit recovery for intentional infliction of emotional distress was a question of law that had to be decided by the court in the first instance. Smith v. United States, 121 F.Supp.3d 112, 124.

D.D.C.2015. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Terminated employee brought claims sounding in, among other things, wrongful termination, race discrimination, retaliation, and intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against former employer. This court granted defendant's motion for judgment as a matter of law on plaintiff's IIED claim, holding that plaintiff's conclusory allegations did not rise to the requisite level of outrageousness to state an IIED claim, and that plaintiff had adduced no evidence to support such a claim even after an extensive discovery period. The court noted that the District of Columbia followed Restatement Second of Torts § 46, which set a very high bar for satisfying the requisite level of outrageousness, which went well beyond mere insults, indignities, or annoyances. Sun v. District of Columbia Government, 133 F.Supp.3d 155, 175.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

D.D.C.2015. Com. (d) quot. in cases quot. in sup. Residential mortgage borrower brought claims for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress against lender and others, alleging that defendants fraudulently attempted to foreclose or claimed the right to foreclose on his property without the right to do so. This court granted defendants' motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiffs failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court reasoned that defendants' conduct was not so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, as required to state such a claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Taylor v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., 85 F.Supp.3d 63, 73.

D.D.C.2015. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in sup. Kenyan and Tanzanian citizens who were injured or killed in suicide bombings of the United States embassies in Kenya and Tanzania sued the Republic of Sudan, the Islamic Republic of Iran, and related entities, seeking to hold defendants responsible for their roles in allegedly supporting, funding, and carrying out the attacks. After granting summary judgment on liability against defendants, this court awarded plaintiffs damages, holding that foreign national U.S.-government-employee plaintiffs who were injured in the bombing were entitled to recover under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act for pain and suffering caused by the attack. The court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46 in reasoning that acts of terrorism, by their very definition, amounted to extreme and outrageous conduct and were thus compensable by analogy under the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Wamai v. Republic of Sudan, 60 F.Supp.3d 84, 89.

D.D.C.2014. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in sup. U.S. citizens injured in embassy bombings in Kenya, along with their family members, brought an action under the "terrorism exception" of the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (FSIA) against the Republic of Sudan and its ministry of the interior, and the Islamic Republic of Iran and its ministry of information and security, alleging that defendants supported, funded, and otherwise carried out the bombings. The district court entered judgment on liability in favor of plaintiffs and referred the claims to a special master for a determination of damages. This court adopted the special master's report, with modifications. Applying the general principles of tort law, the court held that plaintiffs were entitled to damages on their federal claims. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, the court explained that acts of terrorism, by their very definition, amounted to extreme and outrageous conduct, and therefore, were compensable by analogy under the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Khaliq v. Republic of Sudan, 33 F.Supp.3d 29, 32.

D.D.C.2014. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Employee brought an action against private university for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that she was mistreated, placed on administrative leave, and demoted after co-workers learned that she had signed a petition to place an amendment to ban gay marriage on the state ballot. Granting defendant's motion to dismiss, this court held that plaintiff failed to allege sufficient facts to support an IIED claim. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, the court explained that, generally, a successful IIED claim required conduct that was so outrageous and extreme as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, but in the employment context, the conduct needed to be even more extreme and outrageous. McCaskill v. Gallaudet University, 36 F.Supp.3d 145, 160.

D.D.C.2014. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in sup. Victims of embassy bombings in Tanzania, along with their families, brought an action under the "terrorism exception" of the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (FSIA) against the Republic of Sudan and its ministry of the interior, and the Islamic Republic of Iran and its ministry of information and security, alleging that defendants supported, funded, and otherwise carried out the bombings. The district court granted summary judgment on liability against defendants and referred the claims to a special master for a determination of damages. This court adopted the special master's report, with modifications. Applying the general principles of tort law, this court held that plaintiffs were entitled to damages on their federal claims. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, the court explained that acts of terrorism, by their very definition, amounted to extreme and outrageous conduct, and therefore, were compensable by analogy under the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Mwila v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 33 F.Supp.3d 36, 40.

D.D.C.2014. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. After taxicab driver was acquitted of criminal charges in connection with his arrest during a traffic stop, driver brought claims for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against the District of Columbia, alleging that it was vicariously liable for the actions of the police officer who initiated the stop that resulted in his arrest, and who had previously issued him five traffic tickets on two other occasions, all of which were eventually dismissed. This court granted summary judgment for defendant, holding that no jury could reasonably find that the officer's actions—in making two traffic stops with no use of force, arrest, or other threatening behavior, and in making a third stop in which she did not interact improperly with plaintiff—were so outrageous in character and so extreme in degree as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, as required to state a claim for IIED under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Singh v. District of Columbia, 55 F.Supp.3d 55, 65-66.

D.D.C.2014. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup., subsec. (2)(a) cit. in case cit. in sup. Victims who were injured and estates of victims who were killed in a terrorist bombing of a U.S. Marine Corps barracks in Lebanon sued the Islamic Republic of Iran and the Iranian Ministry of Information and Security, seeking to hold defendants liable for the bombing under the state-sponsored terrorism exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (FSIA). This court granted in part plaintiffs' motion for a default judgment, holding that all but one plaintiff had established a valid theory of recovery on their claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court noted that, while the "immediate family" requirement was strictly construed in FSIA cases, the "presence" requirement was not, because terrorism was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to demonstrate that it was intended to inflict severe emotional harm on even those not present at the site of the act. Worley v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 75 F.Supp.3d 311, 336.

D.D.C.2013. Cit. in case cit. in sup. Arrestee, for herself and on behalf of her teenage daughters, brought, inter alia, a pendent state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against police officers, alleging that defendants unlawfully entered her apartment without a warrant, and used excessive force in arresting her and the wrong daughter for assaulting another teenager. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment as to this claim, this court held that plaintiffs' IIED claim failed because there was no evidence that defendants' conduct caused plaintiffs severe emotional distress. The court concluded that, while plaintiffs alleged that they suffered emotional and physical distress, and exhibited signs of depression, nervousness, lack of sleep, and loss of appetite, these facts provided no indication that their distress was "of so acute a nature that harmful physical consequences might be not unlikely to result." Garay v. Liriano, 943 F.Supp.2d 1, 23.

D.D.C.2013. Subsecs. (1), (2)(a), and (2)(b) quot. in case quot. in sup. Family of 14-year-old U.S. citizen who was killed in a suicide bombing in Israel sued the Islamic Republic of Iran under the state-sponsored terrorism provision of the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, alleging that defendant was responsible for the attack. Granting plaintiffs' motion for a default judgment, this court awarded, among other things, solatium damages, holding that plaintiffs had satisfied the causation requirement for such an award by showing that defendant was potentially liable to plaintiffs under a theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court reasoned that plaintiffs were either the parents or siblings of the decedent, and, while none of the plaintiffs were present at or witnesses to the attack, acts of terrorism were by definition extreme and outrageous, and thus a plaintiff in an action involving terrorism did not have to be present at the place of the outrageous conduct in order to recover emotional-distress damages. Goldberg-Botvin v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 938 F.Supp.2d 1, 9, 10.

D.D.C.2013. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Mother of 16-year-old daughter who was killed in a retaliatory drive-by shooting while attending a funeral service for a young homicide victim brought various claims against the District of Columbia, police chief, and other government agencies and officials, alleging, among other things, that defendants negligently failed to prevent daughter's death and failed to provide adequate police protection for African American youths in the District of Columbia in general. Granting in part defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held that, although the actions of the shooters—in indiscriminately opening fire on a crowd of teenagers with an assault rifle—constituted heinous acts that might form the basis of such a claim, the actions of defendants that allegedly contributed to daughter's death, while unsettling if true, did not themselves support a finding that defendants committed extreme and outrageous conduct. Jefferies v. District of Columbia, 917 F.Supp.2d 10, 41.

D.D.C.2013. Coms. (d) and (h) quot. in cases quot. in sup. Former employee of contractor that provided plumbing services to the District of Columbia Department of Corrections brought, inter alia, a state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against contractor, alleging that defendant falsely accused him of turning off the heating system at the District of Columbia jail and then deprived him of his dignity and humiliated him by walking him off the job site. Granting defendant's motion to dismiss this claim, this court held that, while the indignity and humiliation that plaintiff alleged that he suffered in being discharged was understandable, defendant's alleged actions were not sufficiently outrageous to state a claim for IIED under District of Columbia law, but rather represented the sort of employer—employee conflicts that were not actionable under this tort. Morris v. Carter Global Lee, Inc., 997 F.Supp.2d 27, 41.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

D.D.C.2012. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in sup., subsecs. (2)(a) and (2)(b) quot. in case quot. in sup., caveat quot. in case quot. in sup. Family and estate of a U.S. citizen who died in a terrorist bombing in Israel sued the Islamic Republic of Iran and the Iranian Ministry of Information and Security, seeking to hold defendants responsible for citizen's death under the state-sponsored terrorist exception of the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act. After defendants failed to timely appear, answer, or otherwise move, this court entered judgment for plaintiffs, holding, among other things, that defendants were liable under the exception for intentional infliction of emotional distress as to each plaintiff. The court reasoned that plaintiffs had satisfied all of the elements of such a claim as set forth in the Restatement Second of Torts § 46; in addition, plaintiffs were members of citizen's immediate family and, while plaintiffs were not present and witnesses to the bombing, the presence requirement was relaxed in cases involving terrorism. Bodoff v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 907 F.Supp.2d 93, 103, 104.

D.D.C.2012. Cit. and quot. in sup., subsec. (2)(a) cit. in sup. After a default judgment on liability was entered in an action brought by servicemen and family members under the state-sponsored exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (FSIA) against Iran and its intelligence service, arising from the 1983 terrorist bombing of the U.S. Marine barracks in Lebanon, the action was referred to a special master for consideration of plaintiffs' claims for damages. This court held, inter alia, that surviving servicemen's children born after the date of the bombing could not collect, under the FSIA's state-sponsored terrorism exception, awards for intentional infliction of emotional distress, or solatium; while the bombing's impact on servicemen and their families continued long after the attack, Restatement Second of Torts § 46, required that the bombing be "directed at" a third person, and the special master went too far in assuming that the attack was directed at unborn family members, a potentially unlimited class. Davis v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 882 F.Supp.2d 7, 14, 15.

D.D.C.2012. Cit. in case cit. in disc. In resolving whether judgment creditors could garnish United States bank accounts held by judgment debtor Islamic Republic of Iran, this court explained that it would look to, among other things, the Restatement First of Property to determine whether defendant had an ownership interest in the accounts sufficient for attachment and execution under the Terrorism Risk Insurance Act or the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (FSIA), which had preempted District of Columbia law. The court noted that it had previously applied the Restatement Second of Torts § 46 to claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress brought under the FSIA. Estate of Heiser v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 885 F.Supp.2d 429, 445.

D.D.C.2012. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee brought, inter alia, a state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against former employer, among others, alleging that defendant's vice president used a racial epithet when he ordered plaintiff out of his office. Granting summary judgment for defendant, this court held that defendant was not liable for IIED, because vice president's alleged comment, though offensive, was not the type of action that met the standard of extreme and outrageous conduct under District of Columbia law. Etoh v. Fannie Mae, 883 F.Supp.2d 17, 42.

D.D.C.2012. Quot. in case quot. in sup., subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in sup., subsecs. (2)(a)-(2)(b) quot. in sup. Serviceman injured in the 1983 bombing of the U.S. Marine barracks in Beirut, Lebanon, brought suit, along with his family, against the Islamic Republic of Iran and the Iranian Ministry of Information and Security, pursuant to the state-sponsored terrorism exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, alleging that defendants created and supported the terrorist organization that carried out the attack. This court granted plaintiffs' motion for a default judgment, holding, inter alia, that defendants were liable under a theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress for the mental anguish and suffering that all of the plaintiffs endured as a result of the attack, even though plaintiff family members were not present and did not witness the bombing; the Beirut terrorist bombing qualified as an extreme and outrageous act sufficient to warrant recovery for non-present plaintiffs. Fain v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 856 F.Supp.2d 109, 123, 124.

D.D.C.2012. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. African-American employees of the District of Columbia Fire and Emergency Medical Services brought racial-discrimination claims under federal law, as well as a state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), against the District of Columbia. Granting summary judgment for defendant on the IIED claim, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiffs' allegations that defendant falsely accused them of professional misconduct and transferred them, and that defendant's acts were racially motivated, did not state conduct that was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to constitute an IIED claim. Hamilton v. School District of Columbia, 852 F.Supp.2d 139, 153.

D.D.C.2012. Cit. in case quot. in sup., subsec. (1) quot. in sup., subsecs. (1)-(2)(a) cit. in case cit. in sup. Former sailors who were injured in a terrorist attack on a Navy vessel, along with several of their spouses who, while not on the vessel during the attack, allegedly suffered emotional distress upon learning of the incident, sued the Republic of Sudan under the state-sponsored-terrorism exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, arguing that defendant was liable for their injuries by virtue of its support for the terrorist organization that perpetrated the bombing. This court entered a default judgment against defendant, holding, inter alia, that defendant was liable to plaintiff sailors for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), because defendant's support of the bombing was both intentional and reckless and caused sailors emotional distress; further, defendant was liable to plaintiff spouses for IIED, because terrorism, which was unique among the types of tortious activities in its extreme methods and aims, fell within an exception to the tort's "presence" requirement, and spouses provided uncontroverted evidence that they suffered severe emotional and physical injuries as a result of the injuries sustained by their husbands. Harrison v. Republic of Sudan, 882 F.Supp.2d 23, 30, 46, 47.

D.D.C.2012. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Estate of deceased group-home resident brought, inter alia, a pendent claim under District of Columbia law for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against the District of Columbia, group home, home's corporate officers, and doctor, alleging that defendants caused decedent emotional distress by subjecting him to severe neglect and substandard nursing and medical care. Granting summary judgment for group home, its officers, and the District of Columbia, this court held that it was unnecessary for it to reach the question of whether defendants' conduct was sufficiently outrageous to maintain their IIED claim, because plaintiff placed absolutely no facts in the record to support his claim that defendants' conduct—outrageous or not—caused decedent to suffer severe emotional distress. Harvey v. Mohammed, 841 F.Supp.2d 164, 184.

D.D.C.2012. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Pedestrian brought, inter alia, a state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) as part of his federal civil-rights action against police officer and others, alleging that officer, who was conducting pedestrian traffic control during an outdoor festival, yelled at him and forcefully pushed him as he was walking in the street in an effort to get him to move onto the sidewalk. Granting in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, this court held that, even if a jury found that officer used physical force to remove pedestrian from the street, no reasonable jury could find that officer's conduct was sufficiently outrageous to support plaintiff's IIED claim; liability under the tort did not extend to mere insults, indignities, threats, annoyances, petty oppressions, or other trivialities. Muhammad v. District of Columbia, 881 F.Supp.2d 115, 125.

D.D.C.2012. Quot. in case quot. in sup., subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in sup., subsecs. (2)(a)-(2)(b) quot. in sup. After former general of the pre-Revolutionary Iranian government was assassinated while exiled in France, decedent's grandson sued the Islamic Republic of Iran and the Iranian Ministry of Information and Security under the state-sponsored terrorism exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, alleging that defendants were responsible for the assassination. This court granted plaintiff's motion for a default judgment following defendants' failure to appear or respond to the complaint, holding, among other things, that plaintiff could recover under a theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress even though he was not present at the assassination. The court reasoned that terrorism was unique among the types of tortious activities in both its extreme methods and aims, and that all acts of terrorism were by definition extreme and outrageous and intended to cause the highest degree of emotional distress, literally, terror. Oveissi v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 879 F.Supp.2d 44, 54.

D.D.C.2012. Cit. in sup., cit. in ftn. Son of United States citizen who was abducted, held, and tortured by Lebanese terrorists over the course of three years sued Islamic Republic of Iran and Iran's Ministry of Information and Security for their support of the terrorists. After defendants failed to appear or otherwise respond, this court granted in part plaintiff's motion for a default judgment, holding that defendants were liable for plaintiff's injuries under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (FSIA), because defendants' acts would give rise to common-law tort liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court concluded that the restriction set forth in Restatement Second of Torts § 46 that a plaintiff could not recover for intentional infliction of emotional distress if not physically present to witness the harm done was inapplicable for purposes of the FSIA. Reed v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 845 F.Supp.2d 204, 212.

D.D.C.2012. Quot. in case quot. in sup., subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in sup., subsecs. (2)(a)-(2)(b) quot. in sup. Estate of victim killed in a suicide bombing of a restaurant in Israel brought suit, along with his father, who was injured in the attack, and other family members, against the nations of Syria and Iran and certain of their ministries, pursuant to the state-sponsored terrorism exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, alleging that defendants supported the terrorist organization that carried out the attack. This court entered judgment for plaintiffs, holding, inter alia, that defendants were liable under a theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress for the mental anguish and suffering that decedent's father, mother, and sister endured as a result of the attack; the presence requirement did not apply to this case, because all acts of terrorism were by their very definition extreme and outrageous and intended to cause the highest degree of emotional distress, literally, terror. Wultz v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 864 F.Supp.2d 24, 36, 37.

D.D.C.2012. Cit. in case cit. in sup., subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in sup., subsecs. (2)(a)-(2)(b) quot. in case quot. in sup. Hostage and estate of hostage held in Turkey for 21 days by terrorists, along with members of both of their families, brought suit against the Syrian Arab Republic pursuant to the updated state-sponsored terrorism exception of the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (FSIA), alleging that the kidnapping was conducted with defendant's full knowledge and support. Granting plaintiffs' motion for a default judgment against defendant, this court held, inter alia, that it had jurisdiction over plaintiffs' claims that were based on the severe emotional distress of the family plaintiffs. The court concluded that the test for emotional distress claims under FSIA's state-sponsored terrorism exemption was satisfied, reasoning that a terrorist attack constituted extreme and outrageous conduct; by bankrolling and otherwise supporting a terrorist organization responsible for the kidnapping of hostages, defendant acted recklessly to cause severe emotional distress to their family members; each of the family-member plaintiffs suffered severe emotional distress as a result of the kidnapping; and all of them fell into the definition of "immediate family." Wyatt v. Syrian Arab Republic, 908 F.Supp.2d 216, 229.

D.D.C.2011. Cit. in sup., cit. in case cit. in sup. After two American citizens were injured and one was killed in execution-style shootings carried out by Palestinian terrorists during an airplane hijacking in 1985, injured citizens, decedent's estate, and family members brought suit under the state-sponsored-terrorism exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act against the Syrian Arab Republic and its agents. Dismissing from the case plaintiff husband and son of one injured victim, this court held that those two plaintiffs did not have the necessary standing to bring a solatium claim. The court reasoned that the section of the Restatement Second of Torts most relevant to solatium claims was § 46, which did not extend causes of action beyond members of the victim's "immediate family" at the time of injury; here, plaintiff husband had not yet met victim at the time of the attack, and son was not yet born. Baker v. Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahirya, 775 F.Supp.2d 48, 74, 78.

D.D.C.2011. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Hotel employee brought an action against employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, alleging that other hotel employees threatened and harassed him after he reported their suspicious behavior to authorities. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, this court held that, although a reasonable jury could find that plaintiff's assertions of employees' repeated and sustained threats of physical violence and death over a three year span were sufficiently extreme and outrageous to make out a claim for IIED, defendant could not be held vicariously liable for employees' behavior because employees were acting outside the scope of their employment. The court found no evidence that employees were motivated in any part by a desire to advance the interests of defendant when they threatened and harassed plaintiff; to the contrary, they appeared to have acted solely for the accomplishment of their independent, malicious, mischievous, and selfish purposes. Beyene v. Hilton Hotels Corp., 815 F.Supp.2d 235, 248, 249.

D.D.C.2011. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. African-American former employee brought racial discrimination and retaliation claims, as well as a pendent state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), against former employer and co-workers. Dismissing plaintiff's IIED claim, this court held that plaintiff's allegations that co-workers scrutinized her movements in order to determine whether her behavior or demeanor violated the terms of employer's written warning, which directed her to refrain from using a tone of voice or physical gestures that reasonably could be construed as intimidating to any employee, such that she arrived at work each day expecting to be fired, did not assert conduct rising to the level of outrageousness necessary to state an IIED claim. Brown v. Children's Nat. Medical Center, 773 F.Supp.2d 125, 137-138.

D.D.C.2011. Com. (d) quot. in cases quot. in sup. Arrestee sued the United States, asserting a claim for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) based on the purported actions of a District of Columbia police officer during a vehicle stop, the alleged ongoing harassment of plaintiff by members of the federal government, and a statement allegedly made by a Secret Service agent threatening to have plaintiff deported. Granting defendant's motion to dismiss the claim, this court held that neither police officer's inquiry during the course of a vehicle stop about the custody status of plaintiff's children, whom officer knew had been the subject of a custody dispute, nor the investigation and questioning of plaintiff by Secret Service agents (including the associated threat about deportation) after his ex-wife apparently reported to authorities that plaintiff was going to kill the President were sufficiently outrageous to state an IIED claim. Olaniyi v. District of Columbia, 763 F.Supp.2d 70, 95.

D.D.C.2011. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in sup., subsecs. (2)(a)-(2)(b) quot. in sup., caveat quot. in case quot. in sup. Family members of eight servicemen killed in the bombing of the U.S. Marine Corps barracks in Beirut, Lebanon, brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against the Islamic Republic of Iran under the state-sponsored-terrorism exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (FSIA), alleging that defendant created and supported the terrorist organization that carried out the attack. This court entered an order finding defendant responsible for plaintiffs' mental anguish and suffering and thus liable under the FSIA's state-sponsored terrorism exception; the requirements of a bystander IIED claim were met here, since plaintiffs were the immediate family of the victims, and the presence requirement could be foregone due to the nature of defendants' outrageous terrorist acts. Taylor v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 811 F.Supp.2d 1, 15, 16.

D.D.C.2011. Com. (d) quot. in sup., com. (i) cit. in sup. Arrestee sued the District of Columbia and arresting police officers, asserting a claim for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) under District of Columbia law. This court denied one police officer's motion for summary judgment as to the IIED claim, holding that genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether police officer engaged in outrageous conduct or acted with the requisite intent or recklessness when she allegedly helped detain plaintiff for investigation of theft at the request of a fellow officer, and looked on while that fellow officer, who at the time was moonlighting as a security guard at a motel and had mistakenly stopped plaintiff for absconding from the motel without paying the bill, handcuffed plaintiff, removed cash from her pocket to pay the motel bill, gave her a receipt, and told her to "get out." Zhi Chen v. District of Columia, 808 F.Supp.2d 252, 261.

D.D.C.2010. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in sup., subsecs. (2)(a)-(2)(b) quot. in sup., caveat quot. in case quot. in sup. Family members of American military servicemen injured in the 1983 suicide bombing of the U.S. Marine barracks in Beirut, Lebanon, brought claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, against the Islamic Republic of Iran and its intelligence ministry under the state-sponsored-terrorism exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, alleging that, by creating and directing the terrorist organization that carried out the attack, defendants were legally responsible for the severe mental anguish and toll that the barracks bombing wreaked upon them. This court entered a default judgment against defendants, holding, inter alia, that defendants were liable to plaintiffs for IIED; because acts of terrorism were by their very definition extreme and outrageous and intended to cause the highest degree of emotional distress, immediate-family members, like plaintiffs here, did not have to be present at the scene of the terrorist bombing to recover for their severe emotional injuries suffered as a result of the attack. Anderson v. The Islamic Republic of Iran, 753 F.Supp.2d 68, 86.

D.D.C.2010. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. African American members and officers of the District of Columbia Fire and Emergency Medical Services Department brought an action for discrimination against the Department and the District of Columbia. This court denied without prejudice the District's motion to dismiss plaintiffs' pendent claim under District of Columbia law for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), holding that, while it was questionable whether plaintiffs' factual allegations that the department's management falsely accused plaintiffs of lying and discharging their duties inappropriately and wrongly transferred them out of an elite unit were sufficient to support an IIED claim, the District had failed to discuss the IIED count in its memorandum. Hamilton v. District of Columbia, 720 F.Supp.2d 102, 114.

D.D.C.2010. Cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. After mortgagee asserted that mortgagor had defaulted on his home-mortgage loan, mortgagor brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, against mortgagee, mortgagee's successor by merger, and successor's vice president. Dismissing the IIED claim, this court held that, while plaintiff's allegations that, among other things, defendants discriminated against him by virtue of his race and ethnicity, failed to credit his mortgage payments in a timely manner, and overcharged him for private mortgage-insurance premiums might describe poor business practices and a truly unpleasant experience for plaintiff, those acts did not rise to the level of atrocious or outrageous conduct, as required to state a claim for IIED under D.C. law. Ihebereme v. Capital One, N.A., 730 F.Supp.2d 40, 54.

D.D.C.2010. Com. (j) quot. in sup. Mother and four children who lived in an apartment owned and operated by the District of Columbia Housing Authority's public housing program sued authority, its executive director, and one of its employees, alleging that defendants wrongfully failed to provide them with a "heat controlled and rodent-free apartment." Denying, as to authority and employee, defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under District of Columbia law, this court held that a reasonable juror could find that these defendants' conduct was outrageous and committed in reckless disregard of plaintiffs' welfare. The court cited plaintiffs' allegations that defendants were aware that one child had a special physical condition that required him to avoid excessive heat, that the apartment lacked a thermostat, that vermin ate the child's feeding tube and deprived him of essential nutrition, and that defendants failed to take action sooner despite the imminent nature of plaintiffs' requests. Morton v. District of Columbia Housing Authority, 720 F.Supp.2d 1, 10.

D.D.C.2010. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup., subsecs. (1)-(2)(a) cit. in sup., Caveat quot. in sup. and cit. in case quot. in sup. American military servicemen injured in the 1983 suicide bombing of the U.S. Marine barracks in Beirut, Lebanon, brought claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, against the Islamic Republic of Iran and the its intelligence agency, alleging that they suffered severe emotional and physical injuries from the blast; several family members of victims also brought IIED claims, alleging that extreme and outrageous conduct directed at third-person relatives caused them severe emotional distress. Entering judgment for plaintiffs, this court held that defendants were liable for IIED, because acts of terrorism were by their very definition extreme and outrageous and intended to cause the highest degree of emotional distress. The court further held that one did not have to be present at the time of a terrorist attack upon a third person to recover for severe emotional injuries suffered as a result; thus, family members, although not present at the Beirut bombing, could recover for the emotional injuries they suffered as a result of that attack. Murphy v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 740 F.Supp.2d 51, 74, 75.

D.D.C.2010. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in sup. Father of American military serviceman killed in the bombing of a U.S. military residence in Saudi Arabia sued the Islamic Republic of Iran and its agencies or instrumentalities under the new state-sponsored-terrorism exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (FSIA), seeking punitive damages that were denied him in his prior action against defendants under the old exception. Entering a default judgment against defendants, this court held that, although plaintiff in this case did little more than allege that his son died and that defendants were responsible for his death, plaintiff's prior action against defendants, in which defendants were found liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Missouri law, provided an obvious theory of recovery here under the new exception to the FSIA; thus, defendants were also liable to plaintiff in this action on the theory that one who by extreme and outrageous conduct intentionally or recklessly caused severe emotional distress to another was subject to liability for such emotional distress. Rimkus v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 750 F.Supp.2d 163, 184.

D.D.C.2010. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup., subsecs. (2)(a)-(2)(b) quot. in sup. Three airmen, along with one airman's mother, brought suit under the state-sponsored-terrorism exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (FSIA) against the Islamic Republic of Iran and others, alleging that defendants provided material support and assistance to the terrorist organization responsible for the bombing of the Khobar Towers U.S. military housing complex, in which 19 serviceman were killed and hundreds injured, including plaintiffs. This court found for plaintiffs and awarded damages, holding, among other things, that all four plaintiffs could rely on theories of intentional infliction of emotional distress to recover. The court reasoned that defendants, in working with terrorist organization to plan and execute the attack, sought to cause severe emotional distress to air force personnel living in the towers, and airmen plaintiffs were certainly afflicted with such distress; as to mother, while the tort generally required that a family member not herself injured be present in order to recover, FSIA courts had not strictly enforced this requirement in terrorism cases, which by their nature involved horrific and terrifying acts. Valencia v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 774 F.Supp.2d 1, 14.

D.D.C.2010. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup., subsec. (2)(a) cit. in sup., caveat quot. in sup. In consolidated actions, survivors of a terrorist truck bombing and relatives and estates of victims killed in the bombing sued Islamic Republic of Iran and Iranian Ministry of Information and Security, alleging that defendants provided operational control over and financial and technical assistance to Iranian agents of the terrorist organization that constructed, deployed, and exploded the bomb. This court entered a default judgment against defendants and, after a nonjury trial, awarded plaintiffs damages, holding, among other things, that defendants were liable to survivors and their immediate family members for intentional infliction of emotional distress; acts of terrorism were by their very definition extreme and outrageous and intended to cause the highest degree of emotional distress, and plaintiffs' assertions that they did, in fact, suffer severe emotional injury from the blast were uncontroverted. Valore v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 700 F.Supp.2d 52, 77-79.

D.D.C.2009. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in disc., com. (i) cit. in disc. Detainee sued police officers and others, after an alleged incident in which officers, acting on a mistaken belief that she had failed to pay a $60 bill at a local inn, accosted her in the early morning hours, transported her against her will in a police car to the inn, searched her and removed $60 from her pocket, and then released her without any formal proceedings, all the while ignoring her pleas for help or for an interpreter. Denying in part defendants' motion to dismiss, this court held that plaintiff adequately stated a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, citing her allegations that, as a result of the incident, she had developed an abiding fear of police officers, she had become afraid to venture outside at night, and she had experienced emotional distress so severe that she had had difficulty at work. Chen v. District of Columbia, 256 F.R.D. 267, 272, 273.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

D.D.C.2009. Cit. in case quot. in ftn. (general cite). Relatives and estates of two deceased United States citizens sued Syrian Arab Republic and others for acts that supported and facilitated the kidnapping, torture, and murder of decedents. This court denied defendants' motion to vacate a default judgment it had entered against defendant under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (FSIA). The court noted that, under the FSIA, state law no longer controlled the nature of the liability and damages that could be sought when United States citizens who were victims of state-sponsored terrorism sued a responsible foreign state, because Congress had provided the "specific source of law" for recovery, and that federal courts looked to the Restatement Second of Torts, and not state law, to provide content to Congress's express intentions. The court cited a case accepting the Restatement Second of Torts as delineating the controlling substantive law for intentional infliction of emotional distress as a proxy for state common law. Gates v. Syrian Arab Republic, 646 F.Supp.2d 79, 82.

D.D.C.2009. Com. (d) quot. in disc. and sup. and quot. in ftn., com. (f) cit. in sup., com. (i) cit. in disc., com. (j) quot. in sup. and in ftn. Arrestee brought, inter alia, claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against city, asserting that she was unlawfully arrested and detained overnight for allegedly entering city's transit system without paying. This court granted judgment as a matter of law for city, holding that police officers' alleged actions in confining plaintiff for several hours in a cell at a hospital with a man dressed as a woman and taking no corrective action even after being informed of the situation; making inappropriate, lewd, and sexual remarks about her and to her; and transporting her in an "intentionally reckless" manner in the back of a police vehicle did not constitute sufficiently extreme and outrageous conduct to support her IIED claim as a matter of District of Columbia law. Halcomb v. Woods, 610 F.Supp.2d 77, 80, 81, 83-85.

D.D.C.2009. Cit. in disc. In 20 consolidated cases involving more than 1,000 individual plaintiffs, victims of terrorist attacks sued the Islamic Republic of Iran under the state-sponsor-of terrorism-exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, alleging that Iran provided material support to the terrorist organizations that perpetrated the attacks. After Congress repealed the exception to sovereign immunity under the Act and replaced that provision with a new statute that, among other things, made punitive damages available to plaintiffs in such actions, this court held, inter alia, that, in analyzing the new statute, it would rely on well-established principles of law, such as those found in the Restatement Second of Torts, like § 46, rather than on "federal common law." In re Islamic Republic of Iran Terrorism Litigation, 659 F.Supp.2d 31, 60, 61.

D.D.C.2008. Quot. in sup. Survivors of an Israeli citizen assassinated in New York City, together with two individuals wounded after the attack, sued the Islamic Republic of Iran and its Ministry of Information and Security under the terrorist exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, alleging that defendants provided material support and assistance to the terrorist organization that carried out the bombing. This court entered a default judgment against defendants, holding, inter alia, that plaintiffs had standing to recover for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement § 46(2); decedent's wife was present at the time of the assassination, and plaintiffs who were not present had standing by virtue of the fact that terrorist attacks were directed both at victims and at victims' families. In addition, plaintiffs satisfied the elements of the claim, including suffering severe emotional distress proximately caused by defendants' actions. Acosta v. The Islamic Republic of Iran, 574 F.Supp.2d 15, 28.

D.D.C.2008. Cit. in case quot. in disc. Widow, along with other family members, brought claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) under the state-sponsored terrorism exception of the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act against the Islamic Republic of Iran and its intelligence agency in connection with defendants' involvement in the assassination of her husband, the former Prime Minister of Iran. This court, after entering a default judgment against defendants, and holding a trial on damages, here found, inter alia, that defendants' assassination of decedent was an outrageous act that, as a terrorist attack, was intended to cause emotional distress to widow, and did cause such severe distress, as evidenced by widow's wearing of black ever since decedent's death in 1991 and by her intention not to remarry or have another relationship. Decedent's son's IIED claim failed, however, for lack of severe distress, because he testified that his father died when he was young and that he had no memory of his father; decedent's stepdaughter's claim also failed, because she was not a "direct victim" for purposes of the claim, having not been adopted by decedent when no legal barrier prevented him from doing so. Bakhtiar v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 571 F.Supp.2d 27, 36.

D.D.C.2008. Cit. in sup. Mother and siblings of an American victim of a suicide bombing in Israel brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against the Islamic Republic of Iran and the Iranian Ministry of Information and Security under the terrorist exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, alleging that defendants provided material support and assistance to the terrorist organization that carried out the bombing. This court entered a default judgment against defendants, holding, inter alia, that, under Ohio and Virginia law, defendants were liable for IIED on a theory of vicarious liability. The court reasoned that defendants' conduct was extreme and outrageous, plaintiffs suffered severe emotional distress as a result of decedent's tragic and untimely death, and defendants' actions proximately caused decedent's death and the subsequent emotional distress experienced by plaintiffs. Beer v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 574 F.Supp.2d 1, 12.

D.D.C.2008. Subsec. (d) quot. in sup. Apartment resident involved in altercation with her neighbor sued police officer and others, alleging that responding officer used excessive force to subdue and detain her without legal basis. Denying defendants' motion for summary judgment as to plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held that the determination of whether officer's conduct was extreme or outrageous belonged to a jury. The court noted that questions of fact remained as to whether officer had been informed by the crowd that plaintiff had a knife, whether he forced her to the ground after having been informed that it was neighbor, and not she, who had the knife, whether he threatened her with jail, and whether he threatened to have her children taken by child protective services. Cotton v. District of Columbia, 541 F.Supp.2d 195, 206.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

D.D.C.2008. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Terminated employee who was of Lebanese national origin and had pro-Zionist beliefs sued former employer, alleging that defendant's actions in failing to promote him and in terminating him were motivated by anti-Semitism and racism. Granting summary judgment for defendant on plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to present any evidence in support of his allegations that defendant's actions were deceptive, atrocious, and uncivilized; the undisputed evidence showed that plaintiff was not qualified for and did not apply for the position that he believed he should have been promoted to, and that he was terminated for admittedly leaving his work site without permission and starting a fight with a co-worker. Elhusseini v. Compass Group USA, Inc., 578 F.Supp.2d 6, 23.

D.D.C.2008. Cit. in case cit. in sup. Four siblings of airline passenger killed in the mid-air Lockerbie terrorist bombing sued Libya and a high-ranking member of the Libyan External Security Organization who was convicted for his role in the bombing. This court, inter alia, denied member's motion to dismiss plaintiffs' claims for their own injuries, brought under the Flatow Amendment, including a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). The court held that, as the death of a loved one due to terrorism or airplane sabotage could cause mental suffering and anguish for several United States nationals—and not just the victim's legal representative—the Flatow Amendment necessarily contemplated actions by more than just a decedent's legal representative; claims under the Amendment for such suffering, i.e., solatium, followed Restatement Second of Torts § 46's articulation of IIED, which permitted recovery for all immediate family members meeting its criteria. Fisher v. Great Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, 541 F.Supp.2d 46, 55.

D.D.C.2008. Cit. in case cit. in ftn. (general cite). Relatives of United States civilian contractors who were beheaded by a terrorist group in Iraq sued the Syrian Arab Republic for damages under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (FSIA) and state law, alleging that Syria provided material support and resources to the terrorist group. After Syria failed to appear, this court entered a default judgment in favor of plaintiffs under recent amendments to the FSIA, but dismissed plaintiffs' state-law claims, holding, inter alia, that, under the amendments, state law no longer controlled the nature of the liability and damages that could be sought when a foreign government was sued under the FSIA. The court additionally noted that federal courts looked to the Restatement Second of Torts, and not state law, to provide content to Congress's express intentions, citing as an example a case that accepted the Restatement as delineating the controlling substantive law for intentional infliction of emotional distress as a proxy for state common law. Gates v. Syrian Arab Republic, 580 F.Supp.2d 53, 66.

D.D.C.2008. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. Police officer brought civil-rights and other claims against police captain and District of Columbia after captain arrested officer for allegedly making threats against another officer while seeking medical attention due to stress caused by his interactions with other officer. This court granted summary judgment for defendants, holding, inter alia, that captain's decision to seek a warrant against plaintiff was not unreasonable or lacking in probable cause, and that captain's actions in arresting plaintiff on Christmas Day, detaining him overnight, and subjecting him to a criminal trial did not approach the requisite standard of "outrageousness" necessary to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Jackson v. District of Columbia, 541 F.Supp.2d 334, 344.

D.D.C.2008. Adopted in case cit. in sup. Parents and siblings of an American victim who was injured in a suicide bombing in Israel brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) under the terrorist exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act against the Islamic Republic of Iran and its intelligence agency, alleging that defendants provided material support and assistance to the terrorist organization that carried out the bombing. This court entered a default judgment against defendants, holding that no presence requirement was necessary for an IIED claim arising from a terrorist attack, and thus plaintiffs, who were not present at the attack, had standing to seek recovery. The court further held that defendants' actions proximately caused the severe emotional distress experienced by plaintiffs, who endured and would continue to endure a level of emotional distress that far surpassed the level of distress a reasonable person was expected to suffer. Kirschenbaum v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 572 F.Supp.2d 200, 211.

D.D.C.2008. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in sup. Terminated 54-year-old female employee brought state and federal discrimination claims against employer, as well as a common-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). Dismissing the IIED claim, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to plead facts sufficient to amount to extreme and outrageous conduct, or to support a reasonable inference of severe emotional distress; the sexist insults alleged and the differential treatment as a manager plaintiff perceived might have been actionable under other theories, but did not reach the high bar set by the common law for this tort. Marshall v. Honeywell Technology Solutions, Inc., 536 F.Supp.2d 59, 70.

D.D.C.2008. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Terminated employee of federally and municipally funded nonprofit organization sued former employer, alleging retaliation, breach-of-contract, whistleblower, and intentional-infliction-of-emotional-distress (IIED) claims. This court granted summary judgment for defendant as to the IIED claim, holding that it was not enough for plaintiff to assert that an alleged manager had responded with "F—k you [plaintiff's name]" when approached about the negative effects that that manager's performance was having on the organization's mentally retarded clients. The court reasoned that such a retort was a "mere insult" between co-workers that exemplified intra-workplace mistreatment only, and, as a matter of law, was not the "truly outrageous" conduct required of an IIED claim. Martin v. Arc of Dist. of Columbia, 541 F.Supp.2d 77, 86.

D.D.C.2008. Cit. in sup., subsec. (2) cit. in sup. Former crewmembers of a United States vessel who were kidnapped, imprisoned, and tortured by North Korean agents, and widow of one such crewmember who was now deceased, sued North Korea pursuant to the "terrorism exception" of the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act. This court entered a default against defendant based on its failure to answer or respond to the complaint and awarded damages to plaintiffs under the laws of California, Illinois, Virginia, and Pennsylvania. The court noted that, while Pennsylvania had not expressly recognized the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress, asserted here by plaintiffs, its courts had cited the Restatement Second of Torts § 46(2) for the minimum elements necessary to sustain such a cause of action. The court stated that all acts of terrorism were by their very definition extreme and outrageous and intended to cause the highest degree of emotional distress, literally, terror, in their targeted audience. Massie v. Government of Democratic People's Republic of Korea, 592 F.Supp.2d 57, 76.

D.D.C.2008. Cit. in sup. Father of an American serviceman killed in a terrorist bombing of a U.S. military facility in Saudi Arabia brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against the Islamic Republic of Iran and certain of its agencies under the terrorist exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, alleging that defendants provided material support and assistance to the terrorist organization that carried out the bombing. This court entered a default judgment against defendants, holding, inter alia, that, under Missouri law, the elements of plaintiff's claim for IIED were met. The court reasoned that defendants' conduct was intentional, extreme, and outrageous, and was the proximate cause of plaintiff's emotional distress, and that plaintiff suffered—and would likely continue to suffer—severe emotional distress as a result of decedent's tragic and untimely death. Rimkus v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 575 F.Supp.2d 181, 197.

D.D.C.2008. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Mother and siblings of a U.S. citizen residing in Israel who was abducted and executed by a terrorist organization brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) under the terrorist exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act against the Islamic Republic of Iran and the Iranian Ministry of Information and Security, alleging that defendants provided material support and assistance to the terrorist organization. This court entered a default judgment against defendants, holding that plaintiffs established the elements of their claim for IIED. The court reasoned that terrorists perpetrated acts that were deliberately outrageous, that a terrorist attack—by its nature—was directed not only at the victims but also at the victims' families, and that decedent's abduction and execution caused plaintiffs severe emotional distress. Wachsman ex rel. Wachsman v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 603 F.Supp.2d 148, 156-157.

D.D.C.2008. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Estate and relatives of United States citizen who was abducted and executed by terrorists while he was residing in Israel sued Islamic Republic of Iran and Iranian Ministry of Information and Security for allegedly providing training and support to the terrorists. Denying without prejudice plaintiffs' motion for a default judgment against defendants after defendants failed to appear, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress failed because, while plaintiffs sufficiently alleged that the terrorists engaged in extreme and outrageous acts that were intentional or reckless, their evidence of severe emotional distress was deficient and violated the court's directives. Wachsman ex rel. Wachsman v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 537 F.Supp.2d 85, 98.

D.D.C.2007. Cit. in sup. and disc., adopted in cases cit. in sup., cit. in cases cit. in sup. and cit. but dist., subsecs. (1) and (2) and com. (l) cit. in disc., subsec. (2)(a) quot. in disc. Children of Americans allegedly held as hostages and tortured by the former Iraqi regime in the 1990s sued Iraq for intentional infliction of emotional distress, seeking damages for the emotional distress they allegedly suffered during their fathers' captivity. Denying defendant's motion to dismiss, this court held, inter alia, that, under the common law of plaintiffs' domiciles of Florida and Oklahoma, plaintiffs, as former hostages' close relatives, stated a cognizable claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, even though they were not present when the alleged outrageous acts occurred. Beaty v. Republic of Iraq, 480 F.Supp.2d 60, 93-99.

D.D.C.2007. Cit. in sup., subsecs. (1) and (2) cit. in case cit. in sup., com. (l) cit. and quot. in sup. Parents, sister, and grandmother of American student who was killed in a terrorist attack in Jerusalem sued Islamic Republic of Iran and Iranian Ministry of Intelligence and Security for allegedly providing material support and assistance to the terrorist organization that orchestrated and carried out the attack. Granting a default judgment for plaintiffs, this court held, inter alia, that defendants were liable to parents and sister for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court, however, dismissed grandmother's distress claim, reasoning that, under California law, standing for intentional infliction of emotional distress was limited to a victim's near relatives, or immediate family. Bennett v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 507 F.Supp.2d 117, 129.

D.D.C.2007. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., quot. in ftn. Arrestee who was taken into custody and held overnight for violating a restraining order of which he claimed he was unaware at the time of the arrest sued university police officer and officer's employer for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court dismissed the claim, since plaintiff conceded that the arrest might not have caused him the kind of severe emotional distress required to make a case for emotional distress. The court noted that liability did not extend to mere insults, indignities, threats, annoyances, petty oppressions, or other trivialities, and recovery was not permitted merely because conduct caused mental distress. Black v. District of Columbia, 480 F.Supp.2d 136, 140.

D.D.C.2007. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Pet owners whose pets were temporarily seized by the local humane society brought a common-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, as part of their § 1983 action alleging the unconstitutionality of the District of Columbia's animal-protection statute, against humane society, its employees, and the District of Columbia. Granting in part defendants' motion to dismiss, this court held, inter alia, that the temporary seizure of an animal, which was conducted in a relatively benign manner, did not constitute the extreme and outrageous conduct necessary for an intentional-infliction-of-emotional-distress claim. Daskalea v. Washington Humane Society, 480 F.Supp.2d 16, 39.

D.D.C.2007. Cit. in case cit. in disc. Family members of victims of a terrorist bombing of an airplane over Lockerbie, Scotland, brought suit against, among others, Libyan head of airline security. Denying in part defendant's motion to dismiss, this court held, inter alia, that, even though plaintiffs were not decedents' legal representatives, they had standing under both the Anti-Terrorism Act and the Flatow Amendment to pursue claims against defendant for the injuries that they themselves suffered as a result of the bombing. The court noted that claims under the Flatow Amendment for solatium, i.e., mental suffering and anguish caused by the death of a loved one, followed the Restatement Second of Torts § 46 articulation of intentional infliction of emotional distress, which permitted recovery for all immediate family members meeting the criteria. Hurst v. Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, 474 F.Supp.2d 19, 31.

D.D.C.2007. Com. (d) quot. in cases quot. in disc.; com. (f) quot. in case quot. in sup. (cit. as § 46); com. (j) quot. in sup. Terminated university librarian sued his supervisor and university, alleging that after returning from a period of medical leave for depression and requesting certain accommodations for his disability, defendants took a series of illegal and retaliatory actions against him. This court, inter alia, denied supervisor's motion to dismiss plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court held that, while plaintiff's allegations that supervisor harassed him with intimidating and inappropriate questions on his first day back, retroactively lowered his performance rating, and tried to get him to resign would not of themselves have constituted extreme and outrageous conduct, plaintiff also alleged, sufficiently to survive dismissal, that supervisor acted with full knowledge of plaintiff's fragile mental state and serious mental-health condition. Langer v. George Washington University, 498 F.Supp.2d 196, 200, 201.

D.D.C.2007. Subsec. (2)(a) quot. in sup. and applied in case cit. in sup., com. (l) cit. in sup. Grandson of former chief of Iranian armed forces under the Shah sued Islamic Republic of Iran and others, alleging that agents of the Republic carried out the murder of his grandfather on a Paris street. This court reluctantly dismissed plaintiff's complaint, holding, inter alia, that his claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress failed for lack of standing. The court explained that, under controlling California law, standing to bring a claim against a defendant resulting from the death of an individual was conferred on those who were entitled to inherit property of the deceased under California's probate code, and grandson, whose father was still alive, was not so entitled; similarly, under this court's common-law approach to this tort, a member of a victim's "immediate family" could recover for distress caused by a terrorist act at which he was not present, but not a grandchild. Oveissi v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 498 F.Supp.2d 268, 282, 283.

D.D.C.2007. Cit. in disc. and sup., adopted in case cit. in sup., caveat and com. (l) cit. in sup., subsecs. (1) and (2) cit. in disc. and sup. and in case cit. in sup. After this court found the Islamic Republic of Iran liable for damages arising from its involvement in the 1983 terrorist bombing of the United States Marine barracks in Beirut, Lebanon, that killed 241 American servicemen, it here assessed, among other things, the validity of 753 plaintiffs' consolidated claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). The court held, inter alia, that those plaintiffs who were near relatives of victims and domiciled in states that did not require a plaintiff to be present when the tortfeasor's conduct was directed at a third party had standing to assert their IIED claims; additionally, those domiciled in states that had not addressed the issue of presence, as well as those domiciled in states that allowed plaintiffs to recover only when the conduct was "directed at" the third-party plaintiffs themselves, had standing, since terrorism, by its nature, was directed not only at the victims but at the victims' families. Peterson v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 515 F.Supp.2d 25, 41, 42, 45, 47.

D.D.C.2006. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Executive director of nonprofit chess organization brought various pro se federal civil-rights claims and an additional common-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against numerous organizations and individuals involved in sponsoring student chess tournaments, several of whom allegedly devised a racially motivated scheme to deny minority children the opportunity to win chess scholarships. This court granted defendants' motions to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that the retaliatory conduct alleged by plaintiff in support of his emotional-distress claim, including an assertion that certain of the defendants caused him to be falsely arrested, even if true, was not sufficiently outrageous and extreme to permit recovery under this tort. Bennett v. U.S. Chess Federation, 468 F.Supp.2d 79, 90.

D.D.C.2006. Com. (d) cit. in ftn. in sup. After he was arrested by a university police officer for violating a restraining order, arrestee sued officer, university, and the District of Columbia, alleging tortious conduct and constitutional violations arising out of the arrest. This court granted defendants' motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotion distress could not be sustained, because officer's alleged actions in holding plaintiff overnight and refusing to investigate plaintiff's claim that he was unaware of the restraining order was not conduct so outrageous and extreme that it went beyond all bounds of decency so as to be regarded as atrocious in a civilized community. Black v. District of Columbia, 466 F.Supp.2d 177, 180.

D.D.C.2006. Adopted in case cit. in disc., subsec. (1) and coms. (d) and (i) quot. in case quot. in disc. United States serviceman who was injured in a terrorist bombing while serving in Saudi Arabia brought action with his parents under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act against the Islamic Republic of Iran, an Iranian official, and an Iranian military entity, alleging that defendants were liable for damages from the attack. Entering a default judgment for plaintiffs, this court held, inter alia, that the elements of serviceman's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Florida law were satisfied; defendants' conduct in providing material support and facilitation to the terrorist organization in order to bring about the bombing was intended to cause severe emotional distress, and was also an extreme and outrageous act beyond all bounds of civil decency. Blais v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 459 F.Supp.2d 40, 56.

D.D.C.2006. Cit. in sup., cit. in ftn., adopted in cases cit. in disc., subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup., subsec. (2) cit. in disc., coms. (d) and (i) quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (l) cit. and quot. in sup. and in disc., caveat cit. in disc. and in ftn. Family members and estates of servicemen killed in a 1996 bombing on a United States military base in Saudi Arabia brought suit for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress against the Islamic Republic of Iran and various Iranian organizations, alleging that defendants were liable for damages due to their provision of material and support to the terrorist organization that allegedly orchestrated and carried out the bombing. Entering judgment for plaintiffs, this court held, inter alia, that, under the laws of the applicable states, there was sufficient evidence to support the conclusion that defendants' extreme and outrageous conduct intentionally caused severe emotional distress to plaintiffs. Estate of Heiser v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 466 F.Supp.2d 229, 272, 305, 319, 328, 329, 333, 341, 344-346, 349, 352, 354, 355.

D.D.C.2006. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in sup. Husband, parents, and estate of United States citizen killed in a suicide bombing in Israel sued the Islamic Republic of Iran and its Ministry of Information and Security under the terrorism exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act for providing material assistance to the terrorist organization that orchestrated the bombing. Entering judgment for plaintiffs, this court held, inter alia, that each element of a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress was satisfied. First, defendants provided material support to organization with the intent that it would carry out attacks that would cause severe emotional distress; second, material support of terrorism was extreme and outrageous and went beyond all bounds of decency; third, defendants' actions proximately caused the death and plaintiffs' subsequent emotional distress; and, fourth, the distress was so severe that no reasonable person would be expected to endure it. Greenbaum v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 451 F.Supp.2d 90, 104.

D.D.C.2006. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Homeowner who was arrested and detained for two days on felony assault charges for allegedly attempting to hit her neighbor with a copper pipe brought § 1983 civil-rights action and various civil-tort claims against city and several individual city police officers, after she was acquitted of the charges in a bench trial. Granting summary judgment for defendants, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress failed because the arrest, incarceration, and initiating of criminal proceedings against plaintiff was not conduct that rose to the level of outrageousness as to be beyond all possible bounds of decency as required by this tort; additionally, plaintiff submitted little more than conclusory statements in support of her assertion that she suffered the required element of "severe emotional distress." Lyles v. Micenko, 468 F.Supp.2d 68, 75.

D.D.C.2006. Com. (i) quot. in case quot. in sup. Same-sex couple who were photographed at their wedding while kissing sued nonprofit organization and others for damages and an injunction to prevent further use of this image in an advertising campaign that challenged various public policy positions taken by a nonparty. This court, inter alia, dismissed plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that the conduct alleged did not come close to demonstrating the outrageous conduct necessary to establish the claim. The court reasoned that plaintiffs simply alleged that defendants used plaintiffs' photograph, which was taken by a newspaper photographer in a public place, in an advertisement designed to expose third party's alleged views on the military and same-sex marriage. Raymen v. United Senior Ass'n, Inc., 409 F.Supp.2d 15, 26.

D.D.C.2005. Quot. in sup., com. (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. Following the filing of an amended complaint and supplemental brief by injured victims and family members of deceased victims of the1983 bombing of the American embassy in Beirut, Lebanon, against the Islamic Republic of Iran and its Ministry of Intelligence and Security for their alleged involvement in the bombing, this court entered judgment for plaintiffs and awarded them compensatory damages. Stating that plaintiffs' claims were governed by the laws of their separate domiciles, the court found, inter alia, that estate of deceased victim who had been domiciled in Florida stated a valid claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress under Florida law, and that claims of decedents' survivors under Virginia law would be treated as claims for compensatory damages under the wrongful-death statute and not as claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Dammarell v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 404 F.Supp.2d 261, 285, 297.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

D.D.C.2005. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. Former municipal employee brought several claims against municipality after he was suspended following an inquiry into his allegedly improper and illegal conduct as an alcoholic-beverage-regulation investigator. This court dismissed plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding, inter alia, that his allegations of an investigation into his conduct and the possible public disclosure of information in his personnel file, even if true, did not describe behavior that was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to sustain such a claim. Evans v. District of Columbia, 391 F.Supp.2d 160, 170.

D.D.C.2005. Subsec. (1) adopted in case cit. in disc.; subsec. (2) cit. and quot. but not fol., cit. in ftn., and cit. in case cit. in disc. Estate and surviving family members of serviceman killed in the 1983 Marine barracks bombing in Beirut, Lebanon, sued the Islamic Republic of Iran, and others. While entering judgment for plaintiffs, this court held that, under the restrictive caselaw of Kentucky, plaintiffs could not recover damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) under a solatium theory. The court reasoned that, because the conduct at issue was directed at a third person (decedent) and not plaintiffs, the only conceivable cause of action that plaintiffs could have had for IIED would have been under Restatement Second of Torts § 46(2), which had not been adopted by Kentucky courts, and, in any event, would have required plaintiffs to have observed the bombing. Holland v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 496 F.Supp.2d 1, 30.

D.D.C.2005. Com. (d) quot. in disc. Townhome resident brought suit for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress against her adjoining neighbors, alleging that defendants' initiation of a complaint with the police that led to plaintiff's arrest, incarceration, and subsequent criminal trial based on false allegations that plaintiff attempted to hit defendant wife with a copper pipe caused plaintiff severe emotional distress. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to establish that defendants' alleged conduct rose to the requisite level of outrageousness or that plaintiff suffered the necessary severe emotional distress to sustain her claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Lyles v. Micenko, 404 F.Supp.2d 182, 187.

D.D.C.2005. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup. Two American citizens, one presently residing in Texas and the other in California, sued a foreign sovereign that had been designated as a "state sponsor of terrorism," in part for intentional infliction of emotional distress during plaintiffs' detention there in 1980. Entering a default judgment in favor of plaintiffs, this court held, inter alia, that the law of both Texas and California recognized the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress and controlled this case; because the foreign sovereign was not immune from suit under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, and, by its extreme and outrageous conduct toward plaintiffs it had committed this tort, it was responsible for its misconduct. Price v. Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, 384 F.Supp.2d 120, 134.

D.D.C.2005. Com. (d) quot. in sup., quot. in ftn., and quot. in case quot. in sup.; com. (h) quot. in case quot. in sup. After government contractor's computer technician was killed in Colombia and delivery of his remains was delayed, his parents sued contractor for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that defendant intentionally withheld information regarding the circumstances of technician's death. This court dismissed the case, holding that a delay of four business days in sending the remains was not outrageous. Also, defendant's withdrawal of information was not, as a matter of law, extreme or outrageous conduct, since there was no evidence that defendant withheld information from plaintiffs for any reason other than a clearly legitimate business reason—the desire to avoid violating its contractual duties. Ross v. Dyncorp., 362 F.Supp.2d 344, 358, 359, 362.

D.D.C.2005. Subsec. (2)(a) quot. in ftn. Widow of a United States Army Sergeant who was killed in the bombing of the United States Embassy in Lebanon in 1983 sued Islamic Republic of Iran, certain of its related organizations and officials, and a terrorist group, seeking compensatory and punitive damages for wrongful death, solatium, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court entered judgment for plaintiff, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff established considerable loss as a direct result of defendants' extreme and outrageous conduct. Sergeant's killing resulted in severe emotional trauma to plaintiff and her daughter, and defendants intentionally caused those injuries, in fact and proximately, by planning, supplying, and supporting embassy bombing in which sergeant was killed. Salazar v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 370 F.Supp.2d 105, 115.

D.D.C.2004. Cit. in case quot. in disc. Physician sued former employer and others for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted in part defendants' motion to dismiss, holding that claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress failed because there was no extreme and outrageous conduct. At best, plaintiff could prove that defendants knew that he needed tail coverage to cover risk of injurious acts predating employment, intentionally or negligently failed to secure coverage or notify him that he had no such coverage, and then covered up those failures. Fraud, alone, was not enough to state claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Hayes v. Chartered Health Plan, 360 F.Supp.2d 84, 88.

D.D.C.2003. Cit. in sup., subsecs. (1) and (2) cit. in sup., subsec. (2)(a) quot. in sup., com. (l) quot. in sup. Former prisoners of war during 1991 Gulf War and their family members sued Iraq, Saddam Hussein, and Iraqi Intelligence Service under Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, alleging personal injuries and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court entered judgment for plaintiffs and awarded compensatory and punitive damages, holding that defendants were liable for injuries they intentionally caused when they assaulted and battered POWs and intentionally inflicted emotional distress on POWs and their families. Defendants engaged in outrageous conduct through physical and mental torture, denial of requests to notify families, the forced making of propaganda tapes by POWs, and refusal to permit inspection of prisoners' conditions. When defendants tortured POWs, they intended to and did cause emotional distress to POWs' immediate family members. Acree v. Republic of Iraq, 271 F.Supp.2d 179, 216, 217, vacated 370 F.3d 41 (D.C.Cir.2004).

D.D.C.2003. Subsec. (2)(a) cit. in case quot. in sup. Victims of September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks and their families sued nearly 200 entities or persons, alleging that defendants provided material support, aided and abetted, or conspired with terrorists who perpetrated attacks. Plaintiffs also stated claims for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court denied in part defendants' motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that since plaintiffs stated viable claims for aiding and abetting against Islamic foundation and its Oregon branch, plaintiffs also stated common-law claims for emotional distress. The court stated that terrorist attack on civilians was intended to cause emotional distress to victims' families, and it did not matter that family members were not physically present. Burnett v. Al Baraka Inv. and Development Corp., 274 F.Supp.2d 86, 108.

D.D.C.2003. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Plaintiff, who was arrested for murder after he was falsely identified as man withdrawing money from same ATM used by victim on night of murder, but was released when it became apparent that time indicated by bank's camera was inaccurate, sued District of Columbia and police detective responsible for investigation and arrest for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. This court granted in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that while detective might have been negligent in failing to double-check information before completing arrest and filling out detention affidavit, his failure to verify a fact did not equate to a reckless or deliberate lie about existence of that fact. Arrest supported by this sort of careless error was not sufficiently outrageous to support emotional-distress claim. Liser v. Smith, 254 F.Supp.2d 89, 106.

D.D.C.2003. Cit. in sup. Abductee who was kidnapped in Beirut and held for 65 days by members of Hizbollah, an Iranian-sponsored terrorist organization, brought suit under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (FSIA) against the Islamic Republic of Iran and the Iranian Ministry of Information and Security, asserting, in part, various common-law claims. Entering judgment for plaintiff, the court held that common-law claims could be asserted against state sponsors of terrorism under the FSIA, and that the evidence adduced at hearing clearly supported defendants' liability for, in part, battery, assault, false imprisonment, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Regier v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 281 F.Supp.2d 87, 100.

D.D.C.2002. Quot. in sup. Family of Navy petty officer murdered during terrorist airline hijacking brought wrongful-death and survival action against Islamic Republic of Iran and Iranian intelligence service, seeking, in part, damages for loss of solatium. Entering judgment for plaintiffs, the court recognized a cause of action for loss of solatium under the federal common law by relying on the Restatement Second of Torts § 46, and held, inter alia, that plaintiffs were entitled to loss-of-solatium damages because they experienced grave emotional distress as a result of the terrorists' extreme and outrageous conduct. Stethem v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 201 F.Supp.2d 78, 89.

D.D.C.2002. Cit. and quot. in ftn. (Erron. cit. as § 3.) Longtime companion of CIA agent who was abducted in Lebanon and died in captivity brought suit under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act on behalf of decedent's estate, herself, and decedent's sister against the Islamic Republic of Iran for funding and directing terrorist acts against decedent, seeking, in part, damages for loss of solatium. Entering judgment for plaintiff, the court held, inter alia, that because defendant's conduct was patently outrageous and the emotional distress caused to plaintiff and decedent's sister was undeniable, plaintiff was entitled to damages for solatium. Surette v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 231 F.Supp.2d 260, 269, 270.

D.D.C.2002. Quot. in case quot. in disc. African-American employee who was a member of the Jehovah's Witness faith sued employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, defamation, retaliation, and Title VII violations, alleging that she had been discriminated against and harassed by employer on the basis of her sex, race, and religion. This court dismissed the emotional-distress claim, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's allegations that were not barred by the statute of limitations failed as a matter of law to support her emotional-distress claim. Employer's conduct of allowing a coemployee who had physically and verbally attacked plaintiff to return to work before her suspension expired, transferring plaintiff involuntarily to the day shift, and firing plaintiff was not outrageous. Thompson v. Jasas Corp., 212 F.Supp.2d 21, 27.

D.D.C.2001. Cit. and quot. in sup. Victim of kidnap and torture and his family brought suit under theory of respondeat superior against Islamic Republic of Iran and the Iranian Ministry of Information and Security, which funded and controlled fundamentalist group responsible for the kidnapping. The court entered default judgment in favor of plaintiffs, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff and his siblings had claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, but his nieces and nephews did not. Jenco v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 154 F.Supp.2d 27, 35, judgment affirmed 315 F.3d 325 (C.A.D.C.2003). See above case.

D.D.C.2001. Quot. in sup. American university professor who was kidnapped in Lebanon and detained and tortured for six and one-half years sued the Islamic Republic of Iran, which financially supported and directed the terrorist organization that held plaintiff hostage. After defendant failed to respond, the district court entered a default judgment awarding plaintiff compensatory and punitive damages. Finding, inter alia, that plaintiff suffered severe emotional distress at the hands of his captors, and that the infliction of the distress was attributable to defendant, the court held defendant liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Sutherland v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 151 F.Supp.2d 27, 49, 50.

D.D.C.2001. Quot. in sup. After a United States Naval officer died in terrorist bomb explosion while on duty at the United States Embassy in Lebanon, the victim's family sued the Islamic Republic of Iran and an Iranian governmental agency for wrongful death. This court entered judgment for plaintiffs for compensatory and punitive damages, holding, inter alia, that the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act entitled plaintiffs to monetary damages for solatium, or loss of the victim's society and companionship. The act of purposefully detonating a large explosive charge adjacent to an occupied building constituted extreme and outrageous conduct in any civilized society. Wagner v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 172 F.Supp.2d 128, 136.

D.D.C.2000. Cit. in case quot. in disc., cit. generally in case cit. in ftn. A source who was quoted in a magazine article sued the magazine, the magazine's owner, and the reporter for breach of contract and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that the reporter intentionally misrepresented himself, that he broke his promise of confidentiality, and that he falsely reported that the source had attempted to sell her story to a tabloid. This court granted defendants' motions to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that, although the reporter's conduct may have been contrary to journalistic standards and upsetting to sources like plaintiff, plaintiff had not pled facts supporting the conclusion that the reporter's conduct was extreme and outrageous. Steele v. Isikoff, 130 F.Supp.2d 23, 36.

D.D.C.1997. Quot. in case quot. in disc. Former employees of the White House Travel Office sued aviation consulting and charter firm for intentional infliction of emotional distress and tortious interference with contract. Plaintiffs alleged that they were dismissed after defendant, in an attempt to win the Office's air-charter business, discredited plaintiffs by falsely accusing them of illegal activity and making these accusations known to top White House officials. Granting defendant's motion to dismiss, the court held that the alleged wrongdoing was not sufficiently extreme or outrageous as to give rise to a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress; that there could be no liability for tortious interference with contract where plaintiffs were at-will employees; and that even a charge of intentional interference with prospective economic advantage would fail, as plaintiffs served at the pleasure of the President and the current administration. Dale v. Thomason, 962 F.Supp. 181, 184.

D.D.C.1997. Cit. in disc. A couple who had adopted a three-year-old Russian boy brought suit against the adoption agency and three of its employees for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, after they discovered that the child suffered from one or more serious neurological and visual disorders that were irreversible. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that defendants were not liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress, since no motive was shown for defendants to have deliberately deceived plaintiffs as to the child's health, and no conduct was ascribed to them that in any respect resembled the "extreme or outrageous" conduct held necessary to prove the tort under District of Columbia law. Ferenc v. World Child, Inc., 977 F.Supp. 56, 60, affirmed 172 F.3d 919 (D.C.Cir.1998).

D.D.C.1997. Cit. in headnote, com. (h) cit. in disc. Widower whose wife, a longtime smoker, died from a stroke brought on by respiratory failure caused by emphysema sued cigarette manufacturer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendant deliberately manipulated the nicotine level in its cigarettes in order to profit from increased sales generated as a result of smokers' nicotine addiction. Plaintiff also sought recovery under a theory of strict products liability. Granting in part and denying in part defendant's motion to dismiss, the court held that, even if defendant's conduct was outrageous, plaintiff had failed to show that defendant acted with the intent to cause severe emotional distress to plaintiff and his late wife. However, the court could not say as a matter of law that cigarettes were not unreasonably dangerous, and questioned the precedential value of authority stating that cigarettes made with "good tobacco" were not inherently dangerous. Witherspoon v. Philip Morris Inc., 964 F.Supp. 455, 456, 462.

D.D.C.1997. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Homeowners, their son, and daughter-in-law sued United States for violations of the Federal Tort Claims Act, alleging that agents of the U.S. Park Police committed the torts of negligence, negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress, and trespass while executing a search warrant for plaintiffs' home. Entering judgment in part for plaintiffs, the court held that agents were negligent in conducting a second pat-down of daughter-in-law, damaging plaintiffs' personal property, and detaining son overnight on a weapons charge; that plaintiffs' emotional trauma, which included recurrent nightmares and increased nervousness, was minimal and did not support a finding of negligent infliction of emotional distress; that the manner in which agents executed the search warrant was not so extreme and outrageous as to give rise to a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress; and that the existence of a valid search warrant was an absolute defense to an action for trespass. Wright v. U.S., 963 F.Supp. 7, 18.

D.D.C.1996. Quot. in case quot. in disc. In 1992, a college employee missed one month of work when she was unexpectedly hospitalized because of complications associated with her pregnancy. Two years later, after the employee told her supervisors that she was again expecting, she received a negative performance evaluation and she was fired. The supervisor had told her, "I need to know if you're going to be able to handle the stress of fall registration; if not, I need to get you out of here and get someone else in." The employee sued the college and the supervisor for negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment on the intentional-infliction-of-emotional-distress claim, holding, inter alia, that defendants' words and actions were distressful, but as a matter of law they did not rise to the requisite level of outrageousness and recklessness. Harvey v. Strayer College, Inc., 911 F.Supp. 24, 28.

D.D.C.1996. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Client brought an action for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress against his former criminal defense trial attorney, alleging that certain of defendant's trial tactics caused plaintiff's conviction for drug distribution. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiff did not prove that the conduct complained of in this case, i.e., defendant's failure to adequately investigate identification evidence, adequately interview potential witnesses, make any pretrial motions, move for a mistrial, vigorously cross-examine, or zealously advocate, constituted extreme and outrageous behavior or that defendant intentionally inflicted emotional distress; therefore, plaintiff did not establish a prima facie case of intentional infliction of emotional distress under District of Columbia law. Williams v. Callaghan, 938 F.Supp. 46, 51.

D.D.C.1994. Com. (d) quot. generally in case quot. in disc. and cit. generally in headnote, com. (h) quot. in disc. An employee sued his former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, after he suffered severe injuries from an attempted suicide that occurred as a result of his supervisor's false accusation that he had stolen a carpet from the employer's president's residence. The court granted defendant's motion to dismiss, holding that the supervisor's conduct was not outrageous because his conduct in withdrawing his accusation when he learned it was false clearly showed the absence of malice. The court also held that the supervisor's failure to apologize once he discovered the truth was insufficient to support his emotional-distress claim. Chung v. Lee, 852 F.Supp. 43, 44, 45.

D.D.C.1994. Com. (d) quot. in part in sup. Terminated employee sued her former employer, asserting intentional infliction of emotional distress and other claims. Denying employer's motion to dismiss one claim but granting it for all others, including the emotional-distress claim, this court held, inter alia, that, under District of Columbia law, since the complaint alleged nothing more than discharge from employment, employee had failed to allege sufficiently extreme and outrageous conduct to establish a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Underwood v. Archer Management Services, Inc., 857 F.Supp. 96, 99.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

D.D.C.1994. Com. (e) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee of the District of Columbia Department of Corrections sued the District of Columbia and her supervisor for sexual harassment and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding plaintiff damages. Denying defendants' posttrial motion for judgment as a matter of law on plaintiff's claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress, the court held that the record contained testimony of defendant supervisor's conduct that reasonable individuals could find outrageous, as well as evidence that plaintiff's trauma arose as a consequence of that conduct. Webb v. Hyman, 861 F.Supp. 1094, 1102.

D.D.C.1991. Quot. in case cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. A divorced husband and his parents sued a magazine publisher, an editor, and a freelance writer for libel and intentional infliction of emotional distress based on the magazine's publication of an article concerning the plaintiff husband's highly publicized child visitation dispute. The court dismissed the claims of the plaintiff husband and his father but denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment on the claims made by the plaintiff husband's mother, on the ground that reasonable persons could differ as to whether the conduct of the publisher and editor supported her allegations. Foretich v. Advance Magazine Publishers, Inc., 765 F.Supp. 1099, 1104.

D.D.C.1991. Com. (d) quot. in disc. Dog owners were walking their unleashed dogs when one of the dogs was shot by a police officer who feared the dog was going to harm his police dog. The dog owners brought an action for damages against the United States, pursuant to the Federal Tort Claims Act, alleging assault and battery, false arrest, property loss, and negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress. On the count of intentional infliction of emotional distress, the district court held in favor of the defendant. The court reasoned that the officer's conduct did not rise to the requisite level of outrageousness and atrocity to warrant recovery under this theory, and the plaintiff's distress resulted from what she perceived to be the senseless shooting of her pet, not from any disregard for her own safety. Kaiser v. U.S., 761 F.Supp. 150, 156.

D.D.C.1990. Quot. in case cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. A father who was involved in a bitter, highly publicized child custody dispute and his parents sued the publisher of a magazine, among others, for defamation and intentional infliction of emotional distress on the basis of certain statements made in the “Letters from Readers” page and an editorial comment thereon. Denying the defendant's motion to dismiss, the court held that the plaintiff stated a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress as to one of the statements, relating to a childhood incident in which the plaintiff's mother handed him his dead infant sister's body “so he could arrange for the funeral.” Foretich v. Glamour, 753 F.Supp. 955, 970.

D.D.C.1990. Quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. A temporary firefighter working at a hospital whose contract was not renewed after the hospital transferred from federal government to District of Columbia control sued the District of Columbia for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The plaintiff contended that he did not know that his employment was temporary and was not told he could do something to retain his employment once he was notified of his impending termination. Granting the defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court refused to believe that the defendant lacked knowledge of his temporary status when all of his employment forms clearly stated the temporary nature of his appointment. Moreover, because it was undisputed that the plaintiff became aware of, and applied for, the position of firefighter before his termination date, the court held that, even if the defendant failed to personally inform the plaintiff that his employment was temporary and that he should apply for a firefighter vacancy, this would not rise to the level of conduct needed to establish a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Russell v. District of Columbia, 747 F.Supp. 72, 80, 81.

D.D.C.1990. Com. (d) quot. generally in case quot. in disc. A female former police sergeant was arrested by officers of the United States Park Police and a local police department after she allegedly resisted an attempt to catch her by refusing to show a license and registration and almost hitting an officer with her car in trying to flee. The arrestee sued the arresting officer and the United States, alleging violations of the federal civil rights statute and the Federal Tort Claims Act, and also asserting common law tort claims for false arrest, false imprisonment, malicious prosecution and negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and held, inter alia, that the defendant officer's behavior was not sufficiently extreme or outrageous to warrant relief for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Moreover, the court stated that the degree of force used to arrest the plaintiff was reasonable in view of the plaintiff's attempts to resist. Stevens v. Stover, 727 F.Supp. 668, 672.

D.D.C.1989. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in disc. An airline passenger who requested to be allowed off of an airplane when his New York City-bound flight was delayed on the runway for about three hours sued the airline for false imprisonment, intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress, and punitive damages after the request was denied. The airline moved for summary judgment, and the passenger moved for partial summary judgment on his claim of false imprisonment. Denying the plaintiff's motion and granting the defendant airline's motion, this court held that, by buying his ticket, the passenger gave the pilot express consent to fly him to New York City, an agreement that did not guarantee arrival at his destination by a specific time or provide that the plaintiff could unilaterally determine that he should be deplaned. Additionally, the court held that the plaintiff's claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress was deficient because it did not establish that the defendant caused an emotional disturbance so acute in nature that harmful physical consequences would be likely to result. Abourezk v. New York Airline, Inc., 705 F.Supp. 656, 665, decision affirmed 895 F.2d 1456 (D.C.Cir.1990). See above case.

D.D.C.1989. Quot. in case quot. in sup. A former bank vice president sued the bank for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that she suffered severe emotional distress as a result of being fired by the defendant, witnessing the defendant's efforts to maintain that she was guilty of misconduct, and being a known diabetic. The court granted summary judgment to the defendant on this issue, stating that the plaintiff's allegations fell far short of the standard for intentional infliction of emotional distress of unusually outrageous conduct and that the tort should not be successfully pursued by merely alleging unfair circumstances surrounding a termination of employment. Cunningham v. United Nat. Bank of Washington, 710 F.Supp. 861, 864.

D.D.C.1989. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. After a husband and wife learned that the real estate investment properties they had purchased from the defendant's investment association in a joint venture were worth less than what they had paid for them, they sued the defendant and the association, among others, on a theory of fraud, inter alia. The defendant counterclaimed on a theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court dismissed the counterclaim, holding that the defendant failed to satisfy her burden of proof. The court rejected the defendant's testimony that the plaintiff husband tormented the defendant by wearing her late husband's clothes in her presence after she refused to sell the plaintiffs' investment properties. Weiss v. Lehman, 713 F.Supp. 489, 502, order amended and supplemented on rehearing 759 F.Supp. 1 (D.D.C.1989).

D.D.C.1988. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. A catering company sued the owner of a special events planning business to recover unpaid debts; the defendant counterclaimed, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress caused by the plaintiff company's employees' abusive conduct during their collection efforts. This court granted the plaintiff's motion for summary judgment on the emotional distress claim, finding that the defendant had presented insufficient proof of outrageous conduct. The court concluded that the plaintiff's employees' allegedly rude and insulting behavior in response to the defendant's unpaid debt was not so extreme as to be regarded as atrocious, and that the defendant failed to demonstrate any causal connection between the conduct of the plaintiff's employees and the harm she allegedly suffered. Ridgewells Caterer, Inc. v. Nelson, 688 F.Supp. 760, 764.

D.D.C.1987. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in disc. Apartment tenants sued the building owner and manager who allegedly contracted unskilled maintenance men, claiming that they suffered the intentional infliction of emotional distress as a result of a gas explosion and collapsed ceiling in their apartments. This court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding that the defendants' conduct would at most constitute negligence. The court stated that the use of unskilled workers could not as a matter of law be deemed so extreme in degree as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency. Longus v. First Columbia Management, Inc., 664 F.Supp. 13, 15.

D.D.C.1986. Cit. in case quot. in disc. Transcendental meditation students sued the founder of the transcendental meditation movement for intentional infliction of mental distress. This court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment because the students failed to show that the defendant's acts were calculated to cause them emotional harm and an associated risk of physical injury, and because the students failed to cite any case law supporting their claim that a continuing injury can rise to the level of outrageousness necessary to constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress. Doe v. Yogi, 652 F.Supp. 203, 209.

D.D.C.1986. Quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (j) cit. in sup. An employee sued her former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress arising out of an allegedly hostile work environment. Holding for the defendant, this court reasoned that the plaintiff's stress was incident to her job responsibilities and did not result from extreme and outrageous conduct on the part of her former employer, and that stress alone was insufficient to meet the threshold requirement of severe emotional distress. Green v. American Broadcasting Companies, Inc., 647 F.Supp. 1359, 1362, 1363.

D.D.C.1986. Quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. A management-level accountant who had worked for his employer for over a decade was reassigned to a "temporary" position at a much reduced salary after the company suffered a severe financial crisis and reduced its staff. The accountant sued the company for age discrimination and other unlawful acts. This court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that the plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress failed because the defendant's alleged breach of confidentiality, dismissal without prior disciplinary procedures, and attempts to force the plaintiff's resignation, while perhaps insensitive and unfair, did not approach the level of extreme and outrageous conduct required for liability. Schoen v. Consumers United Group, Inc., 670 F.Supp. 367, 378-379.

D.D.C.1985. Coms. (d) and (h) quot. in sup. A blind man who was told to move to another seat because he was sitting next to the plane's emergency exit sued the airline for violating federal statutes, outrageous conduct, and breach of contract. Both sides moved for summary judgment. This court granted the defendant's motion because the airline's request was for safety purposes and based on a policy that did not discriminate against blind people. Since the conduct was in accord with the FAA's published policy designed to keep emergency exits as freely accessible as possible, the conduct did not go beyond all bounds of decency or permit recovery on the outrageous conduct claim. Finally, the court found that there was no breach of contract because the airline did not refuse to transport the passenger and did not guarantee the passenger's right to sit wherever he wished. Anderson v. USAir, Inc., 619 F.Supp. 1191, 1197, judgment affirmed, 818 F.2d 49 (D.C.Cir.1987). See above case.

D.D.C.1981. Com. (d) quot. in part and cit. in sup. The plaintiffs voluntarily accompanied two FBI agents to the Washington Field Office for questioning. The FBI had received a report that the plaintiffs had sought at two banks in Virginia to change currency that the bank tellers noticed to be part of a ransom paid in a kidnapping case then under investigation. During the course of the questioning, the plaintiffs gave the agents conflicting accounts concerning the source of the money they changed at the banks. Based on this inconsistency, the agents arrested the plaintiffs. After detaining them overnight, the plaintiffs were brought before the District of Columbia Superior Court, which asked to see the warrants for the plaintiffs' arrest. The agents explained that the warrants were issued in the Eastern District of Virginia and had not yet been received in Washington. The judge ordered the plaintiffs released from custody; however, as soon as the plaintiffs left the courthouse, federal marshalls arrested them, relying on the federal warrant issued in Virginia. The plaintiffs were detained for two days and a U.S. Magistrate found that they had been arrested on probable cause. The plaintiffs waived their right to a hearing in the District of Columbia so that they would be transferred to the Eastern District of Virginia. There the plaintiffs testified before a grand jury investigating the kidnapping and all charges against them were dropped. The plaintiffs instituted an action against the United States and nine individuals and the District of Columbia for false arrest and imprisonment, assault and battery, intentional infliction of emotional distress, defamation, and invasion of privacy. On motion of the defendants for summary judgment, the District Court held, inter alia, that the plaintiffs' claim that the defendants caused emotional distress was insufficient in the absence of alleged facts that would constitute the sort of conduct that is necessary to give rise to liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court noted that conduct must be beyond the bounds of decency and regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Therefore, since the court found that the plaintiffs' complaint did not state such occurrences that would give rise to a claim under this standard of extreme or outrageous conduct, the court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. Wilcox v. United States, 509 F.Supp. 381, 387.

D.D.C.1980. Cit. in sup. The plaintiff was the general counsel to a government agency and was reassigned by the chairman of the agency to another position. The plaintiff sued the chairman and the commissioners of the agency in their official capacities, seeking only the equitable relief of reinstatement to his former position. He did not seek money damages. The trial court held that the transfer of the plaintiff amounted to a termination which failed to comply with statutory procedures and ordered that the plaintiff be reinstated to the position of general counsel. The plaintiff then sued in this court, suing the chairman in his individual capacity for allegedly wrongful behavior in procuring the plaintiff's transfer. The plaintiff brought common law tort claims and constitutional tort claims. The court held that the plaintiff's causes of action were barred by res judicata, stating that simply because the plaintiff had sought only equitable relief in his previous suit and here sought only monetary relief was not a sufficient distinction to warrant the conclusion that the two cases involved separate causes of action. All of the plaintiff's claims arose from the same course of conduct and the plaintiff could have brought all of the claims in the same action. The doctrine of res judicata applies not only to all matters which were actually determined but to all matters which could have been determined. Therefore because there were no new facts or circumstances in this suit, the plaintiff must suffer the consequences of not bringing all of his claims for relief in one action. The court also rejected the plaintiff's claim that his suit here was not barred by res judicata because a different defendant was involved because the chairman here was sued in his individual and not in his official capacity. The general rule states that where a judgment is rendered against a person in a representative capacity and later is sued in his individual capacity, the rule of res judicata does not apply. The court, however, distinguished the rule from this case, stating that the rule applies where there is a danger of the sued party having to take inconsistent positions whereas, here, the barring of the plaintiff's suit did not run the risk of binding a party to any position inconsistent with his present one. Also, the rule applies where the party to be barred did not enjoy a realistic opportunity to litigate the question in the first action. Here, however, the plaintiff was free to raise the issues herein in his original complaint. The court stated, inter alia, that the plaintiff had not stated a prima facie case of intentional infliction of emotional distress because the tortfeasor's conduct had not been wanton, extremely outrageous or especially calculated to cause serious mental distress which was required for recovery. Shewmaker v. Minchew, 504 F.Supp. 156, 163.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

M.D.Fla.

M.D.Fla.2023. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee who was raped by her former supervisor filed a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against former employer, alleging that employer threatened to fire her if she talked about the rape or filed a complaint with human resources, actually fired her after she sought psychological treatment and talked about her rape during the treatment, withheld her final paycheck after she refused to sign a settlement and confidentiality agreement, and badgered her to take down private social-media posts about her rape. This court granted employer's motion to dismiss employee's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that employer's alleged conduct did not rise to the high level of outrageousness required to state such a claim under Florida law and Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Treminio v. Crowley Maritime Corporation, 649 F.Supp.3d 1223, 1242.

M.D.Fla.2019. Com. (e) cit. in sup., cit. in case quot. in sup.; com. (f) quot. in sup., cit. in case cit. in sup. Daughter, individually and as successor of father's estate, sued credit-reporting agency, alleging that it refused to correct father's credit report, which incorrectly showed that he was deceased and delinquent on a large mortgage, such that he was prevented from obtaining loans he needed to renovate his home to accommodate his and his wife's health needs and eventually from paying for his wife's funeral. This court granted agency's motion to dismiss, holding that daughter failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court reasoned, in part, that, even accepting daughter's allegations as true, agency's conduct was not objectively outrageous as a matter of law, as required to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Malverty v. Equifax Information Services, LLC, 407 F.Supp.3d 1257, 1263, 1264.

M.D.Fla.2017. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Mortgage borrower filed, inter alia, an intentional-infliction-of-emotional-distress (IIED) claim against lender, alleging that, after defendant assigned its interest in the mortgage to an assignee, which accepted a deed in lieu of foreclosure from plaintiff and forgave plaintiff's debt, defendant continued to attempt to collect the forgiven debt from plaintiff. This court granted defendant's motion to dismiss plaintiff's IIED claim, holding that defendant's conduct was not outrageous as a matter of law. The court explained that, under Florida law and Restatement Second of Torts § 46, a defendant's conduct had to be so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious, and utterly intolerable in a civilized society, in order to state an IIED claim. Owens-Benniefield v. Nationstar Mortgage LLC, 258 F.Supp.3d 1300, 1322.

M.D.Fla.2016. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. African American employee brought claims for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against water-and-sewer district and its executive director, after defendants terminated his employment. This court granted defendants' motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiff's allegations—that defendants subjected him to a discriminatorily applied pay policy, issued unfounded discriminatory actions against him, limited his job duties, and falsely accused him of watching pornography on his work computer and ordered him to seek treatment for doing so—failed to state such a claim under Florida law or Restatement Second of Torts § 46; while defendants' alleged conduct was clearly offensive, it did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct required to recover for IIED. Short v. Immokalee Water & Sewer District, 165 F.Supp.3d 1129, 1152.

M.D.Fla.2015. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Minor filed, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against county deputy sheriffs, after defendants responded to a call that described plaintiff as a "suspicious person" and a "slow kid" who lived in the caller's neighborhood, attempted a takedown procedure when plaintiff retreated from them, tasered and hit plaintiff with their flashlights and fists, and handcuffed and arrested plaintiff. This court granted defendants' motion to dismiss the claim against defendants in their official capacity, and denied defendants' motion to dismiss the claim against them in their individual capacities. The court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, for the standard for determining whether defendants' conduct was sufficiently outrageous, and explained that county could not be liable for the willful and wanton acts of its employees but that the alleged facts were sufficient to state a plausible IIED claim against defendants in their individual capacities. C.P. by and through Perez v. Collier County, 145 F.Supp.3d 1085, 1096.

M.D.Fla.2011. Quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (j) quot. in sup. Arrestee brought § 1983 action against police officer and sheriff's department, alleging false arrest, warrantless entry into her home, and intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). Granting in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, this court held that plaintiff had not established her IIED claim, because she had not shown that officer's conduct was "beyond all possible bounds of decency" or that she suffered "severe distress." While being subject to false arrest was embarrassing, it was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous absent some other grievous conduct, and, while plaintiff pointed out that she was wearing only a towel at the time of arrest, the court noted that she was sitting outside wearing only a towel prior to officer's arrival. Frias v. Demings, 823 F.Supp.2d 1279, 1288, 1289.

M.D.Fla.2010. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Insured brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against insurer, alleging that defendant failed to pay him benefits under his homeowner's insurance policy. Granting defendant's motion to dismiss the IIED claim, this court held that, even accepting as true plaintiff's allegations that defendant delayed and denied plaintiff's insurance claim, and even if defendant's four offers over a three-year period to settle plaintiff's claim were either inadequate or designed to force plaintiff to discount the full value of his claim, defendant's conduct failed to qualify as outrageous for purposes of stating a claim for IIED. Delfrate v. Liberty Mutual Fire Ins. Co., 727 F.Supp.2d 1307, 1309.

M.D.Fla.2010. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Guardian ad litem, on behalf of two minor children and a proposed class of children who were in the legal custody of the state department of children and families and who had been placed in foster care, sued department, corporation that operated the state foster care system pursuant to a contract with department, and others, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress and other claims. Granting without prejudice defendants' motion to dismiss, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiffs did not allege the requisite outrageous conduct to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Florida law. The court noted that, while plaintiffs might, by amending, be able to plead a cause of action for outrage if they confined themselves to allegations that met the threshold for outrageousness, plaintiffs' allegations of various actions and inactions, including claims of negligence and inaction, mitigated against a determination that defendants' conduct was sufficiently outrageous to support such a cause of action. Smith v. Rainey, 747 F.Supp.2d 1327, 1342.

M.D.Fla.2009. Com. (d) adopted in case quot. in sup. Operator of dance hall sued county, county sheriff's office, and others for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that defendants pressured his landlord to evict the dance hall, harassed the hall's employees and patrons, repeatedly arrested him for violating certain ordinances, and conducted an aggressive late-night search of his home in connection with one of the arrests. Granting in part defendants' motion to dismiss, this court held that plaintiff's allegations concerning defendants' actions did not rise to the level of outrageousness necessary to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Florida law. Abusaid v. Hillsborough County Bd. of County Com'rs, 637 F.Supp.2d 1002, 1027.

M.D.Fla.2006. Cit. in case cit. in disc.; com. (d) quot. in cases quot. in disc. (cit. as § 46). Hispanic independent-contractor truck drivers brought suit for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, against owner of asphalt-production facility, alleging that they were subjected to harassment and racial slurs by facility's plant operator. Granting in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiffs' allegations that plant operator, who had no authority to fire or demote plaintiffs, repeatedly used racial slurs and delayed and inconvenienced plaintiffs while they delivered materials to the facility did not assert conduct that was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to establish a prima facie case of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Martinez v. Pavex Corp., 422 F.Supp.2d 1284, 1296.

M.D.Fla.2002. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Former client sued law firm that had stopped representing him in a slip-and-fall case, alleging, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting defendant's motion for judgment on the pleadings, the court held, inter alia, that defendant's withdrawal from plaintiff's underlying personal-injury case did not rise to the level of outrageous conduct necessary to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, where defendant had the right to withdraw pursuant to the retainer agreement, and three years remained until expiration of the statute of limitations. Jones v. Law Firm of Hill and Ponton, 223 F.Supp.2d 1284, 1288.

M.D.Fla.2002. Quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. Cruise-ship passenger sued cruise line for damages stemming from sexual assault and battery committed by ship's head waiter. Denying in part cruise line's motion to dismiss, district court held that passenger's allegations sufficiently stated claim for negligent hiring and retention, and, since cruise line was vicariously liable for intentional torts of employees, passenger's allegations stated claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Stires v. Carnival Corp., 243 F.Supp.2d 1313, 1319.

M.D.Fla.1999. Quot. in case quot. in disc. Employee sued employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. Plaintiff alleged that defendant store manager rubbed his penis and his hand across plaintiff's buttocks, that he tried to enter a locked room while plaintiff was breast-feeding her child and commented that he wanted plaintiff to "feed him," and that he told plaintiff that he would like to see plaintiff and a female co-worker together in a sexual act. This court granted in part employer's motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that, while defendant's alleged acts were offensive, they were not outrageous. Ball v. Heilig-Meyers Furniture Company, 35 F.Supp.2d 1371, 1376.

M.D.Fla.1998. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. generally in ftn. After being fired, a Hispanic employee sued her employer for, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiff alleged that she heard that a supervisor had made a comment against ethnic people, saying he preferred the front desk to be manned by nonethnics. This comment, combined with a fight in the office of another supervisor, purportedly reduced plaintiff to tears. This court, among other dispositions, dismissed the emotional-distress claim, holding, inter alia, that the employer acted with propriety considering the at-will status of the relationship, and that the treatment by the supervisors was not so egregious as to entitle plaintiff to damages. Weld v. Southeastern Companies, Inc., 10 F.Supp.2d 1318, 1323.

M.D.Fla.1997. Quot. in case quot. in disc. An employee sued her employer and a coemployee, alleging sexual harassment, assault, battery, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted in part and denied in part defendants' motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court noted that within the context of employment discrimination, Florida courts have recognized claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress where the complaint alleges repeated and relentless physical and verbal abuse. Sparks v. Jay's A.C. & Refrigeration, Inc., 971 F.Supp. 1433, 1440-1441.

M.D.Fla.1996. Quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee of airline sued airline for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that defendant created an extraordinarily hostile, sexually poisoned work atmosphere for plaintiff and that defendant purposely exposed plaintiff to vile acts of depravity, rather than take simple and cost-effective measures to stop the harassment. Granting in part defendant's motion to dismiss, the court held that, under Florida law, the male co-workers' conduct in using bad language in front of plaintiff and repeatedly placing pornographic photographs on her desk did not reach the level of outrageousness necessary to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress in the employment context. Pucci v. USAir, 940 F.Supp. 305, 309.

M.D.Fla.1995. Quot. in case cit. in disc., com. (g) cit. in headnote and quot. in disc. Female dancers for a theme park's entertainment show who were spied upon and videotaped in various stages of undress and while using the restroom sued the theme park for, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress and invasion of privacy. This court granted in part and denied in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that defendant failed to establish that the use of the female dancers as bait to catch the peeping tom was a permissible way of pursuing its legal rights of investigation. Defendant may have exceeded the bounds of propriety in using the dancers as bait in the sting operation without their prior knowledge or consent, particularly in consideration of the contractual agreement between several of the plaintiffs and defendant regarding a secure dressing environment. It also held that a fact issue existed as to whether defendant's conduct was extreme and outrageous. Liberti v. Walt Disney World Co., 912 F.Supp. 1494, 1505, 1506.

N.D.Fla.

N.D.Fla.1988. Cit. in disc. An American flyer was shot down during the Vietnam conflict. The United States government subsequently misidentified the remains of the flyer, persisted in that misidentification, and issued a letter to his wife stating that if she did not accept the remains and bury them, the government would do so. The government also continued to carry the flyer's name as "accounted for" even after the Armed Services Graves Registration Board rescinded the identification of the flyer. The flyer's wife sued the United States for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting the plaintiff's motion for summary judgment, the court held that the government's conduct was outrageous as a matter of law. Hart v. U.S., 681 F.Supp. 1518, 1522, judgment reversed 894 F.2d 1539 (11th Cir.1990). See above case.

N.D.Fla.1980. Quot. in sup. (Erron. cit. as Torts.) During a previous litigation where the plaintiffs attempted to recover under an insurance policy issued by the defendant, the plaintiffs became displeased with activities of the defendants and filed a suit alleging libel, slander, and intentional outrageous conduct resulting in emotional distress to the plaintiffs. After dismissing the libel and slander complaints, the court held that the complaint for emotional distress could not be sustained because, although the defendants' conduct may have been reprehensible, defendants' overtures were not directed to the plaintiffs or any member of their immediate family who was present at the time. Dyer v. Florida Farm Bureau Mut. Ins. Co., 496 F.Supp. 695, 697.

S.D.Fla.

S.D.Fla.2022. Com. (d) quot. in sup.; com. (e) quot. in ftn. and cit. in case quot. in sup.; com. (f) quot. in sup. Former employee who was physically and sexually assaulted by a patient while working as a medical assistant brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against former employer, alleging that it sent her back to work to finish her shift after the assault without giving her the chance to be examined by a doctor or report the assault to police, that it blamed her for the assault and made inappropriate verbal comments, and that it intentionally disseminated information about the attack to others. This court denied employer's motion to dismiss, holding that a lower standard of outrageousness was appropriate under Restatement

Second of Torts § 46, given employer's knowledge of employee's susceptibility to distress from the situation she had just experienced, and that its alleged conduct was sufficiently outrageous under that standard, because an average member of the community would consider it to be atrocious, and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Cooper v. Empower U, Inc., 603 F.Supp.3d 1317, 1322, 1323.

S.D.Fla.2022. Cit. in case quot. in sup. Passenger who was onboard a cruise ship during an outbreak of an infectious pandemic disease, individually and on behalf of her husband who died of the disease, sued operator of the ship for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that it failed to screen passengers before allowing them to board, failed to enforce physical distance requirements, and misrepresented to passengers that everyone onboard remained healthy and happy when several guests had displayed symptoms consistent with the disease. This court granted in part operator's motion to dismiss, holding that passenger's allegations were insufficient to show that operator's actions were sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under maritime law, which looked to the standards set forth in Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Dome v. Celebrity Cruises Inc., 595 F.Supp.3d 1212, 1225.

S.D.Fla.2022. Com. (d) cit. and quot. in case cit. and quot. in sup. Customer filed a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against provider of an internet-connected home-alarm system that included indoor and outdoor camera surveillance, after provider's technician added himself to her account as authorized user and repeatedly accessed her account without her permission. This court granted in part provider's motion for summary judgment, holding that customer failed to establish that provider engaged in outrageous and extreme conduct, as required for it to be liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court pointed out that, while provider knew that its technicians had access to its customers' accounts, that access was limited to vetted employees who were instructed on the limitations of that access. Doty v. ADT, LLC, 594 F.Supp.3d 1319, 1338.

S.D.Fla.2020. Cit. and quot. in cases quot. in sup.; com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Passengers of a cruise ship filed a class action against cruise line, seeking to recover damages after the ship experienced a contagious-disease outbreak in which at least 45 people became infected and at least two people died. This court granted in part cruise line's motion to dismiss, holding that passengers failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against cruise line under Florida law and Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court reasoned that passengers' allegations that cruise line lied, concealed, and misrepresented to passengers that everybody on board the cruise ship was healthy when it knew that was false failed to rise to the level of outrageousness required to state such a claim. Kantrow v. Celebrity Cruises, Inc., 510 F.Supp.3d 1311, 1318, 1324, 1325.

S.D.Fla.2019. Cit. in sup. Wife and children of cruise-ship passenger filed a wrongful-death action against cruise-ship operator, alleging that passenger suffered a heart attack while the ship was in port and eventually died of cardiac arrest in the ship's medical center after defendant refused to allow him to disembark. This court denied defendant's motion to dismiss plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding, among other things, that plaintiffs' complaint adequately pleaded the extreme and outrageous conduct required to state such a claim under Florida law and Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court pointed to plaintiffs' allegations that defendant refused to let passenger or plaintiffs off the ship while it was docked despite statements by the ship's physician that passenger needed to be flown to Miami to undergo possible heart surgery and that time was of the essence, and that the ship left the port with passenger and plaintiffs confined onboard against their will. Eisenman v. Carnival Corporation, 424 F.Supp.3d 1303, 1308.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

S.D.Fla.2019. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Tenant brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against landlord, alleging that defendant engaged in pervasive sexual harassment of plaintiff, including making unwanted sexual propositions, conducting physical trespasses and stalking-related behaviors, and threatening plaintiff that he would not allow her to renew her lease or recover her security deposit if she refused to be his girlfriend. This court granted in part defendant's motion to dismiss, holding that defendant's actions—which amounted to unwelcome sexual advances without making physical contact—did not constitute extreme and outrageous conduct as defined by Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d. Noah v. Assor, 379 F.Supp.3d 1284, 1300.

S.D.Fla.2018. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. After being stopped for allegedly throwing bottles out of his car window by police, arrestee brought a lawsuit against county and detectives, alleging that detectives falsely arrested him and used excessive force when they slammed him onto the hood of his car, punched him, and cursed at him, despite his cooperation with them. This court granted defendants' motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to allege enough facts to sustain his claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against detectives. The court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment j, in explaining that detectives' conduct did not rise to the level of severity required under Florida law to meet the elements of an IIED claim. Casado v. Miami-Dade County, 340 F.Supp.3d 1320, 1332.

S.D.Fla.2017. Cit. in case quot. in sup.; com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Surviving spouse of cruise-ship passenger who fell overboard while intoxicated and presumably drowned brought a wrongful-death action under the Death on the High Seas Act against cruise-line operator, alleging, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) arising from defendant's negligence in over-serving alcohol to decedent and failing to timely detect and report her fall and initiate a prompt search-and-rescue attempt. This court denied defendant's motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that development of the record was necessary to determine whether defendant's conduct was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support an IIED claim. The court explained that, in admiralty cases, courts relied on the standard set forth in Restatement Second of Torts § 46 for evaluating IIED claims. Broberg v. Carnival Corporation, 303 F.Supp.3d 1313, 1317.

S.D.Fla.2017. Cit. in sup., adopted in case cit. in sup.; com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former college student brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against instructor of his composition class, alleging that instructor asked him to read aloud to the class on multiple occasions despite knowing that he suffered from a visual disability that prevented him from being able to do so, such that he was forced to disclose his disability to his classmates. This court granted instructor's motion to dismiss student's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that the conduct alleged by student was not so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and thus did not rise to the level necessary to support such a claim under Florida law and Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Leach v. District Board of Trustees of Palm Beach, 244 F.Supp.3d 1334, 1337, 1338.

S.D.Fla.2016. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Cruise-ship passenger sued ship's owner and its medical personnel for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress, following an incident in which one of her children drowned and another one of her children nearly drowned in the ship's pool. This court granted in part defendants' motion to dismiss, holding that passenger's allegations—that owner failed to employ lifeguards while advertising itself as family friendly and kid friendly, that owner failed to keep lifesaving equipment on the pool deck, that owner failed to have staff stationed on the pool deck who were prepared for a medical-drowning emergency, and that the ship's medical personnel took a long time to arrive after the children were pulled from the pool—were not sufficient to show that defendants engaged in extreme and outrageous conduct within the meaning of Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Blair v. NCL (Bahamas) Ltd., 212 F.Supp.3d 1264, 1270.

S.D.Fla.2013. Illus. 1 quot. in sup. Mother of an intoxicated cruise-ship passenger who climbed over a railing, fell overboard, and presumably drowned sued operator of the cruise ship, alleging, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress based on the fact that the captain or someone in a similar uniform told her that her son had committed suicide. Granting defendant's motion to dismiss plaintiff's emotional-distress claim, this court held that her allegations were insufficient to state such a claim, because the alleged conduct was not so outrageous in character and so extreme in degree as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency. The court reasoned that this was not a situation in which the captain, with no justification or factual predicate, decided to play a joke on plaintiff by falsely informing her of her son's death; the reality was that her son had in fact climbed a railing and fallen overboard, and there was no indication, nor any reason to infer, that the captain knew of plaintiff's religious faith and characterized her son's death as a suicide with the intention of causing her extra emotional suffering. Tello v. Royal Caribbean Cruises, Ltd., 939 F.Supp.2d 1269, 1278.

S.D.Fla.2012. Quot. in sup., adopted in case cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. Concert producer/promoter and its president/majority shareholder brought contract and tort claims against performer, his record company, his booking agent, and agent's president, after defendants issued a press release canceling a series of 10 concerts that plaintiffs had agreed to produce and promote. Granting in part defendants' motion to dismiss, this court held that plaintiffs failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against booking agent's president; while president's alleged conduct in seeking additional bargaining leverage, threatening to breach the parties' contract, and encouraging third parties to disparage plaintiffs could be aptly described as unprofessional or irresponsible, it was not, as a matter of law, so atrocious or utterly intolerable as to rise to the level of outrageousness required to state such a claim under Florida law. Five for Entertainment S.A. v. Rodriguez, 877 F.Supp.2d 1231, 1329.

S.D.Fla.2009. Com. (d) quot. and adopted in case quot. in sup. Same-sex partner and children of deceased female patient sued hospital, social worker, and physicians, alleging that defendants denied them certain visitation rights and refused to timely acknowledge partner's power of attorney or consult with her about patient's medical history, wishes, and treatment. Granting defendants' motion to dismiss, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiffs failed to allege conduct on defendants' part that was sufficiently outrageous to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress; while defendants might not have allowed plaintiffs as much visitation as medically permitted or warranted, they did permit plaintiffs to see patient at certain times before she died, and defendants eventually accepted partner as patient's health-care surrogate and consulted with her as to patient's treatment. Langbehn v. Public Health Trust of Miami-Dade County, 661 F.Supp.2d 1326, 1344.

S.D.Fla.2009. Cit. in ftn., adopted in case cit. in ftn. Mother sued the Republic of Cuba and others in connection with the arrest, prolonged detention, and torture of her son in Cuba, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia. Entering a default judgment against defendant on the IIED claim, and awarding compensatory and punitive damages to plaintiff, this court held that plaintiff had stated a claim for IIED, and such a claim was authorized under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act. The court noted that some courts analyzed tort claims against foreign states by looking to the standards of federal common law, and courts that had applied federal common law looked to Restatement Second of Torts § 46, which was expressly adopted as the basis for an IIED claim in Florida. Saludes v. Republica De Cuba, 655 F.Supp.2d 1290, 1295.

S.D.Fla.2000. Cit. in disc. Blind former employee sued former employer for discrimination under the Americans with Disabilities Act and state law, claiming intentional infliction of emotional distress, and negligent hiring, supervision, and retention. Granting in part employer's motion to dismiss, this court held, inter alia, that employer's conduct was not sufficiently outrageous to support claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Gillis v. Sports Authority, Inc., 123 F.Supp.2d 611, 616.

S.D.Fla.1998. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. and cit. in headnotes. A parcel-service company's driver sued the company for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that he had been subject to racial epithets, racial violence, racially discriminatory actions, and retaliation for opposing race discrimination. Plaintiff alleged that defendant fabricated a reckless driving charge in an attempt to fire him; that defendant's business manager told a false story about plaintiff to another employee and referred to plaintiff as a “nigger” in Spanish; and that he was unjustifiably suspended and demoted. This court granted in part and denied in part defendant's motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that defendant's actions did not rise to the level of relentless physical and verbal harassment necessary to state an emotional-distress claim. Vamper v. United Parcel Service, Inc., 14 F.Supp.2d 1301, 1302, 1306.

S.D.Fla.1996. Cit. in sup. (Cit. as Restatement of Torts). Employee sued former employer and employer's president for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiff alleged that she was terminated when she complained about president's unwelcome sexual advances, which included hugging her and making sexually explicit jokes and suggestive comments. Defendants moved to dismiss. Granting in part and denying in part the motion, the court held that, while the conduct complained of was unacceptable, it did not rise to the level of outrageousness required to sustain a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Blount v. Sterling Healthcare Group, Inc., 934 F.Supp. 1365, 1370.

S.D.Fla.1996. Cit. in headnotes, com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. A receptionist for a medical-services center sued the center, her supervisor, and a doctor at the center for, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress in light of the doctor's repeated acts of sexual harassment targeted at the receptionist. This court granted in part and denied in part the doctor's motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff stated a viable emotional-distress claim. Plaintiff alleged a pattern of persistent verbal and physical abuse that culminated in her constructive discharge, and, if established to be true, the doctor's conduct constituted outrageous behavior. Vernon v. Medical Management Associates of Margate, 912 F.Supp. 1549, 1551, 1557, 1559.

S.D.Fla.1995. Cit. in case quot. in sup. Employee sued employer for gender-based employment discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting in part defendant's motion for partial summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that defendant's alleged failures to pay compensation and benefits, to promote plaintiff or post job openings, and to treat plaintiff in a professional manner did not constitute behavior that was so outrageous and extreme as to sustain plaintiff's intentional infliction of emotional distress claim. Henderson v. Hovnanian Enterprises, Inc., 884 F.Supp. 499, 503.

S.D.Fla.1994. Cit. in headnote, cit. generally in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. Alleging that their harassing and discriminatory acts forced her to resign her position, a former cash register salesperson sued her former supervisors for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Denying defendants' motion for summary judgment on this count of plaintiff's complaint, the court held that, at this point in the proceedings, the record was insufficiently developed to ascertain whether defendants' conduct was so extreme and offensive as to support plaintiff's demand for relief. Albert v. National Cash Register Co., 874 F.Supp. 1328, 1328, 1331.

S.D.Fla.1993. Cit. in case cit. in sup., quot. in case quot. in sup. Employees sued their employer, asserting Title VII civil rights claims and Florida tort law claims, including one for intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted in part the defendants' motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that allegations regarding verbal harassment by a co-worker and improper transfer from one state to another did not assert an emotional distress claim under Florida law. Watson v. Bally Mfg. Corp., 844 F.Supp. 1533, 1536.

S.D.Fla.1992. Cit. in sup., subsec. (1) and com. (f) quot. in sup. A county employee sued the county commissioners, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court denied defendants' motion for judgment on the pleadings, holding that employee stated a claim for emotional distress where she alleged that employee's supervisor knew of her mental handicap, harassed employee for absences caused by the handicap and for tardiness resulting from necessary treatment, and maliciously pestered employee with questions about the nature and extent of the handicap. Doe v. Board of County Com'rs of Palm Beach County, Fla., 815 F.Supp. 1448, 1450.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

S.D.Fla.1991. Cit. in case cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress, conspiracy, and loss of consortium, the occupants of a car illegally stopped by the police and their spouses sued the police officers in a civil rights action. This court denied the police officers' motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that the car occupants had alleged conduct sufficiently outrageous to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court stated that the acts the police officers were accused of, physically and sexually abusing an elderly deaf woman, forcing two of the other occupants to stand in an area infested with red ants while handcuffed and unable to protect themselves from the painful bites, and forcing three other occupants to sit in the patrol car with the windows closed and the heater running on a hot day constituted outrageous conduct by the officers. McCray v. Holt, 777 F.Supp. 945, 946, 947.

S.D.Fla.1986. Quot. in sup., coms. (d) and (h) quot. in sup. A group of airplane passengers sued the airline after the airplane suffered an engine failure and was forced to return to the airport. The passengers alleged breach of contract, negligence, and entire want of care under state law, and violation of the Warsaw convention under federal law. The court granted, in part, the airline's motion for judgment on the pleadings. The court held that the entire want of care claim could not withstand a motion to dismiss for failure to state a cause of action unless the airline were guilty of another recognized intentional tort. The court rejected the passengers' argument that the airline was guilty of intentional infliction of emotional distress, because there were no facts to support the claim that the airline had acted recklessly or intentionally. In re Eastern Airlines, Inc., Engine Failure, 629 F.Supp. 307, 311, 312, judgment reversed 872 F.2d 1462 (11th Cir.1989), cert. granted 496 U.S. 904, 110 S.Ct. 2585, 110 L.Ed.2d 266 (1990).

M.D.Ga.

M.D.Ga.2012. Cit. in sup. (general cite). Home mortgage borrowers brought conversion and other claims against mortgage lender, seeking punitive damages and damages for emotional distress stemming from lender's failure to properly credit two mortgage payments to their account before eventually correcting the error a year and a half later. Denying in part lender's motion for summary judgment, this court held, among other things, that borrowers could potentially recover emotional-distress damages proximately caused by lender's intentional conversion of their money. The court explained that, under Georgia law, a plaintiff who sought emotional-distress damages without proof of a physical injury was not required to prove all of the elements of the separate tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress if the plaintiff could prove the essential elements of a well-recognized intentional tort and prove that the intentionally tortious conduct proximately caused the emotional-distress damages. Blackburn v. BAC Home Loans Servicing, LP, 914 F.Supp.2d 1316, 1329.

M.D.Ga.1999. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee who allegedly was forced to take maternity leave sued former employer for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that alleged conduct of defendant's co-owner in forcing plaintiff, when she was eight and one-half months pregnant, to file papers while sitting on the floor, asking her what she would do if her baby were born black, and telling her that she was a liability to the company and was stealing from him when she went to the doctor did not rise to the requisite level of outrageousness and egregiousness to state a viable claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress; furthermore, plaintiff failed to show that she suffered severe emotional distress. Allen v. Commercial Pest Control, Inc., 78 F.Supp.2d 1371, 1380.

M.D.Ga.1991. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (e) quot. in sup. A vehicle operated by the defendant insurance company's insured collided with the plaintiff's parked car. In the course of having his car repaired, the plaintiff twice contacted the insurance company's claims adjuster, who, on both occasions, allegedly used abusive language and called the plaintiff obscene and insulting names. After one such occasion, the plaintiff suffered a blackout and was hospitalized. The plaintiff sued the insurance company and the claims adjuster for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. The court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding that, given that the claims adjuster was in a position to affect the plaintiff's interests, a jury could find that the adjuster's conduct was sufficiently outrageous to support a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Brown v. Manning, 764 F.Supp. 183, 187.

N.D.Ga.

N.D.Ga.2017. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Insured owner of a home that was destroyed in a fire filed a pro se action against insurer and servicer of the mortgage on her home, alleging that defendants reduced the amount of coverage on her homeowner's insurance policy without her knowledge or consent. This court granted defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that defendants' alleged conduct in lowering or not increasing plaintiff's insurance coverage did not rise to the requisite level of outrageousness as a matter of law. The court explained that, under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, for a party's conduct to be considered outrageous, the conduct had to have been so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious, and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Griggs v. USAA Casualty Insurance Company, 263 F.Supp.3d 1375, 1381.

N.D.Ga.2009. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. Professor brought various claims against university and its officials in connection with their investigation of his alleged sexual harassment of a university employee. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment on plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held that, while plaintiff alleged that defendants' findings against him caused him intense feelings of embarrassment and humiliation, defendants' actions were not "extreme and outrageous" given the high bar set by Georgia case law, and that, even if defendants' actions could be considered extreme and outrageous, plaintiff failed to point to evidence supporting a crucial element of his claim, namely, that he suffered severe emotional distress as a result. Soloski v. Adams, 600 F.Supp.2d 1276, 1371.

N.D.Ga.2006. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Former employee sued former employer and co-workers for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court adopted the magistrate's report and recommendation that defendants be granted summary judgment on grounds that plaintiff failed to demonstrate that defendants engaged in extreme or outrageous conduct; plaintiff's allegations that one of his co-workers verbally abused him on numerous occasions and physically threatened him on at least two occasions, and that another co-worker ratified that conduct by failing to intervene after he complained about the alleged conduct and harassment, were insufficient to create a disputed issue of fact as to whether defendants subjected him to conduct that exceeded all possible bounds of decency. Bozeman v. Per-Se Technologies, Inc., 456 F.Supp.2d 1282, 1363.

N.D.Ga.2005. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee brought Title VII claims against former employer and its principal, alleging, among other things, sexual harassment by principal. This court, adopting the magistrate judge's report and recommendation, inter alia, granted defendants' motion for summary judgment as to plaintiff's pendent state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court held that plaintiff's allegations of unwanted attention, comments, and contact by principal did not rise to the requisite level of outrageousness and egregiousness to support a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress under Georgia law, noting that defendants' actions must have been so terrifying as naturally to humiliate, embarrass, or frighten plaintiff. Kimsey v. Akstein, 408 F.Supp.2d 1281, 1306.

N.D.Ga.2005. Com. (d) quot. in disc. After being terminated for violating her employer's expense-reporting policies, employee sued employer, alleging various instances of age and gender-based discrimination and harassment. Granting defendant summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to show that her supervisor's conduct in criticizing her work and rejecting her expense reports met the requisite level of outrageousness or engendered feelings of embarrassment, fright, or outrage so as to support plaintiff's state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Additionally, plaintiff's testimony that she experienced anxiety, depression, and stress following her firing was insufficient as a matter of law to show that her emotional distress was severe, since she did not seek medical attention or counseling for any distress. Pierri v. Cingular Wireless, LLC, 397 F.Supp.2d 1364, 1381.

N.D.Ga.2005. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee brought Title VII claims against former employer and its principal, alleging, among other things, sexual harassment by principal. This court, adopting the magistrate judge's report and recommendation, inter alia, granted defendants' motion for summary judgment as to plaintiff's pendent state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court held that plaintiff's allegations of unwanted attention, comments, and contact by principal did not rise to the requisite level of outrageousness and egregiousness to support a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress under Georgia law, noting that defendants' actions must have been so terrifying as naturally to humiliate, embarrass, or frighten plaintiff. Smith v. Akstein, 408 F.Supp.2d 1309, 1335.

N.D.Ga.2002. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former high school student sued school district, principal, and teacher, alleging that teacher committed sexual misconduct and asserting claims for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Parties cross-moved for summary judgment. Denying in part plaintiff's motion, this court held, inter alia, that, while teacher's conduct in inducing teenagers in participating in fake "experiments" for a "scholarship program" was clearly outrageous, issues of fact remained as to whether student established that he suffered severe emotional distress as a direct result. Hackett v. Fulton County School District, 238 F.Supp.2d 1330, 1371.

N.D.Ga.1998. Subsec. (1), com. (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. Paper-mill employee sued mill for intentional infliction of emotional distress and violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), alleging that defendant refused to make certain employment opportunities available to him because of a heart condition. Defendant moved for summary judgment. Granting the motion in part and denying it in part, the court held that, in Georgia, disadvantageous employment actions could not form the basis of a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress; however, because material factual issues existed as to whether plaintiff could be considered a qualified individual with a disability, summary judgment on the ADA claim was inappropriate. Wilson v. Georgia-Pacific Corp., 4 F.Supp.2d 1164, 1168.

N.D.Ga.1995. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in disc. (Erron. cit. as § 461.) Inmates at a federal penitentiary sued several correctional officers for claims of excessive force, cruel and unusual punishment, failure to provide medical care, assault and battery, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted in part and denied in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiffs failed to present any evidence to sustain a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because they provided no evidence that they suffered emotional distress that rose to the requisite level of severity in that they failed to show that they were humiliated, embarrassed, frightened, or outraged by defendants' alleged conduct. Ruble v. King, 911 F.Supp. 1544, 1559.

N.D.Ga.1994. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in disc. (Erron. cit. as § 461). A pregnant Nigerian immigrant who was refused medical treatment because she declined to consent to HIV testing sued the obstetrics and gynecological clinic for, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court, among other dispositions, denied plaintiff's motion for summary judgment on the emotional-distress claim, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to point to any intentional or reckless conduct by any individual defendant that rose to the requisite level of outrageousness or egregiousness. Even if defendants' termination of treatment as a result of plaintiff's refusal to follow defendants' medical advice were deemed to violate Title VI or the Americans with Disabilities Act, there was no indication that it was done out of any desire to humiliate, frighten or anger plaintiff. Atakpa v. Perimeter Ob-Gyn Associates, P.C., 912 F.Supp. 1566, 1577.

N.D.Ga.1994. Cit. in case quot. in sup. Former manager for janitorial-services provider sued employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that she was fired because of her sex and her pregnancy. This court, among other orders, denied plaintiff's motion for summary judgment on her emotional-distress claim, holding that issues of fact existed as to this claim. It reasoned that plaintiff was pregnant, and therefore, arguably, in a particularly susceptible emotional and physical condition; that her division president occupied a position of control over her; that defendant intentionally eliminated her position, subjected her to discriminatory treatment and inferior working conditions, isolated her, and closed her out of meetings; and that she suffered severe emotional distress to the extent that her marriage was ruined, she needed intensive psychological counseling, and she was taking antidepressant medication. Shepherd v. ISS Intern. Service System, Inc., 873 F.Supp. 1550, 1558.

N.D.Ga.1987. Subsec. (1), com. (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. An employee sued her employer in federal court, asserting a federal claim of age discrimination and a pendent state claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress based on allegations that agents and representatives of the employer embarrassed and humiliated her for her failure to receive a promotion. This court granted in part and denied in part the employer's motion for summary judgment, holding that the evidence was insufficient to support a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court stated that the plaintiff failed to show that her alleged emotional distress was so extreme, severe, and outrageous as to support her claim. Gaston v. Southern Bell Tel. and Tel. Co., 674 F.Supp. 347, 353.

S.D.Ga.

S.D.Ga.2014. Com. (d) quot. in cases quot. in sup. (general cite). Parents and their daughter, who were passengers of airline, brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, against airline, alleging that defendant's employee publicly attacked them in an airport by suggesting that they could not speak English, that he intentionally or recklessly failed communicate to parents that he had put daughter on standby for two days, and that he forced them to purchase a new ticket for daughter although she already had a valid ticket. Granting in part defendant's motion to dismiss, this court held that plaintiffs failed to state a plausible IIED claim, because defendant's actions were not “extreme and outrageous” under the standards set out in Restatement Second of Torts § 46 and Restatement Third of Torts: Liability for Physical and Emotional Harm § 46. The court explained that the complaint alleged mere insults and failures to perform under an existing contract, which were not sufficient to sustain an IIED claim. Benjamin v. American Airlines, Inc., 32 F.Supp.3d 1309, 1322.

S.D.Ga.1995. Com. (d) quot. in disc., com. (f) cit. in disc. Accident victim's husband brought suit for intentional infliction of emotional distress against insurer, arising from claims adjuster's statement that plaintiff was a "liar." Granting defendant's motion for a directed verdict, the court held that adjuster's conduct was not tortious as a matter of law, in spite of the facts that plaintiff and adjuster had a "special relationship" by virtue of adjuster's power to damage plaintiff's interests and that adjuster had "special knowledge" of plaintiff's heart condition. The court said that the two factors had little weight and did not lead, ipso facto, to liability, since plaintiff and adjuster had no longstanding relationship of trust, the amount of money at issue was not large, and adjuster was clearly willing to repair plaintiff's truck. Price v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 878 F.Supp. 1567, 1569, 1573.

S.D.Ga.1995. Cit. in headnote, com. (d) cit. but dist., com. (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. Job applicant who alleged she was rejected three times for the same position sued prospective employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Applicant maintained that she was discriminated against because she was prone to epileptic seizures. Employer moved for summary judgment. Granting the motion, the court held that the decision to withhold an offer of employment, even if withheld for improper reasons, was not the type of extreme, outrageous, or egregious conduct that could serve as the basis for a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Moreover, the court did not believe that a reasonable person would suffer extreme emotional distress as a result of the encounters applicant described. Ward v. Papa's Pizza To Go, Inc., 907 F.Supp. 1535, 1536, 1540, 1541.

S.D.Ga.1994. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. An oil-company employee and her husband sued employer for civil-rights violations and intentional infliction of emotional distress arising from persistent sexual harassment by co-workers. This court granted in part and denied in part employer's motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff had no cause of action for emotional distress against employer because the alleged sexual harassment was not committed in furtherance of employer's business, as it occurred outside the scope of plaintiff's coemployees' jobs. The court, therefore, did not need to resolve whether plaintiffs' allegations, which included obscene language, sexual gestures, crank calls, and the presence of pornographic magazines, rose to the requisite level of severity. Mills v. Amoco Performance Products, Inc., 872 F.Supp. 975, 991.

D.Hawaii

D.Hawaii, 2020. Cit. in case cit. in ftn. (general cite). In former employee's claim for conversion against employer's corporate parent and its officers, who allegedly used his credit-card information without authorization for business expenses, this court denied in part defendants' motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiff stated a claim for conversion under Restatement Second of Torts § 242. The court noted that the Hawaii Supreme Court frequently turned to the Restatement Second of Torts for guidance, citing by way of example a case in which it looked to Restatement Second of Torts § 46 in discussing intentional infliction of emotional distress. Jass v. CherryRoad Technologies, Inc., 472 F.Supp.3d 787, 796.

D.Hawaii,

D.Hawaii, 2017. Coms. (e) and (g) quot. in case quot. in sup. Recipient of Medicare and Medicaid, who used a personal-mobility device due to his medical conditions, sued providers of benefits under plaintiff's Medicare and Medicaid plans, alleging that defendants committed the tort of bad faith by withholding approval of his request for a new personal-mobility device and intentionally inflicted emotional distress on him through their litigation tactics. This court granted summary judgment for defendants, holding that, while Restatement Second of Torts § 46 provided that a plaintiff could state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress based on an opposing party's litigation tactics in a prior lawsuit, plaintiff's allegations regarding defendants' conduct involved third parties and were not based on defendants' direct interactions with plaintiff; in addition, plaintiff's claim did not concern a previous lawsuit in which plaintiff was successful. Quinones v. UnitedHealth Group Incorporated, 250 F.Supp.3d 692, 707.

D.Hawaii, 2013. Adopted in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Terminated 59-year-old male employee sued former employer, alleging violations of state discrimination laws based on age and gender, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, after his position was eliminated and a younger female co-worker was selected for the newly created position that replaced his position. Granting summary judgment for employer on employee's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held, among other things, that, even when viewed in the light most favorable to employee, the evidence did not demonstrate that employer's alleged conduct—in wrongly failing to select him for the newly created position based on discriminatory conduct—was outrageous or beyond all bounds of decency, as required to state such a claim. Hollister v. Mrs. Gooch's Natural Food Markets, Inc., 919 F.Supp.2d 1101, 1110, 1111.

D.Hawaii

D.Hawaii, 2010. Adopted in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup., quot. in case quot. in sup. Former security guard/bellman at hotel brought discrimination action against hotel and others, as well as a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) in connection with hotel's handling of an alleged altercation with co-worker. Denying summary judgment for hotel on the IIED claim, this court held that plaintiff raised a genuine issue of material fact that hotel's conduct was outrageous, in light of his allegations that hotel's general manager, who, unlike plaintiff, was not Caucasian, responded to plaintiff's question of, “Why don't you like me?,” by asking, “How many white people do you see on my staff?” The court noted that, while, under Hawaii law, an IIED claim could not be sustained by threats, annoyances, petty oppressions, or other trivialities, sexually harassing behavior, racial slurs, and accusations of criminal conduct could all possibly be considered outrageous conduct. Hughes v. Mayoral, 721 F.Supp.2d 947, 964, 965.

D.Hawaii, 2009. Adopted in case quot. in sup., com. (i) quot. in sup. Parents of child who was either stillborn or died shortly after birth sued hospital after it misplaced child's remains, which were never found. Denying summary judgment for hospital on plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held, inter alia, that a reasonable person could find that hospital's actions were reckless and outrageous; hospital delayed issuing birth and death certificates over six months after child's death even though it knew bodies could not be removed from the morgue without a death certificate and the morgue could not accommodate bodies for a long period of time, and hospital's own expert hypothesized that someone with access to the locked morgue might have "inadvertently" discarded the remains. Ritchie v. Wahiawa General Hosp., 597 F.Supp.2d 1100, 1110, 1112.

D.Hawaii, 2006. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Union member sued union employee for, among other things, allegedly filing a false police report accusing plaintiff of assaulting and robbing defendant at an illegal cockfight and repeating those accusations at a general union meeting. This court denied defendant's motion to dismiss plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding, inter alia, that a finder of fact could reasonably determine that defendant's actions constituted outrageous and reckless conduct. The court noted that where reasonable persons differed as to whether the acts alleged were sufficiently outrageous to form the basis for a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress, the question should be left to a jury. Machado v. International Ass'n of Heat & Frost Insulators & Asbestos Workers, 454 F.Supp.2d 1056, 1063.

D.Hawaii, 2005. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Former employee sued employer, supervisor, and others for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that he was terminated and otherwise retaliated against after he made an anonymous complaint about employer on employer's confidential compliance hotline. Denying employer's motion for summary judgment as to the claim for emotional distress, this court held that questions of material fact remained as to whether the acts were in retaliation for employee's protected activity, and that the alleged conduct, including supervisor's refusal to respond to employee's inquiries, her public scolding of employee, and her reassignment of projects in such a manner as to impact his pay and employment evaluation, when viewed in the light most favorable to employee, could be found to constitute outrageous behavior. Lopes v. Kapiolani Medical Center for Women & Children, 410 F.Supp.2d 939, 957.

D.Hawaii, 2005. Adopted in case quot. in sup. Special-education tutor brought civil-rights action against state education department and its officials, asserting various state and federal claims based on alleged racial and sexual discrimination. The court granted judgment on the pleadings for one official sued in her individual capacity judgment for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding, as a matter of law, that official's implementation of a policy prohibiting male teachers from tutoring female students did not constitute objectively-outrageous conduct, since, inter alia, it applied to all teachers and did not single out plaintiff; additionally, plaintiff alleged, at most, embarrassment, not emotional distress, from receiving fewer tutoring assignments. Sherez v. State of Hawai'i Dept. of Educ., 396 F.Supp.2d 1138, 1148.

D.Hawaii, 2005. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. After employer hotel failed to accommodate his request for light duty, hotel bartender on workers' compensation leave sued employer for violating Americans with Disabilities Act, alleging negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress because employer's agent told union president that plaintiff was not welcome to return to employer's hotel. This court granted employer summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, since agent's conduct was not outrageous or unreasonable. The court determined that telling a union representative who would ultimately relay to employee that employee was terminated—and even going so far as to tell representative that employee could not return to employer's premises—did not go beyond all bounds of decency. Soone v. Kyo-Ya Co., Ltd., 353 F.Supp.2d 1107, 1116-1117.

D.Hawaii, 2004. Cit. in sup., coms. (d) and (f) quot. in sup. Nonprofit corporation and three African-American representatives sued parks employee and city, which had issued permit that did not allow vending as money-raising activity at corporation event and failed to clean park in advance of event, alleging, in part, that employee's racial slurs and discriminatory acts constituted intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiffs did not produce evidence concerning emotional distress suffered as a result of employee's racial slurs and acts of discrimination. Epileptic Foundation v. City and County of Maui, 300 F.Supp.2d 1003, 1014, 1015.

D.Hawaii, 2004. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Employer fired employee who gave urine sample pursuant to employer's drug-testing policy after diagnostic laboratory erroneously reported that sample was inconsistent with human urine. Laboratory did not inform employer of its mistake for two years. Employee sued laboratory for intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court denied defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding that, regarding the emotional-distress claim, issues of material fact existed as to whether defendant's delay in disclosure rose to requisite level of outrageous conduct, since reasonable juror could find that defendant's failure to provide information about urine test to plaintiff in a timely manner, which resulted in the loss of his job for two years and caused his depression, was extreme and outrageous conduct. Nagata v. Quest Diagnostics Inc., 303 F.Supp.2d 1121, 1127.

D.Hawaii, 2001. Cit. in case cit. in sup., quot. in ftn. Worker whose employment was terminated after he suffered a back injury on the job sued former employer for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court denied defendant's motion for summary judgment on plaintiff's claim to the extent that plaintiff sought to recover under general maritime law for intentional infliction of emotional distress relating to defendant's allegedly wrongful reduction of maintenance payments to plaintiff, stating that a genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether the reduction constituted extreme and outrageous conduct or unconscionable abuse. Fawkner v. Atlantis Submarines, Inc., 135 F.Supp.2d 1127, 1135, 1136.

D.Hawaii, 2001. Com, (h) cit. in case quot. in sup. Hawaii resident claiming to be daughter of deceased movie star sued New York magazine for libel per se, defamation, tortious infliction of emotional distress, tortious interference with contractual relations, unjust enrichment, and punitive damages in connection with magazine article. Granting magazine's motion for judgment on the pleadings, or in the alternative, summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff did not establish an intentional tort to sustain claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Miracle v. New Yorker Magazine, 190 F.Supp.2d 1192, 1202.

D.Hawaii, 2000. Com. (d) quot. in disc. Owner of a lumber business sued police department, police chief, police officers, and others for violations of 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and several state law torts, including intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress. This court denied the summary-judgment motions of the police department and the county police officer on the emotional-distress claim, holding, inter alia, that fact issues existed as to whether defendants' actions of yelling at plaintiff, arresting him, dragging him across the floor, and tossing him into a police car because he protested the wrongful taking of various pieces of property were unreasonable, and whether officer should have recognized that his actions were likely to result in plaintiff's depression and suicidal thoughts. Pourny v. Maui Police Dept., County of Maui, 127 F.Supp.2d 1129, 1147.

D.Hawaii, 1999. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. African-American employee who claimed that he had suffered racial harassment, discrimination, and retaliation sued employer for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Denying in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether defendant's failure to promote plaintiff to several positions, suspension of plaintiff, and alleged racial insults rose to the level of outrageous conduct necessary to maintain a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Lesane v. Hawaiian Airlines, 75 F.Supp.2d 1113, 1121.

D.Hawaii, 1998. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. and cit. generally in headnote. Employee sued former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, after his employment relationship was abruptly ended when he failed to provide medical certification for his illness. In violation of its employee manual, defendant failed to give two weeks' notice of termination, and it violated the law when it told the disability insurer that plaintiff had received unemployment and disability payments at the same time. This court denied in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that fact issues existed as to whether a reasonable man could suffer severe distress under these circumstances. UEMA v. Nippon Exp. Hawai'i, Inc., 26 F.Supp.2d 1241, 1244, 1250.

D.Hawaii, 1996. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in ftn. Former airline employee who alleged that he was discharged because of a psychological disability sued the airline and his former supervisor for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held, in part, that plaintiff's claim against former supervisor individually for intentional infliction of emotional distress was barred by Hawaii's two-year statute of limitations. Alternatively, the court found that the allegations in plaintiff's affidavit concerning his alleged harassment at work raised no genuine issue of outrageous conduct necessary to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Ellison v. Northwest Airlines, Inc., 938 F.Supp. 1503, 1516.

D.Hawaii, 1995. Cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. An insured and his beneficiary sued a life insurer and its agent who sold him a universal life policy, alleging, among other things, that defendants marketed and sold the policy as part of a plan of deliberately and fraudulently selling such policies during a period of high interest rates. Plaintiffs alleged that defendants' extrinsic representations induced them to switch from "whole" to "universal" life, that defendants later wrongfully failed to provide them with information, and that defendants' actions resulted in emotional distress to the beneficiary. This court dismissed in part, holding, inter alia, that defendants' conduct was not outrageous. Keiter v. Penn Mut. Ins. Co., 900 F.Supp. 1339, 1348.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

D.Hawaii, 1995. Cit. in case quot. in disc., subsec. (1) quot. in ftn., com. (d) quot. in ftn. and cit. in case quot. in disc. Former crew member sued owner of cargo container ship for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress under the Jones Act, alleging that he collapsed due to stress and excessive abuse by his superior officer. Granting in part defendant's motion for partial summary judgment, the court held that, even assuming that plaintiff suffered severe emotional injury, he was not subjected to the unconscionable abuse or extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Yballa v. Sea-Land Services, Inc., 919 F.Supp. 1428, 1437.

D.Hawaii, 1994. Com. (d) quot. in part in case cit. in sup. Former employee sued former employer and former supervisor for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, contending that former supervisor interrupted her when she spoke, yelled at her, changed his instructions to her, told her she could quit if she was unhappy, gave her conflicting work instructions, and told her not to question his actions. The court granted defendants summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that former supervisor's comments, while distasteful, did not rise to level of outrageousness needed to maintain claim. Bragalone v. Kona Coast Resort Joint Venture, 866 F.Supp. 1285, 1294.

D.Hawaii, 1988. Cit. in disc., com. (h) quot. in case cit. in disc. An employee who alleged that a co-worker physically assaulted her by grabbing her breast and buttock was moved into a newly created position and then fired for poor job performance after less than two weeks. The employee sued her employer and coemployees, alleging, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress arising out of her discharge. The court denied the defendants' motion for partial summary judgment, holding that the conduct of the defendant who physically assaulted the plaintiff was sufficiently outrageous to support a claim for emotional distress and that it was a question of fact as to whether the conduct of the other defendants in participating in, encouraging, or condoning those actions also rose to the required level of outrageousness. Lapinad v. Pacific Oldsmobile-GMC, Inc., 679 F.Supp. 991, 995, 996.

D.Idaho

D.Idaho, 1988. Com. (j) quot. in sup. A man sued his insurer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that the insurer, which failed to make timely payment of two monthly benefits on his disability insurance, knew or should have known that the delayed payments would cause him financial and emotional injury. The court granted the defendant's motion to dismiss, holding that as a legal certainty the claim did not exceed the jurisdictional amount of $10,000, since the plaintiff's affidavit in support of the jurisdictional amount did not reveal the severe emotional distress required to warrant recovery of damages. Windsor v. Guarantee Trust Life Ins. Co., 684 F.Supp. 630, 632.

D.Idaho Bkrtcy.Ct.

D.Idaho Bkrtcy.Ct.2001. Com. (j) cit. in case quot. in sup. Chapter 13 debtor and trustee of his bankruptcy estate brought an adversary proceeding against company that purchased at a discounted present value debtor's annuity payments from a structured personal-injury settlement, claiming damages for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Entering judgment for plaintiffs on other grounds, the court held, inter alia, that, although defendant's pursuit of the transaction with debtor despite its knowledge of debtor's brain injury from a car accident, lack of employment, and living arrangements with his parents was extreme and outrageous, debtor and his family failed to show that they suffered the requisite level of severely disabling emotional distress to support their claim. In re Wiggins, 273 B.R. 839, 879.

C.D.Ill.

C.D.Ill.2010. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Female first-grade students, through their parents, sued school administrators, among others, asserting a common-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) as part of their suit for sexual harassment, sexual discrimination, and sexual abuse by a teacher in violation of state and federal statutes. Denying defendants' motion to dismiss the claim, this court held that plaintiffs sufficiently alleged behavior on administrators' part that rose to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct, when viewed as a whole and in light of plaintiffs' tender age when the abuse occurred; plaintiffs alleged that administrators knew that teacher was making extensive use of his work computer to view pornography on the Internet and was sequestering plaintiffs in a locked classroom at least weekly for over six months, and that administrators concealed their knowledge in order to protect themselves, knowing that doing so would allow teacher to continue his abuse. Doe 20 v. Board of Educ. of Community Unit School Dist. No. 5, 680 F.Supp.2d 957, 984.

C.D.Ill.2009. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Minor students and their parents sued students' former first grade teacher, alleging that teacher sexually harassed students, sexually groomed them for the purpose of introducing sexual abuse, and/or sexually abused them. Denying defendant's motion to dismiss plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiffs sufficiently pled the elements of such a claim under Illinois law; it was obvious from plaintiffs' allegations that defendant engaged in “truly extreme and outrageous conduct” and that he intended to inflict severe emotional distress on students, and the alleged conduct allowed a plausible inference that students had suffered severe emotional distress. Doe ex rel. Doe v. White, 627 F.Supp.2d 905, 912.

C.D.Ill.1997. Cit. in headnotes, com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Individual who was arrested in connection with the beating of a gas station attendant sued arresting officers for, inter alia, false arrest, false imprisonment, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Arrestee's wife and sister, who were questioned over a four-day period, also asserted claims for false imprisonment and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Officers moved for judgment as a matter of law. Granting the motion, the court held, in part, that officers had probable cause to arrest arrestee; that defendants could not be found liable for false imprisonment where arrestee was held in jail over the weekend as the result of an agreement between his attorney and officers, and where wife and sister were free to terminate their questioning at any time; and that officers' conduct was not so outrageous and extreme as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency in a civilized society. Cornish v. Papis, 962 F.Supp. 1103, 1105, 1111.

C.D.Ill.1997. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. Employees of state Department of Children and Family Services sued state for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with the manner in which they were terminated. Granting defendants' motion for judgment as a matter of law, the court held, in part, that plaintiffs were unable to show that they suffered severe emotional distress as a result of the alleged wrongdoing. Ryan v. Ill. Dept. of Children & Family Services, 963 F.Supp. 1490, 1512, reversed 185 F.3d 751 (7th Cir.1999).

N.D.Ill.

N.D.Ill.2023. Cit. in case cit. in sup.; com. (e) cit. in case cit. in sup.; com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. and quot. in case quot. in ftn. Battery suspect sued, among others, police officer who responded to an altercation between suspect's group of friends and owner and bouncers of nearby bar, alleging that officer's use of force when arriving on scene and false testimony at suspect's criminal trial for battery to cover up officer's misconduct caused suspect extreme emotional distress. This court denied officer's motion for summary judgment, holding that there was a genuine issue of material fact as to whether officer's conduct was extreme and outrageous under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court noted that § 46 identified police officers as an example of a person with authority over others and whose degree of power or authority could impact whether the at-issue conduct was deemed outrageous. Bedford v. Dewitt, 662 F.Supp.3d 856, 879-881, 887-888.

N.D.Ill.2021. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Pretrial detainees at a county juvenile detention center filed a class action against, among others, county, center's superintendent, and television network, alleging that superintendent's decision to allow network to film portions of a television show at the center caused detainees to experience increased confinement and interruptions to school and recreation. This court granted summary judgment for county and superintendent on detainees' claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that detainees failed to show that their harm was sufficiently severe to support such a claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court pointed out that detainees had not submitted evidence that they suffered any emotional distress beyond mere annoyance, frustration, or stress, which did not supply a basis for a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Illinois law. T.S. v. Twentieth Century Fox Television, 548 F.Supp.3d 749, 783, 784.

N.D.Ill.2020. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup.; com. (j) quot. in case cit. and quot. in sup. Former fiancée and her parents filed a claim for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress against former fiancé and his parents in connection with allegations that defendants surreptitiously listened to and recorded a private conversation between fiancée and her parents and later disseminated the recorded conversation to others. This court granted defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiffs' emotional-distress claim, holding, among other things, that plaintiffs had not alleged sufficiently extreme and outrageous conduct, nor did their allegations plausibly suggest that defendants intended to cause distress so severe that no reasonable person could be expected to endure it, or were aware of a high probability that their actions would cause such distress, as required to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Gross v. Chapman, 475 F.Supp.3d 858, 864, 865.

N.D.Ill.2019. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Female city police officer, who had refused to date male state trooper, sued state trooper and his co-worker, alleging that co-worker, at state trooper's request, handcuffed her and locked her in the back of his cruiser for six hours, drove her around the city and at one point pretended to let her go, all while taunting her and showing her embarrassing videos of herself. This court denied defendants' motions to dismiss, holding that plaintiff stated a claim against them for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Illinois law and Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court reasoned that plaintiff adequately pleaded that co-worker's conduct was extreme and outrageous, as evidenced in part by the fact that he disabled his dashboard camera, and that she suffered severe emotional distress requiring psychological treatment as a result of the ordeal. Molina v. Latronico, 430 F.Supp.3d 420, 441.

N.D.Ill.2017. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. Male student brought claims for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress against college and female classmate, alleging that college wrongfully suspended him after classmate falsely accused him of sexually assaulting her while she was incapacitated by alcohol. This court granted college's motion to dismiss student's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that, even if college's resolution of classmate's sexual-assault complaint against student was unfair or unreasonable, student did not allege conduct that constituted the type of extreme, targeted, and malicious conduct required for an intentional infliction of emotional distress claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Doe v. Columbia College Chicago, 299 F.Supp.3d 939, 964.

N.D.Ill.2015. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. Former prisoner who was incarcerated for 20 years for a rape and battery before DNA evidence eliminated him as a source of the semen found on the victim brought claims for malicious prosecution and intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against forensic serologist who failed to exclude him as a source of the semen found on the victim and against dentists who testified that he had left bite marks on the victim. This court granted in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding that prisoner failed to identify evidence sufficient to maintain his malicious-prosecution claim against serologist or dentists, and that he therefore could not maintain his IIED claim against them. The court noted that, under Illinois law, which followed Restatement Second of Torts § 46, the hurdle for an IIED claim was even higher than for a malicious-prosecution claim, where, as here, the safe offending conduct formed the basis of both claims. Starks v. City of Waukegan, 123 F.Supp.3d 1036, 1063.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

N.D.Ill.2014. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Widow, as administrator of the estate of pretrial detainee who experienced a seizure and died while he was in custody at a county jail, sued correctional officers at the jail, alleging, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). This court denied defendants' motion for summary judgment on the IIED claim, holding that there were questions of fact as to whether defendants knew that decedent was suffering seizures and ignored his suffering. The court explained that a reasonable jury could find that ignoring a patently severe medical condition such as a seizure was extreme and outrageous conduct under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, especially because defendants had complete authority over decedent during his incarceration. Awalt v. Marketti, 74 F.Supp.3d 909, 941-942.

N.D.Ill.2013. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Arrestee brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against city police officers, after defendants arrested him for drug offenses without probable cause, transported him around town, and brought him to jail, where he stayed for eight months. Denying defendants' motion for summary judgment as to this claim, this court held that the evidence showed that defendants engaged in extreme and outrageous conduct, especially given that they were abusing their power if they did indeed engage in the alleged acts. The court further held that there was sufficient evidence that arrestee actually suffered severe emotional distress, because his alleged anxiety, depression, helplessness, frustration, impatience and sadness, together with physical symptoms such as panic attacks and "rushes" as a result of his distress, constituted a degree of distress that no reasonable person should be expected to withstand. Padilla v. City of Chicago, 932 F.Supp.2d 907, 930.

N.D.Ill.2011. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Doctor brought claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, against medical center and former supervisor, alleging that defendants' course of conduct throughout his residency at medical center caused him extreme emotional distress. Granting defendants' motion to dismiss the IIED claim, this court held that plaintiff's allegations that he was, among other things, placed on academic probation without being accused of specific deficiencies and reprimanded undeservedly and hypercritically would, if proven, demonstrate that he was subjected to an unfair work environment, but would not be so extreme and outrageous as to exceed all bounds of human decency, as required to state a claim for IIED under Arizona law. Chi v. Loyola University Medical Center, 787 F.Supp.2d 797, 807.

N.D.Ill.2011. Com. (d) quot. in disc. Pregnant former airline employee sued airline for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, alleging that she suffered severe distress as a result of termination from her job, which she believed was motivated by gender discrimination, among other things. This court granted summary judgment for defendant on the IIED claim because, in order to prove IIED under the Restatement and Illinois law, a plaintiff had to show that a defendant's conduct was so extreme as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and plaintiff did not challenge summary judgment on this issue. Mashal v. Royal Jordanian Airlines, 837 F.Supp.2d 884, 891.

N.D.Ill.2011. Com. (j) quot. in sup. After condominium owner suffered a serious head injury and was prescribed an emotional support dog, condominium association, which had a no-pets policy, imposed limitations on where in the building owner could bring her dog; owner and her husband sued association and others for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, alleging that defendants repeatedly harassed and humiliated them, tracked their movements, imposed unreasonable demands and restrictions, and made them feel unsafe and unwelcome in their own home. Granting defendants' motion to dismiss the IIED claim, this court held that plaintiffs' allegations were insufficient because defendants' conduct was neither extreme nor outrageous. The court reasoned, among other things, that plaintiffs' allegations amounted to a dispute over whether defendants went far enough in accommodating a disability, an issue that would be decided in plaintiff's separate federal statutory failure-to-accommodate claim. Stevens v. Hollywood Towers and Condominium Ass'n, 836 F.Supp.2d 800, 812.

N.D.Ill.2009. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee sued former employer and supervisor, alleging, inter alia, that defendants wrongfully caused her to suffer "mental stress." Granting defendants' motion to dismiss, this court held that defendants' alleged conduct in terminating plaintiff in violation of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act, as well as "publicly scolding" her and "shouting venomously" at her, was not enough to constitute extreme and outrageous conduct so as to be actionable as intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court pointed out that the complaint was devoid of any factual material to support plaintiff's conclusory allegation that she "reasonably found the behavior to be more than petty or mere insults." Curran v. JP Morgan Chase, N.A., 633 F.Supp.2d 639, 643.

N.D.Ill.2004. Com. (d) quot. in ftn. and quot. in case quot. in ftn. Former county jail corrections officers sued fellow officers, supervisors, and county, alleging harassment and retaliation for plaintiffs' expressed willingness to disclose instances of excessive force used against inmates. Denying in part defendants' motion to dismiss, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiffs stated claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress where they alleged a death threat and deliberate acts, such as not providing backup when requested and not investigating a prisoner attack, all of which, in prison context, put officers in harm's way. Fairley v. Andrews, 300 F.Supp.2d 660, 667.

N.D.Ill.2004. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. City resident who allegedly was threatened by her sister brought federal and state-law claims against police officers and city after officers failed to investigate resident's allegations or arrest resident's sister. Granting officers' motion for summary judgment, the court held that, as to resident's intentional-infliction-of-emotional-distress claim, resident failed to allege any conduct by officers that was so extreme or outrageous as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, nor did she identify any severe emotional distress suffered as a result of officers' unactionable laughter and inappropriate comments. Farrar v. Bracamondes, 332 F.Supp.2d 1126, 1131.

N.D.Ill.2003. Com. (d) quot. in sup. and quot. in case quot. in sup. Police officer for public railroad corporation sued corporation and supervisor, among others, for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, after he was exonerated of charges of robbery and possession of a controlled substance. Denying in part defendants' motion to dismiss, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's allegations that supervisor made false statements to city police officers, withheld exculpatory evidence, and testified falsely at plaintiff's criminal trial stated a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against supervisor and vicariously against corporation. Bergstrom v. McSweeney, 294 F.Supp.2d 961, 969.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

N.D.Ill.2003. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. African-American plaintiff sued city and police officers for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, after officers refused to investigate and arrest plaintiff's sister, who had threatened plaintiff with bodily harm, and laughed at a threatening voicemail message left by plaintiff's sister. Denying in part defendants' motion to dismiss, the court held, inter alia, that, although the facts that plaintiff alleged did not qualify as extreme or outrageous, as required to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, federal notice-pleading standards did not require her to allege all facts in support of her claim. Farrar v. City of Chicago, 291 F.Supp.2d 747, 754.

N.D.Ill.2002. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in cases quot. in disc. Former employee sued former employer and its parent company, asserting federal-law claims for discrimination based on sex and disability, and state-law claims in tort and contract. Denying in part defendant's motion to dismiss, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's allegations that, despite numerous complaints, she was subjected to a repeated pattern of sexual harassment for almost six years sufficed to state a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress in a notice-pleading regime. Arnold v. Janssen Pharmaceutica, Inc., 215 F.Supp.2d 951, 961.

N.D.Ill.2002. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (e) cit. in sup. Female employees sued former employer and supervisor for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging sexual harassment and hostile work environment. This court denied defendants' motion to dismiss the emotional-distress claim, holding, inter alia, that the misconduct alleged by plaintiffs might rise to the requisite level of outrageousness. Plaintiffs sufficiently alleged inappropriate and offensive sexual comments, unwelcome and unwanted sexual advances, and numerous occasions of harmful and offensive touching by their superior. Plaintiffs further alleged that employer knew of the sexual harassment and discrimination and, in response to complaints, retaliated by raising performance standards or directly discharging each plaintiff. Spahn v. International Quality & Productivity Center, 211 F.Supp.2d 1072, 1076.

N.D.Ill.2002. Com. (d) quot. in disc. Employee sued former employer and supervisor for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that she was sexually harassed by supervisor, and that employer retaliated against her for complaining about sexual harassment by changing her working conditions and then firing her. This court granted in part employer's motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that since plaintiff's only theory of recovery on emotional-distress claim sounded in retaliation, it was not independent of Illinois Human Rights Act, and was preempted. The court noted that although supervisor's assault was boorish, offensive, and inappropriate, and changes in plaintiff's work environment that followed were unpleasant, those actions alone were not outrageous; however, a jury could have found that changes in work environment were retaliatory, and therefore extreme and outrageous. Thomas v. Habitat Co., 213 F.Supp.2d 887, 898.

N.D.Ill.2000. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. A man who was prosecuted for the murder of his wife and acquitted by a jury sued a police officer, the sheriff, and the county coroner for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. This court granted defendants summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that defendants' conduct did not rise to the level required for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because plaintiff did not allege that he was framed in the sense that evidence was planted, material perjury occurred, or exculpatory evidence was withheld from the prosecutors who ultimately made the decision to bring the case to the grand jury. Nugent v. Hayes, 88 F.Supp.2d 862, 869.

N.D.Ill.1999. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in ftn. College athlete sued her former basketball coach, the university, and its board of trustees for sexual harassment and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. This court dismissed plaintiff's complaint, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's emotional-distress claim was barred by the statute of limitations. The court noted that plaintiff's complaint did not include allegations of the kind of extreme and outrageous conduct that was required for this claim. Turner v. McQuarter, 79 F.Supp.2d 911, 918.

N.D.Ill.1998. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. A tenant who was evicted from her apartment sued the apartment owner and manager for, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress, age discrimination, and sexual discrimination and harassment. This court granted defendants summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that defendants' conduct was not outrageous because, at the very most, plaintiff was subject to a few insults and the disfavor of building management. In addition, plaintiff failed to provide evidence of severe emotional distress. Despite plaintiff's claims of suffering anxiety, sleepless nights, nightmares, and a tarnished reputation, she did not provide evidence that she suffered distress so severe that no reasonable person could endure it. Cavalieri-Conway v. L. Butterman & Assoc., 992 F.Supp. 995, 1011, judgment affirmed 172 F.3d 52 (7th Cir.1999).

N.D.Ill.1997. Cit. in headnote, com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. Individual who planned to write a book detailing his alleged drug use with nationally syndicated television talk-show host sued host for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress after defendant was quoted in tabloid newspaper as stating that plaintiff was a liar who could not be trusted or believed, and denying any prior relationship with him. Defendant moved to dismiss. Granting the motion, the court held, in part, that defendant's conduct was not sufficiently outrageous, nor was plaintiff's mental distress sufficiently severe, to give rise to an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Cook v. Winfrey, 975 F.Supp. 1045, 1048, 1054, 1055, affirmed in part, reversed in part 141 F.3d 322 (7th Cir.1998). See above case.

N.D.Ill.1996. Cit. in headnote, coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. Former employee sued former supervisor and employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, after supervisor rated his performance as poor and placed him on a "performance action plan." Defendants moved to dismiss. Granting the motion, the court held that defendants' conduct was not so outrageous as to be considered intolerable or extreme, nor could plaintiff's alleged emotional distress be deemed unendurable. Lewis v. Cotton, 932 F.Supp. 1116, 1116, 1118.

N.D.Ill.1995. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., illus. 1 quot. in sup. A female employee and her child sued her employer and her supervisor for, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that the supervisor's harassment caused employee to suffer severe stress, mental anguish, sleeplessness, embarrassment, and humiliation, which proximately caused the premature birth of her son. This court, among other dispositions, granted defendants' motion to dismiss the child's emotional-distress claim, holding, inter alia, that a fetus could not have suffered emotional distress. However, the court refused to dismiss the mother's emotional-distress claim, holding that to subject an expectant mother to repeated harassment of the type alleged at the workplace, at home, and at the hospital immediately prior to labor—including chastising her for missing work when she had gone into premature labor—could indeed be extreme and outrageous conduct. Patterson v. Xerox Corp., 901 F.Supp. 274, 278, 279.

N.D.Ill.1995. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. Woman sued town and individual police officers for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress after officers conducted a warrantless search of her home, attempted to elicit a bribe from her, and provided false testimony in order to have her indicted and tried for intimidation. Defendants moved to dismiss on the ground that the allegations were insufficient. Granting in part and denying in part the motion, the court held that defendants abused their positions of power when they unsuccessfully demanded a bribe from plaintiff, then tapped her phone and fabricated testimony in order to secure the indictment, conduct the court believed would lead an average community member to become aroused and cry, "Outrageous!" Treece v. Village of Naperville, 903 F.Supp. 1251, 1260.

N.D.Ill.1994. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Former employee sued her former employer, asserting civil rights and other claims, including intentional infliction of emotional distress, allegedly arising from her work environment. Granting in part employer's motion to dismiss, the court held, inter alia, that, under Illinois law, allegations that employee was discriminated against for taking pregnancy leaves, was exposed to a work atmosphere of offensive and tasteless humor of a sexual nature, was given demeaning work assignments, was sexually harassed and discriminated against in promotions and transfers, and was forced to endure retribution and harassment designed to prevent women from obtaining the status of partner in the company were insufficient to support an emotional distress claim. Piech v. Arthur Andersen & Co., S.C., 841 F.Supp. 825, 831.

N.D.Ill.1994. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. In employment-discrimination case, former employee asserted a pendent state tort claim against former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting defendant's motion to dismiss, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiff did not state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, since plaintiff's allegations of disparate treatment by her former supervisor, albeit unpleasant and humiliating, were not extreme enough to constitute outrageous conduct; moreover, plaintiff failed to allege that supervisor either specifically intended to cause or knew that her oppressive behavior had a high probability of causing plaintiff emotional distress, and plaintiff failed to plead actionable emotional distress. Whitehead v. AM Intern., Inc., 860 F.Supp. 1280, 1291.

N.D.Ill.1993. Com. (d) quot. in part in case quot. in sup. The former director of human services for a nonprofit library organization sued the organization for race and sex-based employment discrimination and also asserted a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted the organization partial summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that, under Illinois law, even if the plaintiff had been the subject of intentional racial discrimination, her allegations against the organization of inadequate notice to prepare for meetings, denial of secretarial support, failure to take action on anonymous racially insulting messages directed at her, and various personal affronts failed to show conduct so outrageous or extreme as to support an emotional distress claim. Gibson v. American Library Ass'n, 846 F.Supp. 1330, 1340.

N.D.Ill.1993. Com. (g) quot. in case quot. in disc. Former employee sued former employers and several individual employees and officers for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, due to alleged sex discrimination and retaliatory discharge. In determining whether plaintiff's claim was preempted by § 301 of the National Labor Relations Act, the court said that the claim was preempted only if application of state law required interpreting a collective bargaining agreement. Denying in part defendants' joint motion for summary judgment, the court said that plaintiff was not alleging that defendants' "extreme and outrageous" conduct derived from their abuse of procedures established under the collective bargaining agreement, but that it stemmed from their alleged concoction of theft allegations against her for the purpose of firing her; therefore, the court found that the claim was not preempted by the Act. Pelech v. Klaff-Joss, LP, 828 F.Supp. 525, 532.

N.D.Ill.1990. Com. (d) quot. in sup. and quot. in case quot. in sup. A female worker sued her former employer and a supervisor for sexual harassment, retaliatory discharge, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that the supervisor's lewd remarks and comments, while vulgar and unprofessional, were not so outrageous and extreme as to give rise to intentional infliction of emotional distress, on their own, but that his alleged subsequent pattern of retaliatory conduct against the plaintiff for her complaint about his prior conduct was outrageous; therefore, facts were alleged that could support recovery for this tort. The court stated that it would be reasonable to find that the defendant's alleged retaliatory conduct of undermining the plaintiff's authority within the office and generally making it more difficult to do her job facilitated the plaintiff's termination by the company. Class v. New Jersey Life Ins. Co., 746 F.Supp. 776, 778.

N.D.Ill.1988. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in disc. A female employee brought a lawsuit alleging claims of intentional infliction of emotional distress against her supervisor and her employer, and a Title VII sexual discrimination count against her employer. She alleged that her supervisor had subjected her to a hostile and abusive work environment by repeatedly requesting and proposing sexual relations with her, using sexual innuendoes, subjecting her to unwelcome sexual advances, and exposing himself to her. The defendants' motion to strike and dismiss the three counts was denied in part and granted in part by this court. The court, inter alia, did not dismiss the plaintiff's complaint on the pleadings as to the emotional distress count against the supervisor, reasoning that it could not conclude at that point of the lawsuit that the alleged course of sexual harassment was not extreme and outrageous. However, it dismissed the emotional distress count against the employer, determining that it was a respondeat superior claim preempted by the Illinois Workers' Compensation Act. Bailey v. Unocal Corp., 700 F.Supp. 396, 399.

N.D.Ill.1988. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. Parents and their daughters sued the school district and four employees alleging a violation of their civil rights and intentional infliction of emotional distress after both girls were questioned and one was subjected to a physical examination during an investigation into possible child abuse. Denying in part the defendants' motion to dismiss, this court held, inter alia, that the nude physical examination of the younger child might constitute sufficiently outrageous conduct to give rise to a claim for emotional distress. Landstrom v. Illinois Dept. of Child. & Fam. Serv., 699 F.Supp. 1270, 1281, decision affirmed 892 F.2d 670 (7th Cir.1990).

N.D.Ill.1988. Com. (e) cit. in disc. Plaintiff sued several city and county police officers, the city, and the county alleging a violation of his civil rights and various tort claims, including intentional infliction of emotional distress, resulting from his arrest, detainment, and beating by the officers. The court granted in part and denied in part the defendants' motions to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff had not pleaded all of the elements of intentional infliction of emotional distress under Illinois law. Although he pleaded intentional conduct that could be deemed extreme and outrageous, his bare allegation that he suffered “severe emotional distress” was insufficient to plead that element of the claim. Valliere v. Kaplan, 694 F.Supp. 517, 523.

N.D.Ill.1987. Com. (d) cit. in disc. The landlord of a low-income apartment building with mostly black tenants sued the city government for civil rights violations and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted in part and denied in part the defendant's motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that evidence of the defendant's racially motivated conduct, which included threats, harassment, abuse of power, and ultimately, termination of the plaintiff's business, was sufficiently outrageous and extreme in degree to go beyond all bounds of decency and to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Dale v. City of Chicago Heights, 672 F.Supp. 330, 333.

N.D.Ill.1987. Cit. in disc., com. (j) quot. in case cit. in disc. The maternal grandparents of a child who resided at their home in Illinois induced a family to adopt the child without obtaining the consent of the child's legal father. The father sued the maternal grandparents for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court denied the defendant's motion to dismiss and held that the intensity and duration of the distress caused by the grandparents' behavior was sufficient to maintain an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court said that, even though the plaintiff resided in Maryland, Illinois had the most significant relationship to the issues in dispute; therefore, the court applied the law of Illinois to test the claims stated in the complaint. Kunz v. Deitch, 660 F.Supp. 679, 684.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

N.D.Ill.1987. Com. (d) quot. in sup., com. (g) quot. in case quot. in disc. The beneficiaries of life insurance policies sued the life insurance companies for intentional infliction of mental distress after the companies refused to pay death benefits based on their finding that the insured committed suicide. The beneficiaries, the mother and sister of the insured, alleged that the insurance investigator called the insured impotent, psychotic, a liar, and mentally ill. This court granted the insurance companies' motion for summary judgment, reasoning that the defendants' conduct was not so outrageous in character, or so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency where the companies had a legitimate reason for pressing the plaintiffs about the circumstances surrounding the insured's death even though such conduct was certain to cause emotional distress. Zakarian v. Prudential Ins. Co. of America, 652 F.Supp. 1126, 1138.

N.D.Ill.1985. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Husband and wife insureds sued to recover medical expenses for which their health insurer failed to compensate them. Their complaint alleged, inter alia, that the insurer intentionally inflicted emotional distress upon them by causing an outrageous delay in settling the insurance claim. The district court granted the insurer's motion to dismiss three counts of the complaint, holding, inter alia, that Illinois case law interpreting an insurance statute barred the insureds from bringing an intentional infliction of emotional distress claim. The court noted that even in the absence of such precedent, the claim would not succeed because the insureds failed to show that the delay in settling the claim constituted such conduct as could be considered outrageous beyond decency. Langendorf v. Travelers State Ins. Co., 625 F.Supp. 1103, 1107.

N.D.Ill.1984. Com. (d) quot. in sup., com. (e) cit. in sup. A black employee resigned his position as a cook when his employer and owner of the restaurant said that the employee was a “nigger” and “not a human being.” The employee subsequently brought a civil rights action against his former employer. The court denied the defendant's motion to dismiss, holding that whether the employee was confronted with an aggravated situation beyond ordinary discrimination and therefore acted reasonably in resigning his position before having sought legal redress was a question of fact. The court discussed in detail the impact of changing social conditions and the resulting judicial decisions affording relief for victims of ethnic slurs. Bailey v. Binyon, 583 F.Supp. 923, 931, 932.

N.D.Ill.1983. Com. (d) quot. in part in sup. and com. (j) cit. in disc. The employee of the defendant corporation brought this action to recover damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court held that the employer's refusal to reinstate the plaintiff despite an arbitration award in his favor did not constitute extreme and outrageous conduct. The court also found that the employer's act of giving the plaintiff's name to the FBI as part of their investigation of the “Tylenol Murders” did not constitute extreme and outrageous conduct. Nor was it extreme and outrageous conduct to send the plaintiff a written notification of his termination, detailing the underlying reasons. Because the plaintiff's allegations were insufficient to state a claim under the law of Illinois, the defendant's motion for summary judgment was granted. Balark v. Ethicon, Inc., 575 F.Supp. 1227, 1231.

N.D.Ill.1983. Coms. (d), (f) and (j) quot. in part in case quot. in disc. A motion picture studio moved to dismiss a pro se complaint alleging the improper inclusion of ethnic jokes in a motion picture. Searching for a viable claim, the court considered, inter alia, whether an action would lie for intentional infliction of emotional distress. It concluded that the requisite outrageous conduct could not be imputed to the defendant and that the requisite severe distress had not been suffered by the plaintiff. Since no legal theory could be found to support the complaint, the defendant's motion was granted. Pawelek v. Paramount Studios Corp., 571 F.Supp. 1082, 1085.

N.D.Ill.1982. Com. (d) quot. in disc. The plaintiff sued the defendant to recover under a life insurance policy. In Count I the plaintiff alleged that the defendant unreasonably refused to pay the insurance proceeds, and in Count II she alleged breach of the duty of good faith and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted the defendant's motion for partial summary judgment as to Count I, holding that the insured had no claim for vexatious and unreasonable refusal to pay the claim. The defendant acted in good faith when it rejected the plaintiff's claim because of the omission of medical information which the defendant viewed as a material misrepresentation. There was no indication that the defendant's agent knew of the specific medical condition which the defendant claimed constituted the misrepresentation; hence, the defendant was not estopped from refusing to pay the claim. The court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment as to Count II, holding that a statute which provided for attorneys' fees and other costs preempted the field of extracontractual damages arising out of the defendant's alleged bad faith refusal to settle a claim. The plaintiff did not state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, as the undisputed facts clearly demonstrated as a matter of law that the defendant's conduct fell far short of being so outrageous in character and so extreme in degree as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency. The plaintiff's allegation of malice or evil motive was not by itself sufficient to show the requisite degree of outrageousness. Smith v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 550 F.Supp. 896, 901.

N.D.Ill.1980. Com. (e) cit. in sup. The plaintiff brought this action against his employer and the employer's health insurance company seeking compensatory and punitive damages based upon, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional harm. The plaintiff had been covered by the insurer's medical policy during his employment. The plaintiff had become totally disabled while working and was eventually forced to stop working. The insurer incorrectly told the plaintiff that he was ineligible to continue receiving any more medical benefits because his employment had been terminated. The insurer also failed to investigate the merits of the plaintiff's claim that he had been terminated because of his total disability. The insurance company moved to dismiss the claim. The court cited the Restatement in holding that the insurance company's misrepresentation of the plaintiff's insurance coverage and failure to investigate the merits of the plaintiff's claim constituted precisely the type of abusive behavior that gives rise to the element of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary for a finding of intentional infliction of emotional harm. The court also found that the plaintiff suffered severe emotional harm which had been caused by the insurance company's conduct and that the conduct was reckless in nature. Thus, the court denied the dismissal of that claim. Strader v. Union Hall, Inc., 486 F.Supp. 159, 163.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

S.D.Ill.

S.D.Ill.2015. Com. (d) quot. in cases quot. in sup. Registered nurse who formerly worked for hospital brought claims for violations of the Illinois Human Rights Act (IHRA) and intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against hospital and former supervisor, alleging that supervisor sexually harassed her by sending her inappropriate text messages and by retaliating against her when she requested that such texts cease. This court granted in part defendants' motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiff's common-law IIED claim was preempted by the IHRA, because it was intricately linked to her sexual-harassment claims under the IHRA. The court noted that, under Illinois law, which followed Restatement Second of Torts § 46, an IIED claim required more than mere insults, indignities, threats, annoyances, petty oppressions, or other trivialities; the defendant's conduct had to be such that the recitation of the facts to an average person in the community would arouse resentment against the actor and lead the person to exclaim "Outrageous!" Carwyle v. Anna Hospital Corporation, 102 F.Supp.3d 1024, 1035.

S.D.Ill.2006. Com. (e) cit. in sup., com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Mother who refused to allow her children to attend certain school activities on the basis that they offended her religious beliefs brought civil-rights suit against school district and superintendent, after superintendent allegedly reported plaintiff to the state child-services department as an “unfit” parent, and told department staffers that her children were “in danger.” This court denied superintendent's motion to dismiss plaintiff's additional state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, rejecting as unsupported superintendent's argument that plaintiff pled nothing more than insults and indignities, rather than the requisite extreme and outrageous conduct. The court observed that a key factor in the “extreme and outrageous” calculus was the degree of authority that a defendant held in relation to a plaintiff, noting that superintendent's position vis-à-vis child services and plaintiff bore consideration. Stanley v. Carrier Mills-Stonefront School Dist. No. 2, 459 F.Supp.2d 766, 779.

S.D.Ill.2005. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. After former restaurant employee who had been injured on the job and sought medical treatment asserted his rights under the Illinois Workers' Compensation Act, he sued employer and his supervisor for harassment, retaliatory discharge, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that supervisor's conduct was intended to subject plaintiff to work-related stress and pressure, and eventually his termination. This court dismissed the claims against the supervisor, holding, inter alia, that supervisor's conduct was not extreme and outrageous, since it was such workplace conduct that Illinois courts consistently found insufficient to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiff also failed to allege that his distress was severe. Rosas v. BB Holdings Partnership, 362 F.Supp.2d 986, 991.

N.D.Ind.

N.D.Ind.2016. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. (general cite). Truck driver brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against trucking company and teacher of a driver-orientation program at company's facility, following an incident in which teacher allegedly pushed him in the chest with enough force to cause him to move backwards. This court granted defendant's motion for partial summary judgment, holding that plaintiff failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court reasoned that teacher's alleged conduct was not extreme or outrageous, and that plaintiff failed to present sufficient evidence that the conduct caused him severe emotional distress, as required to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Jimenez v. CRST Specialized Transportation Management, Inc., 213 F.Supp.3d 1058, 1064.

N.D.Ind.2013. Com. (d) cit. in sup., quot. and adopted in cases cit. and quot. in sup. Homeowners brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, against, among others, bank that was the assignee of title to a property adjacent to homeowners' property, which the assignor had acquired through foreclosure, alleging that bank, despite knowing that it never had any interest in homeowners' property, ordered its agents to break into homeowners' property when they were out of town, remove their belongings, and otherwise ransack the home. Denying defendant's motion to dismiss, this court held that plaintiffs stated a claim for IIED, because the facts sufficiently alleged that defendant knew that severe emotional distress was certain, or substantially certain, to result from its conduct. The court pointed to evidence that, based on recorded property records, defendant knew that it had no legal interest in the property, but nevertheless ordered contractors to break into the house, change the locks, confiscate most of plaintiffs' personal property, trash the home, leave the door standing open such that debris and dead animals were later found inside, and list the home for sale with a realtor. Gordon v. Bank of New York Mellon Corp., 964 F.Supp.2d 937, 945-947.

N.D.Ind.2010. Quot. in case quot. in sup. University student brought various claims against newspaper in connection with its publication of an article, in print and on an interactive website, regarding criminal charges that were pending against him for falsely reporting that he had been assaulted. Granting defendant's motion for judgment on the pleadings as to plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held, among other things, that plaintiff neglected to demonstrate that publishing the article was comparable to other acts found to be extreme and outrageous by Indiana courts; moreover, inviting readers' comments about the article and publishing them on the website did not constitute the outrageous conduct element necessary for such a claim, because, even if the comments could be considered outrageous, defendant's actions in that regard were not. Collins v. Purdue University, 703 F.Supp.2d 862, 871.

N.D.Ind.2010. Cit. in case cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. and adopted in cases cit. in sup. Insured who claimed to have entered into a whole life insurance policy with insurer providing that she would no longer need to pay premiums if she became totally disabled brought various claims against insurer, alleging that, although she submitted proof of her total disability, insurer refused to waive her premiums. Granting insurer's motion to dismiss insured's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held that insured failed to show that insurer's conduct in, among other things, contacting her and requesting additional medical proof of her disability exceeded all possible bounds of decency so as to satisfy the claim's element of extreme and outrageous conduct. Skinner v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 829 F.Supp.2d 669, 684, 685.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

N.D.Ind.2006. Cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in cases quot. in sup. (cit. as § 46), com. (i) cit. in case cit. in sup. Parent and high-school student sued school, school's principal, and teacher for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that teacher engaged in improper Internet communications with student. Denying summary judgment for teacher and granting summary judgment for school and principal, this court held that a fact question existed as to whether teacher's conduct was extreme and outrageous, and that a reasonable factfinder could conclude that teacher's inappropriate communications caused student great distress, to the point where she left her school and talked of suicide; the court found, however, that the response of school and principal, including contacting law enforcement and reprimanding teacher, did not exceed all possible bounds of decency. Chivers v. Central Noble Community Schools, 423 F.Supp.2d 835, 857.

N.D.Ind.1997. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Former grocery-store manager brought Title VII action against her former employer and supervisor, alleging that she was demoted to a cashier position because of her gender. Plaintiff also asserted a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Defendants moved for summary judgment. Granting the motion in part and denying it in part, the court held that material factual issues existed as to whether defendants' demotion decision was motivated by gender bias; however, the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress failed because the conduct complained of, which included withholding pertinent information from plaintiff and scheduling her workday in such a way as to prevent her from fulfilling her managerial duties, was not so extreme or outrageous as to be considered intolerable in civilized society. King v. Wiseway Super Center, Inc., 954 F.Supp. 1289, 1295.

N.D.Ind.1995. Cit. in headnote, quot. in case quot. in sup. Seventh-grade female students who were strip-searched by teacher and others after gym class in an effort to recover a sum of $4.50 that was missing sued the school board, principal, superintendent, and teachers, asserting claims based on violations of their constitutional rights, as well as state law claims. Granting in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress failed, because plaintiffs presented no evidence that defendants intended to cause emotional distress. Oliver by Hines v. McClung, 919 F.Supp. 1206, 1210, 1221.

N.D.Ind.1994. Quot. in case quot. in sup. High school teacher sued the school and others, asserting state and federal claims arising from various incidents occurring during the course of his employment, including a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting summary judgment for defendants on the emotional-distress claim, the court held, inter alia, that, under Indiana law, the claim was barred by the Workers' Compensation Act, as plaintiff had been subjected to numerous incidents of alleged harassment that were, for the purpose of the Act, “by accident,” and found that the alleged tortious conduct failed to satisfy the standard of extreme and outrageous conduct intended to cause severe emotional distress. Eggleston v. South Bend Community School Corp., 858 F.Supp. 841, 859.

N.D.Ind.1993. Quot. and cit. in case quot. in sup. Female employee of poultry farm sued her co-workers, supervisors, and employer for sexual harassment, discrimination, and other civil rights claims and asserted pendent Indiana state law claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress and invasion of privacy. Denying defendants' motion to dismiss for, among other things, failure to state a claim under Indiana law, the court held, inter alia, that the allegation by plaintiff that she was the victim of sexual harassment and discrimination asserted under Indiana law extreme and outrageous conduct sufficient to support an emotional distress claim even without proof of a "host tort" in connection with the claim. Garus v. Rose Acre Farms, Inc., 839 F.Supp. 563, 569.

S.D.Ind.

S.D.Ind.2014. Com. (d) cit. and quot. in sup., coms. (e) and (f) cit. in case cit. in sup. Party attendee brought a state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, against city police department and police detective who investigated her allegations that she was gang-raped at the party, alleging that detective inflicted emotional distress upon her when he insinuated that she had "asked for" the sexual assault, used expletives to refer to her parents in her presence, and failed to engage in a proper investigation. Granting defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiff's IIED claim, this court held that, while plaintiff successfully pled the element of "extreme and outrageous" conduct against detective, and adequately pled that his course of conduct caused her severe emotional distress, recovery against him and his employer was barred by law-enforcement immunity. The court noted that, in defining the type of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to give rise to liability, Indiana courts had turned for guidance to Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d. Snyder v. Smith, 7 F.Supp.3d 842, 872, 873.

S.D.Ind.2013. Com. (d) quot. in cases quot. in sup. Caucasian former employee of county public library, along with her African-American boyfriend, brought a pendent state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, against library, employee's former supervisor, and library director in connection with allegations of discriminatory treatment by supervisor. This court granted defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiffs' IIED claim against library director, holding that, because plaintiffs failed to allege any discriminatory animus on the part of director, director's decision to terminate employee for failing to follow orders and for unprofessional conduct could not be deemed extreme and outrageous conduct under Indiana law, as required to state a claim for IIED. The court, however, denied defendants' motion to dismiss the IIED claim as to library, holding that library was potentially liable under a theory of respondeat superior, because supervisor's actions—in criticizing employee's job performance for the first time after she became aware of employee's intimate relationship with her boyfriend, disapproving of that relationship because "white women should not date African American men," and informing employee that boyfriend was no longer allowed to enter the library when employee was working—could rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct. Rihm v. Hancock County Public Library, 954 F.Supp.2d 840, 858.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

S.D.Ind.2009. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. As part of their suit alleging gender-based discrimination, male former employees of mental-health facility operated by state brought a pendent state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against state and state's family and social services administration. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment, this court held that defendants' alleged actions in prohibiting plaintiffs from wearing shorts to work, restricting them from playing cards while on duty, stopping them from using their own electronic appliances, like coffee makers, at work, and requiring them to respond to "Code Green" emergencies more frequently than other employees fell far short of the outrageous conduct required to support plaintiffs' IIED claim. Keller v. Indiana Family and Social Services Admin., 639 F.Supp.2d 928, 946.

S.D.Ind.2007. Adopted in case cit. in disc.; com. (d) quot. in sup. (cit. as § 46). Parents brought various claims individually and on behalf of their eighth-grade son and his sister against public-school corporation, alleging defendant's lack of response to bullying of the children by schoolmates over a two-year period. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment on plaintiffs' claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court found that there had been no evidence presented to support a reasonable inference that defendant or its employees intended to inflict emotional distress upon the children; additionally, the court held that, regardless of how negligent defendant's alleged conduct might have been, none of it rose to the level required under Indiana law of being atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized society. Seiwert v. Spencer-Owen Community School Corp., 497 F.Supp.2d 942, 957.

S.D.Ind.2006. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in part in cases quot. in sup. (general cites). Former employee sued employer, claiming, in addition to his federal discrimination claims, that employer committed the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress under Indiana law when it unlawfully terminated his employment within days of his wife's suicide attempt. Granting summary judgment for defendant, this court held that there was no evidence that the termination caused plaintiff the requisite severe emotional distress contemplated by this theory of liability or that defendant intended to inflict severe emotional distress on plaintiff, and the court declined to find outrageous and extreme an employer's decision to terminate its business relationship with an employee it believed did not meet its standards. Tracy v. Financial Ins. Management Corp., 458 F.Supp.2d 734, 747.

S.D.Ind.2000. Quot. in case quot. in disc. Former sixth-grade students who had been subjected to a strip-search by their teacher sued the teacher and the superintendent and trustees of the county school corporation for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that the claim failed because plaintiffs produced no evidence that defendant teacher intended to inflict emotional distress upon them. Higginbottom ex rel. Davis v. Keithley, 103 F.Supp.2d 1075, 1089.

S.D.Ind.1999. Quot. in case quot. in disc. Participant at public meeting of county master plan steering committee sued committee cochairs for violations of 42 U.S.C. § 1983, alleging that defendants violated her rights under the First Amendment when they dissolved the meeting as she was speaking. Plaintiff also asserted a state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting in part and denying in part defendants' motions to dismiss, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's allegation of an abridgement of her right to free speech survived the motions to dismiss; however, plaintiff had failed to establish that defendants acted in an extreme and outrageous manner, or that they intended to cause her severe emotional distress. Thompson v. Huntington, 69 F.Supp.2d 1071, 1077.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

S.D.Ind.1996. Quot. in case quot. in sup. Female former employees sued their former employer and former supervisor for sexual harassment in violation of Title VII and brought state-law claims against them for invasion of privacy and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Denying defendant supervisor's motion for summary judgment on plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, the court held, inter alia, that a reasonable trier of fact could conclude that defendant's conduct in persistently commenting on plaintiffs' physical appearance and on how their physical appearance impacted on their sex lives was outrageous. Van Jelgerhuis v. Mercury Finance Co., 940 F.Supp. 1344, 1369.

S.D.Ind.1992. Cit. in case cit. in disc. An emotionally handicapped student and his legal guardians sued various school corporations and their employees and officials for, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress, after defendants allegedly improperly attempted, via administrative and criminal proceedings, to remove the student from his guardians and force him from the school system in retaliation for plaintiffs' lawful attempts to force defendants to provide a proper education. Entering summary judgment for defendants, this court held, inter alia, that although Indiana law recognized a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, plaintiffs' allegations either did not support such a claim or supported a claim barred by the Indiana Tort Claims Act. The court stated that defendants' acts, allegedly constituting malicious prosecution and abuse of process, could not constitute the requisite intentional wrongdoing for a viable claim since defendants were immune from all tort liability arising from those kinds of acts under the Tort Claims Act. Norris by Norris v. Board of Educ., 797 F.Supp. 1452, 1461.

S.D.Ind.1982. Cit. in disc. The plaintiff was discharged from his employment by the defendant. The plaintiff brought an action to recover, among other things, for wrongful discharge and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The defendant moved to dismiss each of the claims for failure to state a claim upon which relief could be granted. The court denied the motion to dismiss on the wrongful discharge claim because the plaintiff's claim was an exception to the employment at will doctrine, as the plaintiff alleged that he was discharged for refusing to continue his participation in an anticompetitive scheme. With respect to the claim of intentional infliction of mental distress, the court concluded that if the plaintiff was the victim of retaliatory discharge resulting in emotional distress, he should include that element in his measure of damages for wrongful discharge. Accordingly, the court concluded that the emotional distress claim was surplusage and it was dismissed. Perry v. Hartz Mountain Corp., 537 F.Supp. 1387, 1390.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

N.D.Iowa,

N.D.Iowa, 2021. Cit. in case quot. in ftn.; com. (e) quot. in case quot. in sup. Brazilian students filed claims for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress against public community college, alleging that it misrepresented that students, as participants in its J-1 visa program, would complete internships related to their field of study and that they would work no more than 32 hours per week. This court granted without prejudice college's motion to dismiss students' emotional-distress claim, holding that students' allegations in support of that claim were nothing more than a formulaic recitation of the elements of such a claim. In making its decision, the court noted that, while Iowa courts referred to the tort as "intentional infliction of emotional distress," neither Restatement Second of Torts § 46 nor Iowa case law required proof of an intentional act; a reckless disregard of the probability of causing emotional distress was sufficient. Bucco v. Western Iowa Tech Community College, 555 F.Supp.3d 628, 661, 662.

N.D.Iowa, 2016. Com. (d) quot. in cases cit. and quot. in sup. Former employee sued former employer and other unknown defendants for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) in connection with his termination, alleging that an unknown defendant, with the intention of having employee fired, falsely reported to employer that employee made a racial slur at work. This court granted employer's motion for partial summary judgment, holding that employer could not be said to have engaged in a course of conduct exceeding all bounds of decency, as required to state such a claim under Iowa law and Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court pointed out that, although employee initially claimed that the report was false, he later admitted to having used the racial slur at work. Newkirk v. GKN Armstrong Wheels, Inc., 168 F.Supp.3d 1174, 1199.

N.D.Iowa

N.D.Iowa, 2010. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. While divorce proceedings were pending, husband brought a pro se complaint asserting, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against wife and others, alleging that defendants conspired to slander, libel, and defame him for the purpose of wrongfully denying him custody of his son, severely limiting his visitation with his son, and/or driving him from town. Denying defendants' motion to dismiss, this court held that plaintiff's allegations of defendants' outrageous conduct—e.g., that they sent out to 300 patrons of wife's dance school e-mails accusing plaintiff of being an abusive husband, and made a false report to the state agency of child protective services that husband had sexually abused son—were sufficient to support his IIED claim. McFarland v. McFarland, 684 F.Supp.2d 1073, 1090.

N.D.Iowa, 2002. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (f) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee sued employer and supervisors, alleging race discrimination, retaliation, assault, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting in part defendants' motions for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that alleged “strip search” by employer to determine if employee was wearing recording device did not rise to level of outrageousness sufficient to support claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Weems v. Federated Mutual Ins. Co., 220 F.Supp.2d 979, 996.

N.D.Iowa, 1999. Coms. (d) and (f) quot. in disc., com. (f) quot. in disc. A parishioner sued a priest and other church officials, alleging sexual abuse, tortious infliction of emotional distress, and assault and battery, among other claims, after the priest allegedly fondled and kissed her. This court granted in part and denied in part defendants' motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff did not state a viable claim for tortious infliction of severe emotional distress, because an unsolicited kiss from a purportedly celibate priest did not constitute outrageous conduct. Doe v. Hartz, 52 F.Supp.2d 1027, 1069.

N.D.Iowa, 1996. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. A high school sophomore told her parents the names and addresses of high school students who attended a party at her parents' farmhouse and caused over $1,500 in damage to the property. During the next three years, the school's students launched a host of verbal and physical assaults against the student, many of which took on a sexual nature. The student and her parents sued the school district, the principal, and the superintendent, alleging, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress arising from defendants' inaction as to the peer sexual harassment. This court granted defendants partial summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that defendants' inaction in failing to protect the student from the harassment of her peers did not rise to the requisite level of outrageousness. Burrow By and Through Burrow v. Postville Comm., 929 F.Supp. 1193, 1210.

N.D.Iowa, 1995. Cit. in headnotes, cit. generally in disc., com. (d) quot. in case cit. in disc., quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (f) quot. in case quot. in sup. Employee who injured his back at work and who claimed he was discharged in retaliation for his intention to seek workers' compensation benefits sued his former employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Denying defendant's motion for summary judgment on the ground that its conduct was not outrageous, the court held that defendant's requirement that plaintiff submit to repeated medical examinations by a doctor of defendant's choice while it prepared not to pay the bills was sufficiently extreme that an average member of the community, upon learning of it, would exclaim, “Outrageous!” The court believed that a factfinder could find such behavior to be mean-spirited and petty in that it was likely to inflict financial hardship while simultaneously terminating plaintiff's employment and denying him workers' compensation benefits. Reedy v. White Consol. Industries, Inc., 890 F.Supp. 1417, 1421, 1441, 1441-1442, 1442.

N.D.Iowa, 1994. Cit. in headnotes, com. (d) quot. in cases cit. and quot. in disc., coms. (f) and (j) quot. in cases cit. in disc. Former assistant director of juvenile detention center sued center and its supervisor, alleging sexual harassment, wrongful discharge, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that, although plaintiff could make a sufficient showing of the elements for recovery on the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress, plaintiff's claim was preempted by the Iowa Civil Rights Act (Act), because her allegations of outrageous conduct for the common law tort were cognizable as sexual discrimination, for which the exclusive remedy was found in the Act. Chester v. N.W. Iowa Youth Emergency Serv. Center, 869 F.Supp. 700, 701, 709-711.

N.D.Iowa, 1994. Coms. (d), (f), and (j) cit. generally in headnotes and quot. in cases cit. and quot. in sup. Former marketing executive for a television station sued the station following his discharge, asserting a pendent state law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held, in part, that, even if plaintiff's claim was not preempted by the Iowa Civil Rights Act, plaintiff failed to allege any sufficiently outrageous conduct to support his claim; at most, his allegations were that he was demoted abruptly, his position was assumed by the associate who had recommended his demotion, and he was fired after failing to meet new performance guidelines. The court also concluded that plaintiff's evidence of emotional distress was insufficient as a matter of law, since he merely asserted that it was the most trying time of his life, he could not sleep, his wife had blood-pressure problems, and he was emotionally stressed. O'Bryan v. KTIV Television, 868 F.Supp. 1146, 1148, 1164, 1165, affirmed in part, reversed in part 64 F.3d 1188 (8th Cir.1995).

N.D.Iowa, 1994. Com. (d) quot. in cases cit. in sup., coms. (f) and (j) quot. in part in cases quot. in sup. Former bank officer sued bank and chairman of its board of directors for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, after he was terminated following on-site audit by federal examiners that resulted in bank's reduced rating. The court granted defendants summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that, whether or not the court agreed with defendants' business decision to fire plaintiff, allocating to him a good share of blame for bank's problems, such basis for discharging at-will employee in responsible position was not outrageous; moreover, the court held that plaintiff's high blood pressure and anxiety and the destruction of his career and reputation were not severe enough to support the claim. Rouse v. Farmers State Bank of Jewell, Iowa, 866 F.Supp. 1191, 1216-1218.

N.D.Iowa, 1994. Coms. (d) and (f) cit. in headnotes and quot. in cases quot. in sup. Rehabilitation technician formerly employed at substance-abuse treatment and rehabilitation center brought constructive discharge, race discrimination, and pendent state-law claims against the center, managerial personnel, and the center's corporate parent. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that defendants' investigation of the accusations of plaintiff's cocaine use and their suggestion that plaintiff apply for another position at the center did not amount to the outrageous conduct necessary to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Thomas v. St. Luke's Health Systems, Inc., 869 F.Supp. 1413, 1419, 1440, affirmed 61 F.3d 908 (8th Cir.1995).

N.D.Iowa, 1994. Coms. (d) and (f) quot. in case quot. in sup. After being fired, female deli manager sued former employer for, among other claims, sexual discrimination, wrongful discharge, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted in part and denied in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding, in part, that defendant's alleged conduct was sufficiently outrageous to support an emotional distress claim. The court stated that if plaintiff could prove that she was terminated because she sought insurance benefits she believed had been promised her by her employer and for which deductions were made to her paycheck, or for threatening to get a lawyer to vindicate her right to insurance coverage, such conduct could be considered outrageous because it could be perceived to be calculated to intimidate plaintiff and other employees into foregoing benefits for which they believed they had paid. Thompto v. Coborn's Inc., 871 F.Supp. 1097, 1122, 1123.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

N.D.Iowa, 1985. Com. (j) quot. in disc. The plaintiff, who was demoted and relocated twice during his six-month probationary period as a restaurant general manager trainee for the defendant corporation, resigned after claiming he had completed the training period, and sued the corporation for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment on this claim, holding that there was insufficient evidence of severe distress when all the plaintiff could demonstrate was that he became depressed as a result of his employment with the defendant, that his depression led to temporary marital discord, that he allegedly developed a mistrust of people, especially employers, and that he lost his enthusiasm for the restaurant business. Polito v. Perkins Restaurants, Inc., 617 F.Supp. 380, 382.

S.D.Iowa

S.D.Iowa 2020. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. After obtaining a judgment against farm owner, motorist and son brought, among other things, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against farm owner's legal professionals and banking professionals in state court, alleging that defendants caused emotional distress to plaintiffs when they knowingly assisted farm owner's efforts to evade collection on plaintiff's judgment. Following removal, this court granted in part defendants' motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiff failed to state a claim for IIED. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment j, the court explained that plaintiff failed to allege that defendants' conduct was extreme or outrageous beyond making conclusory assertions that plaintiff suffered extreme emotional distress. Kruse v. Repp, 611 F.Supp.3d 666, 723.

S.D.Iowa

S.D.Iowa, 2006. Cit. in disc. Employee brought various claims against bank that employed her, alleging, among other things, that it refused to provide reasonable accommodations for her panic attacks, denied her a promotion, and refused to allow her to exercise her religion freely. This court granted bank's partial motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that employee's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, which relied on no factual assertion unchained by the prerequisite of proof of discrimination, was preempted by her claim under the Iowa Civil Rights Act (ICRA). The court specified that its holding did not prevent employee from seeking damages for emotional distress under other theories, noting that the ICRA permitted recovery of such damages in some circumstances without proof of outrageous conduct, severe distress, or physical injury. Cole v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., 437 F.Supp.2d 974, 982.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

S.D.Iowa, 2006. Subsec. (1) cit. in sup., coms. (d) and (e) quot. in cases quot. in sup., com. (f) cit. in sup. Employee who was terminated after allegedly suffering workplace injuries brought claims for disability discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress against his hotel employer. This court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment and dismissed the action. The court held, inter alia, that even if information in an accident report that purportedly showed plaintiff was not being honest about the accident was both false and manufactured by defendant's employees, and hotel's general manager was aware of that fact but terminated plaintiff anyway, that conduct was not sufficiently outrageous to generate a fact question on the emotional-distress claim under Iowa law. Napreljac v. John Q. Hammons Hotels, Inc., 461 F.Supp.2d 981, 1040, 1041.

S.D.Iowa, 2005. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Insureds filed class-action suit against insurance company that proffered low first payment proposals to customers who had prior insurance claims. Plaintiffs raised several causes of action and requested compensatory, consequential, and punitive damages. The court granted plaintiffs' motion to remand case to state court and held, inter alia, that damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress could not be recovered since plaintiffs did not claim to have suffered any emotional distress from defendant's actions. Furthermore, defendant's conduct did not rise to the level of outrageousness required to maintain an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Varboncoeur v. State Farm Fire and Cas. Co., 356 F.Supp.2d 935, 946.

S.D.Iowa, 1997. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Male former employee sued former employer for, inter alia, hostile work environment sexual harassment in violation of Title VII and the Iowa Civil Rights Act. Plaintiff also asserted a common law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Defendant moved for summary judgment. Granting the motion, the court held, in part, that the tasteless jokes, name calling, and general ridicule of which plaintiff was one of many targets did not constitute harassment based on sex, nor was it sufficiently severe or pervasive as to alter a term, condition, or privilege of employment. Similarly, the conduct complained of was not so extreme and outrageous as to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Noble v. Monsanto Co., 973 F.Supp. 849, 860.

S.D.Iowa, 1992. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Terminated employee who had been named as a party in a co-worker's sex discrimination complaint sued his former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held that plaintiff was unable to establish the "outrageous conduct" element of his cause of action, because neither defendant's explanation to plaintiff that he was laid off in a consolidation effort nor defendant's unwillingness to meet the co-worker's settlement demands amounted to outrageous conduct. Nielsen v. Crane Co. Inc., 809 F.Supp. 699, 704.

D.Kan.

D.Kan.2018. Com. (j) quot. in sup. Former member of religious group brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against religious group leader and leader's business entities, alleging that defendants isolated plaintiff from society, forced her to work long hours without any compensation, malnourished her, and committed various other wrongdoings, including human trafficking. This court entered default judgment against defendants, holding that plaintiff alleged facts establishing a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court explained that plaintiff alleged facts establishing that defendants' conduct constituted an intentional, reckless disregard for plaintiff's personal freedoms that was extreme and outrageous and inflicted extreme and severe mental distress upon plaintiff, and noted, citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment j, that, in some cases, extreme and outrageous conduct by a defendant could itself be evidence that the plaintiff was extremely and severely distressed. Ross v. Jenkins, 325 F.Supp.3d 1141, 1171.

D.Kan.2006. Cit. in pleadings cit. in disc. (general cite). Terminated sales employee of consulting business brought claims of malicious prosecution and the tort of outrage against business after business filed a state-court action against employee alleging, among other things, that employee had refused to return a laptop containing confidential information to business. This court denied defendant's motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff stated a prima facie case for the tort of outrage based on evidence that she attempted to return the laptop but was instead faced with a lawsuit. The court found that dismissal was premature because there was a basis to conclude that defendant's conduct was extreme and outrageous and that plaintiff suffered some emotional distress because of defendant's decision to file the suit. Mohr v. Margolis, Ainsworth & Kinlaw Consulting, Inc., 434 F.Supp.2d 1051, 1057.

D.Kan.2003. Subsec. (1) cit. in disc., coms. (j) and (k) quot. in sup. African-American passengers sued airline for violation of § 1981 and negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress after flight attendant commented over the intercom, “Eenie, meenie, minie, moe, pick a seat, we gotta go.” Granting in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held that whether flight attendant's remark was made with discriminatory intent was question for jury; however, remark was not so outrageous as to support claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, since it was not expressly racist and recent generations were increasingly unaware of racist nursery rhyme in which phrase originated. Sawyer v. Southwest Airlines Co., 243 F.Supp.2d 1257, 1275-1276.

D.Kan.2000. Quot. but dist. City employee sued city for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with his termination, which came after two female co-workers accused him of sexual harassment. Entering summary judgment for defendant, the court held, in part, that the conduct complained of, which included defendant's alleged breach of plaintiff's employment contract and certain actions of the female co-workers, could not be characterized as atrocious or utterly intolerable in civilized society. Wood v. City of Topeka, Kan., Topeka Housing Auth., 90 F.Supp.2d 1173, 1194, amended 96 F.Supp.2d 1194 (D.Kan.2000).

D.Kan.1999. Cit. in sup., adopted in case quot. in sup. Landlords sued municipal defendants charged with enforcing the housing code, asserting a claim for outrage, inter alia. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment, this court held, in part, that defendants' conduct in issuing numerous housing-code citations against plaintiffs, placarding plaintiffs' property, entering plaintiffs' property without their authorization, and forcing plaintiffs to appear in court numerous times on housing-code violations was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to permit recovery for a claim of outrage under Kansas law. Green v. City of Wichita, Kansas, 47 F.Supp.2d 1273, 1280.

D.Kan.1998. Com. (e) cit. in disc. and cit. in case cit. in disc., com. (f) quot. in disc. In action brought pursuant to Age Discrimination in Employment Act, employee asserted state law claims against supervisor for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress and battery. Entering summary judgment for supervisor, the court held, in part, that the conduct complained of, which included directing employee to terminate co-workers based on age, was not so extreme and outrageous as to go beyond all bounds of decency and be considered intolerable in civilized society, and that supervisor did not commit battery when he patted employee on the back, since such contact would not be deemed offensive by a reasonable person. Holdren v. General Motors Corp., 31 F.Supp.2d 1279, 1283, 1284.

D.Kan.1998. Subsec. (1) and com. (f) cit. in disc. A Nigerian male sued a grocery store for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, after he was detained by a store manager and accused of being the person who previously robbed the store. Plaintiff argued that the important factors to remember in assessing plaintiff's outrage claim was plaintiff's background and familiarity with the United States legal system. This court granted in part and denied in part defendant's motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's emotional-distress claim failed, because he did not allege facts sufficient to establish that he suffered severe emotional distress. The court stated that it did not judge plaintiff's outrage claim on plaintiff's unknown emotional frailties, and that plaintiff did not allege any facts as to defendant's knowledge of plaintiff's background or understanding of the United States legal system. Nwakpuda v. Falley's, Inc., 14 F.Supp.2d 1213, 1219.

D.Kan.1997. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in disc. Mexican-American former bank employee sued bank for, inter alia, discrimination based on national origin, retaliatory discharge, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Defendant moved for summary judgment. Sustaining the motion in part and overruling it in part, the court held that plaintiff had not established that defendant's alleged nondiscriminatory reason for failing to promote or award her a salary raise was pretextual; that material factual issues existed as to whether plaintiff was eventually terminated because of her national origin or because of her decision to file a charge of discrimination with the EEOC; and that defendant's alleged wrongful conduct was not so extreme or outrageous as to support recovery under a theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Garcia-Harding v. Bank Midwest, N.A., 964 F.Supp. 1492, 1512.

D.Kan.1995. Coms. (d)-(f) quot. in sup. and cit. in headnote. A deceased patient's family members sued a hospital for breach of contract and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, after the hospital allegedly removed the decedent's eyes and major bones after the family members consented only to removal of corneas and bone marrow. This court granted hospital summary judgment on plaintiffs' breach of contract claim but denied summary judgment on the other claims. The court held, inter alia, that fact issues existed as to the emotional-distress claim, because a reasonable person looking at this situation could exclaim, "Outrageous," as the nurse's conduct of intentionally misleading plaintiffs into consenting to a tissue donation that exceeded their expressed wishes could be said to have exploited a position of trust and respect gained from an emotionally vulnerable family. Perry v. Saint Francis Hosp. & Medical Center, 886 F.Supp. 1551, 1552, 1560-1561.

D.Kan.1995. Subsec. (1) cit. in headnote and sup. A housekeeper at a hospital sued the hospital for civil-rights violations and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that throughout her employment she was constantly sexually harassed by her supervisor. This court granted in part and denied in part hospital's motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff did not demonstrate that former employer's failure to act in response to plaintiff's complaints of sexual harassment constituted the tort of outrage. Wilkerson v. P.I.A. Topeka, Inc., 900 F.Supp. 1418, 1418, 1423.

D.Kan.1994. Cit. generally in case quot. in sup., subsec. (1) cit. in disc. Restaurant employee sued restaurant owner for, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that a co-worker made repeated and unwanted physical and verbal sexual advances. This court granted in part and denied in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that, although co-worker's conduct was rude, abrasive, and unprofessional, it could not conclude that his conduct was so extreme or outrageous so as to permit recovery. Beam v. Concord Hospitality, Inc., 873 F.Supp. 491, 501, 502.

D.Kan.1994. Cit. generally in case cit. in sup. Former employee sued insurance agent for whom she worked and insurance company for whom supervisor worked for outrage, among other claims. The court granted defendants summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that agent's sexual harassment and other conduct, while rude and unprofessional, was not of such an abusive nature or constancy as to permit recovery for outrage. Thomason v. Prudential Ins. Co. of America, 866 F.Supp. 1329, 1337.

D.Kan.1992. Com. (f) quot. in sup. and cit. in case quot. in sup., illus. 9-12 cit. generally in disc. and in ftn. Former employee, subjected to longtime abusive behavior by supervisor, sued supervisor and employer for outrage and negligent retention. After verdict for the employee, defendants moved for new trial, inter alia. In denying the motion, the court rejected defendants' argument that the court erred by failing to instruct the jury that there could be no liability under tort of outrage for emotional distress resulting from employee's peculiar sensitivity, which was unknown to her supervisor. The court stated that the jury was sufficiently informed of this, having been instructed that the employee could not recover unless the emotional distress was reasonably foreseeable to her supervisor as a consequence of his conduct. Laughinghouse v. Risser, 786 F.Supp. 920, 923.

D.Kan.1986. Com. (j) cit. in case quot. in disc. A former city employee sued the city and its director of personnel for intentional infliction of emotional distress and outrage, inter alia, alleging that she was terminated in retaliation for her objections to the defendants' sexually discriminatory employment practices. The court held that those torts were the same cause of action and granted summary judgment for the defendant on those counts, since the defendants' conduct failed to meet the stringent standards for the tort of outrage. The court reasoned that, to have sent the case to the jury, it must have been convinced that reasonable factfinders might differ over whether the defendants' conduct was so extreme and outrageous as to permit recovery and whether the emotional distress suffered by the plaintiff was so severe that no reasonable person should be expected to endure it. Polson v. Davis, 635 F.Supp. 1130, 1151.

D.Kan.1984. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup., com. (j) cit. in case cit. in sup. Discharged employee sued her supervisor and employer alleging violation of a federal age discrimination statute. Plaintiff also asserted state claims for the tort of outrage, tortious interference with a business relationship, and breach of implied warranties of good faith and job security. Defendants moved for summary judgment on all the state claims. The court granted summary judgment on all but the implied covenant of job security. Regarding the tort of outrage, the court noted that termination of an employee, whatever the motive, rarely met the requirement of extreme and outrageous conduct, and that the pain of losing a job was part of the price of living in society. Fletcher v. Wesley Medical Center, 585 F.Supp. 1260, 1261, 1262.

D.Kan.1982. Cit. in disc. The plaintiff employee brought suit against her employer, a Missouri corporation, under the Equal Pay Act, alleging that the defendant paid her a lower wage than that received by male employees doing the same work. The plaintiff sought a retroactive increase in pay, back pay, lost wages and benefits, liquidated damages, attorney's fees, and interest. The plaintiff also sought recovery under the tort theory of outrage, contending that the failure of the defendant to provide female employees with equal pay constituted tortious conduct. The defendant filed a motion to dismiss the tort theory of outrage. This court granted the defendant's motion to dismiss. The court stated that unequal pay for equal work was not conduct so extreme and atrocious as to subject an employer to liability in tort as well as under the federal Equal Pay Act. The court also refused to exercise pendent jurisdiction over the plaintiff's tort claim when the claim for the violation of the federal Equal Pay Act was also asserted, because it found no common nucleus of operative fact between the claims. The court noted that jury confusion might result because the tort claim would entitle the plaintiff to jury instructions and punitive damages while the federal claim would not. Elliot v. Employers Reinsurance Corp., 534 F.Supp. 690, 691.

D.Kan.1982. Subsec. (1) quot. in disc., com. (d) cit. in disc. The plaintiff brought an action for injunctive relief and damages against his employer as a result of the employer's policy to randomly search vehicles prior to their exit from the employer's property. Both parties moved for summary judgment. The court found that the plaintiff had failed to state a cause of action for the invasion of his right to privacy because the plaintiff refused to allow his car to be inspected; therefore no actual intrusion occurred. The court further concluded that the plaintiff's claim that the defendant's conduct was outrageous, resulting in severe emotional distress, was without merit. Accordingly the defendant's motion for summary judgment was granted. Gretencord v. Ford Motor Co., 538 F.Supp. 331, 334.

E.D.Ky.

E.D.Ky.2019. Com. (h) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against former employer, alleging that coworkers failed to intervene during an incident where plaintiff was verbally harassed by a customer, plaintiff did not receive employment coaching sessions, plaintiff's manager acted indifferently towards her, and plaintiff was subject to harassment and humiliation regarding her hysterectomy. This court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding that, under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment h, defendant's actions could not reasonably constitute the level of extreme and outrageous conduct required for a successful IIED claim. Vonderhaar v. AT&T Mobility Services, LLC, 372 F.Supp.3d 497, 513.

E.D.Ky.2015. Subsec. (1) quot. and adopted in case quot. in sup. (general cite). Students who had enrolled in the inaugural class of university's graduate clinical-psychology program filed a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against university in connection with changes it made to the program's curriculum after their enrollment. This court granted summary judgment for university on students' IIED claim, holding that, even if students' allegations were all proven to be true, university's actions were insufficiently outrageous to cross the high threshold required to state such a claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court concluded that there was no genuine issue of material fact as to whether university behaved in a way that deviated from all bounds of decency or that was utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Suhail v. University of the Cumberlands, 107 F.Supp.3d 748, 760.

E.D.Ky.2013. Subsec. (1) adopted and quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Two former employees brought claims for, among other things, age and gender discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against former employer in connection with their termination. Granting employer's motion to dismiss employees' IIED claims, this court held that, even considered collectively, none of employees' allegations—that one employee was disliked by her supervisor, demoted, forced to work longer weeks, and terminated, and that the other employee was reprimanded on false grounds, not promoted, demoted, asked to perform duties beyond her medical limitations, and terminated—rose to the level of outrageousness required to state such a claim. Bargo v. Goodwill Industries of Kentucky, Inc., 969 F.Supp.2d 819, 826, 827.

E.D.Ky.2013. Com. (d) cit. in case cit. in sup. Mortgagor brought, inter alia, a state-law claim of outrage against mortgagee of his personal residence, alleging that defendant harmed his credit rating and his personal reputation when it misapplied his mortgage payments and inappropriately reported a deficiency to credit-rating agencies. Granting defendant's motion to dismiss, this court held that plaintiff's outrage claim was preempted by the Fair Credit Reporting Act, but that, even if it were not preempted, plaintiff's allegation that defendant inaccurately reported his delinquency, adversely affecting his credit score, stated conduct that, while certainly not desirable, did not deviate from all reasonable bounds of decency, and thus was not sufficiently outrageous to state a claim for the tort of outrage under Kentucky law. Morgan v. HSBC Mortg. Services, Inc., 930 F.Supp.2d 833, 840.

E.D.Ky.2012. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. Husband and wife sued, among others, school district for elementary school where they both formerly taught and where their daughter was formerly a student, alleging that defendants intentionally discriminated against daughter, who had Type 1 diabetes, on the basis of her disability, and that defendants terminated plaintiffs in retaliation for their attempts to protect daughter's rights. Granting in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, this court held, among other things, that husband failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress as a matter of law, because nothing in the record came close to approaching the level of outrageous behavior necessary to support such a claim under established Kentucky law. The court noted that an employee's termination, even if based upon discrimination, did not rise to the required level of extreme and outrageous conduct, without proof of something more. Nixon v. Greenup County School Dist., 890 F.Supp.2d 753, 760-761.

E.D.Ky.2012. Subsec. (1) adopted in case quot. in sup. After a grand jury refused to indict school counselor who was arrested by police detective for alleged sexual abuse of a minor, counselor sued detective, alleging, inter alia, violation of his Fourth Amendment right to be free from unlawful arrest, retaliatory arrest for exercising his First Amendment right to challenge a social worker's substantiated-abuse finding, and the tort of outrage. This court dismissed plaintiff's outrage claim on the basis that plaintiff failed to state a claim for which relief could be granted. The court explained that the gravamen of plaintiff's complaint was the violation of his First and Fourth Amendment rights, and, since emotional-distress damages were available for each of those claims, plaintiff's outrage claim, which was a "gap-filler" tort under Kentucky law, was not actionable, because plaintiff did not allege that defendant acted solely to inflict emotional distress upon him. Wesley v. Rigny, 913 F.Supp.2d 313, 330-331.

E.D.Ky.2011. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Female former sales associate brought, inter alia, a pendent state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against co-worker, among others, claiming that, throughout her time with employer, she was subjected to unwelcome, crude, and offensive sexual comments and advances by co-worker. Granting defendant's motion to dismiss this claim, this court held that, while plaintiff alleged that defendant engaged in "clearly offensive and repetitive sexual remarks and pressure," as well as "physical threats and intimidation," such conduct was not sufficiently outrageous and intolerable to support an IIED claim under Kentucky law. Temple v. Pflugner, 866 F.Supp.2d 735, 745.

E.D.Ky.2002. Adopted in case cit. in disc., cit. generally in sup. Former county jail inmate who alleged that she had been denied her previously prescribed medication for epilepsy, asthma, and spinal nerve damage during her 10-day incarceration brought a claim for, in part, outrageous conduct against nurse and jail employees in their individual capacities. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that defendants did not commit outrageous conduct by allegedly failing to provide proper medication and medical treatment before and after plaintiff's seizure. Plaintiff left her seizure medication at home so that jail staff had to await its arrival to dispense it, and, following her seizure, she continued to receive medical care at her request. Smith v. Franklin County, 227 F.Supp.2d 667, 683.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

E.D.Ky.2000. Cit. in ftn., subsec. (1) and com. (d) cit. in disc., subsec. (2) quot. in disc. Woman whose son killed his girlfriend and then committed suicide sued talk-show host and related entities for "false light" invasion of privacy and intentional infliction of emotional distress after defendants caused the broadcast of a program in which host and a guest suggested that decedent was also responsible for the murder of another woman. Entering summary judgment for defendants, the court held that, with the exception of the tort of appropriation of name or likeness, actions for the violation of the right of privacy did not survive the allegedly invaded party's death, and that plaintiff could not maintain an action for outrage in her capacity as a third party. Mineer v. Williams, 82 F.Supp.2d 702, 706, 707.

E.D.Ky.1997. Cit. in disc., com. (d) cit. and quot. in disc., com. (h) cit. in disc. Former employees alleged that they were ordered to work "off the clock" and then were terminated for doing so; they sued former employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held, in part, that the conduct complained of was not so extreme and outrageous as to give rise to a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress; to the contrary, discharging workers for their known violations of company policy was a good and reasonable business decision. Bevins v. Dollar General Corp., 952 F.Supp. 504, 510, 511.

E.D.Ky.1997. Cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. and quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (h) quot. in disc. Discharged assistant county attorney who alleged that she was terminated because she was a woman sued county attorney and county officials for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Defendants moved for summary judgment. Granting the motion in part and denying it in part, the court held that a gender-based discharge, while illegal and reprehensible, did not constitute conduct that was sufficiently outrageous or extreme for purposes of the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Lococo v. Barger, 958 F.Supp. 290, 297, 298, affirmed in part, reversed in part 234 F.3d 1268 (6th Cir.2000).

E.D.Ky.1996. Cit. in headnote, quot. in sup. Insured whose disability benefits were terminated brought a claim for outrage, inter alia, against insurer. Granting defendant's motion for partial summary judgment, the court held that plaintiff presented no evidence that defendant's investigation and decision to terminate plaintiff's benefits amounted to the extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to maintain a claim for outrage under Kentucky law. Sculimbrene v. Paul Revere Ins. Co., 925 F.Supp. 505, 505, 509.

E.D.Ky.1993. Cit. and quot. in sup., coms. (d) and (h) quot. in sup. A male employee who had been demoted sued his employer for reverse discrimination on the basis of sex and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting the employer's motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that under Kentucky law the employer's conduct in investigating allegations of sexual harassment against the employee and hastily demoting him in a rude and callous manner was not so outrageous as to support an emotional distress claim. The court stated that plaintiffs' supervisors' insulting statements during the investigation that plaintiff might as well have been a "murderer, rapist, or child molester, that it wouldn't be any worse," constituted a mere indignity. Pierce v. Commonwealth Life Ins. Co., 825 F.Supp. 783, 788, 789, judgment affirmed 40 F.3d 796 (6th Cir.1994).

E.D.Ky.1988. Coms. cit. in case quot. in disc. A corporation had a long-standing policy that prevented former employees from working in any capacity on its property. A former employee challenged the policy, claiming, inter alia, outrageous conduct causing severe emotional distress. The district court held that the plaintiff had submitted no evidence or even a reasonable inference that the defendant's conduct was extreme and outrageous, and granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment. Burchett v. General Telephone Co. of the South, 699 F.Supp. 114, 117.

W.D.Ky.

W.D.Ky.2022. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. African American former employees of a trucking company sued employer, its owner, and owner's wife for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that plaintiffs were terminated or left employment because of discrimination and a hostile work environment. This court granted in part defendants' motion to dismiss, finding that plaintiffs' complaint failed to sufficiently allege claims of intentional infliction of emotional distress against defendants. The court noted that, under Kentucky law and Restatement Second of Torts § 46, termination from employment, even for discriminatory reasons, did not constitute outrageous conduct sufficient to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Robards v. BLK Out Transport, 623 F.Supp.3d 810, 825.

W.D.Ky.2019. Cit., quot., and adopted in cases cit. and quot. in disc. Minors who were participants in city's career-education program brought, inter alia, claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against program sponsors and staff, alleging that defendants sexually abused plaintiffs, subjected plaintiffs to severe verbal interrogation after confronting plaintiffs about the sexual abuse, and fraudulently concealed evidence of the sexual abuse. After the cases were consolidated, this court denied in part defendants' motion to dismiss, holding that, as required for a successful IIED claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, plaintiffs alleged sufficient facts that defendants acted with reckless indifference to plaintiffs' well-being and committed outrageous and extreme actions through harsh verbal interrogation and concealing evidence of sexual abuse. B.L. v. Schuhmann, 380 F.Supp.3d 614, 649.

W.D.Ky.2016. Cit. in sup.; com. (d) quot. in sup.; com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Female college-basketball official sued athletic conference, alleging, among other things, that conference negligently supervised its coordinator of basketball officials, who committed the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress by commenting on her appearance, ogling her, propositioning her, becoming upset when she refused to share a hotel room with him, and by sending her explicit text messages, including one in which he offered to pay her for sex. This court denied conference's motion to dismiss official's claim for negligent supervision, holding that official stated a plausible claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court reasoned that official's factual allegations indicated that coordinator's conduct was extreme and outrageous, and that his behavior caused official to suffer severe emotional distress. Dukes v. Mid-Eastern Athletic Conference, 213 F.Supp.3d 887, 893, 894.

W.D.Ky.2016. Cit. in sup.; com. (d) quot. in sup.; com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Female college-basketball official sued coordinator of basketball officials, alleging, among other things, that coordinator committed the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) by commenting on her appearance, ogling her, propositioning her, becoming upset when she refused to share a hotel room with him, and by sending her explicit text messages, including one in which he offered to pay her for sex. This court denied in part coordinator's motion for judgment on the pleadings, holding that official stated a plausible claim for IIED under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court reasoned that official's factual allegations indicated that coordinator's conduct was extreme and outrageous, and that his behavior caused official to suffer severe emotional distress. Dukes v. Mid-Eastern Athletic Conference, 213 F.Supp.3d 878, 886.

W.D.Ky.2015. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employees sued former employer, alleging retaliation in violation of the Family and Medical Leave Act, third-party retaliation in violation of the Act, and intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). Granting in part employer's motion to dismiss, this court held that employees' IIED claim was preempted by their FMLA claim, because any level of outrageousness in employer's conduct stemmed from its alleged FMLA violations. While employer fired both employees, and the firings were unpleasant and poorly timed, the mere termination of employment and the resulting embarrassment did not rise to the level of outrageous conduct and resulting severe emotional distress necessary to support an IIED claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Kastor v. Cash Exp. of Tennessee, LLC, 77 F.Supp.3d 605, 615.

W.D.Ky.2006. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former university athletic director sued university and others, alleging, among other things, that university president invaded his privacy by gaining access to his personal computer and removing personal notes and effects from his office, and made defamatory statements about him to university's board prior to his transfer to another position within the university. Granting summary judgment for defendants as to plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held that an average member of the community would not be outraged by plaintiff's transfer, that the alleged invasion of privacy was not so truly outrageous and intolerable as to rise to the level of conduct required for such a claim, and that any remarks defendants made concerning plaintiff were not so outrageous as to offend generally accepted standards of decency and morality. Dennison v. Murray State University, 465 F.Supp.2d 733, 757.

W.D.Ky.2004. Adopted and quot. in case quot. in disc., coms. (d), (i), and (j) quot. in sup. Owners of property located within 10 miles of a uranium-enrichment facility sued government contractors pursuant to the Price-Anderson Act to recover damages for the alleged diminution in market value of their properties due to soil and groundwater contamination caused by the facility, asserting, in part, a claim for the tort of outrage. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiffs' outrage claim failed because plaintiffs did not offer any evidence that defendants' conduct was intentional or reckless, or that the emotional distress they allegedly suffered was severe. Smith v. Carbide and Chemicals Corp., 298 F.Supp.2d 561, 573, 574.

W.D.Ky.2003. Quot. in case quot. in disc. Female employees of a shipping company sued employer and their supervisor for sexual harassment and outrageous conduct. Supervisor had told inappropriate sexual jokes, touched plaintiffs inappropriately, showed them sexually suggestive e-mails, and placed a vibrating pager between one of the plaintiff's legs. This court granted defendant summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that supervisor's behavior towards plaintiffs, while insulting and derogatory, did not constitute extreme and outrageous conduct. Clark v. United Parcel Service, Inc., 286 F.Supp.2d 819, 831.

W.D.Ky.2003. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former attorney for a bankrupt restaurant sued creditors for, inter alia, outrageous conduct arising from defendants' action in filing false proofs of claim and making false statements under oath during restaurant's bankruptcy proceeding. This court granted defendants' motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state a claim for outrageous conduct. The court stated that filing false claims in a bankruptcy proceeding and offering false testimony were arguably bad acts, and potentially criminal as well, but they did not rise to the level of going beyond all possible bounds of decency, nor were they behaviors considered utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Heavrin v. Boeing Capital Corp., 246 F.Supp.2d 728, 733, affirmed 384 F.3d 199 (6th Cir.2004).

W.D.Ky.2001. Adopted in case cit. in sup. Employee brought diversity action against employer for, inter alia, sexual discrimination, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and negligent supervision. Denying in part employer's motion to dismiss, this court held, inter alia, that employee's broad allegation of employer's inappropriate and intentional misconduct sufficiently stated claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Grego v. Meijer, Inc., 187 F.Supp.2d 689, 694.

W.D.Ky.2001. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Occupants of a private residence sued police officer for the tort of outrageous conduct, alleging that defendant illegally entered their home without a warrant and arrested a visitor. Sustaining defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that defendant was not liable, since his conduct was neither outrageous in character nor extreme in degree. Hickey v. Hayse, 188 F.Supp.2d 722, 730.

W.D.Ky.2000. Cit. in sup. Employee brought state-court tort action against employer and supervisor. Employer removed the action to this court and moved for judgment on the pleadings, arguing that supervisor was fraudulently joined in order to defeat diversity jurisdiction. Remanding the action, the court held that it lacked subject-matter jurisdiction in this case, since plaintiff's allegations were sufficient to state a claim against supervisor for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Sprowls v. Oakwood Mobile Homes, Inc., 119 F.Supp.2d 694, 697.

W.D.Ky.1999. Cit. in disc., cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (g) quot. in disc., com. (i) cit. and quot. in disc. and cit. in ftn., com. (j) cit. in ftn. Widow of individual who died from chronic pulmonary disease caused by extensive smoking brought strict-products-liability action against tobacco company. Defendant moved for summary judgment, arguing that the "common knowledge" doctrine barred plaintiff's claim. Denying the motion, the court held, in part, that the "common knowledge" doctrine, also known as the "consumer expectation test," was not an absolute defense to strict liability for defective design; however, public knowledge of the risks associated with smoking was relevant to a determination of the extent of defendant's duty to warn. Hill v. R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., 44 F.Supp.2d 837, 840-842, 844, 845.

W.D.Ky.1997. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Former employee brought state court action against former supervisor and employer, alleging that she was sexually harassed, discriminated against, and retaliated against in violation of the Kentucky Civil Rights Act. Plaintiff also asserted a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. After removing the case to this court on the basis of diversity jurisdiction, defendants moved for summary judgment. Granting the motion, the court held, in part, that the Act did not impose individual liability for discriminatory conduct, and that supervisor's behavior, while inappropriate for the workplace, did not rise to the level needed to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Effinger v. Philip Morris, Inc., 984 F.Supp. 1043, 1046.

W.D.Ky.1997. Cit. in headnote, com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Package driver sued employer and union for, inter alia, assault and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Entering summary judgment for defendants, the court held, in part, that employer's actions in replacing driver's modified gearshift with a shorter gearshift, which allegedly caused driver pain, did not constitute assault, as driver failed to prove harmful or offensive contact or the imminent apprehension of such, and that any adverse employment actions defendants took against driver did not rise to the level required to sustain an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Humphress v. United Parcel Service, Inc., 31 F.Supp.2d 1004, 1006, 1015, judgment affirmed 172 F.3d 48 (6th Cir.1998).

W.D.Ky.1995. Cit. but dist. Clothing designer who was photographed wearing one of her creations sued publisher of magazine that ran photo and tee shirt manufacturer that subsequently used the photo on its shirts for invasion of privacy. The court granted defendants' motion to dismiss inasmuch as the complaint stated claims for intrusion upon seclusion, giving unreasonable publicity to plaintiff's private life, and placing her in a false light but denied their motion to the extent that plaintiff alleged unauthorized appropriation of her likeness, holding that if she could prove a property interest in her likeness because of its commercial value and her intent to profit from it, she could recover. The court explained that while the cause of action was not limited to celebrities, the amount of damages would vary depending on the extent of the plaintiff's fame. Finally, the court denied plaintiff's request to add a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress on the ground that defendants' behavior was not outrageous. Cheatham v. Paisano Publications, Inc., 891 F.Supp. 381, 387.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

W.D.Ky.1995. Adopted in case cit. in disc., cit. in sup., subsec. (1) quot. in ftn. Boat passenger who allegedly was injured when the intoxicated driver ran the boat aground in a narrow channel sued the driver for the tort of outrageous conduct causing severe emotional distress. On remand, this court held that plaintiff did not state a cause of action for the tort of outrageous conduct under Kentucky law, since plaintiff's personal injuries, rather than her emotional distress, were the essence of her claim, and defendant's conduct, while reckless and irresponsible, was not the kind of indecent and immoral behavior that would engender the ire, rather than the mere disapproval, of a civilized community. Lynch v. McFarland, 893 F.Supp. 707, 708, reversed 111 F.3d 131 (6th Cir.1997).

W.D.Ky.1989. Cit. in sup., com. (g) cit. in disc. An employee who was discharged after fighting with a co-worker on the employer's premises sued the employer and the union for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Dismissing the complaint, the court held that the conduct of the defendants was legally permissible and was not the extreme and outrageous behavior necessary to sustain the plaintiff's claim. The court said that the plaintiff committed a dischargeable offense and the union, in the exercise of its duties of fair representation, decided not to take the plaintiff's termination to arbitration. Hayes v. Bakery Confectionery & Tobacco Wkrs., 753 F.Supp. 209, 215, affirmed 914 F.2d 256 (6th Cir.1990).

W.D.Ky.1988. Cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. in disc. and quot. in ftn. Several convenience store employees were fired after failing a polygraph test. The test was a condition of employment and was taken by all employees on a regular basis. The discharged employees sued the employer and the company that administered the test for intentional infliction of emotional distress, invasion of privacy, and defamation. This court granted the defendants summary judgment on all counts. On the emotional distress count, the court said that, even if polygraph testing was not a reliable indicator of the subject's truthfulness, its use and administration were regulated by state statute and thus, as a matter of law, polygraph testing did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous behavior necessary to support the plaintiffs' claim. Stewart v. Pantry, Inc., 715 F.Supp. 1361, 1365.

W.D.Ky.1986. Cit. in case cit. in disc. An employee sued his former employer, an insurance company, for wrongful discharge and intentional infliction of emotional distress due to his termination in violation of public policy as retaliation for his refusal to participate in an allegedly criminal act. This court granted the employer's motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that the claim for outrageous conduct failed where the evidence showed only that the plaintiff's workplace was stressful and that there was friction between the employee and his supervisor, and where there was insufficient evidence that the plaintiff's discharge was in contravention of a well-defined and fundamental public policy. Webster v. Allstate Ins. Co., 689 F.Supp. 689, 692.

W.D.Ky.1973. Cit. in sup. In this action by school teachers and principals against a board of education, complaining of unlawful discharges and demotions, in retaliation for union activities, the court, after holding that some of the teachers and principals actually had been unlawfully discharged or demoted, held that they were not entitled to punitive damages because the board's action was not motivated by evil intent or malice toward the individual teachers and principals. Dause v. Bates, 369 F.Supp. 139, 150, rev'd. 502 F.2d 865 (6thCir.1974).

E.D.La.

E.D.La.2014. Adopted in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. (general cite). Corporate jet pilot brought claims for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against former employer, alleging that, in retaliation for her stance on aviation safety, it launched a sham independent investigation against her and contrived a mental-health issue that left her permanently grounded. This court denied in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding that genuine questions of material fact remained as to the outrageous nature of defendant's alleged conduct, because plaintiff's allegations that defendant concocted a plan to destroy her career could be deemed sufficiently severe and outrageous as to allow recovery for IIED. The court noted that Louisiana courts had adopted a cause of action for IIED generally in accord with the legal precepts set forth in Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Currier v. Entergy Services, Inc., 73 F.Supp.3d 673, 678.

E.D.La.2014. Cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Adult daughters who owned or were beneficiaries of an insurance policy on their father's life brought, inter alia, a state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against father, after defendant obtained loans under the policy by forging their names without their knowledge or authorization and then deposited the proceeds into his personal checking account. Granting summary judgment for defendant as to this claim, this court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46 in holding that, even if defendant forged plaintiffs' signatures on the loan requests, the evidence did not support a conclusion that he did so with the intent to cause plaintiffs severe emotional distress, or even with the knowledge that such a result was certain to occur; rather, the evidence showed that defendant used funds from two family businesses to pay the premiums for the policy and that he took the loans out on the policy for the purpose of obtaining money for the businesses or for his own personal needs, not in order to cause severe emotional distress. Richardson v. Cella, 1 F.Supp.3d 484, 493.

M.D.La.

M.D.La.2015. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. (erron. cit. as § 12); com. (g) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee brought claims for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against former employer, alleging that employer discriminated against her due to her pregnancy by firing her soon after she gave birth. This court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment on plaintiff's IIED claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, holding that courts had declined to find conduct akin to employer's as outrageous even where the employer fired the employee just before or on the day of delivery of a child, and that, even assuming employer's conduct was outrageous and extreme, employee failed to produce any evidence that she suffered severe emotional distress as a result of employer's actions. Martin v. Winn-Dixie Louisiana, Inc., 132 F.Supp.3d 794, 811, 824.

W.D.La.

W.D.La.2020. Cit. in case quot. in sup. Former suspect, who was investigated and charged with a series of property crimes—including tire spikings, arson, and damage by gunfire—before the actual perpetrator was discovered, filed a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against district attorney and others, alleging that district attorney knew that police officers had placed posters near plaintiff's property with Bible verses written on them in the same style as letters mailed by the perpetrator, but failed to inform suspect despite knowing that the posters caused him and his family to be fearful. This court granted partial summary judgment for district attorney, holding that suspect failed to raise a genuine issue of material fact as to whether district attorney's actions or inactions rose to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct required to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Phillips v. Whittington, 497 F.Supp.3d 122, 166.

W.D.La.1997. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. After being fired, a former district executive of the Boy Scouts sued the organization for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiff alleged that her supervisor told her (1) that he had heard a rumor that plaintiff was having an extramarital affair with a previous scout executive; (2) that an area director was attracted to her and that she was sending out sexual "vibes"; (3) that she was a "very sexual person"; (4) that she was being placed next to a donor at a table because the donor was attracted to her and might give more money; and (5) that he did not want a woman in the position she held. This court granted defendants summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that defendants' conduct was not extreme and outrageous, because employees must be hardened to occasional acts of rough language and inconsiderate and unkind treatment. Here, defendants' conduct amounted to no more than a peccadillo. Glenn v. Boy Scouts of America, 977 F.Supp. 786, 789.

W.D.La.1996. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. A black employee sued his employer and his supervisor for violations of Title VII and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. The supervisor had described certain employees as "cotton patch niggers," and two coemployees had also used phrases containing the word "nigger." This court denied plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding, inter alia, that, although use of the term "nigger" was truly offensive, the three statements made in plaintiff's presence did not constitute extreme and outrageous conduct. Grant v. UOP, Inc., 972 F.Supp. 1042, 1052.

W.D.La.1992. Cit. generally in case quot. in sup., cit. in ftn., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (g) cit. in case quot. in sup. A former insurance salesman sued his former employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress after the following allegedly tortious conduct on defendant's part: unfair evaluation of plaintiff, an argument between plaintiff and his supervisor, potential competition from independent sales agents, inadequate clerical and telephone answering staffs, inability to advertise, and omission of the office's telephone number from the telephone book one year. Granting defendant's motion for judgment as a matter of law dismissing plaintiff's claim, this court held that none of the alleged acts were so outrageous in character and so extreme in degree as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency and that none of them could be regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized community; they were either petty annoyances or trivialities. Deus v. Allstate Ins. Co., 800 F.Supp. 420, 424, 426, 428, affirmed 15 F.3d 506 (5th Cir.1994). See above case. Cert. denied___ U.S. ___, 115 S.Ct. 573, 130 L.Ed.2d 49 (1994).

D.Me.

D.Me.2020. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Ex-wife, who had previously obtained a judgment of divorce from ex-husband in state court, sued ex-husband for, among other things, negligent infliction of emotional distress based on allegations that he fraudulently induced her to leave her career and home in South Africa by promising to marry her and provide her with certain benefits. This court granted summary judgment for ex-husband on ex-wife's claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress, holding that, while former spouses could collect on harms resulting from the intentionally tortious conduct of their ex-spouses under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, post-divorce interspousal claims for negligent infliction of emotional distress had to be understood to be resolved via the divorce proceedings. Jones v. Porter, 438 F.Supp.3d 101, 105.

D.Me.2010. Cit. in case cit. in disc. Army reserve officer employed as a subcontractor in Afghanistan sued contractor for allegedly failing to honor an oral extension of his subcontractor agreement. Granting defendant's motion to dismiss plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held, among other things, that defendant's temporary refusal to pay for plaintiff's flight back to the United States, which stranded him in a foreign airbase until the involvement of another of defendant's managers led to the release of funds for his ticket, was an inconvenience, not conduct that exceeded all bounds of decency. The court noted that any refusal to pay for plaintiff's flight was retracted and that issues resolving his ticket were resolved within a matter of hours. Berry v. WorldWide Language Resources, Inc., 716 F.Supp.2d 34, 54.

D.Me.2003. Com. (h) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee, who had heart condition, sued former employer, alleging disability discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress. On cross-motions for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that employer's failure to assign employee to day shift or facilitate her transfer to different facility did not amount to extreme or outrageous conduct sufficient to sustain claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Leavitt v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 238 F.Supp.2d 313, 317, affirmed in part, vacated in part, remanded 74 Fed.Appx. 66 (1st Cir.2003).

D.Me.2000. Com. (d) and coms. (i)-(k) cit. in case cit. in ftn. A temporary federal employee who was the victim of retaliatory threats and harassment sued her co-workers and supervisors for federal RICO violations and several state and common law claims. This court granted defendants' motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that the Civil Service Reform Act's administrative scheme preempted plaintiff's state and common-law claims against the individual defendants. The court noted that if plaintiff were able to establish harassment that was not related to personnel actions, she might be able to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. However, plaintiff had alleged only humiliation and embarrassment, and not objective symptomatology or severe emotional distress. Ferris v. American Federation of Government Employees, 98 F.Supp.2d 64, 68.

D.Me.2000. Com. (h) quot. in case quot. in disc. Former student sued former elementary school teacher, alleging sexual molestation and asserting due-process claims and state-law claims for assault and intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress. Denying defendant's motion for partial summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that material issue of fact existed because reasonable persons could differ as to whether defendant's conduct was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to result in liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Hinkley v. Baker, 122 F.Supp.2d 57, 61.

D.Me.1999. Com. (d) quot. in disc. Elementary school teacher sued school district, superintendent, and principal for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with defendants' refusal to recommend her for tenure once her probationary period ended. Entering summary judgment for defendants on this count, the court held, in part, that even if defendants' actions were motivated by impermissible considerations, an adverse employment decision was insufficient to give rise to an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Green v. Maine School Administrative Dist. No. 77, 52 F.Supp.2d 98, 114.

D.Me.1999. Quot. in case quot. in sup. Insured sued insurer for, inter alia, fraud and intentional infliction of emotional distress after his request for benefits was denied. Plaintiff also attempted to assert a claim for equitable estoppel. Dismissing the complaint in part, the court held, among other things, that plaintiff's allegations of misrepresentations both when defendant sold him the policy and also when he became disabled with a brain tumor had been pleaded with enough particularity to withstand the motion to dismiss, and that the court could not say as a matter of law that accusing plaintiff of malingering and engaging in an unethical attempt to obtain benefits was not outrageous; however, plaintiff could not maintain an action for equitable estoppel, since equitable estoppel was a defense. Weaver v. New England Mut. Life Ins. Co., 52 F.Supp.2d 127, 131.

D.Me.1996. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Vacation-cottage lessors brought, in part, a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress against lessee who, following an altercation with lessors about the condition of the cottage, had sent a letter to the Maine Land Use Regulation Commission complaining about lessors' activities and challenging their request for an advisory ruling regarding potential modifications to their property. Granting in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that defendant's conduct in sending the letter, while possibly rude, belligerent, uncivil, and vindictive, did not rise to the level of outrageous conduct necessary to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Maine law. Baker v. Charles, 919 F.Supp. 41, 42, 46.

D.Me.1995. Cit. in case cit. in disc. Terminated hospital financial officer sued hospital and its subsidiary for sexual discrimination, retaliation, and defamation, among other claims. Plaintiff's defamation claim stemmed from his termination and the fact that he had been forced to explain to potential future employers and other third parties the reason for his termination. This court granted in part and denied in part defendants' motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, based on Maine's position of negligent publication, coupled with Restatement authority, that the Maine Supreme Court would recognize defamation under the compelled self-publication theory. The court declined plaintiff's invitation to recognize a new and distinct cause of action for compelled self-publication, but noted that in particular circumstances compelled self-publication folds neatly within the publication prong of defamation. Maine's treatment of negligent publication mirrored the foreseeability analysis used by sister states recognizing defamation based on compelled self-publication. Carey v. Mt. Desert Island Hosp., 910 F.Supp. 7, 13.

D.Me.1994. Cit. in headnote, quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. in case quot. in sup. Employee who was discharged sued former employer and former supervisor for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Granting in part defendants' motion for partial summary judgment, the court held that plaintiff failed to establish any of the necessary elements of the tort; plaintiff failed to show that defendants' conduct rose to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct warranting recovery or that he suffered severe emotional distress as a result of defendants' actions. Burr v. Melville Corp., 868 F.Supp. 359, 361, 367.

D.Me.1993. Com. (e) quot. in part and cit. in sup., coms. (g) and (h) cit. in case cit. in disc., illus. 7 cit. in sup. The FDIC sued to recover on promissory notes against a corporate borrower and its owners, and the defendants asserted a counterclaim for intentional infliction of emotional distress and a third-party claim for defamation against the bank where the notes originated and the bank's subsidiary that engaged in debt collection. This court, granting in part and denying in part all parties' motions to dismiss claims against them, held, inter alia, that, under Maine law, allegations that the FDIC structured its complaint to humiliate and harass the owners and engaged in unconventional and ill-conceived settlement negotiations was not outrageous conduct that would support the emotional distress claim, but allegations that the debtors were threatened with terrible consequences, including federal criminal charges, if a settlement demand was not accepted did state such a claim. F.D.I.C. v. S. Prawer & Co., 829 F.Supp. 439, 450, 452.

D.Me.1992. Cit. in ftn. Several persons sued a shipping company alleging, among other claims, negligent infliction of emotional distress under the general maritime law. The jury returned a verdict in plaintiffs' favor. Granting in part defendant's motion for judgment as a matter of law, this court held that plaintiffs' emotional distress claim must fail because plaintiffs presented no evidence of accompanying physical injury or physical impact, which was necessary to state a claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress under general maritime law. The court noted that loss of sleep, loss of appetite, and similar complaints were clearly not the kinds of physical injury required. It also noted that elimination of the physical injury requirement for this tort would essentially eliminate the need for the separate tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress.

Ellenwood v. Exxon Shipping Co., 795 F.Supp. 31, 34, affirmed 984 F.2d 1270 (1st Cir.1993). See above case. Cert. denied___ U.S. ___, 113 S.Ct. 2987, 125 L.Ed.2d 682 (1993).

D.Me.1988. Cit. in case cit. in sup., com. (h) cit. in case cit. in disc. After two tabloid magazines published accounts of an airline pilot's harrowing escape from injury, the pilot sued their publishers for invasion of privacy and intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress. The district court granted one publisher's motion to dismiss; the pilot then brought motions to amend his complaint and to reconsider the dismissal. This court denied both motions. It determined, inter alia, that the pilot's proposed count against the publisher for intentional infliction of emotional distress failed to state a claim upon which relief could be granted. The court reasoned that the publisher's conduct was not so extreme and outrageous as to exceed all possible bounds of decency, because the alleged misrepresentations in its article would not be highly objectionable to a reasonable person. Dempsey v. National Enquirer, 702 F.Supp. 927, 930.

D.Me.1987. Quot. in case quot. in disc., cit. in disc., com. (f) quot. in sup., com. (k) cit. in case cit. in sup. A cruise passenger asked the ship photographers not to take her picture, but they repeatedly harassed her, making lewd remarks and causing her to spend several hours of the trip in her cabin to avoid their approaches. The passenger sued the ship for intentional infliction of emotional distress and for invasion of privacy. The court awarded damages to the plaintiff for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court reasoned that the extreme and outrageous character of the defendant's conduct arose from the photographers' knowledge that the plaintiff was sensitive about having her picture taken and that severe emotional distress was inferred from the extreme and outrageous nature of that conduct. However, the court found no merit in the plaintiff's invasion of privacy claim since the taking of a photograph of someone who was in public was not an intrusion into a physical realm that was uniquely the plaintiff's. Muratore v. M/S Scotia Prince, 656 F.Supp. 471, 480, 481.

D.Me.1986. Cit. in disc. Workers who had been exposed to asbestos sued various defendants for damages for emotional distress, alleging that the defendants were responsible for the plaintiffs' exposure to asbestos and that such exposure had created anxiety that they would contract cancer in the future. The court denied the defendants' motion in limine to exclude from opening statements any discussion of fear or increased risk of cancer, holding that, under Maine law, fear of cancer was a recoverable element of damages in the instant actions. The court cautioned, however, that most courts have been reluctant to award damages under an independent cause of action for emotional distress in the absence of some accompanying physical manifestation of injury, with the exception of anxiety caused by “outrageous” conduct. In re Moorenovich, 634 F.Supp. 634, 637.

D.Md.

D.Md.2020. Com. (e) quot. in sup. Former inmates, who were wrongfully convicted of conspiracy to commit murder, received life sentences, and were imprisoned for approximately 24 years before the convictions were ultimately vacated, filed claims for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress against city police detectives who were involved in securing the wrongful convictions, alleging that detectives used their authority as law-enforcement officers to falsify evidence of plaintiffs' participation in the murders, resulting in decades of wrongful imprisonment and attendant emotional distress. The court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46 in reasoning that detectives' position as officers enhanced the extreme and outrageous character of their conduct. McPherson v. Baltimore Police Department, 494 F.Supp.3d 269, 286.

D.Md.2016. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. African American social worker filed, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against employer and former supervisor, alleging that supervisor refused to provide an annual evaluation and to sign a form plaintiff needed for his social-worker license, retaliated against him for filing a report with the Equal Employment Opportunity Office, refused to give him assignments, told other employees to stay away from him, and attempted to have him suspended for missing work for jury duty. This court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding that plaintiff did not allege conduct that was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support an IIED claim. The court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, in explaining that an IIED claim required conduct that was so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency. Booth v. County Executive, 186 F.Supp.3d 479, 488.

D.Md.2015. Coms. (d) and (f) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee of city's department of public works sued mayor and city council, alleging employment discrimination based on her gender and perceived national origin, retaliation, and intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). This court denied in part defendants' motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiff's allegations that the department's management knew of her emotional sensitivity yet continued to engage in discriminatory, retaliatory, and hostile behavior toward her were adequate to state a claim for IIED. The court reasoned that, under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment f, the extreme and outrageous character of the conduct could arise from the actor's knowledge that the other was peculiarly susceptible to emotional distress, and noted plaintiff's allegations that her psychiatrist had communicated with the department's management several times to make management aware of plaintiff's mental distress attributable to her treatment at work. Arsham v. Mayor & City Council of Baltimore, 85 F.Supp.3d 841, 850.

D.Md.2014. Com. (e) cit. in case quot. in sup. Former employee sued former employer and employer's CEO, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) and other claims in connection with allegations that CEO publicly and privately yelled at him, humiliated and demeaned him, and unnecessarily placed him in stressful and confrontational situations. This court denied in part defendants' motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiff stated an IIED claim under Maryland law and Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court pointed to plaintiff's allegations that CEO was in a position of actual authority over plaintiff, that CEO's behavior worsened after plaintiff asked employer's human resources department to shield him from confrontational situations, that CEO flatly refused to stop his abusive behavior when plaintiff directly asked him to do so, and that CEO violently approached plaintiff at a business meeting, yelled curse words in his face, poked him in the chest, backed him up against a wall, and loudly fired him. Rubino v. New Acton Mobile Industries, LLC, 44 F.Supp.3d 616, 624.

D.Md.2012. Com. (d) cit. in sup., quot. in case quot. in sup. Estate of former resident of a nursing/rehabilitation center brought a claim for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress against center and others, alleging, among other things, that defendants had made inappropriate attempts to obtain information about resident's bank account, and later transferred her to an assisted living facility without her consent. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment on plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held that defendants' alleged conduct, while certainly suspicious and problematic, was not sufficiently "extreme in degree" to state a such a claim. In addition, although resident's friends found her to be confused and not her usual self at the new facility, no evidence reasonably supported an inference that she suffered "severe" emotional distress or that defendants intentionally caused her pain and suffering that would shock the conscience. Estate of Jones v. NMS Health Care of Hyattsville, LLC, 903 F.Supp.2d 323, 329.

D.Md.2011. Com. (e) cit. in case quot. in sup. Resident of housing cooperative, who was disabled by kidney disease and respiratory and immune system disorders, sued cooperative, alleging that it first recklessly exposed her to chemical poisoning by using pesticides near her unit without advance warning, despite her repeated admonitions that doing so would cause serious potential harm to her health, and then refused to alleviate or remedy the situation in any way. Denying defendant's motion to dismiss plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held that plaintiff sufficiently pled outrageous or extreme conduct to survive a motion to dismiss. The court rejected defendant's argument that it was only made aware of potential risks of physical, not emotional, harm to plaintiff, reasoning that plaintiff's conduct and fervor in protesting defendant's proposed use of the chemicals should have conveyed to defendant her deep emotional investment in the issue. Brengle v. Greenbelt Homes Inc., 804 F.Supp.2d 447, 453.

D.Md.2011. Com. (g) quot. in case quot. in sup. Estate of insured brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against workers' compensation insurers, alleging that insured committed suicide because defendants refused to authorize the 24-hour supervised care that she needed as a result of numerous psychiatric conditions from which she suffered following a physical and sexual assault at work. This court dismissed the complaint without prejudice, holding that defendants' failure to authorize the care, which was not requested by a treating physician, did not amount to the kind of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to constitute the tort of IIED. The court noted, moreover, that a party was never liable where he had done no more than to insist upon his legal rights in a permissible way, even though he was well aware that such insistence was certain to cause emotional distress, especially where, as here, there was no allegation that defendants' sole purpose in refusing insured's request was to harass her into abandoning her claim or into committing suicide. Respess v. Travelers Cas. & Sur. Co. of America, 770 F.Supp.2d 751, 761.

D.Md.2008. Cit. in case quot. in sup. Father of soldier who was killed in the line of duty in Iraq brought privacy and emotional-distress claims against fundamentalist church, its pastor, and two of its members for, among other things, picketing son's funeral while carrying signs that publicized their antihomosexual message and publishing related statements concerning son on church's website despite never having met son or his family. This court entered judgment on a jury verdict in favor of plaintiff. Denying defendants' motion for judgment as a matter of law and for judgment n.o.v. as to plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, the court held that there was sufficient evidence in the record for a reasonable jury to conclude that defendants' conduct was so extreme and outrageous as to cause severe injury to plaintiff through its significant emotional impact exacerbating his depression and diabetes. Snyder v. Phelps, 533 F.Supp.2d 567, 580.

D.Md.2006. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Homeowner and his family sued neighbor, county police officer, and county, alleging, among other things, that, as a result of complaints lodged against family by neighbor, police officer harassed them by illegally searching their home while only their minor children were present, illegally searching their vehicle, and issuing them more than 60 parking and traffic citations. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment as to plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held, inter alia, that the alleged acts in this case simply did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Kashaka v. Baltimore County, Maryland, 450 F.Supp.2d 610, 620.

D.Md.2005. Cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Wife of former employee of cable-television company brought several claims against the company after it allegedly failed to hire her to produce and host a program on its cable system, despite seemingly promising to do so when it recruited her husband for a position with the company. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that defendant's alleged conduct in inducing plaintiff's husband to accept the job under the false pretense of giving her a show did not come close to the level of extremeness and outrageousness required to support plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Maryland law, despite defendant's position of power in relation to her. McKenzie v. Comcast Cable Communications, Inc., 393 F.Supp.2d 362, 378, 379.

D.Md.2003. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in ftn., com. (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. African-American correctional officer sued state correctional institution and other officers for racial harassment that led to his termination, alleging, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiff alleged that after being harassed he had suffered anxiety attacks and low self-esteem, had trouble sleeping and eating, and had been forced to seek counseling. This court granted defendants' motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiff failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because he had not alleged that harassment had disrupted his ability to function on a daily basis. Since plaintiff failed to allege severe emotional distress, the court did not need to determine whether he alleged outrageous conduct. Clark v. Maryland Dept. of Public Safety & Correctional Services, 247 F.Supp.2d 773, 778.

D.Md.2003. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in ftn., com. (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. Correctional officers sued state division of corrections, two wardens, and prison official for racial harassment and discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted in part defendants' motions to dismiss, holding that plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress failed because they did not allege severe emotional distress. Although plaintiffs contended that harassment at work had resulted in chronic low self-esteem and stress, they had not alleged that harassment had disrupted their ability to function on a daily basis. Because plaintiffs failed to allege severe emotional distress, the court found it unnecessary to determine whether plaintiffs had alleged outrageous conduct. Hejirika v. Maryland Div. of Correction, 264 F.Supp.2d 341, 348.

D.Md.2003. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Secretary for school principal sued school board and principal for hostile work environment, sex discrimination, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, after principal hid in her home, listened to her conversation with a guest, and confronted her while she was in the shower, and touched her without consent on two other occasions. This court denied principal's motion for summary judgment, holding that plaintiff stated viable claim for emotional distress, since no one in civilized community would find that sneaking into someone's home, waiting for her to take a shower, and then flinging open shower curtain while having a garment over his arm as if to conceal a gun was tolerable behavior within possible bounds of decency. Posey v. Calvert County Bd. of Educ., 262 F.Supp.2d 598, 601.

D.Md.2001. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Female former employee sued former employer for employment discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other things, in connection with alleged sexual harassment. Granting in part employer's motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that supervisor's conduct was not sufficiently outrageous to support claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress where plaintiff laughed at supervisor's inappropriate comments and there was no evidence that supervisor acted with malice or intent to cause distress. Green v. The Wills Group, Inc., 161 F.Supp.2d 618, 624.

D.Md.1996. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (e) cit. in case cit. in sup., com. (j) quot. in case quot. but dist. Hearing-impaired employee sued employer and its president for violations of Title VII and the Americans with Disabilities Act, and for intentional infliction of emotional distress and negligent selection, supervision, and retention. All parties moved for partial summary judgment. Denying plaintiff's motion and granting in part and denying in part that of defendants, the court held that material factual issues existed as to defendants' statutory liability; president's sexual advances, if proven, constituted outrageous and extreme conduct, but plaintiff failed to show that her resulting emotional distress was severe or that his behavior was such that no reasonable person could be expected to endure it; employer could not be found liable for negligent selection, supervision, and retention based on statutory violations, and, to the extent plaintiff sought to impose liability on employer because of a battery committed by president, summary judgment was appropriate where employer was unaware of president's alleged history of sexual harassment. Bryant v. Better Bus. Bureau of Greater Maryland, 923 F.Supp. 720, 747-749.

D.Md.1996. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Former hospital employee who claimed, among other things, that she was sexually harassed by her former supervisor brought Title VII action against supervisor and hospital. Employee also alleged that hospital committed the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress when, knowing of the harassment, it nevertheless assigned her to work with supervisor. Defendants moved to dismiss. Granting the motion in part and denying it in part, the court held, inter alia, that employee could not sustain her Title VII action against supervisor, as she failed to name him in her charge, nor could she maintain an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, since the conduct complained of was not so outrageous as to be regarded as utterly intolerable in a civilized society. Crosten v. Kamauf, 932 F.Supp. 676, 685.

D.Md.1996. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Employee sued employer and former supervisor for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Dismissing the claim with prejudice, the court held that the alleged conduct of former supervisor, following plaintiff's filing of a grievance against him, of standing near plaintiff and saying "Boo-hoo-hoo, we all have problems," glaring at plaintiff, and walking toward plaintiff with a look of rage on his face did not rise to the degree of outrageousness necessary for a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Lee v. Pfeifer, 916 F.Supp. 501, 507.

D.Md.1990. Cit. in disc. A retail store instituted a policy requiring its office clerks to work on Saturdays and Sundays, then offered them the choice of reassignment to jobs that would not require Sunday work. A clerk who quit, rather than accept a reassignment, sued the store for wrongful discharge and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting the employer's motion for summary judgment, this court held that a Maryland statute providing that wholesalers and retailers allow a day of rest to any employee on Sunday or on "his Sabbath" was constitutional, that the employee did not make out a case for constructive discharge, and that the employer's conduct was not so atrocious and extreme as to support a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court stated that the store simply made a legitimate business decision, even though it was obviously personally distasteful and even hurtful to the plaintiff because of her sincere desire to honor the sabbath day. Poyer v. Sears Roebuck Co., Inc., 741 F.Supp. 98, 101.

D.Md.1989. Com. (g) quot. generally in case cit. in disc. An employee sued her former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, after the defendant sent a letter, charging the plaintiff with falsifying a workers' compensation claim, to the local union that represented her for collective bargaining. The court held that the employee's claims were preempted by the Labor Management Relations Act. The court stated that whether the notice of the plaintiff's termination for dishonesty was reckless, extreme, or outrageous depended on whether the plaintiff's conduct was in violation of the collective bargaining agreement. The court also said that whether the defendant's sending of the letter was a permissible exercise of its termination rights under the collective-bargaining agreement would require the court to interpret the agreement to determine whether the defendant had the legal rights it claimed. Barbe v. Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., Inc., 722 F.Supp. 1257, 1262, judgment affirmed 940 F.2d 651 (4th Cir.1991), cert. denied 502 U.S. 1059, 112 S.Ct. 939, 117 L.Ed.2d 109 (1992).

D.Md.1989. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. The widow and daughter of a government employee at a chemical and biological testing center who accidentally contracted anthrax while on the job in 1955 and died 30 years later of cardiac arrest brought wrongful death and survivor actions against the government under the Federal Tort Claims Act, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Granting the defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held that the record failed to support the presence of any facts to establish outrageous intentional conduct by the defendant and severe emotional distress. The court stated that the only intentional conduct that could have been gleaned from the affidavits was the directive to the decedent by government personnel to hide his exposure to the anthrax bacteria and to maintain the "top secret" anthrax studies, and that instruction could not have been characterized as so outrageous as to go beyond all bounds of decency. Metz v. U.S., 723 F.Supp. 1133, 1137.

D.Md.1985. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. (Erron. cit. as com. I.) A former employee sued her employer and a co-worker alleging employment discrimination, retaliatory discharge, false light invasion of privacy, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiff asserted that the co-worker on numerous occasions made racially derogatory remarks to her supervisor, and that despite notice of the harassment, her employer did nothing to terminate the co-worker's conduct. The defendants moved for dismissal, or in the alternative, for summary judgment on all claims. This court held that all of plaintiff's claims could be maintained except for the claim of false light invasion of privacy, which was barred by the statute of limitations. The court stated that it would not rule as a matter of law that the complaint lacked sufficient allegations to establish the requisite extreme and outrageous conduct necessary for the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress, and ordered a stay of the action pending resolution by the Maryland Commission on Human Relations. Robinson v. Vitro Corp., 620 F.Supp. 1066, 1071.

D.Mass.

D.Mass.2023. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Special-education teacher who suffered from asthma and generalized anxiety disorder sued city, public-school district, superintendent, and assistant superintendent for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging, among other things, that defendants treated her adversely because she requested workplace accommodations for her disabilities and because of her advocacy on behalf of disabled children. This court granted in part defendants' motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiff failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court reasoned that, while plaintiff's allegations suggested possible mistakes, neglect, and insensitivity by defendants, those allegations did not amount to a plausible claim of extreme or outrageous misconduct sufficient to establish a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d. Connolly v. Woburn Public Schools, 659 F.Supp.3d 92, 117.

D.Mass.2023. Cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former police detective sued deputy chief and other officer for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress based on allegations that deputy chief promoted the other officer from the patrol unit to the detective unit during plaintiff's absence and demoted plaintiff to the patrol unit after he returned to work several years later. This court granted summary judgment for defendants on plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that defendants' alleged conduct did not rise to the level of atrocious behavior required to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Jakuttis v. Town of Dracut, Massachusetts, 656 F.Supp.3d 302, 339.

D.Mass.2023. Cit. in sup. Owners of seasonal beach home sued neighbors and local real estate broker related to neighbor for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), alleging, among other things, that neighbors and broker threatened owners and encouraged others to obstruct owners' private right of way to their home, following a dispute over two pear trees on the border between the parties' properties. This court denied defendants' motion for summary judgment on plaintiffs' IIED claim, holding that there was a genuine issue of material fact as to whether owners experienced severe emotional distress, as would allow recovery under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court reasoned that a trier of fact could conclude that defendants' repeated threats, such as broker claiming that he would run plaintiffs out of town and to use his influence with local authorities to take out no-trespass orders against plaintiffs rose beyond insults and annoyances to conduct that was beyond all bounds of decency. Kaiser v. Kirchick, 662 F.Supp.3d 76, 102.

D.Mass.2021. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Mother of decedent sued decedent's former domestic partner, who was still named as the beneficiary of decedent's life-insurance policy and a joint owner of his bank account at the time of his death, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress after defendant claimed the proceeds of the policy and withdrew all the money from the account without informing plaintiff. This court granted in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding that a reasonable jury could not find that defendant engaged in any intentional acts sufficiently extreme and outrageous to meet the high standard for a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, which required a high order of reckless ruthlessness or deliberate malevolence that was simply intolerable. McCormick v. Lischynsky, 539 F.Supp.3d 225, 244.

D.Mass.2019. Com. (h) quot. in sup. Conservatee brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against attorney, alleging that defendant abused his conservator position to conceal the fact that a third party gave plaintiff's dog away to others without his permission. This court granted in part defendant's motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiff failed to allege sufficient facts establishing a successful IIED claim. The court explained that, under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment h, the court could determine as a matter of law whether defendant's conduct arose to the level of being sufficiently extreme and outrageous so as to permit recovery, and that, according to state caselaw, loss of animal companionship was not a cognizable injury to sustain a claim under § 46. Hayes v. Mirick, 378 F.Supp.3d 109, 117.

D.Mass.2018. Com. (c) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former police chief who was terminated for conduct unbecoming and successfully appealed his termination before an arbitrator brought an action against city and mayor, alleging that defendants terminated him without procedural and substantive due process and that their malicious misconduct was sufficient to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). This court granted summary judgment for defendants, holding, inter alia, that defendants' conduct was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support an IIED claim. This court quoted Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, in explaining that an IIED claim required conduct so egregious that an average member of the community would consider it outrageous, and that defendants' conduct, including mayor's decision to hold a press conference about plaintiff's termination and to appeal the arbitration determination, did not rise to this level. Cummings v. City of Newton, 298 F.Supp.3d 279, 291.

D.Mass.2018. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Arrestee who was charged with driving under the influence brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against city and city officials, alleging that, after her arrest, defendants provided her an advice-of-rights form that incorrectly stated her legal rights and resulted in plaintiff making a constitutionally-invalid guilty plea. This court denied in part defendants' motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that knowingly providing an arrestee with an erroneous advice-of-rights form could potentially constitute profoundly shocking conduct necessary for an IIED claim. The court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, in explaining that an IIED claim required defendants to have engaged in outrageous conduct beyond all possible bounds of decency, and acted in a manner beyond mere insults, threats, or even merely tortious or criminal conduct. Pimentel v. City of Methuen, 323 F.Supp.3d 255, 274.

D.Mass.2018. Subsec. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Police officer who was fired following an internal investigation but later reinstated brought claims for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against town manager, alleging that defendant wrongfully concluded that the evidence supported the decision to terminate plaintiff. This court granted summary judgment for defendant, holding that plaintiff failed to state an IIED claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court reasoned, in part, that while defendant might have wanted plaintiff gone and might have encouraged the investigator who was hired to conduct the investigation to dig deep for facts against plaintiff, his actions were not illegal or otherwise gratuitously harmful; on the contrary, defendant followed all relevant rules, explained his decision, and allowed plaintiff to respond to the charges against him. Thomas v. Town of Salisbury, 284 F.Supp.3d 66, 79.

D.Mass.2017. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Inmate at a correctional center filed a civil-rights action against correctional officers and nurse who worked at the center, alleging that several officers severely injured him in an attack, that other officers failed to intervene or attempted to cover up the incident, and that nurse refused to provide him with medical treatment. This court granted inmate's motion to amend the complaint to substitute the true name of nurse, except as to inmate's proposed claim against nurse for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that inmate failed to allege conduct by nurse that was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to meet the requisite standard under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court reasoned, based on the allegations of the proposed amended complaint, that, at worst, nurse could have been callously indifferent toward inmate's suffering, and that such indifference was not the type of targeted, deliberate, and malicious conduct required to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Abernathy v. Dewey, 277 F.Supp.3d 129, 140.

D.Mass.2017. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Scientist brought a claim for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress against website operator and employees of operator in connection with allegations that defendants defamed him by publishing a series of 14 articles on the website that disagreed with his claim that he was the inventor of email. This court granted defendants' motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiff's complaint failed to plausibly state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court reasoned, in part, that, under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, defamatory statements could not, as a matter of law, satisfy the "extreme and outrageous conduct" requirement to state such a claim. Ayyadurai v. Floor64, Inc., 270 F.Supp.3d 343, 370.

D.Mass.2017. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former student brought claims sounding in, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against university and university employees, seeking damages and equitable relief in connection with his two-year suspension from university for sexual misconduct. This court adopted the report and recommendation of a magistrate judge and granted defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiff's IIED claim. The magistrate judge quoted Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, in setting forth the criteria for conduct that was "extreme and outrageous" and explaining that defendants' actions, as pleaded, did not rise to the level of atrocity necessary to support an IIED claim. Doe v. Western New England University, 228 F.Supp.3d 154, 186.

D.Mass.2017. Quot. in case quot. in sup.; com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. (erron. cit. as § 145). Neurosurgeon of Indian descent filed, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against former employer and supervisors who had post-employment communication with her potential employers, alleging that defendants provided negative information and references because of her gender and ethnicity. This court granted defendants' motion to dismiss as to plaintiff's IIED claim, holding, inter alia, that the facts as pleaded did not demonstrate that defendants' conduct rose to the exceptionally high standard necessary to qualify as extreme and outrageous or that plaintiff had suffered severe emotional distress. Quoting Restatement Second of Torts § 46 and cases relying on this section, the court explained that liability for IIED had been found only where conduct was so outrageous in character and extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in civilized community. Soni v. Wespiser, 239 F.Supp.3d 373, 390.

D.Mass.2016. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former undergraduate student filed, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against private university that had sanctioned him based on his former boyfriend's claims that plaintiff engaged in sexual misconduct during their relationship, alleging that defendant effectively labeled plaintiff a "sexual predator" by employing a process in which a special examiner acted as an investigator, prosecutor, and judge.

This court granted in part defendant's motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiff failed to state a claim for which relief could be granted. The court explained that plaintiff's complaint did not allege conduct by defendant that was "so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree" to meet the standard of conduct necessary for an IIED claim as described in Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d. Doe v. Brandeis University, 177 F.Supp.3d 561, 617.

D.Mass.2016. Cit. in sup.; subsec. (1) quot. in sup.; com. (j) quot. in sup. (erron. cit. as § 145). Decedent's daughter and daughter's husband sued decedent's companion of many years prior to his death, alleging, among other things, that defendant intentionally caused emotional harm to plaintiffs by interfering with their relationship with decedent during the last years of his life and by failing to inform plaintiffs of decedent's death, such that they missed the funeral. Granting summary judgment for defendant, this court held that plaintiffs failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court pointed out that plaintiffs failed to present any actual evidence that their distress was severe, and that the only definitive evidence provided of any observable symptoms was plaintiffs' sister-in-law's testimony that daughter had some sleepless nights. Torosian v. Garabedian, 206 F.Supp.3d 679, 683.

D.Mass.2015. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (h) quot. in case quot. in ftn. Student at a public high school brought claims for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against school officials in their official and individual capacities, alleging that defendants failed to adequately respond to a pattern of bullying and threats she suffered at the hands of other students at the school. This court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding that defendants' actions were not, as a matter of law, sufficiently extreme and outrageous as to state a claim for IIED under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court reasoned that, even if a jury could find that defendants' actions were ineffective, unreasonable, and demonstrated indifference, no reasonable jury could find that defendants' conduct went beyond all possible bounds of decency and was utterly intolerable in a civilized society. Hankey v. Town of Concord-Carlisle, 136 F.Supp.3d 52, 74.

D.Mass.2015. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Town police officer brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against town manager and town police chief, alleging that defendants engaged in a prolonged and multifaceted plan to force plaintiff out of his job. This court denied defendants' motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiff's allegations were sufficient to state an IIED claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court reasoned that, while town manager's conduct in retaining police chief to conduct an investigation of plaintiff, without more, did not constitute conduct that was utterly intolerable, a fair reading of plaintiff's complaint depicted an ongoing effort on the part of town manager to have plaintiff removed from the police force, and a question of fact remained as to whether such conduct could reasonably be found to be so extreme and outrageous as to permit recovery. Thomas v. Town of Salisbury, 134 F.Supp.3d 633, 652.

D.Mass.2014. Coms. (d), (i), and (j) quot. in cases quot. in sup. Aunt who was arrested while babysitting her two-year-old nephew at his residence brought a state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against police officer who arrived at the residence to assist the Department of Children and Families in removing the child after she refused to hand the child over. This court denied defendant's motion to dismiss this claim, holding that the question of whether defendant's actions—physically shoving, yanking, and jerking plaintiff—were extreme and outrageous, pursuant to Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comments d, i,and j, had to be determined by a jury. The court noted that plaintiff alleged far more than a simple claim of negligence; she asserted that she endured unwarranted physical abuse by defendant while her nephew was in her care after his mother had died and his father was out making funeral arrangements. Lloyd v. Burt, 997 F.Supp.2d 71, 83.

D.Mass.2013. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Parents of two daughters who were arrested in parents' home brought an action for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against the arresting officers. Denying in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, this court held that there was sufficient evidence of conduct that would support a finding of IIED. The court reasoned that plaintiffs could recover for IIED even where, as here, no bodily harm resulted; moreover, even if there had been probable cause to arrest daughters, the conduct complained of—including the use of excessive force, abusive language, and deliberate indifference to obvious medical needs—would, if accepted by the jury, go beyond the bounds of acceptable conduct. Barbosa v. Conlon, 962 F.Supp.2d 316, 334.

D.Mass.2011. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Property owners sued neighbors, town, and construction company in connection with a land dispute. This court granted construction company's motion to dismiss plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that the conduct complained of—that construction company disposed of waste on neighbors' property in violation of state and local environmental regulations, that its dumping caused a stream to overflow and resulted in flooding of plaintiffs' basement, and that it was advised of the flooding but did not cease its conduct—did not, as a matter of law, amount to extreme and outrageous behavior, and plaintiffs had not alleged tortious intent, much less criminal intent or malice. Gable v. Borges Const., Inc., 792 F.Supp.2d 117, 126.

D.Mass.2010. Cit. in case cit. in sup. Arrestee brought a civil-rights action against police officer, city, and hospital, after doctor who worked at hospital, at officers' request, conducted a body cavity search of arrestee for drugs. Denying summary judgment for officers on plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held that a reasonable jury could find that officers' actions in effectuating an x-ray search of plaintiff's abdomen were extreme and outrageous, given that prior visual and digital searches of his "anal cavity" had turned up negative, that officers knew there was no evidence to suggest than an x-ray search would result in any incriminating evidence, and that plaintiff repeatedly told the nurses and officers that he did not want to have the x-ray performed on him and that he wanted to speak to his lawyer. Spencer v. Roche, 755 F.Supp.2d 250, 269.

D.Mass.2007. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Husband and wife sued town and 29 law-enforcement officers, alleging a pattern of harassment and civil-rights violations over the course of 15 years. This court, inter alia, denied one officer's motion for summary judgment on plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, since there was sufficient evidence of alleged outrageous conduct by that officer within the statute of limitations to support the claim, including taunting husband with epithets and challenging him to a fight; searching plaintiffs' 11-year-old son in his classroom; and refusing to take any action after responding to an assault on husband by three men with a gun and bricks. Kennedy v. Town of Billerica, 502 F.Supp.2d 150, 159.

D.Mass.2007. Subsec. (2) cit. in sup. After pharmacies sued healthcare consulting firm, a limited-liability sole proprietorship, over an audit performed by firm for pharmacies, firm brought various counterclaims. Following firm's principal's suicide, his wife was added as counterclaim plaintiff, individually, as executor of husband's estate, and as guardian of the couple's daughter. This court, inter alia, denied summary judgment for counterclaim defendants on wife's claim that she and her daughter were subjected to intentional infliction of emotional distress by defendants. The court held that it was a jury question under Massachusetts' law whether defendants acted recklessly, indifferent to the likely effect of their alleged outrageous conduct against principal, e.g., attempts to destroy principal's reputation and business prospects, on family members who would be apt in time to learn of such conduct. North Shore Pharmacy Services, Inc. v. Breslin Associates Consulting LLC, 491 F.Supp.2d 111, 134.

D.Mass.2004. Subsec. (2) cit. in disc., adopted in case cit. in disc., and quot. in ftn.; com. (1) and caveat 1 quot. in ftn. Two former prisoners and families of two deceased prisoners sued the federal government and law-enforcement officers pursuant to the Federal Tort Claims Act, after prisoners were exonerated following the disclosure of evidence that prisoners had been framed at the time of their murder convictions 30 years previously. Denying federal government's motion to dismiss one plaintiff's intentional-infliction-of-emotional-distress claim, the court held that plaintiff established he had "substantially contemporaneous" knowledge of his father's wrongful conviction and imprisonment arising out of defendants' outrageous conduct that went beyond standards of a civilized society. Limone v. U.S., 336 F.Supp.2d 18, 44.

D.Mass.2003. Com. (d) quot. in sup. After husband was arrested when he tried to enter condominium that he owned with his estranged wife as tenants by the entirety, he sued wife, man who lived in condominium, and arresting police officers. The man counterclaimed for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. This court granted husband's motion to dismiss emotional-distress counterclaim, holding that the man failed to allege any conduct by husband that was extreme and outrageous. Husband's demand that the man leave and husband's attempt to enter his own condominium, given the fact that wife's second temporary restraining order had not been served on him, could not be characterized as anything more than a mere annoyance at best, or a single instance of criminal conduct at worse. Gouin v. Gouin, 249 F.Supp.2d 62, 77, 78.

D.Mass.2002. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee brought suit for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress against former employer and security guards, after he was acquitted of criminal charges of assault and battery stemming from a physical altercation with the security guards. Denying in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether security guards' conduct in allegedly fabricating the story of events leading to plaintiff's arrest to cover up their loss of control and use of excessive force, and in perjuring themselves at his trials rose to the level of outrageous conduct necessary to support plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Grant v. John Hancock Mut. Life Ins. Co., 183 F.Supp.2d 344, 368.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

D.Mass.2002. Com. (g) quot. in case quot. in sup. Postal employees sued the United States Postal Service and a coemployee for injuries arising out of coemployee's alleged sexual harassment. Coemployee counterclaimed for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. This court adopted magistrate's report, which recommended that summary judgment be granted to plaintiffs as to the emotional-distress counterclaim. Plaintiffs' actions were not extreme and outrageous, as they were simply asserting their legal rights, if not obligations, in a permissible way by making complaints to their supervisors and the Postal Service's equal employment officer. Kibbe v. Potter, 196 F.Supp.2d 48, 74.

D.Mass.2000. Coms. (d) and (j) cit. in ftn. Shopper sued store for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress and false imprisonment in connection with her detention for a bag-and-receipt check. Granting in part and denying in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held that the check did not rise to the level of outrageousness necessary to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, but that a reasonable juror could conclude that plaintiff was prevented from exiting until defendant's employee had completed his inspection, and therefore that plaintiff was subject to a false imprisonment. Ball v. Wal-Mart, Inc., 102 F.Supp.2d 44, 53.

D.Mass.1999. Com. (d) quot. in disc. Homeowner brought a class action against a corporation for negligence, strict liability, infliction of emotional distress, and nuisance. Plaintiff alleged that because of the presence of PCB contamination in her neighborhood, a result of defendant's long-time practice of dumping contaminated soil, she was unable to sell her home and suffered anxiety about the risk to her children. This court denied in part defendant's motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff stated a viable public nuisance claim, because she alleged that defendant's contamination of the surrounding area constituted an interference with public health and environment. Plaintiff's inability to sell her property represented special injury. Lewis v. General Electric Company, 37 F.Supp.2d 55, 60.

D.Mass.1998. Com. (e) cit. in disc. Former followers of yoga guru sued guru for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress and breach of contract, alleging damages incurred upon learning that defendant was a fraud who failed to live by the principles he advocated. Defendant moved to dismiss. Granting the motion in part and denying it in part, the court held that plaintiffs could not recover damages for the shock and disillusionment they felt when they discovered that defendant had misrepresented himself as a true and authentic guru and lied about his celibate lifestyle, since those actions were not as a matter of law extreme and outrageous; that defendant's actions did not become outrageous simply by virtue of the fact that he occupied a position of power vis-à-vis plaintiffs; and that, while plaintiffs were intended third-party beneficiaries of a contract between defendant and the yoga community, they could not maintain an action for breach of contract based on defendant's alleged failure to provide the services of an authentic guru. Dushkin v. Desai, 18 F.Supp.2d 117, 121.

D.Mass.1998. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in cases quot. in disc. Former employee of parcel-delivery service sued service for, inter alia, invasion of privacy and reckless infliction of emotional distress in connection with defendant's insistence that plaintiff disclose details of an off-hours drinking incident that occurred at plaintiff's home. Defendant moved for summary judgment. Granting the motion, the court held, in part, that the event in question, which involved three other employees of defendant, was not a private affair of plaintiff alone, and that defendant's conduct was not so outrageous and extreme as to support a claim for reckless infliction of emotional distress. French v. United Parcel Service, Inc., 2 F.Supp.2d 128, 132.

D.Mass.1998. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Woman sued former employer and various individual co-workers for, inter alia, violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), alleging that defendants engaged in a concerted effort to discriminate and retaliate against her because she opposed employer's plan to move its headquarters from a handicapped-accessible location to an inaccessible location in a neighboring town. Plaintiff also asserted a common law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Defendants moved for judgment on the pleadings. Granting the motion in part and denying it in part, the court held, among other things, that, to the extent plaintiff alleged retaliation, she stated a viable claim under Title V of the ADA; however, defendants' actions did not rise to the level of outrageousness necessary to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. LaManque v. Mass. Dept. of Employment & Training, 3 F.Supp.2d 83, 94.

D.Mass.1997. Cit. in disc., com. (f) quot. in case quot. in disc. Estate of individual who allegedly committed suicide because of his homophobic work environment sued decedent's employers and co-workers for discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Defendants moved for summary judgment. Granting the motion, the court held, in part, that the conduct complained of, which included two comments made by decedent's co-workers, was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to give rise to a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Bogdahn v. Hamilton Standard, 973 F.Supp. 52, 58, 59.

D.Mass.1997. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in disc. Learning-disabled university students sued university, among others, for, inter alia, breach of contract and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendants failed to provide reasonable accommodations for their learning disabilities. Plaintiffs also asserted that defendants' actions resulted in the creation of a hostile learning environment. Defendants moved to dismiss. Granting the motion in part and denying it in part, the court held that plaintiffs, who maintained that they made the decision to attend this particular university based on brochures and catalogues purporting to demonstrate university's commitment to the learning disabled, had stated a claim for breach of contract; however, defendants' conduct was not sufficiently extreme or outrageous to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Guckenberger v. Boston University, 957 F.Supp. 306, 318.

D.Mass.1995. Cit. in case quot. in sup. Trucking company and its principal brought a civil racketeering action against toy manufacturer, certain of its executives, and others, and asserted various pendent state law claims, including one for intentional infliction of emotional distress, arguing that plaintiff company was driven out of business by defendants' alleged extortion. Dismissing in part, the court held that plaintiff, failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against manufacturer's vice president's assistant and another trucking concern, since the conduct complained of did not as a matter of law amount to extreme and outrageous behavior and plaintiffs failed to plead severe distress of a nature that no reasonable person could be expected to endure it. Doyle v. Hasbro, Inc., 884 F.Supp. 35, 40, affirmed 103 F.3d 186 (1st Cir.1996).

D.Mass.1995. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup. and cit. in headnote. A detained man sued a city under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and state law, claiming that the police violated his rights while he was in civil protective custody because of incapacitation due to substance abuse. He had been detained for 24 hours and was not given food or water, and the delay in treatment exacerbated the condition and hindered treatment. This court, among other rulings, granted the city summary judgment. The court held, inter alia, that the city was not liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress, since a municipality is not liable for the intentional torts of its employees under Massachusetts law. The court stated that there was no evidence that the officers' conduct was extreme and outrageous. Ringuette v. City of Fall River, 888 F.Supp. 258, 264.

D.Mass.1993. Cit. in case cit. in disc. After a town police officer allegedly took various actions, some unintentional, disclosing to a number of people that a woman was HIV-positive and suffering from AIDS, the woman sued the officer and town, alleging civil rights claims and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court, denying in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, held, inter alia, that a fact question existed over whether the officer's unnecessarily coercing the plaintiff to reveal to him that she was HIV-positive and advising her that he had discussed her medication with various nurses and doctors constituted extreme and outrageous conduct that would support the emotional distress claim. Doe v. Town of Plymouth, 825 F.Supp. 1102, 1110.

D.Mass.1987. Com. (d) cit. in sup. A bankruptcy trustee sued the guarantor on a bankrupt construction contractor's payment bond alleging that its failure to settle the bankrupt's contract suit and to promptly pay an executed judgment in that suit constituted outrageous conduct. The court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment, finding that the defendant's failure to settle or pay the judgment did not constitute the extreme behavior necessary to establish an outrageous conduct claim. The court concluded that the bankruptcy estate was incapable of sustaining damages based on an emotional distress claim because an estate could not experience any emotional distress whatsoever. Kerlinsky v. Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland, 690 F.Supp. 1112, 1121, decision affirmed 843 F.2d 1383 (1st Cir.1988).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

D.Mass.1985. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. After a magazine used plaintiff's picture to illustrate an article on organized crime in wholesale fish markets, plaintiff sued the magazine for defamation, invasion of privacy, appropriation of his picture for commercial purposes, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court found that the existence of material issues of fact precluded summary judgment on plaintiff's claims for defamation and invasion of privacy, but that the magazine was entitled to summary judgment on the claims of unlawful appropriation and emotional distress, as publication of plaintiff's photograph was not for commercial purposes, and plaintiff did not allege that the magazine's actions amount to the extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to prove intentional infliction of emotional distress. Morrell v. Forbes, Inc., 603 F.Supp. 1305, 1307.

D.Mass.1982. Coms. (d), (i), and (j) cit. in sup. A former church member brought an action against the churches of a particular ideology, the founder, and the second-ranking person in the church hierarchy, alleging fraud, intentional infliction of emotional distress, breach of contract, violation of the Fair Labor Standards Act, and a class action for treble damages under the civil remedy provision of the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organization Act. The defendants moved to dismiss the plaintiff's action, claiming, that the court lacked jurisdiction over the defendants, that service had been insufficient, that venue was improper, that the First Amendment barred inquiry into the subject-matter of the plaintiff's complaint, that the complaint failed to state a claim upon which relief could be granted, that the plaintiff's pleadings were defective, and that the various parties were improperly named or joined. The court held, inter alia, that the complaint did not state a claim upon which relief could be granted with respect to certain allegations of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court found that although the plaintiff had alleged that the disclosure of her auditing file with the church caused her emotional distress, she alleged no specific disclosures. The court also found that the church doctrine of "disconnect," i.e., to sever family and marital ties and to depend solely on the church for emotional support, did not constitute the type of extreme and outrageous conduct needed to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Van Schaick v. Church of Scientology of Cal., Inc., 535 F.Supp. 1125, 1139.

D.Mass.1969. Cit. in sup. This was an action by a schoolteacher under the Civil Rights Act, seeking injunctive relief and damages for an alleged improper dismissal by a town school committee. Plaintiff was dismissed particularly for wearing a beard, and after such dismissal suffered a weight loss and reaggravation of an ulcer. The court held that in view of good faith reliance by the members of the school committee upon relevant statutes with respect to plaintiff's dismissal, no award would be made for emotional distress of the improperly dismissed teacher, nor of punitive damages. Lucia v. Duggan, 303 F.Supp. 112, 119.

E.D.Mich.

E.D.Mich.2020. Cit. in case cit. in sup. Borrower sued lender, alleging that it violated the Fair Credit Reporting Act by reporting to credit-reporting agencies that she owed a scheduled monthly payment amount on her car loan in addition to, rather than instead of, the entire remaining balance, which became due when she defaulted on the loan and lender accelerated the debt. This court granted lender's motion to dismiss, holding, among other things, that borrower did not suffer any loss of credit or other financial harm as a result of lender's alleged negligent and willful violation of the Act, and that she failed to submit any evidence in support of her allegations that she sustained stress, frustration, anxiety, or other forms of emotional distress as a result of lender's failure to correct her credit file. The court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46 for the proposition that the possible liability for emotional harm was defined narrowly to exclude mere anxiety. Thompson v. Equifax Information Services, LLC, 441 F.Supp.3d 533, 543.

E.D.Mich.2019. Com. (d) quot. in sup.; com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Homeowner brought claims for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress against city and city police officers who executed a narcotics raid at her home, alleging that one officer ordered her door to be rammed open despite having seen her behind the door, such that it hit her face and caused a cut that required stitches, and that the same officer later took her into a room alone and threatened her in an effort to prevent her from reporting the cut. This court granted summary judgment for defendants, holding that plaintiff did not allege that she suffered severe emotional distress as a result of the officer's actions, nor did she assert that his actions met the very high burden of extreme and outrageous conduct required to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Michigan law and Restatement Second of Torts § 46. James v. City of Detroit, 430 F.Supp.3d 285, 295.

E.D.Mich.2018. Cit. in sup.; coms. (d) and (j) quot. in sup. Homeowner brought claims for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress against police department and officers who executed a warrant to search her home for evidence of drug trafficking, alleging that officers illegally broke down the front door of her home, slammed her to the ground, handcuffed her, ridiculed her weight, and seized her belongings. This court granted summary judgment for defendants on plaintiff's emotional-distress claim, holding that plaintiff failed to show that officers' conduct was extreme or outrageous under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court pointed out that officers were acting pursuant to a valid search warrant, that plaintiff did not allege that they made her suffer any physical abuse beyond excessively tight handcuffing, and that damages for emotional injuries could not be recovered as a consequence of property damage; in addition, although the handcuffing officer made certain statements to plaintiff that were reprehensible—including that she "shouldn't be so fat," that she was a "bitch," and that he could blow her head off and nothing could be done—those statements did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct. McGrew v. Duncan, 333 F.Supp.3d 730, 742.

E.D.Mich.2016. Com. (l) quot. in disc.; cit. in cases cit. in disc. Relatives of employee who died after being shot by a drunk coworker while on a military compound in Iraq filed, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against employer, compound's project manager, and others, alleging that project manager cleared the scene of evidence of alcohol, instructed witnesses to downplay the role of alcohol in the shooting, and told his second-in-command, who then informed employee's family, that the wound that killed employee appeared to be self-inflicted. This court denied in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding that there were genuine issues of material fact regarding project manager's conduct. The court noted that defendants cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46 to argue that the claims regarding conduct for which plaintiffs were not present were subject to summary judgment, and relied on Restatement Third of Torts: Liability for Physical and Emotional Harm § 46 in making its decision. Salser v. Dyncorp Intl. Inc., 170 F.Supp.3d 999, 1005, 1006.

E.D.Mich.2015. Cit. and quot. in cases cit. and quot. in sup. (general cite). Former employee brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against former employer and former supervisor, alleging that, after she returned to her janitorial position following double knee surgery, defendants violated state and federal laws by changing her work assignment, denying her training, and otherwise harassing her. This court granted summary judgment for defendants on that claim, holding that defendants' reassignment of plaintiff—to clean a 20,000 square foot facility that was dirty and pest-infested, lacked windows or fans, and had a reputation as a punishment assignment—did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct required to state an IIED claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Gibbs v. Voith Indus. Services, Inc., 60 F.Supp.3d 780, 802.

E.D.Mich.2015. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Complainant filed, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against individuals, alleging that defendants made numerous communications to plaintiff and his family members that included demands for money, accusations of crimes, and threats of arrest and imprisonment of plaintiff, and interfered with plaintiff's custodial and visitation rights. This court denied defendants' motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiff sufficiently pled an IIED claim. The court explained, citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment j, that plaintiff's allegation that he suffered physical symptoms including rapid heartbeat, dizziness, unsteadiness, fainting, palpitating heartbeat, irregular heartbeat, night sweats, insomnia, and nightmares was sufficient to establish emotional distress, an element of an IIED claim. Gilliam v. Ordiway, 147 F.Supp.3d 664, 670.

E.D.Mich.2012. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Son and mother brought various claims against city and police officers, alleging, among other things, that officers used excessive force to restrain and arrest son at plaintiffs' residence while investigating a report that son had left a threatening telephone message on a neighbor's answering machine. Denying in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, this court held that, if plaintiffs' testimony was believed, a jury might find defendants' misconduct sufficiently outrageous to constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court cited evidence that officers used an electroshock weapon on son twice, punched him while he was on the ground and slammed his head into the tile floor, and dragged him to a police car and threw him into the back seat even though there was no indication that he was attempting to flee and no reason to believe that he had committed a crime before he was arrested. Saad v. City of Dearborn Heights, 876 F.Supp.2d 925, 944.

E.D.Mich.2011. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Two former employees of a microbiology laboratory sued former employer, alleging that they were unlawfully fired or disciplined for blowing the whistle on employer's condonation of the use of expired media by doctors to transport specimens collected from patients to the laboratory for testing. Granting summary judgment for employer on employees' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held that employees had not shown that they suffered the severe emotional distress required by this claim as a result of employer's actions in firing one employee and allegedly chasing her down the halls of the laboratory, shouting and yelling; bruised feelings alone were not compensable emotional injuries. Hilden v. Hurley Medical, 831 F.Supp.2d 1024, 1046, 1047.

E.D.Mich.2010. Cit. in case cit. in sup. Former middle-school teacher who, as a result of undergoing several surgeries for a brain tumor, suffered a paralyzed vocal cord, which made it difficult for her to speak at a normal volume for extended periods of time, sued school district, asserting a pendent state-court claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) based on defendant's failure to make reasonable accommodations to her teaching schedule. Dismissing the IIED claim, this court held that plaintiff's complaints about the type and amount of courses that she was required by defendant to teach and about what she perceived to be insufficient reasonable accommodations for her disabilities did not allege the kind of extreme and outrageous conduct causing severe emotional distress that was necessary to sustain an IIED claim. Chavez v. Waterford School Dist., 720 F.Supp.2d 845, 859.

E.D.Mich.2009. Cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., coms. (j) and (k) quot. in case quot. in sup. Mortgage borrower sued mortgage lender, alleging that defendant falsely reported to credit reporting agencies that she had filed for bankruptcy. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment as to plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held, inter alia, that defendant's allegedly erroneous report of plaintiff's bankruptcy to credit reporting agencies did not qualify as “extreme and outrageous behavior” as a matter of Michigan law, and that plaintiff also failed to establish that she suffered the level of severe emotional distress required to sustain the claim. The court noted that. Lynk v. Chase Home Finance, LLC, 644 F.Supp.2d 868, 883, 884.

E.D.Mich.2008. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. As part of his § 1983 action, father sued detective, city, and nonprofit agency and its employee, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) arising from defendants' investigation of accusations that plaintiff sexually abused one of his children. Granting defendants' motion to dismiss, this court held that, while the Michigan Supreme Court had never adopted the tort of IIED into Michigan jurisprudence, according to standards described by that court for satisfaction of an IIED claim, defendants' actions were not sufficiently extreme and outrageous for plaintiff to establish his claim. Molnar v. Care House, 574 F.Supp.2d 772, 801.

E.D.Mich.2006. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Mother, on behalf of her son, brought excessive-force suit against city and four of its police officers, including a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, after son became violent when asked by his school principal to relinquish his hand-held video game and suffered minor injuries upon being subdued with the aid of a stun gun by officers. This court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment and dismissed all claims. Noting that Michigan had never adopted the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress, the court nonetheless concluded that the evidence did not show that defendants' conduct was sufficiently outrageous so as to allow plaintiff to recover under this theory. Johnson v. City of Lincoln Park, 434 F.Supp.2d 467, 482.

E.D.Mich.2006. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Mother brought § 1983 unlawful-arrest/ excessive-force action on behalf of her minor daughter against three city police officers in state court for injuries allegedly sustained by daughter during an arrest. Upon removal, this court granted summary judgment for defendants, dismissing all of plaintiff's claims, including a state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court, while noting that the Michigan Supreme Court had never adopted this tort but had nonetheless described its standard of proof, held that the evidence did not show that defendants' conduct was so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious, and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Sterling-Ward ex rel. Sterling v. Tujaka, 414 F.Supp.2d 727, 743.

E.D.Mich.2005. Adopted in case cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. Developer sued township and township's planning consultant for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with the rezoning of developer's property. This court, inter alia, granted summary judgment for defendants on the emotional-distress claim, holding that the complaint failed to allege sufficient facts to establish extreme and outrageous conduct. Noting that plaintiff's claim of emotional distress relied primarily on the assertion that defendants conspired to deny him of his property rights, the court pointed out that plaintiff did not have a protected property interest in the original zoning classification. Bauss v. Plymouth Tp., 408 F.Supp.2d 363, 370, affirmed 233 Fed.Appx. 490 (6th Cir.2007).

E.D.Mich.2005. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Employees sued employer and others for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with denial of their claims for workers' compensation. This court granted defendants' motion to dismiss the emotional-distress claim, holding that plaintiffs failed to allege any facts in support of their allegations that defendants engaged in a continuous pattern of harassment, abuse, and unethical conduct. Noting that plaintiffs themselves appeared to concede that the alleged fraudulent denial of benefits was the only factual allegation supporting the claim, the court concluded that such conduct simply could not be characterized as outrageous or atrocious. Brown v. Cassens Transport Co., 409 F.Supp.2d 793, 814.

E.D.Mich.2005. Com. (d) adopted in case quot. in sup. Employee brought, in part, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against employer, workers' compensation insurer, adjuster, and physician, alleging that defendants improperly denied him workers' compensation by conspiring to create false reports. Granting defendants' motion to dismiss, this court held, inter alia, that although the Michigan Supreme Court had not formally recognized the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress, it had adopted the standards of Restatement Second of Torts § 46 relating to extreme and outrageous conduct. Even when construed in plaintiff's favor, defendants' fraudulent conduct did not rise to the level of harassment, abuse, and immorality that could be actionable under Michigan law. Moon v. Harrison Piping Supply, 375 F.Supp.2d 577, 610, affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded by 465 F.3d 719 (6th Cir.2006), certiorari denied 549 U.S. 1279, 127 S.Ct. 1832, 167 L.Ed.2d 319 (2007).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

E.D.Mich.2002. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. (erron. cit. as com. (g)). Former custodian for school district sued district, district officials, and his union for violation of due process and intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, arising from his termination of employment and his subsequent unsuccessful union grievance. Plaintiff alleged that school district fired him to avoid making workers' compensation payments, and that union did not adequately represent him in his grievance. This court granted defendants summary judgment on the emotional-distress claim, holding, inter alia, that defendants' actions did not rise to level of extreme and outrageous conduct, because this case merely involved a run-of-the-mill wrongful-discharge/unfair-representation lawsuit. Chisolm v. Michigan AFSCME Council 25, 218 F.Supp.2d 855, 875.

E.D.Mich.2002. Com. (h) cit. in case quot. in disc. High-school senior brought, in part, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against principal, assistant principal, yearbook adviser, and others, alleging that defendants undertook an investigation into plaintiff's private sexual life after a picture of his genitals was published in the school yearbook. Granting in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to prove that defendants' conduct was intentional or reckless, or that he suffered severe emotional distress as a result of defendants' conduct. Granger v. Klein, 197 F.Supp.2d 851, 872.

E.D.Mich.2000. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. African-American teenage passenger who was reprimanded for unruly behavior by flight attendant during airline flight sued airline and flight attendant for racial discrimination, asserting, as well, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Michigan law. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to make out a prima facie case of intentional infliction of emotional distress, since flight attendant's conduct in telling plaintiff to “shut up” during preflight instructions, asking plaintiff to stop throwing gum wrappers, and glaring at plaintiff was not extreme and outrageous, and plaintiff had no evidence of severe emotional distress. Sanders v. Southwest Airlines Co., 86 F.Supp.2d 739, 746.

E.D.Mich.2000. Cit. in case cit. in disc. Former employee and his wife filed various claims against employer, including intentional infliction of emotional distress. Employee also moved for leave to file a second amended complaint to add, among other things, a claim for trespass to chattel. Granting in part employer's motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that employee's emotional distress claim failed because employer's actions did not amount to extreme and outrageous conduct. Denying plaintiff's motion for leave to file an amended complaint, this court held, inter alia, that employee's trespass-to-chattels claim based on employer's refusal to pay moving company, thereby resulting in moving company's lien against employee's personal property, failed because employee did not make direct or inferential allegations that employee, not the moving company, was entitled to immediate possession of employee's household goods. Willis v. New World Van Lines, Inc., 123 F.Supp.2d 380, 392.

E.D.Mich.1998. Cit. in headnote, com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. African-American employee sued former employer for, inter alia, race discrimination in violation of Title VII. Plaintiff also asserted a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Defendant moved for summary judgment. Granting the motion in part and denying it in part, the court held, among other things, that plaintiff had established a prima facie case of race discrimination and had presented evidence showing that defendant's stated reasons for her discharge were pretextual; however, defendant's actions, which allegedly included promoting white males instead of plaintiff and concentrating minorities in her department, were not so extreme and outrageous as to support a cause of action for infliction of emotional distress. Hall v. State Farm Ins. Co., 18 F.Supp.2d 751, 753, 770, affirmed 1 Fed.Appx. 438 (6th Cir.2001).

E.D.Mich.1998. Cit. and quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. A black airline employee who was fired from his job sued the airline for, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The employee's co-worker had accused plaintiff of sleeping on the job and told him that he was going to take him back to Africa. This court granted defendant summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that no reasonable juror could find the airline's conduct extreme and outrageous as a matter of law. The airline's manager of customer service had received a complaint by the co-worker, accusing plaintiff of sleeping on the job, and thereafter conducted an investigation into the matter. During the investigation, the manager gave plaintiff an adequate opportunity to reveal his version of the facts, and specifically provided plaintiff the chance to make known to the manager the co-worker's allegedly discriminatory remarks, but at no time did plaintiff do so. Although there may have been a fact issue as to whether the co-worker's conduct was extreme and outrageous, the airline was not liable for the co-worker's conduct, because the co-worker was not acting within the scope of his employment when he allegedly discriminated against plaintiff. Odigbo v. Northwest Airlines, Inc., 8 F.Supp.2d 660, 666, 667.

E.D.Mich.1997. Com. (d) quot. in sup. The estate of a Chinese national who committed suicide after being detained and questioned for shoplifting sued the store operator for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that defendant's employee's warning that he would handcuff decedent if she did not remain seated while he was questioning her and another employee's statement that decedent was trying to bribe her did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct and thus did not support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Estate of Ko by Hill v. Sears Roebuck and Co., 982 F.Supp. 471, 478, affirmed 173 F.3d 855 (6th Cir.1999).

E.D.Mich.1996. Cit. generally in disc., com. (g) quot. in disc. Department-store employee who was detained by store security and subsequently terminated for theft brought state court action against store for, inter alia, false imprisonment and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Store removed the action to federal court on the ground that the Labor Management Relations Act (LMRA) preempted employee's claims, then moved for summary judgment. Employee moved to remand the case to state court. Granting in part and denying in part employee's motion, and granting in part that of store, the court held that, with the exception of the false-imprisonment claim, the resolution of which did not require interpretation of the parties' collective-bargaining agreement for a determination of store's legal rights, employee's claims were all preempted by, and untimely under, the LMRA. Weatherholt v. Meijer Inc., 922 F.Supp. 1227, 1232, 1233.

E.D.Mich.1995. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. (Erron. cit. as § 76.) An insurance broker brought tort claims against an insured bank, and the insured counterclaimed for breach of contract and conversion, and joined additional third parties on tort and conspiracy claims. The claims arose out of a dispute concerning property insurance for a condominium development in which the insured had a mortgagee's interest. This court granted in part and denied in part the insured's motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that broker failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because insured was relying on its legal rights when it threatened to sue broker if it did not return its unearned premium and to report its activities to regulatory authorities. Insured's threats that the legal proceedings would financially ruin broker were not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to sustain an emotional-distress claim. Various Markets, Inc. v. Chase Manhattan Bank, N.A., 908 F.Supp. 459, 469.

E.D.Mich.1994. Quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee sued former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that defendant deducted money from his paychecks, allowing him to believe that he had health insurance; he discovered truth, only after he was in hospital and about to lose his eye, that he was uninsured and owed thousands of dollars in medical bills. The court dismissed, holding that not only did defendant's conduct fall short of being extreme and outrageous, plaintiff also had failed to plead facts supporting his allegation that he suffered severe emotional distress. Holloway v. Doug Fisher, Inc., 865 F.Supp. 412, 423.

E.D.Mich.1994. Cit. in headnote, cit. in sup., com. (g) quot. in sup. A widow whose husband died of cardiac arrest, allegedly the result of complications caused by a fracture of a prosthetic heart valve, sued the valve's manufacturers for breach of warranty. During negotiations, defendants refused to admit that the valve was defective and that it fractured; as a result, the widow exhumed her husband's body for an autopsy to determine the cause of death. Because of the exhumation, the widow sought damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress and fraud. The court granted defendants summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that defendants' refusal to admit that the valve was defective, that it fractured, and that it caused the husband's death was not extreme and outrageous conduct. The court stated that defendants were privileged in their refusal to admit a disputed fact in the course of litigation, and that refusals to settle claims did not constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress. Kemp v. Pfizer, Inc., 851 F.Supp. 269, 270, 275.

E.D.Mich.1993. Cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. A person detained for two hours in the custody of various state and federal law enforcement agents sued to recover on state tort and federal constitutional and civil rights claims arising out of the detention. Granting in part defendants' motions to dismiss, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's allegations of unpleasant reactions to her detention did not rise to the level of extreme emotional distress necessary to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, but she would be permitted to amend her complaint to allege additional facts regarding her alleged emotional distress. Fluellen v. U.S. Dept. of Justice Drug Enforcement Admin., 816 F.Supp. 1206, 1216, 1217.

E.D.Mich.1992. Cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (g) quot. generally in case quot. in disc. A terminated black female airline employee sued her former employer and former supervisor for race discrimination under Michigan law, alleging that employer's attendance policy was applied discriminatorily. Defendants removed the case to federal district court, asserting that this court had original federal question jurisdiction because plaintiff's claim was preempted by the federal Railway Labor Act (RLA). Granting plaintiff's motion to remand the action to state court, this court held that plaintiff's race discrimination claim was not preempted by the RLA because her claim did not represent a "minor dispute" under the federal statute. The court reasoned that resolution of plaintiff's state claim did not require construing the collective bargaining agreement's provisions. It distinguished a prior case involving intentional infliction of emotional distress in which a determination of the legal rights insisted upon required reference to the bargaining agreement's provisions. Spears v. Northwest Airlines, Inc., 798 F.Supp. 436, 439.

E.D.Mich.1990. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. The CEO of a debtor corporation and a related corporation sued bankruptcy court-appointed members of the Chapter 11 committee alleging RICO violations, malicious prosecution, and intentional infliction of emotional distress based upon allegedly malicious litigation against the CEO. This court granted the defendants' motions for summary judgment, holding that the plaintiffs had not established elements of malicious prosecution, that they had not alleged with necessary particularity predicate acts of a RICO violation, and that there was no evidence that the defendants committed extreme and outrageous acts necessary to establish the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court stated that there could be no claim for tortious infliction of emotional distress where the defendants' alleged misconduct consisted of actions taken in a legal proceeding, because statements connected with legal proceedings are privileged. Further, the CEO admitted at his deposition that he had suffered no emotional illness. Delorean v. Cork Gully, 118 B.R. 932, 947.

E.D.Mich.1990. Com. (d) quot. in disc. A woman sued a city and two police officers, on behalf of herself, her teenage daughter, and her granddaughter, for civil rights violations after she was arrested for driving with a suspended license and transported to the police station, leaving the two children alone in a parking lot. Denying in part the defendants' motions for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that since the officer effectuated the traffic stop to cite the plaintiff for violating Michigan's child restraint law, which required that enforcement could only take place following the occurrence of a "primary action" such as a moving violation, the plaintiff had stated causes of action for unlawful stop, excessive force, and invasion of privacy. The court also determined that genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether the officers' conduct was so outrageous as to give rise to intentional infliction of emotional distress. A question of fact remained as to whether the officers knew or should have known that the minor children would suffer a physical or an emotional upheaval as a result of being left alone. Walton v. City of Southfield, 748 F.Supp. 1214, 1221, affirmed in part, reversed in part 995 F.2d 1331 (6th Cir.1993).

E.D.Mich.1990. Com. (j) quot. generally in sup., com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. and cit. generally in ftn. A manufacturer's representative procured a contract for his employer, a group of manufacturing services companies, to provide door parts to an automobile manufacturer. The contract specified that payment would be in United States dollars, but after a change in the exchange rates, the companies sought payment in German deutsche marks and the owner of the companies instructed the representative to withhold the door parts until the manufacturer agreed to modify the contract. The representative was terminated when he refused to comply and subsequently sued the owner for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court denied the defendant's motion to dismiss, finding that the plaintiff had properly pled severe emotional distress since his complaint alleged that the defendant's conduct had caused him embarrassment, humiliation, and mental and emotional anguish. The court also concluded that the defendant's abuse of his position of authority over the plaintiff, coupled with his criminal behavior in attempting to obtain money under false pretenses by forcing a contract modification, supported a finding of extreme and outrageous conduct. Wilson v. Kiss, 751 F.Supp. 1249, 1252-1254.

E.D.Mich.1989. Com. (d) cit. in case cit. in disc. A terminated employee sued her former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that she was given inadequate training and then placed in a position with inadequate guidance. The court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding that the defendant's conduct amounted to mere negligence and was not so outrageous in character and so extreme in degree as to go beyond all bounds of decency. Merriweather v. International Business Machines, 712 F.Supp. 556, 565, affirmed 908 F.2d 973 (6th Cir.1990), certiorari denied 499 U.S. 906, 111 S.Ct. 1106, 113 L.Ed.2d 216 (1991).

E.D.Mich.1988. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in cases cit. in sup. An employee sued her employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress and tortious interference with a contractual relationship, based on the employer's racial discrimination in allegedly paying the plaintiff less than similarly situated white employees for performing the same work. The court dismissed both claims. First, the court explained that the discriminatory acts did not constitute the extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to sustain an intentional infliction of emotional distress claim, and that the plaintiff offered no proof of such conduct or that she suffered severe emotional distress. Second, the court found that the interference with a contractual relationship claim could not be sustained since no third party interfered with the plaintiff's employment contract with the defendant. Postell-Russell v. Inmont Corp., 691 F.Supp. 1, 3, 4.

E.D.Mich.1987. Com. (d) quot. generally in case quot. in sup. A physician who was being sued for malpractice sued another physician who had provided reports and deposition testimony for the malpractice litigation, alleging negligence, fraudulent misrepresentation, defamation, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court found for the defendant, holding that the defendant was not negligent because, as a consultant and potential expert witness, he owed no legal duty to the plaintiff, an adverse litigant. The court concluded that there was no fraudulent misrepresentation because the plaintiff had not relied on any statement in the defendant's prelitigation report and in any event the statements were opinions, and therefore not actionable; that the plaintiff's innocent misrepresentation claim failed because he did not establish reliance; that since the defendant's report was limited to statements of opinion that were used for trial preparation, there was no basis for the defamation suit; and that the defendant's actions did not satisfy the extreme and outrageous conduct standard to support an intentional infliction of emotional distress claim. Kahn v. Burman, 673 F.Supp. 210, 217, judgment affirmed 878 F.2d 1436 (6th Cir.1989).

E.D.Mich.1986. Quot. in sup. After a fired police officer was cleared of sexual harassment and rape charges, he sued several township officials for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that the defendants had conspired to have several women file false charges against him. The court dismissed the emotional distress claim, stating that, although the defendants probably felt malice toward the plaintiff because he had charged them with corruption, the evidence was insufficient to show that they had by extreme and outrageous conduct intentionally or recklessly caused the plaintiff severe emotional distress. Solomon v. Royal Oak Tp., 656 F.Supp. 1254, 1265, decision affirmed in part, reversed in part 842 F.2d 862 (6th Cir.1988).

E.D.Mich.1984. Com. (c) quot. in sup. A former employee sued her former employer for breach of her employment contract, defamation, retaliatory discharge, and infliction of emotional distress. The employer moved to dismiss. The opinion did not discuss the underlying facts, but with regard to the emotional distress claim, the court held that the employee had failed to allege extreme and outrageous conduct. The request for dismissal was granted. Smith v. Teledyne Industries, Inc., 578 F.Supp. 353, 355.

E.D.Mich.1983. Coms. (d), (g), and (h) quot. in case quot. in sup. An employee brought an action against her former employer alleging both termination of employment without cause and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The employer filed a motion for summary judgment. The court held that the provision in the employment application permitting termination of employees with or without cause constituted part of the employment contract. Because the employer had expressed no intention that employees be discharged for cause only, the doctrine of at will employment applied. On the plaintiff's emotional distress claim, the court found that the employer did no more than exercise its legal rights in a permissible way. Also, its conduct was not so outrageous as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency. Summary judgment granted. Batchelor v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 574 F.Supp. 1480, 1488, 1489.

E.D.Mich.1980. Cit. in sup., coms. (g), (d), (h), (j) quot. in sup. A former employee brought an action against his former employer for wrongful discharge and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court dismissed the wrongful discharge claim, stating that the employee had no right to just cause determination because his employment application clearly stated that employment was terminable at will and without notice. The court also dismissed the plaintiff's claim of emotional distress, concluding that any distress suffered by the plaintiff was not extreme or outrageous, and that even if the plaintiff suffered such distress, because the defendant was exercising its legal right to terminate the plaintiff's employment, the defendant's conduct was privileged. Novosel v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 495 F.Supp. 344, 346, 347.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

W.D.Mich.

W.D.Mich.2014. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. As part of a wider action, U.S. citizen who had a Hispanic physical appearance brought a claim for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against the United States under the Federal Tort Claims Act, based, in part, on federal immigration officers' alleged comments about plaintiff's presumed illegal status during a raid in which plaintiff was arrested and later released. This court granted summary judgment for defendant, holding that, while the comments in question were unprofessional, no reasonable jury could find that the comments constituted "extreme and outrageous" conduct, as required to state a claim for IIED under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Valdez v. U.S., 58 F.Supp.3d 795, 831.

W.D.Mich.2012. Com. (g) quot. in case quot. in sup. Personal representatives of arrestee's estate brought various claims against county and others, after arrestee, while being transferred from county jail to hospital, died of a lacerated liver that allegedly resulted from his collision with a dumpster during his flight from police just prior to his arrest. Granting summary judgment for defendants on plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held that defendants' failure to immediately send arrestee to a hospital could not be characterized as outrageous, nor could defendants be fairly charged with intent or recklessness in causing emotional distress, because there was no evidence that defendants had prior knowledge of arrestee's serious medical condition. Jackson v. Wilkins, 852 F.Supp.2d 890, 899.

W.D.Mich.1997. Cit. in headnote, subsec. (1) cit. in disc. Male former employee sued former employer for violations of Title VII, and for various common law torts, including the intentional infliction of emotional distress. Defendant moved for summary judgment. Granting the motion, the court held, in part, that plaintiff's Title VII claim was barred because he failed to file a timely complaint with the EEOC, that Michigan did not recognize intentional infliction of emotional distress as a valid cause of action in wrongful-discharge cases, and that, even if such a cause of action was allowed, the conduct complained of here was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support recovery. Cole v. Knoll, Inc., 984 F.Supp. 1117, 1120, 1135.

W.D.Mich.1993. Quot. in disc. A woman infected with the human immunodeficiency virus and her child sued a former sex partner alleging wrongful transmission of the virus. Granting in part and denying in part defendant's motion to dismiss, this court held that the claims for negligent and fraudulent transmission of HIV could be maintained to the extent that defendant knew he was infected with the virus, was suffering symptoms associated with it, or knew of a prior sex partner who had been diagnosed as having the virus, and that the complaint sufficiently stated a battery claim; however, legal claims could not be stated for wrongful transmission of HIV on negligence or fraud theories on the sole basis that defendant had engaged in "high risk" activity, and sexual activity was not an inherently or abnormally dangerous activity for strict liability purposes. The court denied defendant's motion to dismiss the count for intentional infliction of emotional distress as to plaintiff child, but ordered plaintiffs to supply a more definite statement regarding their allegations that defendant's actions were directed with intent to harm the child. Doe v. Johnson, 817 F.Supp. 1382, 1399.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

W.D.Mich.1993. Quot. in sup., com. (i), illus. 15 quot. but dist. The infant daughter of a woman who alleged that she had unknowingly been infected with HIV from sexual conduct with a man prior to her pregnancy sued the man for intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court, granting the defendant's motion to dismiss as to this claim, held that the daughter had not been a "bystander," as required for recovery by third parties on this theory in Michigan, at the time the HIV was allegedly transmitted. The court stated that the daughter was not physically present when defendant's alleged conduct occurred, and her after-the-fact discovery of defendant's alleged outrageous conduct directed toward her mother would not suffice to state a claim. Moore v. Johnson, 826 F.Supp. 1106, 1108-1109.

W.D.Mich.1983. Cit. in disc. com. (d) quot. in case cit. in disc., com. (g) cit. in disc. The plaintiffs brought an action for defamation and intentional infliction of emotional distress against a newspaper. This court stated that Michigan recognized this tort as defined in the Restatement. The conduct had to be extreme and outrageous; liability did not extend to mere insults. This court denied summary judgment on this count since the nature of the conduct depended upon factual issues; it also denied summary judgment on the basis of privilege, noting that extreme conduct could be privileged under some circumstances. In this case, the contested issue of malice, if proven, would override the newspaper's qualified privilege. Apostle v. Booth Newspapers, Inc., 572 F.Supp. 897, 906-908, opinion supplemented 577 F.Supp. 962 (W.D.Mich.1984).

W.D.Mich.1983. Cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. The plaintiff brought an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress against a newspaper after she appeared in a photograph accompanying an article on prostitution. This court stated that Michigan recognized this tort where the conduct was beyond mere insult and was extreme or outrageous. The court denied the motions for summary judgment since the nature of the conduct depended upon disputed facts. Summary judgment was also denied to defendants on the basis of privilege. The second Restatement did not use the language of the prior Restatement referring to privilege in the definition of the tort, but the defendant relied on the general definition of the common law privilege. In this case the applicability of a qualified privilege could not be determined because of factual issues. Similarly, the plaintiff's claim of invasion of privacy by placing her in a false light presented factual issues. Conditional privileges applicable to publishing defamatory matter applied equally to matter constituting an invasion of privacy. Parnell v. Booth Newspapers, Inc., 572 F.Supp. 909, 919-921.

W.D.Mich.Bkrtcy.Ct.

W.D.Mich.Bkrtcy.Ct.2011. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Creditor brought an adversary proceeding against Chapter 7 debtor, seeking a determination that debt arising from a state-court default judgment against debtor was nondischargeable as one for a willful and malicious injury. Granting summary judgment for creditor, this court held that the judgment was entitled to preclusive effect, specifically, that the findings supporting the judgment for her claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress compelled the conclusion that debtor's conduct was willful and malicious; among other things, the state court's finding that debtor's conduct was "extreme and outrageous" under Michigan law also established that debtor's actions toward plaintiff were malicious under the Bankruptcy Code. In re Strozewski, 458 B.R. 397, 407-408.

W.D.Mich.Bkrtcy.Ct.1994. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup. Chapter 11 debtor's former employee who brought a claim against debtor for emotional-distress damages, inter alia, alleging that he was wrongfully discharged on account of his race, moved to transfer determination of his cause of action from bankruptcy court to district court on the ground that his claim was a "personal injury tort," which must be tried in district court. Denying claimant's motion to transfer, the court held that claimant did not allege emotional suffering so severe as to state a claim for emotional distress that would qualify as a personal injury tort in the traditional sense, such as psychiatric impairment beyond mere shame and humiliation. The court stated that claimant's allegations of emotional distress did not transform his racial-discrimination claim into a personal-injury tort. In re Atron Inc. of Michigan, 172 B.R. 541, 544.

D.Minn.

D.Minn.2020. Com. (j) cit. in case cit. in sup. Arrestee brought, among other things, claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress against attorney and victims of plaintiff's harassment, alleging that attorney republished false statements on social media that plaintiff sexually assaulted a woman, and victims published sexual advertisements in plaintiff's name without his consent. This court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding that plaintiff failed to raise a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether defendants' conduct was outrageous or caused plaintiff emotional harm. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment j, the court explained that attorney republished her statements with good-faith belief that the allegations against plaintiff were true, plaintiff failed to set forth evidence that victims actually published the advertisements, and the record did not indicate that plaintiff suffered severe emotional distress. Fredin v. Middlecamp, 500 F.Supp.3d 752, 785.

D.Minn.2015. Subsec. (1) cit. in case cit. in sup. Home-mortgage borrower brought claims for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress against lender, alleging that lender breached the parties' mortgage agreement by failing to arrange a face-to-face meeting before foreclosing on his mortgage. This court granted summary judgment for lender on borrower's IIED claim, holding that borrower produced no evidence that what lender did was intentional and utterly intolerable, or that he suffered the severity of emotional distress required to make out such a claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court pointed out that there was no evidence that borrower was harmed by lender's failure to hold a face-to-face meeting, and, while borrower's mental-health records showed that he suffered from depression and anxiety, there was no evidence of any nexus between lender's alleged conduct and his mental conditions, all of which predated lender's conduct. Njema v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., 124 F.Supp.3d 852, 875.

D.Minn.2012. Subsec. (1) cit. in case cit. in sup. Employee sued employer, alleging, among other things, discrimination based on her disability and her gender in violation of state law. This court granted employer's motion to dismiss employee's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that employee's allegations—that her supervisor was generally disrespectful toward her and threw a ruler at her, and that employer's in-house physician transported her, following a consultation with her personal physician, to a hospital where she was involuntarily committed and subjected to a strip search—were insufficient to support such a claim under Minnesota law. The court noted that, while supervisor's alleged actions were unprofessional and objectionable, they did not satisfy the requirement of extreme and outrageous conduct, and that plaintiff did not allege that employer's physician actually admitted her to the hospital, that he was the one who searched her, or that the hospital misdiagnosed her as a threat to herself or others. Radcliffe v. Securian Financial Group, Inc., 906 F.Supp.2d 874, 895.

D.Minn.2012. Com. (e) quot. in sup. Twelve-year-old middle-school student and her mother brought various claims against school district and others, alleging that defendants wrongfully disciplined student for messages that she posted on an Internet social-networking website, forced her to surrender her passwords for the website and for her email, and searched her account on the website. Granting defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held that, while defendants' alleged behavior arguably constituted a callous, intrusive, and insensitive abuse of power, a reasonable fact-finder could not conclude that the behavior was "particularly egregious" or "utterly intolerable" to the civilized community, as required to state such a claim. The court noted that school authorities could be held liable for emotional distress arising from abuses of their position, but not for mere indignities that were not extreme or outrageous. R.S. ex rel. S.S. v. Minnewaska Area School Dist. No. 2149, 894 F.Supp.2d 1128, 1146.

D.Minn.2009. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Professor of African descent brought discrimination suit against university and others, and asserted a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). Granting defendants' motion for partial dismissal, this court, while acknowledging that plaintiff's allegations portrayed an unfriendly and contentious workplace, held that, under Minnesota law, the IIED claim nonetheless could not be sustained, because a work environment in which co-workers or supervisors criticized, taunted, or harassed another employee did not present the egregious conduct required for an IIED claim; additionally, negative comments concerning plaintiff's work performance, or the delay of a promotion, were not sufficient to establish IIED. Onyiah v. St. Cloud State University, 655 F.Supp.2d 948, 971.

D.Minn.2001. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. Railroad employee sued his union under the Railway Labor Act, alleging that union breached duty of fair representation when it refused to represent him in his grievance with employer railroad. Plaintiff also sued for intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted defendant summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's emotional-distress claim failed, because defendant's actions were not extreme and outrageous. Baird v. Burlington Northern and Santa Fe R.R. Co., 169 F.Supp.2d 1019, 1026, judgment affirmed 24 Fed.Appx. 629 (8th Cir.2004).

D.Minn.2000. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. Food-service director for an assisted-living facility for seniors sued express-delivery company for negligent infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, after delivery truck driver sexually assaulted her. This court granted in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to show that she suffered severe emotional distress with accompanying physical symptoms. Plaintiff's evidence that she was afraid to go out in public, had difficulty sleeping, and suffered anxiety, lightheadedness, and shortness of breath was insufficient to establish her claim. Longen v. Federal Express Corp., 113 F.Supp.2d 1367, 1374.

D.Minn.1993. Com. (j) quot. in part in case cit. in sup. A discharged employee sued her employer and supervisor, among others, alleging age discrimination, defamation, intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress, and other claims. This court, granting nearly all of the defendants' motions for summary judgment and dismissal, held, inter alia, that the employer's conduct in engaging in extensive workplace surveillance of the employee in order to determine the extent of her overtime did not rise to the egregious level required to prevail on a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Schibursky v. International Business Machines Corp., 820 F.Supp. 1169, 1183.

D.Minn.1992. Com. (h) cit. in disc. Fire chief sued newspaper for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, seeking damages arising from newspaper's alleged false statements. The court granted newspaper's motion for partial summary judgment, holding that newspaper's accurate reporting on public matters was not, as a matter of law, sufficiently outrageous to support an intentional tort claim. Conroy v. Kilzer, 789 F.Supp. 1457, 1467.

D.Minn.1992. Com. (j) quot. in sup. and quot. in case cit. in sup. Discharged restaurant employee sued her former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Granting in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that defendant's agents' actions, while harassing, were not so atrocious as to be outside the boundaries of decency and that the emotional distress that plaintiff suffered, which was not materially different from that suffered by other individuals who were terminated from their employment under adverse conditions, was not sufficiently severe to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. O'Brien v. A.B.P. Midwest, Inc., 814 F.Supp. 766, 777.

D.Minn.1991. Cit. generally in sup., subsec. (1) cit. in sup., com. (d) cit. in case cit. in sup., com. (e) cit. in case quot. in sup. and quot. in sup. A group of former division managers of a company sued the company for violations of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act and for various state law claims, including intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that they were subjected to the company's intentional pattern of conduct aimed at reducing the average age of the company's middle-level management. Granting the defendant's motion for summary judgment on the intentional infliction of emotional distress claim, this court held, inter alia, that while much of the company's conduct was reprehensible, none of it could be fairly characterized as extreme or outrageous to satisfy the first requirement of an intentional infliction of emotional distress claim under Minnesota law. Glass v. IDS Financial Services, Inc., 778 F.Supp. 1029, 1073-1074.

D.Minn.1990. Quot. in case quot. but dist. A former counselor sued a nonprofit corporation operating a chemical dependency treatment center, for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, regarding her termination following a former patient's allegations that she had entered into a social and sexual relationship with him immediately after his discharge from the treatment center and after the defendant conducted an investigation concluding that sexual conduct did occur. This court granted the defendant's motion to dismiss, stating that the conduct directed toward the plaintiff during the investigation was not extreme, outrageous, or ill-motivated. Under state law, the defendant was obligated to conduct an investigation regarding the allegations, and the court noted that the investigation was a temperate reaction to serious allegations and was carried out within the parameters of the employment contract existing between the plaintiff and the defendant. Meleen v. Hazelden Foundation, 740 F.Supp. 687, 693, affirmed 928 F.2d 795 (8th Cir.1991).

D.Minn.1986. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in disc. A trial attorney, formerly employed as general counsel by the defendant bank management organization and discharged after a restructuring of the defendant's legal department, brought suit alleging, among other counts, age discrimination, breach of a permanent employment contract, slander, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court granted defendant's motion for partial summary judgment, holding that the plaintiff failed to demonstrate either that he had had a permanent employment contract or that coemployees had made defamatory statements about the reasons for his discharge. The court held that the defendant's act of firing the plaintiff without warning, although distasteful, could not meet the high threshold of extreme and outrageous behavior necessary to recover for intentional infliction of emotional distress, since no verbal abuse or threats occurred, and there was no evidence that the plaintiff was under surveillance or was being harassed. Corum v. Farm Credit Services, 628 F.Supp. 707, 718.

D.Minn.1986. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in disc., com. (h) cit. in disc. An employee sued his employer for, inter alia, intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress after he was fired for allegedly stealing gasoline from the employer. This court granted the employer's motion to dismiss this claim, holding that the employee had failed to identify the extreme and outrageous tortious conduct necessary for the claim to stand, where the plaintiff merely alleged that the defendant had harassed him by giving him the choice of resigning, being fired, or taking a polygraph test, and that the firing itself was further harassment. Jeffers v. Convoy Co., 636 F.Supp. 1337, 1343.

D.Minn.1985. Coms. (d) and (h) cit. in sup. The plaintiff, an FBI agent, sued the writer, the contributor, and the publisher of a book about the role of the FBI in the events at the South Dakota Pine Ridge Reservation in the early 1970s, alleging that they knowingly or recklessly published falsehoods about the plaintiff's involvement in several murders, and seeking recovery for defamation, intentional infliction of emotional distress, false-light invasion of privacy, and prima facie tort. Defendants moved to dismiss. After taking into account the full language and context of the statements, the district court concluded that, since it could not precisely determine whether the statements indicated fact or mere opinion to the average reader, the plaintiff was not foreclosed from proceeding with his cause of action. The court dismissed the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that the statements were not so utterly intolerable as to permit recovery. The court dismissed the prima facie tort action, since the plaintiff could pursue and recover under a defamation cause of action instead. Price v. Viking Press, Inc., 625 F.Supp. 641, 650.

D.Minn.1978. Cit. in disc. An insurance company issued a certificate of hospital indemnity insurance to the plaintiff. The plaintiff was hospitalized subsequent to the issuance of the policy, and, after she was released, the plaintiff filed a timely and proper claim for benefits allegedly due pursuant to the terms of the policy. During an investigation of the plaintiff's claims, the plaintiff alleged that an agent of the insurance company intimidated the hospital personnel who treated the plaintiff and that, as a result of that intimidation, the plaintiff encountered difficulty in obtaining medical records and other information which was sought in order to document her claim. The plaintiff's complaint alleged: breach of the hospital indemnity insurance contract; tortious interference with the physician-patient relationship; interference with legal process; intentional infliction of emotional distress and breach of the plaintiff's right of privacy. The defendant moved for partial summary judgment. The court held that the complaint did not state a cause of action for interference with the physician-patient relationship, for interference with legal process, for malicious bad-faith settlement techniques, for interference with the insured's policy rights, nor for invasion of privacy since the court found that the Minnesota Supreme Court would not recognize such causes of action. The court held that where the claim for breach of contract sought only $4,900 and where all other claims had been dismissed for failure to state a claim upon which relief could be granted, since jurisdiction was premised on diversity of citizenship and a $10,000 minimal amount was required, the action would be remanded to state court from which it was removed. Wilson v. Colonial Penn Life Ins. Co., 454 F.Supp. 1208, 1212.

N.D.Miss.

N.D.Miss.2013. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former resident of county restitution center, who contracted mycobacterium tuberculosis while fulfilling the terms of his restitution at a chicken-processing plant, brought claims for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against owner of the plant. This court granted in part defendant's motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiff failed to state a viable claim for IIED. While plaintiff's allegations —that defendant placed him in an unsanitary work environment alongside employees who might have had tuberculosis and denied his request to see a medical professional for his physical ailments —were potentially sufficient to state a claim for negligence or even gross negligence, they did not rise to the level of extremity and outrageousness required to sustain a claim for IIED under Mississippi law. Jones v. Tyson Foods, Inc., 971 F.Supp.2d 632, 642.

N.D.Miss.1997. Cit. generally in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. Plaintiff sued the owner of a dialysis facility for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Dismissing the claim, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiff could not maintain a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, since defendant's conduct in having plaintiff arrested for trespass while he was escorting his wife into the facility, after he was warned that he was forbidden to come upon defendant's property, was not so extreme or outrageous as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency and to be regarded as utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Tyus v. Kidney Care, Inc., 982 F.Supp. 422, 425.

N.D.Miss.1996. Com. (d) quot. in sup. An employee sued her former employer for violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act and for wrongful discharge and negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiff had suffered from carpal tunnel syndrome, and her doctor failed to notify defendant of his decision to relieve plaintiff of her work duties. Defendant's termination letter advised plaintiff that it was the duty of the employee, not the doctor, to contact the company about medical leave. This court granted defendant summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because defendant's actions in terminating plaintiff were neither extreme nor outrageous, but fell within the realm of an ordinary employment dispute. Pegues v. Emerson Electric Co., 913 F.Supp. 976, 982.

N.D.Miss.1995. Cit. in headnotes, com. (d) quot. in sup. Former paint-store manager and his wife sued the store for, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress, invasion of privacy, wrongful termination, and violations of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act (ADEA). Defendant had suspended plaintiff while it investigated allegations of sexual harassment and assault made against plaintiff. Plaintiff denied the allegations, and when he refused to resign, he was terminated. This court granted defendant summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that defendant's actions in terminating plaintiff were neither extreme nor outrageous but rather fell within the realm of an ordinary employment dispute. Glasgow v. Sherwin-Williams Co., 901 F.Supp. 1185, 1187, 1191.

N.D.Miss.1995. Com. (d) quot. in sup. and cit. in case quot. in sup. A box printer at a meatpacking plant sued his employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress and for a violation of the Mississippi actionable words statute in connection with an incident during which plaintiff was cursed by a managerial employee in the presence of a supervisor. This court granted defendant summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's intentional infliction of emotional distress claim failed because purchasing manager's spontaneous and brief outburst, while improper, was not extreme or outrageous. Plaintiff and purchasing manager did not have an ongoing combative relationship sufficient to take this case outside the perimeters of an ordinary employment dispute. Lawson v. Heidelberg Eastern, 872 F.Supp. 335, 338.

N.D.Miss.1993. Com. (d) quot. in sup. and quot. in cases quot. in sup. A municipal employee sued her supervisor for sexual harassment under federal law and for intentional infliction of emotional distress in a pendent state claim after defendant repeatedly made sexual advances toward plaintiff and gave plaintiff poor job evaluations, demanding that plaintiff quit, after plaintiff rejected defendant's advances. The court granted defendant summary judgment on all issues. Regarding the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress the court held that plaintiff's employment disputes with defendant did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct when defendant's actions were merely improper and upsetting. Jenkins v. City of Grenada, Miss., 813 F.Supp. 443, 446, 447.

S.D.Miss.

S.D.Miss.1998. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. and cit. in case cit. in sup. African-American former oil-rig employee sued employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress and civil-rights violations, after two white crew members put a rope tied into a noose in his locker. This court granted the employer summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that the employer did not act in an outrageous manner designed to inflict emotional suffering. The employer responded to plaintiff and to the incident in a reasonable manner, disciplined the individuals involved, counseled supervisory personnel, declared the episode reprehensible, and offered either to accommodate plaintiff satisfactorily on the oil rig or, at his choice, to transfer him elsewhere. Miller v. Rowan Companies, Inc., 55 F.Supp.2d 568, 574.

S.D.Miss.1998. Com. (d) quot. in disc. Wife of debtor who committed suicide sued casino for negligence and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendant's attempt to collect the debt caused her husband to take his life. Entering summary judgment for defendant, the court held, in part, that the suicide did not result from an irresistible impulse caused by conduct on the part of defendant, such that defendant could be found liable for the harm sustained, and that defendant's decision to turn to the office of the district attorney in an attempt to recover the debt was neither extreme nor outrageous. Shamburger v. Grand Casino of Mississippi, Inc., 84 F.Supp.2d 794, 801.

S.D.Miss.1996. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Noninjured owners of used sport utility vehicles sued manufacturer under theories of negligence, strict liability and breach of warranty, alleging that the vehicles were defective because their fiberglass roofs failed to comply with manufacturer's specifications for strength and crashworthiness. Plaintiffs also asserted claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting defendant's motion to dismiss, the court held that plaintiffs could not recover under theories of negligence and strict liability where they alleged economic damages only; that plaintiffs failed to state a claim for breach of warranty, and that defendant's conduct was not so extreme or outrageous as to support plaintiffs' claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Lee v. General Motors, Corp., 950 F.Supp. 170, 175.

S.D.Miss.1992. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. An employee sued his former employer for wrongful termination of employment after he was terminated for violating the company's antifraternization policy by engaging in a sexual relationship with a coemployee. Plaintiff sought to recover damages on several theories, including tortious invasion of privacy and intentional infliction of mental and emotional distress. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of mental and emotional distress had no merit because plaintiff failed to establish that defendant's actions were so extreme, outrageous, or revulsive as to warrant the imposition of liability. The court noted that plaintiff knew of defendant's policy when he began the prohibited conduct and plaintiff was that aware his conduct, deemed offensive to defendant, could result in his departure. Watkins v. United Parcel Service, Inc., 797 F.Supp. 1349, 1361.

S.D.Miss.1988. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. A woman's autobiography claimed that she was forced to marry a 45-year-old abusive man when she was only 11, and that the man's sister had helped her prepare for the wedding. The book described the sister as drab, gray, and unpleasant, and allegedly implied that she was participating in a “slave auction.” The sister sued the woman, her coauthor and her publisher in diversity for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim. It determined that the defendants' conduct was not outrageous and that an average member of the community could not reasonably resent the defendants' publication of the statements because the language used was not capable of being understood in a defamatory manner or as an accusation of criminal conduct. Mitchell v. Random House, Inc., 703 F.Supp. 1250, 1260, judgment affirmed 865 F.2d 664 (5th Cir.1989). See above case.

S.D.Miss.1985. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup., coms. (j) and (k) quot. in sup. The plaintiff sued an insurer for breach of contract and tortious breach of contract. The jury awarded the plaintiff $50,000 compensatory and $40,000 punitive damages, and the insurer moved for a judgment n.o.v., alteration or amendment of the judgment, and remittitur. The trial court set aside the award of compensatory damages, stating that the damages for emotional distress sought by the plaintiff were not supported by competent evidence, either under a contract or tort construction. However, the court stated further that the plaintiff had established sufficient actual damages to predicate an award of punitive damages, and that the punitive damages awarded by the jury were reasonable. Jones v. Benefit Trust Life Ins. Co., 617 F.Supp. 1542, 1549, judgment affirmed in part, reversed in part 800 F.2d 1397 (5th Cir.1986).

S.D.Miss.1982. Quot. in part in sup., com. (d) quot. in part in sup. The plaintiff, a business telephone customer, brought an action against the local telephone company and one of its employees alleging the wrongful change of a telephone number, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and invasion of privacy. The telephone company had replaced the plaintiff's earlier issued telephone number and credit card with different ones. The telephone company employee had called the plaintiff to explain the change of service and to obtain billing information for charges previously registered to the old telephone number. The plaintiff alleged that the employee was abusive and defamatory during the conversation, and that the changed telephone number had adversely affected the plaintiff's business resulting in lost sales. This court granted summary judgment for the defendants on all issues. Citing state statutory law, this court found that the plaintiff had no rights whatsoever to an issued telephone number. According to statute, the assignment of telephone numbers was an act solely at the discretion of the telephone company to suit its service requirements. This court also found that the telephone company employee's conduct during the single telephone call she made to the plaintiff was not sufficiently outrageous to permit recovery for intentional infliction of mental distress. The employee did not use vulgar language, nor did she threaten immediate criminal prosecution for disputed calls charged to the previous telephone number. Absent such conduct, no recovery could be had for mental distress. Referring to the Restatement, this court also stated there was no invasion of privacy in this case. Repeated telephone calls were necessary to maintain such an action. Here, there was only one, and it was insufficient to permit recovery. Burris v. South Central Bell Tel. Co., 540 F.Supp. 905, 909.

E.D.Mo.

E.D.Mo.1985. Quot. in sup. A former employee sued his employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress and tortious interference with a contract. The court granted the employer's motion to dismiss, holding that the employer's actions could not be deemed outrageous, which was a requirement for an intentional infliction of emotional distress claim, and that no third party had interfered with any contract, which was a requirement for a tortious interference claim; therefore, the plaintiff's claims failed. Evans v. Six Flags Over Mid America, 613 F.Supp. 219, 220.

E.D.Mo.1985. Com. (d) quot. in sup. After three alleged incidents of sexual harassment from a fellow employee, a college employee sued her employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court denied the defendant's original motion for summary judgment, holding that it could not be said as a matter of law that such harassment was not sufficiently outrageous in character and extreme in degree as to be intolerable in a civilized society and thus sufficient to state a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. However, based on other grounds, this court granted the defendant's second motion for summary judgment on this count. Miller v. Lindenwood Female College, 616 F.Supp. 860, 861.

E.D.Mo.1981. Quot. in part in case cit. in sup. Former wife brought an action against former husband alleging breach of contract and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court stated that a defendant's acts must be so outrageous in character, so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized community in order to recover for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Missouri law. The court held, inter alia, that the former husband's breach of the support provisions of the divorce agreement, which was caused by his financial difficulties, could not be characterized as outrageous conduct sufficient to constitute a tortious intentional infliction of emotional distress under Missouri law. Deibel v. Deibel, 512 F.Supp. 135, 139.

E.D.Mo.1980. (op. on punitive damages, 1981). Cit. in disc. The plaintiff, a former air traffic controller, sued the air traffic controllers' union seeking to recover damages for alleged outrageous conduct. The plaintiff moved for partial summary judgment on his claim, citing an administrative decision on the issue finding for the plaintiff. The court, agreeing with the prior administrative decision, found that the defendant had engaged in acts designed either to coerce the plaintiff to cooperate with the union or to punish him for his refusal to do so. Summary judgment was granted in favor of the plaintiff on the ground that the defendant should be subject to liability for the emotional distress caused by the defendant's intentional outrageous conduct. Anthan v. Professional Air Traffic Controllers, 521 F.Supp. 1, 4, judgment vacated 672 F.2d 706 (8th Cir.1982).

E.D.Mo.1978. Cit. and fol. Automobile buyer brought an action against a finance company to recover damages for, inter alia, alleged oppressive collection tactics which allegedly caused buyer to suffer severe mental anguish, embarrassment, and humiliation. According to the complaint, defendant's agents had telephoned plaintiffs, humiliated them to their children, and bullied and harassed them for the collection of the indebtedness. However, the court held that the plaintiffs' version of the conduct of the defendant's representatives did not meet the test of extreme and outrageous conduct undertaken intentionally, recklessly, and with malice which was necessary to sustain an action for emotional distress. The court found, moreover, that the "facts" relied upon by the plaintiffs were so stated in vague generalities and couched in conclusory words that they failed to illustrate conduct so outrageous in character as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency. Wade v. Ford Motor Credit Co., 455 F.Supp. 147, 152.

W.D.Mo.

W.D.Mo.1989. Coms. (d) and (e) quot. in case cit. in disc. A female store manager sued her former employer and others for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that her immediate supervisor subjected her to sexual harassment and discrimination. After the court granted the defendants summary judgment on the intentional infliction of emotional distress claim, stating that the plaintiff failed to offer evidence of mental distress that was medically diagnosable and severe enough to be medically significant, it granted the plaintiff's motion for reconsideration, based on unpresented evidence from which the court found that the plaintiff raised an issue of fact as to whether she suffered medically significant emotional distress caused by the defendants. The court added that, by introducing evidence of subtle forms of discrimination, the plaintiff raised an issue of fact as to whether the defendants' conduct was extreme and outrageous. Beeman v. Safeway Stores, Inc., 724 F.Supp. 674, 680.

D.Mont.

D.Mont.2007. Cit. in case cit. in disc. Corporation and its principal sued limited liability company for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress arising from a prior lawsuit in which corporation sued and recovered damages from company after a jury trial. The district court adopted the magistrate's findings and recommendations in their entirety and granted summary judgment for defendant, holding, inter alia, that plaintiffs, who pointed only to defendant's failure to settle and its disputed "motion tactics" in the underlying action, failed to allege any intentional, wrongful conduct. The court explained that, although the Montana Supreme Court had chosen not to adopt the "outrageous" conduct standard of the Restatement Second of Torts § 46, some intentional, wrongful conduct was still required. DuBray Land Services, Inc. v. Schroder Ventures U.S., 488 F.Supp.2d 1109, 1117.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

D.Mont.1999. Quot. generally in disc., com. (j) cit. in disc. Worker was killed when employer-owned truck in which he was riding as a passenger rolled over; his parents brought survivorship and wrongful-death action against employer. Parents also asserted a claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress. Employer moved for summary judgment. Granting the motion in part and denying it in part, the court held that, to the extent that parents' claims were derivative of decedent's, they were barred by the exclusivity provision of the Montana Workers' Compensation Act; however, parents' claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress was an independent claim that belonged to them as the injured parties. Nelson v. Hawkins, 45 F.Supp.2d 1015, 1020, 1021.

D.Mont.1991. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Alleging negligence, breach of express and implied warranties, nuisance, strict products liability, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, the owner and principal stockholder of a wood-treating facility sued the manufacturers of the wood preservative used during the treating process seeking indemnification for cleanup costs and compensatory damages arising when waste preservative contaminated the facility site. Granting the manufacturers' motion for summary judgment in part and denying it in part, this court held, inter alia, that the owner failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court stated that the manufacturer's action in selling its product was not sufficiently outrageous to justify imposing liability on the manufacturer. Montana Pole & Treating Plant v. I.F. Laucks, 775 F.Supp. 1339, 1348, affirmed 993 F.2d 676 (9th Cir.1993).

D.Neb.

D.Neb.2003. Com. (h) cit. in case cit. in sup. Disabled man who was confined to a wheelchair sued owners and lessee of restaurant for violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Plaintiff alleged that defendants' property had architectural barriers related to handicapped parking spaces and the restroom. This court dismissed in part, holding, inter alia, that defendants' alleged failure to adhere to the ADA's accessibility guidelines did not amount to extreme and outrageous conduct. Hobleman v. Kentucky Fried Chicken, 260 F.Supp.2d 801, 807.

D.Neb.1996. Com. (d) cit. generally in headnote and cit. in case quot. in sup. Former employee who alleged that she was fired as a direct and proximate result of her complaint to management of sexual harassment by a co-worker brought, in part, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against employer, among others. Denying in part defendant's motion to dismiss, the court held, inter alia, that, although defendant could not be held liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress under a direct liability theory because the corporate conduct alleged by plaintiff, specifically, the lack of response to her complaints and her subsequent termination, did not constitute extreme and outrageous conduct under Nebraska law, plaintiff's allegations that a master-servant relationship existed between defendant and the co-worker and that the offensive conduct of the co-worker took place while he was acting within the scope of his employment stated a valid claim for relief under a derivative liability theory. Karstens v. International Gamco, Inc., 939 F.Supp. 1430, 1433, 1442.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

D.Neb.1995. Com. (d) quot. but dist., com. (e) quot. but dist. Manager of telephone company sued Federal Bureau of Investigation agents alleging Fourth Amendment violations in connection with defendants' investigation into possible wiretapping by plaintiff and for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held that their attempts to pressure plaintiff into submitting to a polygraph test and their later threat to press charges were not so intolerable as to support a claim for damages. Specifically, the court explained that the presence of plaintiff's attorney during the polygraph discussion was sufficient protection against any unduly offensive harassment on the part of defendants. Similarly, during the conversation regarding possible criminal charges, the presence of an impartial third party allowed defendants little, if any, opportunity to abuse their position of power. Cole v. U.S., 874 F.Supp. 1011, 1045, 1046.

D.Nev.

D.Nev.2019. Com. (e) quot. in disc. Estate of shooting victim and victim's family brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against city, city police department, and police officer, alleging, inter alia, that police officer shot and killed victim during an investigation of victim's home at a New Year's Eve celebration, despite having minimal basis for conducting the investigation. This court denied in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding that plaintiffs sufficiently alleged that officer's conduct was extreme and outrageous to state a claim for IIED. The court rejected defendants' assertion that, under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment e, defendants could only be liable if plaintiffs demonstrated that defendants committed extreme abuse of their position, because Nevada caselaw did not indicate that extreme abuse was a requirement for an IIED claim. Estate of Sauceda v. City of North Las Vegas, 380 F.Supp.3d 1068, 1087.

D.Nev.2011. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Terminated university pharmacy professor sued university, dean of university's pharmacy college, and university's director of human resources, alleging, inter alia, that defendants' treatment of her after she was diagnosed with bladder cancer constituted intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). This court dismissed plaintiff's IIED claims, holding that the alleged intentional acts asserted by plaintiff fell short of extreme and outrageous conduct, because the acts fell under normal employment relations; plaintiff's claims that defendants sent her letters of reprimand, papered her file, barred her from campus, and required her to complete a remediation plan all concerned actions that were properly categorized as personnel management, and, to the extent that plaintiff's termination or other adverse employment actions were due to a discriminatory policy, a legal remedy might be available in her discrimination claims not addressed here. Welder v. University of Southern Nevada, 833 F.Supp.2d 1240, 1246.

D.Nev.2009. Cit. in sup., cit. in ftn., coms. (d)-(f) quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. in sup. German citizen who was detained by federal officials after arriving at a Nevada airport and was later transferred to a city jail as a result of the erroneous inclusion of his name on a watch list sued the United States for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia. This court granted defendant's motion to dismiss based on the discretionary-function exception to the Federal Tort Claims Act, but without prejudice so that plaintiff could amend his complaint, concluding that plaintiff's IIED claim stated a claim upon which relief could be granted; although the federal officials' request that plaintiff spy for them was not outside the bounds of decency, their control over his movements and their alleged knowledge that he had a heart condition and would be subject to a strip search created fact issues as to whether their conduct was extreme and outrageous and whether they knew that he was peculiarly susceptible to emotional distress. Chehade Refai v. Lazaro, 614 F.Supp.2d 1103, 1121, 1122.

D.Nev.2001. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Fry cook for casino café brought claims against casino and male co-workers for sexual harassment and retaliation under Title VII, intentional infliction of emotional distress, assault, battery, defamation, and sexual harassment under state's antidiscrimination statute. Defendants moved for summary judgment. Denying the motion in part, this court held, inter alia, that whether defendants' sexual remarks and offensive physical contact rose to level of "extreme or outrageous" so as to sustain claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress was jury question. Burns v. Mayer, 175 F.Supp.2d 1259, 1268.

D.Nev.2001. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Female casino employee sued employer and co-workers, alleging, among other things, sexual harassment and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Denying in part coworkers' motions for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether co-workers' sexual remarks and offensive physical contact constituted extreme and outrageous conduct. Switzer v. Rivera, 174 F.Supp.2d 1097, 1108.

D.Nev.1994. Com. (d) cit. in case cit. in sup. A former ticket agent for an airline sued an airline customer for libel, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and tortious interference with a contractual relationship arising from a letter the customer wrote to the airline complaining about the agent's inappropriate behavior. This court granted defendant's motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state an emotional-distress claim because she failed to allege conduct that rose to the level of outrageousness and further failed to allege a sufficiently severe level of distress. Defendant's conduct of sending the letter, in which he expressed his dissatisfaction with the level of service he received from an airline employee and indicated the reasons for his decision to stop patronizing the airline, was a common occurrence and could hardly be classified as extreme or outrageous. Churchill v. Barach, 863 F.Supp. 1266, 1275.

D.Nev.1993. Coms. (d), (h), and (j) cit. in disc. Former casino employees sued the casino owners and management employees, seeking reinstatement and alleging race and sex discrimination and various pendent Nevada state law claims, including intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting the defendants' motions for summary judgment, the district court held, inter alia, that the employees' feelings of inferiority, headaches, irritability and, in one employee's case, weight loss, were not "severe emotional distress" sufficient to sustain their claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with denial of their requests for transfer to a preferred location. Alam v. Reno Hilton Corp., 819 F.Supp. 905, 911.

D.Nev.1992. Cit. in case quot. in sup., coms. cit. generally in case quot. in sup. (Erron. cit. as § 41.) Blackjack dealer sued former employer, asserting civil rights claims arising out of alleged sexual harassment by other employees and seeking damages for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that, under Nevada law, defendant's conduct in failing to respond in ways requested by plaintiff in response to episodes of customer harassment was not extreme and outrageous conduct that would support an emotional distress claim. Powell v. Las Vegas Hilton Corp., 841 F.Supp. 1024, 1031.

D.Nev.1990. Cit. in sup. (erron. cit. as § 41), coms. (d), (e), and (f) quot. in sup. A woman sued her employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that she had been subjected to poor treatment after complaining about preferential treatment being given to a younger woman who allegedly had or was having an affair with her supervisors. The woman argued that pervasive sexual harassment creating a hostile work environment constituted extreme and outrageous conduct, especially since in this case the supervisors were acting in retaliation for her complaints, abused their positions of authority, and knew that the woman was susceptible to work-related stress. The actions complained of included demoting the woman, involuntarily transferring her, denying her overtime work, and taking away her key to the main building. This court, having found no evidence of sexual harassment or hostile work environment, granted summary judgment for the employer, holding that, although the woman's evidence might establish abuse of position by the supervisors and awareness that she was subject to depression resulting from work-related stress, the conduct complained of was not so extreme and outrageous as to establish a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Candelore v. Clark County Sanitation Dist., 752 F.Supp. 956, 962, affirmed 975 F.2d 588 (9th Cir. 1992). See above case.

D.Nev.1986. Cit. in disc., coms. (d) and (h) quot. in sup. The plaintiff, who was employed by the defendant as a warehouse supervisor for 12 years, alleged that the defendant initiated a drug investigation of him despite its knowledge that he had not committed any offense. The plaintiff sought damages for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. After noting that Nevada recognized this tort, the district court held that the allegations raised a genuine issue as to whether initiating a drug investigation was sufficiently outrageous conduct as to permit recovery. The court concluded that reasonable persons could differ on that question and denied the defendant's motion for summary judgment on that claim. Norman v. General Motors Corp., 628 F.Supp. 702, 703-705.

D.N.H.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

D.N.H.2022. Cit. in sup., cit. in case cit. in sup.; com. (d) quot. in sup. and cit. in case quot. in sup.; com. (i) cit. and quot. in sup.; com. (j) quot. in case cit. in sup. Child victims of sexual assault and abuse while working at a marina sued, among others, owners of the marina, alleging that owners were liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) because they permitted the perpetrator, who had a history of abuse, to supervise them. This court denied owners' motions to dismiss, holding, as a matter of first impression, that victims sufficiently alleged that owners recklessly caused them emotional harm because they knew about the abuse and made no effort to stop it. The court rejected owners' argument that only an individual that directly harassed, abused, or assaulted a victim could be liable for IIED under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Doe v. West Alton Marina, LLC, 646 F.Supp.3d 315, 321-323, 326-328.

D.N.H.2013. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Parents and their daughter brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against employees of the New Hampshire Department of Children, Youth, and Families, school district employees, and law enforcement officers, after parents were arrested for interference with custody, and ultimately lost custody of daughter as a result of defendants' initiation and prosecution of neglect and guardianship proceedings against them. Granting defendants' motion to dismiss, this court held that plaintiffs failed to state a claim for IIED because they did not allege any grossly illegal or unconstitutional behavior on the part of any defendant; at the absolute worst, plaintiffs alleged a few instances of conduct that were arguably unconstitutional, but not "grossly" so. The court noted that to state a claim for IIED, it was not enough that defendants acted with an intent that was tortious or even criminal, nor, for that matter, that their conduct had been characterized by malice. Katz v. McVeigh, 931 F.Supp.2d 311, 357.

D.N.H.2012. Quot. in case quot. in sup. Journalist whose attempts to attend four political events on private property were curtailed brought federal civil-rights claims against certain political and police defendants, as well as state-law claims for battery, negligence, and intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against the police defendants, including city police department and its chief of police. This court granted defendants' motion to dismiss all claims, holding that plaintiff's claim for IIED failed because, while he alleged that "officers of the political defendants" approached him threateningly and put their hands on him while he was trying to record video of events, and repeatedly threatened to arrest him, he did not set forth who did what or the resultant harm. King v. Friends of Kelly Ayotte, 860 F.Supp.2d 118, 130.

D.N.H.2011. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee of medical center sued medical center and physician who owned medical center and treated her, alleging, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). Denying defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiff's IIED claim, this court held that the extreme and outrageous character of conduct required to state such a claim could arise from the abuse of a position of authority of the type claimed by plaintiff. The court pointed to plaintiff's allegations that defendant repeatedly threatened to terminate her employment and "kick her out of the house" where they lived together if she did not meet his personal demands (including engaging in sex), that he subjected her to sexually suggestive behavior at work, and that center failed to maintain the confidentiality of her medical records. Hudson v. Dr. Michael J. O'Connell's Pain Care Center, Inc., 2011 DNH 160, 822 F.Supp.2d 84, 98.

D.N.H.2009. Coms. (d) and (e) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. in sup. High school student and her parents sued school district, high school principal, and former high school teacher in connection with certain offensive comments that teacher made to student about her buttocks. Granting summary judgment for defendants on plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held, inter alia, that defendants' conduct was insufficiently extreme and outrageous as a matter of law. The court reasoned that, while teacher's comments to student were unquestionably unprofessional, and arguably reprehensible, they were not beyond "all possible bounds of decency," even for an older man in a position of authority as a teacher to adolescent girls. Brodeur v. Claremont School Dist., 2009 DNH 082, 626 F.Supp.2d 195, 224, 225-226.

D.N.H.2009. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Mother of private-school student sued school, alleging, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) arising from school's dismissal of student because of her eating disorder. Granting in part defendant's motion to dismiss, this court held that plaintiff failed to state a claim for IIED by alleging that school discharged daughter either in violation of its own statements and policies or upon the mistaken belief that she was a danger to herself or others, because such conduct failed to rise to the level of conduct "so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious, and utterly intolerable in a civilized community." Franchi v. New Hampton School, 656 F.Supp.2d 252, 267.

D.N.H.2009. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. After criminal charges against limited-liability company under state's "spillage" statute were dismissed, member of limited-liability company sued police officers who subjected him to booking procedures in connection with the charges. Granting summary judgment for defendants, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff could not prevail on his claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court reasoned that defendants' conduct in initiating an investigation prompted by a citizen complaint, attempting to resolve the complaint informally with a call to limited-liability company, seeking the advice of a county prosecutor, and booking plaintiff as contemplated by the warrant was at a considerable remove from the extreme and outrageous behavior necessary to impose liability for such a claim. Gidley v. Oliveri, 2009 DNH 094, 641 F.Supp.2d 92, 107.

D.N.H.2009. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in cases quot. in sup. Borrower brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, against private lender that decided not to extend additional financing to her after she defaulted on lender's original loan. Granting lender's motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that, although plaintiff alleged that she suffered as a result of the stress lender caused her due to the "looming foreclosure" of her property, there was no evidence in the record that lender ever filed or threatened foreclosure. Further, the court concluded that lender's conduct, even with the ill will attributed by plaintiff, did not constitute the type of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to impose liability for IIED.; the conduct alleged failed to rise to the standard of being so severe that no reasonable person could be expected to endure it. Gilroy v. Kasper, 654 F.Supp.2d 44, 49.

D.N.H.2002. Cit. in case cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. Insured sued insurer, seeking a declaratory judgment that she was entitled to coverage under her home health-care policy, and alleging claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress, breach of contract, and consumer fraud. This court denied in part insurer's motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that insured's allegations that insurer took advantage of an elderly woman, and then treated her with utter disregard and actively avoided her when she fell ill and needed assistance understanding her policy and filing a claim stated a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Insurer and its agents had assured insured that insurer would be approachable and easy to work with if she ever had a claim. Lister v. Bankers Life and Cas. Co., 218 F.Supp.2d 49, 52.

D.N.H.1997. Cit. in headnote, quot. in sup. A town clerk and tax collector sued the town and town officials for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. Plaintiff alleged that town officials committed an unlawful search and seizure by placing a police guard in her office to watch over her on her last day of service. This court granted in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that recitation of the fact of defendants' conduct would not constitute outrageous behavior to the average member of the community. Rossi v. Town of Pelham, 35 F.Supp.2d 58, 61, 75.

D.N.H.1997. Cit. in headnotes, quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. Former part-time police officer sued town and police sergeant for sexual discrimination, sexual harassment, and retaliation in violation of Title VII, alleging, among other things, that she was terminated and replaced with a less qualified male officer after she rejected sergeant's unwanted sexual advances. Plaintiff also asserted state law claims for assault and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Denying defendants' motion to dismiss, the court held that plaintiff's allegations were sufficient to state a claim for violations of Title VII; that sergeant's conduct, which included harassing plaintiff, making vulgar remarks, and touching her without her consent, went beyond mere annoyances and could be considered atrocious and intolerable in a civilized society; and that plaintiff had stated a claim for assault where she alleged that sergeant forced her to take an unannounced written exam at gunpoint. Yale v. Town of Allenstown, 969 F.Supp. 798, 799, 800-801.

D.N.H.1995. Cit. in headnotes, cit. in case cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup., com. (h) quot. in disc. Former employee who alleged she was denied a promotion and eventually terminated because of her parental obligations to her disabled son sued employer and individual supervisors for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiff maintained that supervisors routinely made comments to her questioning the propriety of women in the workplace and, specifically, plaintiff's commitment to her job. Defendants moved to dismiss. Granting the motion as to defendant employer but denying as to individual supervisors, the court held that material factual questions existed as to the frequency and regularity of supervisors' comments and whether they rose to the level of outrageousness required to sustain plaintiff's claim. Miller v. CBC Companies, Inc., 908 F.Supp. 1054, 1057, 1067.

D.N.H.1993. Quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former state employee sued the state treasury department, among others, for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Denying in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held that plaintiff presented evidence, which showed a pattern of deliberate harassment by plaintiff's superiors in retaliation for her exercise of protected expression resulting in her constructive discharge, that was sufficient for a reasonable jury to find that defendant intentionally inflicted severe emotional distress upon her. Soltani v. Smith, 812 F.Supp. 1280, 1296.

D.N.H.1992. Quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. and cit. in case cit. in disc., com. (h) cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Female employee alleged that two male coemployees engaged in inappropriate and sexually harassing behavior. The female employee sued the two male employees, their supervisor, and the employer for various counts, including intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted the supervisor's motion to dismiss the emotional distress claim because the specific factual allegations in that count did not apply to him. The court denied the two employees' motions to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that the plaintiff sufficiently alleged severe emotional distress caused by conduct that could reasonably have been regarded as outrageous enough to permit recovery. The allegations included anxiety, depression, and gastritis caused by continuous sexually suggestive and demeaning behavior and comments. Godfrey v. Perkin-Elmer Corp., 794 F.Supp. 1179, 1188-1189.

D.N.H.1991. Cit. in disc. and in ftn., coms. (i), (d), and (j) quot. in sup. A franchisee of a martial arts studio sued the franchisor for alleged breach of a licensing agreement, negligent infliction of emotional distress, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and recovery for emotional distress on his contract claim. The alleged breach caused the studio's closure, resulting in lost profits and lost business opportunity as well as humiliation and the loss of good will. This court dismissed the plaintiff's tort claims for emotional distress, finding no physical impact or physical consequences flowing from defendant's alleged negligent conduct, or any extreme, outrageous, or atrocious conduct by the defendant. The court also found no support in the applicable state law to support recovery for emotional distress on a contract claim, which left only the contract claim to be decided. Orono Karate v. F. Villari Studio of Self Defense, 776 F.Supp. 47, 51.

D.N.H.1990. Quot. in disc., subsec. (1), com. (d) quot. in disc. A former town employee brought a civil rights action against the town and two of its selectmen, among others, for unlawful termination, alleging, inter alia, that they knew of his preexisting heart condition and intentionally caused him severe emotional distress through their continued harassment of him. Granting in part the defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court concluded that the plaintiff failed as a matter of law to allege conduct that could support recovery for a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court said that, while the defendants' conduct in staring at the plaintiff and his wife and igniting a firecracker in the vicinity of the plaintiff's work may have been personally offensive to the plaintiff, the defendants' acts were not so outrageous as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency and to be regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized society. Bourque v. Town of Bow, 736 F.Supp. 398, 404.

D.N.H.1988. Subsec. (1) quot. in disc., coms. (e) and (h) cit. in disc. After a Veterans Administration psychologist was misquoted in a newspaper as having made derogatory comments about Vietnam veterans, several agency employees released confidential information from his personnel file to the press. He sued them under the Federal Tort Claims Act for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. The court rejected the defendants' motion to dismiss, holding that it was for a jury to decide whether the abuse of a position of authority in this case was conduct sufficiently extreme and outrageous as to result in liability. Kassel v. U.S. Veterans Admin., 682 F.Supp. 646, 659, order amended and clarified 709 F.Supp. 1194 (D.N.H.1989).

D.N.H.1986. Cit. in sup., subsec. (1) and coms. (d) and (h) quot. in sup. An employee sued his former employer for wrongful discharge and intentional infliction of emotional distress for not allowing the employee to return to work due to medical problems and then dismissing the employee. The court granted the defendant's motion to dismiss the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress on the ground that recovery for that tort can only be permitted when there was extreme and outrageous conduct that exceeded the bounds of decency, which was not evidenced by the employer's failure to investigate the cause of the employee's contact dermatitis or to provide the employee's physician with chemical samples. Brewer v. K.W. Thompson Tool Co., Inc., 647 F.Supp. 1562, 1567.

D.N.H.1986. Cit. in disc., coms. (h) and (k) quot. in disc. A former police officer sued town officials for intentional infliction of emotional distress and slander. This court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The court held that, although the plaintiff did not manifest distress by physical injury or bodily harm, it was for the jury to decide if the defendants' conduct in harassing the plaintiff while she was on duty was sufficiently extreme and outrageous as to result in liability. After noting that written defamation was libel rather than slander, the court also held that the essential issue of whether a defamatory letter sent to the plaintiff with copies to the police chief and her personnel file could be considered to have been published remained to be determined by a jury. Brown v. Town of Allentown, 648 F.Supp. 831, 839, 840.

D.N.H.1986. Cit. in disc., subsec. (1) quot. in ftn., com. (d) quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. in sup. and quot. in ftn. A hospital's agent prepared and published an evaluation that questioned the competency of a physician and a nurse. The physician and nurse sued the hospital and its agent for defamation, wrongful infliction of emotional distress, and loss of ability to enjoy life. This court granted the defendants' motions to dismiss the last two counts, holding that New Hampshire did not recognize a cause of action for loss of ability to enjoy life, nor a separate cause of action for wrongful infliction of emotional distress where the factual predicate sounded in defamation. The court noted that negligent infliction of emotional distress was a cause of action confined to the context of the observation of an accident, and that the defendant's conduct failed as a matter of law to constitute the extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to support the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. DeMeo v. Goodall, 640 F.Supp. 1115, 1117.

D.N.H.1985. Cit. in case quot. in disc., cit. in sup., quot. in ftn. A former employee brought a wrongful termination action against her employer, alleging that her termination was based on her refusal to accept his sexual advances. The counts included defamation, based on statements from her employer to his attorney suggesting that she stole company property, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court denied the employer's motion for summary judgment on the intentional infliction of emotional distress claim, holding, inter alia, that genuine factual issues existed as to the employer's intent, as well as the degree of outrageousness of his conduct. The court granted summary judgment to the employer on the defamation claim, holding that the employer's statements were privileged because they were made to an attorney in the course of litigation. The court noted that special damages were not required in libel actions, nor in slander actions where the statements imputed criminal activity. The court stated that the employee showed impairment of her reputation sufficient to prove actual damages. Chamberlin v. 101 Realty, Inc., 626 F.Supp. 865, 868, 869.

D.N.J.

D.N.J.2019. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. and in ftn.; com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. High-school student and his family filed claims for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress against school district and others, alleging that defendants suspended student for starting a fire and having weapons on a school bus, reported him for drawing an apparent weapon in his private sketchbook, and attempted to move him to an alternative educational placement following the dismissal of criminal charges against him. This court granted summary judgment for defendants on plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that defendants' actions were not so outrageous as to meet the high threshold of a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. K.J. v. Greater Egg Harbor Regional High School District Board of Education, 431 F.Supp.3d 488, 516.

D.N.J.2016. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Social worker for the board of education filed, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against board, alleging that her coworkers were verbally abusive, and that defendant released unredacted minutes from a meeting where defendant mandated that plaintiff undergo a psychiatric evaluation. This court denied in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding that plaintiff failed to state an IIED claim, except to the portion of the claim that related to the publication of the meeting minutes. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, the court explained that the coworkers' behaviors did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct required for the claim, but determined that there was a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the release of the unredacted minutes was intentional or reckless in deliberate disregard of a high degree of probability that emotional distress would follow. Edmond v. Plainfield Board of Education, 171 F.Supp.3d 293, 316.

D.N.J.2016. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former union employee who was suspended and later terminated from his position as a flight attendant after he failed a breathalyzer test brought a claim for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against former employer, alleging that employer interfered with the requirements of the union's collective-bargaining agreement, made misrepresentations to third parties, and required him to pay for treatment that he could not afford. This court granted employer's motion to dismiss employee's IIED claim without prejudice, holding that employee's generic and conclusory allegations of emotional distress were inadequate to meet the severity requirement for an emotional-distress claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Kennedy v. American Airlines Inc., 195 F.Supp.3d 646, 658.

D.N.J.2008. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Terminated employee sued former employer, alleging that she suffered severe emotional distress as a result of being pressured to return to work while she was under a doctor's care for anxiety. Granting summary judgment for defendant as to plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held that plaintiff failed to carry her burden of showing that defendant's conduct rose to the requisite level of extreme and outrageous behavior. The court pointed out that defendant attempted to contact plaintiff by telephone on three occasions only and spoke to plaintiff twice after the onset of her health problems, and that the conversations centered around her health, her work project, and her expected return date. Anderson v. DSM N.V., 589 F.Supp.2d 528, 538.

D.N.J.2007. Cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Female police officer sued township, township's police department, and department's police chief, alleging gender discrimination, due-process violations, retaliation, and intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) in connection with disciplinary actions against her and denial of promotion. This court granted summary judgment for defendants, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to show that defendants' conduct was extreme or outrageous under New Jersey law, noting that in a factually similar case, also decided under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, a Pennsylvania court had held that a city and police department that suspended their police captain for 15 days and transferred her after she testified on behalf of a former subordinate had not engaged in conduct sufficiently outrageous to support an IIED claim. Smith v. Township of East Greenwich, 519 F.Supp.2d 493, 513, 514.

D.N.J.2006. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in ftn. Borrowers sued loan-servicing companies, alleging that defendants, among other things, wrongfully continued attempts to collect on borrowers' home mortgage loan after it was discharged in bankruptcy. This court, inter alia, denied defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiffs' claim for emotional-distress damages resulting from defendants' alleged wrongful actions, holding that such claims were highly fact sensitive and thus ill-suited for dismissal at an early stage. The court noted that plaintiffs might nevertheless face an uphill battle in establishing their claims, as common-law theories of intentional or negligent infliction of emotional distress required a showing of emotional distress so severe that no reasonable person could be expected to endure it. Hutchinson v. Delaware Sav. Bank FSB, 410 F.Supp.2d 374, 386.

D.N.J.2005. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. Pro se litigant filed complaint against neighbors, law firm, and others, who moved to dismiss and to have plaintiff declared a vexatious litigant. Granting the motion, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress failed because plaintiff presented nothing more than bald allegations to show that defendants engaged in any outrageous conduct toward her. Perry v. Gold & Laine, P.C., 371 F.Supp.2d 622, 627.

D.N.J.2001. Adopted in case quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. Former employee of county board of social services sued county board and supervisors for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that she was unlawfully subjected to disciplinary action and was later fired because she objected to defendants' imposition of a dress code. Granting in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's allegations of improper purpose on defendants' part in the form of retaliation and harassment did not alone provide the basis for a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress, since plaintiff failed to show that defendants' conduct was outrageous and operated to create an intolerable working environment. Marrero v. Camden County Bd. of Social Services, 164 F.Supp.2d 455, 479.

D.N.J.2001. Cit. in case quot. in disc. Condominium unit owners sued condominium association and board of trustees for violations of Fair Housing Act and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that after plaintiffs filed petition with Department of Housing and Urban Development objecting to exclusion of children from condominium's adult lounge, defendants responded by shunning and ostracizing plaintiffs and engaging in a campaign to discredit them. This court granted defendants summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that defendants' actions in response to what they perceived as unnecessary antagonism and meritless and expensive litigation caused by plaintiffs did not rise to the level of outrageous conduct required for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Sporn v. Ocean Colony Condominium Ass'n, 173 F.Supp.2d 244, 254.

D.N.J.2001. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee sued employer for Title VII violations and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that employees seeking promotions were required to take personality test that inappropriately asked for private sexual, medical, and religious information. This court dismissed in part, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to sufficiently allege an emotional-distress claim, because such standardized psychological testing for management positions had been used for several decades and thus was not utterly intolerable. The fact that test was given to hundreds of employees negated intentionality as to plaintiff. Moreover, plaintiff failed to allege that he suffered severe emotional distress. Witherspoon v. Rent-A-Center, Inc., 173 F.Supp.2d 239, 242.

D.N.J. 2000. Com. (j) cit. and quot. in disc. Settlement agreement and modified joint plan of reorganization were proposed in multidistrict litigation and bankruptcy proceeding involving Chapter 11 debtors, companies that marketed magazine subscriptions and other merchandise through sweepstakes contests. Certain holders of consumer claims objected to plan confirmation and/or settlement agreement. Approving settlement agreement and plan, district court held, inter alia, that (1) proposed plan satisfied “best interest of creditors” or “fairness” test; (2) proposed settlement was fair, adequate, and reasonable; (3) claims of objectors who believed that they had won significant sweepstakes prizes were not unique; and (4) allocation formula used to divide the refund pool in proportion to class members' purchases of debtors' products was fair, adequate, and reasonable. In re American Family Enterprises, 256 B.R. 377, 424.

D.N.J.2000. Cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in disc. and cit. in sup. Former employee who claimed that she had been sexually harassed by her supervisors sued former employer and supervisors for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Denying in part defendants' motion to dismiss, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's allegations that she was subjected to a continuous pattern of intolerable conduct, including denial of advancement and retaliation, after she rejected her supervisors' sexual advances were sufficient to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Calkins v. Dollarland, Inc., 117 F.Supp.2d 421, 431, 432.

D.N.J.2000. Quot. in case cit. in disc. Electronics-store owner who had been subject of county's civil consumer fraud action sued county and individual county employees in their official capacities, alleging, among other things, religious discrimination and intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress. The court granted defendants judgment on the pleadings, holding, inter alia, that owner failed to allege that defendants' actions, even if they were sufficiently extreme and outrageous, caused him to suffer severe emotional distress. Hassoun v. Cimmino, 126 F.Supp.2d 353, 371.

D.N.J.2000. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Worker sued employer for, inter alia, violations of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that he was routinely passed over for promotions in favor of younger, less qualified workers. Entering partial summary judgment for defendant, the court held, among other things, that plaintiff had failed to establish that he suffered an adverse employment action or that defendant's conduct was so extreme or outrageous as to allow recovery. Horvath v. Rimtec Corp., 102 F.Supp.2d 219, 236.

D.N.J.2000. Coms. quot. in case quot. in sup. Employee sued employer, supervisor, and various individuals to whom supervisor reported for violations of Title VII and the New Jersey Law Against Discrimination (LAD), alleging that she was subjected to a sexually hostile work environment. Plaintiff also asserted several common-law claims. Granting in part and denying in part defendants' motions for summary judgment, the court held that plaintiff's failure to establish an adverse employment action was fatal to her Title VII claim, that supervisor's managers were not liable for aiding and abetting supervisor's violations of the LAD, and that it would be premature to conclude that plaintiff could prove no set of facts that would allow her to recover under a theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Newsome v. Administrative Office of Courts, 103 F.Supp.2d 807, 825, judgment affirmed 51 Fed.Appx. 76 (3rd Cir.2002).

D.N.J.2000. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Plaintiff in wrongful-death action against vehicle manufacturer moved to supplement his complaint to add claims for defamation and intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with defendant's assertion that a faulty airbag was not the cause of death of driver, plaintiff's decedent, but that plaintiff murdered her. Granting the motion, the court held, in part, that, while plaintiff's allegations were sufficient to establish prime facie cases of defamation and intentional infliction of emotional distress, defendant would be allowed to argue that its allegation, made during the course of legal proceedings, was conditionally privileged. Thomas v. Ford Motor Co., 111 F.Supp.2d 529, 538, affirmed in part, reversed in part 137 F.Supp.2d 575 (2001).

D.N.J.1999. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. High school seniors who became drunk and disorderly on a class trip and were subsequently punished by exclusion from their graduation ceremony sued the school for violation of the Civil Rights Act and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. One of the students alleged that he suffered emotional distress when he was accidently left behind at an amusement park and was forced to take a cab back to the hotel where the students were staying. This court dismissed in part, holding, inter alia, that the emotional distress a high school senior suffered after missing the bus back to the hotel on a class trip was not so severe that no reasonable man could be expected to endure it. Carlino v. Gloucester City High School, 57 F.Supp.2d 1, 29, affirmed in part 44 Fed.Appx. 599 (3d Cir.2002).

D.N.J.1999. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Terminated employee sued employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress and state and federal civil-rights violations. This court granted defendants summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that defendants' conduct was not extreme and outrageous, because defendants did not engage in any harassing conduct, they conducted themselves in a businesslike manner, and they never physically threatened or yelled at plaintiff. Lemke v. International Total Services, Inc., 56 F.Supp.2d 472, 488.

D.N.J.1999. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Former employee who alleged that former employer's policies and practices unlawfully discriminated against her sued former employer for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting defendant's motion for partial dismissal, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state a viable claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Since plaintiff did not allege that she had to seek medical assistance or that any specific ailments afflicted her, she failed to establish that the emotional distress she suffered was so severe that no reasonable person could be expected to endure it. Mardini v. Viking Freight, Inc., 92 F.Supp.2d 378, 384.

D.N.J.1999. Com. (d) cit. generally in case cit. in disc. After being fired, a female employee sued her employer for wrongful discharge and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that she was entitled to a leave from employment because of the birth of her child and that she was discriminated against because of her pregnancy or family status. This court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because defendant's actions of discharging plaintiff after the birth of her child and after five months of paid sick leave did not rise to the level of intentional and outrageous conduct. McConnell v. State Farm Mut. Ins. Co., 61 F.Supp.2d 356, 363.

D.N.J.1998. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Telephone-company technician sued company, supervisors, and co-worker for violations of the New Jersey Law Against Discrimination (NJLAD), alleging that she was discriminated against on the basis of her gender, and that co-worker's sex-based remarks and violent outbursts amounted to intentional infliction of emotional distress. Defendants moved for summary judgment. Granting the motions in part and denying them in part, the court held, inter alia, that supervisors' failure to remedy the situation once they were made aware of co-worker's alleged sexual harassment of plaintiff was insufficient to support the imposition of individual liability under NJLAD; that material factual issues existed as to plaintiff's sexual-discrimination and hostile-work-environment claims against telephone company; and that co-worker's conduct, though rude and unacceptable, did not rise to the level of outrageousness necessary to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Ferraro v. Bell Atlantic Co., Inc., 2 F.Supp.2d 577, 588.

D.N.J.1998. Quot. in case quot. in sup., coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Plaintiff sued the United States, among others, for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA), alleging that he was wrongfully arrested and imprisoned pursuant to an arrest warrant issued for a different individual. Granting in part defendant's motion to dismiss, the court held, inter alia, that a two-and-one-half-hour airport detention of plaintiff by agents of the Immigration and Naturalization Service following plaintiff's arrival from the Dominican Republic, absent any allegations that plaintiff was beaten, held under unbearable conditions, or otherwise severely mistreated in any manner during this period, did not rise to the level of outrageous and extreme conduct necessary to support a claim under the FTCA for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Moreover, plaintiff failed to allege that he suffered any specific traumatic symptoms that would support an inference that the detention resulted in severe emotional distress that no reasonable person could be expected to endure. Ramirez v. U.S., 998 F.Supp. 425, 434.

D.N.J.1998. Cit. in headnote, quot. in case quot. in disc. An insured parent whose children had cystic fibrosis sued her excess health insurer and administrator to recover for the insurer's failure to issue a policy with a $25,000, rather than a $50,000, deductible. Among other things, plaintiff asserted that by denying coverage defendants intentionally inflicted emotional distress on plaintiff. Plaintiff argued that defendants threatened to sue plaintiff before the Division of Insurance Fraud Prevention when they knowingly lacked a factual or legal basis. This court granted in part and denied in part defendants' motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that defendants' refusal to issue the policy at the $25,000 deductible base, even with knowledge of plaintiff's dire financial need, could not be construed as outrageous conduct. The court stated that, while defendants' conduct may have constituted breach of contract or fraud, insurance companies regularly deny coverage or place conditions on its issuance in situations similar to this one. Yourman By and Through Yourman v. People's Sec. Life, 992 F.Supp. 696, 697, 705.

D.N.J.1997. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. White male former university employee sued university and university officials for, inter alia, violations of the American with Disabilities Act (ADA) and the New Jersey Law Against Discrimination (NJLAD), and for the common law tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with his dismissal. Defendants moved for summary judgment on the ground that plaintiff was discharged for poor performance. Granting defendants' motions, the court held, in part, that plaintiff's ADA claim was barred for failure to exhaust all administrative remedies; that plaintiff had not established a prima facie case of unlawful discrimination under the NJLAD; and that defendants' alleged wrongdoing, which included making a few stray, sarcastic comments in plaintiff's presence, did not rise to the level of extreme outrageousness necessary to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Ditzel v. Univ. of Medicine & Dentistry New Jersey, 962 F.Supp. 595, 608.

D.N.J.1997. Quot. in case quot. in disc. An arrestee sued police detectives and a city under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, alleging his constitutional rights were violated when defendants wrongfully arrested him. Plaintiff argued that defendants' actions in wrongfully arresting him without probable cause and failing to properly investigate the shooting while he remained in jail for eight days over Thanksgiving were extreme and outrageous and utterly intolerable. This court granted defendants summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because defendants' conduct was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous. Green v. City of Paterson, 971 F.Supp. 891, 911.

D.N.J.1997. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. An employee of a water-works commission sued a water-works commissioner for Title VII violations and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that defendant created a hostile work environment and retaliated against her for filing an incident report after the two had an argument. Plaintiff alleged that the commissioner implied that she drove her husband to commit suicide, when, in fact, he died from cancer. This court granted defendant partial summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state a viable emotional-distress claim, because she did not show that she suffered any distress from the comment about her husband's suicide. The court noted that defendant's comment that plaintiff's husband committed suicide because plaintiff talked too much and nagged him could reopen her emotional scars and that this comment constituted outrageous conduct. Lombardi v. Cosgrove, 7 F.Supp.2d 481, 498.

D.N.J.1997. Coms. (d) and (j) cit. generally in headnotes and quot. in case quot. in sup. A former employee whose varicose veins caused her pain and limited the amount of time she could remain standing sued her former employer for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that she had taken the job as shirt-cuff cutter in return for the concession that she could work parttime in a sit-down position but that defendant had terminated her employment without attempting to accommodate her. The court granted defendant summary judgment on plaintiff's emotional-distress claim, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff presented no evidence that defendant's conduct in discharging her was outrageous or that she suffered severe emotional distress. Plaintiff's understandable frustration and depression over losing her job did not rise to the level of severe distress. Nieves v. Individualized Shirts, 961 F.Supp. 782, 784, 797.

D.N.J.1997. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in disc. Former telephone-company employee who claimed to have been terminated because of his age, race, and nationality sued former employer for, inter alia, violations of 42 U.S.C. §§ 1985, 1986, and 1988. Employee also asserted various common law claims, including one for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Entering summary judgment for employer, the court held, in part, that after employer rebutted employee's prima facie case of age, race, and national origin discrimination, employee failed to show that the articulated reason for his termination was merely a pretext for discrimination, and that the circumstances leading to employee's dismissal did not constitute conduct so extreme and outrageous as to give rise to a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Silvestre v. Bell Atlantic Corp., 973 F.Supp. 475, 487.

D.N.J.1997. Cit. in case quot. in disc. After plaintiff's defamation case was removed to federal court, plaintiff moved to remand his case to state court on the ground that defendant failed to remove the action within 30 days of service of the complaint. Denying the motion, this court held that, since plaintiff's complaint did not reveal on its face a specific amount that plaintiff claimed as damages, nor did it indicate that plaintiff's damages were in excess of the minimum required for federal diversity jurisdiction, the 30-day removal period commenced when defendant received the statement of damages, from which he could first ascertain the amount of damages sought. The court noted that a case involving a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress marked the Third Circuit's move away from an inquiry as to what a defendant knew or should have known toward a focus on the actual language of the pleadings. Vartanian v. Terzian, 960 F.Supp. 58, 60.

D.N.J.1995. Cit. but dist. Port Authority engineer who alleged he received disproportionate merit increases, was denied promotions, and was transferred to less enviable positions in retaliation for filing a complaint of racial discrimination with the EEOC sued employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Employer moved for summary judgment. Granting the motion, the court held that, based on the facts presented, engineer failed to show that employer engaged in conduct that was atrocious or utterly intolerable to a civilized society or that it caused him to suffer severe mental distress. King v. Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, 909 F.Supp. 938, 943.

D.N.J.1994. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. A program administrator who was stricken with cancer sued a computer equipment company for discrimination, breach of contract, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that employer unjustly rejected her applications for promotion, impermissibly announced her disability at a management meeting, refused to allow her to leave work for chemotherapy treatments, demoted her, and threatened her with discharge. This court granted in part and denied in part defendant's motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff alleged a litany of facts that could support an emotional-distress claim. It noted that plaintiff alleged a continuing pattern of harassment, which several courts had found adequate to survive a motion to dismiss. Bishop v. Okidata, Inc., 864 F.Supp. 416, 427.

D.N.J.1994. Cit. in headnotes, cit. in sup., com. (d) cit. in headnote and quot. but dist., com. (j) quot. in case cit. in ftn. Dismissed employee sued former employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress allegedly suffered when he was discharged in a manner that violated defendant's discharge policy and guidelines as set forth in its employee handbook. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment on this point but reserving issues of handbook interpretation and plaintiff's expectations under it for trial, the court held that despite plaintiff's allegations that defendant's conduct had left him demoralized and discouraged, he had not shown that it was so obnoxious or repugnant that no reasonable member of a civilized society could be expected to endure the resulting distress. Sellitto v. Litton Systems, Inc., 881 F.Supp. 932, 934, 941.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

D.N.J.1993. Cit. in sup., coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. in sup. Employee who resigned sued her former employer and supervisor for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that her supervisor made demeaning remarks about women and disparaging remarks about her fiance and that her employer allowed this hostile work environment to exist, as a result of which she suffered great emotional distress. Granting defendants' motion to dismiss, the court held that neither defendant employer's negligent failure to supervise defendant supervisor and provide plaintiff with a nonhostile working environment nor defendant supervisor's offensive comments and attempts to initiate unwanted conversations rose to the level of outrageousness necessary to support plaintiff's claim under New Jersey law. Obendorfer v. Gitano Group, Inc., 838 F.Supp. 950, 954, 955.

D.N.J.1992. Com. (j) quot. in disc. and quot. in case quot. in disc. Parents who alleged that their child was injured during birth brought a medical malpractice action against the treating physicians, including a claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress. Denying defendants' motion for partial summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiffs' evidence that they observed the injury to their child as a result of medical negligence and that the distress they experienced after his injury was continual, frequent, and profound raised a jury question as to whether their emotional distress was sufficiently severe to support their claim. Phillips v. Cooper OB/GYN Associates, 811 F.Supp. 1018, 1024, 1025.

D.N.J.1991. Cit. in disc., coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. A terminated employee sued his former employer and supervisors for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Before terminating the plaintiff, the defendant had placed him on probation several times for violating company and FAA safety regulations and had issued internal reports regarding the plaintiff's poor performance. In addition, the defendants had required the plaintiff to attend counseling sessions dealing with his poor performance. The court granted the defendants summary judgment, holding that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover for intentional infliction of emotional distress because he failed to produce evidence of extreme and outrageous conduct by the defendants directed at him. In addition, the court said that the plaintiff proffered no evidence to support a finding that he suffered severe emotional distress; at no time did the plaintiff consult a doctor regarding his anxiety. Fregara v. Jet Aviation Business Jets, 764 F.Supp. 940, 956.

D.N.J.1991. Cit. in disc., coms. (d) and (j) quot. in cases quot. in disc. A franchisor terminated its franchise agreement with a corporate franchisee. The corporate franchisee sued the franchisor alleging, inter alia, that it suffered severe emotional distress as a result of the franchisor divulging financial and personal information about the franchisee and its president to a potential buyer of the franchise. The franchisee also sought to amend this count of the complaint to include its president as a plaintiff. The district court denied leave to amend and dismissed this count, holding that the complaint stated no cause of action for emotional distress suffered by the franchisee, a corporation. The court stated that even if the president of the franchisee was added as a plaintiff, the divulgences alleged did not rise to the level of outrageousness and atrociousness required to recover under this theory. Glenside West Corp. v. Exxon Co., U.S.A., 761 F.Supp. 1100, 1113.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

D.N.J.1990. Quot. in sup. A black female employee who was discharged by her employer sued the employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. The court dismissed the claim on the ground that the plaintiff's allegations did not support a conclusion that the defendant's conduct was so extreme and outrageous as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency. The court said that the plaintiff had difficulty presenting facts that would indicate racial prejudice during her six weeks at the defendant's firm, she did not seek any professional help for emotional distress, and she did not offer a report of a psychiatric expert in support of her emotional distress claim. Butler v. Sherman, Silverstein & Kohl, P.C., 755 F.Supp. 1259, 1267.

D.N.J.1990. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (h) quot. in disc., com. (j) cit. and quot. in case quot. in sup. Parents of a patient who died while being treated at a hospital sued the hospital and the treating physicians for negligence and medical malpractice. The parents also sued one of the physicians for intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress after he allegedly performed an invasive medical procedure on the decedent's dead body. Granting the physician's motion for summary judgment concerning the claim for intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress, this court held, inter alia, that the plaintiffs could not maintain a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, finding as a matter of law that the plaintiffs did not suffer emotional distress so severe that no reasonable person could be expected to endure it. It indicated that the plaintiffs' anger, grief, stress, and insomnia was insufficiently severe distress so as to allow recovery. Lacy v. Cooper Hospital/University Medical Center, 745 F.Supp. 1029, 1034-1035.

D.N.J.1990. Cit. in disc., coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case cit. in disc. An employee was terminated from his position as manager for falsifying reports after an investigation by the employer. The employee sued the employer alleging wrongful discharge, breach of an oral contract, false imprisonment, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and violation of the state statute against discrimination. This court granted the employer's motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that there was no bargained-for exchange to enforce any oral agreement and that the conduct of the supervisors in investigating the employee's conduct did not as a matter of law amount to false imprisonment or intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court stated that the organization and implementation of an investigation into the falsification of business reports were acceptable business practices and did not amount to outrageous behavior. Likewise, the supervisors' act of raising their voice in the context of an investigation into an employee's wrongdoing was not outrageous conduct. Maietta v. United Parcel Service, Inc., 749 F.Supp. 1344, 1367-1368, affirmed 932 F.2d 960 (3d Cir.1991).

D.N.J.1990. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (g) quot. in disc. A beer manufacturer obtained an order to seize merchandise marketed and manufactured by a sportswear company and sold by a T-shirt company that wrongfully used trademarks owned by the beer manufacturer. The beer manufacturer sued the sportswear company, its president, and the T-shirt store for federal and common law copyright and trademark infringement and unfair competition. The defendants counterclaimed, alleging in part that the trademark seizure action was an intentional infliction of emotional distress and constituted malicious interference with contract. This court granted partial summary judgment in favor of the plaintiff, holding, inter alia, that the plaintiff's conduct did not rise to the level of outrageousness needed to create a triable issue on the counterclaim. The court stated that mere evidence that ex parte seizure legal proceedings were being instituted against the defendants was insufficient to support a claim that the resulting mental distress was so severe that no reasonable person could withstand it. It also rejected both the defendants' counterclaim alleging malicious interference with contract and the sportswear company's assertion that it had printed the shirts in reliance on the apparent authority of one of the plaintiff's licensees. Major League Baseball Promotion v. Colour-Tex, 729 F.Supp. 1035, 1054, 1054-1055.

D.N.J.1988. Cit. in disc., com. (d) cit. and quot. in disc. A discharged employee sued his former employers and two of their officers for wrongful termination and the resulting emotional distress. This court, inter alia, granted the corporate defendants' motions for summary judgment on the employee's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that termination of employment, standing alone, could not support a claim for emotional distress; evidence of some sort of harassing behavior was necessary in addition to the termination. Borecki v. Eastern Intern. Management Corp., 694 F.Supp. 47, 61, 62.

D.N.J.1988. Quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in part in case quot. in disc. A distributor settled with several creditors in a lawsuit that alleged fraud, negligence, and racketeering; the settlement agreement contained a clause stating that terms of the settlement were to remain confidential. After a creditor released a statement to several trade publications disclosing the filing of the fraud and racketeering suit, the distributor sued the creditor for defamation, breach of contract, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment on the intentional infliction of emotional distress claim, holding that the plaintiff's allegation that the defendant's actions were egregious because they were intentional was insufficient to support a claim, and that the plaintiff had not produced evidence of outrageous conduct and emotional distress, which are required elements of the tort. The court further justified its grant of summary judgment by noting the availability of damages for emotional distress in the underlying defamation claim. Kramer v. Monogram Models, Inc., 700 F.Supp. 1348, 1357, judgment reversed 875 F.2d 66 (3d Cir.1989).

D.N.J.1988. Quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. In separate actions, individuals arrested for petty disorderly offenses sued a borough, a county, and several law enforcement officers under a federal civil rights statute and state law theories, including intentional infliction of emotional distress. After consolidation of the suits, the court granted in part and denied in part the parties' cross-motions for summary judgment, denying the defendants' motion for summary judgment on the intentional infliction of emotional distress claim. The court stated that a fact issue existed as to whether the strip/body cavity searches the plaintiffs were subjected to after they were arrested without a warrant constituted extreme and outrageous conduct going beyond all possible bounds of decency. O'Brien v. Borough of Woodbury Heights, 679 F.Supp. 429, 439, 440.

D.N.J.1987. Cit. in sup. A terminated employee sued her former employer and some of its employees alleging, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The court denied defendants' motion and held that a factual dispute existed as to whether the standard of intentional infliction of emotional distress had been established by the plaintiff. The court explained that liability was imposed for intentional infliction of emotional distress when the conduct was found to exceed all bounds usually tolerated by decent society and when the actions were especially calculated to cause and did cause serious mental distress; furthermore, other courts have found a substantial issue of fact as to whether alleged harassment by an employer constituted intentional infliction of emotional distress. Porta v. Rollins Environmental Services (NJ), Inc., 654 F.Supp. 1275, 1285, judgment affirmed 845 F.2d 1014 (3d Cir.1988).

D.N.J.1986. Cit. in disc. A company relocated its offices and offered financial assistance to any employees who desired to move with the company. One employee who relocated was later terminated in a cost-cutting move. Although the company assisted this employee in gaining new employment, the ex-employee sued it for breach of an implied employment agreement and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that the defendant's conduct did not rise to the level of outrageous conduct required to sustain a cause of action. Brunner v. Abex Corp., 661 F.Supp. 1351, 1359.

D.N.J.1983. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. The plaintiff, a patron of the defendant casino, had a history of problems with the management. On one occasion, the plaintiff was evicted and ordered not to return. When the patron did return, the defendant's security guards arrested her. Plaintiff sued for damages on several counts, including intentional infliction of emotional distress. Because there was considerable factual dispute over the circumstances that led to the arrest and the specific incident itself, the defendant's motion for summary judgment was denied. Roth v. Golden Nugget Casino/Hotel, Inc., 576 F.Supp. 262, 267, 268.

D.N.M.

D.N.M.2023. Com. (g) cit. in sup. and quot. in case cit. in sup. Minor citizen of Guatemala, who was separated from her father when she illegally crossed the border from Mexico into New Mexico with her father when she was two years old, sued the United States under the Federal Tort Claims Act, alleging that the government's treatment of her constituted an intentional infliction of emotional distress under New Mexico law. This court granted the government's motion to dismiss for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction under the Act, holding that plaintiff's emotional-distress claim had no state-law analog, because the government's conduct did not violate federal law. The court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46 in noting that some outrageous conduct was privileged, and that the prime example of privileged conduct was conduct that a defendant had a legal right to perform. S.E.B.M. by and through Felipe v. United States, 659 F.Supp.3d 1249, 1264.

D.N.M.2020. Cit. in sup., cit. and quot. in case quot. in sup. Tree-crew laborer sued former employer, general manager, supervisor, and several coworkers, alleging, among other things, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with the events leading up to his termination. This court granted in part defendants' motion to dismiss, with leave to amend, holding that plaintiff failed to specify which acts made up his claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and which defendants committed those acts. The court noted that the Supreme Court of New Mexico had adopted Restatement Second of Torts § 46, which set forth the elements that a plaintiff was required to prove in order to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Lucero v. Board of Directors of Jemez Mountains Cooperative, Inc., 495 F.Supp.3d 1135, 1174, 1175.

D.N.M.2019. Cit. in case cit. in disc. Arrestee brought, inter alia, a claim for false arrest against police officer, alleging that defendant lacked the lawful authority to arrest him. This court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding that the record reflected that defendant had probable cause to effectuate plaintiff's arrest. The court noted that it looked to the Restatement Second of Torts to determine when a claim for false arrest accrued, because New Mexico caselaw had adopted Restatement sections such as §§ 46, 324A, 496B, 766, and 766B, and frequently followed the Restatement when developing new tort areas. Favela v. City of Las Cruces ex rel. Las Cruces Police Department, 398 F.Supp.3d 858, 924.

D.N.M.2019. Cit. in case cit. in ftn. Consumer filed various claims against seller of a discounted medical-benefit plan and insurance broker, alleging that broker, acting on behalf of seller, repeatedly called and texted her cellular telephone number with a pre-recorded message or artificial voice without her consent, even though she did not have a business relationship with seller or broker and had registered her number with the National Do Not Call Registry. This court denied in part seller's motion to dismiss, holding that consumer stated a claim for civil conspiracy under New Mexico law by alleging wrongful acts and a close relationship between seller and broker. In making its decision, the court noted that the Supreme Court of New Mexico had been very willing to adopt the view of the Restatement of Torts to assist in the development of new tort areas, and that it had adopted large swaths of tort law from the Restatement Second of Torts, including § 46, which articulated a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Mohon v. Agentra LLC, 400 F.Supp.3d 1189, 1239.

D.N.M.2017. Cit. in case quot. in disc.; com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Corporation filed, inter alia, a claim for intentional interference with prospective contractual relations against union that conducted an organized campaign in a labor dispute in response to plaintiff's failure to recognize defendant as employees' representative. This court denied plaintiff's request for injunctive relief, holding that plaintiff's tortious-interference claim was preempted by federal labor laws governing a union's secondary activities and that plaintiff failed to demonstrate clear proof of defendant's involvement in any alleged tortious conduct. The court explained that common law governed harassment claims and that the New Mexico Supreme Court recognized the definition of the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress as set forth in Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Firebird Structures, LLC v. United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, Local Union No. 1505, 252 F.Supp.3d 1132, 1184.

D.N.M.2016. Cit. and quot. in sup., cit. and quot. in cases cit. and quot. in sup.; com. (d) quot. in sup. Former employee brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against former employer in connection with allegations that her former supervisor belittled and berated her, demoted her, and ultimately terminated her. This court granted in part employer's motion to dismiss, holding, among other things, that employee failed to state a claim for IIED under New Mexico law. The court noted that New Mexico courts followed the definition of extreme and outrageous conduct set forth in Restatement Second of Torts § 46, and reasoned that the supervisor's alleged conduct in belittling and berating employee for not being able to complete certain course work in preparation for attempting to obtain a trades degree was not so extreme and outrageous as to state an IIED claim. Benavidez v. Sandia National Laboratories, 212 F.Supp.3d 1039, 1067, 1068, 1090.

D.N.M.2016. Cit. in ftn., quot. in case quot. in sup.; com. (c) quot. in sup. (quoting § 45 of T.D. No. 5, 2007, which is now § 46 of the Official Text); com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup.; com. (e) cit. in case quot. in sup. Former employee at a plant that processed cheese and dairy products brought a claim for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against former employer in connection with allegations that her supervisors sprayed her with water so as to expose her undergarments and the outline of her anatomy approximately three times per week during the seven years of her employment. This court denied in part employer's motion to dismiss, holding that employee sufficiently alleged outrageous conduct in support of her IIED claim. The court explained that a reasonable juror could find that supervisors' alleged conduct, in regularly spraying employee with water in a physically invasive and humiliating manner, went beyond the bounds of decency and constituted outrageous conduct within the meaning of Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Hartwell v. Southwest Cheese Company, LLC, 276 F.Supp.3d 1188, 1214, 1215.

D.N.M.2016. Cit. in cases cit. and quot. in disc. Following his arrest for driving under the influence where the toxicology test was negative for alcohol and positive for prescription medications, disabled arrestee brought an action against county, sheriff's department, and deputy, alleging discrimination under the Americans with Disabilities Act, false arrest, false imprisonment, and malicious abuse of process under state law. This court granted partial summary judgment for defendants on the discrimination claim, holding that plaintiff was arrested pursuant to probable cause, and declined to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over the remaining claims, remanding them to state court. The court explained that, while the Supreme Court of New Mexico had not addressed when a cause of action for false arrest or false imprisonment accrued, it often followed the view of the Restatement Second of Torts, noting that the court had adopted the elements of the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress as set forth in § 46. Trujillo v. Rio Arriba County ex rel. Rio Arriba County Sheriff's Department, 319 F.R.D. 571, 623.

D.N.M.2014. Adopted and cit. in cases cit. and quot. in disc. In arrestee's action against county and director of a detention center following his arrest and incarceration based on a bench warrant that had been cancelled, this court noted that New Mexico courts had not stated when a plaintiff's causes of action for false arrest and for false imprisonment accrued; however, the Restatement Second of Torts provided that the statute of limitations for false imprisonment and false arrest began to run only when the imprisonment ended, and New Mexico courts often looked to the law as stated in the Restatement Second of Torts, adopting, for instance, the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress, as articulated in § 46. Chavez v. County of Bernalillo, 3 F.Supp.3d 936, 985, 986.

D.N.M.2013. Cit. in cases quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup., com. (e) quot. in case quot. in sup. Physician brought various claims against, among others, medical center's chief medical officer, chairman of its board of trustees, and a member of its medical executive committee, after defendants temporarily and then indefinitely suspended his medical privileges at medical center and imposed harsh requirements for regaining those privileges. Granting in part and denying in part defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held that, while reasonable minds could conclude that chief medical officer's conduct —in, among other things, including clearly false statements about plaintiff in his reports to the state medical board—rose to the level of being extreme and outrageous, the same was not true for the remaining defendants' actions in allegedly violating plaintiff's due-process rights. Osuagwu v. Gila Regional Medical Center, 938 F.Supp.2d 1180, 1195.

D.N.M.2010. Adopted in cases cit. in sup. In this case in which this court predicted that the Supreme Court of New Mexico would adopt the approach of the Restatement Second of Torts that the statute of limitations for false-arrest and false-imprisonment claims under New Mexico law began to run when the imprisonment ended, the court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46 for the proposition that New Mexico courts had been very willing to adopt the view of the Restatement to assist their development of new tort areas. Gose v. Board of County Com'rs of County of McKinley, 727 F.Supp.2d 1256, 1261.

D.N.M.2005. Com. (i) quot. in sup. Current and former subdivision residents sued operators of adjacent uranium milling facility for contaminating groundwater aquifers that served as residents' sole source of water. Denying defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held, among other things, that the continuous, hazardous contamination alleged by plaintiffs would be sure to cause distress to whomever was going to use the water. The court noted that the intent element of the tort was met when the actor knew that distress was certain, or substantially certain, to result from his conduct, or when the actor acted recklessly, in deliberate disregard of a high degree of probability that the emotional distress would follow. Wilcox v. Homestake Mining Co., 401 F.Supp.2d 1196, 1202.

D.N.M.2001. Com. (d) cit. in case cit. in sup. Hispanic former employee sued former employer for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that isolated racial remarks by supervisor and co-workers and retaliatory treatment, including close monitoring by supervisor and receipt of multiple reprimands, though callous and distasteful, were not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Rodriguez v. America Online, 183 F.Supp.2d 1340, 1358.

D.N.M.2001. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Insured who had suffered a stroke sued insurer for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress after insurer terminated her disability benefits. Granting defendant's motion for partial summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that when, as here, an insurer's decision to terminate disability benefits did not rise to the level of bad faith, that decision could not be characterized as the extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to maintain an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Yumukoglu v. Provident Life & Acc. Ins. Co., 131 F.Supp.2d 1215, 1228, affirmed 36 Fed.Appx. 378 (10th Cir.2002).

D.N.M.1999. Quot. generally in case quot. in disc. Former hospital employees sued a doctor and the hospital for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that the doctor routinely made disparaging and offensive remarks pertaining to minorities and women, repeatedly used offensive, inappropriate language regarding race and gender in public in the department, made physical contact with plaintiffs, and interfered with their employment duties. This court denied in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that reasonable minds could conclude that the doctor's conduct rose to the level of being outrageous. Nieto v. Kapoor, 61 F.Supp.2d 1177, 1182, opinion affirmed 268 F.3d 1208 (10th Cir.2001).

D.N.M.1998. Cit. in case cit. in disc. A job applicant sued an insurance company for Title VII violations, breach of contract, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that the insurer discriminated against her because of her gender in not appointing her as the insurer's agent to succeed her father, for whom she had worked for several years. This court granted the insurer summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that the insurer's altering the qualifications for its agents and failure to create an opening for plaintiff did not constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress. Ewing v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 6 F.Supp.2d 1281, 1290.

D.N.M.1997. Quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (h) quot. in case quot. in disc. A transsexual sued a magazine for defamation, invasion of privacy, interference with business relations, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and prima facie tort. The article referred to plaintiff's status as a transsexual and examined plaintiff's involvement in two lawsuits filed against her by the SEC for alleged securities law violations. One suit was filed before plaintiff's sex change and the other was filed afterward. This court granted defendants' motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state an emotional-distress claim, because there was nothing extreme or outrageous about defendant's conduct. The court stated that the references to plaintiff's transsexual status were highly relevant to the central inquiry of the article. Although the article made numerous references to plaintiff's sex, gender, and transsexual status, the article did not contain defamatory falsehood. Schuler v. McGraw-Hill Companies, Inc., 989 F.Supp. 1377, 1390, judgment affirmed 145 F.3d 1346 (10th Cir.1998).

D.N.M.1996. Com. (d) quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. in case cit. in disc. The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission sued an employer for allegedly violating the Americans with Disabilities Act by retaliating against and terminating an employee who suffered from AIDS. The former employee intervened as plaintiff, alleging, in part, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting, in part, defendant's motion for judgment as a matter of law, the court held, inter alia, that defendant's alleged wrongful conduct did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court stated that the most egregious conduct alleged to have occurred in this case happened at an employee meeting that plaintiff-intervenor did not attend, and that the alleged statements by defendant's owner at the meeting, that plaintiff-intervenor would be transferred around until he quit and that people with AIDS should be placed in colonies, raised only an inference of improper motivation. E.E.O.C. v. MTS Corp., 937 F.Supp. 1503, 1514.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

D.N.M.1986. Cit. in sup., coms. (d) and (h) quot. in sup. An employee sued her former employer, alleging discriminatory employment policies and seeking relief under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act and under state tort law. The court dismissed the employee's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that the employer's conduct was not so extreme and outrageous as to state a claim for this tort. The court noted that, although the employer's method of terminating the employee was unpleasant and hurtful, this behavior was not on par with the egregiousness of facts in cases that did successfully raise intentional infliction of emotional distress claims, such as behavior involving serious racial slurs. Salazar v. Furr's Inc., 629 F.Supp. 1403, 1411.

D.N.M.Bkrtcy.Ct.

D.N.M.Bkrtcy.Ct.2018. Cit. in sup., cit. in case quot. in sup.; com. (d) quot. in sup. Former romantic partner of Chapter 7 debtor brought an adversary proceeding against debtor, alleging that debtor was liable for giving her genital herpes and that his debt to her was nondischargeable. After a bench trial, this court held that, while debtor was liable to plaintiff for civil battery, and the debt arising from the battery was nondischargeable on the ground that debtor's actions were willful and malicious, plaintiff failed to state a claim against debtor for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court reasoned that debtor's conduct was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under New Mexico law or Restatement Second of Torts § 46. In re Bolles, 593 B.R. 832, 840, 841.

E.D.N.Y.

E.D.N.Y.2021. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in sup. Prominent saxophonist brought a claim for libel against aspiring saxophonist; defendant counterclaimed for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), alleging that plaintiff used his age and prominence to manipulate her into a sexual relationship, threaten her career, withhold performance opportunities, and threaten her with legal action. This court denied defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding that defendant's counterclaim for IIED failed as a matter of law. Quoting Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, the court explained that the alleged conduct against defendant did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to sustain an IIED claim. Coleman v. Grand, 523 F.Supp.3d 244, 266.

E.D.N.Y.2019. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Senior public-school teachers brought, among other things, claims of intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against principal, assistant principal, and department of education, alleging that defendants harassed plaintiffs, cursed at them, and repeatedly told them that they were going to terminate senior teachers. This court granted in part defendants' motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiffs failed to state an IIED claim. The court explained that defendants' conduct, while insulting and tortious, did not rise to the level of outrageousness needed under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, to sustain an IIED claim. Lebowitz v. New York City Department of Education, 407 F.Supp.3d 158, 180.

E.D.N.Y.2011. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Athletic trainer who told federal investigators that he had injected a major-league-baseball player with steroids sued player, asserting, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). Granting defendant's motion to dismiss the IIED claim, this court held that that claim was duplicative of plaintiff's causes of action alleging defamation and malicious prosecution; while defendant's revelation of private medical information about plaintiff's child was the only nonduplicative basis for plaintiff's IIED claim, the claim failed because the disclosure of that information did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to support an IIED claim. McNamee v. Clemens, 762 F.Supp.2d 584, 610.

E.D.N.Y.2005. Com. (d) cit. in sup. United States citizens injured in and survivors of United States citizens killed in suicide bombing in Israel sued Jordanian bank under federal Anti-Terrorism Act and asserted a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that the bank knowingly provided terrorist organizations with financial services and other support. After denial of preliminary injunction, this court granted bank's motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that although the bank was liable under the federal Anti-Terrorism Act for supporting terrorist activities by intentionally creating and administering death and dismemberment benefit plans for families of suicide bombers, its conduct was too removed from the actual suicide attack, and thus not sufficiently outrageous or extreme, to support common-law claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Linde v. Arab Bank, PLC, 384 F.Supp.2d 571, 590.

E.D.N.Y.2004. Com. (d) cit. in disc. Former executive chef who was fired and charged with petit larceny for allegedly stealing restaurant equipment brought suit for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress against corporation that owned restaurant where he was employed, as well as two of its officers. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment on the emotional-distress claim, the court determined, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to allege any conduct by defendants that was sufficiently "extreme and outrageous" as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency and be regarded as intolerable in a civilized community. Lawson v. New York Billiards Corp., 331 F.Supp.2d 121, 131.

E.D.N.Y.2000. Cit. in disc., coms. (d) and (e) quot. in disc., illus. 11 and 19 cit. in disc. Husband and wife who were ultimately acquitted of criminal charges arising from their involvement in an attempted drug sting sued customs agents, air courier that cooperated with agents in the operation, and city police officers for violations of 42 U.S.C. § 1983. Defendants moved for summary judgment. Granting the motions in part and denying them in part, the court held, inter alia, that, while a private actor enlisted by law enforcement could, in certain situations, claim qualified immunity from liability for its part in an official's abuse of authority, courier was not entitled to such immunity, since a reasonable private person in its position would not have believed that the official conduct here was not patently abusive, and that plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, though adequately pled, appeared time-barred. Mejia v. City of New York, 119 F.Supp.2d 232, 285, 286.

E.D.N.Y.1999. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee who had been diagnosed with Type I diabetes sued his former employer for disability-based discrimination in violation of federal and state law and asserted a state-law claim for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held, in part, that supervisor's phone call to plaintiff in the hospital, informing plaintiff that he had received a poor performance appraisal and would have to return the company car, and termination of plaintiff's employment immediately on his return from disability leave did not constitute intentional and outrageous conduct necessary to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Burke v. Royal Insurance Co., 39 F.Supp.2d 251, 262.

E.D.N.Y.1999. Com. (d) cit. and quot. in disc. A white former teacher at a Catholic elementary school sued the school for intentional infliction of emotional distress and Title VII employment discrimination, among other claims, alleging that the school schemed to fire the white, lay teachers and replace them with Hispanic nuns from Argentina. Plaintiff also alleged that the school's assistant principal subjected her to pervasive verbal abuse and false ridicule of her self-esteem. This court granted defendant summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that, although the principal's conduct might have been unpleasant and unprofessional, it did not rise to the requisite extreme or outrageous level to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Ticali v. Roman Catholic Diocese of Brooklyn, 41 F.Supp.2d 249, 266, affirmed 201 F.3d 432 (2d Cir.1999).

E.D.N.Y.1998. Cit. in headnote, cit. in sup. Former employee sued deputy director of former employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with defendant's response to plaintiff's complaint of supervisor's sexual harassment. Defendant moved to dismiss. Denying the motion, the court held, in part, that material factual issues existed as to whether defendant, who allegedly made further unwanted sexual advances toward plaintiff as she was informing him of supervisor's actions, behaved so reprehensibly that plaintiff could maintain an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Archer v. Economic Opportunity Com'n of Nassau, 30 F.Supp.2d 600, 603, 610.

E.D.N.Y.1998. Cit. generally in case quot. in disc. A clerical employee for the county sued the county administrator and the city for, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that the administrator sexually harassed her. This court granted in part and denied in part the city's motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff had not alleged willful conduct on the city's part. Gryga v. Ganzman, 991 F.Supp. 105, 112, certification granted 1998 WL 229127 (E.D.N.Y1998).

E.D.N.Y.1998. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in disc. A telephone customer sued a phone company for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that a telemarketer employed by the company misrepresented certain features of its residential phone account program, inducing her to switch service from another company, and causing her to develop a phobia by which she mistrusted all telemarketers. This court dismissed plaintiff's complaint, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's emotional-distress claim failed, because defendant's conduct was not sufficiently outrageous. Katz v. MCI Telecommunications Corp., 14 F.Supp.2d 271, 275.

E.D.N.Y.1998. Cit. and quot. in disc. Former employee who alleged that she was sexually harassed by her supervisor sued former employer, among others, for, inter alia, intentional and reckless infliction of emotional distress, negligent hiring, negligent supervision, and negligent investigation. Granting defendant's motion to dismiss, the court held, in part, that the intentional-tort claim was time-barred, that New York did not recognize a cause of action for reckless infliction of emotional distress, and that New York's Workers' Compensation Law provided the exclusive remedy for negligently inflicted employment-related injuries. Stordeur v. Computer Associates Intern., Inc., 995 F.Supp. 94, 102.

E.D.N.Y.1998. Cit. in headnote, com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Former husband sued investment company, former wife's divorce attorney, and state court justices for actions connected with a divorce, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. Plaintiff alleged that the attorney's behavior caused plaintiff to incur large legal fees and dissipation of marital assets. This court dismissed the emotional distress claim against the attorney, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to prove outrageous conduct, because advocating on behalf of one's client in a divorce proceeding typically results in the opposition's incurring such costs. Vasile v. Dean Witter Reynolds Inc., 20 F.Supp.2d 465, 472, 496, affirmed 205 F.3d 1327 (2d Cir.2000).

E.D.N.Y.1997. Com. (d) cit. generally in headnotes and quot. in case quot. in sup. Insured sued insurer for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress after insurer denied her coverage claim under her fire insurance policy. Dismissing the case, the court held, inter alia, that, even if defendant knew that it would not honor plaintiff's insurance claim, its insistence that plaintiff remain in the United States during the period that the claim was allegedly being evaluated, causing her to postpone trips to Israel to visit her ailing mother, was not conduct that was sufficiently outrageous in character or extreme in degree to maintain an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress; plaintiff was free to leave the United States and resolve her insurance claim upon her return. The court stated that defendant's refusal to pay the claim prior to completing its investigation was also not outrageous conduct. Harary v. Allstate Ins. Co., 983 F.Supp. 95, 96, 100.

E.D.N.Y.1997. Cit. generally in case quot. in disc. After insurer stopped paying insured's disability benefits, insured sued insurer for, inter alia, anticipatory breach of contract, breach of contract, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Defendant moved to dismiss the first and third claims. Granting the motion, the court held, in part, that New York did not recognize a cause of action for anticipatory breach where there was an alleged repudiation of an executory contract for the payment of money only, and that plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress failed because defendant's conduct was not sufficiently extreme or outrageous. The court was not persuaded by plaintiff's argument that defendant's refusal to continue paying his disability benefits implied a criminal indifference to civil obligations. MaGee v. Paul Revere Life Ins. Co., 954 F.Supp. 582, 587.

E.D.N.Y.1997. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. generally in case quot. in sup. Homeowners sued a town, the building commissioner, the town supervisor, the building inspector, and a prior building commissioner for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, arising from defendants' unsuccessful criminal prosecution of plaintiffs for zoning and building violations involving improper drainage, setback requirements, and filling of land without a permit. Granting, in part, defendants' motion to dismiss, the court held, inter alia, that there were no allegations in plaintiffs' complaint that, if true, would constitute conduct so outrageous as to give rise to a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and thus the claim failed as a matter of law. Willner v. Town of North Hempstead, 977 F.Supp. 182, 195.

E.D.N.Y.1995. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Homeowners sued airline for, inter alia, infliction of emotional distress based on the alleged outrageousness of the events incident to the crash of one of defendant's airplanes into plaintiffs' backyard. Granting in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held, in part, that defendant's actions with regard to the accident did not rise to the level of extreme and reckless conduct necessary to maintain a claim for emotional damages based on outrageous conduct. The court, moreover, refused to extend defendant's direct duty of care to plaintiffs and all the other nonpassengers its airplanes flew over on a daily basis. In re Air Crash Disaster at Cove Neck, Long Island, N.Y., 885 F.Supp. 434, 440.

E.D.N.Y.1995. Com. (d) cit. in headnote and quot. in case quot. in disc. An Orthodox Jewish man sued ex-wife's attorney, who had contacted the district attorney's office concerning the man's alleged violation of the state domestic relation law, alleging, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted defendant summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that the attorney's communications with the district attorney's office, the Rabbinical board, and others regarding the veracity of plaintiff's statements regarding the removal of barriers to remarriage did not constitute outrageous conduct. The attorney had an obligation to his client to investigate her case and to advance her legal interests, and his conduct was entirely reasonable. Furthermore, there was no evidence that the attorney's conduct was intended to inflict emotional distress on plaintiff. Kalika v. Stern, 911 F.Supp. 594, 596, 605.

E.D.N.Y.1992. Quot. in case quot. in disc., cit. in disc. A seaman who suffered emotional injuries while at sea sued a shipping company pursuant to the Federal Employers' Liability Act and the Jones Act, alleging negligence and unseaworthiness. The allegedly negligent incidents ranged from plaintiff's being temporarily demoted to his being ordered to work under unsafe conditions, and plaintiff claimed that these acts constituted the negligent infliction of emotional distress, causing him to experience depression. This court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding that plaintiff failed to demonstrate any legally cognizable acts of negligence or damages so as to sustain a cause of action. Plaintiff's engaging in heated arguments with other seamen did not constitute unconscionable abuse, and, although plaintiff may have been made fearful by his experience as a seaman, such feelings were not caused by defendant's negligent acts. Puthe v. Exxon Shipping Co., 802 F.Supp. 819, 827, affirmed 2 F.3d 480 (2d Cir.1993).

E.D.N.Y.1990. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Alleging breach of contract, intentional infliction of emotional distress, fraud, and wrongful discharge, the manager of a retirement community sued her former employer after he discharged her without warning or notice. The manager alleged that she had been induced by the employer to leave her prior employment in Ohio and relocate to New Jersey to accept the managerial position from which she was terminated, and that she suffered distress, anxiety, and depression as a result of her termination. Granting the employer's motion to dismiss in part and denying it in part, this court held, inter alia, that the manager had failed to state a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because she failed to allege that her former employer's action in dismissing her without warning or notice was outrageous in character or extreme in degree. Dickerson v. Kaplan, 763 F.Supp. 694, 702.

E.D.N.Y.1989. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup. A discharged employee sued his former employer for age discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted the defendant's motion to dismiss the emotional distress count, holding that, even if the plaintiff's allegations of age discrimination, being blamed for other employees' abuses, and being deceived by his former employer by being told he would work the day shift were true, they did not describe conduct so outrageous and extreme as to support the charge. Realmuto v. Yellow Freight System, Inc., 712 F.Supp. 287, 289.

E.D.N.Y.1987. Subsec. (1) cit. in sup. An employee of a hospital that was under investigation by the state government cooperated fully with the investigations. As a result of her cooperation, the employee alleged, the hospital undertook a campaign of harassment toward her. The employee sued the hospital, asserting various claims including one for intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted in part and denied in part the defendant's motion for dismissal, holding, inter alia, that the defendant's conduct, which included insults, indignities, annoyances, and petty oppressions, did not amount to the outrageous conduct necessary to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Kirwin v. New York State Office of Mental Health, 665 F.Supp. 1034, 1040.

E.D.N.Y.1986. Com. (d) quot. in sup. A physician who specialized in the treatment of rheumatism and arthritis sued an arthritis foundation for prima facie tort and intentional infliction of emotional distress when it dropped his name from its referral list pursuant to a change in its requirements for listing. The trial court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment on both claims. The court stated that there was no evidence that the defendant intended to cause the plaintiff severe emotional harm nor any evidence that the plaintiff had suffered extreme emotional distress. Solinsky v. Arthritis Foundation, 635 F.Supp. 620, 624.

E.D.N.Y.1985. Subsec. (1) quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. A terminated employee sued his former employer for breach of an alleged employment contract, false imprisonment, assault, and intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress. The employer removed the action to federal court. The district court granted the defendant's motion for a directed verdict on the plaintiff's breach of contract claim for failure to state a claim because there was no evidence in the contract of an express limitation on the employer's right to terminate employees at will. The court denied the defendant's motion for a directed verdict on all other claims, holding, inter alia, that the plaintiff's testimony about being placed in apprehension of immediate harm established a prima facie case for his claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Leahy v. Federal Exp. Corp., 609 F.Supp. 668, 673.

E.D.N.Y.Bkrtcy.Ct.

E.D.N.Y.Bkrtcy.Ct.2022. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Chapter 13 debtor brought a pro se adversary proceeding for, among other things, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against trustee of debtor's bankruptcy estate, alleging that defendant caused extreme emotional distress in plaintiff by sending her a letter claiming that a hearing on a motion to dismiss her bankruptcy petition was adjourned, notwithstanding the fact that defendant had not yet filed a motion to dismiss. This court granted in part defendant's motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiff failed to state a claim for IIED. The court explained that neither defendant's erroneously sent letter, nor plaintiff's conclusory statements that she felt threatened and intimidated by defendant, demonstrated the extreme and outrageous conduct, as defined by Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, necessary to sustain a claim for IIED. In re Modikhan, 639 B.R. 792, 817.

N.D.N.Y.

N.D.N.Y.2008. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Female police officer brought gender discrimination and other claims against city, police department, and several co-workers, alleging, among other things, that defendants released private and protected employment information contained in her personnel file and made false statements about her work performance that were intended to cause her harm. Granting summary judgment for defendants on plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held, inter alia, that the alleged behavior, namely, publication of plaintiff's complaint of discrimination and defendants' comments in regards to the complaint, did not offend all bounds of decency, and thus fell far short of the conduct required to sustain such a claim under New York law. Lore v. City of Syracuse, 583 F.Supp.2d 345, 384.

N.D.N.Y.2006. Adopted in case cit. in sup. (general cite), com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. As part of school secretary's employment-discrimination action, secretary sued superintendent, board of education, and school district for intentional infliction of emotional distress, after her request to be reassigned to a full-time position following a heart attack was denied by superintendent. Granting in part defendants' motion to dismiss, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's complaint, which portrayed superintendent's actions as extreme and outrageous through use of conclusory adjectives like "defamatory," "retaliatory," and "harassing," but did not allege specific actions that rose to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct, failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Burns v. Cook, 458 F.Supp.2d 29, 47.

N.D.N.Y.1999. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. After wife, through her personal guardian, sued husband for fraud and conversion of certain marital assets, husband brought third-party complaint against wife's personal guardian, alleging, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting in part personal guardian's motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that personal guardian's alleged conduct in making harassing telephone calls, sending libelous letters, and demanding money in exchange for not reporting Medicaid and tax fraud by husband was not sufficiently outrageous to sustain a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Hodge ex rel. Skiff v. Hodge, 78 F.Supp.2d 29, 36.

N.D.N.Y.1998. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Employee who was terminated shortly after returning from maternity leave for refusing to leave her infant son and attend an out-of-town seminar sued her former employer for sex, disability, and pregnancy-based discrimination in violation of federal and state statutes. Denying, in part, plaintiff's motion to amend her complaint, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiff did not allege conduct on the part of defendant that was sufficiently outrageous in character and extreme in degree to permit addition of a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Bond v. Sterling, Inc., 997 F.Supp. 306, 312.

N.D.N.Y.1998. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Police officers arrested a man who was engaged in the alleged business practice of allowing stored fuel tanks to leak waste petroleum into the ground. The arrestee sued the police officers and an investigator for the state attorney general, alleging, among claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court, among other dispositions, dismissed plaintiff's emotional-distress claim, holding, inter alia, that no claim for intentional infliction of emotional-distress could lie where the conduct underlying the claim fell within the ambit of plaintiff's claims for malicious prosecution and assault and battery. Hansel v. Sheridan, 991 F.Supp. 69, 75.

N.D.N.Y.1998. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Former director of town youth commission sued town and town officials for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with an investigation that defendants opened regarding plaintiff's failure to turn over to town the money collected on various ski trips. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held, in part, that plaintiff's allegations did not rise to the level of outrageous conduct necessary to sustain a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Hathaway v. County of Essex, 995 F.Supp. 62, 69, affirmed 172 F.3d 37 (2d Cir.1999).

N.D.N.Y.1995. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. After town's police officers, at the request of store personnel, asked African-American customers to leave the store, customers sued town and police officers, among others, alleging civil-rights violations and a state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held, in part, that defendants were not liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress under New York law, since defendants' actions in threatening plaintiffs with arrest for trespass, calling for backup prior to approaching them, and detaining them in public view in the store's main entrance, as well as requesting their driver's licenses and ordering a criminal background check on them, were not so egregious as to be beyond all bounds of decency. Robinson v. Town of Colonie, 878 F.Supp. 387, 409.

N.D.N.Y.1994. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Female sheriff's deputies sued county and county officials for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress allegedly suffered as a result of defendants' sexual harassment, discrimination and retaliatory acts. Specifically, plaintiffs maintained that defendants verbally abused them, denied them sick leave while routinely granting it to male deputies, forced them to strip-search male inmates when male deputies were available for the task, stationed them in cell blocks without providing a way to summon assistance in the event a dangerous situation arose, and repeatedly assigned them menial tasks. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment on this part of the complaint, the court held that their conduct was not so obnoxious, intolerable, or unendurable as to support plaintiffs' cause of action. Doolittle v. Ruffo, 882 F.Supp. 1247, 1259.

N.D.N.Y.1994. Cit. in case quot. in sup. A disabled black male whose properties burned down sued the fire chief and the village for, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendants harassed and discriminated against him and demolished his property without giving him notice and an opportunity to be heard. He asserted that defendants had subjected him to building code requirements not enforced against white property owners, and that village police had previously failed to investigate incidents of property damage to his buildings. This court granted defendants summary judgment as to plaintiff's federal claims and pendent state law claims, and dismissed plaintiff's emotional distress claim for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. The court held, inter alia, that plaintiff had properly stated a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Waldron v. Rotzler, 862 F.Supp. 763, 770.

N.D.N.Y.1992. Subsec. (1) cit. in case cit. in disc. Two women who were involuntarily committed to a psychiatric center sued the hospital and its staff members who were responsible for their commitment, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. This court granted in part and denied in part defendants' motion for summary judgment. The court granted defendant physician's motion for summary judgment on the emotional distress claim on the ground that the committing physician's conduct was privileged, since the physician determined that plaintiffs posed a substantial risk of harm to others. Rubenstein v. Benedictine Hosp., 790 F.Supp. 396, 413.

N.D.N.Y.1989. Subsec. (1) quot. in case cit. in disc. A former employee who argued that he was wrongfully terminated from his job sued the employer for age discrimination under federal law and alleged three pendent state law claims, including one for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting the defendant's motion to dismiss the claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress, the court held that the defendant's sole allegation that he was discharged fell substantially below the strict standard applicable to intentional infliction of emotional distress claims that the defendant's conduct must be outrageous in character, extreme in degree, and beyond all bounds of decency. Wanamaker v. Columbian Rope Co., 713 F.Supp. 533, 545.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

S.D.N.Y.

S.D.N.Y.2021. Cit. in sup.; com. (f) quot. in case quot. in sup. Nanny filed a claim for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress against parents who had formerly employed her to care for their son, alleging that they caused her to lose her position with a subsequent family by defaming her as a stalker and harasser in social-media posts. This court denied parents' motion for partial dismissal, holding that nanny plausibly alleged extreme and outrageous conduct on the part of parents in support of her claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court pointed to nanny's allegations that parents engaged in a multi-pronged campaign to harass her to drive her far away from their son, with the knowledge that she was suffering from emotional distress after having recently been the victim of a violent attack. Moraes v. White, 571 F.Supp.3d 77, 105.

S.D.N.Y.2018. Cit. in sup. (general cite); subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former user of a web-based dating application brought an action against operator of the application and related corporate entities, after his ex-boyfriend set up a false personal profile on the application impersonating plaintiff, alleging that the application was deceptively designed because it lacked safety features to prevent impersonation and it failed to remove impersonating profiles. This court granted defendants' motion to dismiss, holding that, because plaintiff's allegations were premised on defendants' purported failure to monitor, prevent, and remove content it had not created, the Communications Decency Act immunized defendants from liability. The court explained that, even if the Act did not apply, plaintiff failed to plausibly allege the necessary elements of a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress as set forth in Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Herrick v. Grindr, LLC, 306 F.Supp.3d 579, 593, 594.

S.D.N.Y.2018. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Parents of a murder victim sued news network, reporter, and contributor, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress and other claims in connection with an article in which defendants reported that the victim, who was a former employee of the Democratic National Committee, was murdered for leaking sensitive, private emails from the committee's servers. This court granted defendants' motions to dismiss, holding that plaintiffs failed to set forth clear and concise allegations of specific instances in which each individual defendant engaged in extreme and outrageous conduct, as required in order to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court noted that, absent such allegations, a plaintiff could not recover even if a defendant acted with a tortious or criminal intent, or his or her conduct was characterized by malice or a degree of aggravation that would entitle the plaintiff to punitive damages for another tort. Rich v. Fox News Network, LLC, 322 F.Supp.3d 487, 500.

S.D.N.Y.2017. Cit. in ftn. Former owner and operator of debtor car dealership brought an adversary proceeding against trustee of debtor's bankruptcy estate, alleging that defendant breached his promise not to sue plaintiff's parents to recover assets that debtor fraudulently transferred to parents prepetition. The bankruptcy court granted defendant's motion to dismiss, finding that plaintiff lacked standing, because he had not sufficiently alleged that he suffered an injury in fact as a result of defendant's actions. While affirming on other grounds, this court held that plaintiff's allegations —that he suffered from nightmares from defendant's alleged breach of their agreement and that defendant's actions cost him his marriage—were sufficient to satisfy the injury-in-fact requirement. The court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46 in reasoning that, although emotional distress was intangible, intangible injuries could be concrete, and emotional distress constituted a concrete injury for purposes of standing. In re Big Apple Volkswagen, LLC, 571 B.R. 43, 50.

S.D.N.Y.2011. Subsec. (2)(a) and com. (l) cit. in disc. (erron. cit. as com. /). Parents of high-school student who was suspended by school superintendent for the remainder of his senior year brought a state-law claim for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against school district and district officials, alleging that defendants failed to properly address any ongoing discrimination and violence against their son, and made false statements about him by accusing him of racism. This court, inter alia, dismissed student's mother's IIED claim, holding that, even assuming that New York courts recognized a claim of IIED upon a bystander, student's mother failed to state such a claim, because there was no allegation that she was present at any meeting in which the alleged emotional distress arose, except for a particular conference where defendants' conduct did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct. TC v. Valley Cent. School Dist., 777 F.Supp.2d 577, 590.

S.D.N.Y.2008. Cit. in sup. (general cite), com. (d) quot. in sup. and quot. in case quot. in sup., coms. (e) and (f) quot. in sup., illus. 5, 6, and 11 cit. in disc. Sister of assistant district attorney who committed suicide as he was about to be arrested on a charge of attempting to solicit a minor online brought civil-rights action against television network whose cast and crew had waited outside preparing to film the arrest, and an additional claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) under Texas law. Denying defendant's motion to dismiss the IIED claim, this court held, inter alia, that a reasonable jury could find that defendant abused its power in reckless disregard of decedent's rights, in an unethical manner that overstepped "all possible bounds of decency" and would be outrageous to an average member of the community; plaintiff alleged, among other things, that defendant intruded into a law-enforcement operation in order to pander to lurid curiosity and caused police to deviate from sound police practice. Conradt v. NBC Universal, Inc., 536 F.Supp.2d 380, 395, 396.

S.D.N.Y.2008. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in sup. and quot. in case cit. in ftn. Prisoner who was released 22 years after being convicted of a crime he did not commit sued police officers and others for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Denying in part defendants' motion to dismiss, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's allegations were sufficient to sustain the claim under New York law; here, there was no question that the alleged conduct—maliciously falsifying evidence that caused plaintiff to spend 22 years in prison for a crime he did not commit—was so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious, and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Newton v. City of New York, 566 F.Supp.2d 256, 275.

S.D.N.Y.2008. Quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Bus passenger who, because of a disability, used a power wheelchair and whose speech was impaired sued city transit authorities, bus operator, and others, asserting a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia. Granting transit defendants' motion to dismiss, and dismissing, sua sponte, the complaint as against bus operator, this court held that bus operator's alleged conduct in telling plaintiff to power off her wheelchair without explaining why and ultimately delaying her transportation approximately 40 minutes was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to meet the requirements for an IIED claim. Stephens v. Shuttle Associates, L.L.C., 547 F.Supp.2d 269, 274.

S.D.N.Y.2007. Quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. Landowners located near manufacturer's facility brought a class action against manufacturer and chemical company that allegedly supplied manufacturer with materials containing polychlorinated biphenyls (PCBs), claiming that defendants dispersed harmful PCBs onto their properties. This court, inter alia, denied defendants' motion to dismiss landowners' claims of intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that an allegation of knowingly subjecting individuals to exposure to a highly toxic substance, while purposely concealing from those so exposed the serious injuries that might result from such exposure, and in reckless disregard of those risks, could constitute the extreme and outrageous conduct required for this tort under New York law. Abbatiello v. Monsanto Co., 522 F.Supp.2d 524, 536.

S.D.N.Y.2007. Adopted in case cit. in ftn., subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. and cit. in ftn. Residents and business owners who lived near two gasoline stations found or suspected to have leaked gasoline into the soil asserted, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against owners of the gas stations and owners' suppliers, after plaintiffs' private wells tested positive for the gasoline additive MTBE. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment on this portion of the complaint, this court held that, even if defendants' alleged conduct in knowingly marketing a product capable of causing widespread property damage could be considered extreme and outrageous, plaintiffs' IIED claim failed because there was no evidence that, by engaging in such conduct, defendants intended to cause, or disregarded a substantial probability of causing, severe emotional distress to plaintiffs. In re Methyl Tertiary Butyl Ether ("MTBE") Products Liability Litigation, 528 F.Supp.2d 303, 312.

S.D.N.Y.2006. Quot. in case quot. in sup. Terminated provisional employee of city hospital brought various civil-rights claims against hospital, city, union, and others. This court granted defendants' motion to dismiss, holding in regard to plaintiff's additional claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, that plaintiff failed to allege any specific actions on the part of any defendant within New York's one-year statute of limitations for intentional tort claims that were sufficient on their own to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress; plaintiff apparently had not had any direct contact with defendants after the effective date of her termination, which was more than one year prior to the filing of the complaint. Cabrera v. NYC, 436 F.Supp.2d 635, 647.

S.D.N.Y.2006. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Resident of homeless shelter who was involuntarily committed to psychiatric hospital brought various claims against social worker employed by shelter. This court dismissed the claims, holding, inter alia, that the magistrate's report properly concluded that the conduct plaintiff ascribed to defendant—denying plaintiff an opportunity to return to the shelter on account of "red tape," thereby prolonging her alleged unlawful imprisonment at psychiatric hospital—did not rise to the high threshold of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to establish a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Fisk v. Letterman, 424 F.Supp.2d 670, 674.

S.D.N.Y.2006. Cit. in case quot. in sup. Inmate of detention center brought pro se action against center's guards and officials, alleging that he was unconstitutionally assaulted, verbally abused, strip-searched, and deprived of his property by defendants while he was being held in pretrial custody. This court, inter alia, granted defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that, while plaintiff alleged that defendants acted with the purpose of inflicting emotional distress, he failed to allege that he actually suffered any severe emotional distress. Noting that intentional infliction of emotional distress was meant to apply in only the rarest circumstances, the court concluded that plaintiff's failure to allege one of its elements was fatal to his claim. Jean-Laurent v. Wilkerson, 438 F.Supp.2d 318, 328.

S.D.N.Y.2006. Com. (d) adopted and quot. in case quot. in sup. Medical photographer formerly employed by university health center and university medical school sued his former employers and others for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that he suffered severe emotional distress as a result of his termination and defendants' alleged conversion and defamation. Granting in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's claim failed because he offered no concrete evidence regarding physical or behavioral symptoms of severe emotional distress, and provided no evidence of malice sufficient to fulfill the intent requirement for the claim. Slue v. New York University Medical Center, 409 F.Supp.2d 349, 371, reconsideration denied 2006 WL 212294 (S.D.N.Y.2006).

S.D.N.Y.2006. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Individual who was wrongfully arrested by two plainclothes police officers sued officers and others, alleging that officers repeatedly punched him during the arrest, and, after determining that he was not the person they were seeking, strip searched him, held him overnight, and denied him the opportunity to contact his family. This court, inter alia, granted defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court found that, even assuming the truth of plaintiff's allegations, officers' actions could not be considered so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious, and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Williams v. City of Mount Vernon, 428 F.Supp.2d 146, 160.

S.D.N.Y.2005. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Plaintiff sued nurse and medical center that employed nurse, after nurse, while working at a crisis hotline called by plaintiff, phoned authorities to alert them to a potentially suicidal person, and plaintiff was taken to a hospital, against her will, for a 29-hour evaluation for having suicidal thoughts, during which time plaintiff's cat died. The court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment and dismissed plaintiff's claims, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff did not allege or show that defendants' conduct in following normal procedures with individuals who might be contemplating suicide was extreme or outrageous enough to sustain a claim of negligent infliction of emotional distress. Matthews v. Malkus, 377 F.Supp.2d 350, 361.

S.D.N.Y.2005. Com. (j) cit. in case quot. in disc. Worker sued her employer's workers' compensation insurer and its physician, asserting several causes of action based on the insurer's allegedly premature termination of physical-therapy payments stemming from a prior work-related injury, after which worker suffered a broken hip and other injuries. This court granted insurer's motion to dismiss plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Noting that reaching the first element of such a claim was difficult in New York courts, the court stated that insurer's cessation of payments for physical therapy did not rise to the level of extreme emotional conduct required under state law to sustain an emotional-distress claim. Polidoro v. Chubb Corp., 386 F.Supp.2d 334, 338.

S.D.N.Y.2005. Com. (d) quot. generally in case quot. in disc., com. (j) cit. in case quot. in disc. Injured employee sued employer, workers' compensation insurance carrier and carrier's physician after employee's injuries worsened following carrier's denial of additional physical therapy. Granting defendants' motion to dismiss, the court found that employee's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress would not succeed under New York law, as insurance carrier's alleged conduct was not sufficiently extreme or outrageous to meet the standard necessary. The requirement of extreme or outrageous behavior for a claim of severe emotional distress was strictly applied in New York courts. Polidoro v. Chubb Corp., 354 F.Supp.2d 349, 352, 353.

S.D.N.Y.2005. Subsec. (1) cit. in ftn. Tug-boat captain who failed drug test sued employer on various grounds after being fired. Granting employer's motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress failed because plaintiff did not allege any facts indicating that employer's conduct was exceptionally egregious. Smith v. McAllister Towing of New York, L.L.C., 361 F.Supp.2d 348, 350.

S.D.N.Y.2004. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Suspect sued city and several police officers and district attorneys for violating his constitutional rights and various common law torts after he was arrested and indicted, but never tried, on charges of murder and attempted robbery. Granting city's summary-judgment motion on all claims, this court found, inter alia, that suspect's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress failed because he could not demonstrate that the arrest and indictment were the result of the city having acted intentionally or recklessly in a way that was so “extreme and outrageous” as to go beyond all grounds of decency and to be regarded as intolerable in a civilized community. Brown v. City of New York, 306 F.Supp.2d 473, 481.

S.D.N.Y.2003. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee sued employer for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's allegations that defendant prevented plaintiff from attending meetings and social events, denied him his chosen workplace for the benefit of a younger co-worker, destroyed and scattered his books and documentation, deprived him of his work tools, and subjected him to insults and slurs based on his nationality did not describe the kind of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Chimarev v. TD Waterhouse Investor Services, Inc., 280 F.Supp.2d 208, 215, 227, affirmed 99 Fed.Appx. 259 (2d Cir.2004).

S.D.N.Y.2003. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Terminated employee sued former employer for violations of federal law and intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Granting in part employer's motion for summary judgment, the court held that supervisor's critical performance reviews and his comment, following employee's demotion, that employee was "nothing" or "nobody" did not constitute extreme or outrageous conduct sufficient to support claim for emotional distress. Darboe v. Staples, Inc., 243 F.Supp.2d 5, 19.

S.D.N.Y.2003. Com. (d) quot. generally in case quot. in sup. After being fired for repeatedly failing to deposit store receipts, Hispanic former employee sued employer and her former supervisor for Title VII civil-rights violations and intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. This court granted defendants summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiffs' allegations were insufficient to constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress, since plaintiff alleged only that defendants conducted a legitimate investigation into a substantial loss of money, that the funds were lost on her watch, and that defendants terminated her after she violated their policies a second time while a legitimate investigation was ongoing. There was no evidence that defendants' actions were extreme and outrageous. Ortiz v. Brookstone Co., 274 F.Supp.2d 456, 465.

S.D.N.Y.2002. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Owner of car dealerships and his wife sued car manufacturer and its subsidiary for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendants threatened them with termination of dealership and foreclosure on their home, terminated dealerships' credit line, engaged in excessive audits, told dealership employees that dealership was failing, imposed onerous lending terms on dealership's customers, and provided financial assistance to plaintiff's competitors. This court granted defendants summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that defendants' threats, which consisted of statements that plaintiff's dealership was running out of time and that defendants would throw plaintiff out and go after his house, might have been heavy-handed or unfair, but were not outrageous conduct. Bronx Chrysler Plymouth, Inc. v. Chrysler Corp., 212 F.Supp.2d 233, 248.

S.D.N.Y.2002. Subsec. (1) cit. in disc., com. (j) quot. in disc. Insured sued insurer for breach of contract, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and bad faith, after insurer ceased making disability-insurance payments under individual and group policies. This court granted in part insurer's motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that insured's emotional-distress claim failed, because insurer's conduct of terminating insured's benefits, while troubling, did not rise to the requisite level of extreme and outrageous conduct. It noted that prior courts considering similar facts had characterized such claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress as true contract cases recast in tort. Wiener v. Unumprovident Corp., 202 F.Supp.2d 116, 122.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

S.D.N.Y.2001. Quot. generally in case quot. in sup. Homosexual former employee of a museum that was part of the Smithsonian Institution sued co-workers for assault, battery, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and tortious interference with a contract. Plaintiff alleged that he was discriminated against because of his sexual orientation and that co-workers intentionally hit and touched him on a regular basis as they walked past his desk. This court granted defendants' motion to substitute the United States as the named defendant and to dismiss the action. The court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's emotional-distress claim failed, because plaintiff's description of unwanted physical contact in his work environment did not rise to the requisite level of outrageous conduct. Marley v. Ibelli, 203 F.Supp.2d 302, 311, judgment affirmed 52 Fed.Appx. 564 (2d Cir.2002).

S.D.N.Y.2001. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in disc. Investigator for city's office of medical examiner sued city, police department, and members of city department of investigation, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, arising from the criminal prosecution and subsequent acquittal of plaintiff for the theft of a ring from a death scene. This court granted defendants partial summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's emotional-distress claim failed, because no reasonable jury could find that defendants' conduct was designed only to harm plaintiff, who acknowledged that defendants' initiation of the criminal prosecution was intended to prevent embarrassment to the city from media reports of plaintiff's huge overtime earnings. Savino v. City of New York, 168 F.Supp.2d 172, 179, judgment reversed in part 331 F.3d 63 (2d Cir.2003).

S.D.N.Y.2000. Com. (h) cit. in case quot. in disc. Consumers sued issuer of credit card, among others, for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with defendant's repeated telephone calls to plaintiffs in an attempt to recover a debt owed by their daughter-in-law. Dismissing the complaint, the court held, in part, that even if plaintiffs' allegations of telephone calls at unusual hours were true, such conduct did not constitute extreme and outrageous behavior on defendant's part. Conboy v. AT & T Corp., 84 F.Supp.2d 492, 507, affirmed241 F.3d 242 (2d Cir.2001).

S.D.N.Y.1998. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. An assistant to a university dean sued the university for civil-rights violations and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. Plaintiff alleged that the dean made sexual comments regarding his attraction to plaintiff, repeatedly asked her to dinner, called her at home, and sent her expensive gifts. After plaintiff complained to the university's affirmative action office, the dean searched her desk, erased her computer files, falsely accused her of misplacing files, gave her several memoranda criticizing her performance, and transferred her to a menial position in another department. This court dismissed in part plaintiff's claims, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state an emotional-distress claim.

Plaintiff's allegations regarding the dean's sexual harassment and retaliatory conduct, while more than reprehensible if true, did not constitute extreme and outrageous conduct. Burrell v. City University of New York, 995 F.Supp. 398, 416.

S.D.N.Y.1998. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in disc. Female former employee sued former employer and various supervisors and co-workers for, inter alia, violations of Title VII and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Defendants moved for summary judgment. Granting the motion in part and denying it in part, the court held, among other things, that summary judgment was appropriate to the extent that plaintiff alleged quid pro quo sexual harassment under Title VII, but that material factual issues existed as to whether she was subjected to a hostile work environment, and that the conduct complained of, specifically consistent comments by one of plaintiff's supervisors that were made to debase and humiliate her, was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous as to support an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Ponticelli v. Zurich American Ins. Group, 16 F.Supp.2d 414, 440.

S.D.N.Y.1997. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup. and adopted in case cit. in disc. A pregnant employee who was terminated six months after commencing maternity leave sued her former employer for wrongful termination in violation of federal law and asserted a pendent state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under New York law, since she was unable to satisfy, even remotely, any of the tort's elements pursuant to Restatement (Second) of Torts § 46. The court said that plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress involved no factual allegations independent of those relating to her termination. Lacoparra v. Pergament Home Centers, Inc., 982 F.Supp. 213, 230, 231.

S.D.N.Y.1997. Cit. in headnote, quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (f) quot. in ftn. in sup. An employee sued his employer and supervisors for intentional infliction of emotional distress, after he was removed from his position during a corporate reorganization and placed on “surplus” status; he was subsequently discharged following his failure to report to work for medical reasons. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that defendants' alleged conduct in frustrating plaintiff's attempts to find a “budgeted” position, transferring him to a small windowless office without a telephone, assigning him work that was not suitable for someone of his experience, and removing plaintiff's name from a company-newsletter article about a course that plaintiff had taught was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Mariani v. Consolidated Edison Co. of New York, 982 F.Supp. 267, 267, 273, 277, order affirmed 172 F.3d 38 (2d Cir.1998).

S.D.N.Y.1997. Com. (h) cit. in ftn. The former senior vice president and publisher of a magazine was demoted and then fired, allegedly because she became pregnant with a second child. The vice president sued her former employer for federal Title VII violations, violations of the New York State and City Human Rights Laws, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. This court granted defendant's motion to dismiss the emotional-distress and negligent-supervision claims, holding, inter alia, that it was extraordinarily unlikely that New York courts would allow liability for employment discrimination on the emotional-distress theory in the face of the legislature's enactment of a more limited remedy. The court stated that recognizing a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress based on employment discrimination would extend liability for punitive damages where the legislature had declined to do so in the Human Rights Law. The court further concluded that, while the conduct alleged was reprehensible, New York courts would find it an insufficient basis for liability. Silberstein v. Advance Magazine Publishers, Inc., 988 F.Supp. 391, 392.

S.D.N.Y.1996. Com. (d) quot. in disc. A father and son whose application for an investment account was denied by a brokerage firm sued the broker for intentional infliction of emotional distress and discrimination on the basis of Canadian citizenship, race, sexual orientation, and disability. This court granted defendant's motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that plaintiffs failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because the conduct alleged by plaintiffs was not extreme and outrageous. Cheung v. Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith, 913 F.Supp. 248, 254.

S.D.N.Y.1996. Com. (d) quot. generally in case quot. in disc. After his father died, a man allegedly schemed to cause his half-sister to suffer a nervous breakdown so that he could gain control of his mother's assets. The half-sister and the mother sued the man for intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court denied defendant's motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that plaintiffs stated an emotional-distress claim, because they alleged that defendant engaged in a continuous course of harassing conduct that commenced around the time of the father's death. Such conduct was geared towards defendant's ultimate economic gain. The court stated that continuous and coercive harassment can establish a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and that the alleged events occurred within one year of the filing of the complaint. Neufeld v. Neufeld, 910 F.Supp. 977, 984.

S.D.N.Y.1996. Cit. generally in disc. Fast-food restaurant customer who claimed that he was denied use of the facility's restroom because of his race sued restaurant's franchisee, among others, for, inter alia, violations of 42 U.S.C. §§ 1981 and 1982, and for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Franchisee moved for summary judgment. Granting in part and denying in part the motion, the court held that material factual issues as to whether franchisee's acts were purposefully discriminatory and racially motivated precluded summary judgment on customer's 42 U.S.C. § 1981 claim; use of the restroom did not constitute a property right under 42 U.S.C. § 1982; and franchisee's conduct was not so outrageous or extreme as to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Perry v. Burger King Corp., 924 F.Supp. 548, 553.

S.D.N.Y.1995. Cit. in headnote and in sup. After receiving inadequate bonuses, employee sued employer for breach of contract, prima facie tort, and intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with his demotion from district manager to sales representative. This court granted in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state a viable emotional distress claim, since a demotion by an employer during an employer-employee dispute does not ordinarily constitute extreme, outrageous conduct, nor can it be assumed to cause severe emotional injury. Cartelli v. Lanier Worldwide, Inc., 872 F.Supp. 1253, 1254, 1256.

S.D.N.Y.1995. Subsec. (1) cit. in headnotes and quot. in case quot. in sup. Residents of apartment buildings sued landlords and others for failure to remove lead paint. Denying in part defendants' motion to dismiss, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiffs stated a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress by alleging that defendants knew that plaintiffs' residences would expose plaintiffs to lead, causing them physical and mental injuries, that lead poisoning and its risks would cause any parent of a young child to suffer severe emotional distress, including ongoing concern for and fear of the child's safety, and that defendants' failure to prevent plaintiffs' exposure to lead paint in violation of federal and local law was outrageous. German v. Federal Home Loan Mortg. Corp., 885 F.Supp. 537, 542, 571.

S.D.N.Y.1995. Cit. in headnote, subsec. (1) quot. in case cit. in disc. Deaf employee who was dismissed for allegedly stealing a co-worker's money sued employer for, inter alia, violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Employee, who could communicate only via a sign language interpreter, argued, among other things, that a human-resources manager with little signing experience knowingly misinterpreted his side of the story, misrepresenting to employer that he stole the money in order to pay off credit-card debt. Granting in part and denying in part employer's motion for summary judgment on the statutory claims and granting the motion with regard to the common law claim, the court held that employee failed to establish that human-resources manager's actions were outrageous or that she intended to cause employee emotional distress. Mohamed v. Marriott Intern., Inc., 905 F.Supp. 141, 144, 157.

S.D.N.Y.1995. Subsec. (1) cit. in headnotes and quot. in case quot. in sup. An attorney sued her former law firm for, among other claims, civil-rights violations and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that she was discriminated against and fired because she was a woman, became pregnant, and had a child. Plaintiff alleged that the firm isolated her from firm activities after learning of her pregnancy, that a firm partner had stated that the firm should stop hiring women, and that her billable hours had decreased because the firm told her that no work was available. This court granted in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state an emotional-distress claim, because defendant's conduct was not extreme and outrageous. Sigmon v. Parker Chapin Flattau & Klimpl, 901 F.Supp. 667, 671, 681.

S.D.N.Y.1995. Subsec. (1) cit. in headnotes and quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. A terminated hospital employee sued the hospital for age discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiff alleged that the visits by the supervisor and the employee from human resources were done in such a way so that all of her coemployees could observe her being disciplined and were used to intimidate, shock, and place pressure upon her. This court granted hospital partial summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to establish intentional infliction of emotional distress, since the actions by plaintiff's supervisors fell far short of the extreme- and outrageous-behavior standard. The court stated that threats of termination did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous behavior. Stylianou v. St. Luke's/Roosevelt Hosp. Center, 902 F.Supp. 54, 55, 57.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

S.D.N.Y.1995. Cit. generally in sup., subsec. (1) quot. and adopted in case quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee sued former employer for sexual harassment under Title VII, and for the common law tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Employer moved to dismiss. Granting the motion, this court held that dismissal of the Title VII claim was appropriate where employee failed to exhaust her administrative remedies and where she could not prove that employer failed to remedy the harassment. The emotional distress claim warranted dismissal because employee's allegation that employer retaliated against her by subjecting her to humiliating criticism and adverse job evaluations, and depriving her of certain work-related opportunities, did not rise to the level needed to sustain a claim of outrageous conduct. Walsh v. National Westminster Bancorp., Inc., 921 F.Supp. 168, 174.

S.D.N.Y.1994. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former resident of managed-care retirement community sued assignee of community's operator for refund of plaintiff's entrance fee, alleging, among other claims, that she suffered emotional distress and should be awarded $1 million. The court dismissed, holding, inter alia, that the failure or inability of defendant to pay the entire amount of its obligations under a nonrecourse note did not constitute conduct that could be deemed outrageous or beyond the possible bounds of decency. The court said that defendant, at worst, was selfishly pursuing its own business interests at plaintiff's expense. Barnum v. Millbrook Care Ltd. Partnership, 850 F.Supp. 1227, 1238.

S.D.N.Y.1994. Cit. and quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. Two cruise-ship passengers and their husbands sued the cruise line for negligence and intentional infliction of emotional distress after a cabin steward raped one woman and verbally assaulted the other. Plaintiffs asserted that authorities in St. Thomas and Miami were never notified of plaintiffs' complaints, that evidence was collected by ship personnel in a haphazard way, and that defendants' attorney misrepresented applicable law. This court granted defendants summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that defendants did not owe a duty to aid plaintiffs in the subsequent investigation of plaintiffs' complaints and that defendants' conduct surrounding the subsequent investigation did not constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress. While defendants' conduct may have been unsympathetic or even callous, it was not so extreme as to be utterly reprehensible. York v. Commodore Cruise Line, Ltd., 863 F.Supp. 159, 164-165.

S.D.N.Y.1993. Cit. and quot. in case cit. in disc. Hispanic female employee sued her former employer, manager, and company vice president, alleging discriminatory discharge, discrimination in hiring, and sexual harassment. Granting in part defendants' motion to dismiss, this court held, inter alia, that, under New York law, allegations that the employer's racial discrimination caused plaintiff emotional distress did not give rise to liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Cruz v. Ecolab Pest Elimination Div., Ecolab, Inc., 817 F.Supp. 388, 393.

S.D.N.Y.1993. Subsec. (1) cit. and quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Model attacked by woman at a party hosted by fashion studio sued the studio, among others, for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that, one month after plaintiff's attack, studio held fashion show with models made up to appear that they had blood flowing from their foreheads down their cheeks similar to the way plaintiff looked immediately after her attack. The court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding that, taking plaintiff's assertion as true, that defendant attempted to capitalize upon plaintiff's assault for its own fashion/business purposes, defendant's primary purpose was to advance its own business interests, and any conduct that harmed plaintiff was incidental and therefore not actionable. Fontaine v. Ryan, 849 F.Supp. 190, 204.

S.D.N.Y.1992. Subsec. (1) cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. A former employee who was fired from his job sued his former employer and former co-workers, alleging age discrimination, tortious interference with contract and intentional infliction of emotional distress. He specifically asserted that allegations against him of sexually harassing a subordinate female employee were merely a pretext for his firing so that his employer could be relieved of any obligation to pay his salary and future retirement benefits. Granting in part defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's allegations with respect to his discharge and the circumstances leading up thereto fell far short of the requisite level of outrageousness. Augugliaro v. Brooks Bros., Inc., 802 F.Supp. 956, 964.

S.D.N.Y.1992. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Black female employee sued railroad for employment discrimination under state and federal law, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and prima facie tort, alleging that she was denied promotion to four positions for which she was qualified and that the positions were awarded to white employees who were equally or less qualified. The court granted in part railroad's motion for summary judgment, holding that issues of fact as to whether railroad's articulated reasons for failing to promote plaintiff were pretextual precluded summary judgment on three of plaintiff's employment discrimination claims, but plaintiff did not allege extreme and outrageous conduct sufficient to sustain a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, as her claims were essentially ordinary employment discrimination claims and there was no evidence that railroad acted intentionally in causing plaintiff emotional distress. Bradley v. National R.R. Passenger Corp. (Amtrak), 797 F.Supp. 286, 294.

S.D.N.Y.1992. Subsec. (1) quot. in case cit. in disc. (Erron. cit. as subsec. (a).) Union member who attempted to distribute literature critical of union officials sued the officials for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, after defendants hired private investigators to put plaintiff's apartment under surveillance. The court denied defendants' motion to dismiss, holding that discovery might establish sufficient facts to permit the trier of fact to determine that one or more of the defendants intended to put plaintiff in fear of his life or well-being. Guzman v. Bevona, 810 F.Supp. 509, 513.

S.D.N.Y.1992. Subsec. (1), com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. and quot. generally in sup. Salesman sued his former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that employer misrepresented reasons for his dismissal and attempted to coerce him into signing a severance agreement to avoid paying him commission. The district court denied defendant's motion to dismiss on other grounds but granted the motion with regard to the emotional distress claim. It held that employer's statements about plaintiff's job performance did not demonstrate sufficiently outrageous conduct. It compared this case to others in which state courts dismissed similar employee claims where employer's behavior was more serious, such as giving unjustifiably poor evaluations, improperly denying vacations, or wrongfully terminating employees. Knudsen v. Quebecor Printing (U.S.A.) Inc., 792 F.Supp. 234, 240.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

S.D.N.Y.1992. Subsec. (1), com. (d) quot. but dist. Husband and wife sued hotel for negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress and loss of consortium resulting after hotel employees erroneously and belligerently informed husband, in response to his repeated requests that they check their registration lists, that his wife had not registered there as a guest. Granting in part hotel's motion to dismiss, the court held that, although plaintiffs' complaint stated a claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress as to husband, in that hotel negligently performed a duty undertaken to locate his wife, husband could not recover for intentional infliction of emotional distress because there was no allegation permitting a reasonable jury to find that hotel's conduct was "utterly intolerable in a civilized community." Perrin v. Hilton International, Inc., 797 F.Supp. 296, 302.

S.D.N.Y.1992. Cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc., quot. in case quot. in disc. and quot. in ftn. An employee who had numerous confrontations with her supervisors ranging from alleged crank phone calls to sexual abuse and bad shift assignments brought a lawsuit under the Federal Employers' Liability Act (FELA) for intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress. This court granted the employer's motion for summary judgment, determining that disagreements regarding the collective bargaining agreement, disputes over the propriety of invoking formal disciplinary procedures, personality conflicts between managers and employees, and even outright manifestations of personal distaste for an employee did not constitute unconscionable abuse or outrageous behavior. In light of its conclusion, the court deemed it unnecessary to resolve whether the FELA covered emotional distress claims. Visconti v. Consolidated Rail Corp., 801 F.Supp. 1200, 1209, 1210, 1212, 1213.

S.D.N.Y.1990. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. and quot. in case quot. in disc. After a boxing promoter sued a boxer and his agent concerning contracts between the parties, the defendants claimed that the contracts were unconscionable and asserted counterclaims for slander and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting the promoter's motion for partial summary judgment, this court held that, despite the promoter's power and stature in the boxing field and that extendable terms of the contracts could amount to the rest of the boxer's professional life, the contracts were not unconscionable when made, according to New York law. The court also held that statements made by the promoter were not sufficiently factual to be susceptible to being proved true or false as to be considered slanderous, nor were certain statements so extreme and uncivil as to provide a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The contention that the promoter said or implied that the boxer was not the deserving champion was an insufficient predicate for such a cause of action, especially where the parties' relationship was defined by a business or employment context. Don King Productions, Inc. v. Douglas, 742 F.Supp. 778, 785, 786.

S.D.N.Y.1990. Com. (d) quot. in disc. A former general manager for an insurance sales office sued his former employer, alleging that the defendant dismissed him to prevent him from obtaining higher pension benefits and to avoid paying him certain commissions that were due and owing to him. He sued on a theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. This court dismissed the claim, holding that nothing in the pleading rose to the level of outrageousness required to maintain a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Lawford v. New York Life Ins. Co., 739 F.Supp. 906, 918.

S.D.N.Y.1990. Cit. in case quot. in ftn. A female railroad engineer sued her employer and its predecessor under the Federal Employers Liability Act (FELA), alleging negligence in failing to protect her from sexual harassment. Denying the defendants' motion for summary judgment, this court held that the plaintiff had stated a cause of action for the negligent infliction of emotional distress under FELA by alleging both physical contact in causing her injuries and a significant physical injury. The court also decided that it need not determine whether the defendants' conduct was extreme and outrageous since the plaintiff had made it quite clear that she was alleging negligent, not intentional, infliction of emotional distress. It noted that a cursory review of New York law on negligent infliction of emotional distress indicated that New York did not follow the majority rule, which required some manifestation of physical injury in order for a plaintiff to recover. Masiello v. Metro-North Commuter RR., 748 F.Supp. 199, 206.

S.D.N.Y.1989. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in disc. A discharged employee sued his former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging, among other things, that the defendant forced the plaintiff to sign a termination agreement, slandered him by calling him a swindler at a company meeting, libeled him in a magazine article, and withheld his wages. On the plaintiff's motion to reargue the defendant's motion to dismiss, the court adhered to its decision to dismiss the intentional infliction of emotional distress claim, stating that, under New York law, abusive or wrongful discharge of an at-will employee, without more, did not constitute the extreme and outrageous behavior necessary to give rise to a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Loudon v. Hayek, 756 F.Supp. 107, 109.

S.D.N.Y.1989. Subsec. (1), com. (d) quot. in case cit. in disc. After a one-half owner of a woolen materials import and distributing company sued the other shareholder to recover his vested accrued benefits under the retirement and pension plans, the defendant joined a bank that acted as the investment adviser for the plans as a third-party defendant, asserting a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, against the bank. Granting the third-party defendant's motion to dismiss the claim, the court held not only that the claim was time-barred but also that the allegations that the bank refused to extend a letter of credit and failed to disclose its dealings with a competitor did not amount to the type of outrageous conduct regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized community necessary to maintain a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Resnick v. Resnick, 722 F.Supp. 27, 36.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

S.D.N.Y.1989. Subsec. (1) quot. in case cit. in disc., coms. (d) and (f) cit. in disc. An employee with a terminal illness who had retired from his job and had begun collecting long-term disability and pension benefits sued his former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, for allegedly forcing him to retire because of his age and refusing to pay his group life insurance premiums. Granting the defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held that the conduct of which the plaintiff complained was insufficient as a matter of law to provide the basis for a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because it was not extreme or outrageous nor offensive to a civilized society. The court also stated that, although an actor's knowledge of another's susceptibility to emotional distress by reason of a physical or mental condition might render conduct outrageous, the plaintiff's illness was insufficient to render the defendant's conduct actionable in this case. Rooney v. Witco Corp., 722 F.Supp. 1040, 1043, 1044.

S.D.N.Y.1988. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in case cit. in disc. A woman sued her former employer, alleging sex discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court granted the defendant's motion to dismiss the intentional infliction of emotional distress claim, holding that the plaintiff had failed to state a claim. The court said that the defendant's conduct in sending the plaintiff, who was on sick leave, a letter asking for clarification concerning a specific date for her return to work and stating that she might be terminated for lack of availability did not constitute the extreme and outrageous behavior necessary for the claim. Burger v. Health Ins. Plan of Greater New York, 684 F.Supp. 46, 51.

S.D.N.Y.1987. Subsec. (1) quot. in case cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. A black female employee sued her employer and management personnel, alleging, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The court granted the defendants' motion because the plaintiff's allegations of negative evaluations, harassment, unfavorable job assignments, and disparaging statements were found insufficient, as a matter of law, to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court stated that such a claim must allege conduct that is sufficiently shocking and outrageous as to surpass all reasonable bounds of decency. Bradley v. Consolidated Edison Co. of New York, Inc., 657 F.Supp. 197, 205.

S.D.N.Y.1987. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. The original owner of an oil painting by Monet that disappeared in Germany during the Second World War sought the return of the painting from a subsequent purchaser. The court found for the plaintiff, holding that the original owner established a superior right to possession of the painting, and ordered the subsequent purchaser to return it. The court stated that the plaintiff did not unreasonably delay her demand for the painting's return and that the unique quality of the painting warranted its return. In dismissing the defendant's counterclaim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, the court held that the original owner's conduct fell short of the requisite atrociousness and intolerableness. DeWeerth v. Baldinger, 658 F.Supp. 688, 696, judgment reversed 836 F.2d 103 (2d Cir.1987), cert. denied 486 U.S. 1056, 108 S.Ct. 2823, 100 L.Ed.2d 924 (1988).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

S.D.N.Y.1987. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. An importer of fine watches sued American and Swiss watch manufacturers for injuries resulting from the defendants' RICO and antitrust violations, fraud, conversion, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that the defendants conspired to submit documents to the United States Customs Service fraudulently stating that the defendant American manufacturer was not owned or controlled by the Swiss owner of the watch's trademark. This court granted in part and denied in part the defendants' motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that the basis for the plaintiff's claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress, that the American manufacturer's trademark recordation led to the plaintiff's federal indictment, was insufficient to state a claim for this tort because the plaintiff failed to allege either specific intent or outrageous conduct by the defendants. Shaw v. Rolex Watch, U.S.A., Inc., 673 F.Supp. 674, 683.

S.D.N.Y.1986. Com. (d) cit. in disc. After providing business and social assistance to the defendant for 15 years, the plaintiff alleged that the defendant agreed to give her a $6.5 million house, a $4 million trust fund, and the rent-free possession of a condominium until she remarried. The plaintiff sued the defendant for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that he reneged and had his agents enter the condominium, strip it of valuable items, change the locks while she was out and her daughter was ill at home, and station armed guards in the lobby to keep out unauthorized persons. This court denied the defendant's motion to dismiss the claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that the placing of armed guards, the changing of the locks, the exclusion of visitors, the entry without consent and the removal of objects without consent demonstrated a course of conduct designed to intimidate, threaten and humiliate, and that it was for the trier of fact to determine whether those acts were outrageous. Bower v. Weisman, 639 F.Supp. 532, 541.

S.D.N.Y.1986. Com. (c) quot. in sup. The plaintiff sued her former employer for employment discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that she had been fired while four less experienced and less knowledgeable employees were retained, that her time records were forged to make her appear habitually late, and that she had been told she would be blackballed and unemployable in the industry if she filed a complaint with the State Division of Human Rights. This court granted summary judgment for the employer on the intentional infliction of emotional distress claim, holding that as a matter of law, the conduct the plaintiff alleged, even if true, did not rise to the level of outrageous conduct necessary to constitute the tort under New York law. The court noted that New York had no cause of action for abusive or wrongful employee discharge, and that all of the allegations taken together failed to demonstrate a deliberate and malicious campaign of harassment. Kovich v. Manhattan Life Ins. Co., 640 F.Supp. 134, 136.

S.D.N.Y.1986. Quot. in ftn. An author sought a declaratory judgment against his insurer that its policy provided him with coverage for legal expenses he might incur in defending a lawsuit brought by the subject of a book. Partially awarding the author summary judgment, this court held that the lawsuit brought by the subject of the book for libel and intentional infliction of emotional distress was within the coverage that the policy contemplated and thus required the insurer to indemnify the author for legal expenses and any eventual judgment. McGinniss v. Employers Reinsurance Corp., 648 F.Supp. 1263, 1270.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

S.D.N.Y.1985. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Plaintiff, a terminated female sales representative, sued her employer for employment discrimination under Title VII and asserted a state law claim against three of her superiors for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiff had a persistently unsatisfactory employment record, including her engagement in a forbidden trade practice known as "steering." The Title VII claim was tried to the court; the tort claim was presented to a jury, which found for the plaintiff. The court held for the employer on the Title VII claim, finding the employee's claims of sexual harassment and discrimination unfounded. The court also granted defendants' motions for judgement n.o.v. on the tort claim, holding that plaintiff utterly failed to make out a case for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Buddle v. Heublein, Inc., 613 F.Supp. 491, 497.

S.D.N.Y.1984. Com. (d) quot. in sup. The plaintiff, who compiled a book of verse, poetry, limericks, and epigrams, refused to withdraw portions of the book to which the defendant's parent company objected. When the defendant discontinued promotion, distribution, and sales of the book, the plaintiff sued for intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted in part and denied in part the defendant's motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, holding that the trier of fact had to determine if the defendant's conduct was extreme and outrageous. Conniff v. Dodd, Mead & Co., 593 F.Supp. 266, 269.

S.D.N.Y.1984. Quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. The defendant supervisor corrected the conduct of the plaintiff employee in front of other persons. In a later private conversation, the defendant was alleged to have questioned the plaintiff's sexual preference. The plaintiff sued for intentional infliction of emotional distress in state court. The defendant removed the action to this court and moved for dismissal. This court dismissed the action. The conduct causing such distress must be outrageous, said the court, and the law should not interfere in every case when a person's feelings are hurt. The court concluded that criticism of job performance and questions about sexual preference do not constitute outrageous conduct sufficient to support the tort. Moye v. Gary, 595 F.Supp. 738, 739.

S.D.N.Y.1983. Quot. in part in disc., cit. in sup., subsecs. (1) and (2) cit. in sup., subsec. (2)(a) quot. in part in disc., com. (1) quot. in sup., Caveat quot. in sup. The parents of a murder victim brought an action against the convicted murderer. After disposition of all other issues, the plaintiffs moved for the entry of judgment on their claim for infliction of severe emotional distress. The court noted that the New York Court of Appeals had adopted s 46 of the Restatement of Torts 2d as stating the law of New York as to the tort of infliction of emotional distress. The necessary import of the adoption was that recklessness was one ground under New York law for imposing liability for the infliction of emotional disturbance when it was accompanied by extreme and outrageous conduct. The court also noted that adherence by the New York courts to the Restatement section in question led to the further conclusion that, under certain circumstances, a plaintiff could recover for the infliction of emotional distress where an assault or other wrongful conduct was directed at a third person. In deciding whether the parents could recover for the trauma they suffered following the discovery of their dying daughter, the court stated that while the Restatement would generally limit recovery to situations where a family member was present at the time of the injury to the third person, a caveat attached to the Restatement section indicated that there might arise situations where such presence was not required as a predicate to the imposition of liability. The court also noted that there was no sound basis in reason or policy for placing such a narrow limit on recovery in such situations. As the assault that led to their daughter's death had taken place in the plaintiffs' home, and they had discovered their horribly injured daughter while still struggling for life, the court decided that the parents could recover on their claim. It accordingly granted the parents' motion for the entry of judgment. Garland v. Herrin, 554 F.Supp. 308, 310, 313-315, reversed 724 F.2d 16 (2d Cir.1983). See above case.

S.D.N.Y.1982. Subsec. (1) cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. The plaintiff organization brought an action against the authors and publisher of a book allegedly defaming it. The defendants counterclaimed for prima facie tort; they also brought a separate action for malicious prosecution, which set forth essentially the same allegations as those in the counterclaim, and which was dismissed for failure to state a claim. The court dismissed the complaint against the defendants and granted summary judgment in favor of the plaintiff on the defendants' prima facie tort counterclaim, stating that it merely realleged a defective cause of action for a traditional tort. The court rejected the defendants' motion to add a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress because the plaintiff's acts of attempting to review the manuscript and threatening to commence a lawsuit could not be characterized as “outrageous;” thus the claim was legally deficient. Church of Scientology of California v. Siegelman, 94 F.R.D. 735, 740, 741.

S.D.N.Y.1982. Subsec. (1) cit. in sup. A physician brought an action against the chairman of a peer review committee of a county medical society, alleging that an investigation undertaken by the committee into claims that he was overcharging for his services went beyond legitimate necessity by inquiring into the merits of his underlying procedures. The defendant moved for a summary judgment. In response to the plaintiff's claim that the defendant's conduct during the investigation constituted an intentional infliction of severe emotional distress, the court stated that to support such a cause of action, the defendant's conduct would have had to rise to a level of extreme and outrageous behavior exceeding all bounds usually tolerated by a decent society. The court found that the defendant's conduct during the investigation scarcely rose to such a level, and the plaintiff's complaint failed to state a cause of action for intentional infliction of severe emotional distress. The complaint was dismissed. Greenfield v. Kanwit, 546 F.Supp. 220, 225, affirmed 714 F.2d 113 (2d Cir. 1982).

S.D.N.Y.1980. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in a case quot. in sup. The plaintiff was employed as a truck driver by the defendant until he was designated as a voluntary quit by defendant. The plaintiff, asserting that he had been ill, filed a grievance of wrongful discharge with his union. The grievance led to an arbitration hearing at which it was adjudged that the plaintiff was a voluntary quit. According to the terms of the union's contract with the defendant, the decision of the arbitration panel was final and binding on all parties. The plaintiff then sued both the employer and the union but did not assert a claim against the union. The plaintiff alleged, in part, that the real reason for his discharge had been a vendetta against him, performed by the defendant's dispatcher in retaliation for the plaintiff's complaints about work practices. The union asked and received dismissal of the complaint against it. The employer filed a pre-answer motion for dismissal of the complaint or for summary judgment maintaining, inter alia, that the plaintiff's suit was an attempt to vacate the arbitration award, was time-barred, and was barred for failing to allege that the union had breached its duty of fair representation. The defendant's motion for summary judgment was granted as to plaintiff's claim of wrongful discharge. The plaintiff's claim of a vendetta actually amounted to outrageous conduct causing the plaintiff emotional distress, so that it was a claim for the common law tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court maintained that liability attaches under this theory when the conduct was so outrageous in character and so extreme in degree as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency and was atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. The court did not find that the defendant was liable for such conduct. Additionally, the court held that defendant's acts constituted contract grievances subject to the compulsory grievance machinery provided for by the collective bargaining agreement. The court therefore dismissed the action against the defendant. Dinger v. Anchor Motor Freight, Inc., 501 F.Supp. 64, 69.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

S.D.N.Y.1973. Cit. This was an action brought by the plaintiff, the former wife of the defendant, to determine the continued validity of an antenuptial agreement in the light of the husband's subsequent divorce. Plaintiff also sought damages for defendant's allegedly tortious course of conduct contending that the defendant had harassed her by bringing continuous litigation against her based upon their marital difficulties, and that this treatment had caused her to suffer greatly. Their marriage originated in 1956 and lasted until 1961 when a separation decree was granted. The period between 1961 and 1967 was fraught with continuous litigation, and the defendant obtained a divorce decree in 1967. The court dismissed plaintiff's complaint stating that both plaintiff and defendant have a right to engage in legal proceedings, and the defendant's conduct since 1964 had not been malicious and without justification, but rather was strictly related to the legitimate enforcement of legal rights he held against the plaintiff. Rosenstiel v. Rosenstiel, 368 F.Supp. 51, 64, aff'd without op. 503 F.2d 1397 (2d.Cir.1974).

S.D.N.Y.Bkrtcy.Ct.

S.D.N.Y.Bkrtcy.Ct.2017. Cit. in disc. Former prisoner, whose convictions for various crimes were vacated, filed a motion seeking leave to assert claims for, among other things, malicious prosecution, infliction of emotional distress, and spoliation of evidence against, among others, bankrupt car manufacturer and successor that purchased manufacturer's assets, based on allegations that manufacturer was complicit in his wrongful convictions. This court denied plaintiff's motion as to successor, holding, among other things, that successor did not assume manufacturer's tort liabilities under the sale agreement between successor and manufacturer. The court cited Restatement Second of Torts §§ 46, 653, and 870 in noting that plaintiff's claims for malicious prosecution, infliction of emotional distress, and spoliation of evidence were claims asserted under tort law. In re Motors Liquidation Company, 576 B.R. 761, 776.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

W.D.N.Y.

W.D.N.Y.1995. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in ftn., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in ftn. A college student who had engaged in an extensive research project sued a fellow student and four doctors who had published plaintiff's research project without attributing plaintiff's contribution, alleging, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted defendants' motion to dismiss, holding the Copyright Act preempted plaintiff's claims for unlawful conversion, unlawful competition, and unjust enrichment. Furthermore, since plaintiff did not own a copyright, she failed to state a copyright-infringement claim. Since no federal issues survived, plaintiff's state law cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress would be dismissed for lack of jurisdiction. The court noted that the unauthorized publication of plaintiff's study and research project fell far short of the "extreme and outrageous" standard. Patrick v. Francis, 887 F.Supp. 481, 486.

W.D.N.Y.1992. Com. (d) cit. in sup. Former employee brought an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, against his former employer, alleging that his supervisors engaged in a systematic course of conduct that was threatening, harassing, and calculated to cause him to resign or retire early. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court found no significant indication that defendant's conduct toward plaintiff reached the level of extreme and outrageous conduct required under New York law to state a prima facie case of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Spence v. Maryland Cas. Co., 803 F.Supp. 649, 673, judgment affirmed 995 F.2d 1147 (2d Cir.1993).

W.D.N.Y.1991. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Two teachers sued the superintendent of schools and the president of the board of education, among others, for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, after the board suspended the teachers for making an adult-theme movie with school equipment and then turned the videotape over to the district attorney's office for a determination as to whether it was pornographic. The court held that the defendants were not liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress because the plaintiffs did not establish that the defendants' conduct was outrageous, extreme, and beyond the bounds of decency. Rothschild v. Board of Educ. of City of Buffalo, 778 F.Supp. 642, 661.

W.D.N.Y.1984. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. In a suit involving age and gender discrimination in the hiring and discharge of employees, the individual plaintiffs also sued a hotel for alleged intentional infliction of emotional harm. The defendant filed a motion to dismiss. The court held, inter alia, that the plaintiffs stated a cause of action against a specific hotel for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court explained that the plaintiffs alleged that the defendant implemented a willful, wanton, and malicious claim to illegally terminate them; the allegation survived the motion to dismiss because, if proven to be accurate, the elements of the allegation may be in accord with New York's requirements for intentional infliction of emotional distress. People of State of N.Y. by Abrams v. Holiday Inns, Inc., 656 F.Supp. 675, 683.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

W.D.N.Y.Bkrtcy.Ct.

W.D.N.Y.Bkrtcy.Ct.1982. Subsec. (1) quot. but dist. (Erron. cit. as § 846.) A bank commenced an action against a debtor for the balance due on a delinquent installment promissory note. The debtor filed for a Chapter 13 bankruptcy and counterclaimed for damages, as he alleged that the bank had caused him intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court entered judgment for the bank and dismissed the debtor's counterclaim. The court stated that the debtor had a heavy burden to prove that the bank's actions were outrageous and beyond all bounds of decency. It found that most courts look for a planned program of harassment or threats in the bank's actions to see if they were outrageous. The court noted that if the bank's actions were outrageous, then causation and damages were virtually presumed. The court found that repeated telephone calls to the debtor from the bank and visits by bank employees did not constitute conduct outrageous enough to support a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court stated that a creditor did have a right to pursue a delinquent account. The court noted that the debtor's claimed physical symptoms of distress could have been caused by his marital problems or by problems he had with the court over the handling of a surrogate matter as executor for an estate, for which he was suspended from practicing law for two years. The court stated that the debtor failed to prove a causal relation between his physical symptoms and the bank's action. In re Baker, 18 B.R. 243, 244.

E.D.N.C.

E.D.N.C.2017. Com. (d) cit. and quot. in cases quot. in sup. Former employee of college filed an employment-discrimination action against college and its president, alleging, among other things, that president engaged in numerous instances of rude behavior toward him and was thus liable to him for intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted summary judgment for defendants, holding, as a matter of law, that president did not engage in extreme and outrageous conduct, as required to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court explained that, under North Carolina law and Restatement Second of Torts § 46, liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress did not extend to mere insults, indignities, or threats. Howard v. College of the Albemarle, 262 F.Supp.3d 322, 340.

E.D.N.C.2015. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Individual who was arrested for assault on a government official brought various claims against arresting officer and city after the charge against him was dropped, alleging, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). This court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment on plaintiffs' IIED claim, holding that plaintiff failed to proffer any medical documentation or other evidence from which a jury could find that he suffered severe emotional distress within the meaning of Restatement Second of Torts § 46. While plaintiff asserted that it had been almost impossible for him to function since his arrest, he had not sought any treatment for his emotional distress other than one visit to a chaplain two or three weeks after his arrest; although a medical diagnosis was not always necessary, North Carolina courts had found a plaintiff's decision not to seek a medical diagnosis highly probative of the alleged level of distress. Johnson v. City of Fayetteville, 91 F.Supp.3d 775, 814.

E.D.N.C.2013. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (j) quot. in disc. Female former employee, acting pro se, sued former supervisor and male co-worker, asserting pendent state-law claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) in connection with allegations of sexual harassment. Granting defendants' partial motion to dismiss, this court held that plaintiff's allegations that supervisor was rude, gossiped, lied, made plaintiff perform tasks that were outside the scope of her job, and interfered with her ability to work failed to rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to state a claim for IIED under North Carolina law. Furthermore, while co-worker's alleged acts of attempting to kiss her, following her to her car and the restroom, and becoming more aggressive with his flirtations so that she had to physically push him away were improper, they were not the sufficiently extreme and outrageous conduct that North Carolina required for a claim of IIED where, as here, sexual harassment was at issue. Moody-Williams v. LipoScience, 953 F.Supp.2d 677, 690, 692.

E.D.N.C.1995. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee, alleging she was dismissed for filing a sexual-harassment complaint with the EEOC, sued employer for retaliatory discharge and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Employer moved for summary judgment. Granting the motion, the court held that employee was unable to establish a prima facie case for retaliatory discharge, while employer had articulated several nondiscriminatory reasons for the termination. Furthermore, plaintiff, who admitted she never believed her job was in jeopardy for refusing to accede to her supervisor's allegedly harassing demands, had not shown that the distress she claimed to have experienced was so severe as to be unendurable. Bray v. Tenax Corp., 905 F.Supp. 324, 330.

M.D.N.C.

M.D.N.C.2019. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Student brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against, among others, student's purported assailant and university counselor, who was in a romantic relationship with assailant at the time of the purported assault, alleging, inter alia, that, after assailant sexually assaulted her, defendants slandered her when she tried to report the assault and disclosed her confidential sexual-assault report widely within the university. This court denied in part defendants' motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiff alleged sufficient facts to establish a claim for IIED. The court relied on Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, in defining the extreme and outrageous conduct necessary for an IIED claim as conduct that was so extreme and outrageous as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and explained that assailant's alleged sexual assault and counselor's use of confidential university records to slander plaintiff constituted such extreme and outrageous conduct. McClean v. Duke University, 376 F.Supp.3d 585, 612.

M.D.N.C.2014. Subsec. (1) cit. in ftn. Widow of railroad employee brought an action against railroad under the Federal Employers' Liability Act (FELA), alleging that her husband committed suicide in response to harassment he received on the job for refusing to violate certain safety regulations. Granting in part defendant's motion to dismiss, this court held that plaintiff's FELA claim did not satisfy the "zone of danger" test, because her injuries did not result from a physical impact or an imminent threat of physical impact. The court, citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46(1), noted that even severe mental or emotional injuries that led to physical manifestations were insufficient, on their own, to bring a claim within FELA. Fulk v. Norfolk Southern Ry. Co., 35 F.Supp.3d 749, 755.

M.D.N.C.2012. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Undergraduate student sued university for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) and other claims in connection with its conduct toward her in the months following her rape at an off-campus party, including its actions in sending her a letter in which it allegedly encouraged her to transfer to another institution. This court granted summary judgment for university on student's IIED claim, holding that the record did not establish any basis for finding that university's actions amounted to extreme and outrageous conduct or that student suffered severe emotional distress as a result. The court reasoned that there was no evidence that university coerced, duped, or tricked student into transferring; instead, the undisputed facts showed that student initiated the transfer discussions and intended to transfer permanently, and that university merely sent student a form letter based on a template used for any transferring students. Rouse v. Duke University, 914 F.Supp.2d 717, 728.

M.D.N.C.2011. Com. (i) quot. in case quot. in sup. Three former members of university lacrosse team, who were investigated, but not indicted, on charges of rape, sexual assault, and kidnapping, brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against university, city police officers, and others, alleging that defendants made false and inflammatory statements, manufactured inculpatory evidence and concealed exculpatory evidence, and intimidated witnesses. Dismissing plaintiffs' IIED claim, this court held that plaintiffs failed to include any factual allegations as to each plaintiff's emotional or mental disorders, condition, or diagnosis, in order to state a claim that each of them suffered from severe emotional distress; they also failed to sufficiently allege a link between any emotional or mental disorder or condition and the specific misconduct alleged in this claim. McFadyen v. Duke University, 786 F.Supp.2d 887, 979.

M.D.N.C.2004. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. African-American female employee sued former employer for civil-rights violations and intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that she was discriminated against and was fired in retaliation for her EEOC complaint. This court granted defendant summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress failed because she did not provide evidence to support conclusion that she suffered emotional distress, including chronic frustration, insomnia, and fear. Plaintiff's mere allegation that she was frustrated, afraid, and sleep deprived did not show that she suffered severe distress. She did not indicate that medical expert would testify as to her condition, and she did not seek a diagnosis. Kimes v. Laboratory Corp. of America, Inc., 313 F.Supp.2d 555, 568.

M.D.N.C.2004. Com. (d) quot. in ftn. and quot. in case quot. in disc. Librarian who was terminated from her position brought suit against county and its library-services director, alleging violations of various federal statutes and the state disabilities act, and asserting state-common-law claims for intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress. Granting in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, and dismissing plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to allege that defendants' harassment constituted extreme and outrageous conduct that went beyond all bounds of decency and would be considered intolerable in a civilized community. Sheaffer v. County of Chatham, 337 F.Supp.2d 709, 732.

M.D.N.C.2001. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Maintenance employee for private school sued the school and school officials for violations of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act (ADEA) and the Rehabilitation Act, and for negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted the officials' motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that defendants' handling of plaintiff's termination was not extreme and outrageous. Furthermore, plaintiff did not suffer severe emotional distress as required to state a claim for negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiff's conclusory allegation of damages for mental anguish and pain and suffering was insufficient to state an emotional-distress claim. Swaim v. Westchester Academy, Inc., 170 F.Supp.2d 580, 584, 585.

M.D.N.C.2001. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. African-American employee sued employer after being terminated from assembly-line position, alleging, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting in part employer's partial motion to dismiss, this court held, inter alia, that defendant's conduct in giving plaintiff excessive workload and creating a hostile work environment, while deplorable, did not rise to the level of “extreme and outrageous” conduct necessary to sustain claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Thomas v. Northern Telecom, Inc., 157 F.Supp.2d 627, 634.

M.D.N.C.1999. Com. (f) cit. in disc. Employee who was discharged after he suffered a heart attack and went on medical leave sued employer for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting in part defendant's motion to dismiss, the court held, inter alia, that defendant's conduct in terminating plaintiff's employment at a time when plaintiff was in poor health did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous action necessary to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court said that while a defendant's knowledge of a plaintiff's particular susceptibility to distress would bear upon a determination of whether conduct was extreme and outrageous, it was not dispositive. Atkins v. USF Dugan, Inc., 106 F.Supp.2d 799, 811.

M.D.N.C.1999. Com. (f) cit. in disc. Employee who was discharged while on an approved medical leave of absence sued former employer for violations of the Family and Medical Leave Act (“the Act”) and intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress. Granting in part and denying in part defendant's motion to dismiss, the court held that plaintiff's allegations of violations of the Act were sufficient to withstand the motion to dismiss, and that, while the conduct complained of was not so extreme and outrageous as to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, a triable issue existed as to whether defendant should have foreseen that its alleged negligence in the manner in which it terminated plaintiff would have caused her severe emotional distress. Buser v. Southern Food Service, Inc., 73 F.Supp.2d 556, 573.

M.D.N.C.1995. Com. (d) quot. in sup. After police responded to a 911 call reporting a hostage situation in an apartment complex involving a man with psychiatric problems, they proceeded to tackle the man, handcuff him, and have him involuntarily committed. The man sued the city and the police officers for civil-rights violations and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. This court granted defendants summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state an emotional-distress claim, because there was no showing that defendants engaged in extreme and outrageous conduct that was intended to and did in fact cause plaintiff severe and disabling emotional distress. Defendants acted as reasonable police officers in attempting to prevent plaintiff from harming himself and others, and their intent was to keep plaintiff from hurting himself or others. White v. Town of Chapel Hill, 899 F.Supp. 1428, 1438, affirmed 70 F.3d 1264 (4th Cir.1995).

M.D.N.C.1994. Com. (d) cit. in headnotes and quot. in case quot. in sup. A nurse who was fired from her job at a poultry-processing plant sued the plant owner for race discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. This court granted defendant summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that defendant's conduct in terminating plaintiff's employment was not extreme and outrageous. The court stated that it was not considered extreme and outrageous conduct for defendant, after the institution of this lawsuit by plaintiff, to subpoena plaintiff's employment records from a subsequent employer for the purposes of defending against plaintiff's lawsuit. Cromer v. Perdue Farms, Inc., 900 F.Supp. 795, 797, 802, affirmed 65 F.3d 166 (4th Cir.1995).

W.D.N.C.

W.D.N.C.2016. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. African American employee brought, inter alia, a claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress (NIED) against his former employer, alleging that defendant failed to investigate plaintiff's reports of his supervisor's and coworker's misconduct, including that they verbally and physically assaulted him, threatened to have him fired, drove a forklift at him, and ultimately caused his suspension. This court held that defendant's motion for summary judgment would be granted as to plaintiff's NIED claim unless plaintiff could show cause as to why there was a genuine issue of material fact on the element of "severe emotional distress." Quoting Restatement Second of Torts § 46, the court explained that, in accordance with North Carolina law, liability should be imposed only where the distress inflicted was so severe that no reasonable man could be expected to endure it, and plaintiff's testimony regarding his stress, lack of motivation, and difficulty sleeping was not sufficient. Reid v. Dalco Nonwovens, LLC, 154 F.Supp.3d 273, 297.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

W.D.N.C.2011. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. (general cite). As part of their action for unpaid wages under the Fair Labor Standards Act, former employees of a boarding school for troubled teens brought, inter alia, a pendent state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against school. This court allowed defendant's motion to dismiss the IIED claim, holding that defendant's alleged conduct in concealing the violent histories of the boys whom plaintiffs would be supervising was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to state an IIED claim under North Carolina law; while defendant's alleged conduct could be construed as counterproductive to an efficient work environment, there were no plausible allegations that it went beyond all possible bounds of decency, especially where the alleged concealment was viewed in the context of plaintiffs seeking and obtaining employment at a school for troubled teens and knowing from day one of the violent tendencies of the boys they were supervising. Bonham v. Wolf Creek Academy, 767 F.Supp.2d 558, 572.

W.D.N.C.2002. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. African-American employee who alleged that her employment was terminated because of her race and her refusal to sign a false affidavit sued former employer for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting in part defendant's motion to dismiss, the court held, inter alia, that defendant's alleged actions in making a racially discriminatory statement to plaintiff after she refused to sign the affidavit, and then dismissing her from her position, did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Jackson v. Blue Dolphin Communications of North Carolina, L.L.C., 226 F.Supp.2d 785, 794.

W.D.N.C.2000. Cit. in disc. Female employees at brake shop sued employer and plant manager for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress arising from alleged sexual harassment by defendants. Denying defendants summary judgment on emotional-distress claim, this court held, inter alia, that defendants' alleged sexual harassment was sufficiently extreme to support plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotion distress. Cox v. Indian Head Industries, Inc., 123 F.Supp.2d 892, 902.

W.D.N.C.1991. Com. (d) quot. in sup. A stockbroker was discharged from his employment allegedly for trading extensively in accounts for customers he knew had died well before he began such trading. The stockbroker claimed that the real reason for the termination was that he had discovered widespread insider trading was being conducted by employees with the tacit approval of the office manager. The stockbroker sued his employer, alleging, among other things, retaliatory discharge and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted in part the employer's motion for summary judgment. As to the emotional distress claim, the court held that while the employer's actions in terminating the stockbroker may have been insensitive or inappropriate, the court did not believe that the evidence indicated that the conduct was extreme or outrageous. The court found that the stockbroker had merely lost his job that was governed by an employment agreement providing for discharge without cause. Haburjak v. Prudential Bache Securities, Inc., 759 F.Supp. 293, 303.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

W.D.N.C.1990. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Black former and current employees sued an employer for civil rights violations. This court granted summary judgment for the defendant on all of the plaintiffs' § 1981 claims, holding that claims for inadequate pay, demotion, termination, retaliatory discrimination, racial harassment, and failure to promote were not actionable under this statute. The court also granted summary judgment for the defendant on some of the plaintiffs' Title VII claims and on the plaintiffs' pendent jurisdiction claims for wrongful discharge and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court stated that the defendant's conduct did not rise to the level of outrageousness required to establish liability under the latter tort, nor was it established that the defendant's conduct directly caused the physical problems claimed by the plaintiffs. It rejected the plaintiffs' contention that racial discrimination per se exceeds the bounds of decency tolerated by a reasonable society, and emphasized that the plaintiffs admitted that little of the defendant's conduct was overt. Frazier v. First Union Nat. Bank, 747 F.Supp. 1540, 1554.

W.D.N.C.1988. Cit. in disc., quot. in case cit. in sup. A fired sales representative sued her former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that her telephone messages were used by male sales representatives to usurp her prospective sales opportunities, information was secretly retrieved from her business files and her mail, her customer accounts were transferred to others without just cause, and her customers were charged more than others. The court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment, stating that the defendant's alleged conduct did not rise to a level of conduct beyond all possible bounds of decency that could be regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Keziah v. W.M. Brown & Son, Inc., 683 F.Supp. 542, 548, 549, judgment affirmed in part, reversed in part 888 F.2d 322 (4th Cir.1989).

W.D.N.C.1987. Com. (d) cit. and quot. in sup. A 59-year-old worker who was demoted when his employer restructured his department, eliminating his old position, sued the employer for age discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress after his demotion and the creation of a new position to be filled by a younger employee were announced at a meeting. Granting the defendant's motion for summary judgment, this court held that the demotion was not related to age but to experience and that it was handled in a professional and dignified manner. Hardin v. Champion Intern. Corp., 685 F.Supp. 527, 531, 532.

D.N.D.

D.N.D.2006. Cit. in case quot. in sup. After ex-wife unlawfully removed her two children from county's custody during a visitation at a rape crisis center and absconded with them for a period of 18 months before being apprehended, ex-husband, who had been scheduled to regain custody sued county and center for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted defendants' motions for summary judgment, holding that ex-husband failed to raise a genuine issue of material fact as to whether defendants' conduct in creating and carrying out the visitation plan was extreme and outrageous. The court concluded that no reasonable person would describe ex-husband's allegations of misconduct, including defendants' failure to memorialize the visitation plan in writing, as "atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized community." Geraci v. Women's Alliance, Inc., 436 F.Supp.2d 1022, 1036.

N.D.Ohio,

N.D.Ohio, 2016. Cit. in ftn.; coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. and cit. in ftn. Veteran who resided at a domiciliary operated by the Veterans Administration (VA) brought an action under the Federal Tort Claims Act against the United States, after he was sexually propositioned by the VA chaplain who was part of his treatment team. This court granted defendant's motion to dismiss plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding, as a matter of law, that plaintiff failed to state such a claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court reasoned that, while chaplain's actions were inappropriate, they were insufficient to rise to the level of outrageous conduct as a matter of law, and, even if the chaplain's conduct was sufficiently outrageous, plaintiff failed to allege that his resulting mental anguish was so serious that no reasonable person could be expected to endure it. French v. United States, 195 F.Supp.3d 947, 956.

N.D.Ohio, 2016. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee sued former employer and former supervisor, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) and other claims in connection with her termination. This court granted summary judgment for defendants, holding, among other things, that plaintiff's allegations that supervisor was an unpleasant, difficult and bad boss, and that he harassed her, screamed at her, and threw boxes at her office door were insufficiently extreme and outrageous to form the basis of an IIED claim. The court reasoned that having a lousy boss was not a matter beyond all possible bounds of decency, regarded as atrocious, and utterly intolerable in a civilized community, as required to state such a claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. See v. Cleveland Clinic Foundation, 222 F.Supp.3d 569, 576-577.

N.D.Ohio, 2016. Com. (d) quot. in cases quot. in sup. and cit. in ftn.; com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. and cit. in ftn. Employee who wore visible hearing aids on both ears sued employer and supervisor for, among other things, disability discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), after supervisor made two comments regarding employee's hearing and effectively demoted employee. While denying defendants' motion for summary judgment as to plaintiff's discrimination claim, this court granted defendants' motion as to plaintiff's IIED claim, holding that the alleged discriminatory conduct—two isolated comments and an effective demotion—were not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to state a claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Sessin v. Thistledown Racetrack, LLC, 187 F.Supp.3d 869, 880.

N.D.Ohio

N.D.Ohio, 2015. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee of an office-supply store brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, against former employer and others, alleging that defendants discriminated, harassed, and retaliated against her based on her three pregnancies, her requests for leave due to the pregnancies, and her need to express breast milk; defendants asserted that employee was terminated for threatening a coworker in violation of the store's code of conduct. This court granted summary judgment for defendants, holding that plaintiff failed to point to any evidence of injury sufficient to support an IIED claim. The court noted that the Supreme Court of Ohio followed the definition of "extreme and outrageous conduct" set forth in Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Flagg v. Staples the Office Superstore East, Inc., 138 F.Supp.3d 908, 920.

N.D.Ohio.

N.D.Ohio, 2012. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) cit. in sup. and quot. in case quot. in sup. Arrestee and his parents brought a civil-rights action against police department, police officers, and others in connection with an early morning incident in which officers, with the intent of citing arrestee for driving erratically, forced their way into plaintiffs' home and shot arrestee with a stun gun. Granting defendants' motion for judgment on the pleadings as to parents' claims, this court held that parents could not rely on any aspect of the arrest in support of their claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), because arrestee had pled guilty to resisting arrest, which constituted an admission under Ohio law that the arrest was conducted in a lawful and reasonable manner; liability for IIED could be found only where the defendant's conduct was both extreme and outrageous, and, as a logical matter, if an act was reasonable, i.e., neither tortious nor criminal, it could not qualify as extreme and outrageous. Hayward v. Cleveland Clinic Foundation, 878 F.Supp.2d 860, 865.

N.D.Ohio

N.D.Ohio, 2010. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Female employee of local union who allegedly was sexually harassed by local's former president brought, inter alia, a state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against local union, international union, and former president. Granting summary judgment for defendants on that claim, this court held that plaintiff's allegations that representatives of international union observed former president's harassing conduct toward her during labor negotiations but took no steps to prevent it and that international union failed to timely respond to her complaint of sexual harassment did not assert conduct that was sufficiently outrageous to state an IIED claim against international union; in addition, plaintiff's IIED claim against local union and former president failed because her statements in her affidavit that she suffered severe emotional distress, anxiety, sleeplessness, and nightmares were insufficient to demonstrate that she sustained severe and debilitating emotional injury proximately caused by former president's alleged conduct. Kendel v. Local 17AUnited Food and Commercial Workers, 748 F.Supp.2d 732, 744.

N.D.Ohio,

N.D.Ohio, 2009. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Employee who discovered that she was pregnant after accepting a position with corporate employer as a business analyst, sued employer after it terminated her, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. This court granted summary judgment for defendant on that claim, finding that plaintiff failed to meet the severe mental anguish element for the tort. The court reasoned that, while plaintiff suffered some stress due to the loss of her job, she pointed to no evidence that she suffered mental anguish of a nature that no reasonable person could be expected to bear. Pizzimenti v. Oldcastle Glass, Inc., 666 F.Supp.2d 839, 848.

N.D.Ohio

N.D.Ohio, 2007. Quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employees of village brought various claims against village and supervisor in connection with allegations of sexual harassment by supervisor. Adopting the magistrate's report and recommendation, this court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiffs' claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress failed as a matter of law. The court concluded that nothing in the facts asserted by plaintiffs supported such a claim, reasoning that the conduct complained of by plaintiffs, including sexist jokes and behavior, yelling, and poor management skills, did not satisfy the high burden of extreme and outrageous conduct that had to be met under Ohio law. Hale v. Village of Madison, 493 F.Supp.2d 928, 940-941.

N.D.Ohio, 2006. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Female factory employee whose employment was terminated sued former employer, union local, and employee-assistance-program counselor for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's emotional-distress claim failed, since plaintiff did not show: that employer's reliance on a county prosecutor's statement and plaintiff's own admissions to conclude that she stole employees' social security numbers was unreasonable; that defendants engaged in disparate treatment; that counselor's sexual advances were unwelcome; that counselor or anyone else retaliated against her; or that defendants intended to cause her emotional distress. Finally, termination from employment, even if wrongful, was not outrageous conduct. Jaquez v. Herbert, 447 F.Supp.2d 858, 876.

N.D.Ohio, 2005. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. African-American worker brought a civil-rights action against his employer, claiming that he was racially discriminated against in various ways, including not being rehired following a business downturn. Granting in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's allegations did not meet the standard for outrageous conduct to support his claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiff's only specific assertion of defendant's outrageous conduct was that his supervisor had laughed off his concerns about being forced to enter a manhole without safety precautions, despite plaintiff's preexisting fear of enclosed spaces. Since plaintiff did not show that he had suffered any serious anguish as a result, he could not prevail on his emotional-distress claim. Guy v. Central Locating Service, Ltd., 389 F.Supp.2d 843, 857.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

N.D.Ohio, 2005. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Production supervisor brought claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress against automobile manufacturer and production worker she supervised, among other claims. This court granted summary judgment for defendants on the emotional-distress claims, holding, inter alia, that, even if worker made threats against plaintiff in confidential communications to management, the threats were not extreme and outrageous, and were not the proximate cause of any psychological injury to plaintiff. Additionally, plaintiff did not show that manufacturer intended to cause her emotional distress, engaged in extreme and outrageous conduct, or caused severe emotional distress, three required elements of the claim. Langley v. DaimlerChrysler Corp., 407 F.Supp.2d 897, 905, affirmed 502 F.3d 475 (6th Cir.2007).

N.D.Ohio, 2003. Coms. (d) and (g) quot. in case quot. in disc. Truck driver sued employer, terminal manager, and labor-relations manager, claiming racial discrimination, defamation, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that managers engaged in outrageous conduct by alleging, at his grievance hearings, that he had sexually harassed female hardware-store employee. This court granted defendants' motion for partial dismissal, holding, inter alia, that because plaintiff would not be able to show that defendants' behavior was outrageous without referring to terms of union collective-bargaining agreement, his emotional-distress claim was preempted by § 301 of Labor Management Relations Act. Defendants acted under agreement's terms when they made statements. Fitzgerald v. Roadway Exp., Inc., 262 F.Supp.2d 849, 858.

N.D.Ohio, 2002. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup. After being fired in a company reorganization, phone-company employee who suffered from arthritis, colitis, and migranes and her disabled child sued employer company for violations of Americans with Disabilities Act and intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. This court granted defendant summary judgment on emotional-distress claim, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff had submitted neither expert testimony nor testimony of lay-witness family members who were acquainted with her and could testify that plaintiff suffered the kind of severe emotional response required under Ohio law. Plaintiff's own affidavit did not provide guarantee of genuineness necessary to survive motion for summary judgment. Anthony v. United Telephone Co. of Ohio, 277 F.Supp.2d 763, 777, affirmed 110 Fed.Appx. 680 (6th Cir.2004).

N.D.Ohio, 2002. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Members and officers of local union asserted, in part, a state-law claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress against international union and its officers, alleging that defendants removed local officer from office on pretextual grounds and threatened to blacklist him, take his job, and end his union membership. This court granted defendants summary judgment on emotional-distress claim, holding, inter alia, that defendant officers' statements to local officers that plaintiff officer would never work as a union insulator or hold office if contractors' allegations about plaintiff officer were true were not outrageous. While defendant officer's raised voice and use of obscenities might have caused plaintiff officer to feel threatened, the threats to take actions that international union would be justified in taking did not constitute outrageous conduct. Conway v. International Ass'n of Heat and Frost Insulators and Asbestos Workers, 209 F.Supp.2d 731, 761, affirmed 93 Fed.Appx. 780 (6th Cir.2004).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

N.D.Ohio, 2002. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Female employee brought action against employer and male supervisor, alleging sexual discrimination, sexual harassment, retaliation, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting defendants summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that supervisor's questioning paternity of plaintiff's child, his yelling at employees, and his generally insulting demeanor, while in poor taste, did not rise to level of extreme and outrageous conduct to support claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Roelen v. Akron Beacon Journal, 199 F.Supp.2d 685, 696.

N.D.Ohio, 2002. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Plaintiff, who was arrested for possession of illegal drugs and held for 75 days after police officers conducted an illegal search of his residence, where a police informant had planted the drugs, sued officers, among others, for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Denying in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether defendants' intentional conduct was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to go beyond the bounds of decency, and as to whether their conduct caused plaintiff serious emotional distress for which he required medical treatment. Sinick v. County of Summit, 196 F.Supp.2d 560, 569, reversed in part, appeal dismissed in part 76 Fed.Appx. 675 (6th Cir.2003).

N.D.Ohio, 2001. Quot. in case quot. in sup. Employee who alleged that she was sexually harassed by supervisor sued employer and supervisor for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Denying in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether supervisor's alleged propositions, veiled threats, and physical contact were sufficiently outrageous and extreme to support plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. McCormick v. Kmart Distribution Center, 163 F.Supp.2d 807, 831.

N.D.Ohio, 2001. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Employee who alleged that his employment was terminated because of his disability brought, in part, a pendent state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against his former employer. Granting in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that defendant's treatment of plaintiff in terms of making work assignments and applying its sick-leave policy prior and subsequent to plaintiff's injury did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Ray v. Libbey Glass, Inc., 133 F.Supp.2d 610, 620, judgment affirmed 38 Fed.Appx. 302 (6th Cir.2002).

N.D.Ohio, 2000. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. African-American customers of hair salon sued salon for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with defendant's alleged failure to provide certain services of particular interest to patrons in plaintiffs' position, or to train staff on care, treatment, and styling of African-American hair. Entering partial summary judgment for defendant, the court held, among other things, that, even if plaintiffs were able to establish that they had been humiliated and embarrassed, they had failed to prove that defendant engaged in conduct so extreme as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency. Halton v. Great Clips, Inc., 94 F.Supp.2d 856, 871.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

N.D.Ohio, 2000. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Employee of public school district sued school board and superintendent for whom she worked for, inter alia, "hostile work environment" sexual harassment and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Entering partial summary judgment for defendants, the court held, in part, that material factual issues existed as to whether plaintiff had been the target of gender-based discrimination; however, superintendent's conduct in allegedly making false accusations against plaintiff, berating her, changing her daily job expectations, and encouraging her to quit did not rise to the level of outrageousness necessary to support a claim for the intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plotner v. Swanton Local Bd. of Educ., 85 F.Supp.2d 747, 754.

N.D.Ohio, 1998. Cit. in disc. A company fired a 59-year-old employee, along with 18 other employees, as part of a reorganization and reduction in force. The 59-year-old employee sued the company, alleging, among other claims, violation of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted defendant summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state an emotional-distress claim, because being fired due to age discrimination was not outrageous conduct that could give rise to a valid claim of emotional distress. Godfredson v. Hess & Clark, Inc., 996 F.Supp. 730, 740, affirmed 173 F.3d 365 (6th Cir.1999).

N.D.Ohio, 1998. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. A Catholic elementary-school teacher who was dismissed for violation of her contractual obligation to reflect the values of the Catholic Church after she became sexually involved with a married man sued the school, the diocese, and three school employees for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that, in light of plaintiff's violation of her employment contract, plaintiff's allegations that she was unfairly disciplined, that defendants failed to renew her teaching contract, and that the school wrongfully instituted a no-smoking policy did not assert conduct that was sufficiently outrageous to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Gosche v. Calvert High School, 997 F.Supp. 867, 873, affirmed 181 F.3d 101 (6th Cir.1999).

N.D.Ohio, 1998. Cit. in headnote, cit. in case cit. in disc. A postal clerk who suffered migraine headaches sued the United States Postal Service pursuant to the Family and Medical Leave Act, claiming that defendant wrongly discharged her from employment for failure to maintain a regular work schedule, and that the discharge was an intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted defendant's motion to dismiss plaintiff's claims for wrongful discharge and intentional infliction of emotional distress, but denied defendant's motion for summary judgment on plaintiff's Family and Medical Leave Act claim. The court held, inter alia, that plaintiff could not bring a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because this claim was within the Federal Employee's Compensation Act, and even if the court had jurisdiction, plaintiff failed to state an emotional-distress claim because defendant's conduct was not outrageous. Vargo-Adams v. U.S. Postal Service, 992 F.Supp. 939, 940, 944.

N.D.Ohio, 1997. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in disc. A white female former employee sued her former employer and co-workers for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendants harassed her because of her common law marriage to a black male co-worker and then terminated her for misconduct and poor attendance. Granting in part defendants' motion to dismiss, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to show that defendants' alleged actions rose to the level of outrageousness required to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Ohio law. DeLoach v. American Red Cross, 967 F.Supp. 265, 268.

N.D.Ohio, 1997. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. A male former employee brought an action for sexual harassment and retaliatory discharge under Title VII against his former employer, a co-worker, and a supervisor and asserted, in part, a state-law claim for intentional or reckless infliction of emotional distress. Granting in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that individual defendants' alleged acts in making sexual comments to plaintiff, touching plaintiff's chest, sides, and shoulders, ridiculing plaintiff and using foul language around him, and falsely subjecting him to discipline were insults, indignities, and annoyances that did not rise to the level of outrageousness required to sustain a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Griswold v. Fresenius USA, Inc., 978 F.Supp. 718, 733.

N.D.Ohio, 1997. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Former employee sued former employer, co-worker, and supervisor for, inter alia, sexual harassment in violation of Title VII and state common law, and negligent and intentional failure to provide a safe workplace. Defendants moved to dismiss. Granting the motions in part and denying them in part, the court held that, while Title VII did not permit individual liability, co-worker and supervisor could be found individually liable for sexual harassment under Ohio Rev.Code § 4112.99, and that Ohio recognized negligent failure to provide a safe workplace as a valid cause of action; however, dismissal was appropriate as to the claim for intentional failure to provide a safe workplace, which the court treated as a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because the conduct complained of was not sufficiently extreme or outrageous to support recovery. Griswold v. Fresenius USA, Inc., 964 F.Supp. 1166, 1174.

N.D.Ohio, 1994. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in disc. Family members of a Navy sailor who was killed in a ship's explosion sued a television network for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that the network implied that the sailor was a homosexual and that he purposefully caused the ship's explosion to commit suicide. This court granted the network summary judgment, holding that the emotional-distress claim failed because the broadcast did not constitute extreme and outrageous conduct in that the reporter had no malicious intent and his only purpose was to accurately report on the government's allegations and findings. Furthermore, there was a complete failure of proof of serious emotional distress, as plaintiffs offered no reports of doctors, social workers, psychologists, or other experts. Hartwig v. National Broadcasting Co., 863 F.Supp. 558, 562, decision affirmed 76 F.3d 379 (6th Cir.1996).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

N.D.Ohio, 1994. Cit. generally in disc., com. (i) quot. in disc. AIDS patient who experienced a severe non-AIDS related allergic reaction sued hospital admitting physician and others for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress after defendant refused to treat him. Plaintiff alleged that defendant's refusal to treat was motivated by extreme and outrageous discrimination, as evidenced by his statement that an AIDS patient, once admitted, became impossible to discharge. Denying defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held that a jury could conclude that the emotional distress plaintiff complained of came as a result of learning that his underlying illness was the true reason that defendant refused him treatment. Howe v. Hull, 874 F.Supp. 779, 789, 790.

N.D.Ohio,1993. Cit. in case quot. in disc., cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case cit. in sup., com. (h) quot. in ftn. Employee who alleged that she was sexually harassed by co-workers sued her employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held that defendant could not be held vicariously liable on plaintiff's claim, since there was no proof that the offending co-workers acted within the scope of employment or that defendant was negligent in failing to prevent their sexual harassment of plaintiff. The court stated, moreover, that the offensive conduct alleged by plaintiff, i.e., pin-ups of scantily clad celebrities in common areas and the receipt of pornographic photographs in plaintiff's locker, was not so outrageous as to be utterly intolerable in a civilized community and thus did not rise to the level of tortious conduct necessary for plaintiff's claim. Baab v. AMR Services Corp., 811 F.Supp. 1246, 1268-1270.

N.D.Ohio, 1989. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. and quot. generally in sup. (Erron. cit. as subsec. (1).) A black female secretary was repeatedly denied job upgrades, promotions, and salary increases by her employer, allegedly causing her to suffer serious physical and emotional illness. She sued her employer for damages, alleging racial discrimination in violation of federal civil rights laws and intentional infliction of emotional distress in violation of state law. This court dismissed the complaint and held, inter alia, that the plaintiff failed to assert evidence sufficient to maintain a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court stated that under Ohio law the standards necessary to sustain that claim in employment actions were stringent and that the plaintiff's claims of racial bias, harassment and humiliation were not so extreme or outrageous as to warrant relief. It reached this conclusion despite acknowledging that the plaintiff had a demoralizing relationship with her inept, unyielding, and insensitive supervisor. Anthony v. TRW, Inc., 726 F.Supp. 175, 178-179, 181.

N.D.Ohio, 1989. Subsec. (1) quot. but dist. Employees sued their employers for sexual and religious discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The defendants moved for summary judgment on all of the plaintiffs' claims. Granting the defendants' motion on the intentional infliction of emotional distress claim, the court held that the defendants' conduct as alleged by the plaintiffs did not as a matter of law rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct as defined under Ohio law. Taylor v. National Group of Companies, Inc., 729 F.Supp. 575, 578.

N.D.Ohio, 1987. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in disc. A daughter sued her father for intentional or negligent infliction of emotional distress after he married another woman while he was still married to her mother. This court dismissed the case for failure to state a claim, holding that bigamy coupled with neglect was not the type of conduct that was so outrageous and extreme that it supported a cause of action for the intentional or negligent infliction of emotional distress. Starr v. Corley, 662 F.Supp. 219, 221.

N.D.Ohio.Bkrtcy.Ct.

N.D.Ohio Bkrtcy.Ct.2016. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Neighbors filed an adversary proceeding against Chapter 7 debtors, asserting claims for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) based on allegations that debtors falsely stated at a township zoning-board public hearing that neighbors tried to run over their son with neighbors' vehicle. This court denied neighbors' IIED claim, holding that neighbors failed to show that debtors' statements were extreme and outrageous, as required to state a claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court explained that, under § 46, extreme and outrageous conduct gave rise to liability when it was so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. In re Palmer, 555 B.R. 611, 627.

N.D.Ohio Bkrtcy.Ct.

N.D.Ohio Bkrtcy.Ct.2013. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in ftn. Teacher, who had received a Chapter 7 discharge more than seven and a half years prior, filed a motion to partially seal her bankruptcy records, alleging that, as a result of unfettered public access to information about her bankruptcy, she had been subjected to ridicule by her students, fellow teachers, and the community at large, which caused her severe emotional distress and threatened her job performance. This court denied the motion, holding that, even if that the adverse effects that debtor was suffering as a result of the ridicule were otherwise sufficient to give rise to a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46(1), debtor had failed to provide a causal link between the alleged injury and public access to her bankruptcy information. In re Creighton, 490 B.R. 240, 245.

S.D.Ohio,

S.D.Ohio, 2018. Cit. in disc., adopted in cases cit. in disc.; coms. (d), (g), and (h) quot. in disc. Independent insurance agent brought an action against insurer, asserting claims for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) arising after she was allegedly not offered servicing rights to insurer's books of policies and was terminated from an agency agreement for failing to meet production goals. This court granted summary judgment in part for defendant, holding that plaintiff failed to demonstrate conduct so outrageous as to support her IIED claim.

The court quoted Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, in defining the standard of offensive conduct required to prevail on an IIED claim, noting that, under § 46, Comment g, liability for emotional distress was not imposed simply because a defendant caused distress by enforcing his legal rights in a permissible way, like terminating an agency agreement for a failure to meet production goals. McGrath v. Nationwide Mutual Insurance Company, 295 F.Supp.3d 796, 815-816.

S.D.Ohio

S.D.Ohio, 2015. Illus. 14 quot. in sup. Sister and daughter of decedent brought claims for intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress against county coroner who declared decedent's death a suicide and had his body transported to a hospital before plaintiffs arrived at his house. This court granted defendant's motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiffs failed to state a claim for intentional or negligent infliction of emotional distress to the extent that their claims were based on learning that decedent had died of suicide. Although learning of decedent's death caused plaintiffs emotional distress, defendant was required by statute to determine the cause of death and the manner and mode in which the death occurred, and to notify any known relatives of decedent's death, and, under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, a defendant was not liable for a plaintiff's emotional distress if the defendant did no more than insist upon his or her legal rights in a permissible way, even if the defendant was well aware that such insistence was certain to cause emotional distress. Elfers v. Varnau, 101 F.Supp.3d 753, 765.

S.D.Ohio,

S.D.Ohio, 2014. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Arrestee brought, inter alia, a pendent state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against the United States, alleging that she was arrested for drug trafficking based on a mistaken identification that the Federal Bureau of Investigation provided to city police. This court granted defendant's motion to dismiss, holding that defendant's improper identification of plaintiff leading to her mistaken arrest was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous pursuant to Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, to state a claim for IIED. Snyder v. U.S., 990 F.Supp.2d 818, 835.

S.D.Ohio, 2013. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. Victim of a home invasion by unknown assailants brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, against two paramedics who were dispatched to the scene, alleging that defendants left the scene without providing plaintiff with medical care and that they "ridiculed" her in their incident report. This court dismissed that claim without prejudice, holding that it was unclear whether plaintiff had adequately stated such a claim, based on the limited factual allegations contained in the complaint. The court pointed out that plaintiff did not indicate when she read defendants' report or what effect it had on her, nor did she provide any description of the emotional distress that she suffered as a result. Shoup v. Doyle, 974 F.Supp.2d 1058, 1092.

S.D.Ohio

S.D.Ohio, 2010. Cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in sup. Law-school student disciplined by university for honor-code violations brought, inter alia, claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against university. This court granted judgment as a matter of law for defendant, holding that no conduct alleged to have been engaged in by any person associated with plaintiff's discipline would evoke the exclamation "outrageous" from any reasonable juror, and plaintiff had presented no evidence of any psychological injury, severe or not, stemming from his suspension from university. Valente v. University of Dayton, 689 F.Supp.2d 910, 925.

S.D.Ohio, 2007. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. Purchaser of manufactured home sued seller and manufacturer of the home for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress, in connection with various alleged delays and defects in the construction of the home. Granting summary judgment for defendants, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to raise a genuine issue of material fact that his emotional injury was both severe and debilitating as required by Ohio courts. The court pointed out that plaintiff had not sought medical treatment or psychological counseling for the depression and strained relationship he allegedly experienced as a result of the problems surrounding the home. Lang v. D & J Homes, 494 F.Supp.2d 799, 809, 810.

S.D.Ohio, 2007. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup. and adopted, com. (d) quot. in sup. Former police officer sued city and others, alleging that he was subjected to varying degrees of harassment by co-workers, including psychological intimidation, as well as theft of personal property from his home. Granting in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that there was no genuine issue of material fact as to plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because plaintiff had filed exhibits, without any analysis, in response to defendant's assertions that the record was devoid of any evidence of extreme or outrageous conduct on the part of city, or of any mental anguish or suffering endured by plaintiff that no reasonable person could be expected to endure. The court granted plaintiff leave to file a motion for reconsideration spelling out specific evidence supporting the claim. Roemer v. City of Dayton, 496 F.Supp.2d 873, 885.

S.D.Ohio, 2006. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. (p. 73 erron. cit. as § 73). Former employee, who allegedly had been diagnosed with bipolar disorder, panic disorder, eating disorder, posttraumatic stress disorder, and anxiety, brought suit for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress against former employer, claiming that she was subjected to closer scrutiny than her co-workers, was not given instructions on performing her job, was unfairly reprimanded, and was not paid her earned but unused vacation and sick days, and that her performance evaluations contained false statements. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that defendant's alleged conduct was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Edwards v. Dialysis Clinic, Inc., 423 F.Supp.2d 789, 799.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

S.D.Ohio, 2003. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Employee with carpal tunnel syndrome and tendonitis sued employer for discrimination under Americans with Disabilities Act and state law, and for intentional infliction of emotional distress following employer's alleged failure to accommodate employee based on her condition. Granting in part employer's motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that employee's emotional-distress claim was time-barred, and that employer's adverse action in disregarding employee's medical condition, even if discriminatory, did not amount to infliction of emotional distress without proof of something more. Benge v. General Motors Corp., 267 F.Supp.2d 794, 804.

S.D.Ohio, 2003. Subsec. (1) adopted in case cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Male employee who alleged that he had been sexually harassed by female co-workers brought, in part, a state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against co-workers and union representatives. Sustaining defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held that union representatives' conduct of glaring at plaintiff while standing outside his work station and failing to conduct an impartial investigation of his complaints was not so extreme and outrageous as to create a fact issue on plaintiff's claim. Co-workers' acts of giving plaintiff a brief, unwanted massage and making sexually suggestive comments to him, while inappropriate and insulting, did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct as a matter of law. Greenwood v. Delphi Automotive Systems Inc., 257 F.Supp.2d 1047, 1072, affirmed 103 Fed.Appx. 609 (6th Cir.2004).

S.D.Ohio, 2003. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. generally in case quot. in sup. Arrestee brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against arresting officer, city police department, and officer's superiors following acquittal on underlying claim. Granting defendants summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that lawful detention and arrest, absent a showing of bad faith by officer, could not give rise to tort action for infliction of emotional distress. Hale v. Vance, 267 F.Supp.2d 725, 736.

S.D.Ohio, 2003. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in sup. After county fired a female custodial worker when she requested leave due to harassing conduct by her supervisor and other county employees, worker sued county board of commissioners for sexual harassment, hostile work environment, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. This court granted defendants summary judgment, holding that plaintiff's emotional-distress claim failed, since defendants' actions were not discriminatory or outrageous. Even had plaintiff demonstrated that defendants could be found liable under Title VII, such a conclusion would not be enough, since discrimination, by itself, was insufficient to support claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Ohio law. Shoemaker-Stephen v. Montgomery County Bd. of Com'rs, 262 F.Supp.2d 866, 888.

S.D.Ohio, 2003. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in sup. Former employee asserted a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress in her employment-discrimination action against employer, alleging that she was terminated after being granted medical leave based on a diagnosis of depression. Granting in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that although the facts adduced by plaintiff gave rise to genuine issues relating to claims of discrimination and retaliation, they did not describe conduct that was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Swanson v. Senior Resource Connection, 254 F.Supp.2d 945, 962.

S.D.Ohio, 2003. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Parents of third-grade student sued school and teacher for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, after teacher looked inside student's pants in an attempt to find money missing from teacher's desk. Granting in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that teacher's conduct did not rise to the level of outrageousness required to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Watkins v. Millennium School, 290 F.Supp.2d 890, 903.

S.D.Ohio, 2002. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in disc. African-American employee who alleged that she was wrongfully demoted from a supervisory position because of her race sued employer for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Sustaining defendant's motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff did not establish a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress; defendant's conduct in demoting plaintiff against her will was not outrageous, and the fact that plaintiff continued to see the psychologist whom she had been seeing prior to her demotion did not establish the existence of severe and debilitating emotional distress resulting from her demotion. Bush v. American Honda Motor Co., Inc., 227 F.Supp.2d 780, 800.

S.D.Ohio, 2002. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. A hospital patient's father was arrested after he engaged in an argument with hospital security guard, who had called police for assistance. Father and his wife sued police officer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, assault and battery, and false imprisonment, inter alia. This court granted officer's motion for summary judgment on the emotional-distress claim, holding, inter alia, that there was no evidence that officer's act of arresting father and escorting him out of hospital either intentionally or recklessly caused wife severe emotional distress, the arrest did not constitute extreme or outrageous conduct, and plaintiffs failed to show severe emotional distress, as wife merely “had a hard time” dealing with the situation. Shevlin v. Cheatham, 211 F.Supp.2d 963, 971.

S.D.Ohio, 2002. Com. (d) quot. in sup. and adopted in cases cit. in disc., com. (h) cit. in case cit. in disc. After cancer patient's employment was terminated by employer, patient sued employer for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that defendant's conduct in discharging plaintiff was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court said that defendant had granted plaintiff an extended leave of absence and had otherwise accommodated her prior to her discharge. White v. Honda of America Mfg., Inc., 191 F.Supp.2d 933, 955.

S.D.Ohio, 2001. Subsec. (1) quot. in ftn., com. (d) quot. generally in ftn. Three mothers and their infant children brought suit for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress against department store that prohibited plaintiffs' breast-feeding activities in public areas of its stores. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that, assuming that defendant had a special relationship with plaintiffs, plaintiffs' emotional-distress claim based on public policy nevertheless failed because defendant had discharged its duty to refrain from insulting plaintiffs or treating them unlawfully by extending to them at all time respectful and decent treatment while exercising its lawful right to prohibit breast-feeding in its stores' public areas. Derungs v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 162 F.Supp.2d 861, 869, affirmed 374 F.3d 428 (6th Cir.2004).

S.D.Ohio, 2001. Subsec. (1) and coms. adopted in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Temporary-employment-agency employee assigned to a United States Air Force base by agency's customer brought suit for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress against United States, alleging that she was sexually harassed by members of Air Force. Sustaining defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that although one member's conduct in making sexually offensive comments and staring at plaintiff was inappropriate for the workplace and might have caused plaintiff to feel hurt or embarrassed, his actions were not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Dodge v. U.S., 162 F.Supp.2d 873, 887.

S.D.Ohio, 2001. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. After restaurant customer was punched by another customer during restaurant brawl, injured customer sued city, police officers, assailant, assailant's friends, restaurant, and security guard for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. This court granted summary judgment for one of assailant's friends on emotional-distress claim, holding, in part, that even if friend made a conscious decision to allow his friends to commit assault and battery upon plaintiff and then help them flee, those actions, without more, were not extreme and outrageous. Although plaintiff alleged that he suffered emotional distress to the point of not being able to perform normal daily functions or work for some period of time, this bare allegation was insufficient to defeat summary-judgment motion. Neuens v. City of Columbus, 169 F.Supp.2d 780, 790, reversed and vacated 303 F.3d 667 (6th Cir.2002).

S.D.Ohio, 2000. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in disc. Black female former middle-school assistant principal sued school district, claiming that she was transferred to another school and denied of promotions in violation of federal civil-rights statutes and Ohio statutory and common law. Granting defendant partial summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that defendant's conduct was not so extreme and outrageous as to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Black v. Columbus Public Schools, 124 F.Supp.2d 550, 587, affirmed in part, vacated in part 79 Fed.Appx. 735 (6th Cir.2003).

S.D.Ohio, 1999. Adopted in case quot. in disc. Employee who was discharged sued her former employer for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that defendant's managers' acts of repeatedly asking plaintiff when she was planning to resign, not replacing her assistant, taking money from her paycheck for being a few minutes late, joking about her in the office, retaining her personal possessions after she was discharged, and inquiring into her personal beliefs to change her mind about her religion did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Hartley v. Dayton Computer Supply, 106 F.Supp.2d 976, 982.

S.D.Ohio, 1997. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. Children of a suicide victim sued a television station and its reporter and cameraman for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that defendants entered the victim's home, filmed her body, and broadcast the film on the news. This court granted in part and denied in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that a fact issue existed as to whether defendants' actions were extreme and outrageous, and that defendants were not privileged by the First Amendment to enter the victim's home without permission. Barrett v. Outlet Broadcasting, Inc., 22 F.Supp.2d 726, 747.

S.D.Ohio, 1997. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. A former employee who alleged that he was laid off and that two or more native white Americans were hired before and/or subsequent to his termination sued his former employer and supervisor for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that he was subjected to a racially hostile work environment and discrimination. Denying in part defendants' motion to dismiss, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's allegations, construed in a light most favorable to plaintiff, supported a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court stated that proof of the claim required evidence that extreme and outrageous conduct by defendants caused plaintiff to suffer severe emotional distress. Osman v. Isotec, Inc., 960 F.Supp. 118, 122, 123.

S.D.Ohio, 1995. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Construction contractor for a fast-food restaurant sued restaurant for intentional infliction of emotional distress and breach of contract, among other claims, alleging that defendant's failure to pay for work performed constituted extreme and outrageous conduct. This court dismissed in part, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state an emotional distress claim, because defendant's conduct was not extreme and outrageous. The court stated that plaintiff alleged breach of contract and then tried to make that into an intentional-infliction case merely by adding that defendant did it to cause emotional distress and that defendant was successful. Klusty v. Taco Bell Corp., 909 F.Supp. 516, 522.

S.D.Ohio, 1990. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in sup. A 59-year-old man was demoted, replaced, and, two years later, terminated. He sued his former employer on a theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that his termination was in callous disregard of his rights and past services on behalf of the defendant, and that such disregard constituted outrageous and extreme conduct, even if the defendant's officials were cool and calm at the termination meeting. The court granted the defendant summary judgment, holding that the plaintiff's termination was not extreme and outrageous conduct, and noting that the mere unjustifiable nature of a termination did not make it outrageous, and certainly not so extreme in character and degree as to make it beyond all possible bounds of decency. Hawley v. Dresser Industries, Inc., 737 F.Supp. 445, 469.

S.D.Ohio, 1988. Subsec. (1) quot. in case cit. in disc. A group of employees sued their union for violation of its duty of fair representation, fraud, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The suit was removed to this court because most of the plaintiffs' counts presented an action under the Labor Management Relations Act. This court denied in part and granted in part the plaintiffs' motion to remand the action back to state court, holding that the counts requiring the court to interpret the terms of the plaintiffs' collective bargaining agreement were preempted from being pleaded under state law and thus could not be remanded. However, the plaintiffs' allegations that they had suffered emotional distress, because they had been intentionally barred from participation in discussions on modification of the collective bargaining agreement, did not require interpretation of the agreement, and thus were not preempted and could be remanded. Adkins v. General Motors Corp., 713 F.Supp. 1043, 1053, affirmed in part, vacated in part946 F.2d 1201 (6th Cir.1991).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

S.D.Ohio, 1988. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. An employee sued her employer for sexual harassment and discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court awarded the plaintiff compensation based on the degree and duration of the harassment and the harm that she suffered. The court stated that the defendant's harassment, which continued for four years, and his refusal to perform mandatory performance and salary reviews for the plaintiff because she refused his sexual advances constituted extreme and outrageous conduct, and that the testimony of the plaintiff's psychologists supported her claim that she suffered severe emotional distress as a result of the defendant's acts. Shrout v. Black Clawson Co., 689 F.Supp. 774, 782.

S.D.Ohio, 1988. Coms. (d) and (e) quot. in disc. A female prison employee sued her male supervisor and the prison superintendent, claiming that her supervisor sexually harassed her by unwanted touching and sexual solicitation and that the superintendent fired her following her complaints and her unwillingness to be harassed. The plaintiff's causes of action included pendent state claims for invasion of privacy, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and assault and battery. In a prior decision, the district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss certain parts of the complaint, not including the state claims. This court granted the defendants' motion for limited summary judgment in part, holding, inter alia, that the defendants were entitled to summary judgment on the assault and battery claim. The court noted that the privacy and emotional distress claims for compensatory and punitive damages remained, as they were not challenged and the court had jurisdiction over them. It cautioned that even though an employee might be especially susceptible to emotional distress arising from the captive audience nature of an employment relationship, the language and conduct of co-workers and supervisors must be very extreme to sustain the cause of action. Valerio v. Dahlberg, 716 F.Supp. 1031, 1041.

S.D.Ohio, 1986. Coms. (d) and (h) quot. in sup. An employee sued her former employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress after she was terminated from her employment, allegedly on the basis of her age and sex. This court granted summary judgment for the employer, holding that the employer's conduct did not rise to the level of being so extreme and outrageous so as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, despite the alleged pattern of pressure and harassment suffered by the employee, the intentional downgrading of the employee's appraisal, and the threats of demotion and/or termination. Crawford v. ITT Consumer Financial Corp., 653 F.Supp. 1184, 1192.

S.D.Ohio, 1986. Cit. and quot. in case cit. in disc., coms. (j) and (d) quot. in sup. A discharged female employee sued her former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court found for the employer, holding that the employer's conduct in firing the employee because she engaged in an extramarital sexual affair with her supervisor was not so extreme in degree as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, or to be regarded as atrocious, and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Oldfather v. Ohio Dept. of Transp., 653 F.Supp. 1167, 118*l*, 1182, dismissed 816 F.2d 681 (6th Cir. 1987).

S.D.Ohio, 1985. Cit. generally in disc. The president and principal shareholder of a corporation and his wife brought an action against another corporation, alleging tortious interference with prospective business advantage and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The claims arose from the defendant corporation's breach of contract with the plaintiffs' corporation. Plaintiffs' corporation had previously sued defendant for the breach. The district court sustained defendant's motion to dismiss the plaintiffs' tortious interference claim, holding that it would amount to a relitigation of the corporation's previous action for breach. The court, however, overruled the motion to dismiss plaintiffs' intentional infliction of emotional distress claim, holding that a question existed as to whether defendant's deliberate failure to pay certain debts was conduct of the requisite extreme and outrageous nature. Foreman v. General Motors Corp., 625 F.Supp. 1048, 1051.

S.D.Ohio, 1985. Subsec. (1) cit. in sup. (erron. cit. as § 346(1)), subsec. (1) quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. A terminated employee and his wife brought separate suits against the husband's former employer for intentional or reckless infliction of emotional distress. The defendant moved to dismiss, claiming that a threat of physical violence was needed to maintain such an action and that plaintiffs failed to allege such a threat. The district court denied the defendant's motion, finding that Ohio law referred to the Restatement to define actionable conduct and that nowhere did the Restatement or its comments specifically require a threat of physical violence for intentional or reckless infliction of emotional distress. Yungkau v. Dean Witter Reynolds, Inc., 628 F.Supp. 23, 24.

N.D.Okl.

N.D.Okl.2022. Cit. in cases cit. and quot. in sup. Employee brought, among other things, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against medical practice and owners, alleging that defendants terminated plaintiff's employment while plaintiff was undergoing extensive medical treatment and rehabilitation. This court granted defendants' motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiff failed to state a claim for IIED. The court explained that defendants' termination of plaintiff was not outrageous under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, because it was expected that plaintiff would not be able to work for at least six more months after plaintiff had spent more than five weeks in intensive care and transferred to an in-patient rehabilitation facility. Cline v. Clinical Perfusion Systems, Inc., 637 F.Supp.3d 1255, 1270.

N.D.Okl.2016. Cit. in sup., cit. in cases cit. and quot. in sup. Former employee filed, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against former employer, alleging that, after returning to work following a leave of absence for a nervous breakdown, he did not want to work at his old position, defendant knew that he was suffering from depression, refused to offer him an accommodation, and strung him along for months making him think he could transfer to a new position when defendant did not intend to reassign him. This court granted in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding that plaintiff's allegations were not sufficient to support the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary for an IIED claim. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, the court reasoned that the evidence showed that plaintiff applied to jobs for which he was unqualified or was not the most experienced applicant, and failed to show that the persons making the hiring decision had any knowledge that he claimed to be disabled. Russell v. Phillips 66 Company, 184 F.Supp.3d 1258, 1275.

N.D.Okl.2014. Cit. in sup., cit. in case quot. in sup. Former city employee brought a state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, against several city officers, alleging that he was forced to undergo an unconstitutional drug and alcohol screening and then was unlawfully fired when he raised questions about its propriety. Granting defendants' motion to dismiss this claim, this court held that plaintiff's allegations that defendants participated in implementing and/or continuing a policy that ultimately resulted in the violation of his constitutional rights, that he was retaliated against when he raised concerns about his rights, that employees were instructed not to speak to him, that an inquiry was made into his performance, that the locks were changed on his office, and that he was ultimately terminated and allegedly defamed by being called an extortionist and snitch did not assert conduct that was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to state an IIED claim. The court noted that, in Oklahoma, a claim for IIED was governed by the narrow standards laid out in Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Romero v. City of Miami, 8 F.Supp.3d 1321, 1334.

N.D.Okl.2012. Quot. in sup., cit. in ftn., cit. in case quot. in ftn. Former employee of town sued town, police officers, and others, alleging that, as punishment for voicing his opinion about the operation of the town, defendants arrested him on trumped up charges, took him to a distant jail, and forced him to expend time and resources defending himself against an arrest and charge for which there was no jurisdiction or probable cause, thereby causing him to suffer embarrassment and ridicule. Denying defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held that reasonable minds could differ as to whether defendants' actions, as alleged by plaintiff, rose to the level of outrageousness required to maintain a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and that, when reasonable persons could differ, it was for the jury to decide, subject to the oversight of the court. Allen v. Town of Colcord, Okla., 874 F.Supp.2d 1276, 1290.

N.D.Okl.2011. Cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. African American former employee sued former employer, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, arising from racial discrimination by employer. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, this court held that plaintiff's testimony that, among other things, defendants failed to promote him to full-time work and enforced a ban on cellular phone usage during work against him but not against Caucasian employees was insufficient to prove that defendant engaged in a pattern of consistent and severe discriminatory behavior that rose to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct; moreover, plaintiff failed to produce any evidence that he suffered severe emotional distress as a result of defendant's alleged conduct. Green v. Paragon Films, Inc., 814 F.Supp.2d 1174, 1186, 1187.

N.D.Okl.2007. Cit. in case quot. in sup. Independent contractor, who performed individual rehabilitation services for clients of nonprofit corporation, brought various claims against corporation for, among other things, allegedly discriminating against her on the basis of her religion and disability, fostering a hostile work environment, and retaliating against her after she filed for unemployment benefits. Granting summary judgment for defendants, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because she did not allege actions by defendant that were sufficiently extreme and outrageous to satisfy Oklahoma's high standard of actionable conduct within the employment context. Edwards v. Creoks Mental Health Services, Inc., 505 F.Supp.2d 1080, 1096.

N.D.Okl.2006. Coms. (d), (i), and (j) quot. in cases quot. in disc. Fifty-two Indian nationals recruited by company to live and work at company's Oklahoma plant brought federal civil-rights/labor-standards action against company and its president, including an additional state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. After finding that the work assignments, restrictions, living conditions, name-calling, profanity, and threats that plaintiffs experienced at the hands of defendants, when considered as a totality, were sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support plaintiffs' emotional-distress claim, the court concluded that president, who had directly participated in this conduct, was personally liable for his tortious acts. Chellen v. John Pickle Co., Inc., 446 F.Supp.2d 1247, 1292, 1293, amending and superseding 434 F.Supp.2d 1069.

N.D.Okl.2006. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Licensed physician who specialized in cardiovascular and related surgery brought suit, together with his corporation, against various hospitals and competing medical professionals for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendants interfered with plaintiffs' reputation and livelihood by, among other things, telling patients and other doctors that physician was being stripped of his credentials and privileges and refusing to refer patients to him. Dismissing the claim with prejudice, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiffs failed to allege facts sufficient to support the necessary elements of their claim. The court stated that the claim was little more than an assertion that plaintiffs were ousted by defendants from the Tulsa cardiovascular-surgery market without good cause, and concluded that such conduct was not extreme and outrageous. Cohlmia v. Ardent Health Services, LLC, 448 F.Supp.2d 1253, 1272.

N.D.Okl.2005. Cit. in disc., subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Former administrative assistant sued church conference and her supervisor for intentional infliction of emotional distress and other claims after being terminated. Granting in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court concluded that supervisor's alleged conduct, which included rubbing employee's shoulders, telling another employee that she was untrustworthy, and failing to praise her when informing others that she was terminated, was not sufficiently outrageous to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Oklahoma Law, especially since plaintiff had not sought counseling and only claimed a lack of sleep resulting from this conduct. Bolin v. Oklahoma Conference of the United Methodist Church, 397 F.Supp.2d 1293, 1298.

N.D.Okl.2005. Cit. in disc. Current and former city employees brought claim for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress against city and supervisors for, among other things, allegedly implementing surreptitious video and audio surveillance of their workplace. This court granted defendants' motions for summary judgment. The court held, among other things, that defendants implemented no surveillance that constituted the extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to establish the emotional-distress claim, since the only allegation potentially rising to the level of such conduct involved surveillance of the restroom, and the camera providing this surveillance only pointed in the direction of the restroom door and generally could not view inside it. Williams v. City of Tulsa, OK, 393 F.Supp.2d 1124, 1130.

N.D.Okl.2003. Cit. in case cit. in disc. After department store fired a deaf and legally blind janitor due to her assaults against two coemployees, janitor sued store for violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiff alleged that coemployee knew of plaintiff's disabilities, yet engaged in campaign of harassment, which included moving items from her work station, ridiculing her, and making repeated unwelcome physical contact. Adopting magistrate's report, this court denied defendants' motion for summary judgment on the emotional-distress claim, stating that fact issues existed as to whether coemployee acted intentionally or recklessly toward plaintiff, whether conduct was extreme and outrageous given plaintiff's disabilities, and whether conduct caused plaintiff severe emotional distress. Campbell v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 272 F.Supp.2d 1276, 1302.

N.D.Okl.2001. Com. (d) cit. in sup. Former prison inmate brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotion distress against state drivers-license examiner, alleging that defendant forced her to have sex with him while she was on work-release at drivers-license center. Denying defendant's motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that defendant's alleged conduct was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Smith v. Cochran, 216 F.Supp.2d 1286, 1297, decision affirmed 339 F.3d 1205 (10th Cir.2003).

N.D.Okl.2001. Com. (d) quot. generally in disc. After telephone reservation sales agent who suffered from Bell's Palsy and fibromyalgia was terminated from her employment, she sued employer for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting summary judgment for defendant, the court held, inter alia, that defendant's discharge of plaintiff for excessive absences did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Thompson v. Cendant Corp., 130 F.Supp.2d 1255, 1263.

N.D.Okl.1998. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Technician sued former employer for sexual harassment in violation of Title VII, wrongful discharge in violation of the Family and Medical Leave Act (FMLA), and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Defendant moved for summary judgment. Granting the motion in part and denying it in part, the court held that, while material factual issues existed as to whether the alleged conduct of plaintiff's supervisor was so severe and pervasive as to create a hostile work environment, defendant's response was proportional and reasonable and reasonably calculated to end any harassment, and that because defendant took prompt remedial action in response to plaintiff's complaints of sexual harassment, plaintiff failed to establish that defendant acted in an extreme and outrageous manner; however, plaintiff's claim for violations of the FMLA survived defendant's motion for summary judgment. Henderson v. Whirlpool Corp., 17 F.Supp.2d 1238, 1248.

N.D.Okl.1996. Com. (d) cit. generally in headnotes and quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee who was terminated for allegedly violating employer's policy against absenteeism brought an action against employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress based on harassment in the work place. Granting in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held that, even assuming the truth of plaintiff's allegations that co-workers referred to plaintiff as "crazy" and/or as "a lunatic" and talked about people on Prozac or going to a mental-health facility, that behavior was not the kind of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Oklahoma law. McClain v. Southwest Steel Co., Inc., 940 F.Supp. 295, 296, 300.

N.D.Okl.1991. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. A former employee sued her former employer and a foreman for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that the foreman engaged in continued sexual harassment, the employer ignored and acquiesced in that harassment, and the harassment caused her severe physical and emotional distress. The jury awarded the plaintiff damages against both defendants but the court granted the defendants' motions for directed verdict and judgment n.o.v., holding, inter alia, that, because the foreman's conduct occurring within the two-year limitations period before the claim was filed was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress and the plaintiff conceded as such regarding the conduct during this period, the claim was time-barred. Marshall v. Nelson Elec., 766 F.Supp. 1018, 1030.

W.D.Okl.

W.D.Okl.2009. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Public-school-district executive who was laterally transferred with no loss of pay from her position supervising 15 school principals to another position in the district brought federal civil-rights claims, as well as a state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against the school district, district superintendent, and others. This court granted summary judgment for defendants, holding, in regard to the IIED claim, that none of plaintiff's allegations, including her assertion that she was transferred in retaliation for the exercise of her First Amendment rights and her attempts to assist an African-American student who was being unfairly disciplined, met the level of extreme and outrageous conduct required to sustain this tort under Oklahoma law. Converse v. City of Oklahoma City, 649 F.Supp.2d 1310, 1319-1320.

W.D.Okl.2009. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Female employee brought a pendent state-law claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against employer, alleging that she was subjected to a continuing hostile work environment due to the actions of defendant's vice president/ COO, and that defendant did nothing to ameliorate the situation but instead retaliated against her by transferring her to a less desirable position. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment on the IIED claim, this court held that Oklahoma courts had routinely held that workplace-harassment claims did not rise to the level of outrageous conduct necessary to support a claim of IIED, and concluded that nothing in plaintiff's allegations indicated that a contrary result should be reached in this case. Daniels v. C.L. Frates and Co., 641 F.Supp.2d 1214, 1218.

W.D.Okl.2008. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Relatives of federal transfer-center inmate who died of an apparent suicide sued United States in connection with its treatment of relatives after inmate's death. This court ruled for plaintiffs on their claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress and awarded a total of $1.1 million to plaintiffs, including $50,000 to the estate of inmate's father, who died before trial. On remand for additional findings as to the severity of the emotional distress suffered by each plaintiff, the court held, inter alia, that the award to father's estate represented the minimum necessary to compensate each individual plaintiff for the government's extreme and outrageous actions in initially failing to disclose the unusual circumstances of inmate's death. The court noted that, under Oklahoma law, in many cases, the extreme and outrageous character of the defendants' conduct was in itself important evidence that the distress existed. Estate of Trentadue v. U.S., 560 F.Supp.2d 1124, 1127, 1137.

W.D.Okl.1997. Cit. in headnotes, cit. and quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc., com. (j) quot. in case quot. in ftn. A hoax victim whose business phone number appeared on internet bulletin board advertisements of items glorifying the bombing of the Oklahoma City federal building sued a radio station for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, after a radio host urged listeners to call the victim's phone number to protest. This court granted defendant summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to prove that the disc jockey acted in an extreme or outrageous manner. Zeran v. Diamond Broadcasting, Inc., 19 F.Supp.2d 1249, 1250, 1253, 1254.

W.D.Okl.1992. Cit. but dist. An employee who was dismissed because he stole a decorative bottle of wine from a company function and then lied about it sued his former employer and supervisors for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that defendants made statements to prospective employers concerning the reason for his termination. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held that defendants' alleged actions did not rise to the level of outrageous conduct necessary to support plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Tatum v. Philip Morris, Inc., 809 F.Supp. 1452, 1470.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

D.Or.

D.Or.2018. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee who suffered from depression, alcoholism, bipolar disorder, generalized anxiety, and post-traumatic stress disorder brought claims for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress against former employer and its successor arising from certain actions taken by his supervisor in connection with his termination. This court granted employer's motion for summary judgment on employee's emotional-distress claim, holding that supervisor's alleged conduct—in falsely claiming that employee failed to disclose that he had previously been arrested and taken to a hospital for a mental-health/suicide evaluation, and in yelling at him during a meeting in which she denied his request for a reasonable accommodation for his disabilities—did not establish the level of extreme or outrageous conduct sufficient to sustain such a claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Reaves v. Nexstar Broadcasting, Inc., 327 F.Supp.3d 1352, 1375.

D.Or.2014. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former charter-school student who was allegedly sexually harassed by another student filed, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against school and school board, alleging that defendants allowed plaintiff's sexual harasser to interact with her despite having a separation plan in place the prior year, suspended plaintiff, required her to write an apology letter to the harasser, and confiscated her personal notes on harasser's behaviors that she took pursuant to her therapist's instructions. This court granted defendants' motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiff failed to raise a genuine issue of material fact. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, the court explained that plaintiff did not allege facts sufficient to establish that defendants' conduct rose to the necessary level of extreme and outrageous conduct required for an IIED claim. T.L. ex rel. Lowry v. Sherwood Charter School, 68 F.Supp.3d 1295, 1320.

D.Or.2011. Coms. (d) and (i) quot. in case quot. in sup. After father and his minor son were involved in a physical altercation with teenagers at a shopping mall, mall owners encouraged police to arrest all of those involved; father, individually and on behalf of son, sued mall owners and property managers for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, alleging that defendants only requested police action in retaliation for father's statements to news media that there were customer safety problems at the mall. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment, this court held that plaintiffs failed to establish the requisite intent for the claim—more specifically, that defendants intended to inflict emotional harm in order to prevent plaintiffs from making public statements—because defendants requested that everyone involved in the altercation be prosecuted, not just those who made statements. The court further reasoned that defendants' actions were not socially intolerable as required for this claim under Oregon law, because requesting that all individuals involved in a physical altercation be prosecuted was not extreme or outrageous conduct. Giulio v. BV CenterCal, LLC, 815 F.Supp.2d 1162, 1180.

D.Or.2011. Com. (h) quot. in case quot. in sup. Parents brought various claims against school district on behalf of their minor child in connection with its provision of special education services to him while he was a middle school and high school student, alleging, among other things, that defendant intentionally inflicted emotional distress on them by obtaining child's juvenile court records. Granting summary judgment for defendant, this court held, as to the intentional-infliction claim, that defendant did not violate a state statute concerning the confidentiality of juvenile records, that the statute reflected what was socially tolerable, and that, because there was no violation, defendant's conduct did not constitute an extraordinary transgression of the bounds of socially tolerable conduct. G.R. ex rel. Russell v. Dallas School Dist. No. 2, 823 F.Supp.2d 1120, 1148.

D.Or.2008. Coms. (d) and (i) cit. in cases quot. in sup. Bicyclist who was charged with a bicycle-light violation and interference with police officers brought a pendent state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), as part of her federal action under § 1983, against city and police officers. This court granted summary judgment for defendants on the IIED claim, holding that officers' conduct in pulling up to plaintiff in an unmarked car at night, failing to identify themselves as police officers, ignoring plaintiff's requests that they identify themselves, failing to use the car lights in a manner that would suggest they were police officers, and chasing her into her yard and pulling her out of her house by her arm and her hair, even viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiff, simply did not constitute a transgression sufficiently extraordinary to meet the requirements for an IIED claim. Child v. City of Portland, 547 F.Supp.2d 1161, 1168.

D.Or.2006. Coms. (d) and (i) quot. in cases quot. in sup. Former police officer of Mexican ancestry brought racial harassment/discrimination claims against city, police department, and supervisors. Adopting the magistrate's recommendation that defendants' motion for summary judgment be granted as to plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to present facts to support his claim that the alleged conduct by defendants, which included numerous racist comments and threats to retaliate against plaintiff if he continued to complain of the comments, exceeded all possible bounds of decency or could be characterized as atrocious. Sizemore v. City of Dallas, 443 F.Supp.2d 1201, 1221.

D.Or.2005. Coms. (d) and (1) quot. in case quot. in disc. Auto technician nearing retirement who alleged that defendant and its shop manager discriminated against him on the basis of age in violation of state and federal statutes, asserted additional common-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court granted defendant summary judgment on this claim, holding that plaintiff failed to establish that the manager's treatment of him, which included criticizing his performance and communication skills, and disciplining him over his allegedly faulty repairs, was unreasonable and exceeded the ordinary treatment of employees by other businesses, much less that it exceeded all possible bounds of decency. Scott v. Sears, Roebuck and Co., 395 F.Supp.2d 961, 981, 982.

D.Or.2000. Com. (d) cit. in disc. Former employee sued employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that termination of plaintiff in airport as he was preparing to leave on a family vacation constituted extraordinary conduct. Entering partial summary judgment for defendant, the court held, among other things, that, while the timing and location of plaintiff's dismissal, as well as the proximity of the act to his family, all made for an unpleasant confrontation, such behavior did not rise to the level of egregiousness necessary to support recovery under a theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Araujo v. General Elec. Information Services, 82 F.Supp.2d 1161, 1174, affirmed and remanded 25 Fed.Appx. 615 (9th Cir.2002).

D.Or.1996. Com. (I) quot. in case cit. in disc. Two nonprofit corporations and several individuals sued several anti-abortion organizations and individuals, alleging violations of RICO, the Freedom of Access to Clinics Act, state statutes, and state tort law claims, including intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court denied defendants' motion to dismiss and granted in part and denied in part one defendant organization's motion for judgment on the pleadings, holding, inter alia, that plaintiffs stated a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because the court could not conclude as a matter of law that defendants' alleged threatening conduct did not exceed the bounds of socially tolerable conduct. Plaintiffs alleged that defendants published and disseminated posters, which threatened physical harm to plaintiffs, with specific intent to inflict severe mental and emotional distress upon plaintiffs. The complaint also contained significant background regarding the potential violent effect of defendants' posters, such as murder, attempted murder, and assault of the individuals targeted in the posters. Planned Parenthood v. American Coalition, 945 F.Supp. 1355, 1386.

D.Or.1994. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Discharged employee sued her former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held, in part, that plaintiff failed to prove that she suffered severe emotional distress as a result of defendant's allegedly abusive conduct and that defendant's conduct was not sufficiently outrageous to support plaintiff's intentional infliction of emotional distress claim. Montgomery v. J.R. Simplot Co., 916 F.Supp. 1033, 1041, affirmed 76 F.3d 387 (9th Cir.1996).

D.Or.1993. Com. (j) quot. in part in sup. Two female employees sued employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, allegedly arising out of male supervisor's sexually inappropriate behavior. Granting partial summary judgment for defendant and making other dispositions, the court held, inter alia, that, under Oregon law, emotional distress attributable to complaints from other workers who were harassed by supervisor, or the general stresses of employment, was not actionable. Meagher v. Lamb-Weston, Inc., 839 F.Supp. 1403, 1410.

D.Or.1990. Coms. (d) and (j) cit. in case quot. in sup. A husband and wife separated shortly after they were involved in an automobile accident. The wife settled her claim against the driver of the other car and presented the driver's insurance company with a written waiver, purportedly signed by her husband, which released and signed over his rights to any settlement proceeds to the wife. The husband, who was liable for his wife's unpaid medical bills, claimed that the signature was forged and sued the insurance company, alleging that accepting the waiver and entering into a settlement agreement with the wife without regard to his interests constituted the tort of outrageous conduct. This court dismissed the complaint for failure to state a claim, finding that the conduct alleged, even if true, would not support a claim for outrageous conduct because the husband produced no evidence that the insurance company acted intentionally or recklessly in a way designed to cause emotional distress to him by accepting a waiver that was valid on its face and arriving at a negotiated settlement with his wife. Showalter v. Rinard, 752 F.Supp. 963, 967.

E.D.Pa.

E.D.Pa.2022. Com. (d) cit. in case cit. in sup. Former township employee brought, among other things, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against supervisor, alleging that defendant pitted plaintiff against his girlfriend, made threatening phone calls after hours, and engaged in retaliation against plaintiff in an attempt to pressure him to not testify about defendant's supervisory conduct in maintaining township roadways. This court granted in part defendant's motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiff failed to state a claim for IIED. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, the court explained that defendant's conduct, as alleged, was not extreme or outrageous such that it could sustain an IIED claim, because it was, at most, objectionable and distasteful. Geraghty v. East Bradford Township, 584 F.Supp.3d 10, 20.

E.D.Pa.2021. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. and cit. in ftn. Brother filed claims for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress against sister and her husband in connection with allegations that defendants falsely informed their mother that he had tried to break into her safe. This court granted sister and her husband's motion to dismiss, holding that brother failed to allege any conduct by sister or her husband that met the standard required to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under the law of either Pennsylvania or Florida. The court noted that both Pennsylvania and Florida courts generally followed the Restatement Second of Torts, which defined outrageous conduct as that beyond all possible bounds of decency, and regarded as atrocious, and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Greiser v. Drinkard, 516 F.Supp.3d 430, 440.

E.D.Pa.2021. Com. (d) cit. in case cit. in sup.; coms. (h) and (i) quot. in sup. Employee brought, among other things, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against coworker, alleging that defendant repeatedly sexually harassed her over the course of several months by attempting to grope her, making graphic and sexual remarks about her body, and offering payment for sexual favors. This court denied in part defendant's motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiff alleged sufficient facts to state a claim for IIED. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, the court explained that plaintiff satisfactorily alleged the intentional, extreme, and outrageous nature of defendant's conduct and that she suffered severe emotional distress as a result of such conduct; furthermore, under Pennsylvania law, plaintiff's claim did not accrue until defendant's repeated actions rendered his conduct sufficiently outrageous to support an IIED claim. Smith v. RB Distribution, Inc., 515 F.Supp.3d 311, 315, 319, 320.

E.D.Pa.2020. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Administrator of estate of correctional-facility detainee, on behalf of herself and the estate, brought, among other things, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against healthcare-services providers, alleging that defendants acted in an extreme and outrageous manner when they prescribed decedent blood and psychotropic medications that gave him the means and opportunity to overdose and die. This court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding that defendants' actions in allowing decedent to keep a thirty-day pack of medications on his person despite his history of overdosing on pills was not sufficiently extreme or outrageous so as to sustain an IIED claim, because the record did not indicate that defendants knew of his history of overdose, and defendants otherwise provided decedent with appropriate medical care. Quoting Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, the court noted that it was not sufficient in an IIED claim for plaintiff to show that defendants acted with tortious or criminal intent. McDonald-Witherspoon v. City of Philadelphia, 481 F.Supp.3d 424, 455.

E.D.Pa.2020. Cit. in case cit. in sup.; com. (d) quot. in sup. Employee brought, among other things, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against employer, alleging that her supervisors and human-resources personnel retaliated against her when she complained that a coworker sexually harassed her repeatedly. This court granted in part defendant's motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiff failed to show that its conduct was extreme and outrageous. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, the court observed that, under state caselaw, employers could be found to have acted outrageously and in an extreme manner if they engaged in both harassment and retaliation, but plaintiff did not allege that defendant participated in the harassment. Smith v. RB Distribution, Inc., 498 F.Supp.3d 645, 666.

E.D.Pa.2019. Quot. in cases quot. in ftn. Pilot who resided in New Jersey brought a lawsuit against employer, an Indiana-based airline company that purportedly told plaintiff he would work at its Philadelphia base if he was hired and completed training at its Indiana headquarters, alleging, inter alia, that a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) arose when defendant terminated his employment in the middle of a flight-training class, in front of his peers, after inducing him to leave his Texas-based employer and move across the country for training. This court denied defendant's motion to transfer venue to Indiana, holding that there were no concerns about enforceability of the judgment, because the laws regarding IIED claims in both Pennsylvania and Indiana drew from Restatement Second of Torts § 46 and were identical. Dariz v. Republic Airline Inc., 377 F.Supp.3d 499, 504.

E.D.Pa.2018. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Arrestee brought a lawsuit against arresting officers, alleging that defendants committed intentional infliction of emotional distress when they stopped and arrested him without reasonable suspicion. This court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress failed because defendants' conduct did not rise to the level of physically harmful, outrageous conduct necessary to award relief. The court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, in explaining that defendants' conduct had to be so extreme as to go beyond all possible bounds of civilized society in order for plaintiff's claim to have merit. Sarin v. Magee, 333 F.Supp.3d 475, 483.

E.D.Pa.2016. Cit. in case quot. in sup. Pet owner brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against humane society and officers of the society who were authorized to enforce animal cruelty laws, alleging that defendants seized all fifteen of her pets while executing an unlawful search warrant and later refused to return two of her pets despite a court order requiring them to do so. This court granted defendants' motion to dismiss that claim with leave to supplement the complaint, holding that plaintiff failed to plead that defendants' actions amounted to the outrageousness required to sustain such a claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. While a statement by one defendant during the search that he was seizing plaintiff's pets because he was "the Big Bad Wolf" was rude and unprofessional, it did not rise to the requisite level of outrageousness, and none of defendants' other alleged conduct met the necessary threshold. Bamont v. Pennsylvania Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, 163 F.Supp.3d 138, 155.

E.D.Pa.2016. Cit. in ftn., cit. in cases cit. and quot. in ftn.; subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. High-school softball player and her parents brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against softball coach who had a sexual relationship with player and was ultimately convicted in criminal court for charges arising from that relationship. This court denied plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment as to the IIED claim, holding that a reasonable jury could find that defendant's conduct was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support the claim. The court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46 for the elements of an IIED claim and explained that liability was reserved for conduct that was so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, which did not necessarily include all behavior that was illegal. Nace v. Pennridge School District, 185 F.Supp.3d 564, 583, 584.

E.D.Pa.2016. Subsec. (2) cit. in case quot. in sup. Parents brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against residential facility for individuals with disabilities where son was a resident, and against facility employees, alleging that, after defendants did not receive funding for son's care and their petition for involuntary confinement was denied, they conspired to remove him from their care, falsified reports of his escalating aggressive behaviors, transported him to and abandoned him at a crisis center, failed to provide medical records to the center, and refused to return him to the facility, which led to son being declared homeless by the state and suffering two grand mal seizures. This court granted defendants' motion to dismiss parents' IIED claim, holding that, while the allegations were sufficiently extreme and outrageous, plaintiffs failed to allege that they were present when any of the conduct occurred, which was a requirement under Restatement Second of Torts § 46(2) when the conduct was directed at a third person. Schutt v. Melmark, Inc., 186 F.Supp.3d 366, 378.

E.D.Pa.2015. Cit. in case cit. in sup. City resident filed, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against city, alleging that, after city police officers arrested her while she was intoxicated and locked out of her apartment, they released her, while she was still intoxicated, in a high crime area where she was abducted and raped by a third party. This court denied in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding that plaintiff sufficiently stated an IIED claim. The court noted that the Pennsylvania Supreme Court did not explicitly recognize an IIED tort, and relied on Third Circuit caselaw that predicted that the state supreme court would adopt Restatement Second of Torts § 46 in recognizing the tort. Arnold v. City of Philadelphia, 151 F.Supp.3d 568, 579.

E.D.Pa.2015. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in sup. Firefighter brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against news publisher, after it used his photograph in an article about a fire-department scandal in which plaintiff had no involvement. This court granted defendant's motion to dismiss, holding that defendant's alleged conduct was not sufficiently extreme or outrageous to establish a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court reasoned that, although being falsely implicated in a scandal involving lewd or lascivious conduct was unfair and unfortunate, and potentially defamatory in some circumstances, it was not extreme or outrageous. Cheney v. Daily News, L.P., 102 F.Supp.3d 708, 717, 718.

E.D.Pa.2015. Cit. in case quot. in sup. Operator of a 25-dog kennel in his 1,350 square foot home brought a claim for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against state nonprofit corporation that was empowered to enforce state law pertaining to the prevention of cruelty to animals, as well as several of corporation's employees, after the state withdrew 134 charges against plaintiff following a suppression hearing related to defendants' execution of a search warrant for his home, and plaintiff was found not guilty of one remaining charge related to his sale of an injured puppy to defendants. This court granted in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding that plaintiff failed to support his IIED claim with competent medical evidence showing that he actually suffered the claimed distress, as required to state such a claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Lawson v. Pennsylvania SPCA, 124 F.Supp.3d 394, 409.

E.D.Pa.2014. Cit. and quot. in sup., cit. in case quot. in sup., cit. in case quot. in ftn.; com. (d) quot. in sup. After owners' home was improperly sold by mortgagee at a sheriff's sale, owner brought, inter alia, a claim for intention infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against mortgagee. This court granted in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding that plaintiffs failed to provide sufficient evidence to support their IIED claim. Citing Restatement Second of Contracts § 46, the court pointed out that an IIED claim required that plaintiffs allege conduct by defendants that was so outrageous and extreme as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and concluded that, not only did plaintiffs not accomplish this, but they also did not provide confirmation by a medical expert that they suffered distress. DeHart v. HomEq Servicing Corp., 47 F.Supp.3d 246, 254, 257, 258.

E.D.Pa.2014. Quot. in sup., cit. in case cit. in sup.; com. (d) quot. in sup. Parents of a deceased marine brought, inter alia, an intentional-infliction-of-emotional-distress (IIED) claim arising under Pennsylvania common law and the Federal Tort Claims Act against the United States and others, alleging that, after discovering that the decedent's heart had been removed during an autopsy in Greece, doctors at a U.S. naval base concealed that information from plaintiffs, and that defendant knew or should have known that plaintiffs' discovery of this deception would cause acute and lasting emotional distress. Granting in part defendant's motion to dismiss, this court held that defendant's conduct did not rise to the level of outrageousness required to sustain an IIED claim. The court noted that, in evaluating IIED claims, Pennsylvania courts applied the standard set forth in Restatement Second of Torts § 46, and, here, defendant's decision as to what information to tell plaintiffs, rather than being sufficiently extreme and outrageous to meet the § 46 standard, simply reflected a contrary approach to relaying uncomfortable facts to a grieving parent. LaLoup v. U.S., 29 F.Supp.3d 530, 541, 542.

E.D.Pa.2013. Cit. in sup., quot. in case quot. in sup. As part of a larger action, Hispanic police detective brought claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, against city police department and its employees, alleging that he suffered extreme emotional distress as a result of personal attacks by his co-workers, which included "hostile desk gags" (such as putting his desk on crates) and the theft of his gun, all of which were aimed at him because he was the only Hispanic officer on his shift. Granting summary judgment for defendants as to this claim, this court held that plaintiff's allegations were not sufficient to support an IIED claim under Pennsylvania law. The court explained that, under Pennsylvania law, where, as here, an alleged workplace harm was motivated by personal reasons and arose from conduct that would not normally be expected in the workplace, a plaintiff could pursue a "personal animus" IIED claim; however, in this case, no reasonable jury could find defendants' actions so atrocious and utterly intolerable in nature that they went beyond all possible bounds of decency in a civilized society, such that they would support liability. Alers v. City of Philadelphia, 919 F.Supp.2d 528, 561.

E.D.Pa.2013. Cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Parents who temporarily lost custody of their infant son as a result of county's child-abuse investigation brought, inter alia, a pendent state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against hospital physician who reported to county authorities his opinion that the child had been abused, contending that the pattern of medical misrepresentations made by defendant to support his false allegations of child abuse amounted to outrageous conduct. Granting summary judgment for defendant, this court held that plaintiffs failed to show that defendant's conduct was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support their IIED claim. The court concluded that, although plaintiffs submitted medical evidence that defendant's opinions regarding their child were possibly erroneous, without an expert opinion that defendant's opinions were grossly negligent, plaintiffs could not succeed on their claim. Dennis v. DeJong, 953 F.Supp.2d 568, 593.

E.D.Pa.2011. Cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in cases quot. in sup. Parents and their infant son brought a pendent state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against hospital physician, social worker employed by hospital, and employees of county child-services agency, arising from the temporary removal of infant from parents' custody for suspected child abuse. This court dismissed this claim with prejudice against social worker and county employees, holding, inter alia, that these defendants' alleged conduct in contacting county authorities based on their suspicions of child abuse was not sufficiently extreme or outrageous to state an IIED claim; further, even though physician allegedly falsely asserted to police officer, for the purpose of securing father's arrest, that infant had a skull fracture and could not breathe on his own, the court dismissed plaintiffs' IIED claim against him without prejudice, because plaintiffs did not provide expert medical confirmation that his conduct caused them emotional distress. Dennis v. DeJong, 867 F.Supp.2d 588, 659, 660.

E.D.Pa.2011. Cit. in case cit. in ftn. Former art teacher sued school district that formerly employed him, former medical provider, and numerous individuals, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress and other claims in connection with his termination from school district. Granting in part defendants' motion to dismiss, this court held that school district's alleged failure to provide plaintiff with medical leave and benefits, and medical provider's alleged breach of plaintiff's privacy rights under the Patient's Bill of Rights and/or the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act, did not rise to the level of outrageous conduct required to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Ruder v. Pequea Valley School Dist., 790 F.Supp.2d 377, 397.

E.D.Pa.2011. Cit. and quot. in sup. Mother of suspect who was shot and killed while fleeing from police brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against police officers who shot suspect. Denying defendants' motion for summary judgment as to that claim, this court held that, if plaintiff's version of the facts was accepted as true and the police fired 55 shots, in her presence, at an unarmed man who was running away from them, a reasonable jury could find that it constituted outrageous conduct for purposes of her IIED claim. Sullivan v. Warminster Tp., 765 F.Supp.2d 687, 708.

E.D.Pa.2010. Com. (d) cit. and quot. in case quot. in sup. Factory worker sued employer and co-worker, asserting, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against co-worker. Granting co-worker's motion for summary judgment, this court held that co-worker's alleged conduct on one occasion in pushing a utility knife into plaintiff's breast in such a way as to “scare the wits out of her” was not sufficiently outrageous to support plaintiff's IIED claim under Pennsylvania law. The court noted that plaintiff only cited one case that, like this case, did not involve retaliation in addition to harassment, and stressed that that case, unlike this case, involved conduct that was incessant; while retaliation was not a mandated factor under Pennsylvania law for an IIED claim asserted in the employment context, it was a weighty factor. Rorrer v. Cleveland Steel Container, 712 F.Supp.2d 422, 438.

E.D.Pa.2010. Com. (e) cit. in sup. In this civil-rights lawsuit, African-American employee brought, inter alia, a pendent state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against police sergeant, alleging that he was terminated from his position as a doorman providing security at a bar and grill after police sergeant arrested him on false charges of public drunkenness and disorderly conduct. This court granted defendant's motion to dismiss that claim, holding that, while plaintiff sufficiently pled extreme and outrageous conduct by alleging that defendant arrested him despite knowing that he was neither intoxicated nor behaving in a disorderly manner, called his employer to tell the owner that he had been arrested and was unfit to work as a doorman providing security, requested owner to terminate his employment, and made the phone call, assertions, and requests to owner because of his race, the claim nonetheless failed because he did not adequately plead harm. White v. Brommer, 747 F.Supp.2d 447, 467.

E.D.Pa.2009. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in ftn. Judgment debtor sued judgment creditors, seeking a declaratory injunction barring enforcement of creditors' New York judgment against debtor, as well as compensatory and punitive damages, and alleging, among other things, that the judgment was obtained in violation of her due-process rights. Granting defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to show some type of physical harm resulting from defendant's allegedly outrageous conduct in order to satisfy the element of severe emotional distress. In making its decision, the court noted that the Pennsylvania Supreme Court had thus far only assumed arguendo that the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress existed in Pennsylvania. Di Loreto v. Costigan, 600 F.Supp.2d 671, 701.

E.D.Pa.2009. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup., subsec. (2) quot. in sup. and cit. in case cit. in sup. Former ballet student and his wife sued ballet patron, patron's foundation, and officers of foundation, alleging that patron sexually abused student over the course of eight years while defendants financially supported his education and ballet training. This court denied defendants' motion to dismiss student's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that one defendant's alleged threats of deportation and cessation of financial support made to student while he was in the hospital for depression could reasonably be regarded as extreme and outrageous; the court, however, granted the motion as to wife, noting that the alleged conduct occurred before plaintiffs were married and that the complaint did not allege that wife suffered any bodily harm. Doe v. Schneider, 667 F.Supp.2d 524, 533.

E.D.Pa.2007. Cit. and quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case cit. in disc. Former high-school student who had an approximately ten-month-long sexual relationship with her band teacher during her senior year brought, in part, a claim of intentional infliction of emotinal distress (IIED) against band teacher and school's principal. This court denied defendants' motions for summary judgment on the IIED claims, holding that principal's alleged conduct in ignoring the sexual relationship after being put on notice of it, thus allowing it to continue for another seven months, was sufficiently extreme as to be labeled outrageous under Pennsylvania law; additionally, teacher's argument that he could not be held liable because plaintiff consented to the relationship, and because his having sex with plaintiff was not criminal failed, since plaintiff lacked the capacity to consent to the sex, and there was no requirement that a claim for IIED be based in criminal activity. Chancellor v. Pottsgrove School Dist., 501 F.Supp.2d 695, 710, 711.

E.D.Pa.2007. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup. and in ftn. Wife, individually, and on behalf of her husband's estate, sued, among others, township's chief of police, alleging, inter alia, that defendant's supervision of "showdown-style" negotiations in a siege situation involving police and her mentally unstable husband caused her husband's suicide and constituted intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). This court denied defendant's motion to dismiss the IIED claim, holding, among other things, that plaintiff sufficiently alleged extreme and outrageous conduct when she asserted that police, who were at decedent's house to serve an involuntary commitment order and take him into custody, disconnected decedent's electricity, threatened him with felony arrest, and blasted loud music, screeching noises, and hundreds of canisters of pepper spray into his house. Heckensweiler v. McLaughlin, 517 F.Supp.2d 707, 720.

E.D.Pa.2005. Cit. in disc., subsec. (1) quot. in disc. After the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission brought an action against employer for retaliatory firing and other unlawful practices, the employee who was fired brought several claims against his former employer for wrongful discharge under federal and state law. This court denied in part employer's motion to dismiss employee's state-law claims, holding, inter alia, that factual issues existed as to whether employer's conduct toward employee was sufficiently outrageous to sustain employee's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Employer's conduct included bringing an action against employee for violation of a noncompete agreement and publishing accusations that employee was untrustworthy and would not pay creditors. E.E.O.C. v. Creative Playthings, Ltd., 375 F.Supp.2d 427, 437.

E.D.Pa.2003. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former police officer sued borough and others for wrongful termination in violation of due process, breach of collective-bargaining agreement, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendants conspired to deprive plaintiff of his job while he was on sick leave and that they knew it would deprive plaintiff of medical care during a serious illness. This court granted in part defendants' motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that defendants' conduct did not rise to requisite level of outrageousness to support emotional-distress claim. Since plaintiff's claims arose from allegations of unlawful termination and were unrelated to sexual harassment and subsequent retaliation, plaintiff's complaint was outside universe of cognizable emotional-distress claims. Capresecco v. Jenkintown Borough, 261 F.Supp.2d 319, 323.

E.D.Pa.2003. Cit. in disc., subsec. (1) quot. in ftn. After a prison inmate assaulted corrections officers, an internal investigation resulted in disciplinary hearings against the officers and initial five-day suspensions, which were eventually reduced to written reprimands, for improper use of excessive force against an inmate. Although one officer called for help during altercation with inmate, the prison's public-address system was inoperative. Officers sued the county for, inter alia, due-process violations, malicious prosecution, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court dismissed in part, holding, inter alia, that plaintiffs' emotional-distress claims failed because defendants' conduct could not reasonably be regarded as so extreme and outrageous as to permit recovery. Keim v. County of Bucks, 275 F.Supp.2d 628, 635.

E.D.Pa.2003. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Former employee sued employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. Granting in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress failed as a matter of law, because the alleged conduct, including a threat by coemployee to ruin plaintiff's career, defendant's failure to review slides causing plaintiff to cancel a scientific presentation, abandonment by former colleagues as evidenced by their decision not to participate as coauthors with her on a paper, and lies told by defendant's witnesses in state-court litigation, did not rise to the level of outrageousness necessary to recover for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Pennsylvania law. Lin v. Rohm and Haas Co., 293 F.Supp.2d 505, 522.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

E.D.Pa.2003. Quot. in case quot. in sup. After store security guard grabbed mother, forced her to the floor, handcuffed her, dragged her through the mall to the store, and had her transferred to police department to be charged for retail theft while her young children were abandoned in the mall, mother sued store on one daughter's behalf, alleging, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment on the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding, inter alia, that there was no medical evidence to support the existence of physical or emotional injury to daughter. Robinson v. May Dept. Stores Co., 246 F.Supp.2d 440, 444.

E.D.Pa.2002. Cit. and quot. in cases quot. in sup. Patient who was erroneously informed that she had tested positive for HIV sued, among others, physician, health-services corporation, and the United States, asserting, in part, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that defendants' conduct could in no way be categorized as outrageous, since there was nothing in the record to suggest that defendants intentionally deceived plaintiff or that they relayed the information to her in an atrocious or offensive manner. Wilder v. U.S., 230 F.Supp.2d 648, 653.

E.D.Pa.2001. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Oil-tanker engineer sued shipping company for intentional infliction of emotional harm, among other claims, due to harassment by other crew members and the lack of a properly fitting immersion suit. This court granted in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's emotional-distress claim failed, because the conduct by defendant's employees aboard the ship did not rise to the requisite level of outrageousness. Given that the voyage was confined to waters where a suit was not legally required, defendant's failure to provide plaintiff with a properly fitting one was not extreme and outrageous conduct. Similarly, the ill treatment of plaintiff by his superiors and co-workers did not provide a basis for his claim. Barclay v. Keystone Shipping Co., 128 F.Supp.2d 237, 244, 245.

E.D.Pa.2001. Quot. in sup. Police captain who was suspended and transferred after testifying at trial of another officer filed suit against city, police department, and police officials, alleging, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that a reasonable jury could not find that defendants' conduct was outrageous enough to satisfy elements of tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Dooley v. City of Philadelphia, 153 F.Supp.2d 628, 665.

E.D.Pa.2000. Quot. in disc., cit. in ftn., com. (d) quot. in disc. and quot. in case cit. in disc. In wrongful-discharge action, customer-service representative sued former employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Entering summary judgment for defendant, the court held, in part, that even if defendant terminated plaintiff in a particularly embarrassing manner and spread rumors about her alleged wrongdoing in the workplace, such conduct was not so outrageous or extreme as to give rise to an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Landmesser v. United Air Lines, Inc., 102 F.Supp.2d 273, 281.

E.D.Pa.2000. Cit. in headnote, com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (j) quot. in disc. White tenant and her black friend sued the landlord of the apartment building for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that the landlord threatened to kill the tenant and remove the black friend and her two children from the apartment if she did not remove them. This court denied defendants' motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that the ejection of a tenant from her home with threats of violence in retaliation for her refusal to accede to racial discrimination was sufficiently outrageous and extreme to sustain a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Lane v. Cole, 88 F.Supp.2d 402, 406, 407.

E.D.Pa.2000. Com. (d) cit. in case cit. in disc. The father of two African-American children who were enrolled at a public high school sued the city school district and others, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. This court granted in part defendants' motion for judgment on the pleadings, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's allegations of wrongful conduct on the part of the school's assistant principal and a teacher—leaking to the press, to the school district, and to Jewish groups plaintiff's letter accusing the school's white and Jewish teachers of being racist and pressuring to have plaintiff terminated as a member of the school's advisory panel and removed as president of the school's home and school association—did not rise to the level of outrageousness required to sustain a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Smith v. School District of Philadelphia, 112 F.Supp.2d 417, 428.

E.D.Pa.1999. Cit. in disc. City police sergeant was charged with, and acquitted of, perjury in testimony he gave concerning accusations of civil-rights violations against another officer; sergeant sued FBI agents who pursued investigations of both men for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Entering summary judgment for agents, the court held, in part, that agents did not act in an extreme and outrageous manner, especially where they played no part in the decision to indict sergeant. Gatter v. Zappile, 67 F.Supp.2d 515, 521.

E.D.Pa.1999. Cit. in sup., coms. (d), (e), (h), and (j) cit. in sup. Three sisters sued city and various city agencies to recover damages sustained when, as foster children, they were repeatedly sexually assaulted by their foster family's teenage son. Granting in part and denying in part defendants' motion to dismiss, the court held that plaintiffs had stated a claim for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress, as they had established that defendants were at least reckless in their disregard of plaintiffs' complaints about son's conduct, which was sufficiently extreme to cause plaintiffs to experience severe emotional distress. Jordan v. City of Philadelphia, 66 F.Supp.2d 638, 642, 643.

E.D.Pa.1999. Cit. in case quot. in ftn., subsec. (1) cit. in ftn. Landlord who was charged with, but acquitted of, prostitution, promoting prostitution, and conspiracy sued arresting officers for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that he was falsely imprisoned and interrogated without counsel, and that defendants coerced a witness into implicating him. Entering summary judgment for defendants, the court held, in part, that there was no evidence that the witness, who merely related that she had felt threatened by defendants, had actually been coerced by them, and that, because defendants had probable cause to arrest plaintiff, his allegation of false imprisonment could not support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Olender v. Township of Bensalem, 32 F.Supp.2d 775, 792.

E.D.Pa.1999. Cit. in case quot. in ftn. Police dispatcher sued township and police officials for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that defendants, through their employees, continually engaged in unwelcome behavior consisting of sexually offensive comments, inappropriate touching, and unwanted gifts of a sexual nature. This court denied in part defendants' motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff sufficiently alleged a pattern of sexual harassment and retaliation against her by her supervisors for complaining about sexual harassment to state a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Regan v. Township of Lower Merion, 36 F.Supp.2d 245, 250.

E.D.Pa.1999. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup. In action brought pursuant to the Age Discrimination in Employment Act (ADEA), laborer asserted state-law claim against former employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Denying defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held, in part, that assigning plaintiff to more difficult tasks than he was asked to perform before he filed his ADEA claim and refusing to provide plaintiff with tools and equipment necessary to perform his job safely amounted to extreme and outrageous conduct. Schmidt v. Montgomery Kone, Inc., 69 F.Supp.2d 706, 715.

E.D.Pa.1999. Quot. in case quot. in disc. Former employee who claimed that she was not promoted because she practiced Seventh Day Adventism sued former employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Dismissing this count of the complaint, the court held that failure or refusal to promote was not sufficiently extreme or outrageous as to be considered atrocious or intolerable in civilized society. Van Cleve v. Nordstrom, Inc., 64 F.Supp.2d 459, 464.

E.D.Pa.1998. Subsec. (1) cit. in headnote and quot. in disc. Employee who was discharged after failing to attend one of his required doctor's appointments for monitoring his alcohol problem sued his former employer for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting defendant's motion to dismiss or, alternatively, for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that the Labor Management Relations Act preempted plaintiff's state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, since disposition of the claim, which would require resolution of the question of whether defendant properly discharged plaintiff, was not possible without an analysis and interpretation of the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement pertaining to just discharge and to grievance procedures. Henderson v. Merck & Co., Inc., 998 F.Supp. 532, 534, 540.

E.D.Pa.1998. Cit. in disc. Former executive sales director for insurance company sued company, among others, for violations of the Fair Labor Standards Act/Equal Pay Act. Plaintiff also asserted common law claims for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Defendant moved to dismiss the complaint. Granting the motion in part and denying it in part, the court held that dismissal was inappropriate with respect to plaintiff's statutory claims; however, plaintiff could not maintain her claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress where her allegations amounted to no more than breach of contract, and the alleged breach was not of such a kind that serious emotional disturbance was particularly likely to result. Jean Anderson Hierarchy v. Allstate Life Ins. Co., 2 F.Supp.2d 688, 693.

E.D.Pa.1998. Cit. in disc. A woman sued a city, its mayor, and its police commissioner for civil-rights violations and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. Plaintiff alleged that defendants improperly charged her with disorderly conduct arising out of her statement at a city council meeting that the mayor was an "ignorant bastard." This court granted in part and denied in part defendants' motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's emotional-distress claim was defective because she failed to allege that defendants' conduct caused her to seek medical treatment. Johnson v. City of Chester, 10 F.Supp.2d 482, 491.

E.D.Pa.1998. Cit. in headnote, quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. Wife and daughter sued husband's accountant, among others, for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendant fraudulently concealed the true value of husband's assets during divorce proceedings. Entering summary judgment for defendant, the court held, in part, that plaintiffs' failure to establish that defendant committed the act complained of precluded an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with that act. Perlberger v. Perlberger, 32 F.Supp.2d 197, 199, 210, vacated in part, modified in part 34 F.Supp.2d 282 (E.D.Pa.1998).

E.D.Pa.1997. Cit. in disc., cit. in case quot. in sup. High school student sued school district and district employees for, inter alia, violations of Title IX, alleging that defendants failed to prevent plaintiff's male classmates from sexually harassing her. Plaintiff also asserted claims for prima facie tort and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Defendants moved to dismiss. Granting the motions in part and denying them in part, the court held that plaintiff stated a cognizable Title IX claim against district; that Title IX liability did not attach to individual employees; that district was immune from liability for willful misconduct; that employees were not liable under a theory of prima facie tort because Pennsylvania did not recognize prima facie tort as a valid cause of action and, even if it did, affirmative conduct, as opposed to the nonfeasance alleged here, was required; and that employees could not be found liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress, since their negligent failure to act formed the basis of the claim. Collier by Collier v. William Penn School Dist., 956 F.Supp. 1209, 1217.

E.D.Pa.1997. Cit. in headnotes, quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. and quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (h) cit. in disc. Therapist prevailed in a lawsuit brought by parents of a patient who accused therapist of having falsely implanted memories of satanic abuse in their daughter's mind. Therapist then sued parents and their attorneys for, inter alia, wrongful use of civil proceedings, defamation, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging, among other things, that defendants initiated their lawsuit in the absence of probable cause and with the wrongful purpose of forcing plaintiff out of practice. Defendants moved to dismiss. Granting the motions in part and denying them in part, the court held that plaintiff had not properly alleged that attorneys filed the earlier lawsuit for an improper purpose and, absent an improper purpose, the question of probable cause did not arise; that parents were not liable for wrongful use of civil proceedings; that plaintiff stated a claim for defamation against parents; and that defendants' conduct was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous as to permit recovery under a theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Mansmann v. Tuman, 970 F.Supp. 389, 391, 392, 401-403.

E.D.Pa.1996. Cit. in disc., cit. in ftn., cit. and cit. generally in cases cit. in ftn., subsec. (1) quot. in ftn. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. in disc. Woman sued her psychotherapist for negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with the 12-year sexual relationship that he initiated with her. Defendant moved to dismiss. Denying the motion, the court held that plaintiff, whom defendant owed a fiduciary duty of care, had successfully pled her negligence cause of action, and that defendant's conduct was sufficiently outrageous and extreme to allow plaintiff to recover under a theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Corbett v. Morgenstern, 934 F.Supp. 680, 683, 684.

E.D.Pa.1996. Cit. in ftn., cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. Judgment debtor and his wife sued constable and others for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that constable, acting for or on behalf of the other defendants, altered an order of execution or caused it to be altered so that it appeared to be issued against plaintiff husband individually and not against his corporation then purported to levy upon and seize personal property belonging to the individual plaintiffs and posted notices of levy and sale. Denying in part constable's motion to dismiss, the court held that plaintiffs stated a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Pennsylvania law by alleging that they suffered from “anxiety, distress, discomfort and embarrassment” as a result of defendants' actions and that defendants' conduct was “extreme and dangerous” and “intentional and reckless” and “caused Plaintiffs severe emotional distress.” Miniscalco v. Gordon, 916 F.Supp. 478, 480, 481.

E.D.Pa.1995. Cit. in headnote, quot. but dist., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Accountant who claimed he was discharged when he reported his supervisor's illegal and unethical business practices to employer sued employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held that plaintiff did not raise a genuine issue of material fact as to whether his supervisor engaged in illegal or unethical conduct and that defendant's failure to inform former clients of plaintiff's termination, resulting in their continued telephone calls to him after his dismissal, did not amount to outrageous or utterly intolerable conduct. Brown v. Peoples Security Ins., 890 F.Supp. 411, 412, 415.

E.D.Pa.1995. Subsec. (1) cit. in case cit. in disc. Hotel restaurant manager who was terminated when he refused to divorce his Roman Catholic wife sued his father, a partner in the hotel and an officer of the hotel's management company, for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Dismissing plaintiff's complaint, the court held that while it did not condone defendant's threats of discharge or his conduct, his actions did not rise to the level of outrageous, obnoxious, or intolerable behavior needed to support plaintiff's claim. Furthermore, plaintiff failed to allege physical injury, a necessary component of an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress in Pennsylvania. Frankel v. Warwick Hotel, 881 F.Supp. 183, 187.

E.D.Pa.1995. Cit. in disc. After car accident, a mentally retarded injured driver sued her insurer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that insurer's adjuster called her employer, threatening to expose him to criminal liability in order to pressure her into accepting an inadequate settlement of her suit with the other driver. Plaintiff sought production from insurer of its file on plaintiff's claims, asserting that production would shed light on whether adjuster's threat was known to and condoned by insurer's officials. This court granted in part plaintiff's motion to compel, holding that plaintiff was entitled to discovery not only of the ordinary work product, but also of the opinion work product relevant to the emotional-distress claim. Plaintiff's claim depended on proof of the insurer's officials' mental state; thus, the opinions and mental impressions of the officials in handling the negligence claim against other driver were directly at issue. Hartman v. Banks, 164 F.R.D. 167, 168.

E.D.Pa.1995. Cit. in disc. Former executive director of county opportunity board sued board and others for wrongful discharge and asserted several state law claims sounding in trespass, including civil conspiracy and malicious interference with contractual rights. Granting in part and denying in part defendants' motions to dismiss, the court held that plaintiff's claims for civil conspiracy and tortious interference with contractual relations were not precluded under the exclusivity provisions of Pennsylvania's workers' compensation statute; the statute was limited to damages for physical injury, and plaintiff's state law claims were not the types of claims that the state legislature intended to preempt when it passed its workers' compensation law. The court stated that defendants' citation of cases holding that intentional-infliction-of-emotional-distress claims were barred by the workers' compensation statute did not help defendants' arguments, because emotional-distress claims had a physical-injury component. Pierce v. Montgomery County Opportunity Bd., Inc., 884 F.Supp. 965, 973.

E.D.Pa.1994. Com. (h) cit. in case cit. in sup. An HIV-positive attorney who was fired by his law firm sued the firm and his supervising attorney for, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress. He alleged that supervisor acted in an outrageous manner by failing to renew plaintiff's contract, disseminated false and defamatory information to conceal his discriminatory purpose, took steps to force plaintiff to voluntarily leave the firm, and abruptly fired him and threatened to forcibly remove him from the firm's premises. This court granted in part and denied in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that even if the jury were to accept plaintiff's factual allegations, it would establish only that supervisor's role in plaintiff's firing stemmed from an improper motive, which was insufficient to support an emotional distress claim. Doe v. Kohn, Nast & Graf, P.C., 862 F.Supp. 1310, 1328.

E.D.Pa.1994. Cit. in case cit. in sup. Employee who was fired from his position as sales manager sued former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress and other claims. Granting in part defendant's motion to dismiss, the court held, inter alia, that defendant's conduct in firing plaintiff a week before Christmas did not rise to the level of outrageousness required under

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Pennsylvania law, since defendant's actions, although harsh, were not so extreme as to go beyond all bounds of decency, despite defendant's harmful motive and the resulting effects on plaintiff. Mulgrew v. Sears Roebuck & Co., 868 F.Supp. 98, 103.

E.D.Pa.1993. Cit. in case cit. in disc. A transit authority employee sued his employer for damages from intentional infliction of emotional distress and loss of reputation caused by an unconstitutional drug test. The jury returned a verdict for the employee, and this court denied the employer's various postverdict motions, holding, inter alia, that the employee was not required to present medical testimony concerning the existence of emotional distress resulting from violation of his constitutional rights, particularly in view of the corroborating evidence that was presented. Bolden v. Southeastern Pa. Transp. Auth., 820 F.Supp. 949, 953, judgment affirmed 21 F.3d 29 (3d Cir.1994).

E.D.Pa.1993. Com. (d) cit. in disc. Former country club golf pro sued township, township's commissioners, and police officers and officials for several claims, including intentional infliction of emotional distress, after commissioners directed police to investigate theft and conspiracy charges against golf pro. Plaintiff alleged that although defendants knew the allegations were unfounded, they waged a two-year campaign to brand him a criminal conspirator and thief even though he was not arrested or charged with criminal wrongdoing. Granting in part defendants' motion to dismiss, this court held, inter alia, that, while plaintiff's allegations of governmental abuse were arguably serious, the emotional distress claim could not proceed as drafted because plaintiff erroneously alleged that all defendants acted outrageously. One defendant police officer, for example, was alleged only to have executed two search warrants and was not alleged to have known that accusations were meritless. Ersek v. Township of Springfield, Delaware County, 822 F.Supp. 218, 222.

E.D.Pa.1993. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in sup. A disability insurer sued its insured for insurance claim fraud, among other claims; the insured counterclaimed, asserting various contract and tort claims, including intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court, granting in part the insurer's motion to dismiss and to strike, held, inter alia, that, under Pennsylvania law, the insurer's alleged conduct in claiming that the insured knowingly made misrepresentations on his disability claim was not sufficiently outrageous to support an emotional distress claim. Great West Life Assur. Co. v. Levithan, 834 F.Supp. 858, 862.

E.D.Pa.1993. Quot. in sup., com. (j) quot. in case cit. in disc. After a Pennsylvania resident was arrested and detained in Pennsylvania for a murder in New Jersey, he sued a New Jersey township, its police department, and a police officer for defamation, malicious prosecution, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Granting in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, this court determined that plaintiff could not prevail on the claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress regardless of whether the law of New Jersey or of Pennsylvania was applicable, since under Pennsylvania law there was no competent medical evidence in the record of the severity of the alleged mental distress, and under New Jersey law there was no evidence that the alleged emotional distress was so severe that "no reasonable man could be expected to endure it." Lohman v. Township of Oxford, 816 F.Supp. 1025, 1032.

E.D.Pa.1993. Cit. and quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. Former chef for monastery located on private university campus sued monastery and university, alleging age discrimination in his discharge and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that, under Pennsylvania law, mere discharge of plaintiff after approximately 10 years of service was not outrageous conduct that would support an emotional distress claim, even if the discharge was groundless. Stouch v. Brothers of Order of Hermits of St. Augustine, 836 F.Supp. 1134, 1144, 1145.

E.D.Pa.1993. Quot. in disc., cit. in cases cit. and quot. in disc.; com. (d) quot. in disc., com. (f) quot. and cit. in sup., com. (i) quot. in sup.; illus. 9-12 cit. in sup. Sexual assault victim sued television station and commanding officer of city's sex crimes unit for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, regarding officer's evening news interview. The court granted defendants' motions for summary judgment, stating that although a reasonable listener could have concluded that officer's statement implied that undisclosed facts existed indicating that plaintiff had engaged in consensual sexual intercourse with a stranger while driving at high speed and then fabricated a story of abduction and rape for the police, neither officer's statement nor broadcast by station was sufficiently outrageous to support intentional infliction of emotional distress claim; mere fact that television station was informed beforehand that plaintiff would be upset by the broadcast was insufficient to make broadcast outrageous. It noted also that station presented public safety official's comments that were sympathetic to plaintiff. Weinstein v. Bullick, 827 F.Supp. 1193, 1203-1205.

E.D.Pa.1992. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in sup. A former employee sued his employer, a designer/manufacturer of electronics systems, alleging, inter alia, the intentional infliction of emotional distress and defamation in connection with remarks made by a co-worker regarding the plaintiff's national origin. The court granted in part the defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding that the alleged remarks were not sufficiently outrageous to permit recovery for emotional distress or sufficiently harmful to support a defamation claim. Gorwara v. AEL Industries, Inc., 784 F.Supp. 239, 247.

E.D.Pa.1992. Cit. in disc. Prisoner brought an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, against state corrections officers who searched his prison cell and opened his privileged legal mail. The court entered judgment for defendants, holding that intentional infliction of emotional distress required intent that went beyond all acceptable bounds and that defendants acted without the requisite intent. Proudfoot v. Williams, 803 F.Supp. 1048, 1054.

E.D.Pa.1991. Com. (d) quot. in disc. A collection attorney represented a client on a contingent fee basis. The attorney resigned from the practice of law for reasons unrelated to this representation, and the client directed him to return all files previously assigned to him. The attorney sued the client, seeking quantum meruit recovery of contingency fees and asserting claims for defamation and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court dismissed the emotional distress count of the plaintiff's complaint with prejudice, holding, inter alia, that the behavior described lacked the requisite degree of outrageousness to form the basis for the cause of action. The court reasoned that the attorney's allegations that the client deliberately sought to cause him various economic hardships by failing to make timely payment of his invoices were merely allegations of ordinary hardships common in many business relationships. Eisenberg v. General Motors Acceptance Corp., 761 F.Supp. 20, 23.

E.D.Pa.1990. Subsec. (1) quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in sup. and cit. generally in ftn. A public transit authority discharged a train engineer following a positive drug and alcohol test result taken after the engineer was involved in a fatal train accident with an automobile, killing the automobile's driver and injuring its passengers. The engineer sued the transit authority for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted the defendant's motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, holding that the administration of a drug and alcohol test and the discharge of the plaintiff in connection with a fatal train accident clearly did not constitute conduct so outrageous as to uphold the plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Quitmeyer v. S.E. Pa. Transp. Authority, 740 F.Supp. 363, 368.

E.D.Pa.1989. Cit. generally in disc., cit. in case quot. in ftn. A nursing home patient and her family sued the owner and operator of a nursing home for violating the Social Security Act by discharging her against her will, and for breach of contract and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted in part the defendant's motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that because Congress did not intend to provide for a private right of action under the Social Security Act creating Medicaid, the plaintiffs could not maintain this action. The court also held that the patient's family could not maintain an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Pennsylvania law because they could not demonstrate either that they were within the zone of danger of the defendant's conduct, or that they fell within a recognized exception to the zone of danger requirement. It stated that none of the family members actually witnessed the patient's transfer to another hospital, as they learned of the transfer from a third party. Chalfin v. Beverly Enterprises, Inc., 741 F.Supp. 1162, 1172.

E.D.Pa.1989. Cit. in ftn., subsec. (1) cit. in ftn. and quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. and quot. in sup., com. (k) quot. in ftn. Four former railroad employees sued the railroad pursuant to the Federal Employers' Liability Act, alleging that they suffered from emotional or stress-related injuries as a result of the defendant's failure to provide them with a safe workplace. Granting the defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held that the plaintiffs did not state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress because they failed to allege outrageous conduct and that they failed to state a claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress because the conduct they alleged was not the type recognized by the tort, namely, some kind of specific physical contact or impact on themselves or a third party or incidents of offensive conduct directed specifically at them. Kraus v. Consolidated Rail Corp., 723 F.Supp. 1073, 1080, 1081, 1086, 1088, appeal dismissed 899 F.2d 1360 (3d Cir.1990). See above case.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

E.D.Pa.1988. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. A discharged employee sued his employer, alleging violations of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act and the Employee Retirement and Income Security Act, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court granted in part the employer's motion for summary judgment, holding that forcing an employee to use a machine that was in poor condition and "riding" and "keeping the heat" on an employee in an attempt to make him retire did not constitute conduct that could be reasonably regarded as so extreme and outrageous as to permit recovery for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Clark v. France Compressor Products, 694 F.Supp. 112, 114.

E.D.Pa.1988. Cit. in disc., cit. and quot. in ftn. A mother sued a rehabilitation hospital for intentional infliction of emotional distress arising out of alleged failure to provide adequate supervision for her son, an accident victim, who was further injured when he fell out of his wheelchair and was occasionally given improper medications. The court granted the hospital's motion to dismiss, holding that, under Pennsylvania law, the plaintiff could state a claim for emotional distress only if she could demonstrate that she was within the "zone of danger" of the defendant's conduct, or if the circumstances of her injuries fell within a recognized exception to the zone of danger requirement, which she failed to demonstrate in this case. The court noted that Pennsylvania had fashioned its own approach to the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress apart from the language of the Restatement. Schachter v. Moss Rehabilitation Hosp., 695 F.Supp. 186, 187-189.

E.D.Pa.1987. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in sup. An employee sued her employer for sex discrimination, wrongful discharge, and intentional infliction of emotional distress as a result of her supervisor's actions. This court granted in part and denied in part the defendant's motion to dismiss the complaint, holding that the emotional distress count failed to state a claim. The court reasoned that activities such as checking the plaintiff's work more frequently than that of other employees, sitting and staring at her for 10 minutes at a time, calling her at home to demand that she report to work, and berating her for low work production were not so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency and to be regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Aquino v. Sommer Maid Creamery, Inc., 657 F.Supp. 208, 211.

E.D.Pa.1987. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. A former employee and his wife sued the former employer for, inter alia, breach of contract and intentional infliction of emotional distress after the husband was discharged from his job. This court granted the employer's motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that the facts as alleged were not extreme or outrageous enough to allow recovery for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and that the employer-employee status is not a special relationship justifying relaxation of this standard. Engstrom v. John Nuveen & Co., Inc., 668 F.Supp. 953, 959.

E.D.Pa.1987. Com. (d) quot. but dist. Homeowners sued an exterminator for strict liability and intentional infliction of emotional distress after it spilled a cancer-causing chemical in their basement which contaminated the air in the house. Granting in part the exterminator's motion for partial summary judgment, this court held that the defendant was not strictly liable for engaging in an ultrahazardous activity because its conduct was for the benefit of the plaintiffs, not for itself. The court also held that the exterminator's conduct was not sufficiently extreme or outrageous to impose liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Villari v. Terminix Intern., Inc., 677 F.Supp. 330, 336.

E.D.Pa.1987. Com. (d) cit. in sup. Homeowners sued a pest control company for contaminating their house with a hazardous termiticide, alleging that the company sold or distributed unreasonably dangerous insecticides and failed to warn the plaintiffs of the danger. This court granted partial summary judgment for the plaintiffs on the ground that even if the company was providing a hybrid sales-service transaction, it was strictly liable in tort for defects in the product. The court reasoned that to require a consumer to pursue a manufacturer would belie one of the goals of products liability law—to respond to the realities of the distribution of products in a changing society. Villari v. Terminix Intern., Inc., 663 F.Supp. 727, 733.

E.D.Pa.1986. Com. (d) quot. in sup. and cit. in disc., illus. 4 quot. in disc., com. (f), illus. 13 cit. in sup. A handicapped chauffeur sued his employer and its clients for slander, intentional interference with prospective business advantage, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, after the clients allegedly told the employer that they were embarrassed to have a handicapped driver. After deciding that Pennsylvania law should govern the dispute because it had the most significant relationship to the issues, the court awarded the defendants summary judgment. The court held that the plaintiff's three causes of actions failed since the alleged statements made by the clients were not defamatory because they were opinions, the plaintiff could not prove intent to interfere with business advantage, and the clients' statements did not rise to the required level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to prove a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. McFadden v. Burton, 645 F.Supp. 457, 463.

E.D.Pa.1985. Com. (d) cit. in sup. A television investigation team filmed a police officer leaving an after-hours club with an envelope in his hand. During the broadcast a reporter voiced suspicions that the officer was corrupt. The officer sued the broadcasting company alleging that the broadcast defamed him, placed him in a false light, invaded his privacy, and caused emotional distress. Plaintiff filed a motion to compel discovery and defendant moved for summary judgment. The trial court denied plaintiff's motion to compel discovery on the ground that defendant's sources of information were protected under Pennsylvania's shield law. The court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment because plaintiff could not establish actual malice. The court held, inter alia, that defendant was not liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress because defendant's conduct was not so outrageous in character or extreme in degree as to be regarded as atrocious or utterly intolerable. Coughlin v. Westinghouse Broadcasting and Cable, 603 F.Supp. 377, 389, affirmed 780 F.2d 340 (3d Cir.1985), cert. denied 476 U.S. 1187, 106 S.Ct. 2927, 91 L.Ed.2d 554 (1986).

E.D.Pa.1985. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case cit. in sup. After the plaintiff was involved in a car accident with an insured of the defendant insurance company, she sued the insurance company for, inter alia, invasion of privacy and intentional infliction of emotional distress because the defendant had a credit report on the plaintiff prepared as part of its investigation, without notifying the plaintiff that such a report had been requested. This court granted the defendant's motions for summary judgment on both claims, holding that the report was not communicated to either the public at large or to so many people that it was substantially certain to become public knowledge, so there was no publication, and therefore no invasion of privacy; and that the defendant's conduct was not sufficiently extreme or outrageous to constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress. Houghton v. New Jersey Mfrs. Ins. Co., 615 F.Supp. 299, 308, judgment reversed 795 F.2d 1144 (3d Cir.1986).

E.D.Pa.1985. Quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc., com. (h) cit. in disc. After an employee was terminated because of irregularities in his expense reports, the employee sued his former employer and supervisor, alleging among other things, defamation, false imprisonment, invasion of privacy, and intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress. The court granted the employer's motion for summary judgment, except as to the basic claim for defamation, the claim for defamation by conduct, and the claim for invasion of privacy. The court held that there was a material issue of fact for the jury as to the truth of the allegedly defamatory communication, thereby denying the employer's motion for summary judgment, regardless of who bore the burden of proving truth or falsity; the court also noted that the parties strongly disagreed as to the meaning of those words as reasonably understood by the audience. The court held that there was a qualified privilege, but a question of fact existed as to whether this privilege had been abused by excessive publication or lack of reasonable care to ascertain the truth. The court noted that, although some states required that there be recklessness for an abuse of a qualified privilege, this state required only negligence. The court held that there was no false imprisonment because the employee had a means of escape. The court also held that there was a material issue of fact whether any information placing the employee in a false light had been communicated to the public. The court rejected the employee's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because the conduct complained of was not outrageous; the employer had communicated the alleged defamatory remarks to a group of employees that had a valid interest in the situation. Krochalis v. Insurance Co. of North America, 629 F.Supp. 1360, 1372, 1373.

E.D.Pa.1985. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in sup. and com. (h) cit. in disc. After his employment as president of the defendant corporation was terminated, the plaintiff brought an action for age discrimination, breach of an employment contract, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The defendants, which included related corporations, moved for summary judgment. This court granted summary judgment on the intentional infliction of emotional distress claim, because the plaintiff had failed to demonstrate that the conduct of the defendants was sufficiently extreme or outrageous, but it denied summary judgment on the age discrimination claim, since there existed a material issue of fact whether age was a determinative factor in the plaintiff's discharge. The court denied summary judgment on the breach of contract claim because an issue existed whether the plaintiff had used his best efforts in carrying out his duties, and the defendants had failed to show sufficient frustration of purpose to bar the contract claim. Madreperla v. Williard Co., 606 F.Supp. 874, 879, 880.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

E.D.Pa.1984. Quot. in sup., com. (d) cit. in case cit. in sup. and quot. in ftn. A woman sued her former employer for sex discrimination, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and wrongful discharge. She claimed that the plaintiff's managers had made disparaging remarks about her marital status and her role as a mother, and had purposely overloaded her work schedule, causing her to collapse at work. The plaintiff had eventually been terminated from her employment. This court held that the plaintiff could not recover punitive damages or damages for pain and suffering under Title VII, since it furnished an equitable remedy. The defendant's conduct was held not to be so extreme and outrageous to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court concluded that, by filing the instant action, the plaintiff had forfeited an exclusive remedy for wrongful discharge provided under Pennsylvania statute. Hooten v. Pennsylvania College of Optometry, 601 F.Supp. 1151, 1154, 1155.

E.D.Pa.1984. Subsec. (1) quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in sup. Victim of bladder cancer and his wife sued various sellers of unnamed chemical products, several trade associations, and a research institute in strict liability and in negligence, claiming that his disease was caused by carcinogens in unidentified chemical products used in the printing industry. Plaintiff included a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendants knew or should have known of the dangers of some unnamed product and failed to warn plaintiffs. The court dismissed the strict liability and negligence claims, holding that plaintiffs failed to state a cause of action because they could not identify any product as the cause of injury. It also dismissed the emotional distress claim, holding that defendants' alleged inaction over a long period of time was not the extreme and outrageous conduct required for recovery. Klein v. Council of Chemical Associations, 587 F.Supp. 213, 225, 226.

E.D.Pa.1983. Cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup., illus. 1 cit. in sup. The plaintiff sued the defendants for malicious prosecution, abuse of process, intentional infliction of emotional distress, civil conspiracy and defamation. The plaintiff had criticized cancer care insurance sold by the defendants; he alleged that the defendants harassed him with lawsuits and defamed him in retaliation. This court granted in part and denied in part the defendants' motion to dismiss. The malicious prosecution count was dismissed because, under the laws of the states where the complained-of proceedings occurred, the plaintiff did not satisfy the arrest/seizure element. The abuse of process count was dismissed for failure to allege arrest of person or seizure of property. The emotional distress count was dismissed for failure to allege sufficiently extreme or outrageous conduct. The civil conspiracy count was not dismissed, and after looking to the laws of the plaintiff's domicile, this court allowed amendment of the defamation count to show abuse of a qualified privilege. Denenberg v. American Family Corp. of Columbus, Ga., 566 F.Supp. 1242, 1251-1252.

E.D.Pa.1983. Cit. and quot. in disc. An employee sued her employer under ERISA alleging that she was improperly denied disability benefits and for intentional infliction of emotional distress by the handling of her claim for disability. The court granted the employer's motion for summary judgment, holding that although ERISA preempted state law relating to employee benefit plans, state laws relating to intentional infliction of emotional distress impacted ERISA plans too tenuously to be considered as law relating to such plans. Therefore the employee's claim for emotional distress was not barred by preemption. In this case however, the employee did not establish that the employer's conduct in investigating her situation was extreme or outrageous. Kelly v. International Business Machines Corp., 573 F.Supp. 366, 372, judgment affirmed 746 F.2d 1467 (3d Cir.1984).

E.D.Pa.1983. Cit. in case quot. in disc., subsec. (1) quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. A purchaser of securities and his family brought an action against various defendants, including a brokerage firm, its officers and a broker, alleging violations of the Securities Act of 1933, the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, and pendent state claims including infliction of emotional distress. The defendants filed motions to dismiss. The court granted the defendants' motion with respect to the claim for infliction of emotional distress, holding that the defendants' alleged fraudulent conduct did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct, and therefore the complaint failed to establish intentional infliction of emotional distress. The motions to dismiss were granted in part and denied in part on other grounds with respect to the other claims. Kimmel v. Peterson, 565 F.Supp. 476, 498, 499.

E.D.Pa.1983. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup., com. (d) cit. in disc. An employee filed an employment discrimination action against her former employer, alleging that the plant manager engaged in a continuing course of sexual advances which were rejected by the employee, and that the manager retaliated against the rejections by making the workplace oppressive for the employee, causing severe emotional distress. The court denied the former employer's motion to dismiss with respect to the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that the former employee's complaint was sufficient to state a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The motion to dismiss was granted in part and denied in part on other grounds. Shaffer v. National Can Corp., 565 F.Supp. 909, 914, 915.

E.D.Pa.1983. Cit. in sup. The defendant corporation fired the plaintiff employee for stealing some brushes. At that time the plaintiff had one month to work until retirement. The retirement benefits the plaintiff would have received were far greater than those for which he qualified as a result of his discharge. The plaintiff sued for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The defendant moved to dismiss for failure to state a cause of action. After reviewing the four elements of this tort, the court held that the plaintiff should be allowed to offer evidence in support of his claim, and it denied the defendant's motion. Shipkowski v. United States Steel Corp., 585 F.Supp. 66, 69.

E.D.Pa.1983. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in part in sup., com. (h) cit. in disc. A former managerial employee brought a wrongful termination suit against her employer alleging, inter alia, that the employer's conduct prior to the employee's forced resignation constituted intentional infliction of mental distress. The court granted the employer's motion for summary judgment as to this count. The court found that although the employer's conduct of removing the employee from her former position and taking away her private office and secretary was intentional and highly inappropriate, it was not the type of extreme and outrageous conduct required to support a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. In addition, the court found that the plaintiff failed to prove that she suffered severe emotional distress. Wells v. Thomas, 569 F.Supp. 426, 433, 434.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

E.D.Pa.1982. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. in sup., and com. (e) cit. in sup. An employee brought an action against his former employer claiming, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The plaintiff argued that the defendant employer had induced him to refrain from seeking other employment and to commit himself to continued employment with the defendant while the defendant was aware that a contemplated change would require the plaintiff to relocate his home to a distant, even foreign, city. The court granted the defendant's 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss and held that the plaintiff failed to state a claim upon which relief could be granted. The court found that the extreme nature of conduct required to establish liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress was absent from the facts of this case, and noted that courts generally have steadfastly refused to extend the scope of this tort to anything but the most extreme and outrageous form of misconduct. While the defendant's conduct in this case might be characterized as offensive and unfair, it is not so extreme as to find liability. The court further noted that the plaintiff's attempted analogy to landlord-tenant cases was misplaced, as liability in those cases for intentional infliction of emotional distress was used to buttress other legal sanctions directed towards policing the conduct of notorious "slumlords." Cautilli v. GAF Corp., 531 F.Supp. 71, 72-75.

E.D.Pa.1982. Subsec. (1) cit. in sup. The plaintiff received collection letters from the defendant record club and brought this action, alleging libel and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The defendants moved to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction and failure to state a claim. The court stated that even if the plaintiff could correct certain jurisdictional defects, the case would then have to be dismissed on the merits. Even if the letters were false and defamatory, there had not been any publication, which was a requirement in a libel action in Pennsylvania. The court stated that the communications between the defendant and its attorney were not defamatory because they could not have reasonably lowered the plaintiff's reputation in the community or deterred others from dealing with him. In any case, such a conversation would be absolutely privileged as preliminary to a proposed judicial proceeding. The court also found that the statements made were not extreme and outrageous, as required to support a claim for mental distress. Complaint dismissed. Jones v. RCA Music Service, 530 F.Supp. 767, 768.

E.D.Pa.1982. Subsec. (1) quot. in ftn. in disc. An employee sued his former employer, the Interstate Commerce Commission, seeking compensatory and punitive damages, reinstatement, transfer, and backpay for the allegedly intentional, wanton, and malicious violation of his First Amendment rights. The court found that the employee's allegations regarding the harassment he received in retaliation for a letter he sent to Congress stated a cognizable First Amendment claim. However, the court held that the statute of limitations had run on this claim. The court applied the tort statute of limitations for the intentional infliction of emotional distress, because the employee's complaint stated that the acts of the employer were "extreme and outrageous," and, through this conduct, the employer "intentionally inflicted severe emotional distress" on the employee. Lawrence v. United States, 631 F.Supp. 631, 635.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

E.D.Pa.1981. Cit. in disc. but dist. The plaintiff husband developed asbestosis and the plaintiffs, the husband and his wife, sued to recover for the infliction of emotional distress. The plaintiffs alleged that they had endured enhanced anguish from the deterioration of the family unit. On a motion to file a third amended complaint, this court stated that recovery depended upon the foreseeability of the harm. The court stated that Pennsylvania appeared not to require direct visual perception, however, the event triggering the distress had been described as sudden or violent. Therefore the court found that Pennsylvania courts would not allow recovery for emotional distress resulting from the development of an occupational disease. Amader v. Johns-Manville Corp., 514 F.Supp. 1031, 1033.

E.D.Pa.1981. Cit. generally in disc. and com. (d) cit. and quot. in case quot. in disc. An action was brought against a state trooper to recover inter alia, for an intentional infliction of mental distress in connection with the trooper's issuing traffic citations to the plaintiff who was believed to have been involved in a hit and run automobile collision. The defendant moved for summary judgment. The court held that there was insufficient evidence of outrageous conduct to make out a claim under Pennsylvania law for the intentional infliction of mental distress, notwithstanding the plaintiff's assertion that the trooper had accused the plaintiff based upon his personal "feelings" about the case. The court stated that the issuance of the traffic citations against the plaintiff, which were supported by probable cause, was not conduct which any reasonable person could deem outrageous. The defendant's motion for summary judgment was granted. Curran v. Dural, 512 F.Supp. 699, 704.

E.D.Pa.1981. Cit. in disc., subsec. (1) cit. and quot. in sup. and cit. in case quot. in disc. and coms. (d) and (h) quot. in disc. Airline passengers brought an action against an airline seeking to recover damages for difficulties they incurred when their flight to Philadelphia was forced to fly directly to Syracuse due to the weather conditions in the Philadelphia area. The court granted summary judgment in favor of the airline holding, inter alia, that the passengers' complaint failed to state a cause of action, under Pennsylvania law, for either intentional infliction of emotional distress, negligent infliction of emotional harm, or emotional harm caused by a breach of contract. With respect to the passengers' intentional infliction of emotional harm claim, the court held that the first element of that cause of action, i.e., that the defendant's conduct had been so outrageous in character and so extreme in degree as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, was clearly absent. The court stated that it was for the court to determine, in the first instance, whether a defendant's conduct could be characterized as sufficiently extreme and outrageous to meet that standard. The court found that the passengers' negligent infliction of emotional harm claim failed because they had not alleged that the airline had been negligent in any manner which threatened the passengers with a danger of physical impact. The court also concluded that the passengers were barred from recovering for emotional harm caused by a breach of contract because they had not alleged any physical injury or physical impact. The court stated that recovery for an emotional disturbance resulting from a breach of contract is not allowed, in the absence of bodily harm caused by the breach. Kutner v. Eastern Airlines, Inc., 514 F.Supp. 553, 557.

E.D.Pa.1981. Cit. and quot. in disc. Plaintiff brought an action alleging that the defendant magazine publisher had defamed him by publishing a photograph of him wearing his "Mummer's" costume with a caption stating, "A New Year's tribute here to all the ostriches who gave their tails to make the world free for closet transvestites from South Philly to get themselves stinking drunk." The defendant moved for summary judgment. The court held that the plaintiff could maintain a defamation action against the magazine and the fact that the picture and caption appeared in the humor section of the magazine raised a jury question as to whether the publication of the picture was so obviously humorous that no person seeing it would have taken it as defamatory. The plaintiff also alleged that the defendant, by publishing the photograph and caption, invaded his privacy by portraying him before the public in a false light and in a manner offensive to reasonable persons. The court stated that in order to prove a claim for false light invasion of privacy, the plaintiff must show that the false light in which he has been placed would be highly offensive to the reasonable person and that the defendant had knowledge of and acted in reckless disregard as to the falsity of the publicized matter and false light in which it placed the plaintiff. The court held that the question of whether a reasonable person would find the statement highly offensive should be decided by a jury. The court also held that the evidence presented a jury question as to whether the defendant's conduct constituted extreme and outrageous conduct which caused severe emotional distress to the plaintiff. Accordingly, the defendant's motions for summary judgment were denied. Martin v. Municipal Publications, 510 F.Supp. 255, 260.

E.D.Pa.1980. Cit. in disc. and quot. in sup. and cit. in case quot. in disc. The plaintiff brought an action against the plaintiff's insurance company, for terminating the monthly disability payments that it had been making to the plaintiff under this policy. Count II of the plaintiff's complaint demanded punitive damages on the grounds that the defendant never intended to pay the plaintiff under this policy and purposefully and maliciously refused to pay benefits and as a result, caused the plaintiff to suffer anxiety, nervousness and distress. The defendant filed a motion to dismiss Count II because it failed to state a claim upon which relief could have been granted in either assumpsit and in trespass. The court noted that the plaintiff did not state whether his claim for punitive damages was in assumpsit or trespass. The court assumed initially that the plaintiff had alleged a breach of contract action based upon the defendant's breach of its duty as an insurer to deal fairly and in good faith with the plaintiff. The court stated that Pennsylvania law did not allow recovery of punitive damages in an action in assumpsit. Therefore the court held that Count II must be dismissed for failure to state a claim upon which relief could be granted in that it demanded punitive damages for an action in assumpsit. Alternatively, the court considered whether Count II sought punitive damages only in a trespass action, for the intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court discussed Pennsylvania law and concluded that an allegation for infliction of emotional distress, based upon the breach of an insurer's duty of fair dealing, fails to state a claim upon which relief could be granted. Therefore, the court granted the defendant's motion to dismiss Count II of the complaint. Mazzuia v. Monarch Life Ins. Co., 487 F.Supp. 1299, 1301-1303.

E.D.Pa.1979. Cit. in sup. An employee brought an action against his employer and his union for interference with business relations and for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The plaintiff was a foreman of the defendant company, a management position. He was notified by the company that he was to stop being foreman and would be returned to his former position as group leader, pursuant to a collective bargaining agreement. Through this action he would have replaced an employee who had less seniority. The union objected to the transfer and threatened to strike if it occurred whereby the company rescinded the transfer. The defendants moved for summary judgment on both counts. The court denied the union's motion with regard to the claim of tortious interference with business relations because the complaint did set forth a recognizable claim and the union failed to put forth any evidence addressed to this issue. The court also denied the union's motion with regard to the claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress because a strike threat might constitute outrageous conduct and because the plaintiff had asserted that the conduct was directed at him intentionally for reasons relating to union politics and that assertion, if proven, would adequately establish the element of intention required to maintain the action. The employer's motion for summary judgment was granted. Gingras v. General Elec. Co., 476 F.Supp. 644, 649.

E.D.Pa.1979. Quot. in disc. and coms. (d) and (h) cit. and quot. in part in disc. The plaintiff was fired by his employer, the defendant, after the plaintiff had made a number of long distance phone calls from the employer's business phone. The plaintiff alleged defamation, intentional infliction of emotional distress, tortious and wrongful discharge and intentional interference with the plaintiff's prospective contractual relations. The defendant moved for summary judgment. The court granted the motion as a matter of law with regard to the defamation count because the plaintiff had not shown publication of a material fact which was a necessary element of the tort. The court found that the defendant's conduct was not unreasonable and therefore granted the motion with regard to the intentional infliction of emotional distress count because such a claim cannot exist unless the defendant's conduct was outrageous. The plaintiff failed to charge that the defendant's conduct was against public policy or in bad faith and therefore the general rule applied which allows an employer to terminate the employment relationship for any or no reason. The defendant argued that there were no genuine issues of fact raised by the plaintiff as to material elements of the claim of interference with prospective contractual relations. The court agreed and granted the defendant's motion on this claim. Lekich v. International Bus. Mach. Corp., 469 F.Supp. 485, 488.

E.D.Pa.1979. Com. (d) cit. in sup. Employee and his wife instituted suit against a rail corporation, the husband's employer, and the vice-president and treasurer thereof, alleging actionable injuries arising out of adjustments in the employee's employment status, a wanton act which caused the plaintiffs severe mental and emotional distress. The defendants filed motions to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction over the subject matter and to dismiss for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. The court held, inter alia, that the acts of the rail corporation and its vice-president and treasurer were fully justified statutorily, and did not rise to the level of the kind of extreme or outrageous conduct necessary to recovery for infliction of mental distress. Wenzer v. Consolidated Rail Corp., 464 F.Supp. 643, 650, affirmed612 F.2d 576 (3rd Cir.1979).

E.D.Pa.1978. Cit. in sup. Former employee brought an action against his former employer alleging, inter alia, that certain actions by employer during the course of employee's employment constituted wrongful harassment amounting to a tortious infliction of mental and emotional distress. Plaintiff claimed that he had been excluded from meetings which were necessary to the performance of his job and was then expected to be familiar with the matters discussed therein; that papers on his desk had been constantly rearranged so as to annoy him; and that rumors had been circulated to the effect that his job was in jeopardy. The court granted the employer's motion to dismiss the complaint because the alleged conduct was not of that extreme and outrageous type which is necessary to support an action for intentional infliction of mental distress. Beidler v. W.R. Grace, Inc., 461 F.Supp. 1013, 1016, judgment aff'd 609 F.2d 500 (3rd Cir.1979).

E.D.Pa.1977. Quot. in op. and com. (j) quot. in ftn. in sup. This was an action by a former professional football player against the club for which he had played to recover a balance allegedly due on his contract, damages for defamation, and damages for infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiff, who had signed three separate standard player contracts, had sustained a permanently related football injury during the first year and was refused payment on the two remaining contracts. Defendant had made posttrial motions following plaintiff's jury verdict. In denying defendant's motions, the court held that there was evidence supporting the jury determination that the three separate contracts containing continuation of salary clauses, in the event of a football-related injury, constituted a single three-year contract, and that there was evidence that the team physician intentionally inflicted mental distress on plaintiff by making a false statement to the press concerning a fatal disease from which plaintiff was allegedly suffering. Chuy v. Philadelphia Eagles Football Club, 431 F.Supp. 254, 262, 263, judgment aff'd 595 F.2d 1265 (3rd Cir.1979). See above case.

E.D.Pa.1976. Quot. in ftn. and dist. and subsec. (2)(a) and com. (l) cit. and dist. and com. (i) cit. in ftn. and dist. This was a diversity action brought by a father seeking damages for emotional distress resulting from intentional defamation of plaintiff's daughter who was dismissed from her position as a cashier in a hotel when defendant's personnel informed the hotel that she was a thief, although they knew that the charge was untrue when they "falsely and maliciously" made it. Plaintiff alleged that as a result of this defamation, a prior coronary condition was aggravated and he suffered a coronary attack of a disabling nature, resulting in his great emotional distress and economic hardship. The question before the court was whether plaintiff stated a cause of action under Pennsylvania law. In dismissing the complaint for failure to state a claim, the court noted that while there may "possibly be a set of facts which would justify the recognition of a cause of action in favor of persons who suffer severe emotional distress due to the defamation of a member of their immediate family which comes to their attention sometime after it occurs * * * to create such a new class of potential plaintiffs based on the facts in this case would not be a proper elaboration of current Pennsylvania law." Waugh v. Gaudio Bros., Inc., 422 F.Supp. 392, 394.

E.D.Pa.Bkrtcy.Ct.

E.D.Pa.Bkrtcy.Ct.1988. Cit. in disc., cit. in case cit. in disc. An employer dismissed an employee after receiving from a former employer evaluations that characterized the employee as having a "poor attitude and less than satisfactory production." The employee sued the former employer on theories of defamation and intentional infliction of emotional distress, which allegedly led to his dismissals. This court granted the defendant summary judgment on the infliction of emotional distress claim because the former employer's conduct was not sufficiently extreme or outrageous. The court reasoned that the former employer's expressed dissatisfaction in lower pay and poor support was not extreme and stated that the evaluation, even if false, was not so outrageous as to create liability. In re Frymire, 87 B.R. 856, 861.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

M.D.Pa.

M.D.Pa.2018. Cit. in cases cit. in ftn.; com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Former student brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against private boarding school, after it expelled plaintiff following his second hospitalization for mental and emotional issues, alleging that defendant encouraged plaintiff to seek hospitalization despite knowing it would result in his expulsion, knew that expelling plaintiff would force him to return to a difficult home life, and expelled him primarily to avoid the liability of keeping him enrolled. This court granted plaintiff's motion to amend, holding that plaintiff alleged sufficient facts for his IIED claim to survive dismissal. The court determined that defendant's conduct rose to the level of outrageousness required for an IIED claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, noting that, although Pennsylvania had not yet explicitly recognized the tort of IIED, the Third Circuit predicted that the Pennsylvania Supreme Court would ultimately adopt § 46's formulation of the tort. Dobson v. Milton Hershey School, 356 F.Supp.3d 428, 439.

M.D.Pa.2018. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former chairman of the board of directors of a medical-device corporation brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against board members and shareholders, alleging, inter alia, that defendants falsely accused him of misusing corporate funds, filed a criminal complaint claiming that plaintiff committed theft by deception, and defamed him and put him in a false light by publicizing documents stating plaintiff had misused funds and failed to disclose that he had been indicted and arrested. This court granted in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that defendants' alleged conduct did not arise to the level of outrageousness necessary for an IIED claim. The court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, in explaining that plaintiff's allegations that defendants acted maliciously, with criminal intent, or with the intent to inflict emotional distress was not sufficiently outrageous to support an IIED claim. Martin v. Finley, 349 F.Supp.3d 391, 430.

M.D.Pa.2018. Cit. in ftn.; com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Mother of a middle-school student who committed suicide sued private, nonprofit institutions that provided cost-free education, housing, and medical care to low-income children like student, alleging that institutions caused student to commit suicide by suspending her for the following year and compelling her to return to her father's home after treating her for mental-health issues that were driven largely by her father's alcoholism and her unstable family life with him. On reconsideration, this court denied institutions' motion to dismiss mother's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress filed on behalf of student, but granted the motion without prejudice as to her claim filed on her own behalf. The court reasoned, in part, that mother failed to establish that she personally experienced any physical harm, as required for her to recover on such a claim under Pennsylvania law and Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Wartluft v. Milton Hershey School, 354 F.Supp.3d 584, 594.

M.D.Pa.2016. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Parents of minor special-needs student who had been diagnosed with various developmental disorders brought an action against public school district, alleging that defendant discriminated against student due to his disabilities and denied his right to a free appropriate public education in violation of federal law. This court denied in part defendant's motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiffs stated a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court pointed to plaintiffs' allegations that defendant inappropriately used physical restraints on student over 20 times when he was only 7 and 8 years old, that this conduct traumatized him, and that plaintiffs witnessed some of the occasions when defendants used the physical restraints on student and saw how he was traumatized. A.C. v. Scranton School District, 191 F.Supp.3d 375, 392.

M.D.Pa.2012. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup. Husband and wife and their two minor children brought claims for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against two physicians who examined one of the children, alleging that defendants' misdiagnosis of the child as suffering from Shaken Baby Syndrome led to a child-abuse investigation and the filing of criminal charges against husband. Granting defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiffs' IIED claim, this court held that plaintiffs failed to allege conduct that was intentional, reckless, or extreme and outrageous, as required to state such a claim. The court reasoned that plaintiffs' complaint established only that defendants engaged in independent medical examinations of the child and concluded thereafter, based on methodology promulgated by the American Academy of Pediatricians, that the child had been abused. Isbell v. Bellino, 983 F.Supp.2d 492, 515.

M.D.Pa.2012. Quot. in sup., quot. in case quot. in sup., subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in sup. Co-administrators of estate of arrestee who committed suicide shortly after being admitted to county correctional facility sued facility and others for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). This court denied defendants' motion to dismiss, holding that it would be premature to dismiss plaintiffs' IIED claim at this stage and that it was appropriate to permit plaintiffs to engage in discovery on that claim. The court noted, however, that it had serious reservations about the validity of plaintiff's IIED claim under existing Pennsylvania law, because the outrageous conduct asserted by plaintiffs was that defendants denied arrestee necessary psychiatric medication, whereas the cases in which Pennsylvania courts had found a cause of action for IIED truly presented what from any vantage point was deliberately extreme and outrageous conduct. Ponzini v. Monroe County, 897 F.Supp.2d 282, 290.

M.D.Pa.2012. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Asian-Pakistani female employee, who was born in Pakistan and identified as a Muslim and a practitioner of Islam, sued former employer, alleging, among other things, that employer unlawfully discriminated against her based on her race, national origin, and religion in violation of federal and state laws. This court granted employer's motion for partial summary judgment on employee's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that, even assuming, arguendo, that all of the conduct complained of was intentional and discriminatory, mere callousness or insensitivity on the part of a defendant did not suffice to establish liability on such a claim. The court noted that, according to the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, it was extremely rare to find conduct in the employment context that would rise to the level of outrageousness necessary to provide a basis for recovery for the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress under Pennsylvania law. Syed v. YWCA of Hanover, 906 F.Supp.2d 345, 361.

M.D.Pa.2010. Cit. in case quot. in sup., subsec. (1) quot. in sup. Restaurant patron who suffered a seizure and was subdued by police officers with an electroshock device when he refused medical treatment sued borough, police department, and officers, asserting federal civil-rights claims and a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Pennsylvania law. This court denied defendants' motion for summary judgment on the emotional-distress claim, holding that, if a jury found that defendants deliberately used extreme force to subdue a subject suffering from physical distress and not resisting officers' physical control, they could find that such conduct went beyond all bounds of human decency; additionally, while plaintiff could not prevail on the claim solely based on his testimony that he began seeing a psychiatrist after the incident as treatment for depression, he could potentially provide competent medical evidence that would demonstrate to a jury that he suffered emotional distress. Shultz v. Carlisle Police Dept., 706 F.Supp.2d 613, 628.

M.D.Pa.2009. Cit. and quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. African-American family sued hotel and its front desk clerk for racial discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress after clerk denied father's request for a room for himself, his fiancée, and their minor daughter. Denying summary judgment for defendants, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiffs alleged sufficient facts to state a valid claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Pennsylvania law. The court rejected defendants' argument that their alleged conduct was not extreme and outrageous, citing, among other things, plaintiffs' allegations that clerk openly admitted to denying plaintiffs a room because of their race in the presence of plaintiffs and others in the hotel lobby while openly providing the same services to white patrons. Shumate v. Twin Tier Hospitality, LLC, 655 F.Supp.2d 521, 541, 543.

M.D.Pa.2009. Cit. in sup. Current and former prisoners at county correctional facility brought federal civil-rights claims as well as state-law claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, alleging that they were abused by prison officials during their incarceration. Denying in part and granting in part defendants' motion for summary judgment on plaintiffs' IIED claims, this court held that because most of the plaintiffs had proferred competent evidence to establish severe emotional injury as a result of defendants' conduct, defendants were not entitled to summary judgment on the IIED claims. However, because one of the plaintiffs failed to provide any competent medical evidence that he suffered severe emotional distress, and the only evidence of such distress was provided by his own testimony, defendants were entitled to summary judgment on that plaintiff's IIED claim. Zimmerman v. Schaeffer, 654 F.Supp.2d 226, 256.

M.D.Pa.2008. Subsec. (1) cit. in sup. Individual who was arrested in his backyard by two police officers who were searching for a person from a neighboring property sued officers and others, alleging that officers threatened to shoot his dog, forcibly restrained him, and transported him to the police station for a few hours before letting him go after he requested that they stop harassing him and leave his property. Denying in part defendants' motion to dismiss, this court held that plaintiff stated a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against defendants in their individual capacities under Pennsylvania law; while the sufficiency of plaintiff's medical evidence would be considered at a later stage of litigation, plaintiff adequately alleged that defendants acted in a deliberate, malicious, extreme and outrageous manner by physically injuring him in a manner necessitating medical attention, and that he suffered severe emotional distress as a result. Kokinda v. Breiner, 557 F.Supp.2d 581, 595.

M.D.Pa.2006. Cit. in disc., cit. in case quot. in disc., subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in sup. African-American woman sued police officers for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, after officers, among other things, arrested her in her home and prevented her husband from helping her locate her telephone before learning that she had been misidentified. This court granted defendants' motion to dismiss this claim, holding that plaintiff's allegations that officers' conduct was “egregious” and that one officer insulted her by effectively calling her a liar did not rise to the necessary level of extreme or outrageous conduct; additionally, plaintiff failed to allege that she suffered any severe emotional injury because of her brief encounter with officers. Hines v. Proper, 442 F.Supp.2d 216, 223, 224.

M.D.Pa.2004. Cit. and quot. in disc. Co-administrators of decedent's estate sued a correctional facility as well as various medical providers and personnel, alleging deprivation of civil rights and asserting pendent state-law claims for negligence, negligent infliction of emotional distress, wrongful death, and survival. This court denied defendants' motion for a more definitive statement as to specific language and causes of action set forth in the complaint, and granted defendants' motion to strike the negligent-infliction-of-emotional-distress claim, finding, inter alia, that an individual could not recover for emotional distress if he or she was not actually present to witness the allegedly tortious conduct. Thomas v. Luzerne County Correctional Facility, 310 F.Supp.2d 718, 723.

M.D.Pa.2002. Cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) cit. in sup. and cit. in case quot. in sup. Husband and wife sued group health insurer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, fraudulent inducement and concealment, breach of contract, negligence, and RICO violations, after insurer refused to pay for husband's medical bills. Plaintiffs alleged that insurer's delay in processing their application caused emotional distress that contributed to husband's medical problems. This court dismissed plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding, inter alia, that the delay in processing an insurance application did not constitute extreme and outrageous conduct. Piper v. American Nat. Life Ins. Co. of Texas, 228 F.Supp.2d 553, 563.

M.D.Pa.2002. Quot. in case quot. in disc., cit. generally in case quot. in ftn. Teacher sued school district, school board, and others for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that defendants singled her out for disparate treatment and ultimate discharge, and that, following plaintiff's successful appeal of her termination in arbitration, defendants advised other teachers not to associate with plaintiff, and school principal began weekly evaluations of plaintiff, which were not required of other teachers. This court granted defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiff's complaint, holding, inter alia, that defendants' conduct did not rise to level of egregiousness or outrageousness necessary to state emotional-distress claim. Also, complaint failed to allege with specificity any physical injury, illness, or harm suffered by plaintiff. Zugarek v. Southern Tioga School Dist., 214 F.Supp.2d 468, 481.

M.D.Pa.1999. Cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case cit. in disc. Police officer sued borough and individual borough employees, among others, for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with defendants' role in charging plaintiff with giving perjurious information in an unrelated case, despite the existence of a nonprosecution agreement. Entering summary judgment for defendants, the court held, in part, that plaintiff had failed to establish that the conduct complained of was extreme and outrageous, or that he had suffered severe emotional distress as a result of it. Williams v. Fedor, 69 F.Supp.2d 649, 668.

M.D.Pa.1995. Cit. in headnotes and sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. After an HIV-positive patient's surgery for a leg abscess and osteomyelitis was delayed by the treating doctor's refusal to perform the surgery without first obtaining protective suits for himself and his surgical staff, the patient sued the doctor for, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted in part the doctor's motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress because there was no evidence to suggest that the doctor's statements that he was seeking to obtain special protective gear from the hospital before performing the surgery were made in a manner insulting or offensive to plaintiff, or that plaintiff perceived them as such or suffered any emotional distress. Sharrow v. Bailey, 910 F.Supp. 187, 189, 194.

M.D.Pa.1994. Cit. in disc., cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in part in sup. and quot. in case quot. in sup. Teacher suspended indefinitely by school district sued principal and district superintendent for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that he was given unsatisfactory job-performance review by principal signed by superintendent on wrong form with inadequate observation; he was suspended with no hearing for events surrounding physical contact with a student; union did not support him in his grievances and complaints; and the actions were taken in retaliation for his exercise of his free speech rights. The court held that the conduct, whether events were viewed singly or in combination, did not rise to level of outrageousness contemplated by § 46. Kessler v. Monsour, 865 F.Supp. 234, 241.

M.D.Pa.1991. Cit. in case quot. in disc., quot. in ftn. A female former college professor sued the college, the dean, and her immediate supervisor for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress alleging that she was sexually harassed and subjected to gender-based discrimination during her employment. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment on this count of the complaint, holding that the evidence was insufficient as a matter of law to show that the conduct of the defendants was so outrageous that it would support a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court reasoned that the plaintiff was not subjected to coercive demands, nor was she subjected to threats if she refused to accede to sexual demands. Garvey v. Dickinson College, 761 F.Supp. 1175, 1190.

M.D.Pa.1991. Cit. in cases cit. and quot. in sup., subsec. (1) quot. in sup. Neighboring property owners were involved in a dispute over what was considered "common areas." When the defendant neighbor caused the plaintiff neighbor's daughter-in-law to be issued a citation by the state police for criminal trespass for being in an area that the plaintiff considered a "common area," the neighbor sued to protect his right to use the common areas and sought damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted partial summary judgment for the defendants with respect to the intentional infliction of emotional distress claim, and stayed the action to allow the plaintiff to establish legal ownership of the property. The court found that the causing of the daughter-in-law to be issued a criminal trespass citation did not rise to the level of outrageousness required for an emotional distress claim. In addition, the plaintiff's claim lacked supporting medical evidence, because he had never seen a mental health provider as a result of the defendant's conduct and had no medical expert to testify that his cardiovascular surgery was connected to the defendant's conduct. McCormick v. Camp Pocono Ridge, Inc., 760 F.Supp. 1113, 1116, 1117.

M.D.Pa.1990. Cit. in cases quot. in sup. Three women arrested while attempting to stop allegedly illegal election procedures sued the arresting officers, a county, and an election judge for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, claiming that the arresting officers used unnecessary force in that the plaintiffs were kicked, dragged and thrown around, punched, and handcuffed, yet the criminal charges against them were later dismissed. This court assumed that Pennsylvania recognized a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress and held that it could not state as a matter of law that there existed no set of facts on which relief could be granted. Accordingly, the court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss and issued an order for further proceedings, noting that the plaintiffs would be required to prove outrageous conduct on the part of the defendants as well as competent medical evidence of harm. Shoop v. Dauphin County, 766 F.Supp. 1323, 1326.

M.D.Pa.1989. Quot. in case cit. in disc., com. (h) cit. in case cit. in disc., com. (k) quot. in disc. A recipient of a prosthetic heart valve sued the manufacturer of the valve in strict liability, inter alia, after watching a television program that discussed incidents of failure or malfunction in the valve. The plaintiff alleged that he suffered severe emotional injuries on learning that the valve had potential defects and sought recovery for mental suffering, inter alia. The court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment, stating that the plaintiff's heart valve had functioned properly for seven years and that the plaintiff's emotional distress was not the result of a physical injury or some medically identifiable effect linked to a failure of the valve but was related to the contents of the television program. Brinkman v. Shiley, Inc., 732 F.Supp. 33, 34, judgment affirmed 902 F.2d 1558 (3rd Cir.1989).

M.D.Pa.1989. Quot. in ftn. A discharged prison matron and her husband sued a county corrections board, a correctional facilities board, a prison board, and a county for employment discrimination and various pendent state law claims. This court granted in part and denied in part the defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that the plaintiff stated a cause of action against the prison warden for emotional distress, where the complaint alleged the warden had engaged in both sexual harassment and retaliatory behavior, but that this claim remained quite tenuous in light of the fact that the plaintiffs had provided no competent medical evidence of causation and severity required by Pennsylvania law. Handley v. Phillips, 715 F.Supp. 657, 675.

M.D.Pa.1988. Cit. in sup., cit. in ftn., subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in sup. A woman and her husband sued her former employer and supervisor for intentional infliction of emotional distress and loss of consortium, alleging that the supervisor's sexual harassment caused the woman to leave her job and become physically ill. Denying the defendants' motion to dismiss, this court held, inter alia, that the alleged conduct of the supervisor was sufficiently outrageous to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and that the husband could bring the loss of consortium claim without proving physical injury. Bowersox v. P.H. Glatfelter Co., 677 F.Supp. 307, 309-311.

M.D.Pa.1988. Cit. in disc., subsec. (1) quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. An employee sued his employer for inducing him to leave his union position to take a management job, falsely promising that he could return to his union position at any time. The court granted the defendant partial summary judgment, holding that the plaintiff's claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress could not be maintained because the defendant's conduct did not meet the requirements of being extreme and outrageous, even if, as alleged, it had purposefully removed the plaintiff from his position, with no intention of allowing him to return, and did this with an awareness that the plaintiff had some physical problems that would make it difficult for him to perform management duties. Malia v. RCA Corp., 690 F.Supp. 334, 337.

M.D.Pa.1986. Subsec. (1) cit. in disc. After an at-will employee was discharged from his position, he sued his former employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding that the plaintiff had not established that the defendant's conduct in discharging the employee met the test of extremeness required to establish a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Gaiardo v. Ethyl Corp., 697 F.Supp. 1377, 1384.

M.D.Pa.1985. Subsec. (1) quot. but dist., com. (h) cit. but dist. An employee sued his employer, alleging that he had been discharged because of his religious beliefs, which mandated that he miss work to observe the Sabbath. This court granted the employer's motion for summary judgment on the claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that no evidence had been presented to support a finding of extreme and outrageous conduct on the part of the employer. The court reasoned that, although Pennsylvania has recognized a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress and has adopted the definition set forth in the Restatement, in this case the employer's conduct—sending warning letters, suspending and discharging the employee because of his absences—was not so extreme as to permit recovery. Krushinski v. Roadway Exp., Inc., 627 F.Supp. 934, 938.

M.D.Pa.1985. Quot. but dist., com. (d) cit. in sup. The plaintiff brought suit for injunctive relief and damages for alleged violations of the First and Fourteenth Amendments and for a state claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The plaintiff alleged that the defendants had punished him for filing internal grievances and would continue to do so if not restrained. The defendants' motions for summary judgment were granted for all the issues except the plaintiff's invasion of privacy and emotional distress claims. The court reasoned that, although the plaintiff's charges of persistent harassment and attempted coercion for filing union grievances were generalized, they were the type of contentions that a trier of fact might find to constitute extreme and outrageous conduct, as required under Pennsylvania law. Lynn v. Smith, 628 F.Supp. 283, 291, 292.

M.D.Pa.1983. Cit. in disc. The plaintiff brought suit alleging that he was threatened and coerced into signing an agreement admitting liability and agreeing to pay a debt in full. The federal district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss in part and denied in part, holding, inter alia, that the plaintiff's assertion that the defendant constable held him in a closed room by threat of force until he settled his debt was sufficient to state a cause of action for false imprisonment under Pennsylvania law and that the plaintiff may have stated a claim against the defendant constable for intentional infliction of emotional distress, since Pennsylvania law was unclear as to whether bodily harm was an element of that tort. Horne v. Farrell, 560 F.Supp. 219, 226.

M.D.Pa.1982. Cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. The plaintiff brought an action in federal court alleging legal malpractice, breach of contract, and intentional infliction of emotional distress on the part of the defendants in connection with their representation of him in two prior federal court actions and one prior state court action. The court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss the legal malpractice claim. While accepting that intentional legal malpractice had been alleged by the plaintiff and that Pennsylvania law technical did not recognize such intentional conduct as a cause of action, the court stated that availability of a remedy for negligent conduct but not for intentional conduct would be illogical; it further held that since the plaintiff was proceeding pro se, his pleadings would be construed as to do justice. The court also noted that while the plaintiff had an extremely heavy burden of proof in establishing intentional infliction of emotional distress, it could not rule as a matter of law that there was insufficient evidence to support such a claim, and therefore denied a motion to dismiss this claim. Next, the court ruled that exemplary damages sought by the plaintiff on all his claims were not generally available for breach of contract, though they were awardable on the other two claims. Finally, the court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss the plaintiff's claims for treble damages, noting that specific statutory authorization was required for the awarding of such damages, and was lacking. Bangert v. Harris, 553 F.Supp. 235, 238.

M.D.Pa.1980. Quot. in part in disc. Prison inmates brought an action under the Federal Tort Claims Act for assaults, batteries, and emotional distress allegedly inflicted on them on their arrival at a federal prison. This court held that the alleged assaults and batteries were privileged, either as incidental and necessary touchings by correctional officers in the performance of their duties, or as reasonable uses of force necessary to maintain control. There was no evidence that the officers' conduct was extreme or outrageous, or that any plaintiff suffered severe emotional distress. However, the unreasonable confinement of one inmate in restraints in his cell for three days was a battery, and the United States, as principal, could not available itself of the good-faith immunity of its agents. The court found the United States liable to this plaintiff in the amount of $200, but granted judgment to the United States on all other claims. Picariello v. Fenton, 491 F.Supp. 1026, 1042.

M.D.Pa.1978. Cit. in sup. Plaintiff, who was on tour in Ireland, fell as she was stepping from a hotel bathroom and was injured. Plaintiff brought this diversity action and alleged that defendant, the tour operator, with its principal place of business in New York, was negligent in failing to inspect the hotel facilities, and that such negligence was the proximate cause of her injuries. She further alleged that a purported agent or employee of defendant, a tour guide who was a resident of Ireland, intentionally inflicted emotional distress upon her. The court entered judgment for defendant, holding on the issue of negligence that neither the tour guide nor the hotel was a direct employee or under the exclusive control of defendant. The court stated that even if they were agents of defendant, liability could not be premised on any act or omission on the party of the guide or the hotel that may have amounted to negligence. Furthermore, the instances of the tour guide's conduct proven by plaintiff at trial did not meet the strict standard required for a finding that the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress had been committed. McDermott v. Travellers Air Services, Inc., 462 F.Supp. 1335, 1342.

M.D.Pa.Bkrtcy.Ct.

M.D.Pa.Bkrtcy.Ct.2013. Cit. in sup. Judgment creditors brought an adversary proceeding against Chapter 7 debtor, seeking a determination that their claim based on their prior state-court judgment against debtor was nondischargeable on grounds of willful and malicious injury. This court denied in part creditors' motion for summary judgment, holding that it could not conclude at this stage that the state court's decision met the standard for determining the dischargeability of the portion of the judgment that was awarded for debtor's intentional infliction of emotional distress upon creditors. While the state court found that debtor committed the intentional tort of infliction of emotional distress by making phone calls complaining about creditors to police and township officials, it made no finding that debtor took the acts with the purpose of producing injury, and it could not be said that the acts in and of themselves had a substantial certainty of producing injury. In re Mauz, 496 B.R. 777, 783.

W.D.Pa.

W.D.Pa.2019. Com. (h) cit. in case quot. in sup. Minor elementary-school student who had been diagnosed with attention-deficit-hyperactivity disorder and oppositional-defiance disorder filed a putative class action against, among others, school principal and school police officer in connection with allegations that defendants unlawfully handcuffed or restrained students with disabilities. This court granted principal and officer's motion to dismiss, holding, among other things, that student's allegations—that principal confined student to a small room for the purpose of keeping him and other kids safe and that officer restrained student from further harming himself or others by handcuffing him—were insufficient to state a claim against them for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court noted that, under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, the court was to decide as an initial matter whether the conduct at issue could reasonably be regarded as sufficiently extreme to constitute outrageousness as a matter of law. D.C. v. Pittsburgh Public Schools, 415 F.Supp.3d 636, 665.

W.D.Pa.2019. Cit. in case cit. in sup.; com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Former employee brought a lawsuit against former employer, claiming, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) based on allegations that her supervisors allowed her to leave defendant's premises after her employment was terminated, even though she was clearly distraught and referenced committing suicide, and that she attempted to commit suicide after leaving defendant's premises. This court granted in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding that termination from employment did not rise to the level of outrageousness necessary to sustain an IIED claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, and that plaintiff could not base her IIED claim on the supervisors' failure to act, because such a claim had to be based on affirmative actions. Sabo v. UPMC Altoona, 386 F.Supp.3d 530, 557.

W.D.Pa.2013. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in sup. Former police chief for borough brought various claims against borough, borough manager, and others, alleging, among other things, that he suffered severe emotional and physical distress as a result of manager's repeated instances of harassment and discrimination. Granting defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held that, although manager's alleged conduct could be construed as unprofessional and even purposeful, the discrimination and harassment alleged in the complaint was not so outrageous as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency tolerable in a civilized society and therefore did not rise to the level of outrageous conduct required to state such a claim. The court pointed out that the standard was not satisfied by allegations of insults, indignities, threats, or other similar conduct, and that it was extremely rare to find conduct in the employment context that would rise to the level of outrageousness necessary to provide a basis for recovery for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Ross v. Borough of Dormont, 937 F.Supp.2d 638, 655.

W.D.Pa.2012. Cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. Parents, on behalf of their minor son, sued county office of children and youth (OCY), among others, for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, alleging that son suffered extreme emotional distress as a result of OCY's decision to place in plaintiffs' home a minor foster child who sexually abused son. Granting summary judgment to defendant on this claim, this court held that the alleged conduct fell short of the very high bar required for the successful prosecution of an IIED claim under Pennsylvania law. The court explained that, while defendant's acts could reasonably be viewed as deliberately indifferent, the record could not support a finding that defendant placed foster child in plaintiffs' home with the intent that he assault son and the expectation that son would suffer severe emotional distress as a result. Bryan v. Erie County Office of Children & Youth, 861 F.Supp.2d 553, 585, 586.

W.D.Pa.2011. Cit. and quot. in sup., subsec. (1) cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup., illus. (7) and (8) cit. and quot. in sup. Business owner sued mortgage lender for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that lender intentionally misstated business owner's indebtedness by proceeding with collection activities based upon false delinquencies. Granting in part defendant's motion for judgment on the pleadings, this court held that defendant's alleged harassment of plaintiff by barraging her with annoying phone calls, sending a male agent to her home to place a calling card in her mailbox, sending two inaccurate letters concerning her account, and sending her an apparent notice of foreclosure, although offensive, did not rise to the level of being shocking and so outrageous that it exceeded the levels of decency tolerated by a civilized society. Wilson v. American General Finance Inc., 807 F.Supp.2d 291, 301, 302, 304.

W.D.Pa.2006. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former deputy sheriff, who was employed at a courthouse where she was required to search individuals and their personal effects, brought various claims against sheriff's office and others for suspending her without pay, terminating her, and filing criminal charges against her that were later withdrawn, in connection with an incident in which an individual alleged that plaintiff tried to steal money from her purse. This court, inter alia, granted defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that defendants' alleged failure to reemploy plaintiff after the criminal charges against her were withdrawn was not conduct that was so outrageous in character, or so extreme in degree, as to support this claim. Benard v. Washington County, 465 F.Supp.2d 461, 467.

W.D.Pa.2005. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Former student and her mother sued school district and its administrators, alleging that they knew about but did not prevent student from being stalked and otherwise harassed for several years by a male special-education student. Granting in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that school administrators' failure to adequately address such ongoing harassment did not rise to the level of outrageousness necessary to support plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Additionally, the allegation that defendants subjected student's mother, who worked for an agency employed by school district, to intentional infliction of emotional distress by requesting that she be transferred to another position in retaliation for her complaints about defendants' handling of her daughter's harassment was also not sufficiently severe to support this claim. Jones v. Indiana Area School Dist., 397 F.Supp.2d 628, 657.

W.D.Pa.1998. Cit. in sup., cit. in case quot. in ftn., subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in sup. Former employee sued employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that her coemployees committed sexually offensive conduct towards her and forced her to participate in fraudulent and unlawful mortgage-lending practices. This court granted in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that, although plaintiff's claims established a deeply unpleasant workplace, defendant's conduct was not extreme and outrageous. Kotlinski v. Mortgage America, Inc., 40 F.Supp.2d 298, 304, 305.

W.D.Pa.1993. Cit. in disc., subsec. (1) cit. in disc. Laid-off mine worker brought an emotional distress claim, inter alia, against former employer. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held that plaintiff's allegations that defendant laid off plaintiff in a reduction in force and failed to recall him to service when there was rehiring for a different position did not state the kind of outrageous behavior required for an emotional distress claim under Pennsylvania law. Bernard v. Bethenergy Mines, Inc., 837 F.Supp. 714, 715.

W.D.Pa.1992. Cit. in sup., cit. in ftn., com. (j) cit. in sup. Employee sued employer alleging that she was fired due to age discrimination and seeking damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court granted partial summary judgment to employer, holding that the state workers' compensation act provided the exclusive remedy for plaintiff employees seeking to recover from defendant employers for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Rejecting plaintiff's argument that emotional distress was not a compensable injury under workers' compensation because it did not rise to the level of a mental illness, the court said that any emotional distress not severe enough to be an injury under workers' compensation also would not be severe enough under the Restatement (Second) of Torts § 46. Gilmore v. Manpower, Inc., 789 F.Supp. 197, 199.

W.D.Pa.1992. Cit. in disc. A reporter fraudulently promised a mother that no names or personal facts would be used in the publication of a silhouette picture of her and her daughter, which was used in connection with a story about their sexual abuse case against the girl's father, a former police chief. The mother and her children sued the newspaper, its employees, and its parent corporation for invasion of privacy, fraudulent misrepresentation, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Entering judgment for the defendants, this court held, inter alia, that the plaintiffs had failed to prove the elements of the tort of invasion of privacy under state law. The court also held that the publication of the article was not outrageous in character, or so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency in a civilized community, as required to prove intentional infliction of emotional distress. Morgan By and Through Chambon v. Celender, 780 F.Supp. 307, 310.

W.D.Pa.1990. Cit. in disc. An employee sued her employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that her supervisor made her work environment hostile, abusive, and intimidating. The court granted the defendant's motion to dismiss, holding that the plaintiff did not allege facts that were sufficient to show the egregious behavior that would support her intentional infliction of emotional distress claim. McWilliams v. AT & T Information Systems, Inc., 728 F.Supp. 1186, 1194.

W.D.Pa.1990. Cit. and quot. in disc., cit. in cases cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc., coms. (f) and (h) cit. in disc. An emotionally unstable woman committed suicide after her sister, on whom she relied for support and advice, withdrew all her support and guidance. The administrator of the decedent's estate sued the sister on behalf of the decedent's retarded daughter alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress and wrongful death. This court granted the sister's motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim upon which relief could be granted, holding, inter alia, that the sister's conduct was not legally outrageous. The court found that the sister's bad counsel and advice, even if malicious, was simply not the kind of conduct she would have known exposed her to liability for the intentional infliction of emotional distress. It also noted its belief that Pennsylvania would allow some recovery for suicide caused by intentional acts, even absent a special duty to prevent suicide, where the plaintiff could prove that the underlying intentional tort was a substantial factor in causing the suicide. Rowe v. Marder, 750 F.Supp. 718, 720, 724-726, affirmed 935 F.2d 1282 (3d Cir.1991).

W.D.Pa.1988. Subsec. (1) and coms. (d) and (h) cit. in disc. An employee sued his former employer for discharging him in violation of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act and for emotional distress resulting from the discharge. The defendant moved for summary judgment on several grounds, including a claim that the plaintiff failed to state a cause of action for negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment on this claim, but denied the motion regarding the others, holding that the mere loss of employment failed to satisfy the threshold evidentiary requirement of outrageousness necessary for the "extreme and outrageous conduct" element of the tort, and that the plaintiff failed to allege that the defendant's conduct caused him severe emotional distress, also an element of the tort. Miller v. State Chemical Mfg. Co., 706 F.Supp. 1166, 1171.

W.D.Pa.1988. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. A unit supervisor who was demoted to product technician and then terminated because of her poor performance sued her former employer, alleging, inter alia, that her employer engaged in favoritism, unjustified criticism, and adverse employment actions and that the employer's conduct amounted to intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting the defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held that the defendant's conduct was not extreme and outrageous enough to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Miller v. Aluminum Co. of America, 679 F.Supp. 495, 507, judgment affirmed 856 F.2d 184 (3d Cir.1988).

W.D.Pa.1986. Quot. in disc. The plaintiff employee filed a complaint with OSHA alleging that he had been placed on layoff by the defendant in retaliation for complaining to OSHA about welding fumes at his workplace. He later filed this action alleging wrongful discharge and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding that neither case law nor the OSHA statute created a private right of action for wrongful discharge, and that the plaintiff had an administrative remedy in its place. The court dismissed the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, noting that firing under the guise of a layoff was insufficient to state a cause of action, and that no evidence was found from which it could be reasonably inferred that the defendant deliberately established and concealed hazardous working conditions. Holmes v. Schneider Power Corp., 628 F.Supp. 937, 942, judgment affirmed 806 F.2d 252 (3d Cir.1986).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

W.D.Pa.1985. Subsec. (1) cit. in sup. A former employee sued his former employer alleging age discrimination, breach of contract, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and negligent infliction of emotional distress after he and five other workers were laid off as a result of poor sales. This court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment on all counts, holding, inter alia, that the defendant's conduct was not sufficiently outrageous to constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress. Brieck v. Harbison-Walker Refractories, 624 F.Supp. 363, 367, judgment affirmed in part, reversed in part 822 F.2d 52 (3d Cir.1987).

W.D.Pa.1985. Com. (d) cit. in sup. Plaintiffs initiated an antitrust action against defendants. In response, defendants filed a counterclaim on behalf of a plaintiff's former employee, alleging that he was wrongfully discharged from his position. The federal district court granted plaintiffs' motion to dismiss the counterclaim, holding that the employee could not state a claim for tortious interference with an employment contract or for wrongful discharge. Additionally, defendants' allegations that plaintiffs forced the employee into quitting his job and taking early retirement were not sufficiently outrageous in character and extreme in degree to support a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Sharon Steel Corp. v. VJR Co., 604 F.Supp. 420, 422.

W.D.Pa.1984. Subsec. (1) quot. in part in sup. The plaintiffs were a mother and daughter who were joint tenants of an options account held with a brokerage firm. The mother relied heavily on the advice of the broker-dealer employed by the firm. When the plaintiffs' account balance of $125,000 was wiped out, they alleged misrepresentation by the broker about the risks involved and churning to generate commissions. They sought damages under federal securities acts and RICO and for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Ruling on various motions by the plaintiffs and the defendants, this court held on the latter claim that the conduct alleged by the plaintiffs in their complaint, even if fully proven, was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to permit recovery. Pennsylvania courts and federal courts applying Pennsylvania law, said the court, have consistently refused to extend this tort to anything other than the most extreme and outrageous conduct. Jacabson v. Merrill Lynch Pierce Fenner & Smith, 605 F.Supp. 510, 512-513.

W.D.Pa.1983. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup., coms. (d) and (h) quot. in part in sup. Plaintiff brought this action for breach of contract and intentional infliction of emotional distress against a financial institution which failed to fulfill an agreement to underwrite a bond issue for the plaintiff's project. The defendant's motion to dismiss the emotional distress claim was granted. The court held that, as a matter of law, the defendant's failure to underwrite a bond issue could not be considered conduct beyond all reasonable bounds tolerated by society, the alleged contract breach did not cause bodily harm, and the breach was not one from which serious emotional distress was likely to result. Price v. Blyth Eastman Paine Webber, Inc., 576 F.Supp. 431, 433, 434.

W.D.Pa.1979. Cit. and quot. in disc. The plaintiff, a motion picture writer, sued the host, his guest and the radio station, among others, after a guest on a radio show made allegedly defamatory remarks concerning the plaintiff's involvement with the Communist party. The plaintiff alleged that the defendants had violated a legal duty to take reasonable care to avoid invading the protected interests of others. The plaintiff argued that the talk show host was negligent and his conduct, by permitting a guest whose credibility was allegedly questionable, was so outrageous that he should be able to recover for emotional distress. The plaintiff moved for summary judgment on all counts. The court stated that summary judgment could be granted only where the defendant's conduct was so outrageous that it went beyond all bounds of decency and that no other determination concerning such conduct could be made. The court did not find that to be the situation herein and held that the determination of outrageous conduct was a question of fact for the jury. The court held that the plaintiff's motion for summary judgment could not be granted with regard to the plaintiff's claim for invasion of privacy because there was a question of fact as to whether the publication was made with knowledge of or in reckless disregard of its falsity. Lorentz v. Westinghouse Elec. Corp., 472 F.Supp. 946, 948, 950.

D.P.R.

D.P.R.1998. Cit. in headnote, cit. in case cit. in disc. Corporation that was certified to provide mail-processing services to bulk-rate customers of United States Postal Service (USPS) sued government for violations of the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) after USPS official made public remarks suggesting that plaintiff lacked certification to do business with USPS. Defendant moved to dismiss. Granting the motion in part and denying it in part, the court held that to the extent plaintiff alleged tortious interference with its existing and prospective contractual relationships, the claim was barred by the FTCA's "interference with contract rights" exception to liability; that plaintiff could not recover based on inaccurate statements official made about plaintiff's certification, since defendant did not waive sovereign immunity for the tort of misrepresentation; that plaintiff, a corporation, could not maintain an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress; and that the claim that USPS negligently supervised its employees survived the motion to dismiss. Dynamic Image Technologies, Inc. v. U.S., 18 F.Supp.2d 146, 147, 151.

D.R.I.

D.R.I.2016. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Former student brought an action alleging various contract and tort claims against private university and its employees who punished plaintiff for violating the university's academic code after she was caught and admitted to cheating. Granting summary judgment for defendants, this court held that plaintiff's tort claims were unsupported by law, and that there were no material facts suggesting defendants breached the academic code, given that defendants adhered to the code in pursuing their investigation, holding the academic-dishonesty hearing, imposing sanctions, and handling plaintiff's appeal of the decision. The court noted that plaintiff failed to plead facts that could rise to the high standard of extreme and outrageous conduct articulated in Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, that was necessary for succeeding on a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Doe v. Brown University, 209 F.Supp.3d 460, 478.

D.R.I.2013. Cit. in sup. Former patient sued physician, alleging that, while he was still treating her and without her knowledge or permission, physician wrote and published a book about her battle with her addiction to prescription drugs, using numerous confidential disclosures that she had made to him during treatment sessions. Granting in part defendant's motion to dismiss, this court held that, even if every fact asserted in the complaint was taken as true, plaintiff failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, given the complete absence of any assertions that defendant's conduct resulted in physical symptomatology. While plaintiff repeatedly emphasized that the facts published about her were offensive or objectionable and that the publication of the book had caused her to suffer severe emotional distress, she did not refer to any physical manifestations of her alleged distress, a required element of such a claim. Lisnoff v. Stein, 925 F.Supp.2d 233, 241.

D.R.I.2006. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Landowners sued gas company, alleging that, approximately 50 years earlier, hazardous substances that were the by-product of a coal-gasification process utilized by gas company's predecessor, were deposited as fill on their land. This court, inter alia, granted in part gas company's motion to dismiss a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress brought by one set of landowner plaintiffs. The court held that these plaintiffs could not prevail on their intentional-infliction claim because their complaint indicated that the coal-gasification waste was deposited before they acquired their property, and thus defendants' actions could not have been intended to cause emotional distress to them in particular. Gail v. New England Gas Co., Inc., 460 F.Supp.2d 314, 326.

D.R.I.2003. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Probationary police officer sued town, alleging, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, in connection with town's refusal to provide health insurance for officer's child and common-law wife pursuant to "full family coverage" provision of labor contract. Granting town summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that defendant's decision did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct required to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Adams v. Town of Burrillville ex rel. Mainville, 249 F.Supp.2d 151, 155.

D.R.I.2003. Adopted in case cit. in disc., com. (d) cit. in sup. After sexual-assault charges against high-school teacher were dismissed, teacher sued city, police department, police chief, and police officers for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to show requisite intentional, extreme, and outrageous conduct causing him to suffer severe emotional distress. Defendants' arrest of plaintiff did not support his claim, because the arrest was made pursuant to a warrant based on probable cause. Forest v. Pawtucket Police Dept., 290 F.Supp.2d 215, 232, affirmed 377 F.3d 52 (1st Cir.2004).

D.R.I.2003. Adopted in case quot. in sup., cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in sup. and quot. in case cit. in disc., coms. (e) and (f) quot. in sup., com. (g) quot. in case quot. in sup. Woman whose adulterous 23-year relationship broke up sued former lover for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress failed because defendant's conduct in engaging in an adulterous affair, ending the affair, and refusing to divorce his wife was neither extreme nor outrageous, the parties' relationship was founded in significant part on deceit, and there was no evidence that defendant was aware that plaintiff was particularly susceptible to emotional injury. Norton v. Hoyt, 278 F.Supp.2d 214, 220-223.

D.R.I.1996. Com. (d) quot. but dist., cit. in disc. Terminated corrections officer who believed his race was the reason his union grievance official failed to appeal his discharge sued union and official for, inter alia, breach of the duty of fair representation and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Defendants moved for summary judgment. Granting in part and denying in part the motion, the court held that material factual issues existed as to whether official received notice of the impending appeal and, thus, whether his failure to appear was motivated by racial discrimination; official was immune from liability for breach of the duty of fair representation, but, under basic agency principles, union would be liable, even if the failure to appear was the result of official's purposeful discrimination, as long as official was acting within the scope of his employment; and official's failure to provide adequate representation, even if racially motivated, did not rise to the level of outrageousness required to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Forbes v. R.I. Broth. of Correctional Officers, 923 F.Supp. 315, 329, 330.

D.R.I.1986. Cit. and quot. in disc., cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in sup. A student sued a college for discrimination, intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress, and invasion of privacy when she was expelled because of her obesity. Partially denying the college's motion for summary judgment, this court held that, although Rhode Island law had expressly rejected the viability of any cause of action for negligent infliction of emotional distress, a trier of fact could reasonably find the college's actions to be so atrocious as to state an actionable claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Russell v. Salve Regina College, 649 F.Supp. 391, 400-404.

D.R.I.Bkrtcy.Ct.

D.R.I.Bkrtcy.Ct.1981. Quot. in sup. This suit was brought by the plaintiff, a tenant of the defendant, to have her claims for damages against the defendant declared non dischargeable. These claims were for damages for conversion, assault, and the intentional infliction of emotional harm allegedly incurred during the defendant's attempted self-help eviction of the plaintiff. The court held that plaintiff was entitled to damages for the intentional infliction of emotional harm and that this claim was nondischargeable. The defendant was found to have acted with full knowledge of the emotional upset which would be experienced by the plaintiff, and to have forcibly broken open the plaintiff's door without regard for the emotional well-being or physical safety of the plaintiff in an attempt to harass and intimidate. In re Berberian, 12 B.R. 465, 469.

D.S.C.

D.S.C.2015. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. African American customer who suffered from Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder and related agoraphobia brought an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against, among others, manager of a convenience-store chain, alleging that, after plaintiff requested permission to shop at the store after hours as part of his course of treatment, defendant laughed while denying his request, became irritated, started talking to him in a loud and aggressive tone, insulted him with a racial slur, and threatened to call the police. This court granted in part defendant's motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiff failed to state an IIED claim. While plaintiff's allegations suggested crudeness on the part of defendant, defendant's conduct did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to state a claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Callum v. CVS Health Corporation, 137 F.Supp.3d 817, 857.

D.S.C.2013. Adopted in case cit. in sup. Female university soccer player brought various claims against, among others, female head coach and male assistant coach in connection with allegations that defendants treated her improperly, by, among other things, sexually harassing her. Granting summary judgment for defendants, this court held that plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress failed as a matter of law, because plaintiff's allegations that female head coach asked her how she could live with herself knowing that she would not be played, and that male assistant coach touched her leg during a private conference and later threatened that "bad things would happen" if she appealed from her scholarship reduction for the coming year were not enough to establish the extreme and outrageous conduct required to support such a claim. DeCecco v. University of South Carolina, 918 F.Supp.2d 471, 519.

D.S.C.2007. Coms. (d), (i), and (j) quot. in case quot. in ftn. Insured driver who was injured in an automobile accident sued his underinsured-motorist (UIM) carrier after defendant refused to pay plaintiff the benefits he sought, asserting tort claims for bad faith and outrage, inter alia. This court dismissed plaintiff's tort causes of action as premature, concluding that, since, at the time plaintiff filed his complaint, he had not yet brought suit against the at-fault driver and served defendant with process, defendant's duty of good faith to plaintiff regarding the payment of UIM benefits had not arisen and thus could not have been violated. In addition, noting that the merits of plaintiff's outrage claim were inherently dependent on the merits of his bad-faith claim, the court concluded that, since it had ruled that defendant was acting within its rights, plaintiff failed to show that defendant's conduct was extreme and outrageous for purposes of proving his outrage claim. Halmon v. American Intern. Group, Inc. Ins. Co., 586 F.Supp.2d 401, 408.

D.S.C.1991. Coms. (d), (j), and (l) cit. in disc. A black employee who claimed that he was demoted because of his race and as a result suffered severe emotional distress brought an employment discrimination suit against his employer, alleging civil rights violations and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court accepted the report of a magistrate judge, who recommended, inter alia, that the emotional distress claim be dismissed because the plaintiff failed to present any evidence that the defendant intended to inflict severe emotional distress or that the defendant's conduct was extreme and outrageous. Glover v. Lockheed Corp., 772 F.Supp. 898, 906.

D.S.C.1987. Quot. in disc., coms. (d), (i), (j), and (k) cit. in case quot. in disc. A police officer assisted a motorist who had driven off the road by contacting a wrecker to return the vehicle to the road. Neither the officer nor the wrecker driver observed any evidence that the motorist was intoxicated. Approximately 45 minutes after the motorist left the area, he was involved in a fatal collision with another vehicle while driving on the wrong side of a divided interstate highway. Post-accident tests of the motorist revealed a high blood alcohol level. Surviving occupants of the other vehicle sued the police officer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress and negligence. This court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that the defendant's conduct was not so outrageous as to exceed all possible bounds of decency. Patel by Patel v. McIntyre, 667 F.Supp. 1131, 1144, 1145, judgment affirmed 848 F.2d 185 (4th Cir.1988).

D.S.C.1985. Cit. in sup., quot. in sup. An occupational health nurse sued her employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that she had been wrongfully terminated. The court granted judgment n.o.v. in favor of the employer, holding that, although the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress was applicable in an employer-employee relationship, the elements had not been met in this case. There was no evidence, said the court, that anyone knew that the nurse was susceptible to emotional distress. Moreover, the employer's act of terminating the nurse did not constitute "outrageous conduct" sufficient to impose liability on the employer in tort; this was an ordinary, industrial firing. Meierer v. E.I. du Pont de Nemours and Co., 607 F.Supp. 1170, 1175, 1176.

D.S.C.1985. Coms. (d), (e), (f), (i) and (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. An electronics missile technician was terminated from his employment when his urine drug screening test indicated a positive result. The technician sued his employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that the plaintiff failed to demonstrate that the defendant's conduct was extreme and outrageous. The court noted that the Restatement's insistence that the conduct be outrageous was no mere happenstance because there was a perceived need to limit the boundaries of liability for the tort of intentional infliction of distress. Satterfield v. Lockheed Missiles & Space Co., Inc., 617 F.Supp. 1359, 1365.

D.S.C.1983. Com. (k) cit. in disc. Plaintiff parents successfully brought an action in wrongful birth against the defendant hospital for failing to advise the plaintiffs of the risk that their child might be afflicted with Downs Syndrome and for failure to diagnose a cardiac disorder. The only issue was the proper amount of damages. The court awarded the parents economic damages equaling their expenses for the duration of the child's life. The court also awarded damages for the parents' emotional suffering, following the trend to abandon the presence of physical manifestation of the emotional harm as an absolute prerequisite to recovery. In addition, the court applied the "benefits rule," holding that the benefits flowing from the child's birth amounted to 50 percent of the damages for mental anguish, and entered the award accordingly. Phillips v. United States, 575 F.Supp. 1309, 1318.

D.S.C.1977. Cit. in disc. and quot. in part in ftn. and com. (d) quot. in sup. The plaintiff sustained a back injury which was compensable under the South Carolina Workmen's Compensation Act. The defendant, the plaintiff's compensation carrier, had failed to make the weekly compensation payments and the plaintiff filed this suit to recover for the alleged emotional distress he suffered as a result. The plaintiff argued that he became nervous and upset and subject to mental and emotional distress which was caused by the defendant's malicious and wilful refusal to make the weekly payments. The defendant filed a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim upon which relief could be granted. The court found that the plaintiff's allegations did not establish a claim because the complaint failed to allege that the defendant's conduct was outrageous as required in order to recover for the infliction of emotional distress. The plaintiff had alleged that the defendant's failure to make payments was malicious but the court found that this was not sufficient to satisfy the element of outrageous conduct which was required. The court stated that the conduct would have to be of such nature as to be atrocious and beyond human decency in order to be the basis for recovery. The court added that the plaintiff failed to allege bodily injury or other physical manifestations of illness and although some authorities did not require manifestations of bodily illness, South Carolina case law did and in their absence, recovery was precluded. The complaint was therefore dismissed. Whitten v. American Mut. Liability Ins. Co., 468 F.Supp. 470, 479, affirmed 594 F.2d 860 (4th Cir.1979).

D.S.C.1973. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup. This action for, inter alia, the alleged tort of intentional interference with the right to attend the funeral of a member of one's immediate family was brought by the father and sisters of deceased children against the sister of the father's estranged wife. When the sister-in-law moved for summary judgment, this court denied the motion holding that Georgia had recognized the principles of recovery for torts not involving bodily injury and specifically as they pertain to intentional interference with proper burial, proper funeral, etc., and that although there was no offer of proof of outward manifestation of the plaintiffs' alleged severe emotional distress, there was still a genuine issue of fact as to whether there was, sufficient distress to warrant an award of damages both actual and punitive. Tully v. Pate, 372 F.Supp. 1064, 1075.

D.S.D.

D.S.D.2014. Com. (d) quot. in sup. and quot. in case quot. in sup. After criminal charges for inhumane treatment of animals against dog breeder were dismissed, breeder sued executive director of nonprofit corporation that provided animal-control services to county and state's attorney for county, who were responsible for initiating the charges against him, alleging, among other things, that defendants conspired to commit the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) by illegally searching and seizing his property. This court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment on plaintiff's IIED claim, holding that, while defendants' actions were questionable and possibly tortious, they did not go beyond all possible bounds of decency, as required to state such a claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Christensen v. Quinn, 45 F.Supp.3d 1043, 1091.

D.S.D.2014. Com. (h) quot. in case quot. in sup. Sixty-two-year-old guidance counselor brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against employer, alleging that employer engaged in extreme and outrageous behavior by, among other things, asking plaintiff about his retirement plans, failing to renew his employment contract, and hiring a younger employee in his place. Granting in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, this court held that, even if the nonrenewal of the contract was done on an illegitimate basis, defendant's alleged conduct did not give rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary for a viable IIED claim. Quoting Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment h, the court pointed out that whether defendant's conduct was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to result in liability was a question for the jury only in circumstances where reasonable men could differ. Dunn v. Lyman School Dist. 42-1, 35 F.Supp.3d 1068, 1092.

D.S.D.2014. Com. (h) cit. in case quot. in sup. Patient and her husband filed, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against physician's medical-practice insurer, alleging that defendant's prevention of patient's treating doctor, who was also insured by defendant, from acting as an expert witness in patient's malpractice action against physician was extreme and outrageous. This court denied in part defendant's motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiffs sufficiently pleaded a claim for IIED. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment h, the court acknowledged that plaintiffs would be required to show that defendant's conduct was extreme and outrageous, but, at this stage, plaintiffs' allegations were taken as true and were sufficient to state an IIED claim. Nichols v. MMIC Ins. Inc., 68 F.Supp.3d 1067, 1084.

D.S.D.2009. Com. (h) cit. in case quot. in sup. Employee sued employer for age discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). This court granted in part employer's motion for a protective order prohibiting employee from deposing its corporate designee as to certain subjects of examination, holding, inter alia, that discovery of punitive damages information was premature. The court, in discussing whether an evidentiary hearing prior to any discovery related to punitive damages would be required, noted that the state supreme court had cited the Restatement for the proposition that it was for the court to determine in the first instance whether a defendant's conduct could reasonably regarded as so extreme and outrageous as to permit recovery on an IIED claim. Murphy v. Kmart Corp., 255 F.R.D. 497, 517.

D.S.D.2002. Com. (h) quot. in sup. Tribal police dispatcher who alleged that tribal police officer twice placed an air pistol to the back of her head and pulled the trigger sued the United States under the Federal Tort Claims Act, asserting a claim for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting defendant's motion to dismiss, the court held, inter alia, that officer's workplace horseplay was silly and childish, and did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Locke v. U.S., 215 F.Supp.2d 1033, 1043, 1044, judgment affirmed 63 Fed.Appx. 971 (8th Cir.2003).

E.D.Tenn.

E.D.Tenn.2020. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. (general cite). Arrestee brought, among other things, claims of intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against city, police chief, and arresting officers, alleging that after she was arrested for driving under the influence, withdrew her consent to a blood-alcohol test, and began suffering from a panic attack, which caused officers to believe she was acting in a hostile manner, officers used excessive force to place her in a police car. This court granted in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding that officers' use of force, such as striking plaintiff in the knee, applying a clavicle pressure-point tactic, and using a jugular-notch pressure technique, did not constitute outrageous conduct under the standard set forth in Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, as required to support an IIED claim. The court reasoned that, while excessive use of force could constitute outrageous behavior under § 46, officers' use of force in this instant case was not outrageous, because the court had already determined that their conduct was reasonable under the circumstances for the purposes of her Fourth Amendment claim. Colson v. City of Alcoa, 458 F.Supp.3d 887, 935.

E.D.Tenn.2011. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Victims of a motor-vehicle accident brought, inter alia, a state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against county sheriff in his individual capacity, alleging that they had been beaten and tasered by deputy sheriffs while being interrogated about the accident at the accident scene. Dismissing the IIED claim with prejudice, this court held that the claim failed because plaintiffs admittedly never had contact with defendant; thus, defendant clearly was not responsible for any outrageous conduct, let alone any conduct, for purposes of the IIED claim. Dillingham v. Millsaps, 809 F.Supp.2d 820, 855, 856.

E.D.Tenn.2011. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. African-American retail-store customer brought a claim for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against store, arising from an incident during which plaintiff shoved and knocked down a white 71-year-old door greeter employed by defendant after plaintiff set off the door alarm while leaving the store and greeter touched his shoulder, asking to check his receipt; while plaintiff did not sustain any physical injury as a result of greeter's contact with his shoulder, he allegedly experienced substantial embarrassment and humiliation after a video of the incident was picked up by local and national media, and he was suspended for 28 days by city police department that employed him as a police officer. Granting summary judgment for defendant, this court held that defendant's failure to issue a public statement apologizing to plaintiff for the incident, and its decision to remain silent in the face of a media fracas not of its own making did not constitute intentional outrageous conduct that could give rise to IIED liability to plaintiff. Freeman v. Wal-Mart Stores East, LP, 781 F.Supp.2d 661, 670.

E.D.Tenn.2010. Com. (d) quot. in sup. City employee who was allegedly sexually harassed by a co-worker sued city, employee's direct and indirect supervisors, co-workers, and others. Granting summary judgment for defendants on plaintiff's claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held that no reasonable jury could find that any of the individual defendants' conduct rose to the level of "outrageousness" required to state such a claim under Tennessee law. While supervisor's conduct in allegedly encouraging plaintiff to falsify an accident and injury report may have impeded the investigation into his allegations, it did not rise to the level of being "outrageous." Reagan v. City of Knoxville, 692 F.Supp.2d 891, 905, 906.

E.D.Tenn.2002. Quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Employee who was terminated following medical leave sued employer and supervisor, alleging, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that defendants' alleged violation of federal law was not sufficiently outrageous, nor did employee present evidence of severe emotional distress so as to support claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Richardson v. CVS Corp., 207 F.Supp.2d 733, 746.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

E.D.Tenn.1978. Subsec. (2)(a) quot. in sup. Husband and wife brought an action against a corporation for malicious prosecution and outrageous conduct causing severe emotional distress. Defendant moved to dismiss the claim of the wife on the ground that she could recover only under the tort of outrageous conduct, and that the complaint failed to state a cause of action under that tort. The court denied the motion, stating that while it was not entirely clear which, if any, actions had allegedly taken place in the presence of the wife, the allegation that the arrest of the husband on a charge of having passed a bad check took place at plaintiffs' home, along with the continuing nature of the alleged conduct, was sufficient for purposes of the motion. Foster v. Trentham's Inc., 458 F.Supp. 1382, 1384.

E.D.Tenn.1974. Quot. in part, and coms. quot. in part, and fol. The plaintiff sought to recover for mental anguish ensuing from his being arrested after having cashed, in a bank, a check he had won from the defendant in a contest, said check containing a legend providing that it could only be used for the purchase of a sewing machine. The court dismissed the complaint for failing to state a claim upon which relief could have been granted, finding that the plaintiff failed to allege any extreme and outrageous conduct on the part of the defendant. Hutson v. Shackelford, 390 F.Supp. 997, 999.

E.D.Tenn.Bkrtcy.Ct.

E.D.Tenn.Bkrtcy.Ct.2013. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Chapter 13 debtors brought an adversary proceeding against mortgage lenders, alleging, among other things, that lenders' failure to modify their mortgage forced them to enter into bankruptcy in order to save their home and caused them to suffer loss of credit, foreclosure notices, emotional harm, and embarrassment. This court granted in part lenders' motion for summary judgment, holding that debtors failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Tennessee law. The court reasoned that, while debtors alleged conduct by lenders that could be perceived as reckless, the running of foreclosure notices that might have caused embarrassment to debtors was not sufficiently outrageous to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and a breach of contract, even if clear, was not by itself actionable under the tort of outrageous conduct, nor would a negligent or inadvertent act give rise to such a claim. In re Jenkins, 488 B.R. 601, 617.

E.D.Tenn.Bkrtcy.Ct.2009. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Chapter 13 debtor brought adversary proceeding against creditor, alleging that creditor, by filing its proof of claim without redacting her personal information, intentionally made such information public to any and all parties with Internet access, opening the door for identity theft. Granting in part creditor's motion to dismiss, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Tennessee law, because she failed to allege facts sufficient to establish that defendant engaged in conduct so outrageous as to be outside the bounds of decency or that she suffered a serious or severe mental injury as a result. In re French, 401 B.R. 295, 319.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

M.D.Tenn.

M.D.Tenn.2019. Cit. in ftn. (general cite); com. (d) cit. in cases cit. in sup.; com. (e) quot. in sup. Husband and wife brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against husband's ex-girlfriend, alleging that defendant published a defamatory document accusing plaintiffs of being psychotic and sending her multiple bothersome or threatening messages over email and voicemail. This court granted in part defendant's motion to dismiss, holding that defendant's actions did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary for an IIED claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Finley v. Kelly, 384 F.Supp.3d 898, 912-914.

M.D.Tenn.2018. Com. (d) quot. in sup., quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee who used her work laptop both for work and to access her private electronic email and accounts sued former employer and former co-worker, alleging that co-worker downloaded her personal files, including nude photographs, from her private accounts through her work laptop without her knowledge or consent, and then shared those files with other employees. This court granted co-worker's motion for summary judgment on employee's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that the alleged conduct, even if true, was not so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized community, as required to state such a claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Billiter v. SP Plus Corp., 329 F.Supp.3d 459, 471.

M.D.Tenn.2018. Cit. in case quot. in sup.; com. (d) quot. in sup. Female laborer who formerly worked as a foreman for a construction company sued former employer, alleging, among other things, sexual discrimination, sexual harassment, and intentional infliction of emotional distress based in part on allegations that her supervisor told her co-workers that she had a "stinky vagina," and told her, in front of her co-workers, that she could "take a shovel two feet inside of her" and that he wanted to take her into the woods to have sex with her. This court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment on plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, reasoning that plaintiff's allegations were insufficient to establish the outrageousness element required to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Cossairt v. Jarrett Builders, Inc., 292 F.Supp.3d 779, 789.

M.D.Tenn.2018. Com. (d) cit. in sup. Former student of private university, who was accused of sexual misconduct by a female student, brought an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress and other claims against university, after it concluded that he was not responsible for sexual misconduct, but punished him for not being truthful during the investigation and for violating university's residential-visitation policy. This court granted university's motion to dismiss student's emotional-distress claim, holding that, even if university's investigation was imperfect or unfair, the alleged conduct was not so atrocious, so beyond the bounds of decency, or so utterly intolerable to society that it met the demanding standard for such a claim under Tennessee law and Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court pointed out that student did not make any specific allegations regarding university's actions, other than that they were done intentionally or recklessly, and noted that removal from academic programs and frustration of earning academic degrees, even if humiliating, depressing, or distressful, were not sufficiently egregious to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Doe v. Belmont University, 334 F.Supp.3d 877, 903.

M.D.Tenn.2017. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Guest at an off-campus fraternity party filed, among other things, a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against fraternity member who invited her to the party, alleging that defendant had a sexual encounter with her without her consent, and took a photograph of her while she was sleeping fully clothed in his bed and sent it to his ex-girlfriend along with a statement indicating that he had had sex with plaintiff. This court denied in part defendant's motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiff alleged sufficient facts to support her IIED claim. Quoting Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, the court determined that a reasonable jury could find that defendant's conduct was so outrageous it could not be tolerated by a civilized society, given plaintiff's argument that defendant acted out of spite toward his ex-girlfriend. Doe v. Andrews, 275 F.Supp.3d 880, 888.

M.D.Tenn.2011. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. After wife was unwittingly filmed for a television program while visiting her husband in a maximum security prison, she brought an intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) claim, inter alia, against television network and producer, alleging that the program caused her to suffer severe emotional distress. Granting in part defendants' motion to dismiss, this court held that plaintiff's IIED claim failed as a matter of law, because even if plaintiff was distressed when some of her family and friends thought that the program portrayed her as a drug dealer, defendants' actions in producing and airing the program were not something beyond all bounds of decency and utterly intolerable in a civilized community, particularly in light of the fact that the program could have been understood to suggest that the drug smuggling allegations against plaintiff were proven false. Battle v. A & E Television Networks, LLC, 837 F.Supp.2d 767, 777.

M.D.Tenn.2011. Com. (d) adopted and quot. in case quot. in sup., coms. (h) and (j) quot. in cases quot. in sup. Lebanese former employee sued his former employer, asserting discrimination claims under federal and state law, and a pendent state-law claim for outrageous conduct/infliction of emotional distress. Granting in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, this court held that plaintiff failed to prove that defendant's conduct was sufficiently outrageous to support a judgment under Tennessee law for outrageous conduct or intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court reasoned that, while plaintiff was exposed to comments based upon his national origin and was later terminated from his job, the record revealed that defendant's branch manager did take some corrective action, and there was no evidence of any physical touching or hostile threats in conjunction with the name-calling; discriminatory conduct did not automatically give rise to the imposition of liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Nijem v. Alsco, Inc., 796 F.Supp.2d 883, 898, 899.

M.D.Tenn.2001. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Arrestee who was kicked and struck with butt of shotgun sued municipality, police sergeant, and several police officers, alleging excessive force, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and Fourth Amendment violations in connection with arrest. Granting in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to present evidence of outrageous conduct necessary to sustain claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Fromuth v. Metropolitan Government of Nashville, 158 F.Supp.2d 787, 796.

M.D.Tenn.1999. Com. (d) cit. in headnotes and sup. Elderly and disabled Medicare beneficiaries who received home health-care services sued the services provider for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, after the provider stopped furnishing the services. Plaintiffs alleged that defendant's refusal was based simply upon the fact that plaintiffs were all heavy service users and economically undesirable patients. This court denied defendant's motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that fact issues existed as to whether defendant's behavior constituted outrageous conduct. Winkler v. Interim Services, Inc., 36 F.Supp.2d 1026, 1026, 1027, 1031.

M.D.Tenn.1997. Com. (d) quot. in disc. Mentally disturbed individual was shot and killed by deputy sheriff who was called to individual's home because he was threatening his family with two machetes; administrator of decedent's estate sued deputy sheriff for, inter alia, wrongful death, assault and battery, negligence, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting in part and denying in part deputy sheriff's motion for summary judgment, the court held that material factual issues existed as to whether deputy sheriff was justified in using excessive force under the circumstances, and therefore summary judgment was inappropriate on the wrongful-death claim, and that summary judgment was also inappropriate on the claims for assault and battery and negligence; however, deputy sheriff's conduct was not so extreme and outrageous as to give rise to liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Thompson v. Williamson County, Tenn., 965 F.Supp. 1026, 1038, affirmed 219 F.3d 555 (6th Cir.2000).

W.D.Tenn.

W.D.Tenn.2010. Com. (h) cit. in case cit. in sup. Customer and her husband brought various claims against retailer and issuer of retailer's credit cards after defendants refused to let customer return several pieces of expensive jewelry that she purchased from retailer using one of retailer's credit cards. Granting summary judgment for defendants, this court held, among other things, that plaintiffs failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress based on allegations that retailer was responsible for an altercation that occurred when customer attempted to redeem certain gift certificates at one of retailer's stores, and that defendants wrongfully refused to accept plaintiffs' attempted returns, increased plaintiffs' credit limit, and reported plaintiffs' debt to credit agencies; even accepting such allegations as true, they did not approach the level of outrageousness that Tennessee required to state such a claim. Holt v. Macy's Retail Holdings, Inc., 719 F.Supp.2d 903, 916.

W.D.Tenn.2010. Com. (d) quot. in sup. African-American female employee of county sheriff's office sued office, asserting claims for sex discrimination, race discrimination, hostile work environment, retaliation, and intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). Granting summary judgment for defendant, this court held, as to plaintiff's IIED claim, that, even taking as true plaintiff's allegations that, among other things, she was "continually harassed" by one supervisor, subjected to unwanted and unwelcomed sexual advances from another supervisor, "verbally attacked" by a co-worker, and retaliated against as a result of her complaints, defendant's actions were not so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all bounds of decency, as required to state such a claim under Tennessee law. Verges v. Shelby County Sheriff's Office, 721 F.Supp.2d 730, 749.

W.D.Tenn.2006. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. Terminated African-American employee brought various claims against former employer and others, alleging racial discrimination. Denying defendants' motion for summary judgment as to plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held, inter alia, that defendants' conduct could be considered extreme and outrageous, in light of plaintiff's allegations that he was subjected to repeated racial slurs and was physically assaulted by defendants in his workplace. The court further held that plaintiff's failure to seek professional treatment for his alleged sleeplessness, cold sweats, and anger was not dispositive, particularly since plaintiff argued he could not afford such treatment. Wagner v. Merit Distribution, 445 F.Supp.2d 899, 917.

W.D.Tenn.2004. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Arrestee sued police officers for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendants repeatedly struck him after accusing him of breaking into a building. This court denied in part defendants' motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff stated a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because unprovoked beatings by officials who were hired to protect and serve the community could be deemed intolerable in a civilized community. Plaintiff alleged that defendants told him repeatedly that they were going to "beat his ass," that defendants hit him with no provocation when he tried to answer their questions, and that defendants repeatedly struck and kicked him after he stopped resisting their authority. Alexander v. Newman, 345 F.Supp.2d 876, 887-888.

W.D.Tenn.2003. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. In racial-discrimination suit against restaurant chain, supervisor brought claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting in part chain's motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that conduct of chain's manager in addressing supervisor as "Princess Diana" due to his sexual orientation, and referring to him as "the little black sheep," was not so extreme and outrageous as to satisfy tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Brack v. Shoney's, Inc., 249 F.Supp.2d 938, 956.

W.D.Tenn.2002. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Former postdoctoral research associate at a hospital sued hospital for federal civil-rights violations and intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that she was fired due to her attempts to bring to light medical mistreatment of patients by hospital staff members. This court granted hospital summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that hospital's conduct in allegedly discharging plaintiff because of her complaints regarding patient mistreatment did not rise to the level of atrocious or utterly intolerable conduct required for an emotional-distress claim. Caruso v. St. Jude Children's Research Hosp., Inc., 215 F.Supp.2d 930, 939.

W.D.Tenn.1997. Com. (b) cit. in headnote and quot. in sup., quot. in case quot. in disc. Former employees of a shoe company sued the company, her supervisor, and the company's general manager for Title VII violations and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted defendants summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that the supervisor's giving a former employee a bad reference, even if it was false, did not rise to the level of outrageous conduct. The court also determined that these alleged acts of the supervisor did not constitute outrageous conduct: displaying little sympathy to one plaintiff's complaints that she was sexually harassed by a co-worker; whispering to a co-worker that she was a lesbian; acting as though he was going to run over her with a case of shoes; and calling another employee a liar and refusing to give her a day off. Scarborough v. Brown Group, Inc., 972 F.Supp. 1112, 1114, 1125.

W.D.Tenn.1995. Com. (b) quot. in case quot. in sup. Employees who alleged that they were sexually harassed by their supervisor and their general manager brought action for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress and invasion of privacy. Defendants moved to dismiss. Granting the motion in part and denying it in part, the court held that plaintiffs failed to state a claim against general manager; that plaintiffs stated a claim for outrageous conduct against supervisor; and that supervisor did not commit the tort of "false light" invasion of privacy when he allegedly provided a prospective employer with false information about one of the plaintiffs; however, the plaintiff who alleged that supervisor followed her home and attempted to enter her home through a window stated a claim for intrusion upon seclusion. Scarborough v. Brown Group, Inc., 935 F.Supp. 954, 962.

E.D.Tex.

E.D.Tex.2003. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup. and cit. in case cit. in sup. After gas-station customer accidentally pumped more gas than he paid for, station manager called police and insisted that customer either pay for excess gas or siphon excess gas from car. Customer siphoned gas by sucking through a hose and became sick by swallowing gas and inhaling fumes. He sued station and manager for intentional infliction of emotional distress and for violating 42 U.S.C. § 1983. This court granted defendants summary judgment on emotional-distress claim, holding, inter alia, that, even assuming that defendants' conduct was reckless and outrageous, there was no evidence that customer actually suffered any emotional distress. Customer did not consult a psychologist, and his allegation that he was emotionally distressed by siphoning experience was unsupported. Hutchison v. Brookshire Bros., Ltd., 284 F.Supp.2d 459, 473, 474.

E.D.Tex.2002. Coms. (d) and (h) quot. in cases quot. in sup. Former employee sued employer for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, after he was discharged for being in violation of company policy by failing to divulge on his employment application his previous employment with another company where he had been accused of sexual harassment. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress failed because defendant's conduct was not extreme and outrageous. Ehrhardt v. Electrical & Instrumentation Unlimited of Louisiana, 220 F.Supp.2d 649, 660, 661.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

E.D.Tex.2002. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Motorist sued gasoline station and police officer for violations of state and federal law, alleging that he was forced to siphon gas from his car after the pump failed to stop automatically. Denying in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, district court held, inter alia, that motorist's allegation that officer and station manager forced him to siphon 10 buckets of gasoline from his car by mouth, causing him to swallow gasoline and inhale noxious fumes, sufficiently stated claim for intentional infliction of physical and emotional distress. Hutchinson v. Brookshire Bros., Ltd., 205 F.Supp.2d 629, 642.

E.D.Tex.2002. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Gas-station customer who was unable to pay for extra gasoline that had mistakenly been pumped into his car's gas tank sued city, city police officer, and gas-station manager and its employees for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that police officer had forced him to orally siphon out the extra gasoline. Granting police officer's motion for summary judgment on the emotional-distress claim, the court held that plaintiff failed to prove that he had suffered severe emotional distress as a result of officer's conduct. Hutchison v. Brookshire Bros., Inc., 225 F.Supp.2d 719, 729, appeal dismissed 71 Fed.Appx. 441 (5th Cir.2003).

E.D.Tex.2000. Cit. in disc. Survivors of motorcyclist who was killed in a collision with vehicle driven by employee of local university sued driver, university, and police officers who responded to the accident for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendants engaged in a cover-up in order to protect driver. Granting defendants' motion to dismiss, the court held, in part, that plaintiffs had failed to establish that defendants participated in the alleged cover-up for the purpose of causing plaintiffs to suffer severe mental distress. LaBarbara v. Angel, 95 F.Supp.2d 656, 667.

E.D.Tex.2000. Cit. in headnote, com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Employee sued employer for "hostile work environment" sexual harassment and retaliation under Title VII and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that a supervisor and a coemployee made comments and gestures toward plaintiff suggesting that plaintiff was engaging in homosexual conduct with a male co-worker. This court granted defendant summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that the teasing, obscenities, and other unpleasantness endured by plaintiff did not constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress. Mims v. Carrier Corporation, 88 F.Supp.2d 706, 720.

E.D.Tex.2000. Cit. in case cit. in disc. Former employee sued former employer under the Age Discrimination in Employment Act (ADEA), also alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting in part employer's motion for summary judgment, this court held that plaintiff failed to meet two of the four prongs necessary to establish intentional infliction of emotional distress, finding that defendant's actions were not extreme and outrageous and that plaintiff did not suffer severe emotional distress. Yelverton v. Graebel/Houston Movers, Inc., 121 F.Supp.2d 604, 612.

E.D.Tex.1999. Cit. in headnote, com. (d) cit. in case cit. in sup. After being fired by her employer hospital, a respiratory therapist sued the hospital's operator for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that she was forced to work in conditions that were inimical to patients' welfare as well as to her own professional and ethical standards. This court granted defendant summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's emotional-distress claim failed, because even if defendant's conduct as to the patients violated some level of care or was malicious or even criminal, that, standing alone, did not constitute extreme and outrageous conduct. Cole v. Sisters of Charity of the Incarnate Word, 79 F.Supp.2d 668, 673.

E.D.Tex.1999. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in disc. Salesman sued former employer for violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), alleging that he was terminated when defendant learned that he suffered from fibromyalgia. Plaintiff also asserted a state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Entering summary judgment for defendant, the court held that plaintiff's failure to establish that a physical impairment substantially limited a major life activity was fatal to his ADA claim, and that the manner in which he was discharged was not sufficiently extreme or outrageous to give rise to a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Garrett v. Autozone, Inc., 71 F.Supp.2d 617, 622.

E.D.Tex.1998. Cit. in case cit. in ftn., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in ftn. Subcontractor's employees who were fired from a construction project because they took en masse breaks in contravention of the general contractor's directive sued oil company and its general contractor for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. This court granted defendants summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that it was not extreme and outrageous conduct for an employer to fire employees who were engaged in activity for which they could be legitimately discharged. Volentine v. Bechtel, Inc., 27 F.Supp.2d 728, 737, 739.

E.D.Tex.1993. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in sup. Former employee and Equal Employment Opportunity Commission sued employer, alleging various claims arising from employee's discharge, including intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting in part and denying in part employer's motion for summary judgment on employee's emotional distress claim, the court held, inter alia, that, under Texas law, a supervisor's labeling of an employee as “not trainable” could be outrageous behavior that would support an emotional distress claim, particularly when employer was aware that employee had, by her own initiative, obtained computer training from a local university to upgrade her skills. E.E.O.C. v. Fina Oil & Chemical Co., 835 F.Supp. 330, 333.

N.D.Tex.

N.D.Tex.2011. Com. (d) cit. in sup. and quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. in sup. Former employee brought, among other things, a pendent state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) in her Title VII sexual harassment/discrimination case against employer and supervisor. This court, inter alia, denied supervisor's motion to dismiss and/or for summary judgment as to plaintiff's IIED claim, holding that a genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether supervisor's alleged conduct in attempting to force plaintiff to have sex with him following a dinner meeting was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to result in liability for IIED. Howe v. Yellowbook, USA, 840 F.Supp.2d 970, 982.

N.D.Tex.2006. Com. (e) cit. in case quot. in disc. Terminated employee sued former employer and former supervisor in state court, asserting claims for statutory employment discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress. After removal to federal court, this court granted plaintiff's motion to remand to state court, holding that supervisor was not improperly joined to defeat diversity jurisdiction because plaintiff could potentially prove a set of facts, consistent with the general allegation that supervisor repeatedly harassed plaintiff and subjected him to demeaning behavior while engaging in a campaign to destroy his reputation within the company, that would meet all the elements of his claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Dixon v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Cos., 433 F.Supp.2d 785, 790.

N.D.Tex.2002. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in disc. Private-corrections-facility employee whose demotion and reduction in pay were part of a disciplinary action taken against her for mistreating an inmate sued employer, asserting, in part, a pendent state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting summary judgment for defendant, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's claim failed because the conduct alleged was within the realm of an ordinary employment dispute, and did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct. Proctor v. Wackenhut Corrections Corp., 232 F.Supp.2d 709, 714.

N.D.Tex.2000. Com. (d) cit. in sup. Former employer challenged arbitration award in favor of former employee and her spouse on employee's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Entering judgment for employer, this court held that employer's conduct in returning employee to her normal job duties upon her return to work after extended absence, with no restrictions placed on employee by her physician, did not constitute extreme and outrageous conduct. Hughes Training, Inc. v. Cook, 148 F.Supp.2d 737, 744, affirmed 254 F.3d 588 (5th Cir.2001).

N.D.Tex.1999. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (j) cit. in disc. A school board trustee and others sued a neighbor who taped the trustee's cordless phone conversations, a television station, and a reporter, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. This court granted in part and denied in part the parties' cross-motions for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiffs failed to show that their emotional distress was severe, as they were not required to seek psychiatric help and their anxiety and insomnia failed to meet the requisite standard. Peavy v. Harman, 37 F.Supp.2d 495, 522, 523, affirmed in part, vacated in part, reversed in part 221 F.3d 158 (5th Cir.2000).

N.D.Tex.1998. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. and cit. generally in headnote. A former employee sued her employer, her supervisor, and the personnel manager for sexual harassment and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. This court granted defendants summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to present evidence that the actions of the employer or the personnel manager stated an emotional-distress claim. There was no evidence that these defendants ratified the supervisor's behavior, as the employer did not authorize or direct the supervisor's acts of sexual harassment. The employer made every effort to inform its employees of its sexual harassment policy, and it provided them several avenues to report any such harassment. Colbert v. Georgia-Pacific Corp., 995 F.Supp. 697, 697, 704.

N.D.Tex.1998. Cit. in disc. After she was fired, a female personnel recruiter sued her former employer for sexual harassment, retaliatory discharge, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. Plaintiff's supervisors subjected plaintiff to continued, abusive, and severe sexual harassment by conduct such as grabbing her blouse, sticking a camera between her legs and taking a picture of her crotch, and calling her "little Ms. Big Tits." This court awarded plaintiff damages, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff had proved all the elements of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiff's harassers acted intentionally, the degree of harassment was unusual, and the emotional distress suffered by plaintiff went far beyond mere worry and embarrassment. Scribner v. Waffle House, Inc., 14 F.Supp.2d 873, 932, vacated 62 F.Supp.2d 1186 (N.D.Tex.1999).

N.D.Tex.1998. Cit. in headnote and disc. A gynecologist at a university hospital sued abortion-rights protesters who picketed the doctor's home, his office, his wife's office, and the church where they worshipped, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress and invasion of privacy, among other claims. The jury found several of the defendants liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted in part and denied in part defendants' motion for judgment as a matter of law, holding, inter alia, that a reasonable jury could find that four of the defendants engaged in extreme and outrageous conduct. These defendants followed plaintiffs' cars on numerous occasions, spied on plaintiffs' home from a parked car, physically confronted the doctor at a restaurant, trespassed on plaintiffs' property, and repeatedly made harassing phone calls to plaintiffs. Two of the individual defendants were not liable on the emotional-distress claim, because their conduct was limited to nonfocused residential picketing. Tompkins v. Cyr, 995 F.Supp. 664, 667, 682.

N.D.Tex.1997. Com. (d) cit. in case cit. in ftn. A store employee sued her former employer, alleging, among other claims, violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act and intentional infliction of emotional distress after the employer filled her position while she was on medical leave recovering from brain surgery. Her applications for seven other positions with the employer were rejected, and she alleged that she was not hired into any of those positions because she was disabled, or, in the alternative, because the employer regarded her as being disabled. This court granted defendant summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's emotional distress claim was preempted by the Texas Commission on Human Rights Act and was barred by the exclusive remedy provision of the Texas Workers' Compensation Act. No competent summary-judgment evidence had been adduced to establish that defendant's conduct was extreme and outrageous, or that plaintiff suffered severe emotional distress. Cannizzaro v. Neiman Marcus, Inc., 979 F.Supp. 465, 479.

N.D.Tex.1997. Cit. in headnote, cit. in sup. Female employee who was terminated after she complained to her supervisor of sexual harassment by other executives and officers of employer brought an action against employer for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. After a nonjury trial, the court entered judgment for plaintiff, awarding her compensatory and punitive damages. The court held that, although plaintiff established the elements of the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress set forth in the Restatement (Second) of Torts § 46, any damages award under this emotional-distress claim would be identical to the mental-anguish damages award made for her sexual-harassment claim plus the mental-anguish damages award made in her defamation claim; thus, the court made no additional award for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Scribner v. Waffle House, Inc., 976 F.Supp. 439, 441, 500, vacated 62 F.Supp.2d 1186 (N.D.Tex.1999).

N.D.Tex.1997. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. African-American former plant supervisor sued employer for violations of 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and Title VII, and for the common law tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that his dismissal was motivated by race. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held that plaintiff had failed to state a § 1983 claim because defendant was a private corporation, not a state actor; that plaintiff had failed to present evidence from which a finder of fact could conclude that defendant's stated reasons for discharge were a pretext for discrimination; and that plaintiff had not shown that defendant's conduct was so extreme or outrageous as to subject it to liability for the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Steele v. SGS-Thomson Microelectronics, Inc., 962 F.Supp. 972, 980.

N.D.Tex.1996. Cit. generally in disc. Resident of apartment complex sued complex's security firm for, inter alia, negligence, gross negligence, and intentional infliction of emotional distress after she was raped on the premises. Resident also asserted a claim for negligence against complex's mortgage holder. Firm moved to dismiss the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and both defendants moved for summary judgment on the negligence claims. Granting the motions, the court held, in part, that firm's conduct, which allegedly included assuring resident that the apartment complex was peaceful and safe and then failing to warn her of the potential for criminal activity, was not so outrageous and extreme as to be considered intolerable in a civilized community; that firm did not owe resident a duty of care on the ground that it was an occupier or possessor of the complex; and that, while mortgage holder was under a duty to protect resident from the criminal acts of third parties, it did not breach this duty. Washington v. U.S. Dept. of Housing & Urban Dev., 953 F.Supp. 762, 768.

N.D.Tex.1995. Subsec. (1) adopted in case cit. in sup. Employee who was discharged, after a substantial investigation, for violating employer's policy against sexual harassment sued employer, alleging race discrimination and retaliation as well as a pendent state law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held, in part, that plaintiff's termination did not constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress, where plaintiff made no allegations that the individuals involved in his termination acted unprofessionally, extremely, or outrageously. Johnson v. J.C. Penney, Co., Inc., 876 F.Supp. 135, 140.

N.D.Tex.1995. Subsec. (1) adopted in case cit. in sup. Trainee police officers who were terminated following their implication in a robbery asserted, in their § 1983 action, a pendent state law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, against the police detectives who investigated the robbery. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held, in part, that plaintiffs failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, since they failed to produce any evidence that defendants acted intentionally or recklessly or that their conduct during their investigation was extreme and outrageous. Scott v. City of Dallas, 876 F.Supp. 852, 860.

N.D.Tex.1993. Cit. and quot. in case quot. in sup., subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in part in case quot. in sup. A zoologist sued animal rights activists and others for conspiracy to deprive him of his professional reputation and employment, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and defamation. This court granted summary judgment for one defendant but denied it for the others, holding, inter alia, that under Texas law a fact issue existed over whether the defendants' conduct in engaging in a letter-writing campaign and taking other actions to prevent the zoologist's use of animals in his work rose to the level of outrageousness necessary to support an emotional distress claim. Chevalier v. Animal Rehabilitation Center, Inc., 839 F.Supp. 1224, 1236, 1237.

N.D.Tex.1993. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. and cit. in ftn. Employee discharged by employer-defense contractor for refusing to take a drug test pursuant to Department of Defense regulations sued employer and employer's consultant for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Denying plaintiff's motion for partial summary judgment and granting motions by employer and consultant for partial summary judgment and summary judgment, respectively, the court held that, since plaintiff had no written employment contract and employer's "key employee" extension plan did not modify plaintiff's at-will status, employer could, without fear of liability for the emotional distress that might result, exercise its legal right to terminate plaintiff without cause and at will. The court also held that neither consultant's characterization of plaintiff as a "dragon" nor employer's alleged suggestion to others that plaintiff had a drug problem rose to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to support plaintiff's claim. Kipp v. LTV Aerospace & Defense, 838 F.Supp. 289, 293.

N.D.Tex.1993. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Police officer who was on restricted duty following a suicide attempt sued city employees for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, for requiring her to authorize release of all her mental health records as they were created in her treatment as a condition for considering her for reinstatement to regular duty. Granting in part defendants' motion to dismiss, the court held, inter alia, that, as a matter of law, the conduct alleged by plaintiff did not reach the level of being utterly intolerable in a civilized community so as to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Thompson v. City of Arlington, Tex., 838 F.Supp. 1137, 1154.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

S.D.Tex.

S.D.Tex.2011. Com. (d) cit. in sup. and quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee of contractor that provided support services to the United States military in Iraq sued former employer, former co-worker, and others, alleging, among other things, that co-worker raped her in her barracks room and former employer tried to "hide" her rape. Granting summary judgment for defendants on plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held that the tort of false imprisonment, the Texas Commission on Human Rights Act cause of action for retaliation, and the Title VII cause of action for retaliation covered plaintiff's allegations in support of her emotional-distress claim, namely, that defendants confined her to a guarded container, refused to allow her to telephone her parents, demanded that she write down her story prior to contacting the Department of State, interrogated her at the Department of State facility, accompanied her back to the United States and unnecessarily documented her actions and words, issued her an ultimatum regarding her continued employment, and destroyed her rape kit. Jones v. Halliburton Co., 791 F.Supp.2d 567, 600.

S.D.Tex.2005. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. After their child was removed from their home based on a teacher's report of suspected sexual abuse, parents of child sued employees of state department of protective and regulatory services and others, asserting constitutional and common-law claims. The court, inter alia, granted summary judgment for department's employees on plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that plaintiffs could not satisfy the outrageousness element of the claim under Texas law; all three employees had obtained reports of sexual abuse from child's teacher and obtained corroboration from a medical examiner before acting. Martin v. Texas Dept. of Protective and Regulatory Services, 405 F.Supp.2d 775, 798.

S.D.Tex.2005. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in sup. Neurosurgeon practicing at hospital sued hospital and its staff members under various theories, including intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging harassment and other offensive behavior, including discriminatory actions intended to block him from gaining privileges at hospital. This court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that it was questionable at best whether the offensive behavior alleged rose to the level of the extreme and outrageous conduct required to maintain such a claim under Texas law and, in any event, plaintiff failed to allege, much less establish, that he experienced the required element of severe emotional distress. Pisharodi v. Valley Baptist Medical Center, 393 F.Supp.2d 561, 576, 577.

S.D.Tex.2005. Quot. in case quot. in sup., coms. (d) and (h) cit. in sup. Employee sued former employer and former supervisor in state court, alleging age discrimination and harassment. After defendants removed the action, in part on grounds that supervisor had been fraudulently joined to destroy diversity jurisdiction, this court denied plaintiff's motion to remand, holding, among other things, that plaintiff was unable to establish a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against supervisor. Noting that whether a defendant's conduct was extreme and outrageous was a question of law, the court concluded that the facts alleged, which the court likened to those associated with an employment dispute, did not rise to the level of the extreme or outrageous conduct necessary to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Swafford v. Bank of America Corp., 401 F.Supp.2d 761, 765.

S.D.Tex.2004. Com. (d) cit. in disc. Former employee sued employer and two of its employees for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that she experienced harassment and ethnic discrimination and that she was wrongfully terminated after informing defendants of her pregnancy. This court granted defendant employee summary judgment, holding that defendants' conduct did not rise to level of outrageousness necessary to prove emotional-distress claim, and that there was insufficient evidence to support the tort's "intent" element. While plaintiff's petition showed that she perceived a pattern of ethnic-and gender-motivated unfairness in how she was treated, she did not meet elevated standards of emotional-distress tort. Termination alone was not outrageous conduct. Prather v. Utiliquest, L.L.C., 313 F.Supp.2d 666, 669.

S.D.Tex.2003. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Employees of academic medical center brought various employment-discrimination claims against center and its administrator. This court granted administrator's motion for summary judgment as to plaintiffs' claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that plaintiffs failed to allege that administrator engaged in extreme and outrageous conduct, and that none of the behavior attributed to him qualified as intentional infliction of emotional distress as a matter of law. The court stated that plaintiffs' allegations, which were within the range of ordinary employment disputes, were based on little more than the impression that, because administrator was head of their department, he must have been responsible for every unpleasant thing that happened to them. Bates v. University of Tex. Medical Branch, 425 F.Supp.2d 826, 850.

S.D.Tex.2001. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (j) cit. in case quot. in sup. After being fired for abusing alcohol, employee sued employer for violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. This court granted employer summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's emotional-distress claim failed, because employer's conduct was not extreme and outrageous. Employer treated plaintiff in a professional manner and tried to assist him in overcoming his alcoholism, and there was no indication that employer or its employees engaged in offensive or hostile behavior or that they denigrated or demeaned plaintiff. Furthermore, plaintiff did not show that his emotional distress was severe, as he did not suffer serious psychiatric problems. Lottinger v. Shell Oil Co., 143 F.Supp.2d 743, 778, 780.

S.D.Tex.2000. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (j) cit. in case quot. in disc. Tenant sued landlord for violations of the Fair Housing Act (FHA) and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that he was discriminated against because he was of Lebanese descent. Entering partial summary judgment for defendant, the court held, in part, that plaintiff had raised a triable issue with respect to retaliation in violation of the FHA, and that, while defendant's conduct could be considered outrageous, plaintiff had failed to show that he experienced severe emotional distress. Texas v. Crest Asset Management, Inc., 85 F.Supp.2d 722, 734, 735.

S.D.Tex.1999. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Discharged employee sued former employer for age discrimination, defamation, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted employer summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's emotional-distress claim failed, because employer's conduct was not extreme and outrageous, but was merely an ordinary employment dispute. Grogan v. Savings of America, Inc., 118 F.Supp.2d 741, 757.

S.D.Tex.1999. Com. (d) cit. in headnote and quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (j) cit. in headnote and cit. in case quot. in sup. A prospective airline passenger who missed his connecting flight was arrested, incarcerated, and charged with making a terroristic threat, after he angrily implied to a ticket agent that there might have been a bomb in his luggage that was on the connecting flight. After the charges were dismissed, the passenger sued the airline and the ticket agent, among others, for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted the ticket agent and the airline summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's emotional-distress claim failed because plaintiff had not alleged extreme or outrageous conduct. The ticket agent merely summoned security to defuse a potentially disruptive situation, and there was no evidence that the agent or the airline assaulted, abused, threatened, or demeaned him. Plaintiff also failed to prove severe distress. Lewis v. Continental Airlines, Inc., 80 F.Supp.2d 686, 690, 703, 704.

S.D.Tex.1998. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (j) cit. in case quot. in sup. A hospital nurse who was diagnosed with bipolar disorder sued the county hospital after she was fired from her job, alleging violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted the county summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's emotional-distress claim failed because she did not prove extreme conduct and severe distress. The hospital treated plaintiff in a polite and professional manner, and there was no indication that the hospital engaged in offensive or hostile behavior or that it denigrated, belittled, or degraded plaintiff. Plaintiff did not experience psychiatric problems due to defendant's conduct, because she was already experiencing depression and had been diagnosed with bipolar disorder before she was fired. Dupre v. Harris County Hosp. Dist., 8 F.Supp.2d 908, 925, 926.

S.D.Tex.1998. Subsec. (1) cit. in case cit. in disc. A man brought a 42 U.S.C. § 1983 action against police officers, alleging that they unlawfully arrested him and used excessive force in the course of the arrest. Plaintiff also brought state law claims of assault and battery and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted in part and denied in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's emotional-distress claim failed, because defendants' acts did not rise to the level of outrageous conduct. While not reflecting well upon at least one officer, the facts regarding the initial police stop described at most the heat generated by a stressful and potentially dangerous situation. Kellough v. Bertrand, 22 F.Supp.2d 602, 609.

S.D.Tex.1998. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Emergency Medical Technician who injured her back while attempting to lift a patient sued former employer for violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), intentional infliction of emotional distress, and negligence. Defendant moved for summary judgment. Granting the motion, the court held that, while material factual issues existed as to whether plaintiff was disabled under the ADA, she had nonetheless failed to satisfy the "reasonable accommodation" element of her prima facie case; that defendant's decision to assign plaintiff to light duties and not make her a dispatcher was not extreme and outrageous as a matter of law; and the plaintiff failed to establish that she injured her back as a result of having been negligently trained by defendant. Leger v. Texas EMS Corp., 18 F.Supp.2d 690, 696.

S.D.Tex.1998. Cit. in headnote, com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Employee who was terminated after failing a random drug test sued former employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting defendant's motion to dismiss, the court held, in part, that where an employer had reason to suspect a worker was using illegal drugs, it was neither extreme nor outrageous to terminate him. Quintanilla v. K-Bin, Inc., 993 F.Supp. 560, 561, 564.

S.D.Tex.1997. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Tenured state-university professor who allegedly suffered from a weakness of voice and loss of vocal stamina as a result of radiation treatments sued university for, inter alia, violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) in connection with university's demand that he teach consecutive class periods, something professor claimed his medical condition prevented him from doing. Professor also asserted a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting university's motion for summary judgment, the court held, in part, that professor failed to satisfy the prerequisites for a claim based on the ADA because he did not file a charge of discrimination with either the EEOC or the Texas Commission on Human Rights, and that university's alleged conduct was not extreme or outrageous. Decker v. University of Houston, 970 F.Supp. 575, 580.

S.D.Tex.1997. Com. (d) cit. in headnote and quot. in case quot. in disc. After she was fired, an employee filed an EEOC complaint and sued her employer for sex discrimination, sexual harassment, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. This court granted defendant summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff could not establish that her termination or the conduct by defendant's employees towards plaintiff gave rise to an emotional-distress claim. There was no evidence of outrageous conduct by defendant, plaintiff's supervisor, or others at the workplace. At best, there was inappropriate profanity or vulgar language used by co-workers, anger expressed by plaintiff's supervisor on occasion, or shunning by co-workers. Gazda v. Pioneer Chlor Alkali Co., Inc., 10 F.Supp.2d 656, 659, 676.

S.D.Tex.1997. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. and cit. in headnote. A mother, individually and as next friend of her minor son, sued a city and two police officers for civil rights violations and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. Plaintiff alleged that the officers' actions of forcing open the door to her home, throwing her and her son to the ground, and coercing the son to confess to committing a fatal arson were intentional, extreme, and outrageous, and caused plaintiff and her son to suffer severe mental distress. This court dismissed plaintiff's emotional-distress claims, holding that plaintiff's allegations did not rise to the level of outrageousness required to state an emotional distress cause of action. The allegations showed, at most, two police officers who were perhaps overly aggressive in the manner of arresting plaintiff and interrogating her son. The court assumed that almost all arrests were noisy, unpleasant affairs, and that physical manipulation of the arrestee occurred frequently. Thompson v. City of Galveston, 979 F.Supp. 504, 505, 512.

S.D.Tex.1996. Coms. (d) and (j) cit. in cases quot. in disc. Woman who consented to the videotaping of her therapy sessions sued organization responsible for the video series for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress after she learned that the tapes had been aired on a nationally syndicated television talk show. Defendant moved for summary judgment. Granting the motion, the court held that, in order to sustain a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress based on a publication, plaintiff was required to prove the falsity of the statement, which she failed to do, and that, even without the falsity element, plaintiff could not prevail where she was unable to show that defendant's conduct was outrageous or utterly intolerable and her emotional distress severe. To the extent that plaintiff attempted to state a claim for negligent misrepresentation in her response to defendant's motion for summary judgment, recovery was unavailable in the absence of pecuniary damages. Bass v. Hendrix, 931 F.Supp. 523, 531, 532.

S.D.Tex.1996. Quot. in case cit. in ftn. Female former employee sued co-worker, among others, for, inter alia, violations of Title VII and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendant harassed her by writing her personal notes in the workplace, attempting to establish an intimate relationship with her, calling and visiting her at home, and embarrassing her professionally. Defendant moved for summary judgment. Granting the motion, the court held, in part, that Title VII did not impose individual liability on co-workers, and that the conduct complained of was not so extreme and outrageous as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency such that it could support an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Carlson v. Rockwell Space Operations Co., 985 F.Supp. 674, 683.

S.D.Tex.1996. Cit. in case quot. in disc. Former employee sued former employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Defendant moved for summary judgment. Granting in part and denying in part the motion, the court held that the conduct complained of, which included the strict enforcement of company rules against plaintiff but not against other employees, was not so outrageous as to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Dade v. Southwestern Bell Tel. Co., 942 F.Supp. 312, 320-321.

S.D.Tex.1996. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (j) cit. in case quot. in sup. Former parole officer who was accused of releasing confidential information in violation of her former employer's policy and was terminated sued former employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held, in part, that, even if plaintiff's termination was in violation of the Texas Whistleblower Act, plaintiff failed to show that defendant's conduct was extreme and outrageous and that any emotional distress plaintiff suffered was sufficiently severe to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Hockaday v. TDCJ, 914 F.Supp. 1439, 1448, 1449.

S.D.Tex.1996. Cit. in headnote, com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Expert in the field of near-infrared spectroscopy who had six patent applications on his work and was a member of a research consortium sued two other consortium members for libel and intentional infliction of emotional distress after defendants wrote a letter in which they implied, among other things, that expert had lied about the pending patents. Defendants moved for summary judgment. Granting the motion in part and denying it in part, the court held that, while material factual issues existed as to whether defendants acted with malice and thereby abused the conditional privilege to which the letter was entitled, their conduct was not sufficiently extreme to support an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Maggard v. ARCO Products Co., 933 F.Supp. 653, 654, 660.

S.D.Tex.1996. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in cases quot. in sup. Oil-delivery driver whose employment was terminated after he suffered a back injury on the job sued his former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Granting in part defendant's motion to dismiss, the court held, in part, that defendant's conduct in discharging plaintiff did not approach the level of extreme and outrageous conduct required to support recovery for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Texas law; plaintiff did not allege that he was subjected to insults, degraded, or treated with disrespect. The court also stated that plaintiff failed to prove that the emotional distress he suffered was severe. Munoz v. H & M Wholesale, Inc., 926 F.Supp. 596, 612.

S.D.Tex.1996. Com. (d) cit. in headnote and cit. in case quot. in sup. Medical-college professor at a state university sued, among others, the dean and the head of department for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that he was subjected to humiliation and public ridicule by defendants and suffered severe emotional distress following his accusations of misconduct against another professor in the department. Granting in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held that plaintiff failed to show extreme and outrageous conduct on the part of defendants within the limitations period to support his claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court said that liability did not extend to mere insults, indignities, threats, annoyances, petty oppressions, or other trivialities and that there was no occasion for the law to intervene in every case where someone's feelings were hurt. Wagner v. Texas A & M University, 939 F.Supp. 1297, 1303, 1326.

S.D.Tex.1996. Quot. in case quot. in disc. Former employee sued former employer for, inter alia, violations of Title VII, alleging that his termination was racially motivated. Plaintiff also asserted a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Defendant moved for summary judgment, arguing that plaintiff was actually discharged because he had falsified his resume. Granting the motion in part and denying it in part, the court held that material factual issues existed on the issue of pretext and defendant's intent in deciding to terminate plaintiff, and thus summary judgment was inappropriate on the claim for discriminatory discharge under Title VII; however, the other acts complained of, which included denying plaintiff a larger office and failing to promote him quickly, were not so extreme and outrageous as to give rise to a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Weeks v. Coury, 951 F.Supp. 1264, 1278.

S.D.Tex.1996. Quot. in case quot. in disc. Former employee who believed that her termination was both race- and gender-based sued former employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Defendant moved for summary judgment. Granting the motion, the court held, in part, that the conduct complained of, which included scheduling a meeting to discuss plaintiff's charge of discrimination immediately after she returned from her father's funeral, joking about a possible settlement, and altering plaintiff's employment records, did not rise to the level of outrageousness necessary to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Williams v. E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 955 F.Supp. 711, 726.

S.D.Tex.1995. Com. (d) quot. in sup., com. (h) quot. in cases quot. in sup. Plaintiffs sued United States under Federal Tort Claims Act, alleging that it was liable for, inter alia, assault and intentional infliction of emotional distress resulting from their arrest by two border-patrol agents. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held that no assault occurred since the agents were privileged to draw and aim their weapons at plaintiffs while plaintiffs were still in their car and considered dangerous. In addition, the agents' use of profanity and felony-stop tactics in capturing plaintiffs they knew had just eluded another agent on a stretch of highway used for drug and alien smuggling was not so repugnant or abhorrent as to give rise to a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress but, rather, entirely reasonable under the circumstances. Garza v. U.S., 881 F.Supp. 1103, 1107, 1108.

S.D.Tex.1995. Com. (d) cit. and quot. in sup. and cit. in headnotes. An eyewear specialist sued her former employer for hostile-work-environment sexual harassment and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted employer's motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's emotional-distress claim failed because she failed to establish extreme and outrageous conduct and severe emotional distress. The isolated remarks, i.e., that she would have to sleep with the boss to be promoted, that she should wear light panty hose, and a description of a magazine article showing a nude woman taking a shower were at worst sexual innuendo and mere annoyances. Plaintiff did not allege that she contracted any type of mental disorder or sought medical, psychological, or psychiatric treatment as a result of defendants' conduct. Gearhart v. Eye Care Centers of America, Inc., 888 F.Supp. 814, 815, 819, 823.

S.D.Tex.1995. Com. (d) cit. in sup. and cit. in case quot. in sup. Office-building manager sued her employer and her supervisor, among others, for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Granting in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held that plaintiff did not state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, since she failed to adduce specific facts sufficient to support the elements of extreme and outrageous conduct and severe emotional distress necessary for her claim; most of the derogatory statements attributed to her supervisor and another employee were mere insults, indignities, threats, annoyances, or petty oppressions, to which liability did not attach, and, while an incident in which the other employee allegedly threw a metal paperweight at her, if proven, might have approached the level of extreme and outrageous conduct, plaintiff's claim based on that incident was time-barred. Humphreys v. Medical Towers, Ltd., 893 F.Supp. 672, 679, 681.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

S.D.Tex.1995. Com. (d) quot. in disc., com. (j) cit. in case quot. in disc. A white shipping-company employee and his wife sued his employer and co-workers, alleging civil rights violations, invasion of privacy, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, after employee was demoted and subsequently resigned. Plaintiffs alleged that the company's representatives hollered at, insulted, and harassed the employee for his failing to explain how a 99-cent "UPS souvenir" stolen baseball was found in his office. This court granted defendants summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that defendants' behavior did not approach the level of extreme and outrageous conduct required to support a recovery for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiffs did not allege that the employee was accused of criminal conduct, physically assaulted, restrained, or subjected to profane language. Furthermore, plaintiffs failed to show that any emotional distress the employee suffered, i.e., headaches, nausea, and insomnia, was severe. Patton v. United Parcel Service, Inc., 910 F.Supp. 1250, 1270, 1272.

S.D.Tex.1993. Cit. in case cit. in sup., com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. A white male employee sued his employer, asserting reverse discrimination based on race, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and other claims. Granting the employer's motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that under Texas law the employee's claims of excess criticism by his supervisors for tardiness and poor grammar, lack of recognition for accomplishments, failure of supervisors to review his work, being mistakenly accused of absenteeism, and being characterized as having an "attitude problem" did not state a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. These were typical complaints voiced by most workers across the nation and did not show outrageous behavior, as there was no showing that plaintiff was demoted, discharged, or degraded by defendants. Ulrich v. Exxon Co., U.S.A., A Div. of Exxon Corp., 824 F.Supp. 677, 686.

S.D.Tex.1992. Cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. and cit. in case cit. in sup. Employee brought action against former employer, asserting, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress arising from employer's criticisms and discipline of employee, sometimes in the erroneous belief that employee had done something wrong, and efforts by the employer to elicit comments from other employees that were critical of employee's performance or that questioned his work-related injury. Employee also claimed to suffer from a spell of headaches resulting from employer's conduct. Granting partial summary judgment to employer, this court held that although employer's behavior may have been rude, accusatory, and suspicious, it was not so reprehensible as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency. Moreover, the court held that employee's headache spells could not be linked to employer's conduct. Clayton v. Nabisco Brands, Inc., 804 F.Supp. 882, 885, 886.

S.D.Tex.1992. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. Employee who was terminated six months before she was to be vested for renewal commissions brought action against employer, alleging, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting employer summary judgment, this court held that even if employee's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress was cognizable under Texas law, employer's conduct, although perhaps not compassionate, was not extreme or outrageous, and that employee did not encounter difficulties any more onerous than those suffered by others who had lost their jobs. Rayburn v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. of the U.S., 805 F.Supp. 1401, 1410.

S.D.Tex.1990. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. but dist. A discharged female employee sued her former employer alleging Title VII sex discrimination, wrongful discharge, intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress, breach of contract, tortious interference with business, slander, and libel. Granting the employer's motion for summary judgment, the district court held, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to prove that her discharge was discriminatory or retaliatory where she was allegedly fired for obtaining and reproducing an employee manual without proper authorization, and plaintiff could not recover for negligent or intentional infliction of emotional distress where her suspension and termination were not accompanied by any extreme or outrageous conduct on the employer's part. Taylor v. Houston Lighting and Power Co., 756 F.Supp. 297, 302.

S.D.Tex.1989. Com. (d) cit. but dist. Plaintiff sued his employer, an airline owned by a foreign government, and another airline employee for violations of federal employment discrimination laws and intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress. Defendants moved for summary judgment. Granting defendants' motion in part, the district court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's allegations did not amount to the outrageous conduct necessary to sustain a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress where plaintiff alleged that the defendant employee caused him embarrassment by calling travel agencies to verify if plaintiff actually made the calls he listed on his work itinerary, and where defendant once quarrelled with plaintiff in front of another employee. Starrett v. Iberia Airlines of Spain, 756 F.Supp. 292, 296.

W.D.Tex.

W.D.Tex.2008. Adopted in case cit. in ftn. in sup. (general cite). After Good Samaritan motorist stopped to aid victims of a highway accident but later became embroiled in a heated argument with responding police officers and was arrested by them, motorist sued officers for false arrest, false imprisonment, and intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia. Finding that defendants acted reasonably under the circumstances, this court held that defendants were entitled to qualified and official immunity on all of plaintiff's claims, and therefore granted their motion for summary judgment. The court additionally noted that, because it found defendants' conduct reasonable, plaintiff's IIED claim would have failed in any event for lack of the extreme and outrageous conduct required for this tort under Texas law. Spencer v. Rau, 542 F.Supp.2d 583, 596.

W.D.Tex.2007. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. (cit. as § 46). Widower brought various claims against decedent's purported daughter and another individual who allegedly assaulted him at decedent's funeral in connection with a dispute over the funeral arrangements. Granting defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held, inter alia, that the behavior described in the complaint did not meet the outrageousness standard required under Texas law. The court found that the blows allegedly suffered by plaintiff at his wife's graveside could not cause emotional suffering so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency and to be regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Von Beck-Lutes v. Arning, 484 F.Supp.2d 585, 588.

W.D.Tex.2001. Adopted in case quot. in sup., cit. in sup. Female former bartender brought claims for sexual harassment and intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, against former employer. Denying employer summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that fact issues existed as to whether supervisor's conduct in harassing, assaulting, and threatening plaintiff satisfied extreme and outrageous elements of tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Verhelst v. Michael D's Restaurant San Antonio, Inc., 154 F.Supp.2d 959, 965.

W.D.Tex.1999. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Psychologist sued nonprofit professional organization for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress after defendant terminated plaintiff's membership for ethics violations. Entering summary judgment for defendant, the court held, among other things, that defendant's expulsion of plaintiff, which came about as a result of plaintiff's establishing a potentially harmful dual relationship with one of her clients, did not amount to extreme and outrageous conduct, and that, even if it did, defendant was acting within its legal rights. Campbell v. American Psychological Ass'n, 68 F.Supp.2d 768, 777.

W.D.Tex.1997. Adopted in case cit. in disc. Mexican company that contracted to provide food services to Mexican factory workers sued factory owner and its American parent corporation for, inter alia, breach of contract, negligent misrepresentation, and intentional infliction of emotional distress after defendants terminated the parties' agreement. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held, in part, that the law of Texas, rather than the law of Mexico, applied to plaintiff's claims; that the parol-evidence rule prevented enforcement of the alleged agreement for employee food subsidies that gave rise to plaintiff's contract claim; that the claim for negligent misrepresentation failed for lack of a showing of a misstatement of existing fact; and that defendants' conduct was neither extreme nor outrageous. Perez v. Alcoa Fujikura, Ltd., 969 F.Supp. 991, 1010.

W.D.Tex.1995. Cit. in disc. Travelers to Mexico sued the United States under the Federal Tort Claims Act, alleging excessive use of force by a Customs Service officer and intentional infliction of emotional distress during a search of their car at a border crossing. While one officer was searching the car, one traveler began pacing back and forth near the officer. The officer's fellow officer instructed the traveler to step away and he placed traveler in a wrist/arm lock when she failed to comply. This court granted defendant's motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state an emotional-distress claim, because the officer's detention of plaintiff was not motivated by malice; rather, the detention was motivated by the officer's obligation and desire to protect the safety of his fellow officer. Rivera v. U.S., 907 F.Supp. 1027, 1030.

W.D.Tex.1993. Quot. in part in sup., com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. An employee discharged for poor attendance and safety violations sued his employer, alleging wrongful termination, breach of contract, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted the employer's motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that, under Texas law, plaintiff's allegations that supervisors treated the employee differently because the employee's father had authority over the supervisors, altered the employee's time cards to make his attendance appear worse than it actually was, sought out old occurrences to use against him, and fired him even though co-workers who were not as good employees were not fired did not meet the definition of extreme and outrageous conduct sufficient to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Badgett v. Northwest Resource Co., 818 F.Supp. 998, 1003.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

W.D.Tex.1990. Com. (d) quot. in part in sup. An attorney sued his former employer alleging, inter alia, racial discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court denied in part the employer's motion for summary judgment, holding that there existed genuine issues of material fact as to whether the employer's failure to promote the attorney to two available positions was racially motivated, and whether the employer's conduct was sufficiently extreme to permit recovery for intentional infliction of emotional distress where the attorney alleged that on account of his race and national origin he was subjected to harangues and verbal assaults from supervisors, he was threatened and denied privileges afforded to others, he did not receive comparable support staff services or office furniture, he was left off organizational charts and distribution lists, and he was excluded from management functions. Guzman v. El Paso Natural Gas Co., 756 F.Supp. 994, 1002.

W.D.Tex.1988. Quot. in case quot. in disc. A former bank employee claimed, inter alia, that the bank committed federal civil rights age and sex discrimination violations against her, and also brought a pendent claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted the bank's motion for partial summary judgment as to the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Noting the plaintiff's admission that she had not required any treatment, from either a physician or a psychologist, the court determined that the plaintiff's injuries did not rise to a level sufficient to support the emotional distress cause of action. Also, no evidence was presented to prove that the bank had intentionally fired the plaintiff to cause her extreme emotional distress. The court further stated that when an employer does no more than exercise its legal right to terminate an employee, that employer cannot be charged with liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Laird v. Texas Commerce Bank-Odessa, 707 F.Supp. 938, 941.

W.D.Tex.1988. Cit. in ftn. Two employees were terminated from their employment with the defendant fast-food corporation. One of the employees, a fast-food worker, brought an action for assault, retaliation, and sexual harassment. The other worker, an assistant manager, brought an action for violation of implied contract, national origin discrimination, and retaliation. The district court awarded the fast-food worker damages on the assault claim and the assistant manager damages on the discrimination claim. The court disallowed the assistant manager's attempt to add a state law tort claim for extreme and outrageous conduct, because the plaintiff failed to raise the claim during the trial. Valdez v. Church's Fried Chicken, Inc., 683 F.Supp. 596, 622.

D.Utah

D.Utah, 2021. Com. (f) quot. in sup.; com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee brought, among other things, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against employer, alleging that defendant's district manager inflicted severe emotional distress upon her when he described her mistaken usage of a store coupon as an ethical lapse and fraudulent behavior, despite knowing that she had recently gone on leave under the Family and Medical Leave Act for her mental health. This court granted defendant's motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiff failed to state a claim for IIED. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, the court explained that, although plaintiff alleged she was uniquely vulnerable to defendant's conduct because of her underlying health issues, defendant's conduct, as alleged, did not rise to the level of outrageousness necessary to sustain an IIED claim. Porter v. Staples the Office Superstore, LLC, 521 F.Supp.3d 1154, 1161, 1162.

D.Utah, 2010. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. and cit. in ftn. Female employees who allegedly were sexually harassed by employer's male president sued president, asserting, among other things, a state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Denying defendant's motion for summary judgment as to that claim, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiffs' allegations of weight gain, trouble sleeping, edginess, crying, mood swings, and depression, as well as other reactions to defendant's conduct, were sufficient to create a genuine issue of material fact on the requirement that the emotional distress be so severe that no reasonable person could be expected to endure it. James v. Frank's Westates Services, Inc., 747 F.Supp.2d 1264, 1278.

D.Utah, 2002. Com. (j) quot. in sup. Widow sued bank that administered decedent's pension plan and bank's chief executive officer for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that her continued receipt of mail addressed to decedent from defendants after she requested defendants to stop the mailings caused her to suffer severe emotional distress. Granting defendants' motion to dismiss, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to plead facts to support her conclusory allegation that she suffered severe emotional distress as a result of the mailings. Nester v. Bank One Corp., 224 F.Supp.2d 1344, 1348.

D.Utah, 1997. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. and quot. in ftn., com. (f) quot. in sup. com. (h) quot. in case quot. in sup. After a professional basketball player placed his hand on a female usher's buttocks and pinched her during a game, she sued the player for battery and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiff argued that defendant's conduct was outrageous because of its context: it occurred not only in front of the arena's spectators, but also in front of a local and national television audience. This court granted defendant's motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that defendant's alleged conduct was not so outrageous as to support an emotional-distress claim. It stated that the alleged conduct constituted an insult, indignity, or unkind act that did not rise to a level warranting imposition of liability. Ankers v. Rodman, 995 F.Supp. 1329, 1335, 1336.

D.Utah, 1997. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in sup. Employees sued their employer and management-level employees for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, based on hostile-environment sexual harassment. Granting in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiffs failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, since one alleged harasser's conduct in retaliating against plaintiffs was not outrageous and there was no evidence that a second alleged harasser deliberately intended to inflict emotional distress on one of the plaintiffs, as required to avoid the exclusive-remedy provision of the workers' compensation act. Metcalf v. Metropolitan Life, Inc., 961 F.Supp. 1536, 1545.

D.Utah, 1995. Cit. in headnotes, coms. (g) and (j) quot. in cases quot. in sup. Petroleum distributor, victorious in its breach-of-contract action against gas-station owner, sought to enforce its judgment by levying and selling owner's property. Owner, who did not appeal the judgment, sued distributor and distributor's law firm for abuse of process and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that the value of the property seized exceeded that authorized in the judgment and that the resulting emotional distress was obvious. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held that where, as here, the property levied upon was sold for less than the amount of the judgment, the seizure was not considered excessive. Furthermore, owner failed to prove that he experienced any emotional distress, much less that it was severe. Finally, liability could not attach where defendants were merely attempting to enforce their legal rights under an undisputed and unappealed judgment. Keller v. Ray, Quinney & Nebeker, 896 F.Supp. 1563, 1564, 1565, 1573, 1574, affirmed 78 F.3d 597 (10th Cir.1996).

D.Utah,1989. Com. (d) quot. in sup. and cit. generally in case cit. in sup. An employee was fired by his supervisor after their relationship had deteriorated and it was discovered that the employee had taped several of their conversations relating to his job performance. The employee sued his employer for breach of implied covenant of good faith, breach of contract, violation of ERISA, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment on all claims, holding, inter alia, that allegations that the supervisor mandated that the plaintiff sell 120% of his previous sales quota and then threatened to disrupt the plaintiff's ability to meet this quota did not rise to the level of outrageous conduct needed to sustain the emotional distress claim. Maxfield v. N. Amer. Phillips Consumer Electronics, 724 F.Supp. 840, 844.

D.Utah, 1988. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. An engineer who was employed by the manufacturer of the solid rocket motors used on the Space Shuttle Challenger sued the manufacturer, following the accident in which the space shuttle exploded, alleging various common law and statutory causes of action including defamation, intentional infliction of emotional distress, antitrust, witness tampering, and civil conspiracy. Pursuant to the defendant's motion for judgment on the pleadings, this court dismissed all claims with prejudice. The court held, inter alia, that the plaintiff's allegation that the manufacturer launched the space shuttle contrary to his recommendation and with the manufacturer's knowledge that its action would be injurious to his mental health could not support an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress absent the manufacturer's knowledge that the shuttle would explode. In regard to the alleged conduct of the employer in attempting to discredit the plaintiff, threatening his employment, and removing him from a position of importance, the court held that, as a matter of law, these actions were not sufficiently outrageous to support a claim for emotional distress. Boisjoly v. Morton Thiokol, Inc., 706 F.Supp. 795, 801.

D.Utah, 1984. Cit. in ftn., com. (d) quot. in sup. The plaintiffs, who worked for certain businesses operated by the defendant religious corporations, were fired from their positions because each was unable or refused to satisfy the Mormon Church worthiness requirements for a temple recommend. The plaintiffs filed this suit, arguing that requiring them to be interviewed by clergymen concerning their eligibility for temple recommends was an intentional infliction of emotional distress. The defendants moved to dismiss the claim for failure to state a cause of action. This court granted the motion, noting that the action causing the distress must be outrageous to be actionable. This court concluded as a matter of law that questions about employees' sexual activities and religious propriety did not rise to the level of outrageous and intolerable conduct. Amos v. Corporation of Presiding Bishop, 594 F.Supp. 791, 831.

D.Utah, 1982. Quot. in sup., cit. in sup., coms. (a), (d), (g), and (i) quot. in sup. Parents withdrew their children from public school for religious reasons but were not permitted by the local school authorities to teach the children at home. Proceedings were instituted against the parents, and warrants were issued for their arrest. The parents barricaded their home and resisted all arrest attempts. One final attempt resulted in the husband being shot and killed by one of the arresting officers. In the family members' resulting suit for intentional and negligent infliction of emotional harm, this court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The court held that no intent existed and that the officers were not liable because they had been legally justified in their actions. Singer v. Wadman, 595 F.Supp. 188, 298-299, affirmed 745 F.2d 606 (10th Cir.1984), certiorari denied 470 U.S. 1028, 105 S.Ct. 1396, 84 L.Ed.2d 785 (1985).

D.Vt.

D.Vt.2015. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former prisoner, who was convicted of murdering his wife and incarcerated for over 17 years before the conviction was vacated, filed a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against detectives who conducted his investigation and re-investigation before the charges against him were ultimately dropped. This court granted defendants' motion to dismiss prisoner's IIED claim as to detective who oversaw the re-investigation, reasoning that his allegedly inadequate re-investigation did not support such a claim, but denied it as to detective who led the original investigation, reasoning that his alleged fabrication of evidence might be extreme and outrageous enough to state such a claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Grega v. Pettengill, 123 F.Supp.3d 517, 550.

D.Vt.1996. Com. (e) quot. in disc.; com. (f) quot. in sup., cit. in disc., and cit. in case cit. in disc.; illus. 9 quot. in ftn. Employee who was discharged sued his former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Granting employer's motion for summary judgment, the court held that, although employer knew of employee's depression, none of the actions taken by employer to improve employee's work habits, inquire about when he would return to work, and gather information necessary to provide employee with benefits rose to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Costello v. Gannett Satellite Info. Network Inc., 939 F.Supp. 313, 315-317, affirmed in part, appeal dismissed in part 112 F.3d 503 (2d Cir.1997).

D.Vt.1994. Com. (h) cit. in headnote and in sup. Student sued college, alleging, inter alia, that college intentionally inflicted emotional distress by charging him with rape and disrespect for persons, finding him guilty of disrespect of persons, and by affirming that finding in the college appeals process. Granting in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held that defendant's decision, when confronted with a female student's accusation of rape, to confront plaintiff with the charges, hold a hearing, and support the findings of the initial tribunal on appeal was not, as a matter of law, such extreme and outrageous conduct as would support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, even where various procedural errors were alleged. Fellheimer v. Middlebury College, 869 F.Supp. 238, 239, 247.

D.Vt.1993. Adopted in case cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in sup. and cit. in case cit. in disc., com. (f) quot. in sup. A discharged employee sued his employer for breach of an alleged contract of employment and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted the employer's motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that, under Vermont law, a supervisor who directed verbal abuse at the employee, ignored him at times, and other times paid unusually close attention to his work habits did not engage in the level of extreme and outrageous conduct required to support an emotional distress claim, even if the supervisor knew the employee had emotional problems. Mancini v. General Elec. Co., 820 F.Supp. 141, 148, 149.

D.Vt.1993. Com. (d) quot. in sup., quot. in case quot. in disc. Discharged employee sued former employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, promissory estoppel, and tortious interference with prospective contractual relations. Granting in part and denying in part employer's motion to dismiss, the court held that employer's allegedly abusive behavior, including regularly searching for infractions for which employee could be terminated, did not constitute outrageousness for purposes of a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Employee's promissory estoppel theory failed since his supervisor's vague offer to transfer him to another department was not the type of promise that could serve as the basis for this claim, and because employee's reliance on subsequent oral assurances was not reasonable under the circumstances. Employee's tortious interference claim survived the motion to dismiss, since material factual issues existed as to employer's intent in informing a bank to which employee applied for home financing that his chances of continued employment were 50-50, thereby causing bank to deny his application. Marcoux-Norton v. Kmart Corp., 907 F.Supp. 766, 773.

D.Vt.1979. Cit. in ftn. in sup. An insured individual sued his insurance company to recover consequential and punitive damages for the defendant's allegedly bad faith refusal to honor explicit policy provisions. A jury found for the plaintiff and the defendant moved in the alternative for judgment notwithstanding the verdict r for a new trial. The court denied the defendant's motion.

The court found that Vermont law would, in a contract action, only allow those consequential damages which were foreseeable at the time the contract was formed, and would not generally allow punitive damages. However, in tort actions consequential damages, whether foreseeable or not, would be awarded and punitive damages would be allowed if the circumstances indicated malice under Vermont law. The question then was whether Vermont law would find the breach of a fiduciary's duty of good faith conduct as tortious or as contractual. The court determined that such a breach would be classified as a tortious wrong and therefore both consequential and punitive damages could be awarded and were awarded properly in this instance. Phillips v. Aetna Life Ins. Co., 473 F.Supp. 984, 990.

E.D.Va.

E.D.Va.2020. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Nurse who was assigned to work at a jail while employed by a staffing agency filed a claim for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress against operator of the jail and correctional officers who worked at the jail, after officers subjected her to a strip search as she entered the jail on her first day of work. This court denied a motion to dismiss filed by correctional officer who controlled the intake of inmates, holding that nurse alleged sufficient facts for a reasonable person to find that he acted outrageously under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court pointed out that nurse personally notified officer that she was a nurse assigned to work at the jail and that, while officer possessed information and resources to confirm the identity of those legally committed to the jail, he ignored nurse's assertions as to her employment and sought out confirmation as to his mistaken assumptions only after forcing her to undergo a highly intrusive search of her naked body. Amisi v. Riverside Regional Jail Authority, 469 F.Supp.3d 545, 579.

E.D.Va.2016. Coms. (d), (e), and (f) cit. and quot. in cases quot. in sup. (erron. cite as § 146). Defense attorney filed, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against commonwealth attorney, alleging that defendant interrupted a DUI proceeding in which plaintiff was defending a client, demanded that plaintiff give him a DUI manual that he claimed she had taken from his office, shoved her, grabbed the manual, and subsequently filed a criminal complaint for larceny against plaintiff and attracted the attention of local news. This court denied in part defendant's motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiff stated a plausible claim for relief. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, the court determined that a reasonable jury could find that defendant's conduct rose to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct that was necessary to support an IIED claim. Daniczek v. Spencer, 156 F.Supp.3d 739, 760, 761.

E.D.Va.2013. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Employee who allegedly was assaulted by his supervisor while they were both working for a government contractor at a military base in Iraq sued contractor, among others, claiming, inter alia, that defendant was liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) for failing to provide plaintiff with timely medical care following the assault. Granting defendant's motion to dismiss, this court held that the Defense Base Act (DBA) provided plaintiff's exclusive remedy against defendant, but, even accepting that plaintiff's IIED claim could fall within the intentional-injury exception to the DBA, plaintiff failed to state facts that defendant's conduct was sufficiently outrageous as to meet the high standard of Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d. Mason v. Sallyport Global Holdings, Inc., 987 F.Supp.2d 707, 710.

E.D.Va.2009. Subsec. (2) cit. in disc. Surviving family members of sailors who were killed in a terrorist bombing of an American navy vessel sued the Republic of Sudan, alleging that it knowingly and willfully provided material support and resources to the perpetrators of the attack. After dismissing plaintiffs' claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court denied plaintiffs' motion for leave to supplement their complaint to reassert such claims under a newly enacted provision of the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act. The court held that the provision could not be retroactively applied in this case, and thus the Death on the High Seas Act, under which nonpecuniary losses were not recoverable, was plaintiff's exclusive cause of action. Rux v. Republic of Sudan, 672 F.Supp.2d 726, 729.

E.D.Va.2009. Com. (j) cit. in case quot. in sup. Arrestee brought § 1983 action against county and its police officers, as well as a state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against one arresting officer. Granting summary judgment for defendants, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff could not establish that he had suffered the severe emotional distress required to support an IIED claim under Virginia law; while plaintiff alleged that he visited a medical professional on one occasion, that he took medication prescribed for him by that professional for two days, and that he had "emotional issues" as a result of his experience, such facts would not allow a reasonable jury to find by clear and convincing evidence that he had experienced emotional distress so severe that no reasonable person could be expected to endure it. Ware v. James City County, Virginia, 652 F.Supp.2d 693, 714.

E.D.Va.2007. Com. (d) quot. in cases quot. in disc. and sup. Holder of business credit card brought Fair Debt Collection Practices Act suit, including an additional claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, against attorney and his firm that represented credit-card company in its state-court collection action against holder. This court denied defendants' motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that attorney's alleged conduct in not only using abusive language with plaintiff on the phone and knowingly filing state actions against her in an incorrect venue, but also blatantly lying to her in order to secure a default judgment against her when he knew that she was actively contesting the debt were actions that a jury could find extreme or outrageous enough to ground liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Virginia law. Perk v. Worden, 475 F.Supp.2d 565, 570.

E.D.Va.2005. Com. (d) quot. in ftn. Tow-truck driver who was detained by police officers on suspicion of towing a car in violation of county ordinance sued officers for intentional infliction of emotional distress and violation of her Fourth Amendment rights. Granting officers' motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that no genuine issue of material fact existed as to driver's tort claim, as she failed to sufficiently demonstrate that she suffered from severe distress or that officers' conduct was so outrageous as to go beyond all bounds of decency or be considered intolerable in a civilized society. Poole v. Pass, 351 F.Supp.2d 473, 482.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

E.D.Va.2004. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. Passenger of vehicle stopped for traffic violation brought suit against police officers, alleging that he was falsely arrested and that officers used excessive force during the arrest. Granting in part officers' summary-judgment motion, the court held, inter alia, that no genuine issue of material fact existed as to plaintiff's claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress, because plaintiff failed to adduce evidence showing that he suffered severe emotional trauma, or that officers engaged in requisite outrageous conduct. Veney v. Ojeda, 321 F.Supp.2d 733, 748.

E.D.Va.2000. Cit. in case quot. in disc. Insurance applicant whose HIV test results came back as indeterminate sued insurer and its in-house physician for negligence, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and defamation in connection with insurer's refusal to retest and its disclosure of the results to Medical Information Bureau (MIB), an association of life insurance companies. Granting defendants' motions for summary judgment, the court held, in part, that refusal to retest and reconsider plaintiff for coverage was not so egregious as to give rise to an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and that plaintiff's claim for defamation failed where the information disclosed was true, its disclosure was protected by statute, and plaintiff signed an express authorization for publication of the test results to MIB. Goddard v. Protective Life Corp., 82 F.Supp.2d 545, 557.

E.D.Va.1997. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in disc., com. (j) quot. in case cit. in disc. A doctor who had AIDS sued the doctor with whom he shared a practice for intentional infliction of emotional distress and defamation after defendant told a patient that plaintiff had AIDS, and that he would not want a physician with AIDS treating him if he were a patient. Defendant also wrote a letter to ten patients stating that he was leaving the practice because he had learned that plaintiff had AIDS and was continuing to perform invasive procedures. This court denied plaintiff's motion for summary judgment as to the emotional-distress claim, holding, inter alia, that a reasonable trier of fact could differ as to whether defendant's conduct was outrageous and intolerable. Defendant had read an article about the transmission of HIV by a dentist in Florida and was genuinely concerned about the well-being of plaintiff's patients. Tolman v. Doe, 988 F.Supp. 582, 587.

E.D.Va.1995. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Employees, who were of Hispanic origin, brought an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, against their employer, which had instituted a policy requiring them to speak only English at the work place. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held that, under Virginia law, defendant's English-only policy was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support plaintiffs' claim; the policy was implemented in response to a perceived need, and plaintiffs, who were bilingual, could continue speaking to each other in English for the duration of the prohibition. Long v. First Union Corp. of Virginia, 894 F.Supp. 933, 945, judgment affirmed 86 F.3d 1151 (4th Cir.1996).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

E.D.Va.1991. Com. (d) quot. in ftn. Former employees brought sex discrimination claims as well as various state law claims against their former employer. The court dismissed the pendent state claims based on lack of jurisdiction and the court's discretion. The court dismissed, inter alia, the claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress to be pursued, if at all, in state court. Otherwise, based on the divergent theories of relief between a claim for sex discrimination under Title VII and the state claims, the court said that the pendent claims might predominate the lawsuit. Nicol v. Imagematrix, Inc., 767 F.Supp. 744, 749.

E.D.Va.Bkrtcy.Ct.

E.D.Va.Bkrtcy.Ct.2003. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Judgment creditors filed complaint to determine dischargeability of debtor's debt to creditors. This court granted creditors' motion for summary judgment for declaration that state court's judgment was not discharged pursuant to § 523(a)(6) of the Bankruptcy Code. The court determined that there was sufficient evidence that debtor's actions were willful and malicious as defined by Bankruptcy Code, that parties or privies in original suit were same parties in this suit, that mutuality existed, that factual issues contained in prior order were actually litigated, and that factual issues were essential to prior judgment. The court noted that, in order to prevail in their claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress in state court, creditors would have shown that debtor's conduct was extreme and outrageous. In re Bundick, 303 B.R. 90, 112.

W.D.Va.

W.D.Va.2015. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee of cleaning business brought claims for assault and battery, wrongful discharge, and intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against business and its owner/sole officer in connection with allegations that owner sexually harassed her. This court denied defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiff's IIED claim, holding that plaintiff's allegations—that owner solicited sexual favors from plaintiff, offered her money for sexual acts, engaged in repeated and unwanted physical contact with plaintiff, and wrote her a series of notes affirming his advances and solicitations—were sufficient to state such a claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court noted that the Fourth Circuit had acknowledged that, under some circumstances, sexual harassment could give rise to an IIED claim, and that plaintiff's allegations described a pervasive course of sexual harassment by owner that a jury could find was sufficiently egregious to establish liability. Faulkner v. Dillon, 92 F.Supp.3d 493, 501.

W.D.Va.1997. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. A store clerk sued her employer and supervisors for sexual harassment, hostile work environment, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. Plaintiff alleged that she was repeatedly the recipient of unwelcome physical touching by the supervisors, that one supervisor sexually stimulated himself by the pornographic magazine rack and forced plaintiff to clean up the mess, and that defendants made inappropriate comments about plaintiff's physical appearance. This court, among other dispositions, denied defendants' motions for summary judgment on the emotional-distress claim. The court held, inter alia, that fact issues existed as to whether the supervisors' conduct constituted extreme and outrageous behavior. A reasonable jury could find that defendants' conduct constituted a campaign of sustained cruelty and harassment, and the employer could be found liable for the supervisors' conduct under the doctrine of respondeat superior. The court also determined that a fact issue existed regarding a connection between defendants' behavior and plaintiff's distress. Young v. Sheetz, Inc., 987 F.Supp. 496, 504.

W.D.Va.1990. Com. (d) quot. in sup. A railroad employee sued his employer under the Federal Employers' Liability Act (FELA), alleging that he was publicly harassed on the job and that this alleged harassment constituted intentional infliction of emotional distress. The defendant moved to dismiss the plaintiff's claim for failure to state a claim for which relief may be granted or, in the alternative, for summary judgment. The court granted the defendant's motion to dismiss on the ground, inter alia, that the plaintiff's allegations did not rise to the level of outrageousness required by Virginia law. Simmons v. Norfolk & Western Ry. Co., 734 F.Supp. 230, 232.

W.D.Va.1989. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. A former employee sued her employer for sex discrimination and negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted in part and denied in part the defendant's motion to dismiss, holding that the defendant's announcement at a personnel meeting of the plaintiff's demotion and replacement did not constitute outrageous and extreme conduct sufficient to maintain an action for negligent or intentional infliction of emotional distress under the Federal Employers' Liability Act. Harris v. Norfolk and Western Ry. Co., 720 F.Supp. 567, 568.

W.D.Va.1989. Com. (d) cit. but dist. (Erron. cit. as § 46d.) An employee of her employer's wholly-owned subsidiary was terminated following a divestiture of the employer's stock in the subsidiary company. The former employee sued the employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress arising from her discharge. The employer's motion for summary judgment as to the intentional infliction of emotional distress claim was granted by this court. The court held that the employer's conduct did not approach the required extreme and outrageous conduct because the requirements of ERISA precluded the employee from continuing to work for the subsidiary company while being on the employer's payroll, and only when the employee failed to respond to the employer's offer of continuing her employment as a subsidiary company employee did the employer terminate her. It also noted that the employee's emotional distress claim would have been barred by the exclusivity provision of the state workers' compensation statute. Owens v. Ashland Oil, Inc., 708 F.Supp. 757, 760.

W.D.Va.1986. Cit. in disc., quot. in disc., quot. in case quot. in disc., caveat and com. (c) quot. in disc. Two parents sued a doctor for intentional infliction of emotional distress and medical malpractice arising out of severe injuries suffered by their daughter during the birth process. In a decision for the plaintiffs, this court held that the father could recover for intentional infliction of emotional distress despite the fact that he was not present at the time of the injury. The court stated that a jury verdict for the father could be sustained because of the developing nature of the tort, that limits were put on the tort to ensure that claims were genuine, and that if a jury was convinced that the claim was genuine, the jury should be permitted to find for the claimant. Boyd v. Bulala, 647 F.Supp. 781, 791, remanded in part 905 F.2d 764 (4th Cir.1990).

W.D.Va.1986. Com. (h) quot. in case quot. in disc. An employee sued his employer and a security company for statutory libel and slander, emotional distress, and tortious interference with an economic opportunity and/or contractual relations, alleging that the defendants acted together to fire the plaintiff from his job and to deny him the opportunity to obtain unemployment benefits. After the case was transferred from the bankruptcy court due to its lack of subject matter jurisdiction, this court dismissed the libel and slander claims, but denied the defendants' motions to dismiss the remaining claims. The court held that the plaintiff had successfully stated a cause of action for tortious interference even though he was an at-will employee, because the plaintiff was seeking damages not for the act of firing but for the employer's alleged intentional interference, by way of false statements made by the security company, with the plaintiff's right to collect unemployment benefits. The court further held that it was for a jury to determine whether the defendants' conduct in allegedly preventing the plaintiff from obtaining the unemployment benefits was sufficiently outrageous to support an emotional distress claim. Welch v. Kennedy Piggly Wiggly Stores, Inc., 63 B.R. 888, 895.

W.D.Va.1984. Com. (h) quot. in disc. Plaintiff sued automobile manufacturer for breach of warranties and included a claim alleging damages for severe emotional distress. Defendant moved to dismiss the emotional distress claim, arguing that under Virginia law no cause of action for emotional distress exists in a breach of warranty action unless actual bodily injury results. The court granted defendant's motion to dismiss. Noting that Virginia follows the Restatement standard for emotional distress in torts cases, the court concluded that the state would also follow the Restatement rule that damages for emotional distress are excluded in breach of warranty actions except in cases where there is bodily impact or where serious emotional distress is a likely consequence of a breach of contract, such as in contracts for burial services. Wise v. General Motors Corp., 588 F.Supp. 1207, 1209.

W.D.Va.1983. Com. (d) quot. in part in sup. Insureds brought actions seeking compensatory and punitive damages from an insurer for the insurer's refusal to pay insurance benefits. The plaintiffs alleged that the insurer issued the insurance policy with no intention or performing or interpreting promises therein in good faith. They further alleged that the insurer's refusal to pay the benefits due under the policy was willful and malicious and done with bad faith and reckless disregard for the insureds' rights, and that as a result, the insureds suffered mental and emotional distress. The insurer moved to dismiss. The court responded that damages for emotional distress were generally not recoverable in Virginia unless they resulted directly from tortiously caused physical injury. Virginia recognized the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress as an exception to this general rule, however. According to the court, Virginia also followed the rule that punitive damages were not reasonable for breach of contract unless the conduct constituting the breach amounted to criminal indifference or an independent willful tort, due to malicious, wanton or oppressive behavior by the breaching party. The court stated that the relevant inquiry was whether the allegations in the complaints were sufficient to state a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Virginia law. The court questioned whether the insurer's alleged bad faith failure to pay insurance benefits, without more, would be sufficient to show the extreme and outrageous conduct required to prevail under this theory, but found that the allegations of bad faith and malice suggested that facts could be proven which would justify recovery for emotional distress. The court noted that even if the emotional distress claim were not sufficiently supported by the plaintiffs' allegations, this count could be construed to state a claim for the tort of a bad faith failure by an insurer to pay an insured's claim. Although it had not been decided whether Virginia recognized such a cause of action, the court found the rationale that every contract imposes a duty of good faith upon each party persuasive. Thus the court found that the possibility of such a cause of action being recognized in Virginia further supported its holding not to dismiss the count above. The defendant's motions to dismiss were denied. Morgan v. American Fam. Life Assur. Co. of Columbus, 559 F.Supp. 477, 482.

D.V.I.

D.V.I.2014. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup. and quot. in case quot. in sup.; com. (d) cit. in sup. and quot. in case quot. in sup.; com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former union employees of contractor that provided services at a refinery, who were arrested for stealing an air-conditioning unit from the refinery, brought claims for intentional or negligent infliction of emotional distress against refinery's owner, after the charges against them were dropped, alleging, among other things, that defendant's employees made false statements implicating them in the theft to police, contractor, union, and a local newspaper. This court granted summary judgment for defendant, holding that plaintiffs had not shown the requisite harm necessary to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. While plaintiffs reported that, as a result of defendant's actions, they continued to experience regular headaches, sleeplessness, stress, anxiety, backaches, or stomachaches, such symptoms could not properly be characterized as so severe that no reasonable person could be expected to endure them. Illaraza v. HOVENSA LLC, 73 F.Supp.3d 588, 614.

D.V.I.2002. Cit. in sup., cit. generally in ftn., subsec. (1) quot. in sup. Former employee sued employer for, in part, wrongful discharge and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The territorial court struck the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding plaintiff $50,000 for lost wages. Affirming in part, this court held, inter alia, that supervisor's act of hitting plaintiff on the leg with his cane and subsequently firing him did not rise to the level of outrageous conduct necessary to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Thomas Hyll Funeral Home, Inc. v. Bradford, 233 F.Supp.2d 704, 714.

D.V.I.1999. Subsec. (1) and coms. (d) and (h) quot. in disc. Hotel manager sued hotel and its minority shareholder for wrongful termination, breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting in part and denying in part defendants' motions for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that the Virgin Islands

Wrongful Discharge Act was preempted by § 7 of the National Labor Relations Act and that, even if the doctrine of preemption were inapplicable, plaintiff had failed to establish an exception to the general rule of at-will employment; that a reasonable juror could conclude that defendants created such an unpleasant work environment that their actions amounted to a breach of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing; and that defendants' conduct could not be considered extreme or outrageous. Claytor v. Chenay Bay Beach Resort, 79 F.Supp.2d 577, 583, 584.

D.V.I.1999. Cit. in headnotes, cit. and quot. in disc., cit. in ftn. Former government employee sued a union for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that the union failed to represent employee properly in her attempt to obtain the correct classification and corresponding higher salary. This court dismissed the emotional-distress claim, holding, inter alia, that the union's failure to pursue a remedy for plaintiff did not constitute outrageous conduct. Seafarers Intern. Union of North America v. Thomas, 42 F.Supp.2d 547, 549, 557.

D.V.I.1998. Quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. Individual who was assaulted by employee of port authority sued port authority for negligent hiring or retention and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiff also alleged that defendant was vicariously liable for employee's actions. Entering partial summary judgment for defendant, the court held that material factual issues existed as to whether defendant retained employee with knowledge of employee's habit of misconducting himself; that defendant's conduct in hiring and retaining employee was not extreme and outrageous, such that plaintiff could maintain an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress; and that defendant was not vicariously liable for the assault. Chase v. Virgin Islands Port Authority, 3 F.Supp.2d 641, 643.

D.V.I.1997. Quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. Electric-company employee who was severely injured when he tried to change a switch that was energized with over 14,000 volts of electricity sued his employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that his supervisor threatened him with disciplinary action if he refused to do the work. Defendant moved to dismiss the complaint on a variety of grounds. Granting the motion in part and denying it in part, the court held, among other things, that the facts alleged were sufficient to show that supervisor recklessly caused plaintiff to suffer severe emotional distress, and that defendant could be found liable for supervisor's actions if it was determined that supervisor was defendant's alter ego. Eddy v. Virgin Islands Water and Power Authority, 955 F.Supp. 468, 478.

D.V.I.1997. Cit. in headnote, cit. generally in ftn., subsec. (1), com. (d) cit. in disc. In action brought pursuant to the Federal Tort Claims Act and the Virgin Islands Tort Claims Act, firearms licensees sued United States federal officers, the government of the Virgin Islands, and Virgin Islands officers for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress and defamation in connection with a narcotics search of their home and the initial denial of their license renewal. Entering summary judgment for defendants, the court held, in part, that, under the FTCA, federal defendants were immune from suit for common law torts; that Virgin Islands defendants, having acted reasonably and reasonably relied on a warrant in executing the search, were entitled to qualified immunity; and, moreover, that plaintiffs had failed to state a claim upon which relief could be granted under theories of defamation or intentional infliction of emotional distress. Intern. Islamic Com. of Masjid Baytulkhaliq v. U.S., 981 F.Supp. 352, 357, 369-370.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

D.V.I.1997. Cit. in headnote, quot. in sup. A former employee of a company sued the company and its sole owner and operator for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting defendants' motion to dismiss, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, since defendant owner's alleged statements concerning plaintiff's poor job performance and misconduct did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous behavior necessary to support plaintiff's claim. Manns v. The Leather Shop Inc., 960 F.Supp. 925, 926, 927, 930, 931.

D.V.I.1996. Cit. in headnotes and quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc., com. (k) cit. in headnote and disc. Port Authority employee sued the authority and her supervisor, alleging sexual harassment and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. This court, among other dispositions, held that plaintiff could seek compensatory and punitive damages from the supervisor for intentional infliction of emotional distress, but not from the authority. The court stated that an employer cannot be held liable for the tort of a person who intentionally injures an employee when that person is merely a supervisor or manager and not the employer in person or a person who is realistically the corporation's alter ego. However, the supervisor's alleged behavior of attempted rape, unwanted touching, kissing, and sexual propositions was outrageous enough to support an emotional-distress claim. Codrington v. Virgin Islands Port Authority, 911 F.Supp. 907, 909, 910, 915, 918.

D.V.I.1994. Cit. in headnote and in sup., subsec. (1) quot. in sup., com. (d) cit. and quot. in sup. and cit. in ftn. Borrower brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, against lender that sought to collect on a note in connection with which lender had asserted default by borrower. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held that plaintiff's allegations that defendant improperly dishonored checks, damaged plaintiff's credit ratings, tortiously interfered with plaintiff's company's business relationship with a supplier, and improperly wrote off a car note did not describe conduct that rose to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct and plaintiff's symptoms of stress, sleeplessness, and hypertension did not reach the requisite level of severity. Pemberton Sales & Serv. v. Banco Popular de P.R., 877 F.Supp. 961, 962, 967.

D.V.I.1991. Quot. in disc., com. (b) cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. A dissatisfied home buyer sued in tort, inter alia, the seller's broker and the seller on a theory that the seller was liable for his broker's acts, contending that the broker misrepresented the location of an easement on the property and made various other misrepresentations causing her physical and emotional harm. The court granted the defendants summary judgment, holding that the plaintiff had not made a viable claim for intentional or reckless infliction of emotional distress. The court noted that it had no reason to believe that the alleged misrepresentations, if any occurred, were not completely innocent. Moreover, regarding the plaintiff's claim that the defendants' misrepresentations resulted in physical illness, the court said that misrepresentations concerning the condition, boundaries, and encumbrances of a piece of real property were not the sort that ordinarily involved an unreasonable risk of bodily harm, nor had the plaintiff presented evidence that the defendants knew or should have known that she was unusually sensitive to emotionally induced physical illness. Lempert v. Singer, 766 F.Supp. 1356, 1367.

D.V.I.1985. Subsec. (1) cit. in disc. and quot. in ftn. A 15-year at-will bank employee was terminated as branch manager after the bank refused to comply with her demands for improvements to the branch office. The employee sued the bank for breach of contract and of good faith and fair dealing, unfair labor practices, and infliction of severe emotional distress. The district court held that the plaintiff had a cause of action under contract theory for breach of an implied obligation of good faith and fair dealing. However, the court dismissed the claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that the bank's refusal to comply with the employee's demands for branch improvements, and the requirements that she work late hours without remuneration, walk to other banks with large sums of money, and use her personal car to pick up computer prints did not constitute conduct so extreme and outrageous as to permit recovery under this theory. Petersen v. First Federal Sav. & Loan Ass'n of P.R., 617 F.Supp. 1039, 1042.

D.V.I.1983. Subsec. (1) quot. in disc., com. (d) cit. in disc. A woman who claimed to have been wrongfully arrested in connection with a bank robbery brought an action for damages against various law enforcement officials and the governments of the Virgin Islands and the United States. The plaintiff alleged, inter alia, the torts of intentional infliction of emotional distress, abuse of process, and malicious prosecution. Motions for dismissal were granted on the grounds that, since the arrest was valid, the conduct of the officials was not outrageous and thus did not establish an action for emotional distress; that since there was probable cause for the plaintiff's arrest, the defendants' decision not to release the plaintiff immediately after questioning did not constitute abuse of process; and that, again because probable cause existed, there was insufficient basis for a claim of malicious prosecution. Deary v. Evans, 570 F.Supp. 189, 200.

D.V.I.1977. Cit. in op. but not fol. In an action claiming damages due to defendant's outrageous conduct causing emotional distress to plaintiff, defendant moved to dismiss on the ground that the conduct alleged was not of such an outrageous character as to constitute the tort. In denying the motion, the court held that the parties should be allowed to proceed to trial and present the irrespective evidence before its determination of the nature of defendant's conduct. Sullivan v. de-Coligny, 432 F.Supp. 689, 690.

D.V.I.1977. Cit. in op. but not fol. In an action claiming damages due to defendant's outrageous conduct causing emotional distress to plaintiff, defendant moved to dismiss on the ground that the conduct alleged was not of such an outrageous character as to constitute the tort. In denying the motion, the court held that the parties should be allowed to proceed to trial and present their respective evidence before its determination of the nature of defendant's conduct. Sullivan v. de-Coligny, 432 F.Supp. 689, 690.

D.V.I.1970. Quot. but not fol. A wife brought an action against her husband based on Sec. 46 of the Restatement for "fraud and wilful hurt." The court dismissed the complaint, holding that it was barred by interspousal disability and declaring that change from such an outmoded rule must come from the legislature. Paiewonsky v. Paiewonsky, 315 F.Supp. 752, 753, aff'd 446 F.2d 178 (3d Cir.1971).

E.D.Wash.

E.D.Wash.2015. Com. (d) cit. in case cit. in sup. Terminated employee brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against former employer and supervisors, alleging, among other things, that supervisors forged her initials on a performance-improvement-plan form and then used that form to justify her termination. This court granted defendants' motion to dismiss, holding that, even if supervisors forged plaintiff's initials on the form with the intent to create a false basis for discharging her, such conduct was insufficient as a matter of law the rise to the level of being atrocious and utterly intolerable to a civilized community, as required to support a claim for IIED under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Richards v. Healthcare Resources Group, Inc., 131 F.Supp.3d 1063, 1074.

E.D.Wash.2012. Cit. in sup., com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. Former financial counselor at hospital brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against hospital, after she was terminated from her job. Granting defendant's motion to dismiss this claim, this court held that defendant's alleged conduct in discharging plaintiff from employment with discriminatory or retaliatory motive, and in leaving her diary writings open on top of her personal belongings when they were returned to her, was not sufficiently outrageous to state a claim for IIED under the high bar set for this tort by the Washington Supreme Court. Armijo v. Yakima HMA, LLC, 868 F.Supp.2d 1129, 1135, 1136.

E.D.Wash.1998. Cit. in disc. Former prisoners sued physician for, in part, violations of international law's prohibition of "crimes against humanity," alleging that they were subjected to nonconsensual medical experimentation involving radiation while they were prisoners in the custody of the State of Washington. Granting defendant's motion to dismiss the international-law cause of action for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction, the court declined to imply from the law of nations, as incorporated into the laws of the United States, the existence of a private right of action for the alleged violations of international law. The court stated that adequate domestic remedies existed for the alleged conduct underlying plaintiffs' "crimes against humanity" cause of action, including state-law causes of action for battery, assault, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. White v. Paulsen, 997 F.Supp. 1380, 1384.

E.D.Wash.1995. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. but dist. County district court administrator who was terminated after her position was eliminated sued county and her supervising judges for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendants' maintenance of a retaliatory and sexually harassing workplace environment constituted outrageous conduct. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held that plaintiff's direct supervisor's temper tantrums, rude and insulting comments, and greater tolerance for a coemployee's errors did not amount to atrocious or loathsome behavior that was intolerable in civilized society. Furthermore, plaintiff failed to prove severe emotional distress. Keenan v. Allan, 889 F.Supp. 1320, 1389.

W.D.Wash.

W.D.Wash.2022. Com. (j) cit. in case quot. in sup. Customer sued bank for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), after bank's manager and security guard allegedly accosted customer and customer's family in the bank's parking lot, falsely accused them of trespassing, refused to close customer's accounts, and made unauthorized transfers from those accounts. This court granted bank's motion to dismiss, holding that bank's alleged conduct was not sufficiently outrageous in character and extreme in degree to support a claim for IIED. The court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46 in explaining that the law intervened only where the distress inflicted was so severe that no reasonable person could be expected to endure it. Lemelson v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., 641 F.Supp.3d 1005, 1014.

W.D.Wash.2021. Illus. 2 cit. and quot. in sup. Former teacher brought, among other things, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against school district and principal, alleging that principal confronted him in a hostile and aggressive manner that implied she would terminate him for wearing a "Make America Great Again" hat to a professional development course. This court granted in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding that principal's conduct did not constitute extreme or outrageous conduct, which was necessary to support a claim for IIED. The court rejected plaintiff's comparison to Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Illustration 2, because, unlike in Illustration 2, the record did not indicate that principal used public intimidation or threatened violence against plaintiff or his property during the confrontation to subject plaintiff to duress. Dodge v. Evergreen School District, 513 F.Supp.3d 1286, 1301, 1302.

W.D.Wash.2020. Cit. in sup. After two police officers who were responding to a report of a domestic dispute shot and killed suspect while he was brandishing multiple knives, suspect's mother sued officers and others, alleging, among other things, claims for outrage under Washington law. This court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment on plaintiff's outrage claim, holding that no reasonable jury could find that officers' interactions with suspect or his family approached the high threshold required for a plaintiff to recover on a claim for outrage. The court noted that, under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, the conduct in question had to be so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious, and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Hernandez v. Federal Way, 456 F.Supp.3d 1228, 1248, 1249.

W.D.Wash.2019. Com. (h) quot. in case quot. in sup. After malnourished minor child was removed from his mother's home subject to dependency proceedings, parents of child brought, among other things, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against state department of social and health services, investigator, and social worker, alleging that plaintiffs suffered severe emotional distress as a result of defendants' mistakes and oversights during dependency proceedings that followed child's removal, including defendants' failure to ensure that child was doing well after placing him in foster care, which resulted in child regressing in development. This court granted in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding that plaintiffs' IIED claim failed as a matter of law, because plaintiffs did not demonstrate how defendants could have better performed their jobs such that a reasonable jury could find their actions were outrageous and extreme, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency. The court observed that, under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment h, whether or not severe emotional distress could be found based on the record was a matter of law for the court to decide, while the finder of fact determined whether or not distress actually existed. Chen v. D'Amico, 428 F.Supp.3d 483, 514.

W.D.Wash.2019. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Hospital patient brought, among other things, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against police officers, alleging that she suffered emotional distress after defendants photographed her bare body while she was lying unconscious in a hospital pursuant to a police investigation into an altercation involving her and her father. This court rejected and modified in part the recommendation of a magistrate judge and granted in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding that plaintiff failed to allege sufficient facts establishing her IIED claim. The court explained that plaintiff failed to demonstrate that she suffered severe emotional distress, as defined by Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment j, because the evidence she presented of her emotional distress—that she became upset during a deposition and requested a break during questioning about the content of the photographs—did not demonstrate the level of severe emotional distress necessary to sustain an IIED claim. Young v. Pena, 428 F.Supp.3d 474, 481.

W.D.Wash.2016. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. (quoting com. (g) of § 46 of Restatement of Torts, Supplement, which is now com. (d) of § 46 of Restatement Second of Torts). Public-school teachers and counselor filed, inter alia, a claim of the tort of outrage against school district and administrators, alleging that, in retaliation for plaintiffs' reports to the media and the district that a high school was providing preferential services to select students, manipulating graduation rates, and otherwise creating a second-tier education system for underachieving minorities, defendants initiated a false lawsuit against plaintiffs and publicized in the media false accusations of plaintiffs' lack of professionalism and criminal misconduct. This court denied defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiffs' outrage claim, holding that plaintiffs pleaded a plausible claim for relief. In evaluating the sufficiency of plaintiffs' claim, the court defined outrageous conduct as that which the recitation of the facts to an average member of the community would arouse his resentment against the actor and lead him to exclaim "outrageous," as set forth in Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Pete v. Tacoma School District No. 10, 198 F.Supp.3d 1206, 1217.

W.D.Wash.2012. Cit. in sup. Suspect who was stopped on suspicion of armed robbery but released brought federal civil-rights claims and state law tort claims against city and police officers who stopped him, alleging, among other things, that officers, who ordered him to the ground at gunpoint, verbally insulted him and forcefully stepped on his hand and right calf during the stop without justification. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment on plaintiff's claim of outrage, this court held that reasonable jurors could not conclude that officers' conduct was so unconscionable as to rise to the level of outrage. In addition, plaintiff failed to allege emotional distress beyond nightmares and general anxiety. Monetti v. City of Seattle, 875 F.Supp.2d 1221, 1231.

W.D.Wash.2011. Quot. in case quot. in sup. Six adult men who claimed that they were sexually abused as children by their scout leaders in connection with their participation in a scouting organization for boys brought various claims against organization, alleging that, long before the abuse, defendant knew that it had a problem with pedophiles and other sexual deviants infiltrating its ranks, but deliberately concealed its knowledge from police, scouts, scouts' parents, and the general public. Granting defendant's motion to dismiss with leave to amend, this court held that, absent allegations that defendant had some specific knowledge that plaintiffs might be in danger of sexual assault by their scout leaders, defendant's conduct in not warning plaintiffs of the existence and contents of its "ineligible volunteer" files, and in failing to take measures to protect plaintiffs from abuse, did not rise to the level of extreme, outrageous behavior required to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Washington law. Boy 1 v. Boy Scouts of America, 832 F.Supp.2d 1282, 1289.

W.D.Wash.2005. Cit. in disc. Individual who had been observed by police officers walking dangerously close to traffic and making peculiar gestures brought, inter alia, claim for intentional infliction emotional distress against defendant city and its police officer, arising from officer's use of excessive force in preventing her from going into her handbag after she voluntarily entered an ambulance taking her to a hospital for mental evaluation. The court granted summary judgment for defendants on this claim, holding that although there was some medical evidence regarding plaintiff's physical injuries, there was none showing that she experienced any mental suffering as a result of the officer's conduct so as to establish the severe emotional distress necessary to prove the tort of outrage under Washington law. Thomas v. City of Seattle, 395 F.Supp.2d 992, 1000.

W.D.Wash.1992. Cit. in case cit. in sup., com. (l) cit. generally but not fol. Father and fiancee of deceased driver sued corporation whose agent was driving the car that collided with driver's truck, killing driver and injuring his fiancee. Granting corporation's motion for partial summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that although fiancee was sitting next to the deceased when he was killed, was a friend and lover of the deceased for two and one-half years, and had lived with the deceased for nearly one year, she was not entitled to recover for the tort of outrage or negligent infliction of emotional distress under Washington law since she was not a closely related or immediate family member as set forth in the state's wrongful death statute. Lindsey v. Visitec, Inc., 804 F.Supp. 1340, 1344.

N.D.W.Va.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

N.D.W.Va.2016. Cit. in case quot. in sup.; com. (j) cit. in case quot. in sup. Special-education student who suffered from attention deficit/hyperactivity disorder, impulse-control disorder, bipolar disorder, mild mental retardation, mild hearing loss, and asthma brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against teacher following an incident in which teacher, in response to a comment student made to or about a classmate, grabbed student by the neck, choked him, pushed him into a bookcase, and forbade him from leaving the classroom. This court denied teacher's motion to dismiss student's IIED claim, holding that student sufficiently pleaded facts that gave rise to an inference that teacher engaged in outrageous conduct that was inflicted intentionally or with reckless disregard for the likelihood that emotional distress would result. The court reasoned, in part, that, under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, extreme or outrageous character of conduct could arise from the actor's knowledge that the other was particularly susceptible to emotional distress, by reason of some mental condition. Conklin v. Jefferson County Board of Education, 205 F.Supp.3d 797, 817.

N.D.W.Va.2014. Com. (d) quot. in sup. After mechanic was injured by an exploding truck tire at work, mechanic and his parents sued, among others, two owners of the trucking business that employed mechanic, alleging, among other things, that defendants committed the tort of outrage by attempting to contact mechanic in order to dissuade him from bringing suit even after parents directed them not to. This court granted summary judgment for defendants, holding that their conduct was not "outrageous" under the definition of such conduct set forth in Restatement Second of Torts § 46 and West Virginia law. The court reasoned that the undisputed evidence demonstrated that most of plaintiffs' allegations were unsubstantiated; although one owner went to the hospital to visit mechanic before plaintiffs' counsel sent defendants a cease-and-desist letter, and a hospital employee visited mechanic's room at the request of the other owner's wife, those actions could not reasonably be called "outrageous," given the first owner's undisputed care for mechanic and the lack of a connection between the actions of defendants and the second owner's wife. Long v. M & M Transp., LLC, 44 F.Supp.3d 636, 649.

N.D.W.Va.2013. Cit. in sup. and ftn., subsec. (1) cit. in case cit. in sup., com. (d) cit. and quot. in sup. (erron. cit. as § 46(1), com. (d)), com. (e) quot. in sup. Member-managers of housing-rental company brought an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, against various city employees, alleging, among other things, that defendants abused their official power and acted deliberately, with a shared intent to deprive plaintiffs of a rental property and drive company to bankruptcy, through actions such as issuing stop-work orders during construction, condemning the property, and giving plaintiffs inadequate time to address purported code violations. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment, this court held that none of the alleged conduct rose to the requisite level of outrageousness for an IIED claim under West Virginia law, nor had plaintiffs provided a scintilla of proof that the series of enforcement actions about which they complained were part of a deliberate campaign by defendants to ruin them. Warner v. Boroff, 921 F.Supp.2d 513, 521-527.

N.D.W.Va.1989. Quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Employees accepted promotions from union positions to nonunion management positions after the company made representations that each employee could return to the union position if the employee desired and that layoffs would be based on date of hire seniority. After various layoffs based upon management seniority date, the plaintiffs sued the company claiming breach of contract, fraud, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting summary judgment for the defendant in part, this court held, inter alia, that: 1) all contract and tort claims relating to return to union positions, which were covered by a collective bargaining agreement, were preempted by federal law; 2) the company was not liable for constructive fraud because it did not owe a duty of disclosure to the employees of the parameters of the right to return; and 3) the company's actions were not so outrageous as to constitute infliction of emotional distress. The court stated that there was no evidence of malice, or even of a deliberate attempt to mislead the plaintiffs into accepting the promotions from which they were later laid off. White v. National Steel Corp., 742 F.Supp. 312, 342, affirmed in part reversed in part 938 F.2d 474 (4th Cir.1991), certiorari denied 502 U.S. 974, 112 S.Ct. 454, 116 L.Ed.2d 471 (1991).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

N.D.W.Va.1983. Com. (j) quot. in ftn. An insured brought an action against his insurer alleging various causes of action arising out of the placement by an employee in the insurer's claim file of a memorandum stating that the insured was “heavily involved in the Mafia.” The district court entered judgment in favor of the insured on the Unfair Trade Practices Act cause of action, the insurer moved for a new trial, for judgment notwithstanding the verdict and for remittitur. The district court denied the insurer's motions, holding that the memorandum was not protected by the First Amendment, and a private cause of action existed under sections of the West Virginia Unfair Trade Practice Ace which made it unlawful for an insurance company to knowingly place false information in an insured's file. Testimony unequivocally demonstrated that two employees responsible for production of the memorandum placed in the file had no basis whatsoever for stating that the insured was connected in any way with the Mafia, thereby supporting judgment in favor of the insured under the Unfair Trade Practices Act. The plaintiff was properly awarded compensatory damages for actual damages suffered. The plaintiff's uncontradicted testimony established the anguish, embarrassment, shame, anger, and depression which she suffered as a result of the insurer's conduct. Recovery for emotional distress unaccompanied by physical injury was proper in cases involving an intentional tort. Mutafis v. Erie Ins. Exchange, 561 F.Supp. 192, 203.

S.D.W.Va.

S.D.W.Va.2016. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup. Arrestee whose girlfriend called 911 to report domestic violence filed, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against town police officer that responded to the call, alleging that, even though plaintiff did not resist, defendant kicked him, knocked his legs out from under him, and continued to kick and stomp on him while he was on the ground. This court denied in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding that plaintiff pleaded sufficient facts to give rise to an IIED claim. The court noted that, in West Virginia, the IIED tort followed Restatement Second of Torts § 46, and concluded that, here, a reasonable jury could find that defendant's alleged conduct was outrageous. Honaker v. Town of Sophia, 184 F.Supp.3d 319, 327.

S.D.W.Va.2015. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in sup.; com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Arrestee who pleaded guilty to two misdemeanor drug offenses filed, inter alia, a claim for the tort of outrage against county prosecutor in plaintiff's criminal case and lawyer that represented plaintiff in his criminal case and an unrelated civil case, alleging, among other things, that prosecutor threatened him and lawyer failed to obtain his release from home confinement after he had served his sentence and convinced him to settle the civil case. This court granted in part defendants' motion to dismiss, holding that plaintiff failed to state a claim for intentional or reckless infliction of emotional distress. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, the court explained that plaintiff's complaint contained only legal conclusions and he failed to provide sufficient allegations to support the assertion that defendants' conduct was outrageous. Conley v. Ryan, 92 F.Supp.3d 502, 517.

S.D.W.Va.2015. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in sup. After arrestee's conviction for obstructing a police officer was overturned, arrestee brought a claim for outrage against arresting officers. This court denied in part officers' motion for summary judgment, holding that arrestee stated a claim for outrage predicated on officers' conduct leading up to and during his arrest, reasoning that arrestee alleged that one officer needlessly used an electroshock weapon on him, and that a number federal courts had held that the unnecessary use of such a weapon by law-enforcement officers could be the basis for a state-law claim for outrage or intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court noted that, under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, to qualify as legally outrageous, a defendant's conduct had to truly offend community notions of acceptable conduct; liability did not extend to mere insults, indignities, threats, annoyances, petty oppressions, or other trivialities. Weigle v. Pifer, 139 F.Supp.3d 760, 777.

S.D.W.Va.2014. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Consumer brought, inter alia, a state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against law firm that engaged in debt collection, alleging that, although he notified defendant that he was represented by an attorney, defendant made numerous telephone calls to plaintiff's residence in an attempt to collect certain debts. This court granted summary judgment for defendant, holding that plaintiff failed to prove that defendant's conduct was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to maintain a claim for IIED. The court concluded that 27 unanswered phone calls over the course of eight months at regular hours of the day could not be regarded as atrocious or utterly intolerable in a civilized community, pursuant to Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d. Bourne v. Mapother & Mapother, P.S.C., 998 F.Supp.2d 495, 507.

S.D.W.Va.2014. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Female employee brought, inter alia, a state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against employer, alleging that employer was liable for certain sexual comments made by her male supervisor. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, this court held that the supervisor's alleged conduct in making a comment about plaintiff's breasts in front of plaintiff and several coworkers, in asking another coworker how he should respond to a text from another female coworker, and in discussing another female coworker's one-night stand could not reasonably be considered so extreme and outrageous as to constitute intentional or reckless infliction of emotional distress under West Virginia law. The court cited Restatement Second of Torts, Comment d, for the proposition that liability clearly did not extend to mere insults, indignities, threats, annoyances, petty oppressions, or other trivialities. Penn v. Citizens Telecom Services Co., LLC, 999 F.Supp.2d 888, 905.

S.D.W.Va.2010. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (e) cit. in case quot. in sup. Detainee brought, inter alia, a state-law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against state-police superintendent and officers, alleging that, during the execution by officers of a warrant to search her home, two officers discovered her naked in the shower, and one of them grabbed her by the hair and forcibly removed her to the living room, where she was compelled to kneel or lie naked on the floor in the presence of 11 men for 30 to 45 minutes while one or more officers made demeaning comments to her and touched her buttocks before she was provided with a towel or blanket to cover herself. Denying defendants' motion for summary judgment as to plaintiff's IIED claim, this court held that plaintiff's allegations, as well as defendants' obvious power and authority over plaintiff, created a triable issue as to the outrageousness of defendants' conduct. Hutchinson v. West Virginia State Police, 731 F.Supp.2d 521, 549, 550.

S.D.W.Va.2009. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Beneficiaries of life-insurance policy sued insurer after it refused to pay their claim for benefits upon the death of policyholder/son. This court, while ruling that defendant was estopped from raising, as grounds for rescission of the policy, certain questions and answers in the policy application concerning son's prior health history, granted defendant's motion for summary judgment on plaintiffs' claim for the tort of outrage under West Virginia law. The court held that an insurance company's denial of a $50,000 claim for life-insurance benefits, without more, did not constitute intentional or reckless conduct that was sufficiently outrageous to sustain such a claim. White v. American General Life Ins. Co., 651 F.Supp.2d 530, 549.

S.D.W.Va.2003. Com. (g) quot. generally in case quot. in disc. After hotel employee, who suffered from coronary artery disease and was fired due to absenteeism, became depressed and died due to inability to pay for health insurance and medication, employee's daughter sued hotel corporation for violating collective-bargaining agreement and for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. This court granted in part plaintiff's motion to amend complaint, holding, inter alia, that her claims for outrage and intentional infliction of emotional distress were not preempted by § 301 of Labor Management Relations Act, since plaintiff did not base the claims on defendant's failure to abide by terms of collective-bargaining agreement, but instead on age and disability discrimination in violation of West Virginia Human Rights Act. Harless v. CSX Hotels, Inc., 265 F.Supp.2d 640, 652.

S.D.W.Va.2002. Com. (j) cit. in case cit. in sup. After political organization mailed a pamphlet containing a picture of a rival candidate and his neighbor alongside a headline stating that candidate as an attorney had represented sex offenders, neighbor sued organization for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Denying defendant's motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that a genuine issue of material fact existed as to the intensity of plaintiff's emotional distress caused by the pamphlet's implication that he was a sex offender. Bell v. National Republican Congressional Committee, 187 F.Supp.2d 605, 618.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

S.D.W.Va.2000. Quot. in case quot. in disc. Former employees who believed that their termination was based on age, race, and disability sued employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Granting defendant's motion to dismiss on this point, the court held, in part, that even if plaintiffs were wrongfully discharged, they had failed to show that defendant's conduct in effecting the discharge was extreme or outrageous. Hoops v. Elk Run Coal Co., Inc., 95 F.Supp.2d 612, 620.

S.D.W.Va.1998. Quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in disc. Television-station account executive sued former employer for, inter alia, breach of contract and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Entering summary judgment for defendant, the court held, in part, that the parties' oral employment agreement based on plaintiff's promise to violate the confidentiality provision of his employment contract with another television station was unenforceable on public policy grounds, and that defendant's actions in teasing plaintiff about his speech impediment and his failure to meet budgetary requirements did not constitute conduct sufficiently extreme and outrageous as to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Burgess v. Gateway Communications, Inc., 26 F.Supp.2d 888, 893-894.

S.D.W.Va.1996. Quot. in case cit. in disc., cit. in ftn., coms. and illus. cit. generally in sup. and in cases quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in sup. and in ftn., com. (j) quot. in ftn. and cit. and quot. in cases quot. in disc., illus. 1 and 2 cit. in ftn. Plaintiffs, who were exposed to a cloud of toxic substances when a fire broke out at a chemical plant, brought a class action against the plant's owner, seeking, in part, to recover damages for emotional distress. Denying in part defendant's motion to dismiss, the court held, inter alia, that plaintiffs' allegation that defendant acted consciously in not doing certain types of maintenance that a reasonable person would do who was primarily concerned with safety rather than simply greedy for profits asserted outrageous conduct and was minimally sufficient to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. McClenathan v. Rhone-Poulenc, Inc., 926 F.Supp. 1272, 1277, 1279.

