S.D.W.Va.1995. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (h) quot. in sup. Correctional officer at a county jail brought, in part, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against police officers, arising from their investigation of charges against plaintiff of assisting in the escape of prisoners from the jail and of transporting contraband into the jail. Granting defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held, inter alia, that, as a matter of law, defendants' conduct in participating in the prosecution of plaintiff, if wrongful in any manner, was not so extreme as to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, where defendants' conduct did not rise to a level supporting either a § 1983 or a common law claim for malicious prosecution. Rhodes v. Smithers, 939 F.Supp. 1256, 1281, affirmed 91 F.3d 132 (4th Cir.1996).

S.D.W.Va.1994. Cit. in headnote, cit. in sup., coms. (d) and (g) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former husband sued his ex-wife, seeking damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress for allegedly preventing him from visiting the parties' children. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held that, under West Virginia law, defendant was not liable to plaintiff, despite the fact that defendant, after the parties' divorce, removed the children from West Virginia to Florida and obtained a court order requiring plaintiff to post $5,000 bond prior to taking the children for summer visits, after plaintiff had refused to return the children from a summer visitation. Settle v. Settle, 858 F.Supp. 610, 611, 613, 614.

S.D.W.Va.1990. Quot. in case quot. but dist., coms. (d) and (j) quot. but dist. Workers exposed to toxic chemicals at their employer's plants in Virginia and West Virginia sued their employer for damages alleging that they suffered emotional distress due to their increased risk of developing various diseases. Noting that West Virginia courts generally adhered to the principle of lex loci delicti in cases of physical injury, the district court applied Virginia law to the exposures that occurred in Virginia, and West Virginia law to those exposures occurring in West Virginia; it then determined that neither Virginia's nor West Virginia's workers' compensation statutes would bar plaintiffs from bringing a civil suit for damages from their occupational exposure to toxic chemicals. However, the court granted the employer's motion for summary judgment, holding that plaintiffs could not recover damages for emotional distress from mere exposure to toxic chemicals without evidence of a physical manifestation of injury, or evidence that the employer's intentional and outrageous conduct caused them severe emotional distress without physical injury. Ball v. Joy Mfg. Co., 755 F.Supp. 1344, 1369, affirmed 958 F.2d 36 (4th Cir.1991), cert. denied 502 U.S. 1033, 112 S.Ct. 276, 116 L.Ed.2d 780 (1992).

S.D.W.Va.1986. Com. (h) cit. in disc. An employee sued her former employer for slander, outrageous conduct, and breach of contract after she was accused of wrongdoing following a cash shortage discrepancy. Awarding the employer summary judgment, this court held that the facts were insufficient to support a theory of outrage because the defendant's conduct did not fall below generally accepted standards of decency and morality. McKinney v. K-Mart Corp., 649 F.Supp. 1217, 1220.

S.D.W.Va.1974. Cit. but not fol. In this diversity action a coal mine operator was sued for emotional and mental disturbance to the plaintiffs after flooding, due to dam failures, resulted in the deaths of the plaintiffs' decedents and damage to the plaintiffs' property, although the plaintiffs themselves were absent from the area at the time of the flooding. The trial court denied defendant's motion for partial summary judgment because material issues off act were found to exist as to whether the injuries were the result of intentional and wanton wrongful conduct of the defendant and also whether federal and state safety regulations were violated. Applying the substantive law of West Virginia, the court noted that the general rule of that state was similar to the Restatement in denying recovery for emotional and mental suffering alone, without physical injuries sustained by the party bringing the action. However the court followed cases allowing recovery for mental disturbance where no physical injury to the plaintiff was involved, so long as the defendant's conduct went beyond simple negligence, constituting rather an intentional or wanton wrongful act, as was alleged here. Prince v. Pittston Co., 63 F.R.D. 28, 33.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

W.D.Wis.

W.D.Wis.1994. Cit. in headnotes, cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup., com. (j) cit. in sup. An African-American woman with a § 8 voucher sued a landlord who rejected her rental application. After the jury awarded plaintiff compensatory damages for emotional distress and judgment was entered for plaintiff, the court granted defendant's postverdict motion for judgment as a matter of law with respect to the compensatory damages award, which was vacated. The court concluded that a denial of a lease to a § 8 beneficiary was unfortunate, unpleasant, and an undermining of the goals of the federal housing programs, but it was not an invidious act that in and of itself rose to the level of tortious infliction of emotional distress, since it could not be characterized as extreme and outrageous conduct causing a person of ordinary sensibilities to experience severe emotional distress. Knapp v. Smiljanic, 847 F.Supp. 1428, 1430, 1435, 1436, affirmed 54 F.3d 1272 (7th Cir.1995).

D.Wyo.

D.Wyo.1997. Cit. But dist., com. (a) cit. but dist. Farmer whose pinto bean crops were insured at 805 pounds per acre sued insurer for, inter alia, negligent misrepresentation, alleging that an assignment of proceeds form sent from insurer to farmer's creditor contained a 999-pound-per-acre guarantee. Farmer, whose crops were damaged but not destroyed in a hail storm, also asserted a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Insurer moved for summary judgment. Granting the motion, the court held, in part, that the claim for negligent misrepresentation failed because the assignment-of-proceeds form was not provided to farmer for his use, and because farmer did not rely on the information contained therein or suffer pecuniary loss as a result, and that insurer's conduct throughout its dealings with farmer was not sufficiently outrageous to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Meyer v. National Farmers Union Prop. and Cas. Co., 957 F.Supp. 1492, 1504, affirmed 162 F.3d 1264 (10th Cir.1998). See above case.

D.Wyo.1994. Cit. in case quot. in sup. Former railroad employee sued railroad, asserting various claims arising from alleged sexual harassment and hostile working conditions, including one for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Denying in part defendant's motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, the court held, inter alia, that, under Wyoming law, plaintiff had stated an emotional-distress claim by alleging that she was subjected to a hostile work environment that constantly degraded women, that she was required to work in an environment that included propositions for sexual favors, physical attack, verbal catcalls, and vulgarity as well as written comments of a sexual and perverted nature, and that she was subjected to pictures and sexual graffiti on defendant's facility walls, using plaintiff's name and suggesting her participation in lewd and lascivious acts. Bintner v. Burlington Northern, Inc., 857 F.Supp. 1484, 1492.

D.Wyo.1994. Cit. in case quot. in sup. Former employee sued employer under the Age Discrimination in Employment Act and asserted a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, arising from his discharge. Granting defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court held, in part, that plaintiff was not entitled to recovery for intentional infliction of emotional distress under a standard requiring proof of extreme and outrageous conduct causing severe emotional distress that no reasonable person could be expected to endure, where plaintiff alleged only that defendant caused him severe mental, physical, and emotional injuries and that plaintiff suffered a loss of reputation and was unable to find another job. Duart v. FMC Wyoming Corp., 859 F.Supp. 1447, 1464, judgment affirmed 72 F.3d 117 (10th Cir.1995).

D.Wyo.1993. Cit. in ftn., cit. in case quot. in sup. A discharged employee sued her former employer for outrage damages, among other claims. Denying the employer's motion to dismiss, this court held, inter alia, that as the allegations stated a claim under Wyoming law for intentional infliction of emotional distress, not retaliatory discharge, the claim was not preempted by the Mine Safety and Health Act. The court noted plaintiff's assertions that defendant's employees set about on a course to discredit her and make her life so miserable that she would terminate employment, and that the job environment was so stressful that her physician precluded her from going to work. Gustafson v. Bridger Coal Co., 834 F.Supp. 352, 354, 355.

Ala.

Ala.2023. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Father of children who were in foster care and employer of father who assisted in caring for the children sued social worker, alleging that defendant conspired with the owner of a drug-screening laboratory to falsify the results of a drug test taken by plaintiffs, such that plaintiffs' ability to see the children was restricted. The trial court granted defendant's motion to dismiss. This court reversed in part and remanded, holding that plaintiffs stated a claim for outrage under Alabama law because, under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, their allegations went beyond asserting that they suffered insults and indignities. The court explained that plaintiffs alleged that defendant maliciously colluded with the laboratory owner to smear them as drug addicts unfit to be around children, that this caused them severe emotional distress by stripping plaintiffs of their parental and caretaking rights, and that defendant damaged their reputation in the community. Avendano v. Shaw, 371 So.3d 278, 286.

Ala.2017. Com. (d) quot. in diss. op. Patient's daughter brought claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against doctors and hospital, alleging that doctors made callous remarks regarding patient's terminally-ill status. The trial court granted defendants' motion to dismiss. This court reversed and remanded, holding that the trial court erred by finding that IIED claims were recognized in only three situations. The dissent argued that, although the trial court had erred, plaintiff's claims failed as a matter of law, because doctors' remarks were mere insults and indignities as defined by Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, and did not constitute extreme or outrageous conduct necessary to establish an IIED claim. Wilson v. University of Alabama Health Services Foundation, P.C., 266 So.3d 674, 678.

Ala.2012. Com. (g) quot. in case quot. in sup. Widow of employee who died in a workplace accident brought a tort-of-outrage claim against decedent's employer and third-party administrator of employer's workers' compensation program, alleging that defendants unlawfully discontinued death-benefit payments to her with the intent to cause her severe emotional distress and force her to settle her claims against a third party. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict in favor of plaintiff. Vacating and dismissing, this court held, among other things, that the court in plaintiff's prior workers' compensation action against employer had exclusive jurisdiction over this action, because the issue in this action was whether employer's cessation of payments was lawful under an order issued in the prior action. The court cited the principle that an actor was never liable where he or she had done no more than to insist on his or her legal rights in a permissible way. Attenta, Inc. v. Calhoun, 97 So.3d 140, 147.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ala.2012. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Pastor emeritus of church sued lay member who was asked to organize church's financial records, alleging that defendant falsely accused him of misappropriating church funds. The trial court denied defendant's motion to dismiss. Granting defendant's petition for a writ of mandamus directing the trial court to grant the motion, this court held that the trial court lacked subject-matter jurisdiction over the action, because any legal inquiry by the court into the claims at issue would constitute an unconstitutional entanglement into matters of church governance in violation of the First Amendment's Establishment Clause and Free Exercise Clause. The court reasoned, in part, that plaintiff's claims for defamation, invasion of privacy, and intentional infliction of emotional distress were not limited to statements that defendant made after church issued its resolution removing plaintiff from the church, but were intertwined with church's investigation of plaintiff and its decision to remove plaintiff from the church. Ex parte Bole, 103 So.3d 40, 52.

Ala.2011. Com. (d) cit. and quot. in case quot. in sup. Black member of city council brought outrage claim against white city mayor in connection with a screaming match between the parties at city hall. The trial court granted defendant's motion to dismiss. Affirming, this court held that plaintiff's allegations that defendant referred to plaintiff's funeral during the confrontation, voted along racial lines in matters before the city council, and "regularly engaged in hate speech against African Americans," did not amount to conduct so outrageous in character and so extreme in degree as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency and to be regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized society. Little v. Robinson, 72 So.3d 1168, 1172, 1173.

Ala.2011. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in conc. op. Patient sued physician who allegedly provided him with prescriptions for addictive medicines in exchange for sex, claiming the tort of outrage, inter alia. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict in favor of patient. Affirming, this court held that patient's tort-of-outrage claim was properly supported by substantial evidence that physician's conduct toward patient began when patient was a minor, that it was intentional and for physician's sexual gratification, that it took place both within and outside the doctor-patient relationship, and that it caused patient severe distress and profoundly impaired his ability to live a normal life. The concurring opinion agreed that patient's outrage claim was viable, since the conduct alleged and supported by substantial evidence was so outrageous in character and so extreme in degree as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized society. O'Rear v. B.H., 69 So.3d 106, 124.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ala.2010. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former tenants of apartment complex sued landlord, entity that managed the complex, and others, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress and other claims, after defendants sent plaintiffs 10-day notices of the termination of their leases, and threatened certain plaintiffs that they would be arrested, that their personal property would be forcibly removed from their apartments, and/or that their credit would be ruined by the process of eviction. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. Affirming as to the dismissal of plaintiffs' emotional-distress claims, this court held that, while defendants' conduct may have made plaintiffs' lives more difficult—and, in some cases extremely difficult—the 10-day termination notice and the threats towards some plaintiffs that accompanied it did not constitute conduct so outrageous in character and so extreme in degree as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized society. Horne v. TGM Associates, L.P., 56 So.3d 615, 630.

Ala.2007. Com. (j) cit. in case quot. in sup. Former employee brought an action for breach of contract and outrage against former employer, after he was terminated as general counsel after more than 25 years of service in employer's legal department. The trial court, inter alia, granted judgment as a matter of law for defendant on plaintiff's outrage claim. This court affirmed as to that portion of the decision, holding that, while being discharged from his employment was certainly a personal crisis for plaintiff, a professional who had devoted his entire career to a company that decided it no longer needed his services, the circumstances of his discharge, including being asked to leave the premises immediately, not being able to say goodbye to his co-workers, and having his effects piled up in the hall outside his office, were not so shocking that they went beyond all bounds of decency. Carraway Methodist Health Systems v. Wise, 986 So.2d 387, 401.

Ala.2003. Com. (d) quot. generally in case quot. in sup. After stepfather sexually molested his stepdaughter's teenage friend during a sleepover, the friend's mother sued stepfather for assault and battery and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Trial court entered judgment on jury verdict for plaintiff. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff produced substantial evidence from which a jury could determine that her daughter suffered severe emotional distress as a result of defendant's conduct. Plaintiff's evidence included daughter's testimony that she had been traumatized by the event, daughter's poems expressing her feelings of fear and guilt after the assault, and plaintiff's own description of daughter's emotional and angry behavior after the assault. Harrelson v. R.J., 882 So.2d 317, 321-322, 322.

Ala.2001. Com. (d) cit. generally in case quot. in sup. Nurse sued doctor for assault and battery, negligence or wantonness, and the tort of outrage, after doctor used profanity during surgery and threw a surgical drape containing patient's blood and surgical refuse at nurse, which required her to undergo blood tests for HIV for one year. Trial court granted defendant partial summary judgment on the outrage claim. This court affirmed in part, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's allegations did not state conduct rising to level required to constitute tort of outrage. The mere fear of contracting a disease, without actual exposure to it, could not be sufficient to cause level of emotional distress necessary for this claim. Every blood test returned a negative result, and there was no evidence that plaintiff carried a communicable disease. Grantham v. Vanderzyl, 802 So.2d 1077, 1081.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ala.2001. Cit. in case quot. in disc., cit. in diss. op., com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. After employee settled his workers' compensation claim, he brought suit for, in part, outrageous conduct against employer, insurer, and claims administrator. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict against insurer and administrator on the outrage claim. Affirming, this court held that the evidence was sufficient to find that defendants' conduct was outrageous, since defendants acknowledged that they were contractually obligated to provide medical care to plaintiff, but they withheld reasonable and necessary items ordered by authorized treating physicians. The dissent argued that the evidence was insufficient to show that defendants' handling of plaintiff's insurance-benefit claims amounted to outrageous conduct. Travelers Indemnity Co. of Illinois v. Griner, 809 So.2d 808, 810, 816.

Ala.2000. Cit. generally in case quot. in disc. Hospital nurse sued hospital and its administrator for, inter alia, the tort of outrage, based upon their submission of a letter to the state board of nursing. Trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiff on her outrage claim. This court reversed, holding that the trial court erred in denying defendants' motion for judgment as a matter of law on the claim, because the evidence did not show the requisite level of outrageous conduct. The only evidence that plaintiff offered to show possible malice on the administrator's part was testimony by the hospital's business controller stating that the administrator never liked plaintiff. Potts v. Hayes, 771 So.2d 462, 465.

Ala.1997. Cit. in sup.; com. (d) cit. generally in headnote, quot. in sup., and cit. in case quot. in disc. A workers' compensation claimant sued a claims adjuster that had contracted with the claimant's employer's workers' compensation insurance carrier to handle ongoing medical-expense claims made by injured workers, asserting, in part, a claim for the tort of outrageous conduct. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant, and the court of appeals reversed as to the outrage claim. Reversing and remanding, this court held that claimant did not produce sufficient evidence to avoid summary judgment on his claim, since he failed to show that defendant's conduct in delaying payment of his medical bills was so extreme and outrageous as to constitute the tort of outrage. Ex parte Crawford & Co., 693 So.2d 458, 458, 460, 461, on remand 693 So.2d 462 (Ala.Civ.App.1997).

Ala.1997. Com. (d) cit. generally in headnote and quot. in case quot. in disc. An insurer issued life insurance policies to a woman, as beneficiary, on the lives of the woman's sister and her son. The woman's brother then killed the son, and the son's estate filed a wrongful-death action against the insurer. Nine months after the insurer learned that the woman had forged the signature of her sister and the son on the insurance policy applications, the insurer notified the sister that the policy was canceled. The sister then sued the insurer for the tort of outrage, alleging that the insurer issued policy to a beneficiary in violation of its own rules and that it acted in spite by allowing the policy to remain in effect for nine months. Trial court granted defendant summary judgment but the appellate court reversed. This court reversed and remanded, holding that defendant's conduct was not sufficiently outrageous to substantiate an outrage claim. While there was some delay in defendant's decision to cancel the policy, a delay that some might view as unreasonable, defendant's conduct did not go beyond the bounds of decency. Moreover, plaintiff failed to present substantial evidence that defendant's delay caused her to suffer extreme emotional distress. Ex Parte Mutual Sav. Life Ins. Co., 698 So.2d 772, 773, 774, on remand 698 So.2d 775 (Ala.Civ.App.1997).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ala.1995. Com. (g) quot. in case quot. in disc. Lumber company employee who was injured at work filed workers' compensation claim against employer and trial court granted employee permanent total disability benefits. Employer appealed and the administrator of employer's insurance plan discontinued making weekly workers' compensation payments. The appellate courts affirmed the disability finding. Employee then sued employer and insurer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that defendants were guilty of wrongful conduct by failing to continue making weekly workers' compensation payments during the time required for appellate review and had caused him to suffer economic loss and severe mental anguish. Insurer petitioned the state supreme court for a writ of mandamus directing trial court to dismiss. This court denied insurer's petition, holding that it was unable to determine whether insurer had a clear legal right to have employee's outrage claim against it dismissed. It noted that insurer may have been acting within its legal rights when, in reliance on a stay obtained by employer, it discontinued the benefits. Ex Parte Lumbermen's Underwriting Alliance, 662 So.2d 1133, 1136.

Ala.1994. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. Crane operator who injured his back while at work sued his employer's workers' compensation carrier, alleging that defendant's failure to provide him with vocational rehabilitation benefits constituted outrageous conduct. Affirming the trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendant, this court held that considering that defendant's medical evaluation of plaintiff revealed that he was unable to perform 68% of the jobs to which he would have had access but for his injury, a denial of the claimed benefits was not atrocious or intolerable. The court believed that the evidence supported defendant's refusal to provide the requested benefits. McAfee v. Shredders, Inc., 650 So.2d 871, 873.

Ala.1993. Cit. but dist., com. (g) quot. in sup. Insured husband and wife sued insurer for tort of outrage for delay in settling auto accident claim. The trial court entered judgment on verdict for insureds. Reversing and rendering judgment for defendant, this court held that delay was not extreme and outrageous, since insurer did no more than permissibly insist upon its legal rights where insurer was not required to pay insureds until other driver's coverage was exhausted and insurer was required to defend other driver against insureds' action. The court noted that even had insurer's conduct satisfied requirements of the tort, insureds produced no evidence that wife suffered emotional distress so severe that no reasonable person could be expected to endure it. State Farm Auto. Ins. Co. v. Morris, 612 So.2d 440, 444.

Ala.1993. Com. (d) quot. in part in case quot. in sup. An independent contractor's employee sued the project engineer for the owner of the building in which he worked, the independent contractor, and another contractor after being exposed to asbestos during a remodeling project in the building, alleging outrage, among other claims. Affirming summary judgment for the defendants, this court held, inter alia, that employee's generalized fear of contracting cancer from exposure to asbestos did not rise to the level of severe emotional distress necessary to support his claim of outrage, absent clinical evidence that he suffered some actual injury from the alleged exposure. It noted that, although owner may have failed to comply with certain regulations, there was evidence that owner's engineer personally warned independent contractor's project supervisor of the presence of asbestos in plaintiff's work area; therefore, engineer's conduct was not sufficiently reprehensible to support an outrage claim. Thomas v. BSE Indus. Contractors, Inc., 624 So.2d 1041, 1043-1044.

Ala.1992. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Injured employee sued workers' compensation carrier for outrageous conduct, inter alia, after disputes arose between them regarding the amount of his weekly average wage and defendant's refusal to authorize back surgery. Affirming the trial court's granting of defendant's motion for summary judgment, this court held that defendant's conduct, without proof of improper motive on defendant's part, was not so outrageous in character and so extreme in degree as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency and to be regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Gibbs v. Aetna Cas. & Sur. Co., 604 So.2d 414, 417.

Ala.1992. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. An employee who was served alcohol at his employer's holiday party was injured in an accident caused by his intoxication while driving home. Employee sued employer for negligence and intentional infliction of emotional distress, claiming that his condition was caused by employer's pressuring him to drink and serving him alcohol even after he was visibly drunk. The trial court granted defendant summary judgment. This court dismissed the appeal, in part, on other grounds and affirmed that plaintiff did not have a cause of action for emotional distress. It concluded that defendant's conduct was not so extreme as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, especially due to the fact that plaintiff voluntarily became intoxicated. Mohacsy v. Holiday Inns, Inc., 603 So.2d 956, 959.

Ala.1991. Cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. A worker was injured on the job when her hand was crushed between two steel doors. The worker sued the workers' compensation insurance carrier seeking workers' compensation benefits and alleging negligence, wantonness, bad faith, and outrageous conduct. The trial court granted the insurer's motion for summary judgment as to the claim of bad faith, and entered a directed verdict for the insurer on the claim of outrageous conduct. Affirming, this court held that the bad faith claim was barred by the exclusivity provisions of the state workers' compensation statute, and that the evidence presented was not sufficient to meet the standard of outrageous conduct. The court found that while the insurer's claims adjustment agents had an unsympathetic attitude toward the worker and gave her "the runaround" by sending her to various doctors and failing to pay her medical bills on time, the evidence did not rise to the level of outrageous conduct. Farley v. CNA Ins. Co., 576 So.2d 158, 159.

Ala.1990. Com. (l) quot. in sup. A doctor at a family planning clinic performed an abortion on a 15-year-old girl, in violation of a state statute requiring parental consent for abortions for minors, when the girl misrepresented her age to be 18. The minor and her parents sued, among others, the family planning clinic, alleging the torts of outrage, trespass, and assault and battery. The trial court entered summary judgment for the defendants, holding that the minor's claim was barred by reason of her willful, affirmative misrepresentations and the parents' claim, being derivative in nature, was also barred by the minor's misrepresentations. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that, based on the affirmative defense of in pari delicto, the minor was estopped from raising her claims because she had the capacity to be responsible for her misrepresentations. The court also determined that the parents could not recover for the tort of outrage because they were not present when the abortion was performed and they did not discover the fact of the abortion until several months after the abortion had been performed. Boykin v. Magnolia Bay, Inc., 570 So.2d 639, 643.

Ala.1990. Com. (d) quot. generally in case quot. in disc., com. (e) cit. in case quot. in disc. and quot. in disc., com. (f) quot. in disc. com. (g) cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (j) cit. generally in case quot. in disc. An injured worker sued his workers' compensation carrier for intentional infliction of emotional distress after the carrier allegedly delayed benefit payments in attempt to coerce him into settling for a small lump-sum settlement of his medical claim. The trial court entered judgment on the jury verdict for the plaintiff. Affirming, this court held that the trial court's instructions properly bore on the question of whether the carrier had insisted on its legal rights in a permissible way by contesting whether certain medical expenses were reasonably necessary. The court also rejected the defendant's argument that the evidence did not support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, stating that the evidence supported a finding that the carrier systematically withheld payments in order to cause the plaintiff anguish over the possibility of the cessation of medical treatments for his pain and thereby to cause him to accept a method of payment that would not subject him to the carrier's "aggravation." Continental Cas. Ins. Co. v. McDonald, 567 So.2d 1208, 1211, 1217, 1219-1220.

Ala.1990. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. While a husband and wife were undergoing counseling by a social worker, the wife told the social worker that she wanted to have an affair with him. The social worker declined, but after he had stopped counseling the couple, did begin an affair with the wife. The husband sued the social worker for, inter alia, outrage, and the trial court granted summary judgment for the social worker. This court affirmed, holding that consensual sexual relations between adults within the context of an extramarital affair, absent any professional relationship or duty and without a malicious intent to inflict harm on another, may well be morally or socially repugnant but did not constitute outrageous conduct. Perkins v. Dean, 570 So.2d 1217, 1219.

Ala.1990. Cit. in case quot. in disc., cit. generally in case quot. in disc., coms. (d), (e) and (f) quot. in case quot. in disc. A doctor determined that a bartender, who was injured when she slipped and fell at work, had aggravated an earlier preexisting condition. The bartender sued her employer and its insurance carrier for, inter alia, the torts of outrageous conduct and bad faith refusal to pay a claim, when the carrier terminated the workmen's compensation claim after making several payments. The trial court denied the defendants' motions for summary judgment on the outrageous conduct count and dismissed the bad faith claim. Reversing in part as to the denial of the summary judgment motions and rendering judgment for the defendants, this court held that the carrier's conduct of stopping the payment of the claim did not qualify as outrageous. The court found that the denial of the claim with no arguable reason for doing so, shortly before the bartender's scheduled hip surgery, was not so outrageous as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency. Wooley v. Shewbart, 569 So.2d 712, 715-717.

Ala.1989. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (g) quot. in case cit. in disc. A woman sued a married man with whom she had had an affair for outrage, inter alia, claiming that the defendant enticed her with promises of marriage to move to another city, had a sexual affair with her, causing her to become pregnant, convinced her to have an abortion, and then informed her that he intended to end their business and personal relationships. The trial court granted the defendant summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that the defendant's illicit relationship with the plaintiff, though not encouraged by the law, and even though they were initially in an employer-employee relationship, did not constitute outrageous conduct. Further, the defendant did not force the woman to have an abortion, since she was a mature adult and could have decided otherwise. The court also said that the defendant's termination of the affair and the business relationship was not outrageous conduct and that the defendant had the legal right to attempt to save his marriage, even if the plaintiff was distressed thereby. Harris v. McDavid, 553 So.2d 567, 570.

Ala.1989. Cit. in disc. An injured employee who entered into a settlement agreement for medical care reimbursement with her former employer's workers' compensation insurer sued the insurer for outrageous conduct when it refused to make reimbursements on any new medical bills after it learned that the employee was injured at her new job. The trial court entered summary judgment for the defendant. Affirming, this court held that, even when viewed in a light most favorable to the plaintiff, the evidence created no genuine issue that the defendant's conduct was outrageous or extreme. Nabors v. Travelers Ins. Co., 551 So.2d 308, 310.

Ala.1988. Com. (d) quot. in part in case quot. in disc., subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in disc. A decedent's father sued the physicians who cared for his daughter, alleging fraud, wrongful death, breach of contract, and outrage. The trial court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding in part that the defendants were entitled to summary judgment on the plaintiff's claim of outrage. The court described the tort of outrage as intentional or reckless outrageous conduct that caused severe emotional distress. Gallups v. Cotter, 534 So.2d 585, 588.

Ala.1988. Cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (d) cit. in disc. and in sup., com. (j) cit. in disc. A medical insurance company, on discovering that the insured had misstated his medical condition at the time he applied for insurance, sought a declaratory judgment that the insurance contract was properly rescinded and that there was no coverage for the insured's hospitalization expenses. The insured counterclaimed that the insurer's outrageous conduct had caused him severe emotional distress. The trial court granted summary judgment to the defendant. Affirming, this court held that there was no evidence that the insurer intended to cause the insured severe emotional distress, and that the insurer's rescission of the policy and denial of coverage were insufficient conduct to meet the standard of extreme and outrageous conduct required for a cause of action for intentional or reckless infliction of severe emotional distress. Kizziah v. Golden Rule Ins. Co., 536 So.2d 943, 948.

Ala.1987. Cit. in disc., com. (d) cit. in disc. A mother sued a hospital for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that its employees had taken and held her baby until the hospital bill was paid. The trial court granted the defendant's motion to dismiss on the ground that the statute of limitations had run. Affirming, this court held that a two-year statute of limitations for trespass on the case and other torts not elsewhere specified under the statute providing a six-year statute of limitations for trespass to the person applied to bar the plaintiff's claim. The court reasoned that the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress was not enumerated under the six-year statute and, furthermore, that it was indirect, thus coming within the trespass-on-the-case class of torts. Archie v. Enterprise Hosp. & Nursing Home, 508 So.2d 693, 694, 695.

Ala.1987. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. A buyer received a certificate for a 20% discount on funeral services rendered by a particular funeral home in exchange for purchasing a cemetery plot and a burial vault. After the funeral home refused to honor the 20% discount certificate, the buyer sued the cemetery and the funeral home, alleging fraud and outrageous conduct. The trial court granted the defendants' motions for summary judgment on both claims. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held that the trial court did not err in granting the defendants' motions for summary judgment on the claim for outrageous conduct. The court reasoned that the conduct of the funeral home and the cemetery in refusing to honor the certificate for discount funeral services was not so outrageous in character and so extreme in degree as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency and be regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized society. Crowder v. Memory Hill Gardens, Inc., 516 So.2d 602, 606.

Ala.1986. Com. (d) quot. in sup. and cit. in case quot. in disc. A male radio station president/owner requested a female employee to have an affair with him; after she refused, he continued to make minor advances toward her for several months. When the business went up for sale, the employee was told by her immediate manager that she would be fired for refusing the president/owner's advances. The employee sued the president and the station for intentional infliction of emotional distress and invasion of privacy. The trial court granted summary judgment for the defendants. This court affirmed, holding that, as a matter of law, the behavior complained of constituted only mere insults, indignities, threats, and annoyances, and was not actionable in tort as extreme and outrageous conduct. McIsaac v. WZEW-FM Corp., 495 So.2d 649, 651.

Ala.1986. Cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. An injured insured sued her insurance company for outrageous conduct in handling and denying her claim for personal injuries resulting from an automobile accident. The trial court granted summary judgment for the defendant for the tort of outrageous conduct. Affirming, this court held that there was nothing in the record that showed the defendant's conduct to be so extreme in degree as to go beyond all bounds of decency, which is the standard required for recovery under this tort. Nabors v. St. Paul Ins. Co., 489 So.2d 573, 574.

Ala.1986. Com. (d) quot. in sup. An employee sued his employer and another employee for assault and battery, defamation, conspiracy, and outrageous conduct after he was allegedly harassed on the job and during grievance proceedings resulting from a disagreement with the project superintendent. The trial court found for the plaintiff on all counts, except that a verdict was directed against the plaintiff on the outrageous conduct claim. This court affirmed the directed verdict for the defendant on the outrageous conduct charge, since the plaintiff failed to carry his burden of proof. The court reasoned that the standard for outrageous conduct was conduct so extreme as to go beyond all bounds of decency; the incidents alleged by the plaintiff of pushing and name-calling did not support this theory. Surrency v. Harbison, 489 So.2d 1097, 1105, 1106.

Ala.1985. Cit. in sup. During a telephone conversation, the defendant's employee told a third person that the plaintiff, an admitted homosexual, was as queer as a three-dollar bill. The plaintiff sued for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted the defendant summary judgment, and this court affirmed. It held that the defendant's conduct was not so extreme and outrageous as to be considered atrocious in a civilized community. Logan v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 466 So.2d 121, 122.

Ala.1985. Com. (d) quot. in conc. and diss. op., cit. in case quot. in conc. and diss. op., com. (h) quot. in conc. and diss. op. The plaintiff suffered a miscarriage one week after her employment was terminated, allegedly for her refusal to take disability leave. The plaintiff sued for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court dismissed the complaint. This court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded, holding that the plaintiff could prove facts that supported an intentional infliction of emotional distress. The concurring and dissenting opinion argued that the defendant's conduct was not so extreme and outrageous as to be considered intolerable in a civilized community. It noted that liability for the tort of outrage does not extend to mere insults, threats, or other trivialities and that the court determines in the first instance if the defendant's conduct is so extreme and outrageous. Rice v. United Ins. Co. of America, 465 So.2d 1100, 1104.

Ala.1984. Com. (d) quot. in sup., and quot. in case quot. in sup. Plaintiffs sued defendant bank, alleging fraud, conversion, and outrage in a transaction involving the payment of a check for the proceeds of an insurance policy. Plaintiffs appealed summary judgments on all three counts. This court reversed the summary judgments on the counts of fraud and conversion, noting the existence of issues of material fact. The court affirmed the summary judgment on the count of outrage, finding that defendant's behavior at most extended to insults, indignities, or annoyances, for which it could not be held liable in tort. Barrett v. Farmers & Merchants Bank, 451 So.2d 257, 262, 263-264.

Ala.1984. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in part in sup. A construction company brought an action against the insured and the insurer for repair work done on the insured's property. The insured appealed from a summary judgment granted in favor of his codefendant insurer on his cross-claim for damages for outrage and bad faith. This court affirmed the summary judgment, holding, on the outrage claim, that the trial court properly withheld that count from the jury because nothing in the insurer's actions amounted to conduct so outrageous and extreme as to have been utterly intolerable in a civilized society. Tyson v. Safeco Ins. Companies, 461 So.2d 1308, 1311.

Ala.1983. Quot. in case quot. in sup., coms. (d) and (g) cit. in case cit. in disc., com. (g) and illus. 14 cit. but dist. The plaintiffs brought an action under the torts of invasion of privacy and outrage, alleging that 30 minutes before the scheduled funeral, the defendants wrongfully refused to allow the plaintiffs to bury their father in a cemetery lot which the defendants orally gave for that purpose. As a result of the refusal, the graveside services had to be conducted at an undug grave. The trial court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment and the plaintiffs appealed. After this court found the plaintiffs' claim for invasion of privacy to be without merit, it stated that to be actionable under the tort of outrage, the conduct involved here had to be so outrageous in character and so extreme in degree as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized society. The court held that if the facts alleged by the plaintiffs were found to be true, they stated a cause of action for outrageous conduct, because the defendants' actions 30 minutes before the funeral and the consequent disruption of the funeral fit the description of outrageous conduct. The defendants argued that they were not liable because they were asserting a legal right in a permissible way, even though the assertion was certain to cause emotional distress. The court responded that even if the oral gift did not effectively pass legal title, or was properly revoked, the defendants could not bring about the plaintiffs' predicament and then seek to shield themselves behind their claim of legal title to the disputed lot. Thus the court held that the defendants were not protected by the principle they asserted. The judgment was affirmed in part, reversed in part, and the case remanded. Cates v. Taylor, 428 So.2d 637, 640, 641.

Ala.1983. Cit. in sup., quot. in case quot. in sup., cit. and quot. in conc. and diss. op. A gas company customer sued a gas company under several theories, including conversion and outrageous conduct, after the company failed to return an LP gas regulator it had removed from her tank. The lower court entered judgment for the customer and denied the company's motion for directed verdicts, and the company appealed. This court held that the question of whether the removal of the regulator from the customer's tank constituted conversion was properly submitted to the jury. However, the gas company's failure to deliver the regulator for nine days during bitterly cold weather did not constitute outrageous conduct. The case was reversed and remanded with directions. A concurring and dissenting opinion maintained that there was sufficient evidence to submit the outrageous conduct claim to the jury. Empiregas, Inc. of Gadsden v. Geary, 431 So.2d 1258, 1261, 1262.

Ala.1980. Cit. and quot. in disc., com. (d) cit. in sup., coms. (b), (d) and (g) quot. in part in sup. and com. (j) quot. generally in sup. The plaintiff was employed by the defendant who accused the plaintiff of dishonest conduct, such an the mishandling of certain files. The plaintiff's employment was terminated and the plaintiff subsequently sued alleging that the defendant had engaged in extreme and outrageous conduct intentionally or recklessly causing severe emotional distress to the plaintiff. The trial court found in favor of the plaintiff and the defendant appealed. This court stated that one who causes severe emotional distress, by extreme and outrageous conduct intentionally or recklessly engaged in, is liable for any emotional distress caused to another. The rule applies only to extreme and outrageous conduct, not to petty oppressions, indignities, threats or trivialities. The court held that the facts in this case were not so outrageous as to warrant the application of the rule. The court found that the defendant did not intend to cause such distress in the plaintiff. The court therefore held that the trial court erred by overruling the defendant's motion for a directed verdict and, accordingly, reversed and remanded. American Road Serv. Co. v. Inmon, 394 So.2d 361, 362-365, 368.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ala.1980. Cit. in disc. and com. (d) cit. in sup. The plaintiffs were told that their son, who was under arrest, had attempted suicide while in his jail cell and had been sent to a hospital. At the hospital, the plaintiffs were told that their son had died. One hour later, when members of the family went to identify the body, it was discovered that a mistake had been made and that their son was alive and still in jail. The plaintiffs then brought this action against the defendants claiming damages on the basis of emotional stress and mental anguish incurred as the result of the defendants' extreme and outrageous conduct. The lower court awarded a directed verdict for the defendants on the ground that the plaintiffs had not met the notice provisions of this state's statute. On appeal, this court held that the lower court's reliance on the statute was erroneous but nevertheless affirmed the directed verdict for the defendant. The court found that although the plaintiffs had suffered some degree of emotional stress from the alleged incident, the defendants' conduct was neither so outrageous nor extreme as to be regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable. The court also found that there was no evidence that the defendants did anything but commit an unintentional mistake. Additionally, the plaintiffs failed to demonstrate any knowledge on the part of defendants as to plaintiffs' susceptibility to distress. The court therefore held that, in the absence of any of these elements, the trial court was justified in granting the defendants a directed verdict on the outrageous conduct claim. Peddycoart v. City of Birmingham, 392 So.2d 536, 537, 538, 540.

Ala.1972. Quot. in sup. in diss. op. In this action plaintiff sued for damages resulting from ill effects she alleged were caused by rough and abusive language used towards her by defendant in her own home. Defendant had charged that she lied on an insurance application. The court held that words alone do not give plaintiff a cause of action unless connected with some traditional tort such as assault or slander. The dissent maintained that the intentional or reckless infliction of mental distress is a separate actionable tort. Hammer v. Bradley, 289 Ala. 624, 270 So.2d 81, 87.

Ala.App.

Ala.App.2019. Quot. in sup.; coms. (e), (f), and (g) quot. in cases quot. in sup. After suffering severe physical, mental, and emotional damages from a workplace accident, employee brought claims of intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against, among others, workers' compensation insurer and case manager, alleging that defendants callously abused his vulnerable state in order to coerce him into accepting fewer workers' compensation benefits than he was entitled to by, among other things, refusing to refer him to psychiatric treatment and controlling the course of his treatments with his assigned physician. The trial court granted defendants' motion to dismiss. This court reversed and remanded, holding that plaintiff alleged sufficient facts that defendants' conduct was extreme and outrageous under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, as required to sustain his IIED claim. Swain v. AIG Claims, Inc., 295 So.3d 1072, 1093-1095, 1097.

Ala.App.2017. Coms. (d) and (g) quot. in case quot. in conc. op. Former employee who was terminated after she suffered a work-related injury sued former employer, seeking workers' compensation benefits and damages for the tort of outrage and retaliatory discharge. The trial court granted employer's motion to dismiss employee's claim asserting the tort of outrage and certified that dismissal as final and appealable. This court dismissed employee's appeal, finding that the trial court erred in certifying the order as final, because the tort-of-outrage claim was so closely intertwined with the retaliatory-discharge claim that there was a probability of repeated appellate review of the same underlying facts. The concurring opinion cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46 in noting that, while the tort of outrage did not require as part of its elements proof of a work-related injury, it was employee's work-related injury and employer's alleged refusal to provide her with medical benefits that formed the factual basis of her tort-of-outrage claim. Kirby v. Jack's Family Restaurants, LP, 240 So.3d 607, 615.

Ala.App.2008. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Wife sued her late husband's doctor for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that doctor improperly caused her employer to terminate her employment after a jury returned a verdict in her favor in her prior wrongful-death and medical-malpractice action against doctor concerning her husband's death. The trial court granted defendant's motion to dismiss. Affirming in part, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's tort-of-outrage claim failed because defendant's alleged conduct in causing plaintiff to lose her job was not so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all bounds of decency and to be regarded as atrocious, and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Thomas v. Williams, 21 So.3d 1234, 1238, 1239.

Ala.App.2007. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Owners of home brought quiet-title action against the home's occupiers, former friends whom owners had allowed to live in the home, until their relations with these friends turned sour; occupiers counterclaimed for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia. The trial court granted summary judgment for owners on the IIED counterclaim. This court affirmed as to that claim, holding that, even if owners maliciously and falsely filed a police report asserting that occupiers forged a document evidencing a promised life estate, such actions would not provide a proper basis for an IIED claim; additionally, even if owners' alleged conduct in burgling the house reached the level of outrageousness required by this tort, occupiers did not show that they suffered severe emotional distress. Hurst v. Cook, 981 So.2d 1143, 1157.

Ala.App.1999. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. A woman and her family sued a police officer, the city, and others for the tort of outrage, among other claims, alleging that she had received obscene telephone calls from the officer. Trial court granted defendants summary judgment. This court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded, holding, inter alia, that the trial court erred in entering summary judgment on plaintiffs' outrage claim. Because defendant was a police officer, the public placed its trust in him to an extent far greater than it did in almost any other individuals in any other profession. If a jury determined that the officer was making obscene phone calls to plaintiffs, then it should determine whether the officer's breach of public trust was so outrageous that it went beyond the bounds of decency. Woodley v. City of Jemison, 770 So.2d 1093, 1096.

Ala.App.1998. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. and cit. in headnote. A waste service employee who was injured on the job was fired after he unsuccessfully attempted to get his employer to reimburse him for workers' compensation benefits. The employee sued the employer and two co-workers for, among other claims, the tort of outrage. Plaintiff alleged that one of the co-workers constantly watched him to validate the suspicion that plaintiff was faking his injury. The trial court granted defendants summary judgment. This court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state an emotional-distress claim, because defendants' conduct was not extreme and outrageous. Buzbee v. Alabama Waste Services, Inc., 709 So.2d 61, 61, 67.

Ala.App.1998. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. Customer and his wife sued a store for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that store employees yelled at them and detained them in the belief that the customers were price checkers for a competing store. Trial court entered judgment for the store. This court agreed with the trial court that the conduct of the store's employees, though possibly insulting and embarrassing to plaintiffs, did not amount to outrageous conduct, but reversed and remanded on other grounds. DeLeon v. Kmart Corporation, 735 So.2d 1214, 1216, 1217.

Ala.App.1997. Com. (d) quot. in cases quot. in disc. Former employee sued former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendant made racially derogatory comments about her. The trial court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that whatever mental distress plaintiff might have suffered was insufficient to support recovery under a theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Johnson v. Fambrough, 706 So.2d 739, 741, 742.

Ala.App.1997. Com. (g) quot. in case cit. in ftn. Passenger who was injured in an automobile being driven by a drunk driver sued her insurer to recover underinsured-motorist (UIM) benefits. Defendant moved for summary judgment on the ground that plaintiff's decision to settle with driver's insurer for an amount less than the available limits of driver's coverage defeated her claim for UIM benefits. The trial court denied the motion and entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiff. Affirming, this court held that where, as here, a policy exclusion was more restrictive than the uninsured-motorist statute, it was void and unenforceable. To the extent defendant relied on an earlier case in which it was a party for the proposition that it had no duty to pay plaintiff UIM benefits, its reliance was misplaced, as that case was an action for outrage where defendant was doing no more than insisting upon its legal rights in a permissible way. State Farm Mut. Auto Ins. Co. v. Scott, 707 So.2d 238, 243.

Ala.App.1995. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (j) cit. generally in case quot. in disc. A workers' compensation claimant sued a claims adjuster that had contracted with the claimant's employer's workers' compensation insurance carrier to handle ongoing medical expense claims made by injured workers, asserting, in part, a claim for the tort of outrageous conduct. Reversing in part the trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendant, this court held, inter alia, that a fact question as to whether defendant's delay in paying claimant's medical bills was unreasonable and was an attempt to coerce claimant into settling his claim for future medical benefits precluded summary judgment on claimant's outrage claim. Jones v. Crawford & Co., 693 So.2d 454, 456, reversed 693 So.2d 458 (Ala.1997). See case above.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ala.App.1985. Cit. in disc., cit. in sup., quot. in case quot. in sup., coms. (d) and (h) quot. in disc. A contractor sued a homeowner for work he performed under contract that the homeowner did not pay for because of dissatisfaction. The homeowner filed a counterclaim, alleging, inter alia, that the contractor intentionally inflicted the homeowner and her children with severe emotional distress. The trial court dismissed the homeowner's emotional distress claim, and rendered judgment for the contractor. The court of appeals affirmed the dismissal of the emotional distress claim, holding that the homeowner's allegations of tar and water damage to her home, and of improper wiring that caused electricity balls to fly through her home were related to breach of contract and negligent performance claims, and therefore were not sufficient to satisfy the requirement of extreme and outrageous conduct on the part of the contractor. Collins v. Henderson, 480 So.2d 1246, 1247, 1248.

Ala.Civ.App.

Ala.Civ.App.1982. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup. and com. (j) cit. in sup. The plaintiff, a former employer, brought an action against former employees, husband and wife, alleging failure on the part of the husband to pay for delivered products and fraud on the part of the wife, the employer's former bookkeeper. The employer asserted that the wife failed to record product deliveries made to the husband and purposely recorded payment for the husband's bills when no payment had actually been received. The wife was relieved of her employment and was later threatened with criminal prosecution. Such criminal prosecution never occurred. The employer filed this civil action, and the wife filed a counterclaim in which she contended, under the tort of outrage, that she had suffered severe emotional distress due to the conduct of the employer in dismissing her and threatening her with criminal prosecution. The wife cited her nervousness, lost sleep, and crying spells as evidence of her emotional distress. The employer's motion for a directed verdict on the wife's counterclaim was denied, and a jury trial resulted in a substantial damages award for the wife. The employer's motions for judgment n.o.v. or a new trial were also denied, and the employer appealed. This court reversed the trial court's judgment and ruled for the employer. Quoting the Restatement, this court ruled as a matter of law that the wife had failed to satisfy the elements of the tort of outrage. The wife did not offer sufficient evidence to prove that the employer's conduct caused her emotional distress. Neither was the emotional distress complained of severe enough to trigger the employer's liability. Finally, this court questioned whether the employer's conduct was sufficiently outrageous to be tortious. The employer prevailed because of a failure of proof of the wife's case. U.S.A. Oil, Inc. v. Smith, 415 So.2d 1098, 1100, 1101, writ denied 415 So.2d 1102 (1982).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Alaska

Alaska, 2016. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in ftn.; com. (g) quot. in sup. and cit. in ftn. Employee and his wife filed, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against law firm of employee's employer's workers' compensation insurer, based on defendant's conduct during a workers' compensation hearing on employer's petition to terminate employee's benefits. The trial court granted defendant's motion for judgment on the pleadings. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, this court reversed, holding that plaintiffs' allegations were sufficient to plead an IIED claim. The court noted that, although, under § 46, Comment g, a defendant's conduct could be absolutely privileged if the defendant did no more than to insist upon the defendant's rights in a permissible way, plaintiffs alleged actions on the part of defendant that were impermissible under the law and therefore not privileged. Cornelison v. TIG Insurance, 376 P.3d 1255, 1278, 1279.

Alaska, 2007. Subsec. (1) cit. in ftn. and adopted in case cit. in ftn., com. (d) quot. in case cit. in ftn. Radio listener brought, in part, claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against radio host and his producer, after host read listener's letter of complaint on the air while making derogatory and sexually explicit remarks about her. The trial court, inter alia, entered judgment on a jury verdict for defendants on the IIED claim. This court reversed and remanded for a new trial on the claim, holding, inter alia, that the trial court erred by instructing the jury that plaintiff was required to prove that host's speech fell under one of two exceptions to protected speech—the "fighting words" exception or the exception for publication of private factual information, both equally inapplicable; conduct consisting of speech could satisfy the "extreme and outrageous" element of an IIED claim if a jury found that the speaker intended to harass by provoking a widespread audience to react with hostility toward the target of humiliating and demeaning comments. State v. Carpenter, 171 P.3d 41, 58, 60.

Alaska, 2005. Com. (j) cit. in ftn. to conc. op., com. (d) quot. in ftn. to conc. op. Inmate brought claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress and unlawful termination against correctional officer and state corrections department after he was fired from his job as a prison barber by means of a racially and sexually offensive memo from officer. The trial court, inter alia, dismissed the emotional-distress claim. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that any error that occurred in the dismissal was harmless. The concurring opinion argued that the trial court properly dismissed the claim based on plaintiff's failure to show he experienced any emotional distress beyond a vague, generalized fear or annoyance that was insufficient to meet the claim's threshold requirement of severe emotional distress. Jones v. State, Dept. of Corrections, 125 P.3d 343, 351, 353.

Alaska, 2001. Quot. in ftn., subsec. (1) cit. in case cit. in ftn., com. (d) quot. in sup. and cit. in ftn. Employee sued employer for constructive discharge and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that after he sued employer to recover unpaid overtime and pension plan payments, employer engaged in a pattern of harassment and retaliation designed to force his resignation. Trial court granted employer summary judgment. This court affirmed in part, holding, inter alia, that employee failed to make out a viable emotional-distress claim, because employer's conduct was not extreme and outrageous. The record revealed no more than insults, indignities, threats, annoyances, and petty oppressions. Finch v. Greatland Foods, Inc., 21 P.3d 1282, 1288, 1289.

Alaska, 2001. Cit. in case cit. in ftn., com. (d) cit. and quot. in ftn. Woman sued her neighbors for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that neighbors painted Biblical passages and citations in large print on their roof for vexatious and retaliatory purposes. Trial court dismissed, and this court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that neighbors' conduct was not sufficiently outrageous to give rise to an emotional-distress claim. The court distinguished other cases that involved multiple, concerted efforts to seriously damage a plaintiff's well-being and reputation. Lybrand v. Trask, 31 P.3d 801, 803-805.

Alaska, 1999. Cit. generally in sup. Employee sued employer for, inter alia, "intrusion upon seclusion" invasion of privacy and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendant's searches of certain employees' personal property were based exclusively on race. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiff. Affirming, this court held, in part, that the evidence supported the finding that the searches were performed for an unlawful reason and in an unreasonable manner, that plaintiff was not required to establish the existence of an independent illegal motive, and that a reasonable factfinder could have found that defendant's conduct was extreme and outrageous. Wal-Mart, Inc. v. Stewart, 990 P.2d 626, 634-635.

Alaska, 1997. Com. (g) quot. in disc. The owners of a liquor store sued the deceased manager's wife, seeking an accounting of the management fee. The wife counterclaimed for fraud, inter alia, alleging that the agreement between the parties was not a management agreement but a sales agreement. The jury returned a verdict for the wife. This court reversed, holding, inter alia, that no reasonable juror could find that the parties entered into an agreement to sell the store. The court also held that the wife could not recover damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Since the owners did not agree to sell the store to the manager and his wife, the wife's contractual rights to run the store ended upon her husband's death. Therefore, the owners could not be held liable for the wife's emotional distress, because the owners were legally entitled to inform her that the contract with her husband ended upon his death and to protect their interests regarding the management of their store. Nome Commercial Co. v. Nat. Bank of Alaska, 948 P.2d 443, 449.

Alaska, 1996. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in ftn. Individual whose personal photographs and videotapes were seized by city police during a drug raid and subsequently destroyed brought action against city to recover damages for the loss. The trial court excluded evidence of the items' sentimental and emotional value, then entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding plaintiff $771. Vacating and remanding, this court held that evidence of sentimental and emotional value was properly excluded, but that the correct measure of damages was the value of the items to plaintiff, as judged by his cost of reproduction and replacement. The court noted that, while a minority of jurisdictions factored in the sentimental value of converted or destroyed chattels, Alaska did not award sentiment-based damages absent an allegation of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Landers v. Municipality of Anchorage, 915 P.2d 614, 619.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Alaska, 1995. Quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Woman sued her doctor for, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress for misdiagnosis of AIDS, alleging that doctor failed to acquire her consent for the HIV test and informed her husband of the test results without her authorization. Trial court directed a verdict against plaintiff. This court affirmed in part and reversed in part, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff could not recover for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because no reasonable juror could find defendant's actions to be extreme, outrageous, or reckless. Although doctor could have emphasized that the positive test result did not prove anything and that further testing was necessary, his failure to do so was not outrageous. It could not be said that conducting a blood test on a hospitalized patient and informing patient's husband of the test results created a high probability of causing severe emotional distress. Chizmar v. Mackie, 896 P.2d 196, 208, appeal after remand 965 P.2d 1202 (Alaska 1998).

Alaska, 1995. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup. The mother of a murder victim sued the state for intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress, alleging that if the police had been more diligent in pursuing the victim's medical records and the mother's identification of the victim's jewelry, and had more carefully scrutinized the information available about the victim, the clothing site, and the remains, they could have more quickly identified the remains as the victim's. Trial court granted the state summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that the state's conduct was not so outrageous in character or extreme in degree as to constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress. The state's conduct of the investigation exhibited, at most, a lack of diligence and organization that perhaps could be characterized as negligent. Hawks v. State, Dept. of Public Safety, 908 P.2d 1013, 1015.

Alaska,1990. Cit. in case quot. in disc., cit. generally in disc. and in ftn., com. (d) cit. and quot. in ftn., com. (h) quot. in ftn. A former security officer at a university sued his supervisor for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that he suffered stress-induced depression and post-traumatic stress reaction disorder as a result of the defendant's harassment. The university was permitted to intervene. The trial court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. Reversing and remanding, this court held that the evidence that the defendant supervisor unjustifiably pursued a two-year private vendetta that caused the plaintiff substantial emotional distress raised an issue of fact as to whether the defendant's conduct could reasonably be regarded as sufficiently outrageous to permit recovery for intentional infliction of emotional distress. King v. Brooks, 788 P.2d 707, 710, 711.

Alaska,1989. Cit. in case cit. in disc., cit. generally in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. Lessees who operated a marina sued the lessors as the result of a family dispute over the terms of the lease and claimed intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that the colessees' lessor-father had harassed the lessees about the operation of the marina. The trial court entered judgment for the lessees. Affirming in part, this court held that the conduct of the lessor-father in intentionally driving recklessly and skidding into the front of the lessee-daughter's car after an argument and in throwing temper tantrums in the marine office satisfied the element of outrageous behavior, even in the context of intrafamily relations. Oaksmith v. Brusich, 774 P.2d 191, 200.

Alaska, 1988. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup. and cit. in ftn. in sup.; coms. (d), (i), and (k) quot. in ftn. in sup.; illus. 1 and 2 quot. in ftn. in sup. and cit. in case cit. in ftn. A former union member sued the local union for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress as a result of threats on his life if he did not force his wife either to quit her job as the employer's supervisor or to give him confidential information about her employer. The trial court entered judgment for the plaintiff, finding that the local union had threatened his life. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that this claim was not preempted by the National Labor Relations Act because it was based on extreme and outrageous conduct. Because it was not necessary to prove bodily harm, the plaintiff's evidence as to his emotional state was sufficient to sustain the claim. Teamsters Local 959 v. Wells, 749 P.2d 349, 356-358, 360.

Alaska, 1987. Subsec. (1) quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. A discharged employee sued his supervisor, claiming that the supervisor had behaved outrageously in terminating the employee's job after the employee allegedly molested the supervisor's 14-year-old daughter. The supervisor filed a complaint and a counterclaim on theories of assault and negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court ordered the two cases to be consolidated and later entered an order granting the employee's motion to dismiss. Reversing, this court held that the supervisor had stated a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court extended the doctrine by allowing a third person who is foreseeably harmed by the extreme and outrageous conduct to state a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court stated that the employee's conduct was of the brand that our society labels as "outrageous." Croft by Croft v. Wicker, 737 P.2d 789, 792, 793.

Alaska, 1987. Subsec. (1) cit. in case cit. in ftn. After a man was severely injured in the course of his employment, his four minor children sued certain defendants for loss of parental consortium. The trial court dismissed the claim. This court reversed and remanded, holding that minor children have an independent cause of action for loss of parental consortium resulting from injuries tortiously inflicted on their parent by a third person. The court noted that it had recently recognized another cause of action for negligently inflicted, intangible injuries to family members: a parent bystander could recover damages for negligent infliction of emotional distress caused by injury to another member of his family. Hibpshman v. Prudhoe Bay Supply, Inc., 734 P.2d 991, 993.

Alaska, 1987. Cit. in case cit. in sup. A contractor's son and three of his employees were injured while attempting to repair a drain pipe on a college campus when the trench in which they were working, which had been excavated by college employees, collapsed. The contractor sued the college for lost income and profits, medical expenses, and other damages. The trial court dismissed the complaint. This court affirmed in part and reversed in part, holding, inter alia, that regarding the contractor's claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress and punitive damages, the trial court correctly ruled that the plaintiff failed to allege anything that, construed liberally, would support a finding of intentional, reckless, extreme, or malicious conduct by the college sufficient to support the claims. Mattingly v. Sheldon Jackson College, 743 P.2d 356, 364.

Alaska, 1986. Quot. in disc., coms. (d) and (i) quot. in sup. After an initial appeal and rehearing of the appeal involving the intoxication of a tortfeasor as a proximate cause of an accident and the impact of the finding of proximate cause on a liquor licensee, this court considered several issues raised on cross-appeal at the original trial. The court concluded, inter alia, that a father was entitled to an instruction to a jury for negligent infliction of emotional distress arising from his arriving at the scene of a car accident in which his daughter was mortally injured, since it was reasonably foreseeable that he would appear at the scene of the accident. The court disallowed the father and mother's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, however, stating that it was not highly probable that an intoxicated tavern patron would cause a serious accident causing their emotional distress. Tommy's Elbow Room, Inc. v. Kavorkian, 727 P.2d 1038, 1043, 1044.

Alaska, 1985. Subsec. (1) cit. in sup., com. (d) cit. in ftn. in sup. Pet owners sued borough when their pet dog was mistakenly killed by an employee of the borough animal shelter. The trial court awarded the plaintiffs the dog's market value. On appeal, the owners argued that the proper amount of damages should include compensation for their mental and emotional suffering. Affirming the original award, this court recognized a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress for the intentional or reckless killing of a pet animal, where the offensive conduct was very similar to that which would sustain a claim for punitive damages. However, this court would not overturn the trial court's threshold determination that the severity of the owner's distress in this case did not warrant a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Richardson v. Fairbanks North Star Borough, 705 P.2d 454, 456.

Ariz.

Ariz.2005. Cit. in sup. Two Islamic Americans sued a newspaper that published a letter to the editor that allegedly insulted and threatened Muslims regarding the Iraq war, alleging assault and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court dismissed the assault claim, but it did not dismiss the emotional-distress claim and it rejected defendant's First Amendment defense. Although assuming arguendo that the trial court correctly held that plaintiffs stated a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court reversed and remanded, holding that the letter did not fall within one of the narrow exceptions to the general rule of First Amendment protection for political speech. Given the content and context of the statement, the court determined that the letter was not a constitutionally proscribable true threat, and therefore defendant could not be held liable under tort law for publishing it. Citizen Publishing Co. v. Miller, 210 Ariz. 513, 115 P.3d 107, 110.

Ariz.1989. Cit. and quot. in disc., coms. (b), (d), and (f) cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. A former sheriff, among others, sued a newspaper publisher for libel and false light invasion of privacy, after the defendant published more than 50 articles stating that the plaintiffs had engaged in illegal activities and were generally incompetent at law enforcement. The trial court dismissed the invasion of privacy claims but refused to dismiss the other counts. The intermediate appellate court affirmed. Vacating, this court affirmed the trial court's dismissal and remanded. Although the court recognized the tort of false light invasion of privacy without requiring the plaintiffs to prove all of the elements of the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress, it held that false light was not available in this case because not only did the publications discuss matters of public interest, but the plaintiffs had no right of privacy with respect to the manner in which they performed their official duties. Godbehere v. Phoenix Newspapers, Inc., 162 Ariz. 335, 783 P.2d 781, 785, 786.

Ariz.1987. Subsec. (1) and com. (b) cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in part in sup. An employee of a corporation who was sexually harassed by a manager sued the manager and the corporation for assault and battery and for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered judgment against the corporation for intentional infliction of emotional distress but not for assault and battery. The intermediate appellate court reversed, holding that the corporation could not be held liable on either claim. This court vacated the intermediate appellate court's decision and reinstated the decision of the trial court, holding that the corporation's failure to take appropriate action in response to the employee's complaints of sexual harassment constituted intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court reasoned that the corporation had acted outrageously when it ignored the employee's numerous complaints and dragged the matter out for months. Ford v. Revlon, Inc., 734 P.2d 580, 585.

Ariz.1986. Coms. (d), (e), and (f) cit. in disc., com. (h) quot. in sup. The plaintiff sued a doctor for damages resulting from the simultaneous birth and decapitation of her premature child. The trial court granted the doctor's motion for summary judgment as to the infliction of emotional distress claim, and the intermediate appellate court affirmed. Reversing, this court reasoned that, to establish a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, the plaintiff must prove that the conduct was outrageous. Since reasonable men could differ as to the outrageousness of the doctor's conduct before, during, and after the birth of the child, the court said, a jury should have had the opportunity to determine the matter and decide whether the plaintiff had suffered severe emotional distress, using factors such as the doctor's position and knowledge of the plaintiff's susceptibility to emotional distress by reason of a physical or mental condition. Lucchesi v. Frederic N. Stimmell, M.D., Ltd., 149 Ariz. 76, 716 P.2d 1013, 1015, 1016.

Ariz.1984. Cit. in disc. A mother whose daughter was sexually molested at a day-care center recovered against the center's owners for infliction of emotional distress, even though she did not witness the assault, then filed a declaratory action against the center's insurer, seeking a declaration of coverage under the policy. This court affirmed the decision for the mother. The court held that a court having jurisdiction adjudicated the claim, and that court's decision could not be attacked collaterally. Because the mother was not in the care, custody, or control of the day-care center, the exclusion clause—which places persons in the care, custody and control of the center outside the insurance coverage—did not apply to her. Gilbreath v. St. Paul Fire and Marine Ins., 141 Ariz. 92, 685 P.2d 729, 733-734.

Ariz.1984. Cit. in sup., com. (h) cit. in sup. The plaintiff's injured son was rushed to a private hospital's emergency room. The defendant transferred the patient for financial reasons, to a county hospital for vascular surgery. The patient suffered residual leg impairment, and the plaintiff sued the private hospital and its physicians for malpractice and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court and intermediate appellate court found for the defendant. This court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. It held that the defendant's conduct was not sufficiently outrageous to allow damages for the intentional infliction of emotional distress. Thompson v. Sun City Community Hosp. Inc., 141 Ariz. 597, 688 P.2d 605, 617.

Ariz.1980. Coms. (d) and (h) quot. in sup. The plaintiff placed her 83-year-old husband in the defendant nursing home. The husband had difficulty walking and had to be assisted. The plaintiff visited her husband daily and often found him unkempt and neglected. The plaintiff was injured while she was helping her husband to the restroom. He slipped and fell onto the plaintiff causing injuries which required hospitalization. While the plaintiff was hospitalized her husband fell again and broke his hip. No one had been with him at the time. The husband was hospitalized and the plaintiff paid all medical bills. The husband returned to the home and the plaintiff visited him daily. The husband contracted pneumonia but the plaintiff was not notified until two days later when he was hospitalized. The husband died shortly thereafter. The plaintiff sued alleging that the defendant's negligence had caused her injury and her husband's injuries which resulted in an intentional infliction of emotional distress to her. The lower court directed a verdict in favor of the defendant on the intentional infliction of emotional distress claim. The jury awarded the plaintiff damages for her injuries and those of her husband and awarded $56,000 in punitive damages. The trial court granted remittitur and reduced the punitive damage award to $10,000. Both parties appealed. This court stated that punitive damages are personal to the victim and, because the plaintiff was suing in her own right and not as the representative of the victim, held that punitive damages owed to the victim were void upon his death. The court then stated that there were three elements to a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court stated that the distress must result from the defendant's conduct, that the act must have been intentional or performed with reckless disregard and that the conduct must be extreme and outrageous. The court held that the defendant's conduct was not so outrageous as to fall within this definition. The judgment of the trial court was affirmed except as to punitive damages which were set aside. Watts v. Golden Age Nursing Home, 127 Ariz. 255, 619 P.2d 1032, 1035.

Ariz.1978. Cit. in disc. and coms. gen. cit. in disc. A trustor entered into a contract with a third party to sell property that was subject to a trust deed under which the bank that had made a loan to the trustor was beneficiary. The contract stated that the beneficiary's loan under the trust deed was to remain the trustor's obligation. The trustor brought an action against the beneficiary and the trustee under the trust deed because the trustee, pursuant to the beneficiary's instructions, had issued a Notice of Trustee's Sale on the subject property, even though the trustor had never been in default on the loan until the beneficiary refused to accept payments. The trial court granted summary judgment for the defendants, and the plaintiff trustor appealed. The plaintiff contended that the defendants' conduct during the original loan transaction and in the course of events leading up to the scheduled trustee's sale constituted the intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court found that the fact that the beneficiary under the deed of trust, which had refused to give the trustor a loan unless she pledged a $2,000 savings account to it for two years, informed the trustor, after she had entered into a contract to sell the subject property to a third party, that it would force her to pay off the entire balance of the loan due under the "due on sale" provision of the trust deed unless it received a transfer fee and an interest rate increase on the loan and thereafter instructed the trustee of the trust deed to issue a Notice of Trustee's Sale on the subject property even though the trustor had never been in default until the beneficiary had refused to accept payments did not constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court noted that it is the duty of the court, as society's conscience, to determine whether the acts complained of can be considered sufficiently extreme and outrageous to state a claim for relief. The court also noted that one can recover for intentional infliction of emotional distress only where the defendant's acts are so outrageous in character and so extreme in degree as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency and to be regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Since the court did not believe that the defendants' acts would be viewed as unacceptable in the community or outrageous enough to justify submission to the jury the question of intentional infliction of emotional distress, the court held, inter alia, that the trial court's granting of summary judgment on the intentional infliction of emotional distress claim was proper. Patton v. First Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n of Phoenix, 118 Ariz. 473, 578 P.2d 152, 155.

Ariz.App.

Ariz.App.2019. Cit. in case cit. in sup.; com. (d) quot. in sup. Prescription- drug purchaser brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against wholesaler, alleging, inter alia, that, after plaintiff repeatedly canceled an erroneously-ordered prescription of erectile-dysfunction treatment drugs, defendant's employee made jokes at his expense with plaintiff's ex-wife when she discovered the erroneous prescription. The trial court granted defendant's motion to dismiss. This court affirmed in part, holding that, under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, defendant's jokes regarding the prescription did not constitute extreme and outrageous conduct necessary for a successful IIED claim. Shepherd v. Costco Wholesale Corporation, 441 P.3d 989, 994, 995.

Ariz.App.2016. Cit. in case cit. in sup.; subsec. (2) cit. in sup.; com. (l) quot. in sup. Mother of firefighter who died while fighting a forest fire brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against state and state's forestry division, alleging that defendants caused plaintiff emotional harm by their reckless and negligent actions that led to firefighter's death and their negligent misrepresentation of facts in an effort to avoid blame for firefighter's death. The trial court granted defendants' motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim. This court affirmed, holding that plaintiff failed to allege sufficient grounds for an IIED claim. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, the court concluded that plaintiff did not allege that she was present at the time of the alleged extreme and outrageous conduct or that any of defendants' conduct was directed at her. McKee v. State, 388 P.3d 14, 20, 21.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ariz.App.2014. Adopted in cases cit. in sup., cit. in sup.; coms. (e)-(g) cit. in case quot. in sup. Family of passenger who was injured in a single-car accident brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against state, alleging that plaintiffs suffered severe emotional distress after officers with the state department of public safety erroneously informed them that passenger had been killed, when another passenger had been killed instead. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant. Affirming as to the emotional-distress claim, this court held, as a matter of law, that the officers' conduct was not so extreme or outrageous as to be utterly intolerable in a civilized society. The court reasoned that plaintiffs failed to present any evidence illustrating that the officers acted in anything other than good faith based on what the charge nurse had told them in attempting to provide next-of-kin notification for the passenger who died. Guerra v. State, 323 P.3d 765, 773.

Ariz.App.1999. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Sponsors of unsuccessful bill to extend the statute of limitations for lawsuits filed by adults who had been sexually abused as minors sued accused abuser and his attorney for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming in part the dismissal of the complaint, this court held, inter alia, that attorney's reiteration of allegedly defamatory statements to legislators about one of the plaintiffs was not sufficiently outrageous to state a claim for relief, where the allegations that plaintiff had embezzled money from her father and that she had accused him of sexually molesting her were already a matter of public record. Johnson v. McDonald, 197 Ariz. 155, 3 P.3d 1075, 1080.

Ariz.App.1996. Cit. in sup. After an escaped inmate broke into a home and shot the homeowner in the presence of his wife, the wife and her children sued the county for wrongful death, false imprisonment, and emotional distress. Trial court awarded plaintiffs damages, but the trial court granted the county's motion for judgment n.o.v., holding that the wife had failed to prove the required legal element of physical injury as a result of witnessing the murder of her husband. This court reversed the grant of judgment n.o.v. and reinstated the jury's verdict awarding the wife damages for emotional distress, holding, inter alia, that the acts of the escaped inmate were unquestionably extreme and outrageous and were imputed to the county by its own admissions, whether or not the county's conduct was intentional or negligent. Requiring the wife to prove physical injury in order to recover for emotional distress would, in effect, relieve the county of its admitted liability for all fault and liability attributable to the escapee. Duke on Behalf of Joy v. Cochise County, 189 Ariz. 35, 938 P.2d 84, 87, 89.

Ariz.App.1995. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) cit. and quot. in cases quot. in sup., com. (e) quot. in diss. op. (erron. cit. as com. 3(e)), com. (f) cit. in case cit. in disc. and quot. in diss. op., com. (g) quot. in sup., illus. 12 cit. in diss. op. After employee failed to receive an expected promotion, she suffered an emotional breakdown and later sued her employer, alleging, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming the trial court's grant of defendant's motion to dismiss, this court held, inter alia, that, because of defendant's legitimate business purpose in seeing that plaintiff's work was done, defendant's alleged conduct in calling plaintiff back to work sooner than her doctor recommended and hand-delivering a letter to plaintiff in the hospital informing her that her job duties were being reassigned was not so extreme and outrageous as to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, even in light of plaintiff's known susceptibility to emotional problems. The partial dissent argued that defendant's knowledge of plaintiff's vulnerability to emotional distress made the conduct outrageous. Mintz v. Bell Atlantic Systems Leasing, 183 Ariz. 550, 905 P.2d 559, 563, 566.

Ariz.App.1994. Cit. in but dist., com. (d) quot. but dist. Parents of 18-year-old student tour participant who died in a fall from a balcony in Mexico, intoxicated from liquor provided by tour host, sued host for, inter alia, intentional misrepresentation and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Applying the "most significant relationship" test, the court first determined that Arizona law applied to all tort issues. Affirming the trial court's dismissal of these counts but remanding in part, this court held that defendant's alleged misrepresentation concerning adult supervision and alcohol consumption on these tours did not rise to the level of extreme conduct needed to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Knoell v. Cerkvenik-Anderson Travel, Inc., 181 Ariz. 394, 891 P.2d 861, 871, vacated 185 Ariz. 546, 917 P.2d 689 (1996).

Ariz.App.1994. Cit. in headnotes and in sup. A former chief financial officer for a resort sued the resort for breach of implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and breach of written employment contract. Security officers had escorted plaintiff from the office in the middle of the night to prevent disruption and sabotage. After granting defendant summary judgment on plaintiff's good-faith and emotional-distress claims, trial court entered judgment for plaintiff. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that trial court properly granted defendants summary judgment on plaintiff's emotional distress claim. In reviewing the evidence concerning the manner in which plaintiff was fired, the court concluded that plaintiff did not provide evidence of outrageous and extreme conduct. Nelson v. Phoenix Resort Corp., 181 Ariz. 188, 888 P.2d 1375, 1386.

Ariz.App.1987. Coms. (b) and (h) cit. in disc. A physician whose medical license was revoked sued the state board of medical examiners and its individual members for unlawful interference with contractual relations and intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. The trial court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment, holding that the claims against the defendants were a collateral attack on the board's decision and must be dismissed for failure to exhaust administrative remedies. Affirming, this court held that the plaintiff was precluded from maintaining a civil action against the defendants because the plaintiff failed to seek judicial review of his license revocation. The court also held that, since the revocation of the plaintiff's medical license was justified, the defendants' conduct could not be deemed extreme and outrageous and, therefore, the trial court properly determined that the acts complained of did not state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Gilbert v. Bd. of Medical Examiners, 155 Ariz. 169, 745 P.2d 617, 625.

Ariz.App.1987. Com. (d) cit. in disc. A sheriff and several employees of the sheriff's office sued for libel and false light invasion of privacy a newspaper that published articles portraying the plaintiffs as improperly and ineffectively performing their duties. The trial court denied the defendant's motion to dismiss the libel claims but granted the defendant's motion to dismiss the invasion of privacy claim. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held that the newspaper articles published by the defendant did not constitute the outrageous conduct necessary to state a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress and therefore did not state a claim for false light invasion of privacy. The court said that the tort of invasion of privacy was concerned with the hurt feelings or emotional distress of another. Godbehere v. Phoenix Newspapers, Inc., 155 Ariz. 389, 746 P.2d 1319, 1321, vacated 162 Ariz. 335, 783 P.2d 781 (1989). See above case.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ariz.App.1987. Com. (h) quot. in disc. A college basketball coach who was fired after one season sued the athletic director and college president for intentional interference with contract and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that he had a four-year contract, that the athletic director had recommended to the president that the plaintiff's employment not be continued after the first year, and that the athletic director had discussed the plaintiff's personal problems with others. The trial court granted summary judgment to the defendants. Affirming, the court stated that, when intentional infliction of emotional distress had been alleged, the court determined whether the defendant's conduct might reasonably be regarded as so extreme and outrageous as to permit recovery. Here, the court could find nothing in the record that constituted sufficiently outrageous conduct to warrant submission of the issue to the jury. Lindsey v. Dempsey, 115 Ariz. 230, 735 P.2d 840, 844.

Ariz.App.1987. Cit. in disc., cit. in ftn., coms. (e), (f), (g), and (k) cit. in disc., com. (g) quot. in disc. After the disappearance of a mother and her child, the father sued the mother's parents for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that the grandparents aided in the disappearance. The trial court awarded judgment for the father on the ground that the grandparents engaged in conduct that they realized would result in injury to the father. Affirming, this court held that the intentional separation of a child from its parent was sufficiently extreme and outrageous conduct to create distress of the requisite proportion for a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Pankratz v. Willis, 155 Ariz. 8, 744 P.2d 1182, 1183-1184, 1186, 1187, 1189-1193, 1195, 1196.

Ariz.App.1986. Quot. in sup. An automobile passenger who was injured in a collision sued an insurance company and its claims superintendent, alleging, among other things, breach of contract and fiduciary duty and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The passenger alleged that the claims superintendent had told him that he would recommend that the insurance company sue the passenger for money that had already been paid by the company. The superintendent also allegedly told the passenger to get an attorney as soon as possible. After the trial court granted summary judgment against the passenger on all counts, the passenger appealed the judgment on the intentional infliction of emotional distress claim only. Affirming, this court held that the acts by the claims superintendent were not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support a claim for relief on a theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Helfond v. Stamper, 149 Ariz. 9, 716 P.2d 70, 72.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ariz.App.1986. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. An ophthalmologist sued another ophthalmologist for slander, libel, false light invasion of privacy, conspiracy to defame, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and intentional interference with medical practice on the basis of some comments made and a letter written by the defendant questioning the plaintiff's competence and ethical standards. The trial court granted summary judgment to the defendant. Affirming in part and reversing in part, this court found that summary judgment on the claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress was proper because the defendant's conduct was not sufficiently outrageous in character and extreme in degree as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency. Hirsch v. Cooper, 153 Ariz. 454, 737 P.2d 1092, 1098.

Ariz.App.1986. Com. (d) quot. in disc., com. (h) cit. in disc. The plaintiffs, who had been involved in a controversial lawsuit, sued a newspaper after an article portrayed them as litigation mongers. The plaintiffs alleged intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress, invasion of privacy, and liability for intentional consequences. The trial court granted summary judgment for the newspaper. Affirming, this court held that the publication of the article was not extreme and outrageous conduct, reasoning that to hold otherwise would open a floodgate of litigation. The court also held that, to prove invasion of privacy based on false light, the elements of intentional infliction of emotional distress had to be shown to prevent the invasion of privacy theory from being used to circumvent the stringent standards necessary to establish a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Moreover, the claim of liability for intended consequences was not a recognized cause of action in the state, said the court, since the plaintiffs had adequate redress in other forms of action. Rutledge v. Phoenix Newspapers, Inc., 148 Ariz. 555, 715 P.2d 1243, 1244, 1245.

Ariz.App.1985. Quot. but dist., cit. in conc. and diss. op., com. (d) cit. in conc. and diss. op., com. (h) cit. in disc. and cit. and quot. in conc. and diss. op. The plaintiff sued a doctor for damages resulting from the simultaneous birth and decapitation of her premature child. The trial court granted the doctor's motion for summary judgment as to the infliction of emotional distress claim. Affirming, this court held that the evidence was insufficient to support a claim of outrage. The court reasoned that the elements of outrage were intentional or reckless conduct, extreme and outrageous conduct, a causal connection between the wrongful conduct and the emotional distress, and severe emotional distress. In this case, the court said, there was no evidence that the doctor had intended to inflict emotional distress on the parents, and one could reasonably infer that revealing the traumatic nature of the delivery, rather than withholding it, would have caused severe emotional distress. The concurring and dissenting opinion argued that, when reasonable men might differ as to whether the actor's conduct was outrageous, it was for the jury, subject to the control of the court, to determine if the conduct had been sufficiently extreme to result in liability. Lucchesi v. Frederic N. Stimmell, M.D., Ltd., 149 Ariz. 85, 716 P.2d 1022, 1026-1029. See above case.

Ariz.App.1982. Quot. in sup. and com. (d) quot. in sup. The plaintiffs brought suit against a police officer, seeking damages for false arrest, assault and battery, and civil rights violations. The police officer went to the plaintiff's residence in response to a noise complaint. The plaintiffs were subsequently arrested. The defendant failed an answer and a counterclaim; the counterclaim alleged libel, slander, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. According to the counterclaim, the basis for these allegations was that the plaintiffs made false statements of police brutality against the defendant by leading a demonstration around the city council building. In response to the defendant's counterclaim, the plaintiffs filed a motion for judgment on the pleadings. The lower court granted the plaintiff's motion, and the defendant appealed. This court stated that a person was liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress if that person's conduct had been so outrageous in character and so extreme as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency. The court found that the plaintiffs' conduct in conducting a demonstration failed to meet the test necessary to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court added that, were it to hold otherwise, every demonstration would give rise to a claim alleging the intentional infliction of emotional distress. The judgment was affirmed. Duhammel v. Star, 133 Ariz. 558, 653 P.2d 15, 18.

Ariz.App.1982. Coms. (h) and (j) cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. The defendants purchased a muffler from the plaintiff muffler shop. The defendants made payment with a check which was returned by the bank for insufficient funds, and the plaintiff forwarded the check to a collection agency. After being contracted by the agency, the defendants paid the debt in full but the plaintiff neglected to make the proper notification in its accounts book. The plaintiff later turned its overdue accounts over to a new collection agency, and the agency made a series of telephone calls to the defendants in an effort to collect the debt which had already been paid. The defendants alleged that the calls were abusive. The plaintiff finally brought suit to recover the debt and the defendants counterclaimed against the plaintiff and the agency for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial judge entered summary judgment for the defendants on the plaintiff's complaint, and the jury returned a verdict for the defendants on their counterclaim. The trial judge granted the plaintiff's and agency's motion for judgment n.o.v. and the defendants appealed. This court affirmed on the ground that the agency's calls were not sufficiently outrageous enough, nor was the defendants' distress sufficiently severe enough, as a matter of law, to support a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Midas Muffler Shop v. Ellison, 133 Ariz. 194, 650 P.2d 496, 499-501.

Ariz.App.1982. Com. (d) quot. in part in sup. The plaintiff employee requested a leave of absence from work, recommended by his personal physician because of a positive reaction to a valley fever skin test. The employee did not tell his doctor that he had had valley fever three years before. When personnel records revealed that the employee had previously been granted a leave of absence for valley fever, the employer's personnel supervisor contacted the company doctor to ask if it was likely that a person could have the disease twice. He responded that it was not likely. The supervisor then identified the employee and his doctor, and the company doctor offered to speak with the employee's doctor. After their discussion, the employee's doctor withdrew his recommendation for sick leave. The employee returned to work, but complained that he was still ill. He was asked to provide medical verification and was fired when he failed to do so. The employee sued his employer, the personnel supervisor and the company doctor for invasion of privacy, and summary judgment was granted for all defendants. On appeal, this court affirmed, holding that to maintain a claim for invasion of privacy, the defendant's conduct must be extreme and outrageous. That test was not met here where the only information disclosed by the defendants was not confidential, but already appeared in the plaintiff's employment record. Valencia v. Duval Corp., 132 Ariz. 348, 645 P.2d 1262, 1264.

Ariz.App.1981. Cit. in disc. Mexican citizen brought an action against a railroad for personal injuries sustained when railroad employees caused train cars to jerk when the plaintiff was attempting to board, causing him to fall under the wheels of the train. The lower court dismissed certain claims in the complaint, and the plaintiff appealed. The question before the court on appeal was whether the railroad did in fact owe the plaintiff a duty to render aid after he was seriously injured by the train. The court stated that, since there was no Arizona case law to the contrary, it would follow the position taken by Section 322 of the Restatement (Second) of Torts that if the actor knows, or has reason to know, that by his conduct, whether tortious or innocent, he has caused such bodily harm to another as to make him helpless and in danger of further harm, the actor is under a duty to exercise reasonable care to prevent such harm. The comments to Section 322 clarified the existence of a separate and distinct duty to render aid regardless of whether the defendant's original misconduct was intentional or innocent in causing the plaintiff's injuries or whether it was the legal cause of any further harm suffered by the plaintiff. The court held, inter alia, that the plaintiff's complaint stated a claim for relief under Section 322 for failure to render reasonable aid and assistance, and also stated a claim under Section 46 of the Restatement (Second) of Torts for intentional infliction of emotional distress. However, the court found that the complaint did not state a claim for intentional interference with a savior or for breach of statutory duty to report an accident. The judgment of the lower court was affirmed in part and reversed in part. Maldonado v. Southern Pacific Transp. Co., 129 Ariz. 165, 629 P.2d 1001, 1005.

Ariz.App.1981. Quot. in sup. and com. (j) quot. in sup. The plaintiff and his two minor sons moved into a town where the residents were trying to maintain it exclusively for retirees. The citizens of this town formed an organization to help pass an ordinance which would prohibit families with minor children from settling there. The plaintiff alleged that the president and the secretary of that organization harassed him and his sons by telling him that he could not live in his house, by sending him an eviction notice, by threatening him over the telephone, and by attempting to run his sons off the road. The plaintiff sued the president and the secretary of the town's organization for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The lower court entered a judgment against the defendants and they appealed, arguing that the lower court should have entered a directed verdict in their favor. This court stated that four elements were necessary to establish liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress: the conduct must be intentional or reckless, the conduct must be extreme and outrageous, there must be a causal connection between the wrongful conduct and the emotional distress, and the emotional distress must be severe. The court concluded that the defendant's conduct was intentional, but that the plaintiff's emotional distress was not sufficiently severe. The court stressed that severe emotional distress is necessary for recovery, and held that because there was insufficient evidence of the plaintiff's distress to constitute severe emotional distress, as a matter of law, a directed should have been entered. The court therefore reversed the lower court. Venerias v. Johnson, 127 Ariz. 496, 622 P.2d 55, 58, 59.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ariz.App.1980. Subsec. (1) quot. in ftn. and com. (e) cit. in ftn. The plaintiffs, a husband and wife, filed suit for breach of contract against the defendant health spa and for invasion of privacy against the defendant assignee of the health spa's contract with the plaintiffs. The defendant assignee counterclaimed for the balance due under the plaintiffs' membership contract with the health spa. The trial court found that the health spa had breached its contract by failing to maintain the premises in a suitable condition and that the conduct of the assignee constituted an invasion of privacy based upon harassment and misrepresentations in its collection practices. The lower court also found against the assignee on its counterclaim. The assignee argued on appeal that there was insufficient evidence at trial to support a finding of invasion of privacy. This court recognized the general principle that a creditor has the right to take reasonable steps to pursue his debtor and to persuade payment, even though such steps may result in some invasion of the debtor's privacy. However, unreasonable steps taken by a creditor in an attempt to collect a debt may be an invasion of privacy. The court noted that the plaintiffs could also have asserted a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against the defendant, but the plaintiffs chose to rely solely on an invasion of privacy theory. The defendant's threats to repossess the plaintiffs' car for failure to pay the $100 debt and the numerous telephone calls made by the defendant to the plaintiffs' neighbors and place of employment led the court to conclude that the defendant's conduct was unreasonable and constituted an invasion of privacy. Fernandez v. United Acceptance Corp., 125 Ariz. 459, 610 P.2d 461, 463.

Ariz.App.1979. Com. (d) cit. and quot. in part in sup. The plaintiff was suspended from a social club so she sued the club alleging that she had been deprived of her rights as a member of the club. The trial court directed a verdict for the defendant holding that the evidence was not sufficient to support the plaintiff's claim. The appellate court affirmed. This court stated that the plaintiff could not recover in tort unless a legally protected right had been invaded and although a contract providing the plaintiff with an opportunity to play bridge had been breached, such a breach would be tortious only if the law provided protection for the plaintiff's membership in the voluntary association. The court concluded that the courts had not been willing to extend legal protection against ostracism and generally, in cases where one suffers insults or indignities, the court will not step in and permit compensation. The court held that a cause of action in tort could not be sustained on the basis of a suspension from a voluntary club. Aspell v. American Contract Bridge League Etc., 122 Ariz. 399, 595 P.2d 191, 195.

Ariz.App.1979. Subsec. (1) cit. and quot. in ftn. and coms. (d) and (h) cit. in sup. The plaintiff was injured before an insurance company accepted or rejected her application for health insurance so she sued the company for negligence in processing her application. She sought recovery of medical expenses and damages for mental distress and punitive damages. A jury returned a general verdict and assessed damages. The appellate court reversed the judgment and remanded the case. The court found that the evidence that the company's agent told the plaintiff that the insurance would take effect immediately was admitted in violation of the parol evidence rule. The court also held that, although there was a question as to whether the company was negligent by not acting on the plaintiff's application for more than eighty days, there was no evidence that the company committed an act so extreme and outrageous as to substantiate a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Continental Life & Acc. Co. v. Songer, 124 Ariz. 294, 603 P.2d 921, 931.

Ariz.App.1979. Cit. and fol., com. (d) quot. in sup., and com. (h) cit. in sup. Plaintiffs filed this action against defendant bank and insurance company alleging four claims for relief. The first claim was for intentional infliction of emotional distress resulting from: defendants' attempts to rescind a loan contract on the plaintiffs' trailer, subsequent delays in payment of disability benefits, late charges by the bank, and attempts to restrict coverage of disability insurance. Another claim alleged that defendants had breached an agreement, under which plaintiffs had fully performed, to provide disability insurance for six years. Another alleged fraud based on the representation that the disability insurance would be provided for six years when in actuality it was only to be for five years. The last claim, for invasion of privacy, was directed solely against the bank and alleged that the bank had obtained confidential medical information about one of the plaintiffs without his consent. The lower court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment, and plaintiffs appealed. This court affirmed the trial court's action in granting defendants' motion for summary judgment. In regard to the claim for intentional infliction of mental distress, the court stated that none of the conduct complained of by the plaintiffs qualified as extreme or outrageous as is required in the Restatement (Second) of Torts to make out a valid cause of action. Davis v. First National Bank of Arizona, 124 Ariz. 458, 605 P.2d 37, 41.

Ariz.App.1979. Cit. in ftn. in disc. Plaintiff insured, who had undergone surgery, filed a claim under a health insurance policy issued by the defendant insurer. After the defendant insurer failed to pay the medical expenses, plaintiff brought an action to recover against the insurer. The plaintiff's theory was that the insurer breached its duty to pay the just claims of its insureds and had breached the implied warranty of good faith and fair dealing with insureds. The trial court dismissed the count raising such a claim, and the plaintiff appealed. The plaintiff contended that tort liability should be imposed on the insurer for failure to deal in good faith with the insured, and the appellate court agreed. The court held that a cause of action in tort will lie for breach by the insurer of its duty to deal fairly and in good faith. The judgment of the lower court was reversed. Noble v. Nat. Am. Life Ins. Co., 128 Ariz. 196, 624 P.2d 874, 875, opinion vacated 128 Ariz. 188, 624 P.2d 866 (1981).

Ariz.App.1978. Com. (d) and (h) cit. in disc. A statutory agent for a corporation brought an action against a city and county for, inter alia, alleged abuse of process and against the city for intentional and/or negligent infliction of emotional distress and the tort of outrage. After plaintiff had been stopped in his car by a police officer for alleged speeding, he was delayed for an hour until he was finally notified that a bench warrant had been issued for his arrest on a charge of the corporation's failure to pay city taxes. Plaintiff complained that he had been stereotyped as a “Mafiosi,” detained with his family for an hour without explanation, searched and handcuffed outside of his car in full view of motorists on a street frequently used by his neighbors and friends, treated as a dangerous criminal for the crime of failing to file a tax return, and falsely arrested. Nevertheless, the court held that the record failed to indicate any conduct on the part of the arresting officer which could be classified as “outrageous.” Rondelli v. Pima County, 120 Ariz. 43, 586 P.2d 1295, 1301, 1302.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ariz.App.1976. Cit. in sup. and com. (d) quot. in sup. When a medical malpractice action was brought by a patient against a member of a medical partnership and an associate of the partners, a third-party complaint was filed against another partner alleging a right to indemnity from that partner, under the partnership agreement, for twenty percent of any judgment exceeding insurance policy limits. After the malpractice action was disposed of favorably to defendants, the physician against whom the third-party complaint had been filed brought an action against the original defendants, alleging that the filing of the third party complaint constituted malicious prosecution, abuse of process, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The doctor's liability insurance carrier was also sued for attorney's fees for the defense of the third-party claim. The lower court granted summary judgment in favor of defendants, and plaintiff and insurer filed cross-appeals. Plaintiff contended that the filing of the third-party complaint against him, with the acquiescence of his own insurance carrier, and the fact the Liberty Mutual paid the attorney's fees of defendant's lawyers (defendants in this action) including those involved in filing against plaintiff constituted conduct so extreme and outrageous as to support a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress against all three defendants. The court held that filing of the third-party complaint seeking indemnity against plaintiff was not within the purview of extreme and outrageous conduct as defined, and, therefore, not within the scope of the tort, infliction of emotional distress. Affirmed. Joseph, M.D. v. Markowitz, M.D., 27 Ariz.App. 122, 551 P.2d 571, 575.

Ariz.App.1975. Quot. and fol., com. (d) quot., com. (g) quot., com. (h)cit. in case cit. in disc., com. (j) quot. Plaintiff administrator brought this wrongful death action alleging damages caused by defendant's malicious prosecution, abuse of process, wrongful attachment, and intentional infliction of mental anguish. Decedent was killed when a sheriff's deputy, who had been sent to decedent's mobile home to levy a writ of attachment thereon, shot him after decedent shot and killed a second deputy. The appellate court affirmed the granting of defendant's motions for summary judgment, holding that plaintiff failed to state a cause of action insofar as he failed to establish that defendant's conduct was so outrageous in character and so extreme in degree as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency and to be regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Bendalin v. Valley Nat. Bank, 24 Ariz.App. 575, 540 P.2d 194, 196.

Ariz.App.1975. Com. (d) cit. in sup. Plaintiff, the inventor of a brassiere, brought this action for damages alleging that defendant, as the alter ego of a corporation, caused her to suffer monetary loss and physical and emotional damage by foocing her to relinquish control of the corporation which produced her invention and to lose her patent on the invention. At trial, the jury returned a verdict for plaintiff. The issue raised on appeal by defendant was whether an issue submitted to the jury, without objection at the first trial, may be objected to at the second trial for damages only. After finding that there was sufficient evidence that defendant's conduct was “outrageous and beyond the bounds of decency so that the average member of the community would find it outrageous” so as to permit the question of defendant's liability for the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress to be submitted to the jury, the court held that defendant's failure to object to the submission at the first trial precluded such objection at the trial on the measure of damages. Linsenmeyer v. Hancock, 23 Ariz.App. 444, 533 P.2d 1181, 1184.

Ariz.App.1969. Quot. com. (d) and cit. com. (h) in sup. This was an action for alleged intentional infliction of mental distress and invasion of privacy. The court held that the complaint alleging that the insurance adjuster had willfully, intentionally and maliciously with purpose of inflicting mental suffering upon plaintiff so as to cause her to settle her claim for the wrongful death of her son, threatened and cajoled plaintiff to accept settlement, in that he informed her that she probably could not recover damages under the laws of the state where the death occurred failed to state a cause of action for intentional distress and invasion of privacy. Cluff v. Farmers Ins. Exchange, 10 Ariz.App. 560, 460 P.2d 666, 668, 39 A.L.R.3d 731.

Ark.

Ark.2007. Com. (j) cit. in case quot. in sup. Boy and his mother sued paternal grandmother for the tort of outrage, after grandmother picked boy up after school in violation of a court order and drove him to a home where he stayed for several days; boy was returned to mother's home when grandmother was jailed on contempt charges. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiffs, awarding substantial punitive damages to boy and mother. This court reversed and dismissed, holding that there was insufficient evidence of severe emotional distress suffered by boy or mother to support the jury's verdict; while boy might have suffered embarrassment and a dip in his grades, no evidence indicated that he suffered distress so severe that no reasonable person could have been expected to endure it, and while mother was upset, she did not seek medical or psychological treatment. Kiersey v. Jeffrey, 369 Ark. 220, 253 S.W.3d 438, 442.

Ark.2003. Com. (d) cit. in case cit. in disc. Female former employee who alleged that she had been sexually harassed by a supervisor sued former employer and supervisor for, in part, the tort of outrage. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. Affirming in part, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to offer proof that, as a result of supervisor's behavior, she suffered damages or emotional distress sufficiently severe to support an action for the tort of outrage. Island v. Buena Vista Resort, 352 Ark. 548, 103 S.W.3d 671, 681.

Ark.2001. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Terminated employee sued employer and others for tort of outrage, among other claims arising from termination. Trial court granted defendants summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's allegations that she disagreed with employer's director and chairman over use of employer's funds, that she was improperly written up for performance problems, that she was improperly placed on probation, and that she was wrongfully fired failed to state claim for tort of outrage. Palmer v. Arkansas Council on Economic Educ., 344 Ark. 461, 472-474, 40 S.W.3d 784, 791-792.

Ark.1996. Cit. in headnote, cit. in disc., coms. (d) and (f) quot. in part in disc. Former employee sued her former employer for the tort of outrage, alleging that employer constantly insulted her and subjected her to veiled threats of bodily harm. The trial court granted employer's motion for summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that the tort of outrage in the employment context was construed very narrowly in Arkansas, and that, where employee failed to show that employer was on notice of the fact that she was not a person of ordinary temperament, or that she was particularly susceptible to emotional distress because of some physical or mental condition, employee's allegations were insufficient as a matter of law to state a cause of action for the tort of outrage. Hollomon v. Keadle, 326 Ark. 168, 931 S.W.2d 413, 414, 415, 417.

Ark.1993. Com. (d) quot. in part in case quot. in sup. Department store customer sued store and its manager for outrage and malicious prosecution after customer was accused of theft and not convicted. Reversing the trial court's entry of judgment on a jury verdict for customer and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that, since the incident lasted less than one hour, customer was not physically touched, and manager had initially confronted customer in a professional manner and in such a way as not to draw the attention of other customers, defendants could not be liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Dillard Dept. Stores, Inc. v. Adams, 315 Ark. 303, 305, 867 S.W.2d 442, 443.

Ark.1990. Com. (d) quot. generally in disc., com. (g) quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. in disc. After a wife had delivered a stillborn fetus, the hospital delivered the body of the fetus to the husband, who was intoxicated. The wife sued the hospital's insurer alleging negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress, after the father was arrested for driving while intoxicated and was held in jail with the fetus. Treating the insurer's motion to dismiss as a motion for summary judgment, the trial court held that the actions of the hospital failed to support a claim for the tort of outrage. Affirming, this court held that the hospital had the authority and the right to release the fetal remains to the father without first obtaining the consent of the mother. The court did not consider the actions of the hospital to be outrageous because the hospital had the legal right to release the fetus to either parent, absent notice to the contrary. Further, the nurse's relaying to the wife of the husband's arrest and the advice to her to recover the body was not atrocious, outrageous, and intolerable behavior. Neff v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 799 S.W.2d 795, 796, 797.

Ark.1989. Quot. in case, quot. in disc., subsec. (2) cit. generally in disc. A widower and children of a deceased mortgagor sued a mortgagee and a listing agent for, inter alia, inflicting outrage by allegedly improperly forcing payment of interest on a note when the mortgagor was dying of cancer by withholding a certificate of deposit (CD) in which the widower had an interest. The trial court granted summary judgment for the defendants as to the claims of the children, finding that the children lacked standing to sue for outrage resulting from enforcement of a contract to which they were not parties. It also directed a verdict for the defendants as to the widower's outrage claim. This court affirmed the summary judgment and directed verdict orders rendered on the outrage claim, but reversed in part on other grounds. The court held that even though the mortgagor may have been wrong in refusing to honor the CD, the defendants' conduct fell far short of the requisite extreme and outrageous behavior. It also noted that the plaintiffs may not have had standing because Arkansas had not adopted the Restatement's language referring to conduct toward third persons. Deason v. Farmers & Merchants Bank, 229 Ark. 167, 771 S.W.2d 749, 753, appeal after remand 300 Ark. 30, 775 S.W.2d 909 (1989).

Ark.1986. Com. (h) cit. in disc. An employee who had served as a warehouse manager was discharged for unsatisfactory performance. There was no written employment contract, although he had been assured by a previous partner-owner that he would have the job for many years. The trial court directed a verdict against the employee on his claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming, this court held that the trial court was unquestionably correct in granting the directed verdict because the termination of an at-will employee was not conduct that was so extreme and outrageous as to permit recovery. Harris v. Arkansas Book Co., 287 Ark. 353, 700 S.W.2d 41, 43.

Ark.1985. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. A police officer sued a city director for intentional infliction of emotional distress as a result of allegedly outrageous conduct by the director, which included threatening the officer's employment, having the officer followed, and lodging false accusations against the officer. A jury awarded both compensatory and punitive damages to the officer, and the city director appealed. Affirming, this court found substantial evidence to meet the requirements necessary to establish liability for the tort of outrage. Hess v. Treece, 286 Ark. 434, 693 S.W.2d 792, 795, cert. denied 475 U.S. 1036, 106 S.Ct. 1245, 89 L.Ed.2d 354 (1986).

Ark.1984. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in conc. and diss. op., com. (h) cit. in case quot. in conc. and diss. op. An insured sued its insurer after the insurer offered to settle the disputed claims under the policy with a lump sum. The lower court found, inter alia, that the insurer had acted in bad faith. This court remanded for a new trial because the lower court gave an erroneous jury instruction on the issue of bad faith. This court also held that a finding of bad faith could be made only upon evidence of affirmative malicious, dishonest, or oppressive misconduct. In a concurring and dissenting opinion, one justice preferred to label the tort at issue as that of outrage. He contended that the conduct must be determined to be very outrageous, while the term bad faith only gave a connotation of mere negligence. Aetna Cas. and Sur. v. Broadway Arms, 281 Ark. 128, 664 S.W.2d 463, 468.

Ark.1984. Com. (d) cit. in case cit. in disc. The manager of the defendant's store quit or was fired as the result of an investigation of his business by the defendant. The manager sued the defendant for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and the defendant counterclaimed for loss of inventory. The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff, and both parties appealed. This court reversed and remanded because improper jury instructions were given, but held that, where defendant was on notice that plaintiff had a nervous condition and that investigators intended to subject him to stress, yet denied his request for permission to take his medication, the evidence was sufficient to support a verdict against defendant for outrage. Tandy Corp. v. Bone, 283 Ark. 399, 678 S.W.2d 312, 314.

Ark.1982. Com. (d) quot. in sup. and com. (h) cit. in sup. The owner of a farm hired the plaintiff to manage his property. The owner, dissatisfied with the plaintiff's work, discharged the plaintiff.

The plaintiff then brought an action seeking to recover damages for severe emotional distress, which allegedly resulted from the owner's sudden discharge of the plaintiff. The owner was granted summary judgment and the plaintiff appealed. This court held that the defendant's conduct was not so atrocious as to go beyond all bounds of decency, as required to permit recovery for emotional distress. The summary judgment in favor of the defendant was affirmed. Givens v. Hixson, 275 Ark. 370, 631 S.W.2d 263, 264.

Ark.1981. Cit. in disc. A debtor sued the defendant collection agency for wrongful invasion of her right of privacy and for causing her severe emotional distress. The lower court awarded the plaintiff compensatory and punitive damages. This court stated that the jury could have found a wrongful invasion of privacy. The court maintained that when, as here, the telephone calls are repeated with such persistence and frequency as to amount to a course of hounding the plaintiff, then that becomes a substantial burden to his existence and his privacy is invaded. Affirmed. CBM of Central Arkansas v. Bemel, 274 Ark. 223, 623 S.W.2d 518, 519.

Ark.1980. Cit. and coms. (d), (g) and (j) cit. in sup. Plaintiff was employed as a cashier in defendant's store under an employment agreement that she could be discharged at any time without notice. After a shortage in her cash register was discovered, she was told she was laid-off because the store had too much counter help. Defendant refused to pay her for the last pay period she had worked until she took a polygraph test. The polygraph operator told her she had passed and that defendant would have to release her paycheck. When she was paid, she found defendant had withheld about one-third of the amount by which her cash register was short. After an investigation by the Labor Department, the withheld amount was paid to plaintiff. No one ever said that she had stolen the missing money. At the time she was discharged, allegedly because of an excess of counter help, defendant was advertising for additional counter help. Plaintiff was denied state unemployment benefits because defendant said that she was laid-off because of numerous customer complaints, a bad attitude, and violation of company rules and policies. Plaintiff sued defendant to recover damages for wrongful discharge and for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The lower court gave summary judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appealed. The court of appeals reversed. On certiorari, the supreme court of Arkansas held: (1) that plaintiff had failed to establish a cause of action for breach of contract; (2) that one who by extreme and outrageous conduct willfully or wantonly causes severe emotional distress to another is subject to liability for such emotional distress and for bodily harm resulting from the distress (apparently first adoption of this tort as basis for liability in the state); and (3) that a fact issue existed as to whether the employer's conduct following plaintiff's discharge was so extreme and outrageous as to constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress, thereby precluding summary judgment. M.B.M. Co., Inc. v. Counce, 268 Ark. 269, 596 S.W.2d 681, 687, 688.

Ark.App.

Ark.App.1979. Quot. in sup. The plaintiff sued her former employer for the breach of a contract of employment at will, and for intentional infliction of emotional distress, claiming that she had been wrongfully discharged in retaliation for an alleged theft of money from the register at work. The trial court dismissed the complaint, but this court reversed on the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court adopted the Restatement approach and concluded that the plaintiff presented sufficient allegations to sustain a cause of action. The plaintiff's complaint alleged that her discharge was under the circumstances, an outrageous course of conduct, designed and intended to cause the plaintiff severe emotional distress, and that the actions were in retaliation for alleged stealing, despite the lack of evidence of any theft by the plaintiff. The plaintiff stated in her deposition that the defendant's conduct caused her great harm, made her nervous, provoked headaches and led to the plaintiff's humiliation in the community. Counce v. M.B.M. Company, Inc., 266 Ark. 1064, 597 S.W.2d 92, 94.

Cal.

Cal.2009. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former wife of decedent sued trustee of decedent's estate, alleging causes of action for sexual harassment under a state statute and intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant, and the court of appeals affirmed. Affirming, this court held that plaintiff failed to establish the elements of outrageous conduct and severe emotional distress for her IIED claim. The court explained that, viewed in the context of plaintiff's legal battles over a five-year period with defendant and the other two trustees regarding their allocation of trust funds, defendant's harsh and inappropriate language directed at plaintiff during a social event did not rise to the level of outrageous conduct under California case law; in addition, plaintiff's assertions that she suffered discomfort, worry, anxiety, upset stomach, concern, and agitation as the result of defendant's comments failed to establish the requisite degree of emotional distress. Hughes v. Pair, 46 Cal.4th 1035, 95 Cal.Rptr.3d 636, 209 P.3d 963, 976.

Cal.1993. Quot. in conc. and diss. op., com. (i) quot. in conc. and diss. op., com. (j) quot. in sup. Landowners who lived adjacent to a landfill and were subjected to prolonged exposure to certain carcinogens brought an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, against tire manufacturer whose hazardous wastes were disposed of at the landfill. The trial court entered judgment for plaintiffs, and the intermediate appellate court affirmed in part. Reversing in part and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that liability was precluded in the absence of a determination that defendant's extreme and outrageous conduct was directed at plaintiffs or undertaken with knowledge of their presence and consumption of the ground water, and with knowledge of a substantial certainty that they would suffer severe emotional injury on discovery of the facts. The court also held that plaintiffs must establish that their fear of cancer was reasonable. A concurring and dissenting opinion argued that there should be no requirement that plaintiffs show that defendants were aware of their individual existence or that defendants directed their hazardous conduct against identifiable persons in particular. Potter v. Firestone Tire and Rubber Co., 6 Cal.4th 965, 1006, 1014, 25 Cal.Rptr.2d 550, 576, 583, 863 P.2d 795, 821, 828.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Cal.1989. Subsecs. (1) and (2) cit. and quot. in conc. op., coms. (e), (f), (l) and caveat quot. in conc. op., com. (k) and subsec. (2)(a) cit. in conc. op. Two mothers sued a psychotherapist, a psychiatric clinic, and the clinic's owner and director for negligent infliction of emotional distress, alleging that the therapist, who treated plaintiffs and their sons for family emotional problems, sexually molested the boys at the clinic. The trial court sustained defendants' demurrer, and the court of appeal affirmed, holding that the mothers could not state a claim because they were neither "bystander witnesses" to the torts nor the immediate objects of the tortious conduct. Reversing, this court held that the mothers, as the therapist's patients, had standing to assert a claim of negligent infliction of emotional distress because the therapist's misconduct breached a duty of care to them and further disrupted their family relationship. A concurring justice argued that the facts also supported a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress because the therapist committed atrocious, outrageous, and offensive conduct within a relationship of trust. Marlene F. v. Affiliated Psychiatric Med. Clinic, 48 Cal.3d 583, 257 Cal.Rptr. 98, 104-108, 770 P.2d 278, 284-288.

Cal.1987. Com. (d) quot. in ftn., coms. (e) and (f) cit. in ftn. A firefighters' union representative was the object of repeated harassment by management personnel. After numerous attempts by management to dismiss the representative on false disciplinary charges or to force his retirement, the representative suffered a massive, debilitating stroke. He sued his employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court dismissed the case on the ground that it was in the jurisdiction of the workers' compensation board. The intermediate appellate court and this court affirmed, holding that since the plaintiff's disability was compensable under the workers' compensation statute, there was no public policy interest in holding the employer civilly liable, even if its conduct was outrageous enough for liability to attach in the absence of physical injury. Cole v. Fair Oaks Fire Protection Dist., 43 Cal.3d 148, 233 Cal.Rptr. 308, 312, 729 P.2d 743, 747.

Cal.1985. Com. (i) cit. in ftn. to conc. and diss. op. Parents sued a county after their child died in a juvenile hall infirmary. The trial court dismissed several counts of the complaint, and the parents sought a writ of mandate to compel the court to set aside that order. This court held that the parents' witnessing of the neglect of their son's pressing medical needs by the infirmary personnel stated a cause of action for negligent infliction of emotional distress. The court stated, however, that no cause of action existed for intentional infliction of emotional distress. A concurring and dissenting opinion argued that a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress should have been allowed, since reckless disregard of the probability of causing emotional distress was a sufficient standard for the tort. Ochoa v. Superior Court (Santa Clara County), 39 Cal.3d 159, 216 Cal.Rptr. 661, 703 P.2d 1, 27.

Cal.1984. Com. (k) cit. in case quot. in ftn. Homeowners who sued a chemical company for intentional infliction of emotional distress caused by water contamination sought a writ of mandate ordering the lower court to vacate its order compelling one homeowner to answer certain questions at her deposition. This court issued the writ of mandate, holding that the information sought was covered by the attorney-client privilege, which the homeowner had not waived by putting those communications directly at issue. The communications were not necessary to a fair adjudication of the claim, said the court, since evidence of the chemical company's outrageous conduct guaranteed that the homeowner's claim for emotional distress was genuine, and that such evidence would not focus on the homeowner's confidential communications with her attorney. Mitchell v. Superior Court (Shell Oil Co.), 37 Cal.3d 591, 208 Cal.Rptr. 886, 896, 691 P.2d 642, 652.

Cal.1982. Coms. (d) and (g) cit. in sup. The plaintiff was assaulted by a man who, at the time of the assault, was under surveillance by police. The police were watching a laundromat after several other staffing incidents had taken place there. Eventually they saw a man who they thought might be the attacker enter the laundromat. The plaintiff was the only customer in the laundromat at the time, and the police did not warn her of their suspicions. The suspect subsequently stabbed the plaintiff four times, and the plaintiff brought an action against the defendant city alleging negligence, as well as intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress. At trial, the court sustained the city's demurrer and the plaintiff appealed. This court affirmed the trial court. The court held that the mere fact that the police may have recognized the suspect as a possible assailant did not establish a "special relationship" which would impose a duty on the police to control his conduct. Recognition of the assailant did not impose a duty on the police to warn the plaintiff. As to the emotional distress claim, the police had not acted with the intent to cause emotional distress, nor was their behavior so extreme or outrageous as to be considered reckless. Davidson v. City of Westminster, 32 Cal.3d 197, 185 Cal.Rptr. 252, 259, 649 P.2d 894 (1982).

Cal.1979. Com. (d) quot. in part in disc. coms. (e) and (f) cit. in disc. Former employee sued former employer and certain supervisory employees to recover compensatory and punitive damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The plaintiff, a highly qualified professional, was employed by the defendant as a scheduling engineer. The plaintiff, a native of East India, held this position for approximately one year, when he was terminated. The incident precipitating the plaintiff's dismissal involved a confrontation between the plaintiff and his supervisor in which the supervisor shouted a racial epithet at the plaintiff and accused him of being unskilled and uncooperative. The trial court entered judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendants appealed. The defendants argue that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict on emotional distress, and punitive damages against the employer. The court acknowledged that ordinarily mere insulting language, without more, does not constitute outrageous conduct, but it affirmed the lower court's finding that the plaintiff presented substantial evidence that the supervisor's use of the racial epithet was outrageous, and that the supervisor acted knowingly and unreasonably with the intention to inflict mental distress and abused his position to humiliate plaintiff and also to recommend plaintiff's termination for reasons that were not true. The court held that an appropriate basis for the employer's liability is the rule that an employer is liable for the willful misconduct of his employees acting in a managerial capacity. Agarwal v. Johnson, 25 Cal.3d 932, 160 Cal.Rptr. 141, 150, 603 P.2d 58, 67, 68.

Cal.1979. Coms. (d) and (g) cit. in sup. The plaintiff had been shopping in a retail store when he was arrested by the defendant's security guard. The plaintiff sued the store, and others, on several grounds including the intentional infliction of emotional distress. The lower court sustained the defendant's motion for nonsuit on this claim. This court stated that the elements of a prima facie case for this tort were extreme and outrageous conduct by the defendant and emotional suffering by the plaintiff which was caused by the defendant's outrageous conduct. The court stated that the defendant's outrageous conduct must not have been privileged and so outrageous that it exceeded all bounds of civilized conduct. The court held that there was sufficient evidence to support the inference that the defendant had arrested the plaintiff knowing that he had not committed any crime and this evidence could have supported a possible jury verdict in favor of the plaintiff. The lower court's grant of nonsuit was held to have been error. Cervantez v. J. C. Penney Co., Inc., 24 Cal.3d 579, 156 Cal.Rptr. 198, 595 P.2d 975, 983.

Cal.1973. Quot. in part but dist. and coms. (a) and (b) quot. in part insup. The plaintiff sued the defendant insurance companies in tort to recover the benefits due on his fire insurance policies and for punitive damages. The plaintiff had been arrested for arson after his business was destroyed by fire. An agent of the defendants told the fire department inspector that the plaintiff had excessive insurance and also so testified at a hearing on the arson charge, which was later dismissed for lack of probable cause. While the charge was pending, the defendants asked the plaintiff to testify under oath; the plaintiff refused on account of the criminal charge. When the plaintiff later offered to testify, after the arson charge had been dismissed, the defendants refused this offer, and denied their liability because of the plaintiff's prior failure to appear. The plaintiff charged that the defendants thereby maliciously deprived him of his insurance benefits by encouraging the criminal charges and by requiring that he testify while knowing that he would not. The trial court sustained the demurrers of the insurance companies and their agents. The court reversed the trial court only with respect to the companies, holding that the plaintiff alleged a breach of their duty of good faith and fair dealing, and that the plaintiff would still be stating a valid cause of action even if he had breached his own duties under the policies, and even if the agent's statements had been privileged. However, the court upheld the trial court with respect to the companies' agents, since they were strangers to the insurance contracts and thus did not have the duty of good faith and fair dealing. The court also held that the plaintiff could recover punitive damages for his mental distress. Gruenberg v. Aetna Insurance Company, 9 Cal.3d 566, 108 Cal.Rptr. 480, 489, 510 P.2d 1032.

Cal.1970. Com. (h) quot. in sup. and com. (d) quot. in ftn. in sup. The court reversed a dismissal of a cause of action and instructed the trial court to overrule a demurrer where the plaintiff alleged that in a work dispute he suffered humiliation, mental anguish, and emotional and physical distress as a result of defendant's intentional and malicious conduct in using vituperative language and racial epithets toward the plaintiff, but the court affirmed a dismissal of a second cause of action for discharge solely because of race, holding that the state's equal accommodations statute did not extend to employment discrimination, which was covered by a separate statute that the plaintiff had waived in favor of union arbitration. Alcorn v. Anbro Engineering, Inc., 2 Cal.3d 493, 86 Cal.Rptr. 88, 468 P.2d 216, 219.

Cal.App.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Cal.App.2019. Com. (d) cit. and quot. in sup.; com. (f) and illus. (1) and (3) quot. in sup. Victim of sexual assault brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against nonprofit corporation, alleging that defendant's director, who was plaintiff's grandmother, caused plaintiff extreme distress by flying into a tirade and blaming plaintiff for being sexually assaulted by defendant's employee. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiff. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that the director's conduct constituted extreme and outrageous conduct as defined by Restatement Second of Torts § 46, because flying into a tirade against a child who had been drugged and raped, blaming her for the assault, and calling her "stupid," went beyond the bounds of decency tolerated in civilized communities, and the fact that the director knew about plaintiff's susceptibility to emotional distress increased the outrageousness of her conduct. The court rejected defendant's assertion relying on § 46, Comment d, that the director needed a special relationship with plaintiff for plaintiff to recover, because IIED claims under California law did not require such a relationship. Crouch v. Trinity Christian Center of Santa Ana, Inc., 253 Cal.Rptr.3d 1, 13-15.

Cal.App.2017. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Ex-girlfriend of former boxing champion sued boxer claiming, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress arising in substantial part from a series of social-media postings and public-radio comments about plaintiff. The trial court denied defendant's motion to strike plaintiff's claims under California's anti-SLAPP statute, finding that although defendant's conduct was protected by the anti-SLAPP statute, plaintiff had established a likelihood of prevailing on her claims and raised questions of fact for the jury to decide. This court affirmed in part as to plaintiff's intentional infliction of emotional distress claim, noting that it was based upon the entire range of defendant's conduct, not just the social-media postings and radio comments protected under California law. The court, quoting Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, cautioned that liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress has been found only where conduct was so extreme and outrageous to be intolerable in a civilized society. Jackson v. Mayweather, 217 Cal.Rptr.3d 234, 257.

Cal.App.2015. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Caregiver for an elderly woman who suffered from dementia brought claims for defamation and intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress against conservator of the woman's person and estate, case manager hired by conservator, and registered nurse who worked for case manager in connection with allegations that defendants sent emails to the woman's two daughters and other caregivers, falsely claiming that plaintiff was responsible for severe bruising and physical and mental injuries suffered by the woman. The trial court denied defendants' special motion to dismiss under the state's anti-SLAPP statute. Reversing and remanding, this court held that plaintiff failed to meet his burden to show that his complaint was legally sufficient and supported by a sufficient prima facie showing to support a favorable judgment. The court reasoned, in part, that plaintiff failed to allege outrageous conduct that was beyond all bounds of reasonable decency, as required to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Barker v. Fox & Associates, 192 Cal.Rptr.3d 511, 529.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Cal.App.2012. Cit. in sup. Employee brought sexual-harassment and other claims against co-worker, supervisor, and employer, alleging that co-worker and supervisor tried to get her drunk and convince her to have sex with them at and after a business-related social gathering; co-worker filed a cross-complaint against employee, alleging that she falsely reported to a nurse and to employer that he had sexually assaulted her. The trial court granted employee's special motion to strike co-worker's cross-complaint as meritless under a state statute prohibiting strategic lawsuits against public participation. Affirming, this court held, among other things, that co-worker failed to state a claim against employee for intentional infliction of emotional distress; employee's actions in allegedly reporting a sexual assault could not be considered extreme and outrageous. Aber v. Comstock, 212 Cal.App.4th 931, 954, 151 Cal.Rptr.3d 589, 607.

Cal.App.2012. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Volunteer coach of a fourth-grade basketball team brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against parent-teacher organization (PTO) and three other volunteers, after his services were terminated over a discipline problem with one of the players. The trial court denied PTO's motion to strike the complaint as a strategic lawsuit against public participation (SLAPP). While reversing and remanding the order denying the SLAPP motion, this court held that plaintiff failed to state an IIED claim, since there was no evidence that the complained-of conduct was outrageous, that it resulted in severe emotional distress, or that it was intentional or, at least, reckless. Hecimovich v. Encinal School Parent Teacher Organization, 203 Cal.App.4th 450, 476, 137 Cal.Rptr.3d 455, 476.

Cal.App.2012. Cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. Customer sued store and others, after a criminal prosecution against her for shoplifting terminated in her favor. The trial court sustained store's demurrer without leave to amend on customer's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming, this court held that a security guard's comment that he needed to make a "collar," and his actions in yelling "that's what you get" and "you're not welcome to shop here anymore" at customer as she was escorted out of the store, were insufficient to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress as a matter of law. The court noted that, ordinarily, merely insulting language, without more, did not constitute outrageous conduct. Johnson v. Ralphs Grocery Co., 204 Cal.App.4th 1097, 1108, 1109, 139 Cal.Rptr.3d 396, 406.

Cal.App.2010. Com. (j) cit. in sup. Pediatric dentist sued parents of patient, along with website, alleging libel per se and intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress in connection with a review that parents posted on website, allegedly containing false assertions criticizing the services dentist had provided to patient. The trial court denied defendants' anti-SLAPP motion to strike plaintiff's claims. This court reversed and remanded, holding, as to plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, that plaintiff's alleged emotional reaction, including loss of sleep and stomach upset, in response to being professionally criticized in a review on a website, however unjustified or defamatory that criticism might have been, did not constitute the sort of severe emotional distress of such lasting and enduring quality that no reasonable person should be expected to endure. Wong v. Tai Jing, 189 Cal.App.4th 1354, 1376, 117 Cal.Rptr.3d 747, 767.

Cal.App.2007. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (f) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former wife of decedent sued trustee of decedent's estate, alleging causes of action for sexual harassment under state law and intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant. Affirming, this court held that, because plaintiff had no cause of action for sexual harassment due to the lack of severe or pervasive conduct required by the state sexual-harassment statute, there was no outrageous conduct that would support an IIED claim; moreover, in the context of the legal battles between the parties over the trust, defendant's harsh and inappropriate language directed at plaintiff during a social event did not rise to the level of outrageous conduct under California case law. Hughes v. Pair, 154 Cal.App.4th 1469, 1486, 1487, 65 Cal.Rptr.3d 619, 631, 632.

Cal.App.2006. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Recipients of threatening e-mail messages ultimately traced back to employee of interactive-computer-service provider sued provider for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that while employee's repeated threats of physical harm directed to plaintiffs, stated in graphic terms, were acts of extreme and outrageous conduct intended to cause emotional distress that were sufficient to sustain an intentional-infliction claim, plaintiffs did not make a prima facie showing sufficient to support liability against provider for these acts. Delfino v. Agilent Technologies, Inc., 145 Cal.App.4th 790, 809, 52 Cal.Rptr.3d 376, 392, certiorari denied 552 U.S. 817, 128 S.Ct. 98, 169 L.Ed.2d 22 (2007).

Cal.App.2002. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Sister of nursing-facility patient brought suit for, in part, reckless infliction of emotional distress against facility's operator and administrator to recover for emotional distress she suffered as the result of sexual assault of patient while in defendants' facility. The trial court sustained a demurrer to plaintiff's claims. Affirming, this court held that plaintiff failed to state a cause of action for reckless infliction of emotional distress, since defendants' alleged nonfeasance in failing to provide adequate security was neither directed primarily at plaintiff nor calculated to cause plaintiff emotional distress, and plaintiff was not present at the time of the injury-causing event. Ess v. Eskaton Properties, Inc., 97 Cal.App.4th 120, 130, 118 Cal.Rptr.2d 240, 247.

Cal.App.1999. Com. (j) quot. in disc. and cit. in sup. Criminal defendant challenged his conviction under state's anti-stalking law. Reversing, this court held that the law was not unconstitutionally vague, but that the victim, who testified that defendant's actions caused her to feel afraid for herself and her children and to suffer sleepless nights, had failed to establish that she had experienced substantial emotional distress, as was required under the applicable statutory section. People v. Ewing, 76 Cal.App.4th 199, 90 Cal.Rptr.2d 177, 184.

Cal.App.1998. Com. (d) cit. and quot. in sup. and cit. in headnotes, com. (f) cit. in sup. A wife sued her former husband for breach of a palimony agreement and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. The husband had left a threatening phone message sarcastically indicating that he was delivering the wife a vacation package on an airline that recently suffered a publicized crash. The trial court dismissed. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that the phone message was not so extreme and outrageous so as to constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress. Absent evidence that defendant tried to follow through on any of his purported threats, defendant's statements were mere insults, threats, annoyances, or petty oppressions. Cochran v. Cochran, 65 Cal.App.4th 488, 76 Cal.Rptr.2d 540, 541, 543, 545-547.

Cal.App.1996. Com. (e) cit. and quot. in disc. Husband and wife retained a collection agency to enforce a judgment in the principal amount of $150,000. Based on agency's advice, couple gave the judgment debtor a full satisfaction of judgment in exchange for $40,000. Later, couple sued agency for, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendant had engaged in wrongful conduct in attempting to collect on the judgment. Trial court sustained a demurrer as to the fiduciary-duty and emotional-distress claims. This court reversed, holding, inter alia, that reasonable minds could differ as to whether defendant's conduct was sufficiently extreme and outrageous. Arguably, defendant abused a position that gave it power to adversely affect plaintiffs' interests. Defendant's alleged actions of affirmatively misrepresenting that an application to renew the judgment had been recorded, failing to inform plaintiffs that judgment debtor had transferred the property to his wife, and persuading plaintiffs to release judgment debtor from a judgment worth $250,000 for $40,000 may have been intentional and done with the foreseeable consequence that plaintiffs would suffer severe emotional distress once they discovered the truth. Cross v. Bonded Adjustment Bureau, 48 Cal.App.4th 266, 55 Cal.Rptr.2d 801, 811.

Cal.App.1996. Cit. and quot. in case quot. in sup., coms. (a) and (b) cit. in case quot. in sup. After a fire caused substantial damage to their home, insureds sued their homeowners' insurer to recover on a bad-faith theory for emotional distress resulting from a delay in resolving their claim for the restoration of their home after a fire. Trial court entered judgment on jury verdict for insureds. This court reversed and remanded, holding that emotional-distress damages were recoverable in a first-party bad-faith case only when the insured establishes financial loss, and that in this case there was no evidence of financial loss. There was no evidence in the record to support a claim that attorneys' fees were incurred by insureds or to suggest that insured wife incurred any financial obligation for her hospitalization. Waters v. United Services Auto. Ass'n, 41 Cal.App.4th 1063, 48 Cal.Rptr.2d 910, 916.

Cal.App.1995. Com. (d) cit. and quot. in sup. and cit. in headnotes. Parents sued television station on their children's behalf, alleging, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, after a station cameraman and employee informed the children that a neighbor had killed her children and then herself and then questioned the minors on camera to get their reaction to the news. Trial court denied defendants' motion for summary judgment. This court denied defendants' request for a writ of mandate directing trial court to vacate its decision, holding that a television reporter who attempts to deliberately manipulate the emotions of young children for some perceived journalistic advantage has engaged in extreme and outrageous conduct. It could be inferred that when defendants realized the minors were friends of the victims, they informed them of the news hoping that it would elicit an emotional response. KOVR-TV, Inc. v. Superior Court (Whittle), 31 Cal.App.4th 1023, 37 Cal.Rptr.2d 431, 431, 433, 435.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Cal.App.1995. Cit. in headnote, cit. but dist., com. (b) cit. in disc., com. (i) quot. in case quot. in ftn. Father and son who were involved in automobile accident with drunk driver and who waited seven years for a $35,000 judgment from driver's insurer sued insurer to recover damages for the emotional distress they allegedly suffered while awaiting payment. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiffs but this court reversed and remanded, holding that where the damage was purely financial, plaintiffs could not recover unless they showed a substantial injury other than the emotional distress or that the emotional distress itself was severe, substantial, or enduring. The court, distinguishing the instant action from one alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress, noted that plaintiffs failed to prove that they suffered any sort of emotional trauma beyond that normally associated with litigation. Torres v. Auto. Club of Southern Cal., 41 Cal.App.4th 468, 43 Cal.Rptr.2d 147, 147, 151, 153, review granted and opinion superseded 45 Cal.Rptr.2d 644, 902 P.2d 1297 (1995).

Cal.App.1994. Com. (e) quot. in diss. op. After automobile passengers who were injured in a rear-end collision settled their personal injury action against tortfeasor, they sued tortfeasor's insurer on a theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, to recover damages for insurer's alleged unfair settlement practices. This court affirmed the trial court's grant of defendant's motion for judgment on the pleadings on the ground that there was no preexisting relationship between the parties. The dissent argued that there was no requirement that there be a preexisting consensual relationship between the parties at the time defendant engaged in the tortious conduct alleged as intentional infliction of emotional distress in order that defendant's conduct might be considered to be outrageous. Krupnick v. Hartford, 28 Cal.App.4th 185, 34 Cal.Rptr.2d 39, 57.

Cal.App.1992. Com. (d) quot. in disc. and cit. in ftn., com. (g) cit. in disc. The plaintiff sued a savings and loan association, its president, and its attorneys for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that the defendants improperly initiated an interpleader action by naming the plaintiff as a claimant. The trial court dismissed the claim. Affirming, this court held that the defendants' wrongfully naming the plaintiff as a party to litigation did not rise to the level of outrageous conduct necessary to support a finding of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Cantu v. Resolution Trust Corp., 4 Cal.App.4th 857, 6 Cal.Rptr.2d 151, 169.

Cal.App.1990. Com. (d) quot. in disc. A schizophrenic woman of low intelligence was placed under the medical care of a doctor at a convalescent hospital. She became pregnant by another patient and was not given proper advice or care during her pregnancy, which led to the birth of an autistic and severely retarded son. The patient's conservator sued the doctor for medical malpractice and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict in favor of the plaintiff, awarding her compensatory and punitive damages on both claims. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that the jury's determination that the doctor intentionally inflicted severe emotional distress through his outrageous actions was proven at trial. It reasoned that the doctor consciously disregarded his responsibilities as a physician by: failing to perform adequate medical examinations on the plaintiff; failing to protect the plaintiff while she was locked in a facility where sexual activity was rampant; ignoring the plaintiff's requests for birth control; failing to warn the plaintiff of the dangers associated with the drugs he prescribed; and, failing to conduct a timely pregnancy test. Adams v. Murakami, 228 Cal.App.3d 885, 268 Cal.Rptr. 467, 470, review granted and opinion superseded 270 Cal.Rptr. 816, 793 P.2d 22 (1990), reversed in part and remanded 54 Cal.3d 105, 284 Cal.Rptr. 318, 813 P.2d 1348 (1991).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Cal.App.1990. Cit. in sup. Family and friends of decedents whose organs and gold fillings were removed without authorization and whose decedents were subject to mass cremation and commingling of their remains sued mortuaries, funeral homes, and crematoriums to which the mortuaries and funeral homes delivered the decedents' remains for cremation, as well as a biological supply company purchasing body parts and organs from the crematory defendants. The plaintiffs sued the mortuary and crematory defendants on theories of intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress and intentional and negligent interference with human remains, inter alia. This court granted the plaintiffs' petition for a writ of mandate seeking review of a pretrial order limiting the plaintiff class, and directed the trial court to vacate its order on standing. It held that all family members and close friends of the decedents had standing to sue for intentional mishandling of remains. However, where neither violent conduct against a living person nor the plaintiffs' immediate presence at the scene of the mishandling was alleged, the court agreed with the defendants that no member of the plaintiff class had standing to sue for negligent or intentional infliction of emotional distress. Christensen v. Superior Court, 230 Cal.App.3d 798, 271 Cal.Rptr. 360, 373.

Cal.App.1990. Com. (e) cit. in disc., com. (f) cit. in sup. A bank charged back a check on a customer's account and harassed the elderly customer to collect the amount of the charge back. The customer sued the bank alleging, among other things, conversion, negligence, and intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress. The trial court sustained the defendants' demurrer without leave to amend. Reversing in part, this court held, inter alia, that the plaintiff had alleged sufficient facts to support her cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because a jury could reasonably find the defendants' conduct to have been outrageous. The court found that the conduct of the bank, including pressuring the client every day to sign a promissory note, threatening to attach her funds, and continuing to make threatening calls after being directed to speak only with her attorney could constitute outrageous behavior, especially where the defendant knew the plaintiff was elderly and the charge back placed her into a difficult financial situation. Symonds v. Mercury Sav. and Loan Ass'n, 225 Cal.App.3d 1458, 275 Cal.Rptr. 871, 878.

Cal.App.1990. Quot. in case quot. in sup., coms. (a) and (b) quot. in case quot. in sup. A client sued an attorney for professional negligence and breach of fiduciary duty seeking damages for financial losses and severe emotional distress, alleging that the attorney had failed to properly advise her regarding termination procedures, resulting in a suit for wrongful termination by former employees. The trial court granted summary judgment for the attorney on the issue of emotional distress damages because the client failed to allege any intentional wrongdoing or bad faith. This court granted the client's petition for a writ of mandate and ordered the trial court to vacate its order granting summary judgment. The court noted that the primary reason for limiting recovery of damages for emotional distress was to prevent fictitious and frivolous claims, and concluded that the client, who had suffered substantial economic damages, did not need to demonstrate willful misconduct to recover emotional distress damages, as the existence of substantial economic loss and the already circumscribed liability of attorneys provided adequate safeguards. Tara Motors v. Superior Court (Jasper), 226 Cal.App.3d 640, 276 Cal.Rptr. 603, 608.

Cal.App.1989. Com. (h) cit. in disc. An employee who was told that she would be terminated, and subsequently told that she would be kept on, only to be terminated again within seven days, sued her employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered summary judgment in favor of the employer. This court affirmed, holding, as a matter of law, that the conduct of the employer in offering and withdrawing a termination package, directing the employee to perform "menial" receptionist tasks, and ultimately providing the employee with a less advantageous termination package than was originally offered did not qualify as outrageous conduct necessary to support an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. It noted that the plaintiff was not singled out in the companywide reduction in work force, and that the company had merely pursued its own economic interests and asserted its legal rights. Trerice v. Blue Cross of California, 209 Cal.App.3d 878, 257 Cal.Rptr. 338, 340.

Cal.App.1989. Com. (d) quot. in sup., com. (h) quot. in disc. The wife of an elderly and incompetent man, who had suffered from congestive heart failure and strokes that had rendered him ill for eight years, requested that no heroic measures be taken to prolong the man's life. After learning that a feeding tube had been inserted into her husband, the wife sued the responsible doctors for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court sustained the defendants' demurrers to the complaint without leave to amend. Affirming, this court held that the defendants' actions were not sufficiently extreme or outrageous to warrant relief, especially since the plaintiff made no attempt to have the tube removed either directly or by court intervention. The court also noted that other physicians similarly situated would have recommended and performed the surgical procedure. Westhart v. Mule, 213 Cal.App.3d 542, 261 Cal.Rptr. 640, 645.

Cal.App.1988. Com. (g) cit. in disc. The former owner of a company alleged that she was fraudulently induced to sell her controlling stock interest in the company to a third-party buyer by a bank's promise of long-term financing for the company. She sued the bank for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. The trial court entered judgment on the jury's verdict for the plaintiff. Reversing, this court held that the bank was privileged to pursue its own legal interests in liquidating company properties and was not subject to liability for infliction of emotional distress. Kruse v. Bank of America, 202 Cal.App.3d 38, 248 Cal.Rptr. 217, 234, cert. denied 488 U.S. 1043, 109 S.Ct. 869, 102 L.Ed.2d 993 (1989).

Cal.App.1988. Com. (j) quot. in disc. A city police dispatcher was arrested by the state highway patrol for possession of drugs and driving under the influence of drugs or alcohol. Although the arrest had not resulted in any conviction, the highway patrol released information pertaining to the arrest to the city that employed the dispatcher, and the city terminated the dispatcher's employment, due in part to this information. The dispatcher sued the city for labor code violations and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court dismissed the complaint. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that the plaintiff failed to state a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress because the mere allegation that he suffered shame, humiliation, and embarrassment without further factual explanation did not meet the required specificity of outrageous conduct by the defendant to support this claim, especially where the humiliation the plaintiff may have suffered was the result of his own unlawful conduct. Pitman v. City of Oakland, 197 Cal.App.3d 1037, 243 Cal.Rptr. 306, 311.

Cal.App.1987. Cit. in case cit. in disc., com. (h) quot. in disc. An employee sued his former employer for intentional infliction of mental distress after his alleged forced retirement. The trial court granted the employer's motion for summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that the challenged conduct could not reasonably be regarded as so extreme and outrageous to permit recovery, where the defendant's conduct consisted of abruptly presenting the plaintiff with an ultimatum concerning his continued employment, implying that the plaintiff was not working hard enough, making light of the plaintiff's importance to the firm, using offensive language, and making "impossible" demands. Duerksen v. Transamerica Title Ins. Co., 189 Cal.App.3d 647, 234 Cal.Rptr. 521, 526.

Cal.App.1987. Com. (h) quot. in case cit. in disc. A marketing manager sued his former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress following the termination of his employment contract. The trial court granted summary judgment to the employer on the ground that the employer had had good cause to discharge the plaintiff. Affirming, this court held that the record did not contain any finding of outrageous conduct on the part of the employer necessary for the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court concluded that the alleged accusations by the defendant of the plaintiff's disloyalty did not raise a triable issue of fact as to outrageousness, because even if they were made, the accusations were an accurate description of the plaintiff's conduct and were not extreme or outrageous. Fowler v. Varian Associates, Inc., 196 Cal.App.3d 34, 241 Cal.Rptr. 539, 545.

Cal.App.1987. Com. (d) cit. in sup. A handbuilt, custom-made automobile was extensively damaged in an accident. When the car's owner sued the other driver involved in the collision, the defendant's insurer offered the plaintiff an amount far less than it would cost to repair or replace the car. The plaintiff then sued the insurer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, based on the unreasonable settlement offer. The trial court overruled the insurer's demurrer. This court, however, sustained the demurrer on the ground that the nonpayment of a single disputed claim, even if wholly unreasonable, did not constitute sufficiently outrageous conduct to support the plaintiff's cause of action. The court said that such conduct must be so extreme as to exceed the bounds of what was usually tolerated in a civilized community. Pacific Nat. Ins. Co. v. Superior Court (Liptak), 198 Cal.App.3d 274, 233 Cal.Rptr. 189, 193.

Cal.App.1986. Coms. (e) and (f) cit. in disc. A patient who involuntarily remained on a ventilator sued the hospital for failure to honor his living will, which requested that he not be kept alive by artificial measures. The trial court dismissed the complaint. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that the trial court had properly dismissed the plaintiff's cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress because the outrageous conduct element necessary for a prima facie case was not present in this case where the evidence showed that the defendant had acted in reliance on what it believed to be prevailing community medical and legal standards, and had not used its superior position to intentionally harass or intimidate the plaintiff. Bartling v. Glendale Adventist Medical Center, 184 Cal.App.3d 961, 229 Cal.Rptr. 360, 365.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Cal.App.1986. Com. (j) cit. in disc. A doctor sued a malpractice attorney, alleging malicious prosecution, abuse of process, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court nonsuited the doctor on the intentional infliction and the abuse of process claims and entered judgment for the doctor on the malicious prosecution claim. Reversing the judgment on the malicious prosecution claim and affirming the rest of the judgment, this court held that the attorney's conduct in bringing an action against the doctor when he knew that the statute of limitations had already run was not the extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress. Devlin v. Fishman, 178 Cal.App.3d 260, 224 Cal.Rptr. 6, 10.

Cal.App.1986. Cit. in disc. Former members of a religious organization sued the organization, alleging fraud and deceit, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and false imprisonment. The religious organization counterclaimed for violation of civil rights as the result of deprogramming activities. The trial court granted summary judgment for the religious organization but dismissed the counterclaim. This court affirmed the judgment but reversed and remanded the judgment on the counterclaim. The court held that the plaintiffs' contentions of fraudulent misrepresentations and use of mind control techniques by the religious organization did not support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress; there was no evidence that the former members had been compelled to join the religious organization or had been prevented from leaving. The court found that the techniques used to recruit and indoctrinate the members, which were not materially different from those employed by other organizations, were not so indecent nor so beyond the limits of social toleration that they provided the necessary element of outrageous conduct. Molko v. Holy Spirit Ass'n for Unification, 179 Cal.App.3d 450, 224 Cal.Rptr. 817, 831.

Cal.App.1985. Com. (d) cit. in disc., com. (j) quot. in disc. Insureds sued insurance company alleging breach of implied covenants of good faith and fair dealing, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and negligent infliction of emotional distress. The suit arose when defendant informed plaintiffs that counsel retained by defendant represented only defendant in settlement negotiations and advised plaintiffs to retain independent counsel. Defendant then refused to pay for plaintiff's counsel. The trial court dismissed the complaint without leave to amend. This court reversed, ruling that the trial court erred in denying leave to amend. Regarding the emotional distress claims, the court held that although defendant's conduct was outrageous, plaintiffs had failed to establish facts indicating the extent of any mental suffering, and therefore had not stated a claim. Bogard v. Employers Cas. Co., 164 Cal.App.3d 602, 210 Cal.Rptr. 578, 587, 588.

Cal.App.1985. Quot. in sup., cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (l) quot. in sup. The plaintiff brought an action for loss of consortium and negligent infliction of emotional distress against the defendant, who had stabbed the decedent. The plaintiff and the decedent had lived together for two years, had had an infant son, and had planned to be married. The plaintiff and the decedent had been driving together when the defendant's car encroached on their lane and the decedent swerved to avoid a collision. The two vehicles came to a stop and an altercation ensued, during which the defendant drew a knife and stabbed the decedent. The plaintiff witnessed the incident from the auto and rushed to the decedent's side, where he died in her arms. The trial court sustained the defendant's demurrer to the plaintiff's claims. This court reversed in part. It held that the plaintiff had a cause of action for mental distress, since it was foreseeable that the defendant's stabbing of the decedent a few feet from the vehicle where the plaintiff was sitting would cause the loved one to suffer emotional distress. Ledger v. Tippitt, 164 Cal.App.3d 625, 210 Cal.Rptr. 814, 822, 823.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Cal.App.1984. Com. (d) quot. in part in sup., coms. (e) and (f) cit. in case quot. in sup. A mother sued the sitter of her child, who died of injuries sustained while the child was in the sitter's care, for negligent infliction of emotional distress. The trial court sustained the sitter's demurrer. This court issued a peremptory writ of mandate directing the trial court to overrule the demurrer, holding that the mother stated a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Although the complaint did not designate the sitter's conduct as outrageous, the court held, it alleged facts and circumstances that reasonably could have led an average community member to conclude that the sitter's conduct was extreme and outrageous and had a severe and traumatic effect on the mother's emotional tranquility. Miller v. Superior Court (Gondringer), 161 Cal.App.3d 1205, 208 Cal.Rptr. 25, 30.

Cal.App.1984. Cit. in disc., com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. (Erron. cit. as § 56, com. (d).) The plaintiff was injured in an accident negligently caused by the driver of the defendant's vehicle. When the plaintiff rejected the defendant's settlement offer, the defendant closed the claim, asserting the statute of limitations. The plaintiff alleged intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court ruled that the action was barred by the statute of limitations. This court affirmed in part and reversed in part. It noted that the defendant's actions were not taken for the purpose of causing emotional distress and the conduct was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress. Muraoka v. Budget Rent A Car, Inc., 160 Cal.App.3d 107, 206 Cal.Rptr. 476, 484.

Cal.App.1984. Com. (d) quot. in ftn. in case cit. in sup. A marketing manager, who was discharged as a result of her romantic involvement with a manager of a rival firm, sued her employer for wrongful discharge and intentional infliction of emotional distress. She was awarded compensatory and punitive damages. This court affirmed, holding that the evidence clearly supported the jury finding that the employer's conduct was so extreme and outrageous as to exceed all possible bounds of decency and was to be regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized society, so that the emotional distress cause of action was amply proved and supported the award of punitive damages. Rulon-Miller v. International Bus. Mach. Corp., 162 Cal.App.3d 241, 208 Cal.Rptr. 524, 534.

Cal.App.1984. Quot. in ftn. Wife sued hospital for negligent infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendant knew or should have known that her husband would fall and be injured without the use of safety rails, and that she would suffer emotional distress as a result. This court affirmed the trial court's dismissal, holding that plaintiff could not recover when she did not witness the accident, and that she was not a direct victim of defendant's negligence. The court also rejected plaintiff's argument that she was entitled to emotional distress damages based on breach of contract, refusing to extend that theory beyond the negligent mishandling of a corpse. The dissent argued that plaintiff was a direct victim because her emotional distress was a foreseeable consequence of defendant's negligence, and that she should have been allowed to amend her complaint to include emotional distress based on breach of contract. The dissent also noted that courts had allowed negligent infliction of emotional distress claims where defendant's conduct was extreme and outrageous. Wiggins v. Royale Convalescent Hosp., 158 Cal.App.3d 914, 206 Cal.Rptr. 2, 7.

Cal.App.1983. Quot. in sup., com. (e) cit. in sup. and quot. in ftn. in sup., com. (f) quot. in ftn. in sup., illus. 8 cit. in sup., illus. 12 quot. in ftn. in sup. A hospital patient sought a writ of mandate to compel the trial court to vacate an order granting partial summary judgment for the hospital on the patient's cause of action against the hospital for intentional infliction of emotional distress. That action was based on a telephone call to the patient by a debt collector from the hospital's business office, made while the patient was still under the effects of her surgery, in which the debt collector allegedly persisted in demanding payment in a rude and offensive manner. This court held that material issues of fact existed as to whether the hospital's method of seeking payment was reasonable in light of the patient's alleged delicate physical and emotional state at the time of the call. The writ of mandate sought by the patient was issued. Bundren v. Superior Ct. of County of Ventura, 145 Cal.App.3d 784, 193 Cal.Rptr. 671, 674, 675.

Cal.App.1983. Cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. An employer and his wife appealed from an order of the lower court dismissing their fifth amended complaint against a union, its local, and several members. That complaint alleged intentional infliction of emotional distress and loss of consortium, based on constant harassment and threats made by union members to the employer, which conduct was allegedly so severe that it eventually caused that employer to suffer a heart attack, and his wife to suffer loss of consortium. This court reversed, holding, inter alia, that the fifth amended complaint sufficiently alleged outrageous conduct, and thus stated a cause of action against the defendants for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and the facts alleged were also sufficient to constitute a cause of action in favor of the employer's wife for loss of consortium. Kiseskey v. Carpenters' Trust For S. Cal., 144 Cal.App.3d 222, 192 Cal.Rptr. 492, 497.

Cal.App.1983. Com. (b) cit. in sup. An actor sued a television studio and two of its officers, and after the jury awarded damages to the actor on the theories of breach of contract, tortious breach of contract, and fraud, the defendants appealed. This court ruled that the jury verdict on the issue of tortious breach of contract was supported by substantial evidence of bad faith action on the part of the defendants which was extraneous to the contract and was intended to frustrate the actor's enjoyment of his contract rights. The court also held that the somewhat speculative nature of the damages suffered by the actor was a risk borne by the defendants who had breached the contract and caused those damages. The court further held that since the jury had determined that the actor had suffered actual damage through interference with his contractual rights, its award of damages for emotional distress under a fraud theory was appropriate. After rejection of a cross-appeal by the actor on the question of a trial court reduction in the amount of damages awarded to him, the court affirmed the lower court judgment in all respects. Smithers v. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, 139 Cal.App.3d 643, 189 Cal.Rptr. 20, 24.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Cal.App.1980. Com. (d) quot. in part in disc. and coms. (e) and (h) quot. in disc., com. (e) quot. in ftn. in disc. The plaintiff, an investigative reporter, brought an action against his publisher, alleging that comments by the publisher to an outside journalist were slanderous. The plaintiff also brought an action against two officials of the newspaper, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress. Both causes of action were dismissed, and the plaintiff appealed. The appellate court found that comments made by the plaintiff's employer constituted an opinion and were not actionable. As to the second cause of action, the court stated that a plaintiff can recover for emotional distress that was intentionally inflicted where there was an extreme and outrageous invasion of plaintiff's mental and emotional tranquility. The judgment of dismissal of the first cause of action was affirmed, and the judgment of dismissal as to the second cause of action was reversed. Lagies v. Copley, 110 Cal.App.3d 958, 168 Cal.Rptr. 368, 377, 378.

Cal.App.1980. Cit. in sup. and com. (k) cit. in sup. Plaintiff tenant brought this action against his former landlord and rental agents for damages allegedly resulting from the dilapidated and unsafe condition of the premises. Plaintiff alleged six causes of action based on the following theories: breach of warranty of habitability, nuisance, intentional infliction of mental distress, negligent violation of statutory duty, constructive eviction, and injunctive relief from unlawful business practices. The trial court struck all causes of action from the complaint other than the cause of action for breach of warranty of habitability. This court affirmed in part and reversed in part, holding that the tenant's remedies were not limited to an action against the landlord for breach of the warranty of habitability, but included the right to sue the landlord and his agents in tort for damages for intentional infliction of mental distress and injury to personal property suffered as a result of the failure to maintain the premises. Regarding the cause of action for intentional infliction of mental distress, the court stated that the right to recover without physical injury is clearly established in California in situations involving extreme and outrageous conduct; whether this was the case under the present allegations was deemed to present a factual question. Stoiber v. Honeychuck, 101 Cal.App.3d 903, 162 Cal.Rptr. 194, 202.

Cal.App.1979. Cit. in diss. op. and com. (b) cit. in diss. op. The plaintiff claimed a loss of consortium and negligent infliction of emotional distress because the defendant doctor had negligently misdiagnosed the plaintiff's wife's condition as syphilis. The lower court sustained the defendant's demurrer and the plaintiff appealed. This court held that a cause of action for loss of consortium did not exist because the loss did not result from physical injuries to the spouse but rather from a misdiagnosis. This court also held that the plaintiff had not stated a cause of action for the negligent infliction of emotional distress because the requirements of a corresponding physical injury and foreseeability were not met. The dissent argued that because the doctor had discussed the plaintiff with the spouse the foreseeability requirement had been met. The dissent also argued that physical injury should not be a requirement in cases involving the negligent infliction of mental distress. In any case the dissent noted that outrageous conduct was necessary only in cases based upon the intentional infliction of mental distress and not in cases based upon the negligent infliction of emotional distress. Molien v. Kaiser Foundation Hospitals, 96 Cal.App.3d 469, 158 Cal.Rptr. 107, 118, opinion vacated 27 Cal.3d 916, 167 Cal.Rptr. 831, 616 P.2d 813 (1980).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Cal.App.1978. Com. (d) quot. in part in disc.; coms. (e) and (f) cit. in disc. A former employee brought an action against his former employer and certain supervisory employees to recover compensatory and punitive damages for defamation and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The lower court rendered judgment for the plaintiff against certain defendants, and such defendants appealed. The major contentions on appeal concerned the sufficiency of evidence of malice and intentional infliction of emotional distress, and the correctness of the jury instructions on an employer's liability for intentional torts of his employees and the proper measure of damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court found that the evidence supported the jury's verdict in favor of the employee for defamation and intentional infliction of emotional distress. However, the court held, inter alia, that the giving of an instruction which left the jury with the impression that the employer was liable for all types of damages and which did not clearly qualify the criteria required for assessment of punitive damages against an employer for acts of an employee was reversible error in view of conflicting evidence pertaining to the liability of the employer and the supervisory personnel and where the instructions also authorized the jury to award damages for economic loss resulting from intentional infliction of emotional distress. Accordingly, the judgment of the lower court was reversed. Agarwal v. Johnson, 81 Cal.App.3d 513, 146 Cal.Rptr. 521, 527, 528.

Cal.App.1977. Quot. in sup. and coms. (j) and (h) quot. in sup. Homeowners brought an action against a contractor to recover damages which allegedly occurred when the contractor, engaged in construction which necessitated removal of a portion of the homeowners' roof, failed to take steps to protect their home and belongings from an ensuing rainstorm. The lower court awarded actual damages and damages for emotional distress upon a jury verdict, and the contractor appealed. The court noted the Restatement position that “some degree of transient and trivial emotional distress is a part of the price of living among people.” It recognized that the Restatement's equating of reckless with intentional extreme and outrageous conduct is embodied in the law of California. The court considered the evidence upon which plaintiffs based their allegation of emotional distress and concluded that “it may not reasonably be deemed to disclose ‘extreme and outrageous intentional (or reckless) invasions of (their) mental and emotional tranquility’. It follows that insofar as the judgment awards damages for emotional distress, it was erroneously entered.” Judgment modified by striking awards for emotional distress, and, as so modified, affirmed. Fuentes v. Perez, 66 Cal.App.3d 163, 136 Cal.Rptr. 275, 277, 278, 279.

Cal.App.1977. Cit. in sup. The plaintiff prevailed in a legal malpractice suit, but was denied recovery for emotional suffering by the lower court. The court affirmed, stating that damages for emotional distress, without physical injuries, are recoverable only in instances of intentional and unreasonable infliction of distress by means of extreme and outrageous invasions of tranquility, and not in a case where an attorney has been merely careless and inattentive. Quezada v. Hart, 67 Cal.App.3d 754, 136 Cal.Rptr. 815, 820.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Cal.App.1976. Coms. (d), (e), (f), and (k) quot. in sup. Com. (j) cit. in sup. A tenant brought suit against the owner of an apartment building seeking declaratory and injunctive relief as well as damages for mental distress in connection with alleged threats to evict her. The lower court granted judgment for the defendants on all causes of action. On appeal, the court affirmed judgment that the plaintiff was not entitled to injunctive or declaratory relief, but reversed the judgment as to the cause of action for intentional infliction of mental distress. In reversing, the court stated that the defendant's conduct in using insulting language and humiliating and harassing the tenant constituted outrageous conduct, and, therefore, the question as to whether the tenant should be allowed to recover should have been submitted to the jury. Newby v. Alto Rivieria Apartments, 60 Cal.App.3d 288, 131 Cal.Rptr. 547, 553, 554.

Cal.App.1974. Com. (g) cit. in disc. This action was brought by a former employee of the defendant for defamation, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and wrongful discharge from employment, subsequent to the employee's forced retirement for falsifying sick leave and the discussion of the matter with the employee's subordinates. Affirming a judgment adverse to the employee, this court held, inter alia, that it was not error for the judge to refuse to give certain of the employee's proposed instructions based on the Restatement where they were in substance covered in other instructions. Deaile v. General Tel. Co., 40 Cal.App.3d 841, 115 Cal.Rptr. 582, 587.

Cal.App.1972. Cit. but dist. Insured's restaurant burned, and he was charged with arson. He alleged that his insurers (1) through an adjuster made statements to the official arson investigator and at his preliminary hearing concerning excessive coverage; (2) demanded through their attorneys that insured submit to an oral examination under oath and demanded his records; (3) refused to delay the examination until the criminal matter had been heard or to pay on the policies due to insured's failure to appear for the examination. Although the criminal charges were dropped for lack of probable cause, the court held that the insurer's conduct was not sufficiently extreme or "atrocious" and "utterly intolerable in a civilized community" to be actionable. Gruenberg v. Aetna Insurance Company, 103 Cal.Rptr. 887, 891, superseded 9 Cal.3d 566, 108 Cal.Rptr. 480, 510 P.2d 1032. See above case.

Cal.App.1971. Com. (e) cit. in sup. This was an action brought by tenants against their landlord to recover for damages for intentional infliction of mental distress, among other things. The court held that where the tenants vacated the premises after the landlord raised the rents by an unfair and unreasonable amount allegedly in response to demands for repairs to be made, the complaint stated a cause of action for intentional infliction of mental distress, since California provided that remedy despite lack of physical injury to the plaintiffs. Aweeka v. Bonds, 20 Cal.App.3d 278, 97 Cal.Rptr. 650, 652.

Cal.App.1971. Cit. and quot., com. (h) cit. and quot., com. (d) quot. inpart, coms. (i) and (j) cit. and quot. in part, com. (c) and caveat cit., andcoms. (e) and (f) cit. and quot. in ftn. in sup., also cit. and quot. s 46, Tentative Draft 1. The plaintiff's husband and wife, alleged that the defendants knowingly, maliciously and with intent to inflict extreme mental suffering and duress upon the plaintiffs and their family caused an agent of the defendants to go to the home of the plaintiff at midnight to serve a process and pounded in aloud and boisterous manner upon the front door thereby awakening the plaintiffs and the neighborhood although the house was unlit and service of the summons had never been attempted at a reasonable time and manner. The plaintiffs alleged that as a result they became "frightened, upset, nervous and humiliated" and suffered extreme and severe mental distress. The court held that each plaintiff stated a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Golden v. Dungan, 20 Cal.App.3d 295, 97 Cal.Rptr. 577, 581-4, 585, 586, 588.

Cal.App.1971. Com. (g) cit. in sup. The plaintiffs, owners of real property, sought to recover damages from the defendants, their real estate agents, on theories of fraud, malicious prosecution, and intentional infliction of emotional distress for alleged manufacturing of a document and perjuring testimony in a prior suit. The court held that although the plaintiff's cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress did not constitute a collateral attack upon the judgment in the prior action, the plaintiffs were not entitled to any relief on that cause of action because the testimony of the defendants was absolutely privileged as publication made in the course of a judicial proceeding. Kachig v. Boothe, 22 Cal.App.3d 626, 99 Cal.Rptr. 393, 403.

Cal.App.1970. Com. (g) and illus. cit. in sup., com. (j) cit. and quot. insup., com. (e) cit. in sup. Plaintiff, permanently disabled, was collecting monthly accident benefit payments, due to run for 30 years. To avoid paying over $50,000 under the policy, the defendant insurer's co-defendant claims manager, by concededly outrageous conduct, schemed to make plaintiff surrender his policy or settle for sickness benefits, which ran for a maximum of two years. Plaintiff brought an action in three counts: 1) seeking a declaration that he was entitled to monthly benefits under the accident provision, 2) seeking compensatory and punitive damages for alleged fraud in inducing the plaintiff to buy the policy, and 3) seeking compensatory and punitive damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress upon the plaintiff. The defendants conceded count one. The court granted defendants' motion for a nonsuit on count two. Judgment on count three in plaintiff's favor (with punitive damages reduced because of passion and prejudice) was affirmed by the court, holding that: 1) defendants' bad faith and conduct in refusing to release payments and making false threatening communications to the plaintiff to surrender his policy or settle disadvantageously a nonexistent dispute was tortious and could be the basis of an action for damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress and 2) such conduct, independently of the first holding, constitutes a tortious interference with a protected property interest for which compensatory damages may be recovered for economic loss as well as emotional distress from the conduct or for the economic loss caused by the conduct, and, in a proper case, punitive damages. The court affirmed the trial court's handling of damages and refused to reverse because of technically deficient jury charges which in its judgment did not alter the verdict. Fletcher v. Western National Life Insurance Co., 10 Cal.App.3d 376, 89 Cal.Rptr. 78, 88, 89, 90, 91, 95.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Cal.App.1970. Com. (g) cit. in sup. Plaintiff petitioned for a writ of mandate to command the respondent court to vacate its order expunging plaintiff's lis pendens. For the expungement of the lis pendens, statute required defendant to prove that plaintiff's action was "not in good faith" and for an "improper purpose." The court found that defendant's evidence on both of these points was insufficient, and stated that plaintiff's yelling over the phone that he would "take defendant for all he was worth" and that he would "tie up the property" and force its sale, was merely an assertion of plaintiff's legal rights. United Professional Plan. v. Superior Court of Orange County, 9 Cal.App.3d 377, 88 Cal.Rptr. 551, 562.

Cal.App.1968. Com. (g) cit. in sup. The plaintiff landowner, an85-year-old man, sought to recover damages from the defendant, his adjoining landowner, for intentional infliction of emotional distress when his heart condition was aggravated from a verbal argument with the defendant's agents as they were removing a fence on the parties' disputed boundary line. Although the court recognized the tort asserted by the plaintiff, it found that a requisite for that tort was the defendant's intent to cause emotional distress, that the defendant's agents were privileged to enter on the land and to exercise reasonable force to protect their principal's land from the plaintiff's intrusion, if the land were in fact that of the defendant, and that a judgment for the plaintiff must be reversed and remanded to permit the defendant to present his proffered evidence to establish that the fence was on his land. Daluiso v. Boone, 73 Cal.Rptr. 105, 110, 111, superseded, 71 Cal.2d 484, 78 Cal.Rptr. 707, 455 P.2d 811 (1969).

Cal.App.1966. Com. (i) cit. in sup. The plaintiffs, two minors, brought actions through their guardians against the defendant to recover for emotional sexual disorders allegedly resulting from the defendant's allegedly willfully inflicting mental distress upon the plaintiffs. Then a 15-year-old girl and13-year-old boy, the plaintiffs had resided in the defendant's home a short time after the dissolution of their parents' marriage. The defendant had written a book advocating, and verbally advocated, that right and wrong in sexual matters was relative, had administered a written sex test to a group including the plaintiffs, and had, in his study, drinking glasses with pictures of nude women on them, which the plaintiffs had observed. Although intentional infliction of mental distress was recognized as a tort, as it was not found that the defendant intended or was reckless in that he should have recognized that any of his conduct would cause the resultant harm, the denial of the defendant's motion for judgment n.o.v. was reversed. Spackman v. Good, 245 Cal.App.2d 518, 54 Cal.Rptr.78, 84, 85.

Colo.

Colo.1999. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. generally in case quot. in disc. Former employee who had conducted illegal undercover narcotics investigations of other employees on instructions of his supervisors sued employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that the supervisors fired him to cover up their involvement in the investigations. The trial court granted defendant's motion to dismiss, and the court of appeals affirmed in part and reversed in part. Reversing and remanding, this court held that plaintiff failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress because defendant's alleged behavior did not rise to the high level of outrageous conduct required by Colorado law. Coors Brewing Co. v. Floyd, 978 P.2d 663, 666.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Colo.1994. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. in sup. Parents sued crematorium, county, and others responsible for mistakenly cremating their son's body, asserting claims for conversion and outrageous conduct. The trial court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the court of appeals affirmed. Again affirming, this court held, inter alia, that, as a matter of law, those involved in the mistaken cremation did not act so recklessly or intentionally as to support a claim of outrageous conduct. Culpepper v. Pearl Street Bldg., Inc., 877 P.2d 877, 882, 883.

Colo.1988. Quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. and quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. in disc. An employee sued her employer for wrongful discharge, defamation, and outrageous conduct after she was discharged for alleged dishonesty. The trial court granted the employer summary judgment. The intermediate appellate court affirmed. This court affirmed summary judgment on the outrageous conduct claim, holding that the employer's failure to comport with its own progressive discipline policy described in its personnel manual did not constitute outrageous conduct. The court also reversed in part and remanded, holding that material issues of fact existed regarding the wrongful discharge claim and the defamation claim. Churchey v. Adolph Coors Co., 759 P.2d 1336, 1350, 1351.

Colo.1988. Com. (d) quot. in disc. An ex-husband and his ex-wife sued a priest and a diocese for negligence, outrageous conduct, and breach of a fiduciary duty after the priest engaged in sexual relations with the wife while the husband and wife were seeking marriage counseling from the priest. The trial court dismissed the plaintiffs' claims. The intermediate appellate court affirmed. This court affirmed in part and reversed in part, holding, inter alia, that the complaint's allegations of outrageous conduct were sufficient to withstand a motion to dismiss. Destefano v. Grabrian, 763 P.2d 275, 286.

Colo.1970. Quot. in part in sup. and com. (d) cit. in case, cit. in sup.The court reversed the dismissal of a suit by a plaintiff-debtor complaining of invasion of privacy and intentional or reckless infliction of emotional distress, without impact, by the defendant creditor. The court recognized the existence of the tort of invasion of privacy and concluded that the complaint stated a claim upon which relief can be predicated. The court remanded for a jury determination of whether defendant's conduct was extreme and outrageous. Rugg v. McCarty, 476 P.2d 753, 756.

Colo.App.

Colo.App.2011. Cit. in sup., quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) cit. in sup., com. (e) cit. and quot. in sup., com. (f) quot. in sup. Wife and sons of a nursing-home patient who died of a heart attack sued owner of nursing facility, among others, asserting, inter alia, a claim for outrageous conduct. The trial court entered a judgment on a jury verdict for wife. Reversing, this court held that nursing facility was entitled to a directed verdict on the outrageous-conduct claim, because evidence that the facility's employees were abrupt, irresponsible, and lacking in sensitivity in responding to wife's requests for help, and that they did not attend closely to patient while his condition was deteriorating was not sufficient to create a jury question on outrageousness. Reigel v. SavaSeniorCare L.L.C., 292 P.3d 977, 990-992.

Colo.App.2009. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup., coms. (e) and (f) quot. in conc. and diss. op. Widow of murdered store owner brought a claim for extreme and outrageous conduct, inter alia, against newspaper, alleging that she suffered emotional stress and humiliation in the Korean community and that her reputation was injured after newspaper published and later retracted a column in a popular community newspaper falsely stating that she had not testified at or attended the murder trial of her husband's alleged killer. The trial court granted partial summary judgment on the claim. This court reversed, holding that a reasonable juror could find newspaper's conduct outrageous because its column recklessly impugned widow's integrity by stating that widow, a crime victim, was disloyal to her late husband, whose murder she had witnessed. A concurring and dissenting opinion disagreed, arguing that defendants' actions did not fall within typical categories of extreme and outrageous conduct, since there was no pre-existing legal relationship between defendants and widow, and no particular evidence why defendants should have known that widow was peculiarly susceptible to emotional stress. Han Ye Lee v. Colorado Times, Inc., 222 P.3d 957, 963, 969, 970.

Colo.App.2004. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Police officer sued radio talk show host for defamation and outrageous conduct, alleging that defendant stated on his talk show that plaintiff was the person who had stabbed another police officer and that he had a history of domestic violence and had engaged in an extramarital affair. Trial court granted defendant summary judgment on the claim for outrageous conduct. This court affirmed in part, holding, inter alia, that defendants' conduct was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to go beyond all bounds of decency in a civilized community. Gordon v. Boyles, 99 P.3d 75, 82.

Colo.App.2001. Com. (d) cit. in sup. Construction company sued modular-home purchasers for breach of contract and enforcement of lien. Purchasers counterclaimed for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that during the dispute over nonpayment, the company's officer threatened to “rip the house down.” Trial court entered summary judgment for construction company. This court affirmed in part, holding, inter alia, that the company's conduct was not outrageous, because the officer's threat was in contemplation of litigation, was momentary in nature, and was soon retracted. Bob Blake Builders, Inc. v. Gramling, 18 P.3d 859, 866.

Colo.App.2000. Com. (e) cit. in disc. After car lessor sued lessees, alleging that they were in default for failure to make lease payments, lessees counterclaimed and brought a third-party suit against the original lessor who subsequently assigned the lease, alleging outrageous conduct, among other claims. Trial court entered judgment on jury verdict for lessees. This court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded, holding, inter alia, that trial court did not err in denying lessor's motion for directed verdict on the outrageous-conduct claim, because reasonable persons could differ as to whether lessor's conduct was sufficiently extreme to result in liability. Lessor's refusal to give lessee the keys to his car when he requested them and lessor's employees' use of strong-arming during negotiations, committing fraudulent acts, and falsifying documents related to the lease transaction could be considered extreme and outrageous conduct. Roget v. Grand Pontiac, Inc., 5 P.3d 341, 345.

Colo.App.1996. Com. (g) cit. in headnote and disc. After a truck driver was fired because of his having suffered a heart attack, the driver sued the employer, its president, and the employer's supply company, alleging violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act, the state antidiscrimination act, outrageous conduct, and negligent infliction of emotional distress. Trial court entered judgment on jury verdict for plaintiff. This court reversed and remanded, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state a cognizable claim for outrageous conduct. The court stated that, although legislative enactments had made unlawful the actions of employers who discharge employees because of a disability, not every violation of such laws is outrageous. It stated that to hold that every discrimination claim automatically constituted outrageous conduct would stretch the tort far beyond its intended boundaries. Bigby v. Big 3 Supply Co., 937 P.2d 794, 796, 800.

Colo.App.1989. Com. (h) cit. in sup. A railroad filed suit to enjoin landowners' water use, and sued the landowners in trespass, private nuisance, and negligence, because the landowners allegedly were irrigating illegally and water was undermining the structural integrity of one of the railroad's tunnels; the defendants counterclaimed for outrageous conduct. At trial, injunctive relief was denied, and the jury found for the landowners on the trespass, nuisance, and negligence claims and also awarded $50,000 for outrageous conduct to one of the landowners. This court affirmed in part as to the claims of trespass, negligence, and nuisance, but reversed in part as to the jury award for outrageous conduct, holding that threatening to suspend water rights and to bring the dispute to court, and attempting to negotiate a cessation of the landowners' use of water rights were insufficient actions to have the issue of outrageous conduct presented to the jury. It noted that the defendant did not accompany its harsh words with equally repugnant actions, nor did it imply that it had some special influence with the court. Denver and Rio Grande v. Forster, 773 P.2d 612, 614.

Colo.App.1988. Quot. in disc., subsecs. (1), (2) and (2)(a) cit. in sup. A decedent's parents sued a hospital and a physician for breach of contract and outrageous conduct after their son died from a ruptured aorta caused by a diving accident. The trial court found in favor of the defendants. Affirming, this court held that the defendants' failure to diagnose a ruptured aorta upon three separate trips to the hospital, instead diagnosing a muscle cramp to explain the son's chest pain, was not outrageous conduct where it was directed at the decedent, not the plaintiffs, and where the plaintiffs did not witness the conduct in question. Bradshaw v. Nicolay, 765 P.2d 630, 632.

Colo.App.1987. Quot. in disc. An agent contracted with a principal to operate a catalog sales agency. After the agent refused to pay his remittances to the principal, the principal removed all the goods from the agent's place of business and changed the locks on all the doors. The agent sued the principal for outrageous conduct, inter alia. This court affirmed the trial court's judgment for the agent, holding that, although the jury determines the ultimate question of whether conduct is outrageous, the trial court decides whether the issue should be submitted to the jury in the first instance, based on whether reasonable persons could differ on the conduct being outrageous. The court concluded that, since reasonable persons could differ on the question of whether the principal's conduct was outrageous, submission of the issue to the jury was not error. Montgomery Ward & Co., Inc. v. Andrews, 736 P.2d 40, 46.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Colo.App.1986. Com. (g) cit. in sup. A newspaper company decided to phase out its use of independent distributors and administer distribution through its own district managers. During the course of this phase-out, one of the paper's independent distributors experienced delivery and billing problems and decided to terminate his contract with the company and to withhold payment to the company to give him leverage in his final accounting with the paper. When they were unable to settle on a final accounting, the newspaper sued the distributor to recover on the open account, and the distributor counterclaimed for outrageous conduct and breach of contract. The trial court directed a verdict for the distributor on the plaintiff's claim, directed a verdict for the newspaper on the counterclaim for outrageous conduct, and a jury found for the distributor on the breach of contract claim and awarded him damages. Both parties appealed. This court affirmed, holding that the newspaper's conduct was not outrageous because it was merely implementing its business judgment to convert independent distributorships to salaried district managers in a permissible manner, and also held that the damages that could be awarded to the distributor were limited because the parties' contract was terminable at will. Denver Pub. Co. v. Kirk, 729 P.2d 1004, 1007, appeal after remand 818 P.2d 262 (Colo.1991).

Colo.App.1986. Subsec. (1) cit. in sup. After a dentist administered certain pretreatment drugs to the plaintiff's son, the son suffered cardiac arrest and later was pronounced dead. The plaintiff sued the dentist on theories of wrongful death, outrageous conduct, negligent infliction of emotional distress, lack of informed consent, and breach of implied contract. The trial court awarded the defendant summary judgment on all claims except wrongful death. Affirming, this court held that the mother was unable as a matter of law to recover for negligent infliction of emotional distress and outrageous conduct because she was not subjected to any threat of direct harm herself and she was not present when her son suffered the harm. Hale v Morris, 725 P.2d 26, 29.

Colo.App.1983. Coms. (d) and (h) cit. in disc. An employee and his wife brought suit against his employer seeking damages for the employer's alleged libel and slander, outrageous conduct, and conversion of the plaintiff's property, arising from a truck accident in which the plaintiff was injured during the course of his employment. The trial court dismissed the libel and slander and outrageous conduct claims, and the plaintiffs appealed. This court stated that liability for outrageous conduct had been found only when the conduct was so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency. The court found that, under the general facts pleaded, the defendant's conduct, which included converting the employee's property left in the truck, not returning his phone calls, and telling people that the employee had been drunk at the time of the accident, could not reasonably be regarded as so extreme and outrageous as to permit recovery in this action. Thus, the court held that the complaint did not state a claim of outrageous conduct for which recovery could be had. The judgment was affirmed in part, but the judgment dismissing the employee's slander claims was reversed and remanded. Dorr v. C. B. Johnson, Inc., 660 P.2d 517, 521.

Colo.App.1982. Cit. in sup., quot. in part in sup., com. (j) cit. and quot. in part in sup. The plaintiff purchased a new tire from the defendant tire company. Balancing and mounting services were included in the price. When the tire went flat overnight, the defendant agreed to replace it. Shortly before closing time, the plaintiff returned to the defendant's store and the mechanic refused to mount the new tire on the plaintiff's truck. The mechanic told the plaintiff to mount the tire himself and referred the plaintiff to some tools. The plaintiff elected to use his own old truck jack, which he had used only once before and the safety of which he questioned, to mount the tire. While the plaintiff was mounting the tire, the jack broke and the truck fell on his wrist. The plaintiff sued the tire company, the mechanic, and the manager for, inter alia, outrageous conduct. The trial court ruled that although the mechanic's conduct was outrageous, the tort of outrageous conduct required proof of emotional distress, and no such proof was presented by the plaintiff. The plaintiff's sole contention on appeal was that this tort permitted recovery of damages for physical injury without any claim for or evidence of emotional harm. This court affirmed, relying on the Restatement, to hold that the plaintiff must prove the existence of severe emotional distress or harm to recover for this tort. Espinosa v. Sheridan United Tire, 655 P.2d 424, 425.

Colo.App.1982. Com. (d) quot. in disc., coms. (e) and (h) cit. in disc. The plaintiff, a California corporation, was the attorney-in-fact management company for various subsidiary insurance companies. In 1977, one of those subsidiaries issued a homeowner's liability insurance policy to the defendant and his wife, and a second subsidiary issued an automobile liability insurance policy to the defendant. While the defendant and his son were insureds under these policies, the son drove the defendant's car on to the front yard of a residence, seriously injuring its owner. The defendant promptly reported the incident to an agent of the second subsidiary, and that company immediately commenced an investigation. The injured party offered to settle the case for the policy limit of the automobile policy. The insurer rejected the offer, stating that the company was not in a position to settle because it had questions about the coverage under its policy. The insurers brought suit for a declaration that the policies provided no coverage with respect to the injured person's claim against the parent for negligent entrustment of the car. The injured person brought counterclaims against the driver and a third-party claim for compensatory and exemplary damages allegedly caused by the insurer's conduct in handling the claim. The trial court entered summary judgment dismissing the counterclaims, and the insured appealed. The court of appeals held that the counterclaims were sufficient to state causes of action for the alleged negligence of the insurers in failing to exercise reasonable care in representing the insured in the course of litigation and, inter alia, for alleged intentional infliction of emotional distress by outrageous conduct. Summary judgment was improper, however, because reasonable persons could differ on the question whether there was outrageous conduct. Affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded with instructions. Farmer's Group, Inc. v. Trimble, 658 P.2d 1370, 1376, 1377, affirmed 691 P.2d 1138 (1984).

Colo.App.1978. Cit. and quot. in sup.; com. (h) cit. in disc. The purchaser of a home brought an action against the seller for intentional infliction of emotional distress by outrageous conduct after the seller refused to vacate the premises on the date agreed upon in the agreement of sale. The lower court entered judgment on a jury verdict in favor of the purchaser, and the seller appealed, arguing that the trial court erred in refusing to grant the seller's motions for a directed verdict and judgment notwithstanding the verdict. The court held that the question of whether the seller's conduct in refusing to vacate the premises on the agreed upon date, in compounding the situation not only by becoming generally belligerent, but also by referring to the plaintiff's serious and unfortunate physical condition, and by inflaming the disagreement by suggesting that, as an attorney, he would have some special influence in any judicial proceeding, was actionably "outrageous" was properly left for the jury. Accordingly, since reasonable men could differ on the question of whether this series of acts was "outrageous," the court held, inter alia, that the trial court was correct in denying the seller's motion for a directed verdict and for judgment notwithstanding the verdict. Meiter v. Cavanaugh, 40 Colo.App. 454, 580 P.2d 399, 400, 401.

Colo.App.1977. Com. (h) quot. in part in sup. The husband of decedent brought this action, alleging wrongful death and outrage against the operator of an ambulance service and a hospital administrator. Defendants had refused ambulance service to plaintiff's critically ill wife because her physician, who had recently resigned from the hospital staff, would not agree to allow defendant's physicians to examine the plaintiff's wife to determine if the requested transportation were necessary. The wrongful death claim was dismissed and was entered on a jury verdict awarding plaintiff damages for outrage. Plaintiff appealed the granting of defendant's motion to reduce the verdict to the amount requested in the complaint, and defendants cross appealed. The court held that the trial court had erred in amending the verdict to reduce plaintiff's recovery. It was also held that the dismissal of the claim for wrongful death did not preclude recovery on the claim of outrage, since the actions serve different purposes and the success of one is not dependent upon the success of the other, and the question of whether defendant's actions constituted outrageous conduct was held to be for the jury's determination. DeCicco v. Trinidad Area Health Ass'n, 40 Colo.App. 63, 573 P.2d 559, 562.

Colo.App.1975. Com. (d) quot., com. (h) quot. and fol. In this action by a residential tenant against her landlord, plaintiff sought to recover all rents paid alleging that the landlord had breached an implied warranty that the rental premises were habitable; plaintiff also sought damages for emotional distress caused by defendant's allegedly outrageous conduct in not repairing defects. At the conclusion of plaintiff's evidentiary presentation, the court dismissed the complaint, and plaintiff appealed. The court affirmed the dismissal, finding that the law of Colorado clearly rejects the concept of an implied warranty of habitability and refusing to adopt the contrary rule. Though the court recognized that an action in tort will lie to recover for severe emotional distress, unaccompanied by physical injury, such recovery was expressly made subject to the limitations of the Restatement, which requires that the conduct must be "so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious, and utterly intolerable in acivilized community." Since it failed to meet this standard, plaintiff's emotional distress claim failed. Blackwell v. Del Bosco, 35 Colo.App. 399, 536 P.2d 838, 841.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Colo.App.1973. Quot. com. (d) and fol. Action by underwriter employed by the state compensation insurance fund against the fund and plaintiff's supervisor for intentional infliction of mental distress. Plaintiff's supervisor delivered to the plaintiff a letter of reprimand which noted certain deficiencies in plaintiff's performance of his duties, a copy of which was sent to the defendant's supervisor. Plaintiff, a paraplegic, contended that the letter, which stated "you must realize the job was created for you because of your handicap" caused him severe emotional distress. The lower court dismissed the complaint against the fund prior to trial, and after trial entered judgment in favor of the supervisor. On appeal, held: Judgment affirmed. The defendant's conduct must go beyond all bounds of decency in order for plaintiff to recover damages for severe emotional distress without any accompanying physical injuries. Since the jury is the finder of fact, it is sufficient that the jury did not find the defendant's conduct to be intentional, extreme, or outrageous. Therefore the jury verdict for the defendant must stand. Paris v. Division of State Compensation Ins. Fund, 517 P.2d 1353, 1355.

Conn.

Conn.2013. Com. (g) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former husband brought claims for fraud and intentional infliction of emotional distress against former wife and wife's former attorneys in connection with allegations that attorneys failed to disclose wife's true financial situation during postdissolution proceedings in which plaintiff sought modification of the alimony award. The trial court granted defendants' motions to strike the claims on grounds of absolute immunity or privilege. The court of appeals affirmed. Affirming, this court held that defendants were protected by the litigation privilege against claims of fraud and intentional infliction of emotional distress for their conduct during judicial proceedings. The court explained that there was no basis for a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress arising out of a privileged communication consisting of a defamatory statement made in the course of a quasi-judicial proceeding. Simms v. Seaman, 308 Conn. 523, 544, 69 A.3d 880, 892.

Conn.2011. Com. (j) cit. in disc. Former husband brought claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against former wife, who pled guilty to filing numerous false police reports against plaintiff accusing him of sexually abusing the parties' daughters. The trial court found for plaintiff; the court of appeals reversed, finding that the statute of limitations had run. Reversing, this court held that the continuing course of conduct doctrine tolled the statute of limitations for IIED claims, where, as here, outrageous conduct causing severe emotional distress was repetitious and involved some conduct that occurred within the limitations period. Watts v. Chittenden, 301 Conn. 575, 594, 22 A.3d 1214, 1225.

Conn.2003. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. After fire destroyed a significant portion of a house, and insurer refused to reimburse insured homeowner based on investigators' determination that fire was caused by homeowner's arson, homeowner sued insurer for breach of contract and intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress. Trial court entered judgment on jury verdict for plaintiff. This court reversed in part, holding, inter alia, that insurer's conduct in its fire investigation was not extreme and outrageous. While there was evidence that insurer did not conduct a thorough or reasoned investigation, and might have decided too quickly that the fire had been set deliberately, the investigation was not so atrocious as to trigger liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Carrol v. Allstate Ins. Co., 262 Conn. 433, 443, 815 A.2d 119, 126.

Conn.2000. Com. (d) quot. but dist. Former schoolteacher sued school board, principal, and assistant principal for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered summary judgment for defendants, but the intermediate appellate court reversed and remanded. Reversing and remanding, this court held, in part, that the conduct complained of, which included the making of condescending remarks to plaintiff, the questioning of her abilities, and the insistence on a police escort to accompany plaintiff from the school to her car, was not so extreme and outrageous as to give rise to liability for the intentional infliction of emotional distress. Waters v. United Services Auto. Ass'n, 41 Cal.App.4th 1063, 48 Cal.Rptr.2d 910, 916.

Conn.1991. Cit. in case quot. in disc. The former chairman of a municipal parking authority commission sued the city and its mayor for vexatious suit and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that the mayor first instituted and then abandoned removal proceedings against him after he blocked adoption of revised parking authority bylaws and accused city and authority personnel of wrongful acts. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for the plaintiff. Reversing in part, this court held, inter alia, that, since the only ground for the claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress was the mayor's action in instituting a vexatious suit by including in the removal proceedings two charges that the jury found baseless and since the court had established earlier in its opinion the defendants' liability for bringing those charges, any additional theory supporting the imposition of liability for the same act was entirely superfluous. The court stated that the plaintiff could not recover any greater damages if liability could also be based on extreme emotional distress. DeLaurentis v. City of New Haven, 220 Conn. 225, 597 A.2d 807, 828.

Conn.1986. Cit. in ftn. An employee sued his former employer for wrongful discharge based on a false accusation that he had misappropriated company funds and also for the infliction of severe emotional distress. The trial court granted the defendant's motion to strike. Finding no error, this court held that the plaintiff did not meet his burden of pleading and establishing that the employer should have realized that his conduct involved an unreasonable risk of causing emotional distress and that the distress, if caused, might result in illness or bodily harm to the employee. Morris v. Hartford Courant Co., 200 Conn. 676, 513 A.2d 66, 69.

Conn.1986. Cit. in case quot. in disc., cit. but dist., com. (g) quot. in sup. An employee sued her employer for libel and intentional infliction of emotional distress after the employer discharged her and later made allegedly defamatory statements on a factfinding form regarding the employee's collection of unemployment compensation. The trial court directed a verdict for the employer. Affirming, this court held that the two requirements of intent and outrageousness to sustain a cause of action for the intentional infliction of emotional distress had not been proven, and, since the employer's comment was absolutely privileged, she would not have been liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress in any event. Petyan v. Ellis, 200 Conn. 243, 510 A.2d 1337, 1342, 1343.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Conn.App.

Conn.App.2020. Com. (j) quot. in sup. Mother, on behalf of middle-school student, brought, among other things, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against middle-school soccer coach, alleging that defendant kicked a soccer ball with great force at a scrimmage during soccer practice such that it struck student's face and gave her a concussion, causing her to repeat a year of school, miss participation in school sports activities and events with friends and family, and suffer humiliation and embarrassment. The trial court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding that the record could not support a reasonable finding that defendant's action in kicking the ball and injuring student inflicted severe emotional distress on student. The court explained that student's distress, while painful and degrading, was not sufficiently extreme as required to sustain an IIED claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment j. Maselli v. Regional School District Number 10, 235 A.3d 599, 617.

Conn.App.2019. Cit. in cases cit. in disc.; com. (d), quot. in case quot. in disc. Member of youth organization and his minor son with autism spectrum disorder who was also a member brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against youth organization and organization's chairman, alleging that, after father complained to defendants that other members were bullying son, defendants banned son from attending organization meetings and events. The trial court granted defendants' motion to strike plaintiffs' claims. This court affirmed, holding that the trial court did not err in granting defendants' motion to strike. The court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46 in defining the elements of an IIED claim, and explained that defendants' failure to relieve son from bullying, son's vulnerability to bullying due to his disorder, and son's expulsion based on reasons aside from his disorder, did not constitute extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to state an IIED claim. Strano v. Azzinaro, 204 A.3d 705, 708, 710.

Conn.App.2011. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Employee sued co-worker for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). The trial court granted defendant's motion to strike the complaint and for judgment. This court affirmed, holding that the four alleged incidents of defendant's inappropriate conduct, occurring over a period of nearly three years—deliberately misinforming plaintiff about a directive from his superior, thereby placing him at risk of violating work rules; falsely reporting to unidentified third parties that plaintiff engaged in outbursts and irrational behavior; becoming "violently angry" at plaintiff such that plaintiff feared for his physical safety; and looking directly at plaintiff and stating, "Bang. Bang."—did not constitute extreme and outrageous conduct for purposes of an IIED claim under Connecticut law. Cassotto v. Aeschliman, 130 Conn.App. 230, 234-235, 22 A.3d 697, 700.

Conn.App.2011. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Social worker sued her supervisors and co-workers, asserting a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). Affirming the trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendants, this court held that plaintiff's allegations that her supervisors, in retaliation for her filing of an institutional labor grievance against them, conspired with her co-workers to force her to withdraw the institutional grievance, gave her a negative performance evaluation for the first time, terminated her employment, and, when she was reinstated, offered to rehire her at a lower position, causing her to resign and take other employment at a greatly reduced income, did not set forth conduct that was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to sustain her IIED claim. Gillians v. Vivanco-Small, 128 Conn.App. 207, 212, 15 A.3d 1200, 1203.

Conn.App.2009. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Divorced wife sued former husband and his new wife for intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress, alleging, among other things, that husband made repeated angry and hostile threats that he would have police evict her from the marital residence, and that defendants used her son in a ruse to gain access to the residence when she was not home and change the locks. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. Affirming in part, this court held, inter alia, that defendants' behavior, while no doubt hurtful and distressing to plaintiff, was not extreme and outrageous as a matter of law; in general, plaintiffs were necessarily expected and required to be hardened to a certain amount of rough language, and to occasional acts that were definitely inconsiderate and unkind. Davis v. Davis, 112 Conn.App. 56, 67, 962 A.2d 140, 147.

Conn.App.2007. Com. (g) quot. in case quot. in sup. (general cite). State employee sued her former supervisor for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). The trial court granted summary judgment for supervisor. Affirming, this court held that, because supervisor's allegedly defamatory statements contained in two written documents he prepared in connection with employee's pending federal discrimination claim against employer for failure to promote were absolutely privileged, employee's IIED claim against supervisor likewise failed. McKinney v. Chapman, 103 Conn.App. 446, 455, 929 A.2d 355, 361.

Conn.App.2003. Cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. generally in case quot. in sup. Condominium-unit buyer sued banks that had brought a foreclosure action on his mortgage loan and banks' attorneys, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress, violation of the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act, and defamation, inter alia. Trial court granted in part defendants' motion to strike plaintiff's complaint. This court affirmed in part as to the emotional-distress claim, holding, inter alia, that trial court properly determined that, even though defendants' conduct in filing a wrongfully motivated lawsuit might have been stressful or hurtful to plaintiff, his allegations failed to meet the threshold pleading requirement of extreme and outrageous conduct. Heim v. California Federal Bank, 78 Conn.App. 351, 365, 828 A.2d 129, 138-139, certification denied 266 Conn. 911, 832 A.2d 70 (2003).

Conn.App.2002. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Respiratory therapist formerly employed by hospital sued hospital for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted defendant's motion to strike plaintiff's complaint. Affirming, this court held that conduct of defendant's agents, servants, and employees in, among other things, disciplining plaintiff, arguing with him, and insulting him was not sufficiently outrageous to form the basis for an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Bator v. Yale-New Haven Hosp., 73 Conn.App. 576, 577, 808 A.2d 1149, 1150.

Conn.App.2002. Com. (d) quot. in sup., com. (h) quot. in case quot. in disc. Employee who was discharged sued his former employer, asserting, in part, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted defendant's motion to strike the claim. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that defendant's alleged demands and inquiries into plaintiff's personal beliefs and attitudes, and its harassment of him to change his mind, presumably regarding his refusal to sign false grant documents, did not amount to conduct that was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Campbell v. Town of Plymouth, 74 Conn.App. 67, 78, 79, 811 A.2d 243, 252, 253.

Conn.App.1999. Cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in ftn. in sup., coms. (h) and (j) cit. in sup. Elementary school student sued board of education and various school officials for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with principal's unconventional teaching methods. The trial court granted defendants' motion to strike. Reversing as to this count of the complaint, the court held, in part, that plaintiff's allegations that principal's system encouraged, created, and tolerated an atmosphere of chaos, disruptiveness, and violence and exposed plaintiff and classmates to physical and verbal abuse were sufficient to withstand defendants' motion to strike. Bell v. Bd. of Educ. of West Haven, 55 Conn.App. 400, 739 A.2d 321, 327.

Conn.App.1994. Cit. in case quot. in sup. In former employee's action for wrongful termination of employment, in which the jury returned a verdict for plaintiff, plaintiff cross-appealed on the ground that the trial court improperly granted defendant employer's motion to set aside the verdict as to plaintiff's claims for negligent misrepresentation and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming in part, this court held, inter alia, that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in granting defendant's motion to set aside the verdict as to intentional infliction of emotional distress, since there was no evidence from which the jury reasonably could have found that defendant had intended to inflict emotional distress or knew or should have known that emotional distress was a likely result of its conduct, or that plaintiff had sustained severe emotional distress. Barry v. Posi-Seal Intern., Inc., 36 Conn.App. 1, 19, 647 A.2d 1031, 1041, certification denied 231 Conn. 942, 653 A.2d 822 (1994).

Conn.Super.

Conn.Super.1995. Com. (h) cit. generally in headnote and quot. in sup. After a film curator at a college library was demoted to assistant and later fired after filing a grievance over her demotion, she sued the college librarian and a co-worker for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Denying defendants' motion to strike, the court held, inter alia, that defendants' alleged conduct in causing plaintiff to lose her employment in retaliation for filing a grievance was sufficiently outrageous to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Talit v. Peterson, 44 Conn.Sup. 490, 498, 692 A.2d 1322, 1322, 1325.

Conn.Super.1991. Coms. (d)-(f) quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. in sup. and quot. in ftn., com. (j) cit. and quot. in sup. and quot. in ftn. An employee sued his employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that his supervisor knew that he was a recovering alcoholic and repeatedly harassed the plaintiff about his recovery and his health and frequently threatened the plaintiff with the loss of his job. Denying the defendant's motion to strike, this court held that, within the context that the defendant was the plaintiff's supervisor and knew of his alcoholism, the defendant's conduct reached the required threshold of outrageousness and was, therefore, an issue for the trier of fact. The court stated that the emotional distress alleged was sufficient, since the plaintiff claimed that he suffered from depression, loss of sleep, anxiety attacks, high blood pressure, rashes, and other skin problems as a result of the defendant's conduct. Mellaly v. Eastman Kodak Co., 42 Conn.Sup. 17, 597 A.2d 846, 847, 848.

Conn.Super.1991. Com. (d) quot. in sup. A husband falsely told his wife that he had tested positive for acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS). In a subsequent divorce action, the wife sued the husband for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court denied in part the husband's motion to strike the entire complaint, holding that the wife stated a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. It found that a false statement to one's spouse that one has AIDS was likely to cause shock and fright of enormous proportions and would be regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. However, the court held that punitive damages would not be appropriate because the underlying cause of action was based on a claim of outrageous conduct. Whelan v. Whelan, 41 Conn.Sup. 519, 588 A.2d 251, 253.

Conn.Super.1984. Cit. in sup., com. (e) cit. in sup., coms. (f), (g), and (h) quot. in part in sup. An employee sued his supervisor for intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court denied the supervisor's motion for summary judgement, holding that whether the supervisor's demand that the employee perform the work assignment while knowing of the employee's fear of heights was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to impose liability was a jury question, as was whether the supervisor only insisted upon his legal rights in a permissible way so as to make the supervisor's conduct privileged. Brown v. Ellis, 40 Conn.Sup. 165, 484 A.2d 944, 946.

Conn.Super.1984. Cit. in sup. An employee discharged without receiving a job performance evaluation sued the employer for wrongful discharge and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The employer moved to strike these and other counts. This court held that the wrongful discharge count should be stricken because the employee had failed to allege a public policy limitation on the employer's absolute right to terminate. The court denied the motion to strike the emotional distress count, since whether the failure to evaluate constitutes extremely outrageous conduct, an element of emotional distress, is a question of fact that must be decided by the trier of fact. Murray v. Bridgeport Hosp., 40 Conn.Sup. 56, 480 A.2d 610, 614.

Conn.Super.1973. Quot. in part and com. (d) quot. in part in sup.Landowners brought this action against a real estate broker, alleging that, inter alia, the broker had insisted they take a loan he had offered them, insisted they pay him a brokerage fee, and had threatened to attach their home and thus prevent alternate financing if they did not comply with his wishes. This court, after considering several authorities including the Restatement, sustained the broker's demurrer to this court, holding that intentionally inflicting emotional disturbances on another may constitute a common-law tort in Connecticut, but that the complaint failed to allege either the broker's intent to cause mental distress or his foreseeing that his conduct would cause such distress. Hiers v. Cohen, 31 Conn.Sup. 305, 329 A.2d 609, 611.

Del.

Del.2013. Com. (e) quot. in sup., com. (h) quot. in sup. and cit. in ftn., illus. 6 cit. and quot. in sup. and cit. in ftn. Eight-year-old middle-school student and his mother brought various claims against, among others, state police officer in connection with allegations that officer interrogated and threatened student in a room for close to an hour for the purpose of scaring him, in order to shame an older student who was also present into confessing to a bullying incident. The trial court granted summary judgment for officer. This court reversed and remanded as to student's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that reasonable minds could differ as to whether officer's conduct was extreme and outrageous, and that it could be inferred that student suffered severe distress, from the fact that he withdrew from the school and was home schooled for the remainder of the year. Hunt ex rel. DeSombre v. State, Dept. of Safety and Homeland Sec., Div. of Delaware State Police, 69 A.3d 360, 367, 368.

Del.1992. Com. (g) cit. in sup. Former patient sued physician and his insurer for defamation, invasion of privacy, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, after newspapers published articles concerning a suit brought against physician by other patients and reporting allegedly defamatory remarks physician made about plaintiff in deposition testimony. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants on the ground that statements made during the course of litigation were absolutely privileged. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held that absolute privilege for statements made in the course of litigation extended to plaintiff's claims of defamation, invasion of privacy, and intentional infliction of emotional distress insofar as they were based on such statements; moreover, physician's participation in extrajudicial newspaper interviews, in which he made false accusations against plaintiff, might state claim of defamation unprotected by absolute privilege, but was insufficient to trigger liability for invasion of privacy or intentional infliction of emotional distress. Barker v. Huang, 610 A.2d 1341, 1349.

Del.1990. Subsec. (1) cit. in sup. A client sued her attorney for malpractice in his handling of her automobile accident claims. The trial court awarded damages to the client. Affirming, the supreme court held that the record supported the trial court's findings where the attorney failed to advise his client fully concerning her right to pursue a claim against her own insurer, he unilaterally increased his contingency fee, and he intentionally caused a stop payment order on an insurance check made out to the client. Moreover, such intentional conduct, arising in a relationship of trust and confidence, was sufficiently outrageous to support an award of damages for emotional distress. Cummings v. Pinder, 574 A.2d 843, 845.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Del.1989. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in disc. The parents of a child born with a genetic disorder sued health care providers for "wrongful birth" and "wrongful life" for failing to timely detect and notify them about the disorder, thus precluding the option of terminating the pregnancy. Upon certification of the issues from the trial court, this court held that a cause of action, rooted in common law, existed for negligence in performing a medical testing procedure and for negligence in failing to timely report the results of the testing; however, it held that the child had no cause of action for wrongful life on a theory that the defendants' negligence deprived the child's parents of the opportunity to reject her birth. The court stated that while extraordinary expenses were ascertainable and recoverable based on the additional financial burden of raising a child with Down syndrome, there could be no recovery for emotional distress, absent a physical injury to the plaintiff or a determination that the defendant's conduct was outrageous. Garrison v. Medical Center of Delaware, 581 A.2d 288, 293.

Del.Super.

Del.Super.2018. Subsec. (h) quot. in case quot. in sup. and cit. in ftn. Individual who was imprisoned on drug charges based on tests indicating that certain powder found in his vehicle was cocaine filed a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against, among others, state office of the chief medical examiner and its employees, after re-testing revealed that the powder was actually confectioner's sugar. The trial court granted defendants' motion to dismiss with respect to all but two employees who were specifically tied to the chain of custody in plaintiff's case, holding that, while plaintiff sufficiently alleged that those two employees engaged in outrageous conduct—tampering with the evidence in his case—that caused him emotional distress, he failed to allege facts sufficient to support a claim against the remaining defendants for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Dollard v. Callery, 185 A.3d 694, 704.

Del.Super.2016. Cit. and quot. but dist., com. (d) quot. in case cit. in ftn., com. (h) cit. and quot. in case cit. in ftn. Pharmacy customer with HIV infection brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, against pharmacy and pharmacist as a result of pharmacist disclosing to plaintiff's father the antiviral medications plaintiff was taking; defendants filed a third-party complaint against plaintiff's father, IIED, alleging that father was either solely or partially liable for any damages his son suffered. This court granted father's motion to dismiss the third-party complaint, holding that father's conduct in discussing his son's condition with his wife and later with plaintiff in no way amounted to the extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to state a claim for IIED under the definition set forth in Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Spence v. Cherian, 135 A.3d 1282, 1288, 1289.

Del.Super.2009. Cit. and quot. in sup., cit. in ftn., subsec. (1) cit. in sup., subsec. (2) cit. but dist., com. (l) cit. in ftn. Customer sued pharmacy, alleging that pharmacy's employee provided sensitive information detailing her prescription and medical history to third parties, including her daughter and her fiancé's son, without justification. Denying pharmacy's motion to dismiss customer's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held, inter alia, that, because customer set forth a direct claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress, rather than an indirect claim, she was not required to be physically present during the alleged conduct; customer did not assert that a third party was the subject of the conduct and that she suffered as a result of her relationship to the third party, but rather that pharmacy intentionally or recklessly inflicted severe emotional damage on her. Fanean v. Rite Aid Corp. of Delaware, Inc., 984 A.2d 812, 818-820.

Del.Super.1987. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup., coms. (d), (h), and (j) cit. in sup. A trailer park resident sued the owner of the park for harassment and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that the owner used scare tactics to convince the resident that he had to buy into the rental park when it became a cooperative community. This court denied the park owner's motion for summary judgment on the ground that material issues of fact existed as to whether the defendant's actions were extreme and outrageous, and whether the plaintiff's distress was both severe and reasonable under the circumstances. Mattern v. Hudson, 532 A.2d 85, 85, 86, 88.

D.C.App.

D.C.App.2023. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. and cit. in ftn. Former information-technology support-staff employed by the federal government filed a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against publisher of a book authored by an investigative journalist, alleging that defendant's publication of the book, which contained highly offensive and false assertions about plaintiffs' employment that defendant knew or should have known to be false, amounted to extreme and outrageous conduct that caused plaintiffs severe emotional distress. The trial court denied defendant's special motion to dismiss under the District of Columbia Anti-SLAPP statute. This court reversed as to plaintiff's IIED claim, holding that, even if defendant committed the tort of defamation by publishing the book, actionable defamation on its own was not enough to amount to IIED under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Salem Media Group, Inc. v. Awan, 301 A.3d 633, 656.

D.C.App.2018. Cit. and quot. in disc., cit. in case cit. in disc., cit. in ftn.; caveat quot. in disc., cit. in ftn.; com. (l) cit. and quot. in sup. Relatives of victims of a terrorist bombing in the Republic of Sudan brought a lawsuit against the Ministry of the Interior of the Republic of Sudan, alleging that defendant was liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) arising from its support of the terrorist organizations that carried out the bombings. The district court entered default judgment against defendant and certified a question to this court as to whether plaintiffs' claims failed as a matter of law because they were not physically present at the scene of the attack. This court answered the district court's question in the negative, holding that plaintiffs did not need to be present at the bombings to assert an IIED claim against supporters of terrorism. The court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46 in explaining that the purpose of the physical-presence requirement was to ensure that only those who were genuinely affected by the traumatic event could recover compensation for an IIED claim, and that the deeply horrifying and publicized nature of terrorist attacks fulfilled that purpose even if the claimants were not present at the site of the attack. Republic of Sudan v. Owens, 194 A.3d 38, 40-43, 45.

D.C.App.2015. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in sup., com (h) cit. and quot. in case quot. in sup. After mother became romantically involved with counselor at child's school, child's father brought a claim for professional malpractice against counselor and school, and counselor counterclaimed for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted the parties' cross-motions for summary judgment. This court reversed as to counselor's emotional-distress counterclaim, holding that questions of fact remained as to whether father's conduct—using a communications firm to publicize his complaint against counselor, which contained particularly sexually explicit language, to media organizations immediately after he filed it—was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to result in liability under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Newmyer v. Sidwell Friends School, 128 A.3d 1023, 1037, 1041-1043.

D.C.App.2013. Com. (d) quot. in cases quot. in sup. Former special agent with the Treasury Inspector General for Tax Administration brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against former co-workers, alleging that the U.S. Department of Agriculture abruptly rescinded its employment offer to plaintiff after defendants sent it six then-anonymous letters stating, among other things, that it was making a "grave error" in hiring plaintiff, and that plaintiff was under investigation for "gross misconduct and integrity violations." The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. Affirming as to the IIED claim, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's claim failed, because, while there was no doubt that defendants' conduct caused plaintiff distress, no reasonable juror could find that his distress rose to the level of severe emotional distress required to prove this tort, or that defendants' behavior was so outrageous as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency. Armstrong v. Thompson, 80 A.3d 177, 189.

D.C.App.2013. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (j) quot. in sup. Employee of investment firm sued animal-rights protestors who held demonstrations outside his house, asserting, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction restricting defendants' protests. Reversing and remanding, this court held that plaintiff did not clearly demonstrate a substantial likelihood of success on the merits of his emotional-distress claim. The court concluded that defendants' conduct was not extreme and outrageous, because their actions took place on public streets on only a few occasions over a period of several weeks, and consisted mostly of chanting slogans and some vague threats. In addition, plaintiff failed to allege that he suffered severe emotional distress, since he did not complain of any symptoms, such as loss of sleep or inability to concentrate, but only labeled the emotions that he was feeling, for instance, humiliation and embarrassment, without indicating the intensity and the duration of the distress. Ortberg v. Goldman Sachs Group, 64 A.3d 158, 163, 165.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

D.C.App.2011. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former residents of a men's homeless shelter closed by the District of Columbia sued the District, asserting, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). Affirming the trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendant, this court held that plaintiffs' IIED claim failed because defendant's closure of the shelter did not constitute extreme and outrageous conduct; defendant attempted to close the shelter in a methodical manner, conducting exit interviews with many residents to provide transitional assistance and transporting them to other shelters, and plaintiffs provided no evidence to support their allegations that defendant caused residents' personal documents to be abandoned outside the shelter. Baltimore v. District of Columbia, 10 A.3d 1141, 1155.

D.C.App.2011. Com. (b) cit. in disc., coms. (f) and (j) cit. in sup. Patient brought claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress against clinic and its doctor, alleging that he suffered serious emotional distress after doctor negligently informed him that he was HIV positive when, as he learned five years later, he was not. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. On rehearing, this court reversed and remanded, holding that, while the zone-of-physical-danger requirement continued to be generally applicable to claims of negligent infliction of emotional distress, it would not be applied to bar such a claim where, as here, the defendant had an obligation to care for the plaintiff's emotional well-being or the plaintiff's emotional well-being was necessarily implicated by the nature of the defendant's undertaking or relationship with the plaintiff, and serious emotional distress was especially likely to be caused by the defendant's negligence. Hedgepeth v. Whitman Walker Clinic, 22 A.3d 789, 795, 816.

D.C.App.2007. Cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. Customer who was arrested for unlawful entry at a restaurant by police officers who were working for the restaurant as private security guards brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against the police officers and the District of Columbia. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. Affirming on this claim, this court held that, because officers had probable cause to arrest plaintiff, the arrest itself could not form the basis for a claim of extreme or outrageous conduct. In addition, the court noted that plaintiff did not seek medical assistance for physical or psychological injury, and thus, without expert testimony, there was no evidence from which a reasonable jury could have found that officers' conduct was so extreme and outrageous that it caused severe emotional distress to plaintiff. Kotsch v. District of Columbia, 924 A.2d 1040, 1045, 1046.

D.C.App.2005. Com. (d) quot. generally in case quot. in disc. Plaintiff who alleged that he was injured when a police officer applied an illegal choke hold to his throat while breaking up a fight between plaintiff and another man sued District of Columbia and police officer for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted defendants' motion for judgment as a matter of law. Affirming in part, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's allegations did not assert conduct that was sufficiently outrageous to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Smith v. District of Columbia, 882 A.2d 778, 794.

D.C.App.2002. Quot. in case quot. in disc. Former employee of university brought suit for intentional infliction of emotional distress against the university and her supervisor. Reversing the trial court's dismissal of the claim and remanding, this court held that plaintiff's allegation that defendants subjected her for nine months to loud and piercing noise emitted by sound-screen devices, knowing that she had become seriously ill as a result, stated a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Larijani v. Georgetown University, 791 A.2d 41, 44.

D.C.App.2000. Com. (d) cit. in ftn. Shareholder of co-operative corporation sued property manager of apartment building for negligently performing repairs to his flooded co-op apartment and for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Reversing the trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendant, this court held that plaintiff had sufficiently alleged an injury to his leasehold interest that, if proved, would entitle him to recover from defendant on a negligence theory. The court noted that even though plaintiff's intentional-infliction-of-emotional-distress claim had not been addressed in the trial court, and notwithstanding the obvious difficulty plaintiff faced in proving outrageous conduct on defendant's part, the entire case would be remanded to the trial court for further proceedings. Souci v. William C. Smith & Co., 763 A.2d 96, 103.

D.C.App.1998. Cit. in headnotes, cit. in case cit. in disc., coms. (d) and (j) quot. in disc., com. (h) quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (i) cit. in disc. Individual who was the target of death threats and numerous harassing telephone calls made by man searching for his ex-wife sued ex-wife's former employer, alleging that defendant acted outrageously in providing plaintiff's telephone number and home address to ex-husband. The trial court granted defendant's motion for judgment n.o.v. after the jury returned a verdict awarding plaintiff $40,000 in compensatory damages. Reversing, this court held that the jury's conclusion that defendant's conduct was extreme and outrageous was entirely rational and legitimate, that defendant acted recklessly when he directed ex-husband to plaintiff, and that plaintiff's mental distress was sufficiently severe to support his claim for relief. Homan v. Goyal, 711 A.2d 812, 812, 813, 817, 818, 820, 821, opinion amended 720 A.2d 1152 (D.C.1998).

D.C.App.1997. Quot. in case quot. in sup., quot. in case cit. in disc. Discharged employee sued former supervisor and former employer for, inter alia, defamation and intentional infliction of emotional distress, and his wife asserted a claim for loss of consortium. The trial court dismissed the complaint. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held, among other things, that employee's termination, and defendants' alleged actions in connection with it, did not constitute sufficiently egregious conduct for purposes of the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress; that employee had stated a claim for defamation based on supervisor's comment to co-workers that employee had left an empty bullet casing in an office hallway; and that wife could maintain an action for loss of consortium absent proof of physical injury to employee if she showed that she suffered a loss of services or affection because of an actionable tort against her husband. Crowley v. N. American Telecommunications, 691 A.2d 1169, 1171.

D.C.App.1997. Com. (f) quot. in case quot. in disc. A former hospital technologist sued the hospital for wrongful termination based on breach of contract and violation of public policy, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiff alleged that defendant intentionally inflicted emotional distress on plaintiff by forcing her to continue either to work in the blood bank, where her fetus would be exposed to radiation, or to lose her job. The trial court dismissed plaintiff's complaint. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that defendant's conduct did not rise to the required level of outrageousness as a matter of law, because defendant did not force plaintiff to remain in a situation where she would be exposed to radiation. Plaintiff had a choice not to work in the blood bank. Duncan v. Children's Nat. Medical Center, 702 A.2d 207, 211, certiorari denied 525 U.S. 912, 119 S.Ct. 257, 142 L.Ed.2d 211 (1998).

D.C.App.1997. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in disc. Former employee sued former employer for, inter alia, breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing and intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with defendant's decision to demote plaintiff following an investigation of sexual harassment charges that had been filed against him. The trial court entered summary judgment for defendant. Affirming, this court held, in part, that, as an at-will employee, plaintiff was not protected by the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing inherent in every contract, and that defendant's conduct did not rise to the level of outrageousness sufficient to support a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Kerrigan v. Britches of Georgetowne, 705 A.2d 624, 628.

D.C.App.1995. Cit. in case cit. in disc. Doctor sued his malpractice insurer, seeking a declaratory judgment that insurer had a duty to defend him in a tort action filed against him. The underlying action asserted claims for libel, slander, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Trial court granted doctor summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that insurer had a duty to defend, since the allegations in the underlying tort complaint raised the possibility of coverage within the scope of the insurer's policy. Since recklessness was sufficient to establish liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and the policy did not exclude coverage for reckless acts, there existed the potential for liability within the policy coverage under the alleged tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. American Continental Ins. Co. v. Pooya, 666 A.2d 1193, 1199.

D.C.App.1995. Cit. in disc. A woman injured in a fall in her apartment sued building owner and property manager in state court for negligence, fraud, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. She also sued owner in federal court alleging same claims. Federal court granted owner directed verdict on the intentional-tort claims but entered judgment on jury verdict for plaintiff on negligence claim. State trial court then dismissed all claims against owner and manager, holding that plaintiff's claims were barred by res judicata and collateral estoppel. Reversing, this court held that neither res judicata nor collateral estoppel barred plaintiff's claim. Collateral estoppel was inapplicable because the federal decision's record did not clearly disclose the grounds on which it was based and, thus, the court could not say that the intentional-tort claims were necessarily decided by the federal court. Major v. Inner City Property Mgmt., Inc., 653 A.2d 379, 381.

D.C.App.1994. Quot. in disc., cit. in case. cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. Tenant sued landlords for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, arising from conditions in her apartment, including rat infestation and failure to abate plumbing problems. Affirming the trial court's entering of judgment n.o.v. after the jury found for plaintiff, this court held, inter alia, that evidence of defendants' failure to make effective repairs was not so outrageous as in other landlord-tenant cases supporting emotional-distress claims, in which landlords made no attempt to repair defective premises. Bernstein v. Fernandez, 649 A.2d 1064, 1075.

D.C.App.1994. Cit. generally in diss. op.; com. (d) quot. in ftn. and in diss. op.; com. (e) cit. in case quot. in sup.; com. (f) cit. in headnotes, quot. in sup., cit. in ftn., quot. in diss. op.; com. (j) cit. in ftn. Rape victim brought an action for intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress against police detective assigned to investigate the rape. Reversing the trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendant and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether defendant's conduct in belittling and insulting plaintiff during interviews following the rape crossed the line from obnoxiousness to outrageousness. The court stated that the correct legal standard to apply was not whether plaintiff was more susceptible to emotional distress than other rape or crime victims but, rather, whether she was more susceptible than a member of the public at large. The dissent argued that defendant's conduct did not meet the Restatement's standard of outrageousness and that rape victims were no more peculiarly susceptible to emotional distress than other crime victims. Drejza v. Vaccaro, 650 A.2d 1308, 1308, 1312-1314, 1316, 1318.

D.C.App.1993. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Employee terminated for neglecting his work duties sued his former employer under several theories, including intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered summary judgment against employee. This court affirmed, holding that mere discharge of an employee was not extreme and outrageous conduct, and that plaintiff failed to show anything more. Elliott v. Healthcare Corp., 629 A.2d 6, 9.

D.C.App.1993. Cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. and in diss. op., coms. (e) and (f) quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. in sup. Employee sued supervisors for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that, after she filed a sexual-harassment grievance against her immediate superior, defendants colluded with the alleged harasser in responding to plaintiff's grievance and participated in retaliating against plaintiff. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiff. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held that one defendant's failure to respond to plaintiff's handwritten grievance was not, as a matter of law, such extreme and outrageous conduct as to permit recovery, whereas the other defendant's conduct in actively aiding alleged harasser to defeat plaintiff's administrative complaint constituted a serious abuse of supervisory authority and supported submission of the liability question to the jury. The dissent argued that no evidence of extreme or outrageous conduct was presented to warrant submission of the case to the jury. King v. Kidd, 640 A.2d 656, 665, 668, 675, 687.

D.C.App.1992. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. A tenant sought to recover damages against her landlord for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. After a lease dispute, the landlord gave the tenant notice to quit and subsequently filed a complaint for possession to recover the premises. Affirming the trial court's grant of summary judgment for the landlord, this court held that the landlord's actions were not so outrageous in character and so extreme in degree as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency. It noted that the landlord took no overt acts of self-help, but resorted to legal processes, and that this was an unremarkable lease disagreement that could not support liability in tort. Bown v. Hamilton, 601 A.2d 1074, 1079.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

D.C.App.1991. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in ftn. A woman underwent an x-ray and surgery during her pregnancy because her physician and hospital negligently failed to ascertain that she was pregnant. Although her twins were born healthy, the woman sued her physician and hospital for negligent infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants because recovery for emotional distress absent an accompanying physical injury was not permitted. Reversing and remanding, this court held that the plaintiff could recover if she could convince the trier of fact that the amount of radiation to which she was exposed or the surgical procedure she underwent presented a threat to her own health or that of her unborn twins, and that as a result she experienced serious and verifiable mental distress. The court noted that the defendant's conduct did not rise to the level of outrageousness required for a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress, since a physician's failure to inform is usually not an intentional act within the traditional concept of intentional torts. Jones v. Howard University, Inc., 589 A.2d 419, 422.

D.C.App.1991. Com. (d) quot. in disc. Homeowners who were dissatisfied with the quality of a painter's work on their house paid the final payment with a check on which they had placed a stop payment order. The homeowners were also attorneys, and the painter sent them a copy of a letter he had sent to the local bar association accusing them of a felony for passing a bad check. The homeowners sued the painter for intentional infliction of emotional distress; inter alia. The trial court granted summary judgment for the painter. Affirming, this court held that the painter's conduct was not sufficiently outrageous to justify liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress; although his conduct in sending the letter might have been malicious, the conduct was not extreme and outside the bounds of decency. Weaver v. Grafio, 595 A.2d 983, 991.

D.C.App.1990. Quot. in case quot. but dist.; com. (d) quot. in sup. and quot. in case quot. but dist. A library employee who was fired on her supervisor's recommendation sued the library and her supervisor for intentional infliction of emotional distress, defamation, assault, and battery. In support of her emotional distress claim, the plaintiff alleged that her supervisor had written numerous memoranda criticizing the plaintiff's performance, had documented her sick leave as unauthorized absences, and had pushed the plaintiff against the wall, threatening and pointing his finger at her. The trial court found for the plaintiff. Reversing on all counts, this court held regarding the emotional distress count that, even if all of the plaintiff's allegations were true, her supervisor's behavior had not been sufficiently outrageous to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. District of Columbia v. Thompson, 570 A.2d 277, 290, rehearing granted 580 A.2d 144 (1990).

D.C.App.1990. Cit. and quot. in disc. A patient sued a physician for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that the physician verbally abused her during her three-day hospitalization and in several subsequent telephone calls after she submitted a written complaint to the hospital. The trial court granted the physician's motion for summary judgment, on the ground that the plaintiff's claim was barred by the statute of limitations. Reversing, this court held that an emotional distress claim stemming from verbal abuse, as in this case, was governed by the general three-year residuary statute of limitations applicable to causes of action for which a limitation was not otherwise specially prescribed, and could not be fairly characterized as sufficiently close to the enumerated tort of assault as to make applicable the one-year statute of limitations for assault. The court emphasized the distinct interests protected by the torts of assault and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Saunders v. Nemati, 580 A.2d 660, 661, 664.

D.C.App.1988. Cit. in case cit. in sup. A property owner returned from a trip to find that his home had been broken into, its lock replaced, and a "No Trespassing" sign affixed to the door. For three weeks, the tax sale purchasers, who had acted on the basis of an erroneously issued tax deed, repeatedly locked out and harassed the record owner. In the owner's suit against the purchasers and the government, the erroneously issued deed was declared void and the case went to trial on the claims against the purchasers for wrongful eviction and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court awarded compensatory damages and, in a second trial, awarded punitive damages. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that there was ample evidence of intentional infliction of emotional distress to support the jury's award of compensatory damages, despite the plaintiff's relatively low out-of-pocket expenses. Robinson v. Sarisky, 535 A.2d 901, 906.

D.C.App.1984. Com. (d) quot. in part in case quot. in sup. A terminated university faculty member sued the university and other university employees on a number of theories. This court affirmed the trial court's judgment for the faculty member on the breach of contract claim, affirmed the directed verdict against the faculty member on the defamation claim, and reversed the directed verdict against the faculty member on the claims of sex discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court stated that the employer-employee conflicts did not, as a matter of law, rise to the level of outrageous conduct necessary to be actionable as intentional infliction of emotional distress, since such conduct was not so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency. Howard University v. Best, 484 A.2d 958, 986, appeal after remand 547 A.2d 144 (1988).

D.C.App.1982. Com. (f) cit. in sup. A patient brought an action against her doctor for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court found for the patient, and the doctor appealed. This court noted that a prima facie case of intentional infliction of emotional distress required an intentional act and a resulting injury, and that the requisite intent could be inferred from the outrageousness of the actor's conduct. Conduct not generally considered extreme or outrageous could be characterized as such if the actor knew that the other person was peculiarly susceptible to emotional distress. Where the doctor knew of his patient's fragile nervousness but cursed her and screamed at her to leave his office, and this conduct led to her hospitalization, the evidence was sufficient to support the judgment. Affirmed. Anderson v. Prease, 445 A.2d 612, 613.

D.C.App.1982. Cit. but dist. coms. (d) and (h) cit. in sup. The plaintiffs sought to recover for an alleged breach of contract because the insurers wrongfully refused their claims. The lower court granted the defendants' motion for a directed verdict on the tort and punitive damages counts; it entered judgment on the verdict for the plaintiffs on the breach of contract claim. Both parties appealed. This court affirmed the directed verdict on the tort and punitive damages counts, but it reversed and remanded on the breach of contract claim because the lower court had never considered on the merits the defendants' statute of limitations defense. The court noted the elements required for the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that the defendants' conduct never approached the required level of outrageousness necessary to impose tort liability. Sere v. Group Hospitalization, Inc., 443 A.2d 33, 37, 38, certiorari denied 459 U.S. 912, 103 S.Ct. 221, 74 L.Ed.2d 176 (1982).

D.C.App.1980. Quot. in sup. Plaintiff, a 16-year-old youth, was mistakenly arrested while in bed at night in his home by a team including armed District of Columbia police and federal agents. The arrest followed a "Sting" operation in which District of Columbia police and federal law enforcement agents had collaborated. Plaintiff was released from custody after four hours. Plaintiff and his family filed two suits for damages based upon the mistaken arrest. The first suit was filed in the Superior Court against the District of Columbia, its mayor, its chief of police, and the employees of Sting 11 claiming damages for slander and defamation, violation of the constitutional right of privacy, procuring arrest and imprisonment, false pretenses, negligence, breaking and entering, infliction of emotional distress, and assault and battery. Plaintiffs filed a second suit in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia against the two federal agents involved in the arrest alleging a violation of the constitutional right of privacy. This second suit was decided first. The federal district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, which judgment was affirmed by per curiam order of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. The Superior Court then granted summary judgment for defendants in the suit pending in that court on all claims by plaintiff, and plaintiff appealed. On appeal, the judgment of the Superior Court was affirmed by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. On appeal, the court found that the issue of plaintiff's claim for damages based upon the infliction of emotional distress had not been disposed of by the district court's opinion. The appeals court found, however, that even if plaintiff's version of the events that occurred during the arrest was accepted fully, no "outrageous" police conduct was alleged that would indicate an intentional or reckless disregard of the plaintiff's emotional well-being. That fact that an officer held a gun, even at close range, during an arrest on probable cause for a felony charge is not in itself so far out of bounds that it can give rise to an emotional distress claim. Jackson v. District of Columbia, 412 A.2d 948, 956, 957.

D.C.App.1980. Quot. in part in sup., com. (d) quot. in part in sup., com. (e) cit. in ftn. and com. (k) cit. in disc. The plaintiff had been a professor at a University for six years. When a new department head was appointed, she sought to dismiss the plaintiff from his position. The college president informed the plaintiff of the decision in June 1975. The plaintiff sought a review, and in August 1975, the Board of Higher Education agreed in writing to restore the plaintiff to his professor status and to award him a two-year contract. The department head and the clinical coordinator of the department balked at compliance with the contract, arguing that the students under the plaintiff would have a more difficult time securing a job upon graduation because of a lack of learned skills. The plaintiff requested a temporary restraining order which was issued the same day. Before hearings began, the plaintiff suffered a cardiac arrest and died. His widow substituted herself as the party plaintiff, and filed an amended complaint seeking four million dollars in compensatory and punitive damages for, inter alia, wrongful death and infliction of emotional distress. The only overt acts alleged by the plaintiff were the defendants' interference with the plaintiff's contract rights and physical interference with the plaintiff's rights to use school facilities. Medical reports established that the cardiac arrest resulted from hypertension, possibly brought on by job pressures. The trial court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim upon which relief could be granted. On appeal, this court found that the trial court had correctly dismissed all counts but that it was analytically incorrect. The court stated that the wrongful death and emotional distress claims could have been established without evidence of physical impact or injury. Nevertheless, the acts perpetrated by the defendants were neither extreme nor outrageous enough to merit recovery by the plaintiff. The acts were not motivated by malice, but by a desire to provide for the students. Embarrassment and difficulty do not approach the requisite outrageousness necessary to establish the tort. The court affirmed the trial court's dismissal. Waldon v. Covington, 415 A.2d 1070, 1076, 1077.

Fla.

Fla.2013. Cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (g) quot. in sup. This court amended the standard jury instructions, as proposed by the Supreme Court Committee on Standard Jury Instructions in Civil Cases, with certain exceptions, and authorized the amended jury instructions for publication and use. The commentary to the instruction on "Burden of Proof on Claim" noted that the Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment g, and case law discussed the defense of "privilege"; pending further development of Florida law, the committee did not submit a standard instruction concerning any defense. In re Standard Jury Instructions in Civil Cases—Report No. 12-01, 130 So.3d 596, 611, 612.

Fla.2010. Cit. in disc., com. (g) cit. in disc. The Florida Supreme Court substantially authorized revisions of Florida's standard civil jury instructions proposed by the Supreme Court Committee on Standard Jury Instructions in Civil Cases. In its commentary on the jury instruction covering outrageous conduct causing severe emotional distress, the committee noted that, while the tort of "intentional infliction of emotional distress" was recognized in Florida, the boundaries of this tort, particularly when the claimant was a third party affected by conduct occurring between the defendant and another person, were not clearly defined. The committee further noted that, while § 46, Comment g, and case law discussed the defense of "privilege" with respect to this tort, pending further development of Florida law, no standard instruction had been submitted concerning any defense. In re Standard Jury Instructions in Civil Cases-Report No. 09-01 (Reorganization of the Civil Jury Instructions), 35 So.3d 666, 757, 760.

Fla.1995. Coms. (d) and (i) quot. in ftn. A man who was erroneously told that he had tested positive for the human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) sued the hospital, a laboratory, and his treating doctor, alleging negligence. Trial court dismissed and intermediate appellate court affirmed.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Answering the trial court's certified question, this court held that the impact rule applied to a damages claim from a negligent HIV diagnosis. However, it allowed plaintiff to amend his complaint to try to establish that misdiagnosis led to invasive medical treatment or prescriptions of caustic medicine. It noted that it had carved exceptions to the impact rule such as recognizing the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. R.J. v. Humana of Florida, Inc., 652 So.2d 360, 363.

Fla.1990. Quot. and cit. in disc.; coms. cit. generally in disc.; coms. (d) and (i) quot. in disc., cit. in spec. conc. op.; com. (k) quot. in spec. conc. op. After an airplane's engines failed en route to the Bahamas, an airline passenger sued the airline for intentional infliction of emotional distress under state law and for emotional distress damages under the Warsaw Convention. The trial court entered summary judgment in favor of the defendant. The intermediate appellate court affirmed in part and reversed in part, reinstating the state law claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Reversing and remanding, this court held that the plaintiff did not state a claim for relief for state law reckless or intentional infliction of emotional distress, but did have a cause of action for emotional distress under the Warsaw Convention. The court stated that allegations that the defendant failed to properly inspect, maintain, and operate its airplane rose no higher than negligence and that it was unlikely that the defendant would intentionally put its crews, passengers, and airplanes in such a perilous situation as that which occurred. A specially concurring opinion noted that the majority's approval of certain language from another opinion's dissent should not be taken to mean that impact is required in intentional infliction of emotional distress cases. Eastern Airlines, Inc. v. King, 557 So.2d 574, 575-576, 576, 579.

Fla.1985. Coms. (d) and (g) quot. in disc. A husband sued his group health insurer, alleging that its actions contributed to his wife's wrongful death and constituted intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered judgment for the plaintiff on the wrongful death claim but against him on the intentional infliction claim, and the intermediate appellate court affirmed. This court ruled that the actions of the insurer did not constitute the extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to support an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress and that the wrongful death action could not be maintained since the woman was an incidental beneficiary of the group policy, and would have been unable to maintain such an action herself. A dissent argued that the wife was a direct beneficiary, since the policy contemplated payments to her as a dependent spouse. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. McCarson, 467 So.2d 277, 279.

Fla.1979. Coms. (d), (g), (i) and (j) cit. in conc. op. A pilot brought an action against an airline, his former employer, to recover for the intentional infliction of mental distress caused by the defendant's actions allegedly taken in retaliation for the pilot's comments or criticisms concerning the lack of safety in the airline's equipment and its pilot training procedures. The lower court granted the defendant's motion for a directed verdict. The appellate court affirmed and held that the actions shown by the plaintiff did not constitute independent torts so that they could not form the basis for an action for the intentional infliction of mental distress and could only support an action for breach of contract or unfair labor practices. The concurring opinion stated that neither the defendant's actions nor the effect of those actions upon the plaintiff were of the thoroughly horrendous character required to make such a claim. Gellert v. Eastern Air Lines, Inc., 370 So.2d 802, 808, certiorari denied 381 So.2d 766 (1980).

Fla.App.

Fla.App.2023. Quot. in case quot. in sup. Estate of patient sued hospital, alleging that healthcare providers in hospital's emergency room performed an intubation of patient that caused patient fatal brain injuries. The trial court granted plaintiff's motion for leave to amend the complaint to add a claim for punitive damages. This court reversed and remanded, holding that plaintiff failed to show that the providers' conduct was grossly negligent such that punitive damages were warranted. The court explained that punitive damages under Florida law were reserved for truly culpable conduct like the extreme and outrageous conduct required to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, and the providers' alleged misfeasance or malfeasance—in placing patient on a floor with fewer observation checks, failing to attend to patient during emergency calls, and beginning intubation without proper supervision—was not grossly negligent. Cleveland Clinic Florida Health System Nonprofit Corporation v. Oriolo, 357 So.3d 703, 706.

Fla.App.2018. Cit. and quot. in sup.; com. (j) cit. and quot. in sup., quot. in case quot. in sup. Brother-in-law sued sister-in-law, alleging that she falsely stated that he was indebted to her for a loan; sister-in-law counterclaimed for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that he said that he would never pay her back and pushed her down the stairs. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for sister-in-law on her emotional-distress claim. This court reversed that portion of the decision and remanded, holding that sister-in-law failed to present sufficient evidence that she suffered severe emotional distress within the meaning of Restatement Second of Torts § 46. While the outrageous nature of brother-in-law's conduct warranted a reasonable inference that it was of a type that could cause severe emotional distress to some people, it could not reasonably be said that sister-in-law in particular suffered such distress without any evidence bearing on the actual effect of his conduct on her emotional state. Kim v. Jung Hyun Chang, 249 So.3d 1300, 1305, 1306, 1308.

Fla.App.2012. Quot. in case cit. and quot. in sup. After cemetery disinterred deceased's body without deceased's widow's knowledge or permission and sent the body for reburial in another state at the request of deceased's mother, widow sued cemetery for damages for reckless infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. The trial court entered summary judgment for defendant. Reversing and remanding, this court held that it could not conclude as a matter of law that defendant's conduct did not reach the level of outrageousness required to support this claim, especially in light of the special deference paid by courts to family feelings where rights involving dead bodies were concerned. Mellette v. Trinity Memorial Cemetery, Inc., 95 So.3d 1043, 1049.

Fla.App.2010. Com. (f) quot. in case quot. in sup. Estate of patient who died at a hospital after having hip surgery and going into cardiac arrest brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against hospital, physician, and nurses, alleging that physician and nurses covered up their injection of patient with a lethal overdose of blood-pressure medication, and provided false information to her family. Reversing the trial court's dismissal of the claim and remanding, this court held that plaintiff sufficiently pleaded the elements of her IIED claim. The court explained that defendants' conduct in making false statements—which led to the interruption of patient's funeral and the return of her body for a second autopsy—rose to the level of atrocious and utterly intolerable behavior; in a situation where a person's loved one had died, it would be apparent to anyone that the person would be susceptible to emotional distress and, therefore, that the action of providing false information concerning the loved one's cause of death met the standard for a claim of IIED. Thomas v. Hospital Bd. of Directors of Lee County, 41 So.3d 246, 256.

Fla.App.2007. Quot. in case quot. in sup. Fast-food restaurant employee brought human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) discrimination suit against employer and supervisor, including an additional claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. Affirming in part, this court held, inter alia, that the alleged teasing of plaintiff over her condition by other employees did not rise to the level of outrageous conduct required to sustain the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Byrd v. BT Foods, Inc., 948 So.2d 921, 928.

Fla.App.2007. Coms. (d) and (e) quot. in sup., illus. 5 cit. and quot. in sup. Owner of bottle club sued police officers for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), alleging that defendants conducted a continuing campaign of harassment by running a drug and prostitution ring out of his club and refusing to investigate illegal activities inside or associated with the club while harassing plaintiff and his employees to ensure their silence. The trial court dismissed the complaint. Reversing, this court held that, given the existence of a relationship of authority in this case that would have led plaintiff to believe that he was subject to arrest for not giving in to defendants' demands, defendants' conduct allegedly encompassing a campaign of extortion leading to the demise of plaintiff's business, if proven, went beyond the bounds of decency and was sufficiently outrageous to support plaintiff's IIED claim. Gallogly v. Rodriguez, 970 So.2d 470, 471-473.

Fla.App.2007. Cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (e) cit. in sup., com. (f) cit. and quot. in sup. Claimant brought suit for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against workers' compensation carrier and its agent for delaying authorization of her double lung transplant. The trial court denied defendants' motion to dismiss. On remand, this court affirmed, holding that, when paired with plaintiff's allegation that defendants knew that plaintiff had a very limited life expectancy and that the additional emotional distress caused by the delay could well hasten her demise, defendants' alleged conduct was sufficiently outrageous to support a claim for IIED and negate the immunity afforded defendants by the state's workers' compensation act; the court further held that the parties' unequal positions could also supply the heightened degree of outrageousness. Liberty Mut. Ins. Co. v. Steadman, 968 So.2d 592, 594-596.

Fla.App.2006. Quot. in case quot. in sup. Jewish stepmother of an employee of a religious organization that allegedly attempted to convince Jews to accept Christian beliefs sued organization for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, arguing that defendant falsely, and without her permission, portrayed her as a convert to the organization in a newsletter that it published and distributed. The trial court dismissed the complaint. Affirming in part, this court held, inter alia, that the newsletter publication fell short of the extreme and outrageous conduct required to support the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court reasoned that the language in question occurred in a praise report primarily intended for the eyes of like-minded individuals who would have viewed the subject matter in a positive light. Rapp v. Jews for Jesus, Inc., 944 So.2d 460, 466.

Fla.App.2005. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Nurse sued employer hospital for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that, in compliance with employer's directions to report to work immediately despite her seizure-like symptoms, she drove to work, suffered a seizure, and was injured in a car accident. Trial court dismissed the suit. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that defendant's direction to its employee that she report to work right away, despite its awareness that she might be suffering symptoms of a serious condition, did not exceed all bounds of decency within the contemplation of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Hernandez v. Tallahassee Medical Center, Inc., 896 So.2d 839, 841.

Fla.App.2004. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Minister and his wife brought suit against parishioners for slander, negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress, and loss of consortium, after parishioners publicly accused minister of stealing church funds to buy a new car. Trial court granted defendants' motion to dismiss complaint. Affirming in part, this court held, inter alia, that the alleged acts, while embarrassing and unsettling, did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Legrande v. Emmanuel, 889 So.2d 991, 995.

Fla.App.2003. Adopted in case cit. in disc. Gas-station/convenience-store employee who claimed that she received psychological injuries as a result of a robbery at the store brought suit against employer, alleging that defendant was negligent in failing to provide adequate security. Affirming the trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendant, this court held that, under Florida law, plaintiff could not maintain an action for negligent infliction of emotional distress against defendant in the absence of a physical impact or injury. The court noted that the impact doctrine had no application to the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress, which was not alleged here, because the duties created by such an intentional tort had never been restricted to the protection of physical person and property. Rivers v. Grimsley Oil Co., 842 So.2d 975, 976.

Fla.App.2003. Com. (d) quot. generally in case quot. in sup. In a dispute between siblings over an inheritance, plaintiff sued executrix of decedent's estate for intentional infliction of emotional distress and slander. Affirming in part the trial court's dismissal of the claims, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff could not recover for intentional infliction of emotional distress, since the facts as pled failed to show that defendant's conduct was extreme and outrageous. Shedeke v. Gomez, 837 So.2d 1122, 1123.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Fla.App.2002. Quot. in sup. Mother and grandparents, individually and on behalf of child, sued father, father's private investigator, and elementary school principal after father and investigator allegedly kidnapped child from school. The trial court granted defendants' motions to dismiss. Affirming in part, this court held, inter alia, that principal's action of releasing child to father when presented with out-of-state custody order did not rise to level of extreme and outrageous conduct sufficient to support claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Allen v. Walker, 810 S.2d 1090, 1091.

Fla.App.2002. Com. (d) adopted in case quot. in disc. Employee sued her employer and supervisors for discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation and for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted defendants' motion to dismiss. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's allegations of verbal abuse and disparate treatment, if true, constituted objectionable and offensive conduct, but did not rise to the level of outrageousness that was required by law in a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress in the employment context. De La Campa v. Grifols America, Inc., 819 So.2d 940, 943.

Fla.App.2001. Quot. in case quot. in ftn. Trial court entered an order in a guardianship adversary proceeding, authorizing guardian husband to discontinue life-prolonging procedures for his wife. This court reversed in part and remanded, holding, inter alia, that record was insufficient to support a temporary injunction sought by wife's parents, and that any action challenging final order of guardianship court must be filed as an adversary proceeding within the guardianship. The court stated that it did not need to decide whether parents stated cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress against husband. Emotional-distress damages were questionable, since parents generally had no common-law or statutory right to recover such damages if their married, adult daughter was a wrongful-death victim. In re Guardianship of Schiavo, 792 So.2d 551, 562, appeal after remand 800 So.2d 640 (Fla.App.2001).

Fla.App.2001. Cit. in case quot. in sup. Former law-firm employee sued firm's attorney, asserting a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress arising out of instances of sexual harassment in the workplace. The trial court denied defendant's motion for a directed verdict, and entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiff. Affirming, this court held that plaintiff's evidence of defendant's persistent verbal abuse coupled with his repeated offensive, unwelcomed physical contact established a prima facie case that defendant's workplace harassment of plaintiff was outrageous. Johnson v. Thigpen, 788 So.2d 410, 412.

Fla.App.2001. Quot. in case quot. in disc. Former employee sued former employer for employment discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other things, based on alleged handicap discrimination and racial discrimination in violation of state law. Trial court dismissed plaintiff's claim. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held that plaintiff failed to prove that defendant's conduct was sufficiently outrageous to sustain claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Williams v. Southeast Florida Cable, Inc., 782 So.2d 988, 991.

Fla.App.2000. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup. Teacher sued pupils for intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with defendants' publication and distribution of a student bulletin. The trial court dismissed the complaint. Reversing and remanding, this court held that defendants' conduct in creating a newsletter in which they threatened plaintiff and her family with death and serious bodily harm could be considered extreme and outrageous and outside the bounds of all decent behavior. Nims v. Harrison, 768 So.2d 1198, 1200.

Fla.App.1998. Cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. and cit. in disc., com. (k) cit. in disc., illus. 1-3 cit. in disc. Tenants who were constructively evicted from their leased premises sued landlord for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court dismissed the complaint. Affirming, this court held that the conduct complained of, which included defendant's failure to act despite its alleged knowledge that the property at issue was below the flood elevation level required by FEMA, that the property was continuously in standing water, and that there was water in the electrical fixtures and lights was not so extreme and outrageous as to give rise to an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Clemente v. Horne, 707 So.2d 865, 866, 867.

Fla.App.1997. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. After a police officer and an investigator for the department of health and human services seized a child from the mother at a church where the mother had been attending services, the mother sued the department, the city, the officer, and the investigator for, among other claims, civil-rights violations and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Trial court dismissed the mother's complaint. This court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff stated a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, in light of her allegation that the officers' unjustified and unexplained taking of her children while she and her children attended church services was outrageous. She alleged that this conduct was accomplished by ripping the infant from her arms, choking her until she lost consciousness, throwing her to the ground, arresting her for challenging the officers' legal authority to take the children without a court order or any justification, and then initiating dependency proceedings to terminate the parent-child relationship. Johnson v. State HRS, 695 So.2d 927, 929, appeal after remand 793 So.2d 20 (Fla.App.2001).

Fla.App.1997. Cit. and quot. in conc. and diss. op. A woman, her family, and a friend sued a department store for false imprisonment and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, after they were detained and evicted from the store and their photos were taken against their will and placed in public view on a bulletin board labeled “Wall of Shame.” Trial court granted defendant summary judgment, holding that defendant's actions did not rise to the level of outrageousness required for intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court reversed and remanded, holding, inter alia, that trial court properly granted summary judgment on the emotional-distress claim, but that a fact issue existed regarding the false-imprisonment claim, particularly as to whether the detention was reasonable and warranted. The opinion concurring in part and dissenting in part argued that fact issues existed as to the emotional-distress claim, because it could not be concluded that there was no conceivable interpretation of the facts on which a fact finder could determine that defendant's actions were outrageous. Rivers v. Dillards Dept. Store, Inc., 698 So.2d 1328, 1333.

Fla.App.1996. Adopted in case cit. in disc., cit. in diss. op., cit. in case quot. in diss. op., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., cit. in diss. op., subsec. (1) quot. in diss. op., com. (h) cit. and quot. in diss. op. Woman and her husband sued health-care plan and participating physician from whom woman was required to seek treatment for medical malpractice and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendants, in an effort to maximize profits, purposefully failed to provide woman with adequate care. The trial court granted defendants' motion to dismiss. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held that plaintiffs had stated a cause of action for medical negligence, but that defendants' conduct was not so outrageous as to allow recovery for mental distress. Dissent believed that the lower court's determination of whether plaintiffs had stated a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress should have been made based on all of the evidence, rather than on their complaint. Paul v. Humana Medical Plan, Inc., 682 So.2d 1119, 1121-1123.

Fla.App.1993. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former grocery store employee who was terminated for theft sued store and its owner for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Reversing the trial court's entry of judgment on a jury verdict for employee and remanding, this court held that, even if the store's conduct in its theft investigation exceeded the bounds of propriety, it did not rise to the level of outrageousness, consisting as it did of reporting the theft to the police after failing to use successfully Florida's civil theft statute. Food Lion, Inc. v. Clifford, 629 So.2d 201, 203.

Fla.App.1993. Cit. in case quot. in ftn., com. (d) cit. in disc. and cit. and quot. in case quot. in ftn. A police officer made a videotape of an autopsy performed on a minor who died from a drug overdose. Officer then hosted a viewing of the tape at his home with other officers in an alleged “party atmosphere” where the audience joked and laughed. The minor's mother and sister sued police department and city for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. Trial court initially granted defendants summary judgment but appellate court reversed. On remand, trial court granted defendants summary judgment on basis of sovereign immunity from liability for an employee's willful and wanton conduct. This court affirmed, holding that if jury found that officers' conduct supported a claim for outrageous infliction of emotional distress by reckless conduct, this conduct would at least constitute willful and wanton conduct under the state sovereign immunity statute; therefore, sovereign immunity doctrine would bar this claim. Williams v. City of Minneola, 619 So.2d 983, 987.

Fla.App.1992. Com. (g) cit. generally in sup. Two children sued a department store and one of its employees for false imprisonment, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and defamation, alleging that the defendants falsely accused them of shoplifting, detained them for two hours, interrogated them in an intimidating manner, and refused their requests to call their parents. The trial court entered a directed verdict for the defendants on three counts and the jury found for the defendants on the other two. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that the defendants were privileged to engage in reckless or outrageous conduct to assert their legal right to detain persons whom they had probable cause to suspect of shoplifting. The court stated that the defendants' conduct did not even approach the limits of the privilege, since there was probable cause to suspect the plaintiffs of shoplifting, the employee who detained the children had called her supervisor, and the employee then followed the supervisor's instructions to call the sheriff's office. Canto v. J.B. Ivey and Co., 595 So.2d 1025, 1028.

Fla.App.1992. Cit. in case cit. in disc., quot. in sup., coms. (d) and (i) cit. in sup. While a patient was waiting in a hospital for x-rays to diagnose a medical problem, a hospital physician verbally assaulted her in a loud and abusive way concerning a debt that she owed to the physician's friend. The patient sued the physician for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Reversing in part the trial court's dismissal of the action and remanding, this court held that, given the doctor-patient relationship between defendant and plaintiff and defendant's knowledge of plaintiff's medical problems, defendant acted in deliberate disregard of the high degree of probability that plaintiff would suffer severe emotional distress and the complaint sufficiently alleged outrageous conduct to survive a motion to dismiss. McAlpin v. Sokolay, 596 So.2d 1266, 1269, 1270.

Fla.App.1991. Cit. in sup., cit. in ftn. to conc. and diss. op., cit. in conc. and diss. op., com. (d) quot. in sup. After a television station broadcast a videotape showing the remains of a child who had been abducted in 1985, the child's parents sued the television station for invasion of privacy and outrage. The trial court dismissed the complaint with prejudice. Affirming in part and reversing and remanding in part, this court affirmed the dismissal of the invasion of privacy claim but reversed the dismissal of the count for the tort of outrage, concluding that reasonable persons in the community could find that the defendant's alleged conduct was outrageous in character and exceeded the bounds of decency so as to be intolerable in a civilized community. A concurring and dissenting opinion argued that the plaintiffs stated a cause of action for invasion of privacy, as well as for intentional infliction of emotional distress, although the two counts might prove to be identical and require an election by the plaintiffs at a subsequent point as to which tort to pursue. Armstrong v. H & C Communications, Inc., 575 So.2d 280, 281-283.

Fla.App.1991. Cit. and quot. in sup., cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (d) cit. in sup. and quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (f) quot. in disc., com. (i) cit. in disc. After police officers displayed photographs and showed a videotape to several other individuals of the autopsy of a 14-year-old boy who had died of a drug overdose, the decedent's mother and sister sued the city, among others, for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. The trial court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment. Reversing and remanding, this court held that a cause of action in tort for reckless infliction of emotional distress lay for outrageous conduct involving pictures of the dead body of a plaintiff's spouse, child, sibling, or parent, even though the plaintiff was not present at the display of the pictures and the allegedly tortious conduct did not physically impact the plaintiff, whether or not the emotional distress in turn caused physical harm to the plaintiff. Williams v. City of Minneola, 575 So.2d 683, 690-693, review denied 589 So.2d 289 (Fla.1991), appeal after remand 619 So.2d 983 (1993). See case below.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Fla.App.1990. Cit. in disc., coms. (d) and (g) quot. in disc. The settlor-beneficiary of a trust sued the trustee bank for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that the defendant invested all of the plaintiff's liquid assets in a fund that was declining in value, contrary to the plaintiff's instructions and investment plan and the bank's proposal and that this mismanagement caused the beneficiary to develop heart disease. The trial court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment on the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming, this court held that the trustee's actions did not support the plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress because those actions did not rise to the level of outrageous conduct required by Florida law and that they were privileged as the assertion of legal rights the defendant had within the trust agreement. Baker v. Florida Nat. Bank, 559 So.2d 284, 288, review denied 570 So.2d 1303 (Fla.1990).

Fla.App.1990. Cit. and quot. in disc., cit. generally in case quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. The personal representative of his deceased father's estate sued several family members for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that, to remove him as personal representative and deprive him of his share of the assets, the defendants conspired to have the plaintiff falsely arrested, convicted, and sentenced for the first-degree murder of the decedent, who was in fact accidentally shot and killed by the plaintiff as he was cleaning his shotgun. The trial court dismissed the complaint with prejudice. Reversing in part and remanding, this court held that the allegations were sufficient to state a cause of action. The court said that outrageousness was more likely to be found where some relationship existed that gave the defendant the power to affect the plaintiff's interests; here, the defendants' relationship to the plaintiff with regard to the estate of their father gave the defendants the power to affect directly the plaintiff's interests. Fridovich v. Fridovich, 573 So.2d 65, 71, 72, reversed 598 So.2d 65 (Fla.1992).

Fla.App.1990. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. and cit. in sup., com. (e) and illus. 5 cit. in sup. A woman sued a restaurant owner for slander, malicious prosecution, and intentional infliction of emotional distress after the owner had her arrested for refusing to pay for a lobster she claimed was uncooked and inedible. The trial court granted summary judgment for the owner. Reversing in part, the court of appeal held that there was sufficient evidence in the record to support plaintiff's claims for malicious prosecution and emotional distress. The court said that a question of fact existed as to whether the food was inedible and whether the innkeeper had probable cause to believe he was being defrauded, and that a jury could find the owner's calculated use of the threat of arrest to extort from a patron money she did not owe sufficiently outrageous to warrant recovery for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Lashley v. Bowman, 561 So.2d 406, 408-410.

Fla.App.1990. Subsec. (1) and coms. (d) and (i) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (g) cit. in sup. A husband and wife sued a cemetery alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress and breach of their statutory right of access after cemetery employees ejected them while they were trying to hold a memorial service at their son's grave. Plaintiffs had previously conducted such services without incident at the site. The trial court dismissed the statutory claim and entered summary judgment for the cemetery on the emotional distress claim. Reversing and remanding, the court of appeal held that plaintiffs had stated a cause of action for violation of their statutory right of access to the cemetery, and that the claim of emotional distress should have gone to the jury, as a trier of fact could find that the cemetery acted recklessly, in deliberate disregard of a high probability that ejecting plaintiffs from the cemetery would cause them emotional distress. Mallock v. Southern Memorial Park, Inc., 561 So.2d 330, 331-332.

Fla.App.1989. Coms. (d) and (g) quot. in disc. An insured party sued a group health insurer and its servicing agent for fraud, negligence, and intentional infliction of emotional distress stemming from the insurer's denial of insurance coverage of the insured's two ailing sons and the agent's action of relaying the insurer's decision to the insured that the sons were no longer covered. The jury found in favor of the servicing agent on the negligence claim and for the insured on all other counts. This court affirmed the judgment entered against the insurer but reversed the judgment against the servicing agent. It determined, inter alia, that the proof failed to reach the heavy burden required for recovery for intentional infliction of emotional distress allegedly caused by the servicing agent. The court explained that in relaying false information as to coverage, the servicing agent had no authority to make independent coverage decisions with respect to the insurance policy and it had initially double checked the coverage question with the primary insurer. In addition the servicing agent had referred the plaintiff's counsel to the primary insurer on all questions of coverage. Blue Cross/Blue Shield of Fla. v. Weiner, 543 So.2d 794, 796-797, certiorari denied 494 U.S. 1028, 110 S.Ct. 1475, 108 L.Ed.2d 612 (1990).

Fla.App.1989. Subsec. (1) cit. in case cit. in disc., subsec. (2)(a) quot. in sup., illus. 1 cit. in case cit. but dist. A man informed parents that he had sexually abused their daughter, and that his wife had been supplying the daughter with illegal drugs from the time she was 8 years old, throughout her childhood, until she was 23 years old. The parents sued the man and his wife for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted the defendants summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that, on public policy grounds, damages for emotional distress were recoverable only by the victim of abusive behavior and not by members of her family who were not present when the behavior occurred. The court, however, noted that the situation would have been different if the information given by the defendant to the plaintiffs had been intentionally false. M.M. v. M.P.S., 556 So.2d 1140, 1141, review denied 569 So.2d 1279 (1990).

Fla.App.1988. Subsec. (d) cit. in sup. The mother of a kindergarten student sued a convenience store for false imprisonment, malicious prosecution, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, after it had the child arrested for stealing a package of gum. The trial court entered judgment for the plaintiff on the false imprisonment claim. Reversing, this court held that the store's actions were privileged because it had probable cause to institute proceedings and it asserted its legal rights in a permissible manner. Southland Corp. v. Bartsch, 522 So.2d 1053, 1056, review dismissed 531 So.2d 167 (1988).

Fla.App.1988. Quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. A defendant appealed a jury finding that he intentionally inflicted emotional distress upon plaintiffs. The trial court entered judgment on the jury verdict, but this court reversed, holding that the charged conduct was not so outrageous in character and extreme in degree as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and be regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Swinarski v. Keller, 529 So.2d 1208, 1209, review denied 541 So.2d 1172 (1989).

Fla.App.1987. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in sup. An insured sued her insurer for intentional infliction of mental distress. The trial court granted the insurer's motion for summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that the insurer's arbitrary refusal to pay on a valid insurance claim was not so outrageous in character as to be actionable. Davis v. Gulf Life Insurance Company, 502 So.2d 1012, 1013.

Fla.App.1987. Quot. and cit. in sup., com. (g) quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (e) quot. in ftn. in sup., com. (f) quot. in sup. The insured held a credit disability policy requiring the insurer to make car loan payments to the bank if he became totally disabled. After the insured became totally disabled, the insurer honored its policy for more than a year and then stopped payments on the basis that the total disability stemmed from a preexisting disability. After the insured's explanations were rebuffed, he was subjected to verbal assaults and his car was repossessed. He sued the insurer for payment under the policy, and sought compensatory and punitive damages. The jury found for the insured. This court affirmed in part and reversed in part, holding, inter alia, that damages were properly awarded for intentional infliction of emotional distress because the insurer's behavior was extreme and outrageous, and represented an abuse of an unequal relationship and an attempt to exploit the plaintiff's known vulnerabilities. Dependable Life Ins. Co. v. Harris, 510 So.2d 985, 986-989.

Fla.App.1987. Cit. in ftn., cit. in disc., quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. and in diss. op., com. (h) quot. in disc. and in ftn. and cit. and quot. in diss. op., com. (i) and illus. 15 and 16 quot. in diss. op. An airplane passenger sued the airline for intentional infliction of emotional distress because an engine failed during the flight. The passenger argued that the airline's maintenance of the airplane was reckless conduct because 12 similar engine failures had previously occurred on the airline's aircraft. The trial court dismissed the complaint on the ground that the passenger had failed to state a claim. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held that the passenger had stated a cause of action because the airline's inadequate maintenance of its aircraft rose to the level of reckless conduct. The dissent argued that there was no cause of action because the airline's behavior was not willful misconduct. King v. Eastern Airlines, Inc., 536 So.2d 1023, 1024, 1025, 1027, 1032-1036, decision disapproved and remanded 557 So.2d 574 (1990). See above case.

Fla.App.1987. Cit. in disc., coms. cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. in sup. A doctor sued a hospital for intentional infliction of mental distress following his termination as director of the hospital laboratory. The trial court granted the hospital's motion for summary judgment, holding that the hospital's conduct was not so extreme and outrageous as to permit recovery where the conduct consisted of denying the plaintiff basic support services, excluding the plaintiff from social affairs, falsely accusing the plaintiff of theft, prohibiting laboratory personnel from conversing with the plaintiff, and publishing false information about the plaintiff's income. Scheller

v. American Medical Intern., Inc., 502 So.2d 1268, 1270, 1271, review denied 513 So.2d 1060 (Fla.1987).

Fla.App.1986. Quot. in sup. The estate of a nursing home patient sued the nursing home for the wrongful death of the patient from infected bed sores. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for the plaintiff awarding both compensatory and punitive damages. Affirming, this court held that there was sufficient evidence of willful or wanton conduct to justify the award of punitive damages because the defendant's conduct was outrageous and beyond the bounds of decency. Payton Health Care Facilities, Inc. v. Estate of Campbell, 497 So.2d 1233, 1240.

Fla.App.1985. Com. (j) cit. in conc. and diss. op. An employee brought a tort action against her employer and her supervisor, alleging damages arising out of an incident in which the supervisor had offensively touched the employee while they were both on duty. The trial court granted summary judgment in favor of the employer, holding that the claims were barred by the exclusivity provision of the workers' compensation act, but did not grant summary judgment for the supervisor. On rehearing, this court affirmed, rejecting the employee's argument that, even if the tort of battery was barred under the statute, the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress was not. A concurring and dissenting opinion criticized the majority for not allowing the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, stating that the majority's reasoning did not take into account the unique quality of the tort in that physical injury need not be shown. Brown v. Winn-Dixie Montgomery, Inc., 469 So.2d 155, 161.

Fla.App.1985. Com. (d) quot. in sup. A widow sought compensatory and punitive damages from a cremation society, alleging breach of contract, negligence, and intentional infliction of emotional distress because the cremation society scattered the decedent's ashes at sea, contrary to his specific instructions. The trial court entered judgment for the widow and awarded her compensatory and punitive damages. This court reversed on the damage award issue, but affirmed the trial court's denial of the cremation society's motion for directed verdict on the widow's claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court reasoned that denial was proper because the evidence presented regarding the cremation society's handling of the decedent's ashes contrary to his specific instructions was such “extreme and outrageous” conduct as to go beyond all bounds of decency in a civilized community. Smith v. Telophase Nat. Cremation Soc., Inc., 471 So.2d 163, 166.

Fla.App.1984. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in spec. conc. op. A customer sued the owner of a retail store for intentional infliction of emotional distress after four of the store's employees chased her and wrongfully accused her of stealing in front of a crowd of people. The trial court found for the plaintiff, and this court affirmed without written opinion. The specially concurring opinion noted that this tort was reserved for extreme and outrageous conduct that would be regarded as atrocious in a civilized society. Jefferson Ward Stores, Inc. v. Khorozian, 519 So.2d 627, 628.

Fla.App.1983. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. The defendant attorney appealed from the trial court dismissal of her third-party complaint against the plaintiff's law firm for indemnity and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court affirmed, stating that there was no basis for the indemnity claim and that the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress failed because the conduct alleged was not beyond the bounds of decency. Anderson v. Rossman & Baumberger, P.A., 440 So.2d 591, 593.

Fla.App.1983. Cit. in disc., cit. in case cit. in ftn. in disc., and coms. (e) and (f) quot. in disc. After the plaintiff was rendered totally disabled by a car accident, his insurer paid the plaintiff disability income for several years. Later, the insurer stopped payments and falsely represented that the plaintiff was not disabled. The plaintiff was forced to sign a paper agreeing that no further payments were due. The plaintiff then brought this action for outrageous conduct causing severe emotional distress. The trial court dismissed the action for failure to state a claim. This court reversed and adopted the view that a cause of action for emotional distress brought about by outrageous conduct was actionable notwithstanding the absence of another tort. Dominguez v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc., 438 So.2d 58, 59, 60, 62.

Fla.App.1983. Cit. in disc. A former employee of a community college brought this suit against the college and its president for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The plaintiff alleged that the president made sexually suggestive invitations to her. The trial court dismissed the complaint. On appeal the district court of appeal affirmed, holding that the tort upon which the plaintiff's complaint was based was not recognized in Florida. None of the allegations against the principal tortfeasor involved a touching or any form of battery. They were limited to the use of offensively opprobrious words directed to the plaintiff by her superior on the job. The plaintiff's declination of the propositions was alleged to have resulted in the loss of her job. The court stated that the obnoxious and socially odious words allegedly coming from the defendant, if true, were nevertheless without physical contact or threat of bodily harm. The declination to extend her employment contract had no legal significance as none of the defendants were legally obligated to do so. That event and the other consequences complained of were found to be insufficient as a matter of law to state grounds for relief under existing law. The plaintiff's only alternative for remedy was to bring a claim in federal court for sexual discrimination. On motion for rehearing, the court certified to the state supreme court the question whether one could recover damages for intentional infliction of mental distress not incidental to any other actionable wrong. Gmuer v. Garner, 426 So.2d 972, 973-975.

Fla.App.1983. Quot. in disc. The husband of a deceased insured sought damages against a group health insurer for breach of contract, intentional infliction of emotional distress to the insured while she was alive, and wrongful death. The trial court entered judgment on the verdict in favor of the husband, but set aside the jury award for damages suffered by the insured while living. The court of appeals affirmed. There was sufficient evidence to support a finding that the insurer's actions constituted the intentional infliction of emotional distress. The insurer, although fully aware of the serious condition of the insured and of its obligations to her, discontinued the nursing services to spite the insured, notwithstanding the potentially devastating consequences to her. The trial court did not err in setting aside the jury award sustained by the insured while she lived since the Florida wrongful death statute allowed the estate to recover damages only for prospective loss of earnings of the decedent and for the decedent's medical and funeral expenses which were not recovered by the survivor. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. McCarson, 429 So.2d 1287, 1290.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Fla.App.1980. Subsec. (1) cit. in sup. and quot. in sup. in ftn. Com. (d) quot. in sup. and com. (j) cit. in ftn. in sup. Plaintiffs were cashier for defendant supermarket and her husband. Cashier had worked for supermarket for six years. The supermarket had been experiencing a cash shortage, and defendant security manager for defendant supermarket asked plaintiff cashier to submit to a polygraph test. She was told that company policy required all employees to take the test or be fired. Plaintiff consented in writing to take the test. At this point she was told by the security manager that it was company policy to have her admit to prior thefts because any one who had worked for the company as long as she had must have taken something. He told her that if she denied such past thefts she would be terminated as untrustworthy. Plaintiff claimed that she protested her ignorance, but that the security officer told her the alternative to confession was termination. He also told her that any confession would not go against her record, and that other employees had signed such statements and been retained by the supermarket in return for repayment of the amount taken. Plaintiff then signed a statement drawn up by the security officer admitting the theft of $150. The polygraph test was then administered and plaintiff was told by the security officer that “it didn't clear.” The next day, the security officer insisted that plaintiff sign a new statement admitting the theft of $500 and gave her another polygraph test. Later, plaintiff was told that she was suspended until the investigation was completed, but that she would then be notified to return to work. Instead, she was terminated because of her admission of misappropriating company cash, although she claimed to have returned all the money taken. About a month later, plaintiff and her husband met with officials of the supermarket to discuss her termination. This meeting was tape recorded and while unintelligible in spots included a statement by plaintiff's husband that plaintiff's truthfulness concerning her version of the threats made by the security manager had been established by an independent polygraph examination by a certified polygraph expert retained by plaintiffs. Plaintiffs brought suit against the supermarket and the security manager to recover damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress and for fraud. The lower court admitted into evidence the tape recording of the meeting between plaintiffs and supermarket officials. The jury found for plaintiffs, awarding compensatory and punitive damages. Defendants appealed. The appeals court found: (1) the conduct of the security manager was not sufficiently outrageous as to give rise to a cause of action for the intentional infliction of emotional distress; (2) plaintiffs did have a cause of action for fraud and (3) the trial court committed reversible error when it admitted the tape recording into evidence. The appeals court reversed the judgment of the trial court and remanded for a new trial on the issues of liability and damages, compensatory and punitive in regard to the claims based upon fraud and deceit. Food Fair, Inc. v. Anderson, 382 So.2d 150, 153.

Fla.App.1979. Cit. in disc., subsec. (1) quot. in disc., coms. (d) and (j) quot. in part in disc. and com. (i) cit. and quot. in part in disc. The defendant credit company had telephoned the plaintiff and, in order to obtain the address for the plaintiff's son for credit purposes, falsely stated that the plaintiff's grandchild had been involved in a car accident and the defendant needed to know the son's address. The plaintiff sued for intentional infliction of mental distress and claimed that she suffered severe mental distress until she ascertained that the story was false. A jury entered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff and awarded both compensatory and punitive damages. The defendant appealed. This court affirmed the lower court's decision and held that the defendant's conduct was reckless, extreme and outrageous, beyond all bounds of human decency and was properly found to be liable for injuries resulting from such conduct. The court stated that the plaintiff does not have to incur bodily harm if the defendant's conduct is sufficiently extreme and outrageous. The court stated that evidence of fright, worry and/or grief could be sufficient to prove that the defendant had intentionally inflicted mental distress. Ford Motor Credit Co. v. Sheehan, 373 So.2d 956, 958-959.

Fla.App.1975. Cit. in ftn. in sup. A mother brought this action against a newspaper for trespass, invasion of privacy, and intentional infliction of mental distress. While plaintiff was away from home a severe fire occurred which killed her seventeen year old daughter. Defendant's photographer, assigned to the fire, entered the house, without express invitation, and took certain photographs of the interior at the request of officials at the scene of the fire. Defendant published a picture of a silhouette on the floor of the house where the plaintiff's daughter's body had lain. It was from this publication that plaintiff first learned of her daughter's death. The trial court dismissed counts of invasion of privacy and entered summary judgment for the defendant on the counts of trespass and intentional infliction of mental distress. On appeal, reversed as to compensatory damages for trespass and invasion of privacy, but otherwise affirmed. The court held that a genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether custom and usage implied consent for the photographer to enter plaintiff's home in her absence while covering a news event. Although not a trespass per se, if entry by the photographer into plaintiff's home constituted an intrusion, it follows that such intrusion constituted a sufficient basis for the tort of invasion of privacy. Fletcher v. Florida Publishing Co., 319 So.2d 100, 112.

Fla.App.1973. Com. (e) cit. in diss. op. but not fol. The plaintiff insureds, injured in a collision with an uninsured motorist, brought an action against defendant, insurer of plaintiffs, for recovery in excess of the policy limits for uninsured motorist coverage and for punitive damages resulting from defendant's malicious bad faith in requiring plaintiffs to resort to arbitration, rather than pay plaintiffs for their valid claim. On plaintiffs' appeal from a judgment dismissing the complaint, the court affirmed, and held that under Florida law, defendant's failure to settle plaintiffs' claim, even if in bad faith, did not render defendant liable for punitive damages or damages in excess of the uninsured motorist coverage. Baxter v. Royal Indemnity Company, 285 So.2d 652, 662, cert. dismissed 317 So.2d 725 (1975).

Ga.

Ga.1991. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. and cit. in diss. op., com. (j) cit. in sup. A former managerial employee sued her employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that the defendant transferred her to another division and demoted her to a meaningless position after she testified against the defendant in an employment discrimination suit. The trial court granted summary judgment for the defendant, and the intermediate appellate court affirmed. Reversing in part, this court held that the plaintiff's allegations, if proved, that the defendant deliberately set out to retaliate against her for testifying against it, which retaliation included subjecting her to abuse by her supervisor and causing her severe emotional pain, met the threshold requirement of extreme and outrageous conduct and thus presented a question of fact for the jury. The dissent argued that, even if the defendant had an improper motive, its act of transferring the plaintiff to an equal-paying job in a less hospitable office did not go beyond all possible bounds of decency. Yarbray v. Southern Bell Tel. & Tel. Co., 261 Ga. 703, 409 S.E.2d 835, 837, 838.

Ga.App.

Ga.App.2022. Com. (f) quot. in case quot. in sup. Father of 15-year-old daughter who committed suicide filed claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress and negligence against funeral home and business hired by funeral home to produce daughter's death certificate, alleging that funeral home and business acted in concert to cause him emotional distress by making fun of his sexual orientation and his daughter's suicide in a manner that suggested that his same-sex marriage contributed to her depression and suicide. The trial court granted business's motion to dismiss. This court reversed in part and remanded, holding that father sufficiently alleged outrageous conduct in support of his claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46 by asserting that business knew or should have known that he was especially susceptible to emotional distress following his daughter's suicide. Mayorga v. Benton, 875 S.E.2d 908, 913.

Ga.App.2013. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. Former employee who had used a false identity to acquire her job and receive workers' compensation benefits brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against former employer, after defendant filed an administrative-fraud complaint against her with the state workers' compensation board. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant. Affirming, this court held that plaintiff's claim failed, because defendant's filing of a complaint with the workers' compensation board, which led a government agency to investigate and eventually arrest plaintiff, did not amount to extreme and outrageous conduct for purposes of plaintiff's IIED claim, even if defendant's complaint was motivated by a desire to limit its future workers' compensation exposure. The court noted that it was undisputed that defendant provided fully accurate information in the complaint, and there was no suggestion that probable cause for plaintiff's arrest was lacking. Garcia v. Shaw Industries, Inc., 741 S.E.2d 285, 289.

Ga.App.2008. Cit. in sup. After a court ruled against former husband in connection with a custody and visitation dispute, husband filed an action pro se against ex-wife, her attorney, and a psychologist, asserting various claims arising from alleged misrepresentations made about him by defendants. The trial court granted defendants' motions to dismiss. Reversing in part and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff properly pled the essential elements of a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, namely, that defendants' intentional conduct was extreme and outrageous and that it caused him severe emotional distress. Walker v. Walker, 293 Ga.App. 872, 668 S.E.2d 330, 334.

Ga.App.2005. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Customer sued drugstore for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that she suffered injuries resulting from drugstore's pharmacy having twice misfilled her prescription with the wrong medication. On remand, the trial court denied defendant summary judgment. This court reversed in part, holding, inter alia, that pharmacy's error, while unfortunate, did not constitute the extreme and outrageous conduct required to sustain a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress as a matter of law, since there was no evidence that drugstore's actions or omissions were egregious or made with conscious indifference to the consequences. Mableton Parkway CVS, Inc. v. Salter, 273 Ga.App. 477, 482, 615 S.E.2d 558, 564.

Ga.App.2002. Subsec. (1), com. (f) quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Employee, individually and on son's behalf, sued employer and employer's manager for intentional infliction of emotional distress and false imprisonment for refusing to let employee leave her job or use the phone to care for son who suffered broken arm at school. The trial court granted defendants summary judgment. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that manager's actions, while harsh and insensitive, were not so extreme and outrageous as to sustain claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Miraliakbari v. Pennicooke, 254 Ga.App. 156, 157, 159, 561 S.E.2d 483, 486, 488.

Ga.App.2000.Com. (d) cit. in case cit. in ftn. Man who was arrested for theft by conversion after failing to return a broken-down rental truck to rental company sued company, alleging, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Trial court granted defendant summary judgment. Reversing in part, this court held, inter alia, that fact issues existed as to whether defendant's conduct in reporting the truck stolen, even though it knew that truck had broken down, was sufficiently extreme and outrageous as to support plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Fleming v. U-Haul Co., 246 Ga.App. 681, 686, 541 S.E.2d 75, 80.

Ga.App.2000. Cit. in case quot. in disc. Employee sued his employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, after suffering a mental breakdown caused by a harsh and ill-timed job evaluation. Trial court granted defendant summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding that giving a harsh performance evaluation on the day an employee returned from extended psychiatric care and continuing that interview despite the employee's tearful entreaties for a postponement did not rise to the requisite level of outrageousness and egregiousness to sustain a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court stated that there was nothing inherently outrageous with subjecting an employee to a straightforward if harsh evaluation of his job performance, regardless of its timing. Jarrard v. United Parcel Service, Inc., 242 Ga.App. 58, 529 S.E.2d 144, 148.

Ga.App.1996. Subsec. (1), com. (j) quot. in case quot. in diss. op. Putative wife brought action for intentional infliction of emotional distress against nursing home at which putative husband was a patient after home discharged husband into the custody of his son from an earlier marriage but did not inform plaintiff of the release. The trial court entered summary judgment for defendant. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that defendant's actions lacked the element of outrageousness or egregiousness necessary to give rise to liability under a theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Dissent believed that a jury could conclude that defendant's conduct was sufficiently insulting as to humiliate and embarrass plaintiff, and that such distress, if extreme, would warrant the imposition of liability. Fisher v. Toombs County Nursing Home, 223 Ga.App. 842, 479 S.E.2d 180, 186.

Ga.App.1994. Cit. in sup. Mother sued county medical examiner and county coroner for intentional infliction of emotional distress resulting from the autopsy performed on her stillborn fetus. This court affirmed the trial court's granting of summary judgment for defendants, holding that defendants' actions did not rise to the necessary level of outrageousness and egregiousness as a matter of law. The court noted that defendants were authorized by state law to perform the autopsy, since medical examiner testified in his deposition that he considered the stillbirth to be suspicious and unexplained. Clark v. Arras, 212 Ga.App. 695, 443 S.E.2d 277, 278.

Ga.App.1993. Quot. in part in case cit. in sup. A former employee of a school system sued her supervisor and a co-worker for intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court affirmed judgment for defendants, holding that the co-worker's actions in showing plaintiff a hole in the crotch of his pants and asking her if she would like to staple it closed and making a lewd gesture referring to sexual activity he imagined she engaged in with her husband on a vacation trip were simply isolated incidents of "tasteless and rude social conduct" that did not rise to the level necessary to support a claim for emotional distress damages. Hendrix v. Phillips, 207 Ga.App. 394, 395, 428 S.E.2d 91, 92.

Ga.App.1993. Cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. A railway worker sued his employer under the Federal Employers' Liability Act (FELA) and the Hours of Service Act, alleging negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress claims from stressful work assignments and an extended work schedule, which included lengthy periods with no days off and workdays of 12 hours or longer without adequate breaks for meals and other personal needs. This court reversed a denial of the railroad's motion for summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that, even if the emotional distress claims could have been asserted under FELA, the employer actions complained of did not rise to the level of egregious or outrageous behavior required to support such claims. Norfolk Southern Ry. Co. v. Spence, 210 Ga.App. 284, 285, 435 S.E.2d 680, 681, cert. denied ___ U.S. ___, 114 S.Ct. 2743, 129 L.Ed.2d 862 (1994).

Ga.App.1992. Cit. in sup., subsec. (1) quot. generally in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. Railroad employee sued employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, caused by employer's allegedly humiliating treatment of employee upon discovering that employee was severely claustrophobic and depressed. The trial court granted defendant summary judgment. This court vacated and remanded with directions to enter judgment on the pleadings for defendant, since defendant failed to file any depositions, affidavits, or testimony on the motion for summary judgment. It held that plaintiff did not prove outrageous conduct by defendant and that defendant was acting within his authority when he inquired into plaintiff's medical condition and adjusted his work schedule and duties to accommodate his illness. Bowers v. Estep, 204 Ga.App. 615, 420 S.E.2d 336, 339.

Ga.App.1992. Subsec. (1), com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Terminated employee sued company owner's relative for intentional infliction of emotional distress allegedly caused by relative's use of foul and abusive language directed at plaintiff. The trial court granted defendant summary judgment, and this court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that defendant's name-calling did not rise to the level of outrageousness necessary for an intentional tort and that plaintiff's own testimony revealed that she was not severely offended, since she did not ask defendant to refrain from his offensive conduct. Cooler v. Baker, 204 Ga.App. 787, 420 S.E.2d 649, 650, 651.

Ga.App.1992. Com. (f) quot. in sup. Chronic diabetes patient sued her physician for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted defendant's motion for a directed verdict. Reversing, this court held that plaintiff's allegations that defendant relentlessly vented anger against her while she was in the hospital after having been admitted to the emergency room complaining of chest pain, that he was aware of her potentially fragile physical condition, and that her physical condition deteriorated following defendant's alleged conduct were sufficient to state a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Williams v. Voljavec, 202 Ga.App. 580, 415 S.E.2d 31, 33.

Ga.App.1992. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Employee was indicted by grand jury for forgery of a letter that transferred the employer's license for computer hardware to employee and for theft of computer hardware. After plaintiff pleaded no contest, defendant allowed the transfer of hardware ownership to plaintiff. Employee then sued employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, caused by the humiliation of being booked and jailed, and having to spend large sums of money in attorneys' fees. The trial court granted defendant summary judgment; this court affirmed, holding that plaintiff had not presented sufficient evidence that defendant's conduct went beyond all possible bounds of decency. Yarbrough v. SAS Systems, Inc., 204 Ga.App. 428, 419 S.E.2d 507, 509.

Ga.App.1991. Subsec. (1) cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in sup. An employee sued her supervisor for slander and intentional infliction of emotional distress as a result of the supervisor accusing the employee of cheating on an exam in front of other workers. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding the plaintiff compensatory damages, but granted the defendant a judgment n.o.v. as to the award for punitive damages for slander and the damage award for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming, this court held that a false accusation of dishonesty or lack of integrity in connection with one's employment, although distressful, is a common part of ordinary life and does not constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress for which the law allows a recovery. It stated that the supervisor's accusation did not cause more distress than a reasonable person could be expected to endure. Peoples v. Guthrie, 199 Ga.App. 119, 404 S.E.2d 442, 444.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ga.App.1990. Subsec. (1) cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. and quot. generally in case quot. in conc. op. After the death of her grandson, a grandmother, who had previously been told by an insurance agent that up to $10,000 would be available for funeral expenses, was informed that she was entitled to only a portion of the actual expenditures of $9,469. After an altercation with the insurance adjuster, in which the adjuster allegedly threw funeral bills across his desk towards the grandmother, pounded on the desk, and pointed his finger at her, the grandmother sued the insurer for breach of contract and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted the insurer summary judgment on the breach of contract claim and denied the insurer's motion for judgment notwithstanding the mistrial on the emotional distress claim. Affirming, this court held that the denial of the post-trial motion was consistent with the prior rulings, and that a material issue of fact existed as to whether the conduct of the insurance adjuster was extreme and outrageous. The concurring opinion asserted that a special relationship existed and that the defendant's conduct went far beyond the norms of acceptable business behavior. Georgia Farm Bureau Mut. Ins. v. Mathis, 197 Ga.App. 324, 398 S.E.2d 387, 389, 390.

Ga.App.1989. Com. (f) cit. in case quot. in sup. An employee fired by her employer sued him for her bonus and vacation pay and also for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for the plaintiff on all counts. Affirming the lower court's ruling on the emotional distress count, this court said that the plaintiff's testimony that the defendant had used threatening and abusive language in warning her not to sue him gave sufficient support to the jury's verdict. The court noted that the existence of a long-term employee-employer relationship between the parties added to the defendant's threats a character of outrageousness that they might not have had in another context. Anderson v. Chatham, 190 Ga.App. 559, 379 S.E.2d 793, 800.

Ga.App.1989. Com. (f) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. in case cit. in sup. A woman called her pharmacist, complained of a migraine headache, and asked to refill her prescription for medicine. The pharmacist called the woman's physician, was told that the prescription had not been renewed recently, then called the police and had the woman arrested for an attempt to fraudulently obtain a controlled substance. The woman sued the pharmacist and pharmacy, inter alia, for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Following a jury verdict for the plaintiff, the trial court granted the defendant's motion for judgment n.o.v. Reversing, this court said the question had been properly submitted to the jury because a reasonable person could find the defendant's behavior outrageous. Moreover, since the defendant was in a position of control over the plaintiff's health and welfare and had known the plaintiff for a long time, had perceived that the plaintiff had emotional problems, and had called the police without making a serious attempt to find out whether the plaintiff's physician would renew the prescription, the jury determination that the defendant's actions were wanton and with malicious purpose was not unfounded. Gordon v. Frost, 193 Ga.App. 517, 388 S.E.2d 362, 366.

Ga.App.1989. Com. (b) quot. in part in sup. A restaurant owner sued a broadcasting company and a radio talk-show host for defamation, intentional infliction of emotional distress, negligence, invasion of privacy, and tortious interference with business relations after the host made disparaging remarks about plaintiff and his restaurant. The trial court granted summary judgment for the defendants, holding that each comment was a constitutionally protected expression of opinion, hyperbole, or a statement of fact. Reversing, the court of appeals held that the trial court erred in granting summary judgment on plaintiff's claim for emotional distress, since a factfinder could consider the host's exhortations to his listeners to go to plaintiff's place of business and confront him in a hostile and assaultive manner sufficiently extreme and outrageous conduct as to result in liability. S & W Seafoods v. Jacor Broadcasting, 194 Ga.App. 233, 390 S.E.2d 228, 231.

Ga.App.1988. Com. (c) quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in sup., com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. An insurance agent who was verbally threatened over the telephone by his former employer for contacting the employer's clients sued the employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that the threat did not constitute an actionable wrong; it was not enough that the threat was intentional because it would not have produced such severe distress in a reasonable person as to rise to the level of outrageous conduct needed for the tort. Moses v. Prudential Ins. Co. of America, 187 Ga.App. 222, 369 S.E.2d 541, 543, 544.

Ga.App.1985. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup., coms. (f) and (j) quot. in sup., com. (e) cit. in sup. A part-time grocery store cashier with multiple sclerosis sued her employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress after she was discharged for not cooperating with a polygraph examination regarding inventory shortages. The plaintiff contended that she suffered trembling and partial paralysis after becoming upset during her polygraph examination. The trial court rendered summary judgment in favor of the defendant, finding that the defendant's conduct was not sufficiently outrageous to sustain an allegation of intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court affirmed, holding that although a polygraph examination in connection with a theft investigation would be upsetting to a normal person, and perhaps more so to a person whose emotional threshold was lowered by multiple sclerosis, the elements of the tort were not present. Bridges v. Winn-Dixie Atlanta, Inc., 176 Ga.App. 227, 335 S.E.2d 445, 447, 448.

Ga.App.1980. Cit. in sup. The plaintiffs were awarded damages, based on a jury verdict, in an action for trespass, assault, invasion of privacy and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court held that the trial court had erred by failing to charge the jury on proximate causation because the element of proximate cause is essential to an action for the intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court therefore reversed the trial court's judgment. Whitmire v. Woodbury, 154 Ga.App. 159, 267 S.E.2d 783, 785, judgment reversed 246 Ga. 349, 271 S.E.2d 491 (1980).

Hawaii

Hawaii, 2008. Cit. in sup., coms. (d), (e), and (g) quot. in sup. Automobile-accident victim brought a claim for the tort of malicious defense, inter alia, against tortfeasor's liability insurer and insurer's attorney, alleging that defendants used the courts imprudently, and acted primarily for a purpose other than that of adjudicating the claims and defenses, such harassment, annoyance, or infliction of injury. Affirming the trial court's dismissal of this claim, this court declined to recognize the tort of malicious defense. The court expressed the view that Hawaii's existing rules, statutes, and tort law offered appropriate remedies for plaintiff's injuries, noting that, in certain cases, a plaintiff aggrieved by a defendant's assertion of malicious defenses was entitled to recover compensatory and punitive damages through an intentional-infliction-of-emotional-distress (IIED) claim; in this case, plaintiff stated a claim for IIED based upon, among other things, defendants' alleged conduct during the underlying litigation. Young v. Allstate Ins. Co., 119 Hawai'i 403, 198 P.3d 666, 688, 689.

Hawaii, 2007. Adopted in case quot. in sup. (general cite). Mortgagors brought various claims against mortgage-payment servicer and its maintenance contractor after contractor entered and secured mortgagors' property before foreclosure of the property was complete. The trial court granted servicer's petition for a determination that its proposed settlement with plaintiff was in good faith. This court vacated and remanded, but held, inter alia, that the amount of the proposed settlement was reasonable. The court noted that while plaintiff's case against servicer for both conversion and intentional infliction of emotional distress was reasonably strong, particularly as to intent to injure, because there was evidence that servicer was aware of mortgagee's instructions not to enter and secure the property until foreclosure was complete, damages were nonetheless subject to considerable uncertainty. Brooks v. Dana Nance & Co., 113 Hawai'i 406, 153 P.3d 1091, 1100.

Hawaii, 2004. Cit. in ftn. Patient sued cardiologist for malpractice. Federal district court entered judgment on jury verdict for plaintiffs, but court of appeals reversed and remanded. Answering certified questions from district court, this court held that amount of medical special damages awardable to plaintiff in negligence suit was not limited to discounted amount paid to healthcare provider by Medicare, and that plaintiff could recover reasonable value of medical services. In applying Restatement Second of Torts § 920A and the collateral-source rule, the court noted that the Hawaii Supreme Court had many times relied on the Restatement as persuasive authority, citing, for instance, a case involving intentional infliction of emotional distress. Bynum v. Magno, 106 Hawai'i 81, 101 P.3d 1149, 1154.

Hawaii, 2003. Cit. and quot. in sup. and adopted, cit. generally in ftn., cit. generally in conc. op., coms. (b), (j), and (k) quot. in sup. State-university professor whose application for a promotion had been denied three times before she was promoted brought suit for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress against university and personnel-committee members. The trial court directed a verdict against plaintiff on the claim. Affirming, this court held that the trial court's grant of a directed verdict was harmless error; since the jury did not find that plaintiff was subjected to a hostile work environment, it could not have found in her favor on her intentional-infliction-of-emotional-distress claim had it been submitted. The court adopted Restatement Second of Torts § 46, according to which proof of bodily injury was not necessary to establish severe emotional distress. A concurring opinion argued that the conduct complained of was not outrageous. Hac v. University of Hawaii, 102 Hawai'i 92, 73 P.3d 46, 58, 60, 61.

Hawaii, 2000. Cit. in disc., com. (h) quot. in case cit. in disc. Store's former manager brought claims for age discrimination and intentional or negligent infliction of emotional distress, among other things, against store and district manager. Plaintiff appealed summary judgment in favor of defendants. Affirming, this court held that the district manager's verbal criticism of plaintiff was not "outrageous" and did not amount to intentional infliction of emotional distress. Shoppe v. Gucci America, Inc., 94 Hawai'i 368, 387, 14 P.3d 1049, 1068.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Hawaii, 1998. Cit. in headnote, cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. State human rights commission filed complaint charging landlords with discriminatory conduct in failing to rent a small cottage to a family of four. Defendants counterclaimed for negligence and negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted plaintiff's motion to dismiss the counterclaim. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff negligently investigated prospective tenants' claim of discrimination by failing to consult administrative rules setting forth the occupancy limits for a dwelling the size of the cottage in question; however, plaintiff's demand that defendants publish the results of plaintiff's investigation in at least one state newspaper did not constitute conduct giving rise to a claim for negligent or intentional infliction of emotional distress. Tseu ex rel. Hobbs v. Jeyte, 88 Hawai'i 85, 962 P.2d 344, 345, 352.

Hawaii, 1996. Cit. in headnotes, cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. in case quot. in sup. A woman brought an action against her father for childhood sexual abuse and also asserted claims for defamation and intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, based on defendant's statement that he was still angry at plaintiff for reporting the assaults to police in 1964 and would never forgive her. Affirming the trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendant with respect to the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held, in part, that defendant's statement, made to his other daughter in the privacy of his home, was not so unreasonable or outrageous as to give rise to a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress; moreover, the statement was not made actionable by the fact that defendant repeated it to plaintiff, in direct response to plaintiff's inquiry. Dunlea v. Dappen, 83 Hawai'i 28, 924 P.2d 196, 197, 198, 206.

Hawaii, 1994. Cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in ftn., com. (h) cit. in case quot. in sup. Hotel employee sued the hotel and others after he was discharged from his position pursuant to the hotel's policy of prohibiting married persons from working in the same department, seeking damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress and asserting other claims. On remand, the trial court entered final judgment for hotel. Affirming in part, this court held, inter alia, that, since there was no evidence that hotel had acted unreasonably in the course of discharging plaintiff, it could not be held liable for emotional distress damages. Ross v. Stouffer Hotel Co., 76 Hawai'i 454, 465, 879 P.2d 1037, 1048.

Hawaii, 1982. Cit. in disc. The plaintiffs brought suit against the defendant homeowner's association, claiming negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress and libel in connection with a neighborhood dispute over an assessment charged to the plaintiffs. The lower court permitted only the negligent infliction of emotional distress count to go to the jury; it then entered judgment on the jury verdict for the plaintiff. Both parties appealed. This court reversed and remanded for a new trial. The court held that the plaintiffs could recover only for intentional, not negligent, infliction of emotional distress when the dispute involved debt collection. The court also held that there was sufficient evidence to permit the jury to decide whether the defendants libeled the plaintiffs and also intentionally inflicted emotional distress. Chedester v. Stecker, 64 Hawaii 464, 643 P.2d 532, 535.

Hawaii, 1970. Com. (j) cit. in sup. This was an action against the stateby homeowners seeking damages for the flooding of their house, resulting from failure of a culvert to drain water from a state highway, the culvert having been blocked by beach sand. Plaintiffs alleged that the state had failed to keep the culvert free of such sand. Plaintiffs testified that the flooding of their husehad left them “heartbroken” and “shocked”. Judgment was for plaintiffs and included an amount for “mental anguish and suffering, inconvenience, disruption of home and family life, past and future, etc.” Upon appeal, the court affirmed the judgment, except … as to the award for “mental anguish and suffering.” In its opinion the court discussed in detail the authorities and cases involving such damages and held that the interest in freedom from negligent infliction of serious mental distress is entitled to independent legal protection; that there is a duty to refrain from the negligent infliction of serious mental distress; that whether or not the defendant is liable to the plaintiff in any particular case will be solved most justly by the application of general tort principles. The court remanded the case to the trial court to decide whether under the facts of the case, serious mental distress to plaintiffs was a reasonably foreseeable consequence of defendant's acts. The concurring and dissenting opinions rejected the position of the majority in this respect. Rodrigues v. State, 472 P.2d 509, 519, 520.

Hawaii App.

Hawaii App.2013. Adopted and quot. in case cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. Former employee of beach resort sued manager of the resort, alleging claims of age discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) in connection with defendants' decision to terminate her employment. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant. Affirming as to plaintiff's claim for IIED, this court held that defendant's alleged conduct failed to rise to the required level of "outrageous" or "extreme" conduct. The court pointed out that plaintiff failed to allege any facts in support of her IIED claim beyond those supporting her discrimination claim, and that Hawaii case law was clear that termination alone, even if based on discrimination, was not sufficient to support an IIED claim without a showing of something outrageous about the manner or process of termination. Simmons v. Aqua Hotels and Resorts, Inc., 310 P.3d 1026, 1033.

Hawaii App.2011. Com. (j) quot. in law dictionary quot. in sup. and cit. in case quot. in sup. State charged father with abuse of family or household member in connection with an incident in which he punched his 10-year-old son twice on the left leg, with enough force to cause bruising, as punishment for lying. After a bench trial, the trial court found father guilty. Reversing, this court held, among other things, that the trial court's finding that father's actions caused son mental distress (rather than extreme mental distress) was not sufficient to negate father's assertion of a statutory parental discipline defense. The court reasoned that, by requiring the mental distress to be extreme, the plain language of the statute clearly prohibited force that was designed to cause or known to create the risk of causing something more than the ordinary definition of emotional or mental distress. State v. Dowling, 125 Hawai'i 406, 263 P.3d 116, 122.

Hawaii App.1998. Cit. in case quot. in ftn. Former employee sued former employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that his termination constituted extreme and outrageous behavior exceeding all bounds usually tolerated by decent society. The trial court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment. Affirming in part, vacating in part, and remanding, this court held, among other things, that, to the extent plaintiff's termination was the result of racial discrimination, material factual issues existed as to whether defendant had engaged in outrageous conduct. Takaki v. Allied Machinery Corp., 87 Hawai'i 57, 951 P.2d 507, 516.

Hawaii App.1989. Com. (d) quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. in sup. A man sued his neighbors for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and the neighbors counterclaimed for libel, defamation, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. All claims were dismissed without prejudice. Subsequently, the original plaintiff sued his neighbors and their attorney for malicious prosecution, abuse of process, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, claiming that the counterclaims in the previous suit had been filed with the sole purpose of harassing him. The trial court granted the defendants summary judgment on all counts. Affirming the lower court holding on the count of emotional distress, this court said that, in the context of the parties' prior litigation, the defendants' sending of interrogatories with questions considered abusive by the plaintiff was not unreasonable, and thus, as a matter of law, could not be characterized as outrageous behavior beyond the bounds of decency. Wong v. Panis, 7 Hawaii App. 414, 772 P.2d 695, 700.

Idaho,

Idaho, 2013. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former assistant principal of high school brought claims for, among other things, negligent infliction of emotional distress against school district, principal, and district's superintendent in connection with allegations that he was sexually harassed by principal and others. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. Reversing as to plaintiff's emotional-distress claim, this court held that there was a sufficient question of fact as to whether defendants' conduct exceeded that degree of inconsiderate verbal remarks to which an ordinary person was expected to be hardened. The court pointed to plaintiff's evidence that he complained to principal of the alleged harassment and asked that it stop, that the various sexual remarks continued even after defendants were made aware that plaintiff found them offensive, and that defendants retaliated against plaintiff for his complaints. Frogley v. Meridian Joint School Dist. No. 2, 314 P.3d 613, 624.

Idaho

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Idaho, 2010. Com. (g) quot. in sup. Landowner brought action for breach of contract and intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against title insurer, seeking relief for insurer's failure to defend the appeal in his suit to secure an easement running over an access road to his property. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant. Affirming, this court held, as to the IIED claim, that, because defendant had the legal right to pay plaintiff the limit of his insurance policy instead of pursuing further litigation, which it did, defendant's conduct was not extreme and outrageous as a matter of law; merely exercising a legal right, without more, was not a tort. Mortensen v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 149 Idaho 437, 235 P.3d 387, 397.

Idaho, 2010. Com. (j) cit. and quot. in disc. and sup. and quot. in case quot. in sup. Insureds sued automobile insurer, alleging, among other things, breach of contract and bad faith in connection with its handling of their claims arising from an accident caused by an uninsured motorist. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding plaintiffs damages for, among other things, emotional distress suffered by plaintiff mother. Affirming that portion of the judgment, this court held that there was sufficient evidence of severe emotional distress caused by defendant's misconduct in denying and delaying payment, for example, evidence that plaintiffs suffered from embarrassment, harassment by medical-bill collectors, and internal family strife, and that mother experienced depression and crying; proof that emotional distress was severe did not require evidence of a psychological disorder, and, in many cases, the extreme and outrageous character of the defendant's conduct was in itself important evidence of such distress. Weinstein v. Prudential Property and Cas. Ins. Co., 149 Idaho 299, 233 P.3d 1221, 1234, 1246, 1247.

Idaho, 2007. Com. (h) quot. in case quot. in sup. Insured who was involved in a multi-vehicle accident sued insurer for bad faith, breach of contract, and intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with its handling of a personal-injury claim filed against him by another party who was severely injured in the accident. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant. Affirming in part, this court held that summary judgment on plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress was appropriate because defendant's conduct in failing to settle the claim within the policy limits was not beyond the bounds of decency. The court concluded that, while defendant could have acted more expeditiously under the particular facts of this case, the record did not show that it acted intentionally or recklessly in carrying out its investigation. McKinley v. Guaranty Nat. Ins. Co., 144 Idaho 247, 159 P.3d 884, 891.

Idaho, 2003. Coms. (e) and (f) cit. in ftn., com. (g) cit. in sup., com. (h) quot. in sup. Former employee, who had an excellent work record for 22 years, sued employer for wrongful termination, breach of implied contract, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, after he was fired and escorted off the premises. Trial court dismissed plaintiff's claims. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that defendant was not liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because the manner of discharge and attendant circumstances were not outrageous. Defendant merely insisted upon its rights in a permissible way, even if it knew of plaintiff's susceptibility to emotional distress from being fired. Edmondson v. Shearer Lumber Products, 139 Idaho 172, 75 P.3d 733, 741, cert. denied 540 U.S. 1184, 124 S.Ct. 1426, 158 L.Ed.2d 88 (2004).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Idaho, 1985. Cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc., com. (j) cit. in disc. A purchaser of land sued the previous landowner for misrepresentations of title and of the condition of the property and for negligent infliction of emotional distress. The trial court quieted title in the purchaser and awarded her damages for the misrepresentation of the condition of the property before the sale and for negligent infliction of emotional distress. This court reversed the award of damages for negligent infliction of emotional distress. The court held that, although the purchaser had suffered severe emotional distress that had manifested itself in physical symptoms, she could not recover for negligent infliction of emotional distress merely because there was a breach of contract. The court reasoned that the law was unable to redress every emotional wrong that a plaintiff suffered. Brown v. Fritz, 108 Idaho 357, 699 P.2d 1371, 1375, 1376.

Idaho, 1983. Cit. in ftn. An employee who, upon informing her supervisor that she was injured in a fall, was directed to continue working, brought an action against her employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted summary judgment in favor of the employer. On appeal, this court affirmed, holding that the plaintiff's claim for emotional distress did not constitute the separate tort of outrage, and was, moreover, barred by the exclusive remedy provisions of the workers' compensation act. Yeend v. United Parcel Service, Inc., 104 Idaho 333, 659 P.2d 87, 88.

Idaho, 1980. Cit. in sup. and quot. in sup. and com. (d) cit. in sup. Defendant auctioneer breached his contract with plaintiff seller by selling logging equipment at less than the minimum specified price. The auctioneer's attorney issued the proceeds of the sale in multiple payee checks with release endorsements, which forced the seller to choose between compromising his own claim and delaying his father's receipt of funds due him. The trial court, in addition to awarding money damages for breach of contract and emotional distress caused by the breach, awarded punitive damages based on the attorney's alleged intentional infliction of severe emotional harm. The court reversed on this issue, holding that plaintiff was not entitled to recover punitive damages, because he had failed to demonstrate the required impact resulting from extreme and outrageous conduct, his hurt feelings being insufficient. Hartfield v. Max Rouse & Sons Northwest, 100 Idaho 840, 606 P.2d 944, 953, 954.

Idaho App.

Idaho App.2009. Quot. in case quot. in disc. Real estate agent brought pro se suit against real estate developer, alleging nonpayment of a commission and negligent infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant. This court reversed and remanded as to the emotional-distress claim, holding that, while in ordinary circumstances of social interaction it would not be foreseeable that insulting and demeaning remarks like those attributed to defendant could inflict serious emotional harm, here there was evidence of plaintiff's unusual emotional fragility and susceptibility to harm from the insults due to his emotional instability or mental illness, and that plaintiff's odd behavior and reactions had been observed by defendant; thus, fact questions remained as to whether defendant was aware of plaintiff's unique emotional delicacy such that he should have foreseen that his alleged crude sexual insults and advances would inflict serious emotional harm. Johnson v. McPhee, 147 Idaho 455, 210 P.3d 563, 576.

Idaho App.2006. Com. (j) quot. in sup. Sisters brought various claims against individual who was caught prowling outside older sister's home with a video camera containing surreptitiously taped images of younger sister and sisters' mother in various stages of undress. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiffs. This court affirmed in part but reversed the trial court's order denying defendant's motion for judgment n.o.v. on plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that plaintiffs' evidence, including younger sister's testimony that she would only change in a windowless room, experienced difficulty trusting males, and was fearful of walking at night, failed to demonstrate the type of severe or disabling emotional reaction essential to such a claim. Alderson v. Bonner, 142 Idaho 733, 132 P.3d 1261, 1269.

Idaho App.1991. Com. (j) cit. in disc. The owners of a dominant tract of land sued the owners of a servient tract to enjoin the defendants from interfering with the plaintiffs' use of an easement that the plaintiffs alleged was conveyed to them by a warranty deed, as well as to recover damages for the emotional distress they allegedly suffered when the defendants blocked off the easement. The trial court ruled for the plaintiffs, awarding them damages for emotional distress. Reversing in part, this court held, inter alia, that the defendants' conduct in locking the gates and barring the plaintiffs from using the right-of-way was not extreme and outrageous and there was no proof that the plaintiffs suffered any severe emotional distress as a result of that conduct. Bethel v. Van Stone, 120 Idaho 522, 817 P.2d 188, 195.

Idaho App.1986. Com. (j) quot. in sup. The plaintiff was arrested for allegedly interfering with the investigation of his brother who was being questioned for drunken driving. The plaintiff alleged that he was beaten while he was in jail and that he was falsely arrested and abused, and he sued police officers, the city, county, and state for violations of his civil rights. His wife also sued the defendants for intentional infliction of emotional distress arising out of her husband's arrest, but the trial court dismissed her claim. This court reversed on the dismissal of the wife's claim, holding that the question of whether the wife's distress was severe enough for her to recover was a question of fact for a jury. The court noted that liability for this tort is incurred only when the distress was so severe that no reasonable person could be expected to endure it. Herrera v. Conner, 111 Idaho 1012, 729 P.2d 1075, 1086.

Idaho App.1985. Quot. in sup. The plaintiffs sued to recover for property loss and mental anguish sustained when the defendant shot and killed their donkey. Concluding that damages for mental anguish were not recoverable, the trial court struck that claim from the complaint. Reversing, this court concluded that a claim for mental anguish may be asserted in connection with the independent torts of negligent or intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court concluded that the plaintiffs, by alleging that the defendant had been reckless and that they had suffered extreme mental anguish and trauma, alleged facts that, if proven, would permit recovery under a theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Gill v. Brown, 107 Idaho 1137, 695 P.2d 1276, 1277.

Idaho App.1984. Com. (j) cit. and quot. in sup. Purchasers of a tavern sued the vendors, alleging breach of a covenant not to compete and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court awarded plaintiffs damages on both counts. This court affirmed the award of nominal and punitive damages for the breach of contract, but remanded for reconsideration of the amount of punitive damages. It reversed the award of damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that plaintiffs' upset, embarrassment, anger and depression were not so severe that no reasonable person could be expected to endure them, as required to warrant recovery. Davis v. Gage, 106 Idaho 735, 682 P.2d 1282, 1288, appeal after remand 109 Idaho 1029, 712 P.2d 730 (1985).

Ill.

Ill.2016. Cit. in case cit. in disc.; coms. (d) and (j) quot. in disc. Mortgagor sued bank, preservation company, and its subcontractors who, following the entry of a judgment of foreclosure, had entered mortgagor's home believing it was vacant and had found her at home, alleging, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants on the IIED claim and the court of appeals affirmed. Affirming, this court held that defendants' entry onto the property to check on its condition after attempting to determine the occupancy of the house and their immediate removal upon determining plaintiff was at home could not be deemed extreme and outrageous. The court relied on the standard articulated in Restatement Second of Torts § 46 in outlining the requirements for an IIED claim. Schweihs v. Chase Home Finance, LLC, 77 N.E.3d 50, 63.

Ill.2003. Cit. in sup., com. (d) cit. and quot. in cases quot. in sup., com. (j) cit. in sup. and cit. and quot. in cases quot. in sup. Former wife sued former husband for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court denied defendant's motion to dismiss, and the appellate court affirmed. Affirming, this court held that plaintiff stated a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, since her allegations of dozens of episodes of abusive behavior, including specific details and time frames for physical and emotional attacks by defendant, sufficiently set forth the element of extreme and outrageous conduct, and her assertion that she suffered from loss of self-esteem, difficulty in forming relationships, and post-traumatic stress disorder for which she incurred medical and psychological expenses stated the element of severe emotional distress. Feltmeier v. Feltmeier, 207 Ill.2d 263, 268, 274, 276, 278 Ill.Dec. 228, 798 N.E.2d 75, 80, 83, 84.

Ill.1999. Cit. in disc. A trainman sued his employer railroad under the Federal Employers' Liability Act (FELA) for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that he suffered injury to his nervous system due to the demeaning comments of a trainmaster, one of defendant's managerial agents. Answering a certified question from the trial court, the appellate court held that a plaintiff need not prove physical contact to recover for intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court reversed and remanded, concluding that a plaintiff must plead and offer proof of physical contact or the threat of physical contact before a plaintiff can recover for the intentional infliction of emotional distress under FELA. Wilson v. Norfolk & Western Ry. Co., 187 Ill.2d 369, 240 Ill.Dec. 691, 693, 718 N.E.2d 172, 174.

Ill.1994. Com. (d) quot. in sup., coms. (e) and (f) cit. in sup., com. (j) quot. in sup. A woman and her two children sued a city, a village, and several police officers for, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiffs alleged that the woman was assaulted by a male intruder in her apartment, that police were summoned, and that while the officers questioned the woman in a rude and accusatory manner and refused to break down the apartment door, the intruder raped her daughter. The trial court granted defendants' motion to dismiss and the intermediate appellate court affirmed. This court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded, holding, inter alia, that plaintiffs stated an emotional-distress cause of action against the city and its police officer, since an average member of the community would resent a police officer who treated a sexual-assault victim in a rude and demeaning manner, and would consider it outrageous for an officer to refuse to break down a door in such a situation because of the fear of liability for property damage. Doe v. Calumet City, 161 Ill.2d 374, 204 Ill.Dec. 274, 280, 641 N.E.2d 498, 507, 508.

Ill.1992. Com. (d) cit. in sup. and quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (e) cit. in spec. conc. op. Promoter of a classic cartoon festival organized as a benefit to increase public awareness of neurofibromatosis brought an action, with his wife and son, against a radio station and two radio personalities for reckless infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that defendants' statements on the air that the promoter's wife and son, who were afflicted with the disease, had abnormally large heads and that the promoter and his wife were married at a shotgun wedding caused them to suffer emotional distress. The trial court dismissed the complaint, and the intermediate appellate court affirmed in part. Reversing in part and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiffs adequately alleged that defendants' conduct was extreme and outrageous, on the bases of the context in which the statements were made, their publication to the community at large, and defendants' improper use of the media. The specially concurring opinion argued that the public nature of the objectionable remarks should not overshadow a critical analysis of their content. Kolegas v. Heftel Broadcasting Corp., 154 Ill.2d 1, 180 Ill.Dec. 307, 315, 320, 607 N.E.2d 201, 210, 214.

Ill.1988. Cit. in disc., coms. (d) and (j) quot. in disc., coms. (e) and (g) cit. in disc. An investor who entered into a real estate sale and financing agreement involving a bank was told by the bank that he could not transfer his certificates of deposit until he assigned the bank second mortgages in connection with the real estate deal. The investor sued the bank for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court dismissed the complaint for failure to state a claim, and the intermediate appellate court reversed. This court affirmed, holding that the bank's refusal to release funds that were unrelated to the real estate sale was outrageous conduct, which could give rise to tort liability. McGrath v. Fahey, 126 Ill.2d 78, 126 Ill.Dec. 724, 727, 728, 533 N.E.2d 806, 809, 810.

Ill.1983. Com. (d) cit. in sup. Having witnessed injuries to his brother caused by an allegedly defective escalator, a minor brought an action for emotional distress against the manufacturer in strict liability, and against the owner and service contractor in negligence. The trial court dismissed the action. The appellate court affirmed the dismissal as to the manufacturer, but reversed as to the owner and the service contractor. This court affirmed the appellate court's decision and noted that, in the absence of physical injury or impact, recovery had been permitted for intentionally inflicted emotional distress but had not been afforded for mental distress caused by another's negligence. Rickey v. Chicago Transit Authority, 98 Ill.2d 546, 75 Ill.Dec. 211, 457 N.E.2d 1, 2.

Ill.1976. Cit. in disc.; coms. (d), (j), and (f) cit. and quot. in part in sup.; coms. (i) and (e) cit. in sup.; com. (g) quot. in part in sup. Defendant, in her amended counterclaim, sought to recover from plaintiff and counterdefendant finance company for alleged intentional infliction of severe mental distress. Defendant alleged that the finance company caused such anguish by virtue of techniques it used in attempting to collect the amount due from defendant under a promissory note secured by a security interest in her household goods. The Supreme Court, in affirming the lower courts, held that defendant's counterclaim failed to state a cause of action. The court noted that conduct which gives rise to a mental distress action must be extreme and outrageous, that the emotional stress must be severe, that the actor must be aware of a high degree of probability of emotional distress resulting. The court determined that the finance company had a right to insist on its legal rights, and that its conduct was not sufficiently outrageous so as to sustain a cause of action. The dissent upon denial of rehearing felt that the dismissal of the counterclaim should be reversed. The dissent noted that on a motion to dismiss, the charges must be assumed to be true. The dissent further noted that the conduct must be considered in the context of the time, place, the person making the appraisal, and the knowledge of the actor that the conduct will cause emotional distress. Public Finance Corp. v. Davis, 66 Ill. 85, 4 Ill.Dec. 652, 360 N.E.2d 765, 767, 768, 769.

Ill.App.

Ill.App.2020. Coms. (d) and (j) cit. in sup. Parents and guardians of minor children who played baseball on a team that won a youth league championship sued, among others, operator of the league, alleging that defendants actively concealed that some of the children did not reside within the team's identified boundaries in order to benefit from the team's notoriety and success, and later unceremoniously stripped the children of their championship title after the residency-rule violations came to light. The trial court granted defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming, this court held that defendants' alleged behavior was not so extreme and outrageous that it surpassed all bounds of decency, as required to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Benton v. Little League Baseball, Incorporated, 181 N.E.3d 902, 927.

Ill.App.2020. Com. (d) quot. in cases quot. in sup. Former employee brought, among other things, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against former employer and supervisor, alleging that supervisor's retaliatory conduct culminating in plaintiff's termination was extreme and outrageous, because she made false statements that plaintiff's work performance was subpar and that she and plaintiff had multiple counseling sessions regarding the quality of her work. The trial court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding that supervisor's conduct did not rise to the level of outrageous and extreme behavior necessary for an IIED claim. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, the court explained that supervisor's conduct amounted to no more than common ill will between employers and employees, and the fact that supervisor held power over plaintiff did not make her conduct extreme and outrageous. DiPietro v. GATX Corporation, 167 N.E.3d 247, 259, 260.

Ill.App.2020. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. University professor brought, among other things, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against colleague, alleging that, for seven years, defendant made false statements to co-workers and federal agencies that plaintiff was performing illegal and violent acts, resulting in damage to plaintiff's mental health, career, and research projects. The trial court granted defendant's motion to dismiss. This court reversed and remanded, holding that plaintiff alleged sufficient facts stating a claim for IIED. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, the court explained that plaintiff's allegations of defendant's continued harassment campaign over the course of seven years created a genuine issue of material fact as to whether defendant's conduct was sufficiently outrageous to sustain an IIED claim. Prakash v. Parulekar, 177 N.E.3d 1, 15.

Ill.App.2017. Com. (j) cit. in case cit. in sup. Parents of two-year-old patient who died during recovery from surgery to replace her pacemaker sued medical center that performed the surgery, seeking, among other things, damages for reckless infliction of emotional distress based on allegations that defendant's nurses left medical tubing in place in patient's body when it was released for burial despite plaintiffs' request that the tubes be removed. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict in favor of defendant. Affirming, this court held that the trial court did not err by giving the jury an instruction defining the tort of reckless infliction of emotional distress based on language from a state supreme court opinion that relied on Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court reasoned that the instruction was an accurate statement of Illinois law, had no improper effect on the jury, and was neither misleading nor confusing. Eid v. Loyola University Medical Center, 72 N.E.3d 851, 867.

Ill.App.2017. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Patient who received treatment for injuries sustained in a motor-vehicle accident filed a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against health-care provider in connection with allegations that it asserted a fraudulent health-care services lien against the settlement proceeds in her personal-injury case, that it refused to provide her attorney with a copy of its participating-provider agreement, and that it sent a threatening letter to her attorney. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant. This court affirmed in part, holding that plaintiff could not recover on her IIED claim, because the record lacked evidence that defendant engaged in extreme and outrageous conduct or that plaintiff experienced distress so severe that no reasonable person could have been expected to endure it, as required to state such a claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment j. Turner v. Orthopedic and Shoulder Center, S.C., 82 N.E.3d 801, 803, 806.

Ill.App.2016. Com. (j) cit. in sup. and quot. in case quot. in sup. State's attorney and his employees brought claims for malicious prosecution, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), and defamation against assistant special prosecutor and his investigators, after plaintiffs were acquitted of various charges brought by defendants. The trial court granted defendant's motion to dismiss with prejudice for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction. Reversing in part and remanding, this court held that plaintiffs pleaded sufficient facts to establish a cause of action for IIED under Restatement Second of Torts § 46 by alleging that defendants fabricated and manufactured evidence and concealed exculpatory evidence for the purpose of falsely and maliciously detaining, arresting, and charging plaintiffs, with the knowledge that such charges lacked probable cause. Bianchi v. McQueen, 58 N.E.3d 680, 701.

Ill.App.2015. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Church deacon brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, against church members stemming from church members signing and publishing a petition alleging that plaintiff verbally threatened to report the details of church members' offerings to the IRS. The trial court granted defendants' motion to dismiss. Affirming, this court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, in holding that plaintiff failed to provide any factual allegations that defendants' conduct was so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency. Chang Hyun Moon v. Kang Jun Liu, 44 N.E.3d 1134, 1143.

Ill.App.2015. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Mortgage borrower who had been permitted to live in her home during the foreclosure-redemption period filed claims for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against mortgage lender, property-preservation service, its contractor, and contractor's employees, after employees removed the door lock and entered her home while she was inside. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants on plaintiff's IIED claim. Affirming, this court held that a reasonable juror could not find that defendants' conduct was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to state a claim for IIED under Restatement Second of Torts § 46; contractor's employees conducted an investigation to determine whether the home was occupied before entering, plaintiff saw the employees in her driveway but refused to answer their repeated knocking, and the only other evidence plaintiff relied on to show that defendants' conduct was extreme and outrageous was that one of the employees was "forceful" when he asked that she come to the front door to speak with him. Schweihs v. Chase Home Finance, LLC, 41 N.E.3d 1011, 1021.

Ill.App.2014. Cit. and quot. in sup. Family and estate of tenant of an apartment complex brought wrongful-death and survival claims against owner of the complex in connection with tenant's suicide, which was allegedly the result of defendant's intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) in attempting to wrongfully evict tenant. The trial court dismissed those claims with prejudice, finding that, under Illinois law, such claims could not be brought in connection with a suicide. Vacating that portion of the decision and remanding, this court held that, in the case of IIED, the fact that a victim committed suicide in no way limited a defendant's liability for its actions where the emotional distress was a substantial factor in causing the suicide. The court relied on Restatement Second of Torts § 46 in concluding that there was no special substantial-factor test pertaining to suicide cases; rather, regarding intentional torts, liability followed under ordinary principles of tort law, unless it was limited by some other rule, such as the intervening-cause rule. Turcios v. DeBruler Co., 2014 IL App (2d) 130331, 12 N.E.3d 167, 173, 174.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ill.App.2012. Com. (d) cit. in case cit. in sup., com. (j) cit. and quot. in cases quot. in sup. Owner of a condominium unit damaged by subsidence brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against condominium association, alleging that defendant failed to make timely repairs and subsequently refused to repair the actual problem causing the damage, thereby causing her continued displacement from her home. The trial court dismissed plaintiff's complaint. Affirming in part, this court held that plaintiff failed to state a claim for IIED; although defendants' actions were inconvenient, aggravating, and annoying, they did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to state an IIED claim, and plaintiff's conclusory assertions that she suffered from emotional distress in the form of aggravation of her dementia and that she suffered monetary losses, medical expenses, emotional distress, and pain and suffering were insufficient to allege that she endured the requisite severe and extreme emotional distress. Duffy v. Orlan Brook Condominium Owners' Ass'n, 2012 IL App (1st) 113577, 981 N.E.2d 1069, 1079, 1081, 1082.

Ill.App.2007. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Mother, on behalf of son, sued vaccine manufacturers and thimerosal manufacturers, alleging that her son's exposure to the mercury-based preservative, thimerosal, in routine vaccines given to him in a two-year period following his birth in 1995 caused his autism; mother and husband also sued individually for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) due to their son's injuries. The trial court, inter alia, dismissed the IIED claim. This court affirmed that portion of the decision, holding that plaintiffs' allegation that defendants knew by 1982 that thimerosal was a toxic substance could not alone support the tort's requirement of extreme and outrageous conduct where defendants' affirmative matter established that the FDA's determination at the time son received the vaccines was that the amount of thimerosal used was sufficiently nontoxic. Reilly ex rel. Reilly v. Wyeth, 377 Ill.App.3d 20, 315 Ill.Dec. 428, 876 N.E.2d 740, 755.

Ill.App.2005. Com. (d) cit. and quot. in case quot. in disc. Homeowners whose neighbors aimed a video surveillance camera at their garage, driveway, and yard brought an action against neighbors for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted neighbors' motion to dismiss. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that homeowners failed to state a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, as neighbors' actions, which also included continually harassing homeowners by calling the police, were not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to cause a reasonable person severe emotional distress. Schiller v. Mitchell, 357 Ill.App.3d 435, 293 Ill.Dec. 353, 828 N.E.2d 323, 333, 338.

Ill.App.2004. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. After member of orthodox Jewish community was excommunicated by rabbinic court, he sued members of the rabbinic court and others for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming the trial court's dismissal of the complaint, this court held, inter alia, that, because of plaintiff's actions and knowledge of the community's rules and practices, the rabbinic court's act of excommunicating plaintiff after determining that he had refused three consecutive summonses to appear before it was not so outrageous as to support a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Thomas v. Fuerst, 345 Ill.App.3d 929, 281 Ill.Dec. 215, 803 N.E.2d 619, 625.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ill.App.2003. Com. (j) cit. in case quot. in disc. Former employee of community college sued, among others, department vice president for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiff. Reversing in part and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that instruction requiring jury to determine whether "one or more" of 11 enumerated actions by defendant constituted extreme and outrageous conduct improperly allowed jury to impose liability on defendant for intentional infliction of emotional distress even if it found that only one of the incidents, even a push, had occurred. The court noted that the emotional distress suffered must be of such intensity and duration that no reasonable person could be expected to endure it. Valentino v. Hilquist, 337 Ill.App.3d 461, 475, 271 Ill.Dec. 697, 709, 785 N.E.2d 891, 904.

Ill.App.2002. Cit. in sup., com. (j) cit. in sup. and quot. in case cit. in disc., illus. 13 cit. in case quot. in disc. Former husband appealed trial court's denial of his motion to dismiss former wife's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming, appellate court held that wife stated valid emotional-distress claim where husband's 11-year pattern of physical and verbal abuse, including beatings, physical restraint, isolation, and stalking, caused her severe emotional distress manifested by posttramatic stress disorder, depression, and fear of relationships with men, and that pattern of marital abuse constituted a continuing tort for limitations purposes. Feltmeier v. Feltmeier, 333 Ill.App.3d 1167, 1171, 1174, 1176, 268 Ill.Dec. 109, 112, 114, 116, 777 N.E.2d 1032, 1036, 1038, 1040, affirmed 207 Ill.2d 263, 278 Ill.Dec. 228, 798 N.E.2d 75 (2003). See above case.

Ill.App.2001. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (j) cit. in case quot. in sup. Therapist's employee, who was obligated to enter into therapeutic relationship as condition of employment, sued therapist in November 1996 for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Plaintiff alleged that defendant initiated campaign of offensive sexual overtures and used his position as therapist and employer in an attempt to get her to submit to his desires. Trial court dismissed, holding that plaintiff's tort claims were barred by two-year statute of limitations. This court reversed in part, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's allegations of frequent, unwelcome, and offensive sexual advances sufficiently stated claim for emotional distress, and patient's cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress did not accrue until last act of continuing tortious behavior occurred. Pavlik v. Kornhaber, 326 Ill.App.3d 731, 743, 260 Ill.Dec. 331, 341, 761 N.E.2d 175, 186, 187.

Ill.App.2000. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Employee who was demoted after complaining about safety issues and statutory violations at employer's nuclear power station sued employer for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Trial court dismissed. This court reversed and remanded the intentional-infliction-of-emotional-distress claim. The court held, inter alia, that defendant's alleged conduct of performing a sham investigation for the sole purpose of retaliating against plaintiff because he reported that defendant was violating nuclear safety regulations was sufficient to constitute extreme and outrageous conduct. Graham v. Commonwealth Edison Co., 318 Ill.App.3d 736, 744, 252 Ill.Dec. 320, 328, 742 N.E.2d 858, 866.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ill.App.2000. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. After decedent was cremated, decedent's sons sued cemetery, funeral home, and decedent's former wife for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that defendants interfered with their right to possess and preserve decedent's body. Trial court dismissed. This court reversed in part and remanded, holding, inter alia, that plaintiffs sufficiently pleaded a viable emotional-distress claim against the funeral home and the former wife, because defendants, through a forged signature on a cremation authorization form, allegedly deprived plaintiffs of the opportunity to grieve their father's death by participating in making arrangements and choosing his final resting place. Rekosh v. Parks, 316 Ill.App.3d 58, 67, 249 Ill.Dec. 161, 170, 735 N.E.2d 765, 774.

Ill.App.2000. Com. (g) quot. in disc. A mother who was involved in a child-custody dispute with the father of her children sued father and father's attorney for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, after attorney sent a letter to plaintiff's spouse relating that plaintiff had engaged in a sexual relationship with father in the hope of persuading him to compromise his legal position in the custody dispute. Reversing the trial court's dismissal of the complaint and remanding, this court rejected defendants' argument that they were absolutely privileged to publish the allegedly defamatory letter because they were merely insisting on their legal rights in a permissible way. The court said that, by sending the letter, defendants were not insisting on any legal right but simply hoping to gain advantage in pending litigation. Thompson v. Frank, 313 Ill.App.3d 661, 664, 246 Ill.Dec. 463, 466, 730 N.E.2d 143, 146.

Ill.App.1999. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc., quot. in spec. conc. op., cit. in case cit. in conc. op. Former employees sued their employer for retaliatory discharge and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that they were demoted and reassigned to perform demeaning and humiliating tasks. Trial court granted employer summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that although the retaliation and indignities to which the plaintiffs alleged they were subjected were wholly lacking in social utility, the court could not conclude that defendant's conduct was of such an outrageous character that no reasonable person could be expected to endure it. Welsh v. Commonwealth Edison Company, 306 Ill.App.3d 148, 154, 156, 239 Ill.Dec. 148, 152, 154, 713 N.E.2d 679, 683, 685.

Ill.App.1998. Cit. in headnote, cit. and quot. in disc., cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (d) cit. and quot. in disc., com. (k) cit. in disc. Pursuant to the Federal Employer's Liability Act (FELA), railroad employee sued railroad for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Defendant moved for summary judgment on the ground that plaintiff had endured no physical contact or threat of physical contact as a result of defendant's actions. The trial court denied the motion but certified to this court the question whether plaintiff was required to plead and offer proof of physical contact or threat of physical contact before he could recover under a theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Answering the question in the negative, this court held that intentional infliction of emotional distress was cognizable under FELA, and that, as long as the distress was genuine and severe, plaintiff was not required to prove physical contact or threat of same. Wilson v. Norfolk and Western Ry. Co., 296 Ill.App.3d 1044, 1045, 1050, 1052, 231 Ill.Dec. 516, 517, 521, 522, 696 N.E.2d 812, 813, 817, 818, reversed 187 Ill.2d 369, 240 Ill.Dec. 691, 718 N.E.2d 172 (1999). See above case.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ill.App.1997. Cit. in headnote, com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc., coms. (j) and (k) cit. in disc. Individual was charged by car lessor with, among other things, criminal trespass to a vehicle. When his case against lessor for intentional infliction of emotional distress, malicious prosecution, and defamation was dismissed, he brought malpractice action against law firm that represented him in the underlying litigation. The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff, but the trial court entered judgment n.o.v. on the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress and granted defendant's motion for a new trial on the malicious-prosecution and defamation claims. Affirming in part and reversing in part, this court held, inter alia, that lessor's conduct was not so extreme and outrageous that no reasonable person could be expected to endure it; that, even though the dismissal of the underlying case constituted termination in favor of plaintiff, lessor had probable cause to commence proceedings against him; and that lessor's remarks concerning plaintiff's possible connection to car theft did not amount to defamation per se. Adams v. Sussman & Hertzberg, Ltd., 292 Ill.App.3d 30, 30, 37, 38, 225 Ill.Dec. 944, 945, 950, 951, 684 N.E.2d 935, 936, 941, 942.

Ill.App.1997. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. Terminated clinic employee sued clinic and individual board members for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court dismissed the complaint. Affirming, this court held, in part, that, while defendants' method of termination subjected plaintiff to hurt feelings and a certain amount of indignity, their conduct was neither outrageous nor beyond all bounds of decency. Brackett v. Galesburg Clinic Ass'n, 293 Ill.App.3d 867, 870, 228 Ill.Dec. 534, 536, 689 N.E.2d 406, 409.

Ill.App.1997. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. Surgical patient who was operated on by HIV-positive physician sued physician, second physician, hospital, and corporation of which physician was allegedly an employee for, inter alia, battery, conspiracy, and intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress. Except for the count of negligent infliction of emotional distress, the trial court dismissed the complaint. Affirming, this court held, in part, that an HIV-positive physician intending to perform invasive surgery was under a duty to disclose his HIV status to his patient, and that a failure to do so gave rise to an action for negligent infliction of emotional distress, even in the absence of proof of transmission of the virus from physician to patient. To the extent that plaintiff accused second physician, hospital, and corporation of intentional infliction of emotional distress, the court found that those defendants had no duty to know of operating physician's HIV status. Doe v. Noe No. 1, 293 Ill.App.3d 1099, 1113, 228 Ill.Dec. 937, 947, 690 N.E.2d 1012, 1022, vacated 303 Ill.App.3d 139, 236 Ill.Dec. 461, 707 N.E.2d 588 (1998).

Ill.App.1996. Subsec. (2) cit. in headnote and quot. in disc., subsecs. (2)(a) and (2)(b) cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in diss. op., com. (j) quot. in case quot. in diss. op. After her son was fatally shot, a mother sued a newspaper publisher for invasion of privacy, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and battery. The newspaper's staffers had eavesdropped and taken unauthorized photographs of the son while he was undergoing emergency treatment at the hospital for a bullet wound and published the mother's statements to her son. The trial court dismissed plaintiff's complaint. This court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff stated a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress caused by the newspaper when it barred her from seeing her dead son on December 31 while it photographed him, and when it published the January 1 article featuring her son and the photograph of him lying dead. However, the newspaper's publication of the January 3 article four days after plaintiff's son's death, which did not include any mention of plaintiff, did not fall under Restatement (Second) of Torts § 46(2)(a) or (b). Dissent argued that plaintiff failed to state an emotional-distress cause of action, because the newspaper never invaded plaintiff's home and never used her words or the deceased's photograph to publicize its coverage of the story, and the distress plaintiff suffered was not such that no reasonable person could be expected to endure it. Green v. Chicago Tribune Co., 286 Ill.App.3d 1, 221 Ill.Dec. 342, 343, 350-351, 355, 675 N.E.2d 249, 250, 257-258, 262.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ill.App.1996. Cit. in headnotes, coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Physician whose hospital staff privileges were revoked after the hospital's medical director determined that he was incompetent and had been falsifying patient records sued hospital and medical director for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that, in the five years before his privileges were revoked, medical director engaged in a constant course of harassment, defamation, and intimidation against him. The trial court dismissed the complaint. Affirming, this court held that the alleged misconduct, which included, but was not limited to, charges of incompetence and suggestions that physician seek retraining, was not so outrageous or extreme as to be considered intolerable by a reasonable person. Tabora v. Gottlieb Memorial Hosp., 279 Ill.App.3d 108, 215 Ill.Dec. 870, 871, 878, 664 N.E.2d 267, 268, 275.

Ill.App.1993. Cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. Employees of an independent contractor hired to do work at a municipality's electricity-generating station sued the city, as operator of the station, the manufacturer of the generating equipment used at the station, and their employees after plaintiffs were exposed to asbestos, alleging that they suffered severe emotional distress and mental anguish. The trial court dismissed plaintiffs' complaint. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiffs' intentional infliction of emotional distress counts were properly dismissed because it was not alleged that defendants knew of the allegedly injurious condition. The court noted that, although the manufacturer admitted during oral argument that work was halted when the presence of asbestos was discovered, since this fact was not alleged in the complaint, plaintiffs did not establish that defendants intentionally or recklessly inflicted severe emotional distress. Campbell v. A.C. Equipment Services, 242 Ill.App.3d 707, 182 Ill.Dec. 876, 879, 610 N.E.2d 745, 749.

Ill.App.1993. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Guardian and next friend of decedent's estate beneficiaries sued decedent's widow for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, arising from widow's failure to exercise her implicit duty under a family settlement agreement to sign a spousal waiver needed to release decedent's pension and profit-sharing funds to estate beneficiaries. Affirming in part, this court agreed that the trial court correctly dismissed the emotional distress claim, holding that, assuming that plaintiff's allegations were true, all that could be said was that defendant asserted her legal rights in connection with a family dispute over decedent's estate, and that she may have breached the family settlement agreement, yet neither action constituted extreme or outrageous conduct. Wilkonson v. Yovetich, 249 Ill.App.3d 439, 188 Ill.Dec. 550, 557, 618 N.E.2d 1120, 1128.

Ill.App.1992. Com. (j) cit. in case cit. in disc. Woman who was involuntarily removed from her home by village paramedics, police officers, and social worker and transported to a hospital for psychological evaluation brought an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, against the village and the individual defendants who removed her. Affirming in part the trial court's dismissal of plaintiff's claims, this court held that plaintiff's emotional distress claim was properly dismissed for failure to allege extreme and outrageous conduct. Anderson v. Village of Forest Park, 238 Ill.App.3d 83, 179 Ill.Dec. 373, 381, 606 N.E.2d 205, 214.

Ill.App.1992. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. The executor of the estate of a plow operator, who was electrocuted when his plow became entangled in a guy wire that contacted a power line, and the son and grandson of the operator sued the power company for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. The trial court dismissed this count of the complaint, holding that the facts alleged did not show the extreme and outrageous conduct needed to support the cause of action. Affirming, this court held that the defendant's conduct in insulating, marking, and maintaining the wire and transmission poles was neither extreme nor outrageous and, at most, constituted negligence. Hayes v. Illinois Power Co., 225 Ill.App.3d 819, 167 Ill.Dec. 290, 587 N.E.2d 559, 563.

Ill.App.1992. Com. (i) quot. in sup. An ex-wife sued her former husband and their daughter for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, after she discovered that defendants were conspiring to have her murdered. Reversing the trial court's dismissal of plaintiff's complaint and remanding, this court rejected defendants' argument that they had not recklessly disregarded the risk of causing plaintiff's emotional distress and held that, with each additional person informed of and brought into the conspiracy, defendants ran the risk that someone would either expose the plan or, as it turned out, inform the police, resulting in plaintiff's discovery of the plot and her subsequent emotional distress because of it. Vance v. Chandler, 231 Ill.App.3d 747, 173 Ill.Dec. 525, 528, 597 N.E.2d 233, 237.

Ill.App.1991. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. A promoter of a classic cartoon festival organized as a benefit to increase public awareness of neurofibromatosis brought an action, with his wife and son, against a radio station and two radio personalities for reckless infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that the defendants' statements that the promoter and his wife were married at a shotgun wedding and that the wife and son, who were afflicted with the disease, had abnormally large heads caused them to suffer emotional distress. The trial court dismissed the complaint. Affirming in part, this court held that, although the defendants' remarks were tasteless, they did not constitute the truly extreme and outrageous conduct required for the tort. Kolengas v. Heftel Broadcasting Corp., 217 Ill.App.3d 803, 161 Ill.Dec. 172, 578 N.E.2d 299, 305, judgment affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded 154 Ill.2d 1, 180 Ill.Dec. 307, 607 N.E.2d 201 (1992). See above case.

Ill.App.1991. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. An employer, who related to the local police department that one of its employees had threatened, harassed, and assaulted a co-worker, terminated the employee. The discharged employee sued her employer alleging, among other things, defamation, false-light invasion of privacy, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court dismissed all the claims. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that the statements concerning the employee's alleged criminal conduct were absolutely privileged and that the conduct of the employer did not satisfy the criteria for an intentional infliction of emotional distress claim. The court noted that statements made prior to the commencement of trial, including statements to police alleging criminal activities, were absolutely privileged. The court also found that the conduct of the employer did not result in distress so severe that no reasonable man could be expected to endure it. Layne v. Builders Plumbing Supply Co., 210 Ill.App.3d 966, 155 Ill.Dec. 493, 569 N.E.2d 1104, 1109.

Ill.App.1991. Com. (d) cit. in disc., com. (j) quot. in disc. Two police officers were told that their psychological test results were indeterminate and likely invalid, indicating either deliberate manipulation of the test or mental illness, and were stripped of their badges and reassigned to positions in the records section. They were retested a week later and allowed to resume their regular duties. The police officers sued the chief of police and the city for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court dismissed for failure to state a claim. Affirming, this court held that the defendants' conduct was not extreme and outrageous. The court said that the incident was an isolated occurrence, the defendants' response was timely, and the event was brought to an expeditious conclusion. Lundy v. City of Calumet City, 209 Ill.App.3d 790, 153 Ill.Dec. 874, 567 N.E.2d 1101, 1103.

Ill.App.1990. Com. (d) cit. and quot. in sup. An employer sued a former employee to recover money he claimed she owed him from her employment with him. The former employee counterclaimed, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress, conversion, and defamation. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for the employee on all claims. Reversing and remanding, this court held that although the evidence was sufficient to support the verdict, the trial judge's conduct was sufficient to create prejudice in the minds of a jury. It determined, inter alia, that a jury reasonably could have found that the employer's conduct toward the employee, commencing while she was still his employee and continuing long after he fired her, constituted extreme and outrageous conduct and that the employer knew that the employee was undergoing psychotherapy and was susceptible to emotional distress. The court cited evidence that the employer pressured the employee for dates, persisted to offer her money for sexual favors, and attempted to disrupt her subsequent employment relationship by harassing her new employer. Pavilon v. Kaferly, 204 Ill.App.3d 235, 149 Ill.Dec. 549, 561 N.E.2d 1245, 1251-1252.

Ill.App.1990. Cit. in case cit. in sup., com. (j) cit. and quot. in sup., illus. 1 cit. and quot. in sup. A patient sued a physician for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that the physician negligently made an improper diagnosis, causing her to suffer severe emotional distress, and intentionally inflicted severe emotional distress upon her by ordering the surgical removal of significant portions of her internal structures and the abortion of her baby. The trial court granted the physician's motion to dismiss the patient's complaint and denied the patient's motion for leave to file a second amended complaint. Reversing and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that the patient stated a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress because she allegedly suffered severe emotional distress as a result of the physician's outrageous conduct, and because the physician could be charged with the knowledge that, by reason of the patient's pregnancy, she was peculiarly susceptible to emotional distress and that there was a high probability that his conduct would cause the patient to experience severe emotional distress. Wall v. Pecaro, 204 Ill.App.3d 362, 149 Ill.Dec. 388, 561 N.E.2d 1084, 1088, appeal denied 136 Ill.2d 555, 153 Ill.Dec. 385, 567 N.E.2d 343 (1991).

Ill.App.1989. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in cases cit. in sup. A former insurance company employee sued her former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that she was insulted, ridiculed, and sexually harassed by supervisors and co-workers, causing her mental anguish that required psychiatric treatment. The trial court dismissed the complaint. Affirming, this court held that plaintiff's complaints of inconsiderate, rude, vulgar, uncooperative, unprofessional, and unfair behavior by supervisors and co-workers did not allege sufficiently outrageous conduct or sufficiently severe emotional distress to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Miller v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc., 181 Ill.App.3d 954, 130 Ill.Dec. 558, 559, 560, 537 N.E.2d 887, 888, 889.

Ill.App.1989. Cit. but dist., com. (d) cit. in case cit. but dist., com. (e) cit. but dist. A school teacher attending a college for her master's degree was accused of cheating and expelled from the program. She was reinstated, but the college officials continued to allege that she had achieved her high grades by cheating. The teacher sued the college for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court dismissed the complaint. Affirming, this court stated that the college officials' conduct, although rude and unjustified, did not rise to the level of outrageousness required to support the charge. Nor did the officials use their authority over the plaintiff to coerce her to commit any act she would not do otherwise. Finally, although the plaintiff argued that the officials knew about her particular susceptibility to emotional distress, she had presented no evidence that she indeed had such a susceptibility. Rudis v. National College of Educ. 191 Ill.App.3d 1009, 139 Ill.Dec. 89, 91, 548 N.E.2d 474, 476, 478.

Ill.App.1988. Coms. (d), (i), and (j) quot. in disc. The purchasers of an automobile sued a car dealer for fraud, alleging that the defendant had orally misrepresented or misstated the purchase price and the interest rate contained in contracts relating to the purchase of an automobile. The trial court entered a judgment for the plaintiffs. This court reversed in part and remanded, holding that the record did not support the award of damages for pain and suffering; the defendant's conduct was not of an extreme and outrageous nature that would justify a recovery for severe emotional distress. Kleidon v. Rizza Chevrolet, Inc., 527 N.E.2d 374, 377, appeal denied 123 Ill.2d 559, 128 Ill.Dec. 891, 535 N.E.2d 402 (1988).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ill.App.1988. Com. (j) cit. in case quot. in disc. A former student sued his former professor and law school based on breach of contract and tort. The student alleged that the professor had wrongfully intercepted his unfavorable student teacher evaluation and had retaliated by lowering the student's grade, and that the professor had wrongly gained access to the student's record book. The trial court entered judgment on the pleadings for the defendants and granted the defendants' motion for sanctions against the student. This court affirmed in part, holding, inter alia, as a matter of law, that the conduct alleged was not of such an extreme and outrageous nature as to have constituted a basis for recovery for intentional infliction of emotional distress; however, it reversed in part as to the trial court's entry of sanctions. It determined that the alleged severe emotional distress manifested by anxieties, depression, loss of time and ability to concentrate, and interference with peace of mind, was not severe enough to allow recovery. Mucklow v. John Marshall Law School, 176 Ill.App.3d 886, 126 Ill.Dec. 314, 320, 531 N.E.2d 941, 947.

Ill.App.1988. Coms. (d), (e), (i), and (j) quot. in disc. The executive director of an abortion clinic sued a pro-life activist for intentional infliction of emotional distress, libel, and invasion of privacy. The trial court granted the defendant's motion to dismiss. Reversing in part and remanding, this court held that the plaintiff was a private individual who was involved in a matter of public concern; therefore he did not have to meet the actual malice standard that was required of public figures and officials to maintain an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court further held that the allegations were sufficient for a jury to find that the defendant's conduct was beyond both the bounds of decency and what a reasonable person could have endured, and that the plaintiff suffered severe emotional distress as a result. Van Duyn v. Smith, 173 Ill.App.3d 523, 123 Ill.Dec. 367, 369, 374, 527 N.E.2d 1005, 1008, 1012, appeal denied 124 Ill.2d 562, 129 Ill.Dec. 157, 535 N.E.2d 922 (1989).

Ill.App.1987. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (e) cit. in case quot. in sup. A company in the retail revolving credit business suspected an employee of stealing company credit cards. Following a criminal investigation the company terminated her employment. The employee sued her former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress as a result of her being accused and threatened during the investigation. The trial court granted summary judgment for the employer. Affirming, this court held that the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress required conduct so outrageous and extreme as to go beyond the bounds of decency, which was not present in the instant case despite the existence of the employer-employee authority relationship. Gibson v. Chemical Card Services, Corp., 157 Ill.App.3d 211, 109 Ill.Dec. 416, 418, 421, 510 N.E.2d 37, 39, 43.

Ill.App.1987. Coms. (d), (i), and (j) cit. in sup. A man who was stabbed to death was taken to an emergency room and then transported to the medical examiner's office where an autopsy was performed. The widow was not notified and did not learn of her husband's death until four months later, after which she sued the city and others for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted in part and denied in part the plaintiff's motion for leave to file an amended complaint. Holding that the plaintiff failed to state a cause of action, this court affirmed the trial court's denial of leave and reversed that part of its order granting leave to file an amended complaint. The court concluded that the alleged facts failed to establish that the defendants' conduct was so extreme as to be beyond all possible bounds of decency, that it was in conscious disregard of the high probability it would inflict severe emotional distress, or that the distress resulting from this conduct was so severe that no reasonable person could be expected to endure it. Hearon v. City of Chicago, 157 Ill.App.3d 633, 110 Ill.Dec. 161, 164, 510 N.E.2d 1192, 1195.

Ill.App.1987. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in disc. A bank customer sued the bank for intentional infliction of emotional distress after the bank refused to release certain funds deposited in various accounts, even after he suffered a heart attack. The trial court dismissed the complaint, holding that the defendant's conduct did not meet the criteria for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Reversing, this court held that, in light of the bank's knowledge of the plaintiff's heart attack, its conduct could be deemed within the scope of the tort; therefore, dismissal was error. McGrath v. Fahey, 163 Ill.App.3d 584, 117 Ill.Dec. 304, 307, 520 N.E.2d 655, 658.

Ill.App.1987. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in sup. A pastor who was discharged against his will sued his former church and its officers for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, asserting that the defendants' extreme and outrageous conduct consisted of their plans to "systematically and disrespectfully oust their pastor of forty years." The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict in favor of the pastor. Reversing and remanding, this court held that, because the defendants' conduct did not rise to the level of outrageous conduct beyond all possible bounds of decency, the plaintiff failed to prove intentional infliction of emotional distress. Owens v. Second Baptist Ch. of La Grange, 163 Ill.App.3d 442, 114 Ill.Dec. 557, 561, 516 N.E.2d 712, 716, appeal denied 119 Ill.2d 559, 119 Ill.Dec. 388, 522 N.E.2d 1247 (1988).

Ill.App.1987. Cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (a) quot. in case quot. in sup. Adoptive parents entered into an agreement with a private agency to adopt a child. Although the adoption was ultimately successful, the process was interrupted when the child's birth mother changed her original story regarding the child's biological father and the mother's former husband recanted his denial of paternity. The adoptive parents sued the adoption agency alleging negligence and breach of the adoption agreement. The trial court granted the agency's motion to dismiss. Affirming in part and reversing and remanding in part, this court held, inter alia, that the plaintiffs did not state a cause of action for reckless infliction of severe emotional distress because, in allegedly failing to implement certain procedural safeguards—conducting adequate investigations, collecting sworn affidavits, and keeping adequate records—the agency did not follow a course of conduct so outrageous as to go beyond the bounds of decency. Petrowsky v. Family Service of Decatur, 165 Ill.App.3d 32, 116 Ill.Dec. 42, 46, 518 N.E.2d 664, 668, appeal denied 119 Ill.2d 574, 119 Ill.Dec. 397, 522 N.E.2d 1256 (1988).

Ill.App.1985. Coms. (c), (d), and (f) quot. in cases quot. in disc. A former newspaper delivery driver sued his former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress and retaliatory discharge when the driver objected to remaining on a particular delivery route. The trial court dismissed the complaint. Affirming, this court held that the employer's actions were not so outrageous in character or so extreme in degree, and the distress inflicted on the driver was not so severe, to support the driver's cause of action. Burgess v. Chicago Sun-Times, 132 Ill.App.3d 181, 87 Ill.Dec. 292, 296, 476 N.E.2d 1284, 1288.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ill.App.1984. Coms. (d), (i), and (j) cit. in case quot. in disc. The plaintiff's noncustodial former wife took their son to bimonthly psychotherapy sessions for one year without the plaintiff's knowledge or consent. The plaintiff alleged that the defendant psychiatrist intentionally inflicted emotional distress. The trial court granted the defendant's motion to dismiss. This court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court explained that the intentional infliction of emotional distress requires that the defendant's conduct go beyond all possible bounds of decency, that the plaintiff's distress be so severe that no reasonable man could endure it, and that the defendant be aware that severe emotional distress will result from his action. As the defendant performed at the noncustodial parent's request, the court held, the defendant's conduct was not extreme and outrageous. Dymek v. Nyquist, 128 Ill.App.3d 859, 83 Ill.Dec. 52, 55, 469 N.E.2d 659, 662.

Ill.App.1984. Com. (d) quot. in sup. A woman sued her former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress. As branch manager of a bank, the plaintiff had suspected that one of the employees under her supervision was involved in theft and embezzlement of the bank's funds. She conducted an investigation and notified her supervisors. The employee was eventually returned to his job. The plaintiff alleged that as a result she was transferred, demoted, and subjected to relentless criticism, mistreatment, and humiliation by the bank management. The trial court dismissed her action for failure to state a claim. Affirming, this court held that the bank's conduct had not been so reprehensible that it rose to the level of outrageous conduct sufficient to state a claim for the intentional infliction of emotional distress. Harris v. First Federal Sav. and Loan Ass'n, 129 Ill.App.3d 978, 85 Ill.Dec. 89, 91, 473 N.E.2d 457, 459.

Ill.App.1984. Com. (j) quot. in case, cit. in sup. The conservator of the estate of an incompetent filed a complaint against an insurance company for willfully refusing to pay benefits owing her. The trial court dismissed the count alleging that the insurer was liable for treble damages, and this court reversed and remanded. On remand, the trial court entered judgment for the insurer. This court reversed and remanded on the issue of attorney fees and affirmed on the remaining issues. It held that the instruction, on the elements of the tort of intentional infliction of mental distress, that the emotional distress suffered must be severe and of such intensity and duration that no reasonable person could be expected to endure it, was neither misleading nor confusing. Sale v. Allstate Ins. Co., 126 Ill.App.3d 905, 81 Ill.Dec. 901, 913, 467 N.E.2d 1023, 1035.

Ill.App.1983. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (e) cit. in sup. and cit. in case quot. in disc., corn. (i) cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (j) cit. in sup. and quot. in case quot. in disc. A former employee brought an action against a co-worker and his supervisor, claiming that the co-worker continually harassed him with an intent to cause him severe anxiety and mental distress. The supervisor, according to the complaint, failed to act to prevent further harassment after being informed of the situation. The trial court dismissed the complaint for failure to state a cause of action. On appeal, the plaintiff challenged the lower court's finding that the acts complained of fell short of being “outrageous.” This court determined that the most serious conduct alleged, involving the placing of human waste in a file the plaintiff was using, could not form the basis for the cause of action asserted by the plaintiff because, as a single act, it lacked the requisite intensity and duration. The court added that the plaintiff's claim against his former supervisor was properly dismissed, as he failed to allege an extreme and outrageous abuse of authority. Affirmed. Morrison v. Sandell, 112 Ill.App.3d 1057, 68 Ill.Dec. 556, 446 N.E.2d 290, 291, 292.

Ill.App.1982. Cit. in disc. The plaintiff brought an action against the defendant insurance company and the insurance company's agent, seeking to recover for damages for failing to notify the plaintiff that her ex-husband had defaulted in making payments on his life insurance policy. The plaintiff had been the owner of the policy, and upon the plaintiff's divorce from her husband, the husband was ordered to maintain the policy with their child named as beneficiary. The trial court granted the agent's motion to dismiss the claim as to the agent, and the plaintiff appealed. This court determined that the agent had no duty to notify the plaintiff, who was a customer of the defendant insurance company. The plaintiff also had argued that the agent's failure to notify the plaintiff caused her severe emotional distress. The court rejected this argument, stating that because the agent's failure to notify was not improper, it would be inconsistent to deem that conduct outrageous. The order dismissing the claim against the agent was affirmed. Bellmer v. Charter Sec. Life Ins. Co., 105 Ill.App.3d 234, 61 Ill.Dec. 34, 39, 433 N.E.2d 1362, 1367.

Ill.App.1981. Coms. (d), (e), and (g) cit. in disc. The plaintiff, an installer for the telephone company, brought an action against his employer alleging that the employer intentionally caused him to suffer severe emotional distress. The plaintiff asserted that it was the defendant's policy to permit, allow, and encourage installers to falsify their work reports which were used for billing customers and compiling reports of corporate expenses. The plaintiff also alleged that when he refused to comply with his superiors' demands, his foreman and superiors harassed him and used retaliatory practices in order to coerce the plaintiff's compliance. The trial court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed. On appeal, the higher court concluded that a jury could reasonably find that the coercion and retaliation allegedly suffered by the plaintiff were so outrageous, extreme, and atrocious as to be considered intolerable in a civilized community. Accordingly, the judgment was reversed and remanded. Milton v. Ill. Bell Tel. Co., 101 Ill.App.3d 75, 56 Ill.Dec. 497, 500, 427 N.E.2d 829, 832.

Ill.App.1981. Coms. (d), (j), and (i) quot. in disc. A franchisee brought an action against her corporate franchiser and the franchiser's district manager, alleging, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The plaintiff claimed that the district manager had “insulted, disturbed, disquieted, and threatened” the plaintiff. She further averred that the manager had ordered her out of her store and threatened to send false reports to the corporate headquarters concerning the plaintiff. The trial court dismissed the plaintiff's complaint with prejudice for failure to state a claim. This court affirmed. The alleged conduct of the district manager amounted to nothing more than mere “insults and indignities,” which cannot be deemed outrageous. Plocar v. Dunkin' Donuts of America, Inc., 103 Ill.App.2d 740, 59 Ill.Dec. 418, 422, 423, 431 N.E.2d 1175, 1179, 1180.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ill.App.1981. Cit. in diss. op. and com. (g) cit. in diss. op. The plaintiff brought an action against his employer's workmen's compensation insurer, alleging that the defendant intentionally caused him severe emotional distress during the handling of his workmen's compensation claim. The lower court entered judgment in favor of the plaintiff, awarding him both compensatory and punitive damages. The defendant appealed, arguing inter alia, that the plaintiff did not prove that he was entitled to compensatory damages. The court found that the plaintiff sufficiently stated a cause of action for intentional infliction of mental distress, making the insurance company liable to the employee for compensatory damages, although not punitive damages. The dissent argued that the insurance company should not be liable because, in denying the plaintiff's claim on account of a questionable cause of the plaintiff's injury, the defendant did no more than insist upon a legal right in a permissible way. Robertson v. Travelers Ins. Co., 100 Ill.App.3d 845, 56 Ill.Dec. 222, 231, 427 N.E.2d 302, 311, judgment reversed 95 Ill.2d 441, 69 Ill.Dec. 954, 448 N.E.2d 866.

Ill.App.1980. Com. (d) quot. in part in case cit. in sup. The plaintiffs instituted suit against the defendants alleging that their newspaper article, which discussed the death of the plaintiffs' son by drug overdose, was libelous and was an intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court dismissed the complaint for failure to state a cause of action. On the issue of intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court stated that liability would exist only where the conduct had been so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency. The court found that the defendants' article merely stated the writer's opinions regarding the problems that teenagers had with alcohol and drugs, and listed some methods she felt would help to solve those problems. This court therefore affirmed the lower court's decision. Galvin v. Gallagher, 81 Ill.App.3d 927, 37 Ill.Dec. 150, 401 N.E.2d 1243, 1246.

Ill.App.1980. Com. (d) cit. in disc. An employee brought an action against his employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress based upon his discharge. The lower court dismissed the complaint with prejudice. This court stated that this tort requires extreme and outrageous conduct by the defendant which is intended to cause emotional distress or which is done in reckless disregard for the probability of causing emotional distress, and the plaintiff's severe emotional distress proximately caused by the defendant's outrageous conduct. The conduct of the tortfeasor must be so outrageous and extreme that it goes beyond all bounds of human decency. Here, an employee at will was discharged, an act well within the employer's rights. Without further allegation, this was not the outrageous conduct required to state a cause of action. The order of the trial court was affirmed. Palmateer v. International Harvester Co., 85 Ill.App.3d 50, 40 Ill.Dec. 589, 406 N.E.2d 595, 598, judgment affirmed in part, judgment reversed in part 85 Ill.2d 124, 52 Ill.Dec. 13, 421 N.E.2d 876 (1981).

Ill.App.1979. Cit. and quot. in disc. and cit. in diss. op., subsec. (2) cit. and quot. in part in disc. and com. (i) quot. in disc. and cit. and quot. in part in diss. op. The plaintiff had a seizure at work and little was done by his superiors or the medical attendant to help him. The plaintiff and his family sued his employer, his co-worker and the medical attendant alleging that the co-worker's and the attendant's outrageous conduct had caused the plaintiff's emotional distress. The lower court dismissed the complaint and the plaintiff appealed. This court affirmed and held that the Workmen's Compensation Act precluded the plaintiff worker from recovery for the tort of emotional distress when the alleged outrageous acts of the defendants were not intentional. The court concluded that because the defendants' conduct was not intentionally calculated to cause the plaintiff worker's emotional distress, the complaint was properly dismissed. The court held that the plaintiff's family could not recover because neither of them had been present at the time of the incident. The dissent argued that the majority had not applied the standards of the tort correctly. The dissent stated that the defendants' conduct was so wanton as to create the intent required under the Workmen's Compensation Act and therefore the Act should not have precluded the plaintiff's recovery. Collier v. Wagner Castings Co., 70 Ill.App.3d 233, 26 Ill.Dec. 641, 388 N.E.2d 265, 268, 269, 272-273, judgment affirmed 81 Ill.2d 229, 41 Ill.Dec. 776, 408 N.E.2d 198 (1980).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ill.App.1979. Com. (d) cit. and quot. in sup. and coms. (e) and (j) cit. in sup. The plaintiff was a new tenant in a hotel and when she was attempting to move in her landlord refused to allow her to use the freight elevator unless she paid him three months rent in advance. The plaintiff was detained, frightened, upset and worried although she did not seek medical attention. The plaintiff sued her landlord for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The defendant's motion for summary judgment was denied and a jury found for the plaintiff. This court reversed and held that no recovery would be allowed where the actions of the defendant were not so extreme as to go beyond all bounds of human decency and where the emotional distress suffered by the plaintiff was merely fright and worry. The court stated that the plaintiff's distress must be of such a nature that no one would be expected to endure it. The court stated that even though a landlord-tenant relationship existed between the plaintiff and the defendant, the plaintiff must still prove that the defendant's behavior was extreme and outrageous. Farnor v. Irmco Corp., 73 Ill.App.3d 851, 29 Ill.Dec. 894, 392 N.E.2d 591, 595, 596.

Ill.App.1979. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in part in sup. The plaintiff sued the defendant for intentional infliction of emotional distress because the defendant had made phone calls and frequent threats to the plaintiff's family. The lower court dismissed the complaint for failure to state a cause of action. This court affirmed and held, inter alia, that the defendant's conduct was not so outrageous as to go beyond all bounds of human decency. The court stated that only conduct which was extremely outrageous in nature could support a cause of action in this tort. Kelly v. Franco, 72 Ill.App.3d 642, 28 Ill.Dec. 855, 391 N.E.2d 54, 59.

Ill.App.1979. Cit. in sup. The plaintiffs had been harassed by a collection agency in its attempts to collect a debt allegedly owed to a health clinic. The plaintiffs sued the collection agency and the clinic alleging the intentional infliction of emotional distress, for which they sought compensatory damages and for the defendants violation of a statute for which they sought compensatory and punitive damages. The plaintiffs argued that the clinic was vicariously liable for the actions of the agency. The lower court dismissed the complaint against the clinic but found that the complaint stated a cause of action against the agency and that the prayer for punitive damages was proper. This court found that the complaint sufficiently alleged that the clinic could be vicariously liable for the actions of the agency. The court discussed the elements of a cause of action for the intentional infliction of emotional distress and noted that the defendant agency claimed that its actions were not extreme and outrageous. The court found that the complaint alleged facts to support a cause of action for this tort. The court found that the complaint stated a cause of action for the violation of the statute and that the clinic could be held vicariously liable as a principal for its agent's violations of the statute. The court determined that punitive damages were recoverable for a violation of the statute. However, the court found that the plaintiffs had not alleged sufficient facts to show that the clinic should be held vicariously liable for punitive damages, if awarded, and the prayer for punitive damages against the clinic should have been stricken with leave to amend. Sherman v. Field Clinic, 74 Ill.App.3d 21, 29 Ill.Dec. 597, 392 N.E.2d 154, 159.

Ill.App.1979. Cit. in disc. and coms. (d), (e), (i) and (j) cit. and quot. in part in sup. The plaintiffs had been issued a homeowner's policy by the defendant insurance company. Their home and personal belongings were so severely damaged by a fire that they had to move into a motel. The plaintiffs felt that the defendant was not making payments according to the policy and numerous discussions took place before the plaintiffs sued. The plaintiffs alleged that they were forced to resort to charity and were subject to distress, embarrassment and great financial difficulties. The lower court dismissed the complaint and the plaintiffs appealed. This court affirmed the dismissal of the count which alleged the intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court stated that the plaintiffs must have alleged conduct which was so extreme and outrageous that it went beyond that which humans could be expected to endure. The court stated that malicious conduct would not necessarily be sufficient to create a cause of action for the intentional infliction of emotional distress if the conduct was not so outrageous that it went beyond all bounds of human decency. This court also affirmed the dismissal of the count which alleged that the defendant had not acted in good faith in its dealings with the plaintiffs. The court stated that the plaintiffs had alleged that the defendant's conduct was willful, wanton and malicious but the allegations were insufficient because no facts existed to support the allegations. Tobolt v. Allstate Ins. Co., 75 Ill.App.3d 57, 30 Ill.Dec. 824, 393 N.E.2d 1171, 1175.

Ill.App.1978. Subsec. (1) quot. but dist. Plaintiff insured brought this suit to recover punitive damages against an insurer for alleged breach of its duty of good faith and fair dealing and for compensatory damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiff asserted that the defendant had instilled in him a fear for his life, and that defendant had attempted to coerce him into surrendering his disability income policy. In affirming the dismissal of certain counts in the complaint, the court held that plaintiff had failed to allege specific facts which could be interpreted as outrageous conduct on defendant's part or which could substantiate plaintiff's allegation that he suffered severe emotional distress. It was also held that plaintiff's complaint failed to state a cause of action for defendant's breach of its duty of good faith upon which relief could be granted. DeBolt v. Mutual of Omaha, 56 Ill.App.3d 111, 13 Ill.Dec. 656, 371 N.E.2d 373, 375.

Ill.App.1978. Coms. (d), (e), (i) cit. in sup.; com. (j) quot. in sup. The parents of two sons, who were treated for inflamed tonsils with radiation treatments in 1947 before tonsil radiation was linked with thyroid cancer, one of whom developed thyroid cancer in 1962 and the other a nodule on his thyroid gland in 1974 that was thought be be cancerous, brought an action against the hospital, the physician who advocated the use of such treatments in young patients, and others to recover for alleged intentional infliction of severe emotional distress. The lower court dismissed the complaint, and the parents appealed. The court found that the plaintiffs' complaint failed to allege extreme or outrageous conduct by the defendants which was "beyond all possible bounds of decency," that the acts of any of the defendants were done intentionally, or that the defendants knew that severe emotional distress was "certain or substantially certain" to result from the defendants' alleged acts in 1947. Accordingly, the court held that the complaint filed by the parents, alleging that they suffered, and for the remainder of their lives would suffer, great emotional trauma as well as pain and worry over the health and well-being of their sons as a result of the defendants' wrongful, negligent, willful, wanton and reckless conduct, failed to state a cause of action for intentional infliction of severe emotional distress. The judgment of the lower court was affirmed. Neuberg v. Michael Reese Hospital & Medical Ctr., 60 Ill.App.3d 679, 18 Ill.Dec. 62, 377 N.E.2d 215, 218.

Ill.App.1977. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in part in case quot. in sup. Plaintiff's complaint alleged that the actions of defendant's agent, the driver of defendant's truck, constituted intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress and intentional assault. The driver-agent allegedly made feints at plaintiff's vehicle as if he were going to strike it while both were traveling at high speed on a highway. The complaint was dismissed, and plaintiff appealed. Affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. Held: The count alleging negligent infliction of emotional distress was properly dismissed since plaintiff failed to assert a physical impact between the two vehicles. Plaintiff did state a cause of action for defendant's intentional or willful entrustment of its truck to an incompetent driver, for which plaintiff's recovery would depend upon proof of defendant's knowledge of the driver's incompetence. The court also held that proof of defendant's negligence in permitting its truck to operate in violation of Interstate Commerce Commission rules and regulations might entitle a jury to find defendant liable for the intentional tort of its driver. Rosenberg v. Packerland Packing Co., Inc., 55 Ill.App.3d 959, 13 Ill.Dec. 208, 370 N.E.2d 1235, 1238.

Ill.App.1976. Cit. and fol., subsec. (1) quot., com. (d) quot., com. (f) quot. in part, (erron. cit. as § 56), com. (f) quot., com. (g) quot., com. (h) quot., Appendix Vol. (through December 1963) cit., Restatement In The Courts, 1965, 1967, 1968-69, 1970-71, 1972-73, 1974 Supps. cit. Plaintiff brought this suit to recover an amount due and owing under a promissory note executed by defendant and secured by consumer goods of all kinds, including household goods, owned by defendant. Defendant filed a counterclaim, which was dismissed on plaintiff's motion, and, when the court dismissed her motion for leave to file an amended counterclaim in which she claimed damages for severe emotional distress intentionally inflicted upon her by plaintiff's manner of seeking to collect two delinquent accounts, she appealed. While the appellate court did find that defendant's pleadings were sufficient to allege the defendant's particular susceptibility and the plaintiff's notice thereof, it affirmed the trial court's dismissal because it was unable to find within the pleadings any allegations of fact which might reasonably have been regarded as a "major outrage," i.e., "so extreme or outrageous as to permit recovery" under the principles set forth in Section 46 of the Restatement of Torts. Public Finance Corporation v. Davis, 36 Ill.App.3d 99, 343 N.E.2d 226, 230, 231. Aff'd, 66 Ill.2d 85, 4 Ill.Dec. 652, 360 N.E.2d 765. See above case.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ind.

Ind.2009. Quot. in case quot. in ftn. Restaurant patrons brought claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, against restaurant operator and its employee after employee stated to a passerby and a police officer that one of the plaintiffs had "pulled a gun" inside the store, leading to plaintiff being publicly handcuffed and detained by police who found no gun. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. Affirming, this court held that the qualified privilege applicable to citizen reports of suspected criminal activity prevented plaintiffs, as a matter of sound judicial and public policy, from succeeding on any of their claims, including their IIED claim. Williams v. Tharp, 914 N.E.2d 756, 769.

Ind.2008. Cit. in case quot. in conc. op. Hospital-operating-room perfusionist sued heart surgeon for assault and intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), following a verbal altercation between the parties. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for defendant on plaintiff's IIED claim, but found for plaintiff on his assault claim. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that the trial court did not err in refusing to instruct the jury that the phrase "workplace bullying," which was raised in connection with the testimony of plaintiff's expert witness, was irrelevant to plaintiff's claims, because workplace bullying could be considered an element of IIED. The concurring opinion observed that, even if the testimony was erroneously admitted, it was harmless error, since it was offered to prove the elements of the IIED claim, and did not go to the elements of the assault claim—the only claim being reviewed in this appeal. Raess v. Doescher, 883 N.E.2d 790, 799.

Ind.2006. Com. (j) quot. in sup. After an unruly passenger became a potential security risk onboard a flight five months after the September 11th terrorist attack, ultimately causing the small plane to be diverted to an airport where he was arrested, couple who were also passengers on the flight brought, in part, claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress against airline that operated the flight. The trial court denied defendant's motion for summary judgment on this claim, and the court of appeals affirmed that portion of the decision. This court reversed, holding that, while the couples' fear and anxiety during the flight were not trivial, the physical impact in this case was slight to nonexistent, and thus allowing an emotional-distress claim to proceed based on the couple's lingering mental anguish, viewed by the court as speculative, would essentially abrogate the requirements of Indiana's modified-impact rule. Atlantic Coast Airlines v. Cook, 857 N.E.2d 989, 1000.

Ind.1997. Cit. in headnote, cit. in disc. Postal worker sued co-worker for invasion of privacy after learning that defendant had disclosed plaintiff's HIV-positive status to another employee. The trial court entered summary judgment for defendant. After reviewing the history of the tort of invasion of privacy and exploring the differences between actionable defamation and the tort of disclosure of private facts, this court affirmed. It held that Indiana did not recognize the subtort of public disclosure of private facts and that, even if it did, plaintiff could not recover under these circumstances because he had failed to establish the element of "publicity." The court also noted that, to the extent plaintiff alleged mental distress, such harm was addressed by the tort of outrage. Doe v. Methodist Hosp., 690 N.E.2d 681, 682, 691.

Ind.1991. Quot. in disc. Family members surrounded and threatened another man while one of them repeatedly touched a revolver he had in a holster. The man being threatened sued the family members alleging several claims, including assault and intentional infliction of emotional distress, and sought to recover for his emotional and psychological injury. The trial court entered summary judgment in favor of the defendants, and the intermediate appellate court affirmed. This court vacated and reversed in part, but affirmed the entry of summary judgment as to the emotional distress count of the complaint. The court held, inter alia, that under proper circumstances, liability would attach to a defendant for an intentional infliction of emotional distress, but that the facts in the case did not support a finding that the defendants intended to cause emotional injury to the plaintiff. The court reasoned that the jury could not infer that the defendants' possession of a gun was intended to inflict emotional injury on the plaintiff merely from the plaintiff's assertion that the defendants knew the plaintiff disliked guns. Cullison v. Medley, 570 N.E.2d 27, 31, appeal after remand 619 N.E.2d 937 (Ind.App.1993).

Ind.1981. Subsec. (2) cit. in diss. op. The plaintiff below brought an action against the defendant loan company. The plaintiff claimed that employees of the loan company intentionally threatened, assaulted, and beat the plaintiff in the plaintiff's home in front of his family. The trial court granted the defendant partial summary judgment on the plaintiff's claim for damages sought for the mental distress suffered by the children and wife as a result of watching the defendant's conduct. The plaintiff's petition for transfer was denied by the higher court. In a dissent to denial of transfer, it was argued that the court should not have required that the plaintiff's family suffer contemporaneous physical impact before they could recover for infliction of emotional distress where the defendant's act was intentional. It was also noted that the Restatement limits recovery to immediate family members in order to prevent a flood of litigation. The wife and children were immediate family members who witnessed the conduct; therefore they should not be denied recovery. Elza v. Liberty Loan Corp., _ Ind. ___, 426 N.E.2d 1302, 1307, 1309.

Ind.App.

Ind.App.2023. Cit. in disc. Patients sued hospital, alleging, among other things, that defendant was vicariously liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress, after defendant's employee improperly accessed plaintiffs' medical records and shared their private health information with the employee's then-husband. The trial court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment. On appeal, this court affirmed, holding that defendant was not liable to plaintiffs for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because its employee did not act with the requisite intent or recklessness to cause emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court pointed out that the designated evidence showed that defendant's employee attempted to keep her improper actions a secret from both defendant and plaintiffs. Fox v. Franciscan Alliance, Inc., 204 N.E.3d 320, 329.

Ind.App.2020. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Citizens who resided in a large-scale public housing complex sued city, state, and others, alleging that defendants knew that the soil and air in and around the complex were contaminated with dangerous levels of lead, arsenic, and other hazardous substances, but took no action to inform plaintiffs or to otherwise safeguard them from the danger. The trial court denied defendants' motion for judgment on the pleadings. Affirming, this court held that plaintiffs recited sufficient facts to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, because a reasonable person could conclude that defendants' alleged conduct in knowingly exposing vulnerable citizens to toxic substances when reasonable alternatives existed was extreme and outrageous. State v. Alvarez by next friend Alvarez, 150 N.E.3d 206, 219.

Ind.App.2016. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Former in-home health worker who was acquitted on charges of stealing jewelry from two patients brought claims for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against former employer and investigators hired by employer, alleging that defendants wrongfully accused her of the thefts. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. Affirming, this court held that plaintiff failed to show that defendants' conduct was outrageous, or that defendants intended to cause her emotional harm, as required to state an IIED claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Ali v. Alliance Home Health Care, LLC, 53 N.E.3d 420, 443.

Ind.App.2016. Com. (d) quot. in sup. High-school basketball coach who was not offered the coaching position for the school year following an incident in which he threw a basketball toward a student player filed, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against school district and high-school principal, alleging that principal failed to conduct a thorough investigation and led administrators and others to believe that he had conducted one, and released a statement by coach removing, without his knowledge or consent, the word "allegedly," so that it read as an admission to hitting the player with the ball. The trial court granted in part defendant's motion for summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding that the trial court did not err in granting summary judgment on plaintiff's IIED claim. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, the court explained that defendant's alleged conduct was not so outrageous in character or extreme in degree that it was to be regarded as atrocious or utterly intolerable in a civilized community. McCollough v. Noblesville Schools, 63 N.E.3d 334, 342.

Ind.App.2015. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Terminated store manager filed, inter alia, an intentional-infliction-of-emotional-distress claim against former supervisor and former employer, alleging that supervisor contacted the police to falsely accuse her of stealing from the store, which resulted in her being charged with theft. The trial court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment. This court reversed in part, holding that there were genuine issues of material fact as to whether defendants' conduct caused plaintiff severe emotional distress. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, the court determined that a reasonable factfinder could find that defendants' conduct was sufficiently outrageous, given plaintiff's allegations that defendants reported her without evidence or belief that she did had committed theft. Bah v. Mac's Convenience Stores, LLC, 37 N.E.3d 539, 550.

Ind.App.2015. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. After mortgagor fell behind on her mortgage payments, mortgagee filed a foreclosure action; mortgagor filed a counterclaim for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), alleging that plaintiff intentionally mishandled her application for the federal Home Affordable Modification Program, which caused defendant emotional distress. The trial court dismissed defendant's counterclaims. Affirming, this court held that defendant failed to allege a sufficient IIED claim. Quoting Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, the court reasoned that, even if defendant's allegations were true and plaintiff mishandled her application under the federal program, a successful IIED claim required conduct that was outrageous and extreme, which was not present in this case. Jaffri v. JPMorgan Chase Bank, N.A., 26 N.E.3d 635, 640.

Ind.App.2014. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (f) quot. in sup., com. (i) cit. in sup. Patient sued mental-health center for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that it disclosed his confidential medical information to his grandmother, whom he had named as his emergency contact upon admission to the center, without his authorization. After a hearing, the trial court granted summary judgment for defendant. Reversing in part, this court held that there was a genuine issue of material fact as to whether defendant's conduct—in contacting plaintiff's grandmother to inform her that he had been admitted and was safe—was so outrageous that it satisfied the reckless element of a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, given that defendant had specialized knowledge as a mental-healthcare provider, as well as actual knowledge that plaintiff was experiencing a mental-health crisis and that he did not want his family to know about his condition. The court noted that, under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, intentional infliction of emotional distress could be found where the actor knew that severe emotional distress was certain, or substantially certain, to result from his or her conduct, and where he or she acted recklessly, or in deliberate disregard of a high degree of probability that the emotional distress would follow. J.H. v. St. Vincent Hosp. and Health Care Center, Inc., 19 N.E.3d 811, 819, 820.

Ind.App.2014. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Former chief executive officer of a charitable organization sued president of a foundation that provided grants to the organization, alleging, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress arising from statements that defendant allegedly made to the mayor's chief of staff, who was engaged in negotiations with plaintiff about a potential employment opportunity in the mayor's office. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant. This court affirmed, holding that the evidence did not support a determination that defendant's conduct was extreme and outrageous. While the evidence showed that defendant stated that plaintiff's organization was being audited due to concerns over financial irregularities, that statement was true at the time it was made, and the evidence did not support plaintiff's claim that defendant continued an alleged "defamation campaign" against plaintiff even after learning from the audit that there was no missing money. Miller v. Central Indiana Community Foundation, Inc., 11 N.E.3d 944, 960.

Ind.App.2013. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Parents whose infant son died of "undetermined" causes while under the care of a babysitter recommended by a pastor at their church brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against church, after church issued a press release about the death that included the family and child's names. The trial court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment on the IIED claim. Affirming as to this claim, this court held that defendant's press release and press conference disclosing the circumstances of the infant's death, as well as pastor's failure to follow up with plaintiffs after he went to the hospital on the day of the baby's death, might have been insensitive, but it did not rise to the level of outrageous conduct required to succeed on an IIED claim. The court concluded that there was no evidence that defendant had any intent to emotionally harm plaintiffs. Westminster Presbyterian Church of Muncie v. Yonghong Cheng, 992 N.E.2d 859, 870.

Ind.App.2012. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee of city housing agency brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against agency, after criminal charges against him for ghost employment, official misconduct, and deception were voluntarily dismissed by the prosecutor. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant. Affirming, this court held that defendant's conduct in reporting to law-enforcement authorities plaintiff's suspected criminal activity, allegedly consisting of conducting personal business during work hours, using a public vehicle for personal reasons, and making false statements on his time cards, did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to maintain plaintiff's IIED claim. Brown v. Indianapolis Housing Agency, 971 N.E.2d 181, 188.

Ind.App.2012. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Thirteen-year-old child, by the Indiana Department of Child Services as his next friend, sued county coroner's office and city, asserting, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) arising from their removal of his morbidly obese mother's remains from the apartment he had shared with her. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. Reversing with respect to plaintiff's IIED claim and remanding, this court held that a genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether defendants' conduct in dragging decedent's body, covered only with a sheet, outside on a mattress while plaintiff watched, winching the mattress onto a tow truck's flatbed, and tossing a dirty carpet on her body before it was transported to the coroner's office was so outrageous that it satisfied the reckless element of the tort. Johnson ex rel. Indiana Dept. of Child Services v. Marion County Coroner's Office, 971 N.E.2d 151, 162.

Ind.App.2011. Com. (d) cit. in sup. and quot. in case quot. in sup. Homeowners brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, against neighbors. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. Affirming, this court held that plaintiffs' allegations that defendants installed surveillance cameras aimed at their property and used video footage from the cameras to pursue criminal-mischief charges against one plaintiff for vandalizing their property asserted conduct that was not sufficiently outrageous to maintain plaintiffs' IIED claim against defendants. Curry v. Whitaker, 943 N.E.2d 354, 361.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ind.App.2011. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. After university professor was terminated for sexually harassing his supervisor, he sued supervisor, asserting a claim for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant. Affirming, this court held that there was no evidence to establish that defendant intended to cause plaintiff emotional distress, as required for plaintiff's IIED claim, when defendant initiated her harassment complaint against him with the university; defendant acted according to the scope of her responsibilities at the university, and filed her complaint when she believed that the university's zero-tolerance policy had been violated. Haegert v. McMullan, 953 N.E.2d 1223, 1235.

Ind.App.2011. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Family members of deceased brought, inter alia, claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against funeral home, funeral director, and others involved in deceased's interment, after deceased's too-large casket caused bulging in the vault, which was not completely sealed, and deceased's casket had to be exhumed, replaced, and reinterred. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. This court affirmed, holding, as a matter of law, that defendants' actions did not constitute "outrageous" behavior as contemplated by the narrow definition adopted by Indiana for the tort of IIED from Restatement Second of Torts § 46. York v. Fredrick, 947 N.E.2d 969, 976-977.

Ind.App.2009. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Property owners brought nuisance, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), and other claims against neighboring dairy farm, alleging that farm's operation, including its associated noises and smells, interfered with the comfortable enjoyment of their property. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that defendant's actions did not constitute "outrageous" behavior sufficient to state a claim for IIED as a matter of law. The court reasoned that defendant was largely, if not entirely, compliant with state regulations, and that, however negligent defendant may have been in operating its dairy farm, none of the designated facts suggested that any alleged negligence was so extreme in degree that it went beyond all possible bounds of decency. Additionally, there was nothing in the record that would support a reasonable inference that defendant intended to cause emotional distress to plaintiffs by its behavior. Lindsey v. DeGroot, 898 N.E.2d 1251, 1264.

Ind.App.2008. Quot. in cases quot. in sup. Two African-American restaurant patrons sued restaurant and its employee for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that, because of employee's false report that one patron had pulled out a gun at the restaurant, police detained them on their knees at gunpoint for more than an hour and a half while family members and neighbors watched. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. Reversing and remanding for trial, this court held, inter alia, that genuine issues of fact remained as to whether employee's conduct was extreme and outrageous and whether he acted intentionally or recklessly. The court declined to hold that the filing of a false report could never amount to extreme or outrageous conduct as a matter of law. Williams v. Tharp, 889 N.E.2d 870, 879.

Ind.App.2005. Quot. in case quot. in disc. Dog owner whose dog died after being attacked by neighbors' German shepherd dog sued neighbors for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted defendants' motion for partial summary judgment. This court affirmed in part, holding, inter alia, that defendants' habit of letting their German shepherd run unleashed in violation of community dog-control guidelines did not constitute sufficiently outrageous behavior necessary to sustain a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, since this behavior, while negligent to some extent, was not so extreme as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency. Moreover, the record did not support a reasonable inference that defendants intended to cause plaintiff emotional distress by their conduct. Lachenman v. Stice, 838 N.E.2d 451, 456, 457.

Ind.App.2002. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. After pastor's wife was injured in a car accident, insurer hired detective agency to conduct surveillance to confirm her disability determination. When insurer denied disability benefits based on agency investigator's videotape of wife as she played piano in front of the congregation, pastor and wife sued detective agency for invasion of privacy and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Trial court granted agency summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that agency's act of videotaping plaintiffs during church worship services was not extreme and outrageous conduct. Agency videotaped wife pursuant to a routine investigation to uncover possible insurance fraud; given the nature of investigation, it was necessary to use covert surveillance procedures. Creel v. I.C.E. & Associates, Inc., 771 N.E.2d 1276, 1282.

Ind.App.2002. Quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. Estranged husband sued late wife's guardian for wrongful interment and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that guardian precluded him from attending the funeral and wrongfully authorized the interment. Trial court entered judgment on jury verdict for plaintiff. This court reversed, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's emotional-distress claim failed because defendant did not engage in extreme and outrageous conduct. Although plaintiff anticipated to be ejected or arrested had he elected to attend the funeral, he did not in fact attempt to do so. Plaintiff's testimony as to expectable conduct by defendant upon his appearance at the funeral was merely speculative. Inlow v. Wilkerson, 774 N.E.2d 51, 55, 57.

Ind.App.2002. Cit. but dist. Patient who underwent therapy for voyeurism sued counselors for malpractice, fraud, and outrage based on conversations counselors had with patient's employer. Trial court denied patient's motion for attorney's fees and granted counselors' motion for summary judgment. Affirming in part, court of appeals held, inter alia, that patient could not recover for outrage where counselors' conversations with employer were made at patient's request and were motivated by concern for his well-being rather than intent to harm patient. Munsell v. Hambright, 776 N.E.2d 1272, 1280.

Ind.App.2002. Quot. in case quot. but dist. Disabled employee sued former employer for disability discrimination, retaliatory discharge, and emotional distress. Trial court denied employer's motion for summary judgment. Reversing and remanding, court of appeals held that employee failed to show that employer's termination of employee for fighting was a pretext, and employee could not recover for intentional infliction of emotional distress because employer's firing him pursuant to disciplinary policy was not extreme and outrageous conduct. Powdertech, Inc. v. Joganic, 776 N.E.2d 1251, 1264.

Ind.App.2001. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Mechanic and his wife sued employer, a coemployee, and a supervisor for libel, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and invasion of privacy, after supervisor took a photo of coemployee posing in a sexually suggestive position next to plaintiff, who was sleeping in the employee break room. Trial court denied defendants' motion for summary judgment on the emotional-distress claim. This court reversed in part, holding, inter alia, that plaintiffs' emotional-distress claim failed, because there was no dispute that defendants did not intend to harm plaintiff. Defendants testified that the picture was a practical joke and that they did not intend to hurt or humiliate plaintiff. Branham v. Celadon Trucking Services, Inc., 744 N.E.2d 514, 523.

Ind.App.1999. Cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (i) quot. in ftn. Former employee sued supervisor for tortious interference with her business relationship with employer and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered summary judgment for defendant. Reversing and remanding, this court held that plaintiff could maintain an action for tortious interference even though she was an at-will employee, that plaintiff was not required to show that defendant acted illegally, that material factual issues existed as to whether defendant's actions were justified as actions taken in the scope of her employment, and that questions remained as to whether defendant's inquiries into plaintiff's personal life and alleged misrepresentations about plaintiff's job security amounted to extreme and outrageous conduct. Bradley v. Hall, 720 N.E.2d 747, 752.

Ind.App.1998. Quot. in case quot. in disc. Seven-year-old boy was injured when he became entangled in fence at city playground; his family brought tort action against city, seeking damages for the harm they sustained in witnessing the accident. The trial court granted city's motion for judgment on the pleadings. Affirming, this court held that, to the extent family members alleged that boy was the victim of an assault resulting in emotional distress to them, the complaint failed to state a claim on which relief could be granted. Rivera ex rel. Rivera v. City of Nappanee, 704 N.E.2d 131, 133.

Ind.App.1997. Cit. in headnote, quot. in case quot. in disc. After a deceased man's daughter sued the deceased's second wife for exerting undue influence over the deceased, the second wife disinterred the deceased's remains and removed the headstone from his grave. The daughter and other family members then sued the second wife for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. Trial court awarded plaintiffs damages. This court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded, holding, inter alia, that there was sufficient evidence to support trial court's judgment that defendant intentionally committed extreme and outrageous conduct and that such conduct caused plaintiffs severe emotional distress. Defendant disinterred the deceased's remains and removed the headstone, even though she knew that the deceased's family members customarily decorated the deceased's grave on Memorial Day. When the family members arrived at the grave site, they suffered extreme emotional trauma when they discovered the grave had been desecrated.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

The daughter also suffered emotional distress when she was informed that the grave had been desecrated. Mitchell v. Stevenson, 677 N.E.2d 551, 554, 563.

Ind.App.1996. Cit. in headnotes, quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. Deputy sheriff who was suspected, but later acquitted, of switching price tags on store merchandise sued sheriff, among others, for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted sheriff's motion for summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that sheriff did not engage in extreme and outrageous conduct when he issued arrest and search warrants for deputy, detailed the misconduct during a press conference, and attempted to deny deputy his pension. Conwell v. Beatty, 667 N.E.2d 768, 770, 775-776, 777.

Ind.App.1996. Cit. in headnotes, quot. and adopted in case quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc., appendix cit. in disc. Couple that agreed to pay contractor $80,000 to build their new home sued contractor for fraud after they discovered that the final cost of the house was going to exceed $120,000. Couple also asserted a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against contractor's wife in connection with threatening phone calls she made to couple. The trial court granted defendants' motions for summary judgment. Affirming in part and reversing in part, this court held that the corporate veil of contractor's construction company did not insulate him from liability for fraud where he personally participated in the alleged misconduct, but that summary judgment was properly entered for wife, as the phone calls, while unreasonable, did not constitute outrageous conduct. Gable v. Curtis, 673 N.E.2d 805, 809-810.

Ind.App.1996. Cit. in headnote, quot. in case quot. in disc. Former employee who alleged that, after he was terminated, his former employer prevented him from pursuing his rights under his union's collective-bargaining agreement sued employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted employer's motion for summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that employee's claim was preempted by § 301 of the Labor Management Relations Act because resolution required interpretation of the collective-bargaining agreement. Short v. Haywood Printing Co., Inc., 667 N.E.2d 209, 210, 214.

Ind.App.1994. Subsec. (1) quot. generally in case quot. in sup. Husband and wife sued wife's former husband and hospital for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, after hospital released to former husband plaintiff husband's mental-health records. This court affirmed the trial court's granting of summary judgment to hospital, since hospital complied with what it reasonably believed was a valid subpoena duces tecum. The court, however, reversed and remanded the trial court's granting of summary judgment to former husband, stating that a genuine issue of material fact remained concerning former husband's intent to harm plaintiff husband emotionally, noting both the level of animosity between former and current husband and the undisputed evidence that former husband referred to plaintiff husband's mental-health condition in court proceedings where plaintiff's mental health was irrelevant. Watters v. Dinn, 633 N.E.2d 280, 292.

Iowa,

Iowa, 2019. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee of state department of public safety sued state and others for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with his termination. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. Affirming in part, this court held that defendants' alleged behavior did not rise to the level of outrageous conduct necessary to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court pointed out that plaintiff's allegations—that defendants deliberately endangered lives by sending representatives to his house to place him on administrative leave, and that his supervisors repeated known falsehoods regarding his threat to public safety to the governor with the knowledge that the governor would broadcast those falsehoods—was not substantial evidence of conduct so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious, and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Hedlund v. State, 930 N.W.2d 707, 724.

Iowa, 2014. Coms. (e), (h), and (j) quot. in sup. Former state-university employee sued university and state for intentional infliction of emotional distress and other claims, alleging that his supervisor engaged in outrageous, retaliatory conduct against him over a substantial period of time in an attempt to cover up her own theft from university. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for employee. The court of appeals affirmed as to employee's emotional-distress claim. Affirming that portion of the decision, this court, citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, held that there was sufficient evidence that defendants engaged in outrageous conduct and that plaintiff suffered from severe or extreme distress to submit employee's claim to the jury. The court reasoned that the conduct here constituted unremitting psychological warfare that exceeded a deliberate campaign to badger and harass employee and crossed the line into outrageous conduct; moreover, employee experienced mental trauma over an extended period of time, substantiated by a psychologist, which manifested itself physically in symptoms such as insomnia, light-headedness, nausea, and weight loss. Smith v. Iowa State University of Science and Technology, 851 N.W.2d 1, 26, 29, 30.

Iowa, 2013. Com. (b) cit. in case quot. in diss. op. Ecuadorian clients sued attorney for legal malpractice after their I-601 applications for permission to enter the United States were denied and they were barred from readmission to the country for 10 years. The trial court granted attorney's motion for a directed verdict on clients' claims for emotional-distress damages. The court of appeals reversed that portion of the decision and remanded. Affirming, this court held that clients' claim for emotional-distress damages was viable, because an attorney-client relationship in the immigration context was the type of relationship in which negligent conduct was especially likely to cause severe emotional distress. The dissent argued that there were sound policy reasons against opening the door wider to claims for negligently caused pure emotional harm, even when it was foreseeable, including avoiding fictitious or trivial claims, the difficulty of establishing or disproving the nature and extent of the alleged mental injury, and limiting liability. Miranda v. Said, 836 N.W.2d 8, 40.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Iowa

Iowa, 1996. Com. (d) cit. in case cit. in sup. University faculty member who was denied tenure sued the dean of the university for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming the trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendant, this court held, inter alia, that defendant's conduct in a meeting with plaintiff in his office, during which defendant allegedly lost his temper, began yelling at plaintiff in a sexist and condescending manner, referred to her as a "young woman," and accused her of causing trouble and "making my life difficult," did not rise to the level of outrageous behavior necessary to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Iowa law. Taggart v. Drake University, 549 N.W.2d 796, 802.

Iowa, 1996. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. and cit. generally in headnote. A discharged police officer sued the city and others alleging, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiff alleged that the police chief had assured him that, if he pled guilty to obstruction-of-justice charges against him, he would retain his job, subject to a 30-day suspension. He further alleged that he relied on the chief's assurance to his detriment by submitting guilty and nolo contendere pleas instead of going to trial as he initially planned. Trial court granted defendants' motion to dismiss. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that defendants were not liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress because the police chief's actions were not outrageous. Van Baale v. City of Des Moines, 550 N.W.2d 153, 154, 156-157.

Iowa, 1991. Cit. in disc., com. (f) cit. in disc. A lawyer committed suicide shortly after receiving a letter from his law firm informing him of a delay in its decision as to when he could return to work following his hospitalization for severe depression. The decedent's wife sued the firm for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. The trial court granted the firm's motion for summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that the law firm's conduct was not so outrageous as to justify a finding of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court noted that, although the decedent's fragile mental condition was considered in determining whether the conduct was outrageous, the conduct was not extreme, since the letter did not dismiss the decedent but indicated only that there would be a delay in deciding when he could resume working. Cutler v. Klass, Whicher & Mishne, 473 N.W.2d 178, 183.

Iowa, 1991. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. The husband of a patient who suffered a paralyzing stroke while undergoing cardiac bypass surgery sued a cardiologist for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that the cardiologist's approach in explaining the patient's severe brain damage and the prospect that she would never regain consciousness caused him severe emotional distress. The trial court directed a verdict for the defendant, finding insufficient evidence to submit the claim to the jury. Affirming, this court held that the plaintiff's testimony of feeling upset and confused by the cardiologist's advice to "unplug" the patient and his advice that the plaintiff would be broke after three months of trying to keep the patient alive fell far short of proof necessary to sustain a prima facie case for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Tappe v. Iowa Methodist Medical Center, 477 N.W.2d 396, 404.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Iowa, 1990. Com. (d) cit. in sup. Plaintiffs recovered a judgment against an electric cooperative association for damages that resulted when an electrical fire, caused by an imbalance in electrical voltage delivered to plaintiffs' property, destroyed their hog farrowing facility and livestock. They appealed, contending that the trial court erred in excluding evidence of lost profits and in failing to allow a claim for emotional distress. Affirming in part, this court held that the trial court correctly determined that plaintiffs' complaint did not allege conduct so extreme and outrageous as to permit a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court reversed in part and remanded for retrial on the damage issue, holding that plaintiffs should have been permitted to submit evidence of lost profits. Mills v. Guthrie County Rural Elec., 454 N.W.2d 846, 850.

Iowa, 1990. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (e) cit. in disc. An employee who left his job after receiving constant verbal abuse from his supervisor sued his employer for religious discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Following a bench trial, the trial court entered judgment for the employee on both counts. Reversing in part and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that the employer took prompt remedial action to rectify the abuse and was not liable for religious harassment, and that there was insufficient evidence to raise a jury question of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court did not decide whether the supervisor's conduct of making anti-Catholic statements was sufficiently outrageous to be actionable, stating that the plaintiff's complaints of being upset, grouchy, and nervous were insufficient to warrant a finding of severe emotional distress. Further, the causal relation between the defendant's conduct and the plaintiff's physical symptoms of weight loss and colitis was not within the common experience of a jury and required expert testimony. Vaughn v. Ag Processing, Inc., 459 N.W.2d 627, 636.

Iowa, 1989. Cit. in disc., cit. but dist., com. (d) cit. in case cit. in disc., com. (j) cit. in disc. A discharged employee sued her former employer, alleging damages for retaliatory discharge and emotional distress after she was diagnosed as suffering from a work-related skin rash and was terminated. The trial court awarded judgment on a jury verdict for the employee on the ground that she was discharged because of her threat to institute a workers' compensation claim. Affirming, this court held that the evidence supported the verdict on the wrongful discharge claim and that emotional distress damages were recoverable. The court stated that it knew of no logical reason why a wrongfully discharged employee's damages should be limited to out-of-pocket loss of income when the employee also suffered causally connected emotional harm. It also determined that the plaintiff was not required to prove that the emotional distress was severe. Niblo v. Parr Mfg., Inc., 445 N.W.2d 351, 353, 356, 357.

Iowa, 1987. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. A farmer sued the seller of a tractor he purchased and the holder of the security interest in the tractor for abuse of process and intentional infliction of emotional distress, after a criminal case was brought against him in connection with an outstanding balance on the tractor. The trial court directed verdicts for the defendants, and the intermediate appellate court reversed and remanded for a new trial. Vacating the judgment of the intermediate appellate court and affirming the judgment of the trial court, this court held that there was no evidence that the defendants misused legal process to collect the debt. The court further held that outrageous conduct on the part of the defendants was not shown to support a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Tomash v. John Deere Indus. Equipment Co., 399 N.W.2d 387, 393.

Iowa, 1986. Cit. in disc. A union sought judicial review of a decision by the state civil rights commission that found the union guilty of racial discrimination against a complainant. The trial court affirmed and ruled that the commission's finding was supported by substantial evidence. Affirming in part and reversing in part, this court upheld the commission's award of emotional distress damages concluding that the union's discriminatory acts were the basis for the victim's emotional distress that necessitated his seeking treatment for headaches. Although the court did not rule on the question of whether a civil rights complainant must show outrageous conduct as required in tort cases to prevail on a claim for emotional distress damages, it noted that some jurisdictions require such a showing and others require a showing that the distress was proximately caused by racial discrimination. Chauffeurs, Local Union No. 238 v. Iowa Civil Rights Com'n, 394 N.W.2d 375, 383.

Iowa, 1986. Subsec. (2)(a) quot. in sup., com. (1) quot. in disc. Minor children and their parents sued a neighbor who had sexually abused the children. The neighbor settled with the children, and the parents sought recovery for expenses of medical treatment of the children arising from the neighbor's conduct and for intentional infliction of mental distress. The trial court granted summary judgment to the neighbor. The state supreme court reversed in part, holding that the parents could recover for their children's medical expenses. The court affirmed in part, holding that the parents could not recover for mental distress because they were not present at the neighbor's assault. The parents became aware of the abuse two months after it occurred and therefore the court relieved the neighbor from liability. H.L.O. by L.E.O. v. Hossle, 381 N.W.2d 641, 644.

Iowa, 1986. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. This suit was brought on behalf of three children who were sexually abused by their mother and her boyfriend. The first claim against the state agency was for negligently delaying the removal of the children from the home of an inadequate and abusive parent. The second claim was for the intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court dismissed the negligence counts against the state but overruled a motion to dismiss the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming, this court held that a question of fact existed as to whether the state agency's failure to remove the children from their mother's home constituted an outrageous act for the purpose of proving intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court noted that outrageous conduct could be proved without showing that such conduct was willful and wanton. M.H. By and Through Callahan v. State, 385 N.W.2d 533, 539.

Iowa, 1986. Subsec. (2)(a) quot. in case cit. in disc. The mother of a hit-and-run victim sued the driver for intentional infliction of emotional distress, based on the driver's failure to stop and report the accident and the subsequent cover-up. The trial court awarded the driver summary judgment.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Affirming, this court held that the elements of geographical nearness and contemporaneous perception were not present to sustain the cause of action. Roberts v. Bruns, 387 N.W.2d 140, 143.

Iowa, 1985. Quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. A bank refused to honor a cashier's check that it had made out to the plaintiff. The plaintiff had obtained the cashier's check by cashing a personal check from a third party who the plaintiff had known lacked sufficient funds to cover the personal check. The plaintiff brought this action for the amount of the check and for compensatory and punitive damages. The jury found for the plaintiff against the bank, and this appeal followed. Finding insufficient evidence of either outrageous conduct or severe emotional distress, this court overturned the plaintiff's claim for damages for mental anguish. Bossuyt v. Osage Farmers Nat. Bank, 360 N.W.2d 769, 776.

Iowa, 1985. Com. (d) quot. in sup. A gas station cashier sued an employer and its area manager for libel and slander, breach of an employment contract, wrongful discharge, and tortious infliction of emotional distress after she was fired due to a company policy that mandated that all workers on a given shift be fired when the cash register was short. The cashier received a form from her employer to give to the unemployment office stating that the employee had been terminated because of "unexplained shortages." The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for the libel, slander, and emotional distress claims and dismissed the claims for wrongful discharge and breach of employment contract. All of the parties appealed. This court reversed on the libel, slander, and emotional distress claims, and affirmed the dismissal of the wrongful discharge and breach of employment contract claims, holding that the form supplied to the employment office was absolutely privileged under an Iowa statute, and that the defendant's conduct was not sufficiently outrageous to sustain the emotional distress claim. Haldeman v. Total Petroleum, Inc., 376 N.W.2d 98, 104-105.

Iowa, 1985. Cit. in disc., subsec. (1) cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. An employee brought an action against his employer, alleging wrongful discharge and tortious infliction of emotional distress resulting from his termination. The employee claimed that his termination was due to his treatment for alcoholism and that his supervisor yelled at him and accused him of misconduct. His employer contended that the termination was based on poor job performance. The trial court entered summary judgment for the employer. This court affirmed, holding that the supervisor's conduct was not so extreme as to satisfy the element of outrageous conduct necessary to an action for tortious infliction of emotional distress. Northrup v. Farmland Industries, Inc., 372 N.W.2d 193, 197, 198, 199.

Iowa, 1985. Com. (d) quot. in sup. An employee sued a bank, a bank director, and others for intentional infliction of emotional distress, slander, intentional interference with his employment contract, wrongful discharge, and breach of an option contract. The trial court dismissed all claims due to insufficient evidence, and the state supreme court affirmed. The bank's relocation of the employee, at the director's instigation, from a branch office close to his home where he had worked for six weeks, back to the main office out of which he had previously worked for 17 years, did not constitute such outrageous conduct as to support a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court also held that the director's conduct in forcing plaintiff's office relocation did not constitute intentional interference with plaintiff's employment contract. Because plaintiff had no contractual right to remain in the branch office, his transfer was not a breach of his contract with the bank, and without a breach between the two parties there was no tort of intentional interference with contract. Reihmann v. Foerstner, 375 N.W.2d 677, 681.

Iowa, 1984. Com. (j) quot. in part in sup., coms. (h) and (j) cit. in sup. Farmers gave their neighbor permission to use their field as a path as long as the ground was frozen. Although the neighbor informed his buyer of that condition, the buyer's employee drove across the field when it was no longer frozen, thereby damaging the land. This court remanded the case for a substituted judgment setting aside the verdicts for compensatory and punitive damages for emotional distress and the award of attorney fees, and reinstated the verdict for damages for trespass. This court held that the record lacked substantial evidence that the farmers suffered distress so severe that a reasonable man could not be expected to endure it. The issue of intentional infliction of emotional distress, therefore, should not have been submitted to the jury. Bethards v. Shivvers, Inc., 355 N.W.2d 39, 44.

Iowa, 1984. Subsec. (1) cit. in disc., com. (d) cit. in disc. The plaintiff brought an action for breach of contract and intentional infliction of emotional distress after the defendant bank refused to lend him money. The jury found for the plaintiff. On appeal, the defendant claimed that an agreement to lend the plaintiff $25,000 lacked consideration, as more consideration than a promise to pay was required to support a promise to lend money. This court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. First, the court found that an offer and acceptance existed when the bank promised to lend and plaintiff executed the note. The court held that performance on the part of the plaintiff was sufficient consideration. As to the emotional distress claim, the court held that the bank's breach of contract did not approach the requisite standard of outrageousness necessary to find liability. Harsha v. State Sav. Bank, 346 N.W.2d 791, 801.

Iowa, 1984. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (e) quot. in sup. The defendant employed the plaintiff as a school bus driver. The plaintiff recorded her actual time and questioned breakdown pay and the granting of extra runs by seniority. The defendant reduced the plaintiff's route time, suspended her, and then fired her for falsifying time cards. The trial court found for the plaintiff in her suit for defamation and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court affirmed in part but reversed the judgment based on intentional infliction of emotional distress. It held that, despite the defendant's position of authority over the plaintiff, the defendant's conduct was not so extreme and outrageous as to be considered atrocious. Vinson v. Linn-Mar Community School Dist., 360 N.W.2d 108, 118.

Iowa, 1983. Subsec. (1) cit. in disc. The plaintiff brought this action against a United States corporation and a Saudi Arabian partnership alleging breach of an employment contract, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and use of malicious threats. The trial court directed verdicts on the mental distress and malicious threats claims; the jury found for the plaintiff against the partnership alone on the contract claim. The plaintiff appealed; this court reversed in part and ordered a new trial on the malicious threats claim. Citing the Restatement, this court enumerated the elements of the tort of intentional infliction of mental distress and found that the trial record was so incomplete that the plaintiff's appeal must fail because it was insufficiently documented regarding several elements. Powell v. Khodari-Intergreen Co., 334 N.W.2d 127, 129.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Iowa, 1983. Subsec. (1) cit. in sup., coms. (d) and (h) quot. in sup. A husband brought an action for alleged intentional interference with marital conciliation and intentional infliction of emotional distress against an individual who proposed to his wife while she was still married to the husband but was planning a divorce. The trial court entered summary judgment for the defendant, and the husband appealed. This court affirmed, holding that there was no independent tort action for damages for interference with conciliation, and the defendant's conduct was not so outrageous as to constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress. Roalson v. Chaney, 334 N.W.2d 754, 756.

Iowa, 1983. Cit. in sup. In this case the court affirmed the trial court's order overruling defendant's motion to dismiss a claim alleging intentional infliction of physical and emotional distress caused by the defendant's seduction of plaintiff's former husband, the basis for defendant's motion being that the court had abolished the claim of alienation of affections. The court noted that the elements of the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress and some of its policy considerations are different from those in an alienation claim. "We cannot conclude as a matter of law that no facts are conceivable under which a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress could be maintained merely because it, like alienation claims, arises out of a failed marital relationship. Whether such facts are present is more appropriately resolved upon presentation of evidence through summary judgment, * * * or by trial." Van Meter v. Van Meter, 328 N.W.2d 497, 498.

Iowa, 1981. Cit. in sup., coms. (h), (j) and (k) cit. in sup. and com. (j) quot. in part in sup. The plaintiffs needed a large sum of money in order to buy two businesses but were unable to procure a bank loan. The defendant signed a bank note in order to allow the plaintiffs to obtain the money. The parties continued their relationship, the defendant was comaker on another note, they became co-owners and purchased additional land together. Eventually, the business relationship deteriorated so the plaintiffs sold their interest in the business to the defendant. The plaintiffs then sued, inter alia, for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The defendant appealed from a jury verdict in favor of the plaintiffs. The defendant argued on appeal that the evidence was insufficient for the claim to go to the jury because the plaintiffs had not shown that the defendant's conduct was outrageous or that the plaintiffs' distress was severe and extreme. This court stated that the plaintiff needed to show that the defendant had intentionally caused or recklessly disregarded the probability of causing emotional distress and that the defendant's outrageous conduct was the actual and proximate cause of the plaintiffs' emotional distress. This court stated that although emotional distress includes all highly unpleasant mental reactions, it is only when the reaction is extreme, whether physical or emotional, that the plaintiff is entitled to compensation. In some cases, the outrageousness of the defendant's conduct may be enough evidence that the distress was severe. In this case, the court found that the plaintiff had not carried his burden of showing severe and extreme emotional distress. The court stated that more evidence is necessary than that the plaintiff felt badly for a month and evidence was needed to show distress during the relationship.

This court held therefore that the lower court erred by submitting the plaintiffs' claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress to the jury. Paulsen v. Russell, 300 N.W.2d 289, 297.

Iowa, 1977. Cit. coms. (d) and (f). This was an action for damages resulting from injury to plaintiff's business as a result of defendant's alleged tortious debt collection practices. Plaintiff appealed after the lower court had announced its intention to dismiss the case against one defendant and after a jury verdict was returned for the other defendant. There was no recorded judgment upon the jury verdict. In dismissing the appeal, the court held that, as there was absent a final judgment on the direct verdict and as there was no record of the jury verdict, it had no jurisdiction to entertain the appeal even though defendant had not moved for a dismissal. DeKruyff v. Johnston, 252 N.W.2d 389, 390.

Iowa, 1977. Cit. in disc. and com. (f) cit. in disc. Plaintiff, a borderline mental retardate, worked as a maintenance man in defendant's store. Plaintiff "borrowed" defendant's floor scrubber to moonlight by cleaning tavern floors. He also took cleaning materials for the scrubber. A security officer of defendant interrogated plaintiff, threatened plaintiff with jail, and had plaintiff sign several statements concerning the use of the scrubber and the cleaning materials, sign a confession to the theft of store merchandise worth $5000, and sign a promissory note to defendant store for $5000. A clinical psychologist testified that some of the words were beyond plaintiff's comprehension, and plaintiff testified that he signed documents under threat of jail. Plaintiff also testified as to mental anguish from the incident, and that he had recurring dreams which affected his relationship with his family. The trial court overruled a motion for a directed verdict by defendant, and the jury found for plaintiff. Defendant moved for a judgment n.o.v. and also for a new trial. The motion for a new trial was sustained, and plaintiff appealed. The issue before the court was that plaintiff did not predicate his claim on a common law tort, but rather on a criminal statute on malicious threats. The court held that this statute does give rise to a civil cause of action, that plaintiff's execution of the statements under compulsion and duress is a recognized common law defense to an action on a note between the original parties. Therefore, the trial court should have overruled defendant's motion for a new trial, and this court returned the case for reinstatement of the verdict and the judgment thereon. Hall v. Montgomery Ward & Co., 252 N.W.2d 421, 425.

Iowa, 1976. Com. (d) quot. in part and cit. in disc., com. (i) cit. in disc. Action against a mortician for mental distress suffered by plaintiff as a result of defendant's manner of dealing with plaintiff's deceased father's burial. For plaintiff to recover, he must show outrageous conduct by defendant evidencing intent to cause, or reckless disregard of the probability of causing, emotional distress. On appeal from summary judgment for defendant, the court held that it was for a jury to determine if defendant's conduct were "outrageous." Meyer v. Nottger, 241 N.W.2d 911, 918.

Iowa, 1972. Subsec. (1) cit. but dist. The court held that an insured did not state a cause of action for intentional infliction of severe emotional distress in an action brought against his insurer for failure to pay a fire loss claim, because there was no hint of "conduct exceeding all bounds usually tolerated by society" where the insurer waited a reasonable period for an arson investigation and where the amount of loss was unknown both to the insurer and the insured. Amdsen v. Grinnell Mutual Reinsurance Co., 203 N.W.2d 252, 255.

Iowa, 1970. Quot. but dist. illus. 7, 15, 16 cit. in sup. Lender sued Borrowers on a note; defendants answered and filed a counterclaim for damages for mental anguish, malicious harassment, and invasion of privacy. Defendants appealed from a judgment for plaintiff and a dismissal of their counterclaim seeking $15,000 for credit harassment. The court affirmed. It held that it was not an abuse of discretion to deny a jury trial to defendants when the request did not comply with the pertinent procedural rule; nor to overrule their objections to plaintiff's Certificate of Readiness (to try all issues). Since no discovery procedures were attempted and prohibited there was no justiciable issue. On the merits, the court held that plaintiff's failure to furnish a copy of defendants' reaffirmation of their obligation (after discharge in bankruptcy) did not render the note unenforceable because the debt was merely revived and the suit was based on the original obligation. The court also decided the public interest would be best served by denying the defendants a remedy for the plaintiff's failure to furnish receipts. The court ruled that, as in written agreement, the defendants were obligated on the unpaid balance, plus interest, calculated at original terms. It thereby dismissed the defendants' counterclaim for overpayment, based on principal only. The discharge in bankruptcy of the husband did not discharge the wife, who remained liable as a comaker of the loan. Finally the court dismissed the counterclaim for mental anguish and invasion of privacy because the evidence did not require a finding that plaintiff's conduct in requesting payment willfully or intentionally sought to cause mental anguish, and telephoning the wife at her place of employment was not an invasion of privacy as a matter of law. Beneficial Finance Co. of Waterloo v. Lamos, 179 N.W.2d 573, 582.

Iowa App.

Iowa App.1996. Cit. in headnote, cit. in disc., subsec. (1) cit. in disc. Daughter of nursing-home resident who committed suicide sued nursing home for loss of parental consortium and for tortious infliction of emotional distress. The trial court directed a verdict for defendant on the issue of emotional distress but submitted the claim for loss of consortium to the jury, which found in plaintiff's favor and awarded her $400,000 in damages. After ordering a remittitur to $100,000, the trial court entered judgment accordingly. Affirming and remanding, this court held that statements made by defendant's employees concerning decedent's suicide, although careless, were not outrageous, and that the trial court did not abuse its discretion by ordering the remittitur. Lamb v. Newton-Livingston Inc., 551 N.W.2d 333, 334, 338.

Iowa App.1995. Cit. in headnotes, com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Demolition experts who alleged they were exposed to asbestos while demolishing a building sued their employer and the owner of the building for negligence and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted defendants' motions for summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that plaintiffs, who were unable to show they presently suffered any effects of asbestos exposure, were limited to bringing their claims under the state workers' compensation law. Furthermore, plaintiffs failed to prove that defendants acted outrageously, atrociously, or in a manner intolerable to a civilized society, causing plaintiffs severe emotional distress. Slaymaker v. Archer-Daniels-Midland Co., 540 N.W.2d 459, 459-461.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Iowa App.1993. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. A nurse sued her hospital and supervisor for sexual harassment and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming trial court's dismissal of the action, this court held that, as substantial evidence supported the finding that the nurse had not been subjected to sexual harassment, the nurse had not satisfied her burden of proof with regard to her emotional distress claim. The court stated that the supervisor never made any sexual overtures to the nurse and did not discuss sexual matters with her. Edmunds v. Mercy Hosp., Cedar Rapids, 503 N.W.2d 877, 880.

Iowa App.1989. Com. (d) cit. in disc. and quot. in sup. A hospital employee was transferred within departments, suspended, and finally dismissed after his supervisor continually received complaints from his co-workers that his performance was substandard. The employee sued the hospital, claiming he suffered emotional distress as a result of the defendant's harassment. The trial court entered judgment for the plaintiff based on a jury verdict awarding him actual and punitive damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Reversing, this court held, inter alia, that the plaintiff presented insufficient evidence of outrageous conduct to create a jury question on the emotional distress claim. The court found no extensive scheme of harassment and noted testimony that the transfer and eventual dismissal of the plaintiff was necessary to protect the patients as the plaintiff was making numerous errors in conducting laboratory tests. McClinton v. Iowa Methodist Med. Center, 444 N.W.2d 511, 512, 514.

Iowa App.1987. Com. (h) quot. in diss. op. A husband sued his wife's dentist for intentional infliction of emotional distress after the dentist had an affair with plaintiff's wife. When the suit was dismissed, the plaintiff's attorney failed to file a timely appeal. The plaintiff sued the attorney for malpractice, but the trial court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment. Affirming, the majority of this court held that the plaintiff's underlying cause of action would not have been successful because the dentist's conduct was not outrageous as a matter of law; therefore, the attorney was not liable even if his conduct was negligent. The dissent argued that reasonable members of a jury could find that the dentist's conduct as a professional had been sufficiently extreme and outrageous to result in liability. Kunau v. Pillers, Pillers & Pillers, P.C., 404 N.W.2d 573, 580.

Iowa App.1984. Cit. in cases cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc., coms. (d) and (g) cit. in diss. op. Employee sued former supervisors for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendants' unmerciful harassment after arbitration of a grievance caused his psychiatric illness. This court reversed the trial court's grant of judgment n.o.v. The court held that while the individual acts alleged might be merely insulting, the jury could properly conclude that all the incidents together amounted to a course of conduct exceeding all bounds usually tolerated by decent society. The dissent argued that defendants' conduct did not meet the legal test for outrageousness, and that the conduct was privileged because defendants believed they were furthering the interests of their employer in a legal way. Blong v. Snyder, 361 N.W.2d 312, 316, 318.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Iowa App.1982. Coms. (j) and (k) cit. in case quot. in disc. A homeowner brought suit against a manufacturer of prebuilt homes to recover damages due to the defendant's alleged use of defective materials in the construction of the plaintiff's home. The plaintiff also sought damages for mental anguish and emotional distress as a result of the defendant's alleged negligence. The defendant then filed a cross-petition against a third-party defendant, seeking indemnification. The trial court entered judgment for the plaintiff and also for the defendant on its indemnity claim. On appeal, the defendant argued that the plaintiff failed to prove by substantial evidence the elements of intentional infliction of emotional distress. After a review of the plaintiff's evidence, this court concluded that there was substantial evidence the the plaintiff suffered extreme emotional distress proximately caused by the defendant's conduct. Therefore, the court affirmed in part, holding that the trial court did not err in submitting this issue to the jury. The judgment against the third-party defendant was reversed another grounds. Randa v. U.S. Homes, Inc., 325 N.W.2d 905, 908.

Kan.

Kan.2010. Com. (g) quot. in sup., com. (j) cit. in sup. After television station incorrectly reported that arrestee was being held as a suspect in a serial-murder investigation, arrestee brought a claim for the tort of outrage, inter alia, against television station's owner and news director. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiff on the claim. Reversing as to this portion of the judgment, this court held that plaintiff failed to present sufficient evidence to prove that the injury he suffered was extreme within the context of this action for outrage; elevated fright, continuing concern, embarrassment, worry, and nervousness did not by themselves constitute sufficient harm to warrant an award of damages for outrage. The court noted that plaintiff's testimony also did not attempt to separate the anxiety suffered as a result of legitimate, constitutionally protected news reporting from any distress caused by defendants' alleged unprivileged conduct. Valadez v. Emmis Communications, 290 Kan. 472, 229 P.3d 389, 394, 395.

Kan.2004. Cit. in case cit. in disc., com. (b) quot. in disc. After hospital employee obtained consent from deceased patient's purported common-law wife to harvest his organs and tissues, patient's daughters brought suit in federal district court against hospital for intentional infliction of emotional distress and outrage, inter alia. Plaintiffs filed their suit 21 months after patient's death. Answering a certified question, this court determined that the statute of limitations on a claim of outrage and intentional infliction of emotional distress was two years. The court rejected defendant's argument that, since the tort of outrage had roots in the common-law tort of assault, it should have the same one-year statute of limitations as the tort of assault. Hallam v. Mercy Health Center of Manhattan, Inc., 278 Kan. 339, 97 P.3d 492, 496.

Kan.1991. Cit. generally in case quot. in sup., subsec. (1) cit. in sup. and cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. and quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (j) cit. and quot. in sup., com. (k) quot.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

in sup. A former employee and her husband sued her former employer for assault, battery, false imprisonment, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that the former employer refused to pay the former employee, shoved her, locked her in a building, and filed intentionally false police reports against her and her husband, and induced an employee to lie to the police about the plaintiffs' alleged involvement in vandalism. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for the plaintiffs, but the intermediate appellate court reversed. Reversing the appellate court's decision and affirming the trial court, this court held, inter alia, that reasonable people could regard the defendant's abuse of the criminal justice process as atrocious and utterly intolerable behavior, and that the enormity of the outrage created by the former employer's conduct was sufficient to satisfy the requirement of severe and extreme emotional distress for the tort of outrage. Taiwo v. Vu, 249 Kan. 585, 822 P.2d 1024, 1028-1031.

Kan.1986. Subsec. (1) quot. in case cit. in disc. Following her son's death, the plaintiff expressed her desire that an autopsy not be performed, even though it was required by law, or at most, the plaintiff consented to a limited autopsy, excluding an examination of the brain. Several weeks after the son's burial, the plaintiff learned that a complete autopsy had been performed, including the brain. The plaintiff sued her son's treating physician for negligent infliction of emotional distress based on interference with a dead body, and sued the state for the outrageous conduct of its employee, the physician who had informed the plaintiff that a state hospital "had her son's brain in a jar." The trial court granted summary judgment for both defendants. This court affirmed, holding that the treating physician was not liable for emotional distress because his interference with the dead body had not been intentional or malicious, but that this defendant was liable for the costs of exhuming the son's body and its reburial because he had assumed a duty of care toward the plaintiff when he took on the responsibility of relaying the mother's request for a partial autopsy to the coroner, and then he breached that duty by failing to convey the request. The court further held that the state was not liable because its employee's conduct in informing the mother that the brain had been autopsied was not sufficiently outrageous or extreme in degree to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Burgess v. Perdue, 239 Kan. 473, 721 P.2d 239, 242.

Kan.1985. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in sup., coms. (f), (h) and (i) cit. in case quot. in sup. Subcontractor and his wife sued prime contractor for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendant's superintendent had attempted to force plaintiffs to pay a debt by falsely informing them that the sheriff was coming to make an arrest. This court reversed the jury verdict for plaintiffs, finding that the defendant's call to plaintiffs' business concerning an insufficient fund check in which defendant had a legitimate interest was not the extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to support the tort of outrage. The court also found that although defendant knew that the wife had recently suffered a miscarriage, his delivery of the message to her in a nonabusive manner was not the equivalent of maliciously giving a disturbing message to a critically ill or mentally unbalanced person. Neufeldt v. L.R. Foy Const. Co., Inc., 236 Kan. 664, 693 P.2d 1194, 1197.

Kan.1983. Quot. in case quot. in sup. A realtor mistakenly informed a class of prospective realtors that the father of a murdered boy was being held as a suspect in the crime, and the father and his wife subsequently sued the realtor and his employer on claims of slander, outrage, defamation of character, and invasion of privacy. After the trial court granted summary judgment to the defendants on all claims, the plaintiffs appealed. This court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court ruled that the realtor was not privileged in making the offending statements, thereby rejecting a trial court finding that the father was a public figure and also rejecting the realtor's contention that the common interest or duty doctrine of qualified privilege was applicable to the facts at hand. The court accordingly reversed the trial court's ruling on the father's claim of slander and remanded for a trial on that issue. The court affirmed the trial court ruling that the plaintiffs had established no claim based on outrageous conduct by the realtor, noting that the statements of the realtor, while improper, were neither beyond all possible bounds of decency nor utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Hanrahan v. Horn, 232 Kan. 531, 657 P.2d 561, 566.

Kan.1983. Com. (d) cit. in sup. The plaintiffs were the parents of a girl who was injured in a car accident. The plaintiffs' daughter and another girl suffered massive head injuries in the accident, and the girls were taken to separate hospitals. A police officer followed the ambulance carrying the other girl to the hospital, and because the wrong purse was sent along, the officer mistakenly deduced that the girl was the plaintiffs' daughter. The plaintiffs were notified, and after their arrival at the hospital they were told by hospital officials that their daughter had died. Shortly thereafter they learned that their daughter, although injured severely, was alive at another hospital. The plaintiffs had both been in poor health and after the incident their conditions deteriorated further. The brought an action against the hospital alleging emotional distress caused by the extreme and outrageous conduct of the hospital in misinforming them as to their daughter's condition. The trial court directed a verdict in favor of the hospital and the plaintiffs appealed. This court affirmed on the grounds that the hospital's conduct had not been so severe and outrageous as to subject it to liability, as it had justifiably relied on the police officer's mistaken identification. Hoard v. Shawnee Mission Medical Ctr., 233 Kan. 267, 662 P.2d 1214, 1223, 1225.

Kan.1981. Subsec. (1) cit. in sup., coms. (f), (h), and (j) cit. in sup. The plaintiff, a hospital patient, brought this action against the defendant doctor in order to recover for the intentional infliction of emotional harm. This suit resulted from an encounter between the plaintiff and the defendant doctor, whom the plaintiff had previously sued and settled with, in a hospital. The plaintiff was being prepared for surgery when the defendant doctor walked over to her and, with a hostile look, shouted, “I don't like you, I don't like you, and I wanted to let you know that before you went in there!” The trial court sustained a motion for summary judgment in favor of the defendant doctor. The intermediate court reversed and remanded this case for trial. This court reversed the intermediate court's decision and entered summary judgment for the defendant. This court found that the doctor's conduct was neither extreme nor outrageous enough to trigger tort liability, because the defendant doctor's dislike for the plaintiff was no surprise, there was no doctor-patient relationship at the time, and the incident was apparently just a chance encounter. This court also held that the emotional distress suffered by the plaintiff was insufficient to recover upon because the total extent of the plaintiff's distress was only continuing concern and nervousness, and the plaintiff did not suffer an impairment of normal functioning, nor did she require treatment for emotional distress. Roberts v. Saylor, 230 Kan. 289, 637 P.2d 1175, 1179, 1180.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Kan.1980. Cit. in disc. This case, filed in federal court, presented a question to be answered by Kansas law which controlled the substantive legal issues of the case. The question was whether the tort of bad faith was recognized in Kansas. The court stated that bad faith, as an independent tort, was a recent development in law designed to afford an insured a remedy against an insurer. The bad faith tort was designed to rectify the unequal bargaining position of the insured and to recognize the importance of the public interest nature of the insurance industry. Courts which had rejected the bad faith tort argue that contract remedies are sufficient to protect an insured and that the public interest nature of insurance is not a sufficient basis on which to adopt a new tort. Also, many states have enacted statutory penalties against insurers who act in bad faith. Kansas already had the tort of outrage which provided the same protection that the tort of bad faith was designed to provide. A claim by a third party may be a better ground for the new tort, but the question here involved a first party claim. The insurer and the third party are involved in a fiduciary relationship, while the insurer and the first party are involved in an adverse relationship. According to Kansas statutes, insureds are protected from the bad faith of an insurer by legislative remedies. The court found it inappropriate to expand the legislative remedies by judicial decree. The court held that the tort of bad faith was not recognized in Kansas. Spencer v. Aetna Life & Cas. Ins. Co., 227 Kan. 914, 611 P.2d 149, 153.

Kan.1979. Cit. in sup., subsec. (1) quot. in sup., subsec. (2) quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in part in sup. Neighbor appealed from a judgment awarding adjoining landowner's wife damages for emotional distress sustained by the wife upon witnessing a fence line dispute in which the neighbor assaulted her husband. The court held that the conduct of the neighbor consisting of spontaneous verbal outbursts, profane and disparaging, coupled with the assault upon her husband, upon the neighbor's discovery that the husband and another adjoining landowner were fencing part of the neighbor's land in with their own was not extreme and outrageous as a matter of law, and that such conduct was not of the type and nature as would ordinarily cause emotional injury to bystanders, whether or not they were members of family of the person assaulted. Accordingly, the husband and wife failed to show that the neighbor intentionally or recklessly caused the wife severe emotional distress, and the evidence was insufficient, as a matter of law, to establish the wife's claim for intentionally inflicted emotional distress. Wiehe v. Kukal, 225 Kan. 478, 592 P.2d 860, 862, 863.

Kan.1976. Subsec. (1) quot. in disc. Action for damages for invasion of privacy resulting in summary judgment for defendant after discovery was completed. Plaintiff appealed. Defendant bank foreclosed on plaintiff's property for a delinquent loan and bought the house in the foreclosure sale, giving plaintiff a six-month option to redeem. While she was arranging financing, a representative of defendant visited her. When she answered the door, he gave her his business card, entered her front room and sat down. She had not invited him in, but she also did not ask him to leave, and, ultimately, even gave him a tour of the house. He informed her of the difficulty she would have in procuring financing and made her an offer for the house. Subsequent to this visit, plaintiff did secure the necessary money and redeemed the house. Judging the evidence in a light most favorable to plaintiff, the facts failed to disclose actionable invasion of privacy, or conduct sufficiently extreme or outrageous to justify liability for mental distress, and summary judgment was properly granted. Vespa v. Safety Federal Savings and Loan Association, 219 Kan. 578, 549 P.2d 878, 881.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Kan.1975. Subsec. (1) quot. but dist.; com. (d) quot. but dist.; coms. (f)and (h) cit. but dist. Subsec. (1) also quot. in syllabus by the Court. A creditor bank took over the management function of a debtor restaurant operator. A suit arose concerning various claims and counterclaims. The jury found the creditor guilty of debtor harassment and of invading the debtor's privacy. The trial court entered judgment on this verdict, and the creditor appealed. In reversing, the court stated that the creditor's assumption of the management of the debtor's restaurant business was insufficient, as a matter of law, to establish invasion of privacy or debtor harassment constituting outrageous conduct causing severe emotional distress. Dotson v. McLaughlin, 216 Kan. 201, 531 P.2d 1, 2, 7, 8.

Kan.1974. Subsec. (1) quot., and coms. (e), (h), and (f) cit., and fol.The plaintiff debtor sued her creditor for harassment, and a health insurer,which was a subsidiary of the creditor's parent, for refusing to make payments under her policy. The plaintiff alleged that after she became unable to keep up with her loan payments as a result of illness, the insurer failed to pay and the creditor made harassing phone calls to her and her parents. The trial court directed a verdict in favor of the creditor and against the insurer. The appellate court reversed with respect to the creditor and remanded for a new trial, holding that a cause of action for debtor harassment exists if the creditor engages in extreme and outrageous conduct, and that the trial court improperly excluded evidence of the telephone calls made to the plaintiff's parents. Dawson v. Associates Financial Services Co., 215 Kan. 814, 529 P.2d 104, 109, 113.

Kan.App.

Kan.App.2020. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Family members of a party guest who suffered from chronic mental illnesses brought, among other things, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against police officer, alleging that, after defendant had been called to help take guest to a hospital, defendant unjustifiably killed guest when guest approached him in an erratic manner. The trial court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment. This court reversed in part and remanded, holding that the trial court erred in failing to recognize that there were genuine disputes of material fact as to whether defendant had the privilege to use lethal force against guest. The court explained that the unprivileged use of a firearm on a person before his family constituted extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to sustain an IIED claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d. Estate of Randolph v. City of Wichita, 459 P.3d 802, 826.

Kan.App.2013. Com. (j) cit. in sup. Father and twin brother of decedent sued cremation company and its staff, alleging the tort of outrage and other claims related to the temporary loss of decedent's cremated remains. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. Affirming, this court held, among other things, that none of the disputed facts alleged by plaintiffs were material to whether they suffered extreme and severe emotional distress, a required element of their claim of outrage. While father testified that he had seen a psychologist twice following decedent's death, and brother alleged that, after the events occurred with decedent's remains, he suffered from chest pain, discomfort, and crying, and had to increase his heart and sleep medications, none of the claimed injuries rose to the level of extreme or severe distress, and the record did not explicitly show that plaintiffs sought medical treatment or psychological counseling specifically related to defendants' loss of decedent's remains. Dana v. Heartland Management Co., Inc., 301 P.3d 772, 781.

Kan.App.2002. Subsec. (1) adopted in case cit. in disc. Plaintiffs appealed trial court's dismissal of their claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress based on plaintiffs' failure to allege any physical injury. Affirming, the court of appeals held that, since the only exception to the physical-injury requirement in emotional-distress claims required an allegation of willful or wanton conduct, plaintiffs' claim was nothing more than the tort of outrage, an intentional tort barred by the applicable one-year statute of limitations. Curts v. Dillard's, Inc., 30 Kan.App.2d 814, 48 P.3d 681, 682.

Kan.App.1993. Subsec. (1) cit. in disc. Employee who was terminated for allegedly stealing company tools sued former employer for the tort of outrage, inter alia, contending that defendant, acting through its agents and employees, created a climate within the plant that made it impossible for plaintiff to return to work after an arbitrator sustained his grievance and ordered that he be reinstated. Affirming in part the trial court's granting of summary judgment for defendant, this court held, inter alia, that defendant's conduct did not rise to the "extreme" and "outrageous" level necessary to support a cause of action for the tort of outrage. Lindemuth v. Goodyear Tire and Rubber Co., 19 Kan.App.2d 95, 864 P.2d 744, 749.

Kan.App.1982. Subsec. (1) quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (e) cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (f) cit. in case quot. in conc. op. A county employee brought an action against the county and the county commissioner for assault, defamation, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and violation of civil rights arising out of an incident during which the commissioner shouted invectives at the employee for five to fifteen minutes. The district court entered summary judgment for the county and the commissioner. On the question whether summary judgment was appropriate for the assault count, this court held that issues of material fact existed on the issue of whether the commissioner's fist-shaking, pounding on a table, and shouting of invectives at the employee could have put the employee in immediate apprehension of bodily harm. On the question whether summary judgment should have been granted for intentional infliction of emotional distress, the court held that an issue of material fact existed on whether the commissioner's calling the employee a "fucking spic" constituted outrageous conduct. The court affirmed the judgment for the county, but reversed and remanded as to the counts of assault and intentional infliction of emotional distress against the commissioner. The concurrence agreed that the discovery record presented submissible claims for assault and emotional distress. Gomez v. Hug, 7 Kan.App.2d 603, 645 P.2d 916, 920-922, 928.

Kan.App.1979. Cit. in disc. A husband sued the attorney representing his wife in a separate maintenance action and sought to recover damages based on fraud, breach of contract, negligence, outrageous conduct, oppression, intentional infliction of emotional distress and violation of disciplinary rules. The trial court entered summary judgment for the defendant and the plaintiff appealed. The appellate court affirmed and held that no contract had ever existed between the plaintiff and the defendant, nor was promissory estoppel appropriate. Professional negligence by an attorney could not apply to anyone other than his client. The court also ruled that nothing in the record indicated that defendant was aware of any facts which would indicate prior knowledge of the likelihood of harm to the plaintiff, an element necessary for the cause of action of infliction of emotional distress. The court stated that an allegation of oppression could support an award of punitive damages, but only if actual damages were first recoverable. The court added that the plaintiff had failed to prove the necessary elements of fraud. Therefore, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. Young v. Hecht, 3 Kan.App.2d 510, 597 P.2d 682, 687.

Kan.App.1977. Quot. in sup. This was an action for slander and outrage brought against an attorney. Plaintiff's complaint, which alleged that during the course of a heated argument he had been called "nigger" and "bastard," was absent of any allegations of special damages. In affirming summary judgment for defendant, the court held that words of general abuse, regardless of how rule or vexatious, are not slanderous per se and cannot support recovery in a slander action, in the absence of the showing of special damages. Bradshaw v. Swagerty, 1 Kan.App.2d 213, 563 P.2d 511, 514.

Ky.

Ky.2016. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup., adopted in case cit. in sup. Estate of student who committed suicide, allegedly because of persistent bullying at school, brought a wrongful-death action against, among others, school teachers, alleging that they knew or should have known that student was being mistreated and they failed to stop or report the bullying. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. The court of appeals affirmed on grounds that student's suicide was a superseding intervening cause. This court affirmed on other grounds, holding that suicide was not a superseding intervening event barring liability for wrongful death when bullying was shown to be a substantial factor in causing the suicide, but that, here, plaintiff failed to demonstrate that defendants' failure to identify and stop the bullying was the cause-in-fact or proximate cause of student's suicide. The court explained that its recognition of the right of an estate of a suicide victim to seek recompense for bullying was consistent with its adoption of Restatement Second of Torts § 46 for liability for conduct causing severe emotional distress to another. Patton v. Bickford, 529 S.W.3d 717, 734.

Ky.2012. Cit. in disc., subsec. (1) adopted in case quot. in sup. Patient brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against, among others, emergency-room physician who treated her for bleeding during her pregnancy, alleging that, the day after defendant told her that she had miscarried her fetus, and prescribed a contraction-inducing drug, plaintiff learned that she was still pregnant and, five days later, delivered the fetus, which did not survive. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant; the court of appeals affirmed. Affirming, this court held that plaintiff could not maintain her claim for IIED, because the facts of this case presented a classic situation of medical negligence instead. The court noted that there could be only one recovery for emotional distress on the same acts, since such emotional distress would have been caused either as a result of an injury done to the plaintiff physically or by outrageous conduct the purpose of which was to inflict emotional distress, but not by both. Childers v. Geile, 367 S.W.3d 576, 579, 580, 582.

Ky.2012. Cit. in ftn. Client brought a legal-malpractice action against attorney, alleging that attorney failed to file, before the applicable statute of limitations expired, a negligence suit on her behalf against pilot who crashed his airplane into her home. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiff. The court of appeals affirmed in part, but vacated plaintiff's damages for pain and suffering because there was no physical impact. Reversing and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that the physical-impact rule was no longer the threshold standard in Kentucky law for claims involving emotional distress; instead, emotional-distress plaintiffs were required satisfy the elements of a general negligence claim and show, by expert or scientific proof, that the claimed emotional injury was severe or serious. The court noted that, because emotional tranquility was rarely attained and that some degree of emotional harm was an unfortunate reality of living in a modern society, recovery was only permitted when the harm experienced reached a level where a reasonable person would no longer be expected to adequately manage it. Osborne v. Keeney, 399 S.W.3d 1, 17.

Ky.2004. Cit. in disc. and cit. in ftn., subsec. (1) and com. (h) quot. in disc. and cit. in ftn., coms. (d) and (f) cit. in ftn. Store employees who were fired for allegedly violating company policy by eating candy from torn bags removed from store's shelves brought suit against store and supervisor, raising, in part, claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress arising out of the termination proceedings. Trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict in favor of plaintiffs. The court of appeals reversed. Affirming in part, this court held, inter alia, that the "indignities" plaintiffs allegedly suffered as a result of defendant's surveillance and accusations fell short of the extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to support an intentional-infliction-of-emotional-distress claim. Stringer v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 151 S.W.3d 781, 788-792.

Ky.1996. Cit. and cit. generally in disc., adopted in case cit. in sup., cit. generally in treatise quot. in sup., com. (f) quot. in sup. Former employee sued former employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. After 32 years of service, employee was forced to resign and, in exchange for a severance package, was required to interview in another state for a job employer knew to be nonexistent. When employee suffered an emotional breakdown and severe depression as a result of employer's acts, employer placed him under surveillance and provided his disability-insurance carrier with inaccurate information in an effort to persuade insurer to deny coverage. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for employee. Affirming, this court held that employer's conduct, which included deliberate attempts to exploit employee's frail mental condition, was sufficiently outrageous to be considered socially unacceptable. Kroger Co. v. Willgruber, 920 S.W.2d 61, 65, 67.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ky.1994. Cit. in cases cit. and quot. in disc., cit. in sup., coms. (d) and (i) quot. in case quot. in disc. Worker who was exposed to asbestos while removing pipes and ducts from a building's basement sued the building's owner for, inter alia, outrageous conduct causing severe emotional distress. The trial court entered summary judgment for defendant, and the court of appeals affirmed in part. Reversing and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that issues of fact as to whether defendant's failure to warn plaintiff of the presence of asbestos in the building was knowing and reckless precluded summary judgment. Capital Holding Corp. v. Bailey, 873 S.W.2d 187, 191, 195, 196.

Ky.1990. Cit. and quot. in sup., cit. in case cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup., com. (e) cit. in diss. op., com. (f) cit. and quot. in sup. and cit. in diss. op., com. (h) quot. in diss. op. A hospital patient who gave birth to a stillborn fetus sued the hospital for negligence, breach of contract, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted summary judgment for the defendant, on the ground that the acts of the hospital staff were not sufficiently outrageous. The intermediate appellate court reversed and remanded. Reversing and remanding for entry of judgment for the hospital, this court held that although the hospital staff's conduct showed a lack of compassion in failing to respond immediately to the patient's complaints of pain, telling the patient to "shut up," and telling the patient that the baby would be disposed of in the hospital, it was not sufficient to support a claim for the tort of outrageous conduct because there was no evidence that their conduct was intentional, outrageous, or reckless, and there was no evidence that their conduct intentionally or recklessly caused the plaintiff's emotional distress. The dissent argued that a jury should have been given the opportunity to decide whether the hospital staff's conduct before, during, and after the birth of the plaintiff's child was outrageous and whether the hospital staff had knowledge of the plaintiff's susceptibility to emotional distress. Humana of Kentucky, Inc. v. Seitz, 796 S.W.2d 1, 3-5.

Ky.1986. Cit. in sup., cit. in conc. op. A worker sued his employer and its insurer for outrageous conduct leading to emotional distress for having delayed his worker's compensation payments. The trial court awarded the defendants' motion for summary judgment, and the intermediate appellate court reversed. Reversing, this court held that the Workers' Compensation Act provided an exclusive remedy and consequently barred the employee's tort action for separate damages due to the untimely payment of benefits. The concurring opinion argued that there was no cause of action for outrageous conduct because the defendants did not engage in the contemptible conduct necessary to serve as a basis for the cause of action. Zurich Ins. Co. v. Mitchell, 712 S.W.2d 340, 343, 344.

Ky.1984. Cit. in disc., quot. in sup., cit. in diss. op., com. (d) cit. and quot. in diss. op. After husband was indicted for forging weight tickets, husband and wife were allegedly harassed by a fellow coal company employee. Plaintiffs' complaint alleged that defendant had harassed them by CB radio, forced the wife's vehicle into oncoming traffic, and kept her house under surveillance, causing mental anguish that resulted in physical illness. The trial court characterized the suit as a personal injury action and granted defendant a directed verdict based on a one-year statute of limitations. The appellate court affirmed. The supreme court reversed and recognized the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress, after comparing it to invasion of privacy. The court also held that the five-year statute of limitations applied regardless of whether plaintiff suffered resulting physical harm, because the essence of the tort was invasion of the right to be free from emotional distress arising from another's conduct. The dissent opposed the decision to recognize the tort and argued that plaintiffs had not met the required standard of proof. Craft v. Rice, 671 S.W.2d 247, 250-252.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ky.1983. Cit. in disc. An employer appealed from a trial judgment and intermediate appellate affirmance for an employee in a wrongful discharge action. This court affirmed. The employee was injured, and when he returned to work, was assigned duties beyond his capabilities. He sought workers' compensation benefits and was then fired. This court held that, as an exception to the termination-at-will doctrine, an employee fired for seeking workers' compensation benefits had a cause of action for wrongful discharge, dictated by public policy. This court noted that the action should be maintained in tort as another facet of compensation for outrageous conduct and invasion of privacy. Firestone Textile Co. Div. v. Meadows, 666 S.W.2d 730, 733.

Ky.App.

Ky.App.2017. Quot. in disc.; com. (d) quot. in disc. Father and his children, tenants of a rental home, filed, inter alia, claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress and outrage (IIED) against former landlord and rental agent for damages, alleging rental charges in excess of the lease amount and failure to remediate mold exposure, which, among other things, led to the children's treatment for mold exposure that led to and exacerbated respiratory problems. The trial court granted partial summary judgment for defendants on plaintiffs' IIED and outrage claims. This court affirmed, holding that plaintiffs failed to establish an IIED or outrage claim, and noted that plaintiffs did not appeal the trial court's order regarding their IIED and outrage claim. The court pointed to the trial court's reliance on the standard set forth in Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, in which it noted that plaintiffs failed to describe facts evidencing "outrageous and intolerable" conduct. Joiner v. Tran & P Properties, LLC, 526 S.W.3d 94, 99.

Ky.App.2011. Quot. in sup., adopted in case cit. in sup. Former police cadet who resigned after two days of training filed a complaint against the state police and others, claiming, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress arising from sleep deprivation for 24 hours, the use of a word of profanity in her presence, having to drink from a hose, being asked if she wore a sports bra, and having to share a table with a man who had cut himself while shaving. The trial court dismissed. Affirming, this court held, among other things, that while defendants' alleged actions might have been impolite or discourteous, they did not rise to the level of outrageous conduct. Burton v. Kentucky State Police, 341 S.W.3d 589, 594.

Ky.App.2010. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. As part of her action for interference with the exercise of her rights under the federal Family and Medical Leave Act, former employee brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against employer. This court affirmed the trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendant on plaintiff's IIED claim, holding that there was no evidence that defendant intended to cause emotional distress when it terminated plaintiff's employment or that it acted recklessly; plaintiff's wrongful termination alone was insufficient to constitute outrageous conduct sufficient to support a claim for IIED. Highlands Hosp. Corp. v. Preece, 323 S.W.3d 357, 368.

Ky.App.2009. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Employee sued fast-food restaurant chain, her supervisor, and supervisor's fiancé, after an unknown telephone caller who pretended to be a police officer convinced supervisor and fiancé to subject plaintiff to a strip search and sexual assault, as well as other degrading acts, over a three-hour period; supervisor filed a cross-claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against restaurant chain. The trial court, inter alia, entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding supervisor compensatory and punitive damages on her cross-claim. Affirming in part, this court held that the trial court's denial of a directed verdict on supervisor's IIED claim was proper, since the jury's verdict was not so flagrantly against the weight of the evidence as to indicate passion or prejudice; because there was evidence that restaurant chain was aware that the hoax caller had previously targeted many other of its stores, but intentionally failed to inform its managers to protect its image, the court could not rule, as a matter of law, that chain's conduct did not qualify as outrageous. McDonald's Corp. v. Ogborn, 309 S.W.3d 274, 294.

Ky.App.2006. Com. (h) cit. in case cit. in sup. Social Security disability examinee sued examining physician, examining facility, and nonmedical assistant/facility owner for, in part, assault, battery, and outrageous conduct in connection with rough and painful treatment she allegedly received during a physical examination. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. This court affirmed, holding, as to the claim of outrageous conduct, that defendants' alleged actions, including yanking plaintiff's limbs beyond their range of motion, puncturing her skin during a sensory examination, and providing her with an inadequate gown that left her private areas exposed to male assistant's view, could not be reasonably regarded as so extreme and outrageous as to permit recovery. Andrew v. Begley, 203 S.W.3d 165, 173.

Ky.App.2005. Cit. in sup. Employee who was discharged sued former employer for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming the trial court's grant of summary judgment for employer, this court held, inter alia, that employee's emotional-distress claim failed because employer's act of terminating employee did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to sustain the claim, and the embarrassment that employee allegedly suffered as a result of losing his job did not meet the standard of being "substantially more than mere sorrow" required by state law to satisfy the element of severe emotional distress for the claim. Benningfield v. Pettit Environmental, Inc., 183 S.W.3d 567, 572.

Ky.App.2003. Cit. in case cit. and quot. in sup. After county dog warden shot and killed a family dog, dog owners sued warden and county fiscal court members for wrongful destruction of the dog and outrageous conduct causing severe emotional distress. Trial court dismissed plaintiffs' suit. This court affirmed, holding that plaintiffs failed to state an emotional-distress claim, because there was no evidence that warden intended to inflict emotional harm on plaintiffs. Warden did not shoot the dog in plaintiffs' presence, and he had not made positive identification of the dog's owner. Ammon v. Welty, 113 S.W.3d 185, 188.

Ky.App.2001. Subsec. (1) adopted in case quot. in disc. and cit. in ftn. High school student sued teacher for false imprisonment, assault and battery, and outrageous conduct after teacher chained student to a tree as a joke. Trial court directed a verdict for teacher. This court affirmed in part, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's outrageous-conduct claim failed, because plaintiff could not show that teacher's actions were intended only to cause him extreme emotional distress, rather than to merely touch or to deprive him of his liberty. Tort of outrage was intended as a "gap-filler," providing redress for extreme emotional distress where traditional common-law actions did not. Banks v. Fritsch, 39 S.W.3d 474, 480.

Ky.App.2001. Adopted in case cit. in disc., quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup., com. (f) quot. and cit. in sup. Owner of pet horses brought action for intentional infliction of emotional distress against farm owners who had agreed to board horses but sold them for slaughter, then lied to owner about horses' whereabouts. Trial court entered judgment on jury verdict for plaintiff. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff established each of the required elements necessary for liability under tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress: reckless conduct, outrageousness, causation, and severe emotional distress. Burgess v. Taylor, 44 S.W.3d 806, 811-812.

Ky.App.2001. Quot. in sup., cit. in case cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. and quot. in sup. African-American store employee sued store and coemployees for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that he was subjected to extreme racial remarks, verbal abuse, intimidation, and harassment. Trial court granted defendants summary judgment. This court reversed in part and remanded, holding, inter alia, that a jury could find that defendants' conduct was sufficiently extreme and outrageous so as to constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress. If plaintiff was subjected to racial remarks on nearly a daily basis by his coworkers and supervisors for seven years, a jury could find such conduct to be intentional, outrageous, and intolerable. Wilson v. Lowe's Home Center, 75 S.W.3d 229, 237, 238.

Ky.App.1999. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in sup. In same-sex "hostile work environment" sexual-harassment action, employee sued supervisor for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiff. Affirming, this court held, in part, that the conduct complained of, which included calling plaintiff sexually explicit names, making lewd comments, and requesting oral sex, was sufficiently extreme and outrageous as to give rise to a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Brewer v. Hillard, 15 S.W.3d 1, 6, 7.

Ky.App.1993. Cit. in case quot. in disc. Workers' compensation claimant brought tort action against carrier for malicious, fraudulent, and oppressive conduct, bad-faith denial of claim, and engaging in unfair, false, misleading or deceptive acts in violation of state statutory law after carrier refused to pay for questionable back surgery and stopped claimant's temporary total disability payments. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding claimant damages.

Reversing, this court held, inter alia, that the exclusivity provisions of the Workers' Compensation Act precluded claimant's tort action, since carrier's conduct did not rise to the level of extreme or outrageous conduct. General Acc. Ins. Co. v. Blank, 873 S.W.2d 580, 582.

Ky.App.1993. Adopted in case cit. in sup., subsec. (1) quot. in part in disc. Former parochial school student sued school employee, school, and others seeking damages for sexual abuse. The trial court dismissed the suit on limitations grounds and also entered summary judgment for all defendants except employee. Affirming, this court held that student's claims were time-barred except his claim for the tort of outrage, but there was no evidence to raise an inference that school, its owners, or its operators engaged in extreme or outrageous conduct toward student sufficient to support a claim based on this tort. While employee's admitted sexual abuse could clearly be found to be extreme and outrageous conduct, an action for the tort of outrage did not lie against him because any emotional distress inflicted on student was incident to and subsumed by employee's intentional torts of assault and battery. Rigazio v. Archdiocese of Louisville, 853 S.W.2d 295, 298.

Ky.App.1989. Cit. in case cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. An employee sued her former employer, inter alia, alleging wrongful discharge and intentional infliction of emotional distress when it fired the employee in retaliation for filing for workers' compensation benefits. The trial court entered summary judgment for the employer, concluding that jurisdiction was preempted by the federal Labor Management Relations Act, and this court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The court held that the claim of retaliation for filing a workers' compensation claim did not turn on interpretation of the collective bargaining agreement, and thus the claim was not preempted by the federal statute. Also, the court held that the conduct of the employer and the union did not reach the standard of outrageous or indecent conduct and found no error of the trial court's dismissal of the claims of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Bednarek v. Local Union 227, 780 S.W.2d 630, 632.

Ky.App.1989. Cit. in sup., coms. and illus. cit. in sup., com. (h) cit. in sup. During divorce proceedings, a wife sued her husband for outrageous conduct that caused her severe emotional distress after he committed adultery and liquidated and spent most of their marital assets. The trial court dismissed the complaint for failure to state a cause of action. Affirming, this court held that, while the emotional and financial distress caused by defendant's adultery and fraud may have been painful and difficult, defendant's actions did not rise to the level of outrageousness necessary to impose liability. Whittington v. Whittington, 766 S.W.2d 73, 74.

Ky.App.1988. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) cit. but dist., subsec. (2) cit. in disc. A mother who saw her daughter struck by a truck sued the driver for mental suffering, based on claims of negligence and outrageous conduct. This court affirmed the trial court's entry of summary judgment for the defendant, finding that his conduct was negligent, not outrageous, and that in negligence cases there could be no recovery for mental anguish without physical contact. Wilhoite v. Cobb, 761 S.W.2d 625, 627.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ky.App.1979. Cit. in disc. A husband sued his wife and her lover for alienation of affection and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court dismissed the suit for failure to state a cause of action and the husband appealed. This court affirmed and held that one spouse could not sue the other for the intentional infliction of emotional distress caused by the other spouse openly consorting with another person. The court recognized that conduct which exceeded all bounds of decency in a civilized society was actionable but usually accompanied by physical contact or harm. The court noted that it did not believe public policy would be served by allowing recovery under this specific fact pattern, even in light of the growing trend which had allowed such recovery. Browning v. Browning, 584 S.W.2d 406, 407.

La.

La.2001. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former bank employee sued bank for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that supervisors harassed her and belittled her in front of customers, and that she was demoted and had her salary cut. Trial court entered judgment on jury verdict for plaintiff; appellate court affirmed. This court reversed, holding that jury erred in finding defendant liable for age discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiff was demoted for just cause, as bank needed to make reconstructive changes and there was evidence that plaintiff was not a productive employee. She had poor performance evaluations, handled personal matters on bank time, and disregarded bank policies as to transfer of customer funds. LaBove v. Raftery, 2000-1394 (La. 11/28/01), 802 So.2d 566, 578.

La.2000. Cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. Employee sued former employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that he was terminated after a supervisor falsified his annual review. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiff, and the intermediate appellate court affirmed. Reversing, this court held, in part, that a jury instruction that failed to explain that plaintiff was required to establish defendant's extreme and outrageous conduct was so misleading as to affect the verdict, and that, in this case, neither defendant's behavior nor plaintiff's alleged resulting mental suffering rose to the level needed to support recovery under a theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Nicholas v. Allstate Ins. Co., 765 So.2d 1017, 1021-1022.

La.1992. Cit. in case cit. in disc., com. (j) cit. in sup. An employee sued a co-worker, her employer, her supervisor, and a union representative for intentional infliction of emotional distress caused by the co-worker's sexual harassment of plaintiff. The trial court dismissed, since only one act complained of occurred within the statute of limitations, and that act was not outrageous; the intermediate appellate court affirmed. This court affirmed in part but reversed and remanded for further proceedings the claims against defendants other than the union representative, holding that those claims were not time-barred. The court said that the last act of harassment, occurring less than one year before suit was filed, might not have been outrageous standing alone but could have been outrageous as part of an ongoing harassment that had not abated within one year of suit being filed and ultimately caused plaintiff serious emotional injury. Bustamento v. Tucker, 607 So.2d 532, 538.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

La.1991. Cit. in disc., cit. generally in sup. and in ftn., subsec. (1) quot. in ftn., com. (d) quot. in sup., coms. (e)-(g), (i), and (j) cit. in sup. After an employee and two other workers were subjected to a one-minute outburst of profanity by a supervisor who berated them for failing to work with adequate diligence, the employee sued the employer and the supervisor for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that as a result of the incident she suffered pains in her chest and respiratory problems requiring hospitalization. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for the plaintiff, and the intermediate appellate court affirmed. Reversing and rendering, this court held that the defendants were not liable because their conduct was not extreme or outrageous to a degree calculated to cause severe emotional distress to a person of ordinary sensibilities and the supervisor did not intend to inflict emotional distress of a severe nature, nor did he believe such a result was substantially certain to follow from his conduct. White v. Monsanto Co., 585 So.2d 1205, 1208-1210.

La.1990. Subsec. (1) quot. in disc. Game agents for the state stopped and searched a mudboat, and questioned and detained two duck hunters for failing to comply with duck tagging regulations. The duck hunters brought a civil rights action against the state and its game agents for damages resulting from the alleged unconstitutional arrests, searches and seizures, and infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered judgment in favor of the hunters for actual and punitive damages. The intermediate appellate court affirmed but vacated the punitive damages award. Reversing, this court held, inter alia, that no constitutional or statutory rights were violated. The court also determined that the plaintiffs did not suffer genuine and serious mental distress to support a finding of infliction of emotional distress resulting from a message accidentally left by other state agents on the plaintiffs' camphouse door stating, “We missed you this time but look out next time.” The court found that the agents' acts were not intentional, outrageous, or related to another tort and the plaintiffs' mental disturbance was not severe or related to personal injury or property damage. Moresi v. Dept. of Wildlife & Fisheries, 567 So.2d 1081, 1095.

La.App.

La.App.2022. Com. (g) cit. in case quot. in sup. Police officer brought, among other things, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against city and police department, alleging that defendants acted in an extreme and outrageous manner that caused him severe emotional injuries when they terminated him after his arrest following a domestic dispute; city civil service commission reinstated plaintiff upon appeal, and plaintiff added current and former city employees as additional defendants. The trial court granted defendants' exception of no cause of action. This court affirmed, holding that plaintiff failed to allege facts supporting his IIED claim. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment g, the court explained that plaintiff's complaint lacked allegations that he was subjected to a pattern of repeated, deliberate harassment over time at the workplace, and defendants' actions in arresting and conducting disciplinary proceedings against plaintiff were within their legal rights to discipline plaintiff. Cunningham v. City of New Orleans, 336 So.3d 977, 992.

La.App.2017. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Terminated employee brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against former supervisor and others, alleging, among other things, that supervisor created a stressful working environment by entering plaintiff's computer without permission to change plaintiff's financial reports. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. Affirming, this court held that there was no indication that the work stress experienced by plaintiff was anything more than stress attendant to his position; moreover, plaintiff failed to show that supervisor intentionally inflicted such distress on plaintiff or that supervisor should have known that it was certain or substantially certain to result, as required to state an IIED claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Hanna v. Shell Exploration and Production, Inc., 234 So.3d 179, 200.

La.App.2014. Com. (f) quot. in sup. and cit. in case quot. in sup., illus. 9 cit. in ftn. Former resident of an assisted-living facility, who had filed an underlying action against facility, brought a separate action for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against facility's counsel, alleging that counsel engaged in outrageous conduct during a deposition by asking her, in questions posed as affirmative statements, whether she knew that her two attorneys—one of whom was her husband and the other of whom was his associate—were having an affair. The trial court granted attorney's peremptory exception of no cause of action. Reversing and remanding for further proceedings, this court held that plaintiff stated a cause of action for IIED, given the irrelevant nature of the questions, coupled with the fact that plaintiff was a 70-year-old, medically impaired resident of an assisted living facility who was alleged to be terminally ill. The court reasoned that, under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, it was appropriate to take into consideration plaintiff's position as a vulnerable victim in determining whether the questions posed by defendant constituted extreme and outrageous conduct. Sullivan v. Malta Park, 156 So.3d 751, 759.

La.App.2007. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in diss. op. Insured whose home suffered wind and rain damage as a result of Hurricane Katrina sued his homeowners insurer for breach of contract and bad-faith failure to pay his claim. This court affirmed the trial court's judgment awarding plaintiff $87,500 in property damages and $125,000 in general damages for plaintiff's mental anguish, stress, and inconvenience sustained as a result of defendant's bad faith. The dissent contended that defendant should not have been held liable for plaintiff's mental distress under the facts, arguing that, although defendant's actions were arbitrary and capricious, they were not intentional or outrageous, and plaintiff did not present any evidence that he suffered measurable and severe psychic trauma and/or injury to justify such an award under the circumstances. Orellana v. Louisiana Citizens Property Ins. Corp., 972 So.2d 1252, 1260.

La.App.2002. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee sued former employer, employer's president, and its owner for intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with termination of his employment. The trial court entered judgment against employer and owner and dismissed claim against president. Reversing, this court held that defendants' conduct was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Goldberg v. Moses, 811 So.2d 1165, 1166, writ denied 824 So.2d 1166 (2002).

La.App.2001. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee sued former employer, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress related to denials of employee's requests for shift changes due to job pressures. The trial court granted defendant summary judgment. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that defendant's conduct did not give rise to tort claim, but was within range of acts covered by workers' compensation. Labbe v. Chemical Waste Management, Inc., 786 So.2d 868, 874, writ denied 796 So.2d 685 (La.2001).

La.App.2001. Subsec. (1) quot. in conc. op. Former employee sued employer for negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that she sustained emotional-distress injuries from job-related stress resulting from understaffing of the department in which she worked. Affirming in part the trial court's dismissal of plaintiff's claims, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff did not state a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, since she failed to allege any facts showing that defendant's conduct was outrageous or intended to cause her severe emotional distress. The concurring opinion agreed with the majority that plaintiff failed to satisfy the elements of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Richardson v. Home Depot USA, 808 So.2d 544, 553.

La.App.1996. Cit. generally in case cit. in Appendix containing trial court op. Church members filed a mandamus action against a church, seeking the production of church financial records. A trial court directed church to produce records. The church members later sued the church, its pastor, and their insurers for defamation and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that the pastor disfellowshipped and removed some of the church members from the church's membership rolls because of their participation in the mandamus action. It was an essential tenet of the Pentecostal faith that Holy Scripture prohibited taking another Pentecostal member to court. Trial court dismissed plaintiffs' suit, holding, inter alia, that, although plaintiffs claimed humiliation and embarrassment, the element of severe emotional distress was absent. Furthermore, defendants' actions were not outrageous, since the First Amendment free-exercise clause provided a complete defense to claims of outrageous conduct. This court affirmed, holding that, based on the state and federal Constitutions, this suit would constitute an impermissible interference in the church's ecclesiastical matters. Glass v. First United Pentecostal Church, 676 So.2d 724, 737.

La.App.1996. Quot. in case quot. in disc., coms. (b) and (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Patient sued physician for, inter alia, breach of the physician-patient privilege and intentional infliction of emotional distress when physician released patient's medical records to government agents in connection with an unrelated medical-malpractice suit brought by patient under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA). The trial court granted physician's motion for summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that patient waived the physician-patient privilege with respect to medical records that were relevant to his FTCA claim; to the extent that physician breached the privilege by disclosing information that was not pertinent to the FTCA claim, patient was not damaged; and physician's conduct was not so outrageous as to be considered intolerable in a civilized society. Sanders v. Spector, 673 So.2d 1176, 1180.

La.App.1994. Quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Heirs sued their deceased father's companion, asserting various tort claims, including intentional infliction of emotional distress by inappropriate disposal of decedent's ashes and refusal to return their father's personal effects. Reversing the trial court's maintenance of an exception of no cause of action to the tort claims and remanding for trial, this court held that the heirs had stated a viable cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Mavromatis v. Lou-Mar, Inc., 632 So.2d 828, 834, 835.

La.App.1993. Cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (j) cit. in case quot. in sup. After former employees sued employers for damages, alleging that employers' sexual harassment constituted negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress, employers brought third-party claim against insurers for costs of their defense, inter alia. Granting summary judgment for insurers, this court held that the policies in question, which required that bodily injury or property damage be caused by an occurrence and excluded coverage for intentional acts, did not require insurers to defend employers against charges of on-the-job sexual harassment, which allegedly occurred over a two-to-three-year period, since the conduct could be characterized as intentional in view of the length of time over which it occurred. Pylant v. Lofton, 626 So.2d 83, 87.

La.App.1993. Cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (i) cit. in case quot. in sup. A wrongfully arrested person sued the state police and the arresting officer, alleging that they, in investigating and arresting her for possible drug-related activity, intentionally inflicted emotional distress and committed other torts. This court amended judgment for plaintiff by reducing the general damage award for anxiety and distress, affirmed, and rendered, holding, inter alia, that the officer's alleged conduct in investigating plaintiff's prescription drug purchases without a reasonable suspicion, in eventually having the plaintiff arrested, and in conducting the investigation for personal reasons —to gain information that would discredit the plaintiff in her suit against the officer for erroneous arrest in a previous incident—was sufficient to support the emotional distress claim. Taylor v. State, 617 So.2d 1198, 1204.

La.App.1992. Cit. but. dist., coms. cit. but dist. Husband, individually and on behalf of minor children, sued priest and other church officials, alleging that priest's illicit affair with his wife resulted in the breakup of his marriage and caused emotional distress to him and his children. Affirming the trial court's dismissal, this court held that Louisiana did not recognize a cause of action for alienation of a spouse's affections or for alienation of a parent's affections, and plaintiffs did not state a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress because there was no evidence that defendants' conduct was directed at plaintiffs or was intended to cause them emotional distress. Greene v. Roy, 604 So.2d 1359, 1363, writ denied 607 So.2d 544 (La.1992).

La.App.1990. Cit. in sup., subsec. (1) quot. in sup., com. (h) quot. in case quot. in sup. While waiting for the arrival of safety goggles and gloves to transfer corrosive material, an employee was subjected to her supervisor's ranting, accusing her of failing to do her job and threatening to fire her, using profane and abusive language. Within minutes of the tirade, the employee went to the plant infirmary with tightness and pain in her chest, pounding and pain in her head, and appearing to be in shock. She was admitted to the hospital for two days, underwent many tests, and was diagnosed as suffering an acute anxiety reaction probably brought on by the incident at work. She sued her supervisor and employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The jury awarded the plaintiff damages against both defendants, and this court affirmed, holding that because the language used here could be considered vile, abusive, and profane, the plaintiff was likely to be more than usually offended by the language, and the supervisor had authority to recommend or impose firing or other disciplinary action, there was an egregious lack of mutuality and appropriateness that rose to the level of outrageousness. White v. Monsanto Co., 570 So.2d 221, 223, 224, 227, judgment reversed 585 So.2d 1205 (La.1991). See above case.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

La.App.1989. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. A worker sued an insurance company and two of its insurance adjusters alleging that he suffered severe mental distress when the insurance company terminated his workers' compensation benefits after having made weekly payments to him for over a year. The worker asserted that the insurer stopped payments solely because he refused to accept an unreasonably low settlement offer. The trial court dismissed the suit on an exception of no cause of action, but this court affirmed in part and reversed in part and remanded. The court ruled that Louisiana law permitted an employee to maintain a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress against his employer's workers' compensation insurer; however, where the plaintiff employee merely alleged emotional and financial loss caused by the wrongful termination of benefits, his sole remedy lay in the penalties and attorney's fees provisions of state law. While expressing doubts as to whether the worker could successfully allege additional acts to show outrageous conduct, the court concluded that the worker should have an opportunity to amend his petition. Boudoin v. Bradley, 549 So.2d 1265, 1267.

La.App.1989. Cit. and quot. in case quot. in disc., coms. (d) and (g) quot. in case quot. in sup. Two corporations sued a minority shareholder to compel specific performance of a contract to sell the shareholder's stocks in the corporations back to the corporations. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict in favor of the shareholder but granted a partial judgment n.o.v. reducing the award for wrongful infliction of mental suffering. The intermediate appellate court affirmed in part in an opinion that was later vacated by the supreme court. On remand, this court reversed and rendered in part and affirmed in part. As to the shareholder's wrongful infliction of mental suffering claim, the court reversed the trial court's judgment, holding that the failure of the corporations to buy back the stock and the failure of the corporations to allow the shareholder to inspect corporate records to ascertain the “true book value” of the stocks was not conduct so atrocious and outrageous as to support a finding of wrongful infliction of mental suffering. It noted that the corporations had a legal right to take most of the actions they did. Directional Wireline Services v. Tillett, 552 So.2d 1201, 1215-1216, writ denied 551 So.2d 1343 (1989).

La.App.1986. Cit. in disc. Three men were involved in a dispute with a group of people at a tube rental shop. A struggle ensued between one of the men and a local deputy sheriff, during which the deputy suffered a fatal heart attack. The decedent's children sued the men for the wrongful death of their father due to the defendants' alleged assault and battery. The trial court held for the plaintiffs. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that the jury had been properly instructed about liability for harm resulting from intentional or reckless infliction of emotional distress when it was instructed that in addition to the torts of assault and battery, one who by extreme and outrageous conduct intentionally or recklessly causes severe or emotional distress to another is subject to liability for such emotional distress and for the bodily harm or death that results therefrom. Sparacello v. Andrews, 501 So.2d 269, 276.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

La.App.1978. Cit. and quot. in sup. and coms. (d) and (g) quot. in sup. An employee and her spouse brought an action against an employer for emotional trauma due to the intentional acts of the employer. The plaintiffs contended that the defendant employer's arbitrary discontinuance of the employee's disability benefits, in addition to visits and telephone calls to her in disregard of her doctor's warnings, were intentional torts subjecting her to physical injury and emotional trauma. The lower court sustained the employer's exception of no cause of action and dismissed the demands of the employee and spouse. On appeal, the court noted that the general rule concerning damages for mental distress due to intentional tort is that the defendant must either have actively desired to bring about the mental anguish or realized to a virtual certainty that it would occur, and that recovery for mental anguish caused by intentional torts has generally been limited to instances of outrageous conduct. The plaintiffs' theory of liability was predicated, partially, on Section 46 of the Restatement. However, the court found that the facts as alleged in the plaintiffs' petition did not, as a matter of law, warrant a finding of an intent to cause emotional distress under the Restatement. The court held that the petition, which failed to allege facts showing that the employer intended to embarrass, humiliate, or emotionally and mentally disturb the employee and that such conduct was done in a manner which was outrageous beyond the privileged bounds of insisting on one's legal rights, did not state a cause of action for emotional trauma due to intentional acts. Accordingly, the judgment of the lower court was affirmed. Steadman v. South Central Bell Tel. Co., 362 So.2d 1144, 1145, 1146.

La.App.1976. Cit. in sup. A tenant sued to recover a security deposit which he had given to his landlord at time of entering into a lease for a residence which had not been made available to the tenant because of remodeling work. The landlord reconvened for attorney's fees and damages for mental pain and suffering, anxiety, and loss of dignity. The lower court entered judgment in favor of the landlord, and the tenant appealed. The tenant contended that the trial court erred in finding that the utterance, “If you were a man, I would beat the hell out of you,” spoken by tenant, was actionable in the context in which it was used. The court held that in the instant context that the aforementioned utterance was not that “extreme and outrageous conduct” as set forth in the Restatement. The landlord was in the rental business, in which landlord-tenant disputes were not uncommon. The court could not say that these statements or “curse words,” absent further amplification, were necessarily so outrageous as to constitute that conduct made actionable under the Restatement. Roshto v. Bajon, 335 So.2d 486, 488.

La.App.1968. Quot. in sup. Defendant was a creditor of plaintiff's and made repeated calls to plaintiff's neighbors' houses since plaintiffs did not have a phone. Plaintiff claimed defendant harrassed and shamed plaintiffs by these calls. Plaintiff sued and a default judgment was entered. Defendant got a restraining order against the execution of the judgment. The judgment for plaintiff was affirmed although the amount was reduced. The court held that conduct on the part of a creditor that is calculated to cause and does cause mental and physical harm is actionable, and the court held further that defendant's conduct had exceeded the bounds tolerated by society. Boudreaux v. Allstate Finance Corp., 217 So.2d 439, 444.

Me.

Me.2014. Com. (j) quot. in sup. After tests revealed numerous lead hazards throughout their rental home, tenants brought claims for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against landlord, alleging that the lead paint had injured their three children. The trial court granted landlord judgment as a matter of law on tenants' IIED claim. This court vacated as to the IIED claim and remanded, holding, among other things, that it could not say as a matter of law that no reasonable juror could find that landlord's conduct caused the children severe emotional distress. The court pointed to evidence that landlord allowed tenants to live in a home that exposed their young children to toxic levels of lead for several years, that landlord failed to comply with his legal duty to relocate tenants for four months after the home was declared a lead hazard, that the children were scared and confused when the home was posted as not safe for children, and that the children would scream “the poison is going to kill us” if a child attempted to enter an area of the home that had been cordoned off to prevent the spread of lead dust. Bratton v. McDonough, 2014 ME 64, 91 A.3d 1050, 1058.

Me.2010. Com. (k) quot. in sup., cit. in ftn., and cit. in case quot. in sup.; com. (j) cit. in sup.; illus. 19 and 20 quot. in ftn. Ex-girlfriend brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against ex-boyfriend, alleging that defendant accumulated piles of paper and trash throughout the parties' home, regularly yelled and screamed, kicked the walls, and was emotionally abusive toward her. The trial court entered judgment awarding plaintiff damages. Vacating the trial court's judgment, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's emotional distress was not so severe that no reasonable person could be expected to endure it; while plaintiff reported feeling inadequate and withdrawn, socially paralyzed, and intimidated by defendant's controlling and compulsive behavior, and her friends described her as being, at times, guarded, jumpy, and withdrawn, plaintiff endured the distress over the course of her 15-year relationship with defendant, as evidenced by the fact that she successfully managed her business, met the demands of daily living, and did not seek assistance from the police or treatment from mental-health professionals. Lyman v. Huber, 2010 ME 139, 10 A.3d 707, 712, 713.

Me.1998. Cit. generally and adopted in case quot. in disc. Employer's liability insurer brought suit for a declaratory judgment that it had no duty to defend employer against farm worker's intentional-infliction-of-emotional-distress claim stemming from employer's conduct during previous litigation in which worker had obtained a judgment against employer for personal injuries. Vacating the trial court's entry of judgment for insurer and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that the policy exclusion for intended or expected bodily injury was inapplicable to worker's claim, since employer might be found to have intentionally inflicted emotional distress without subjectively intending or foreseeing the alleged distress suffered by worker. Maine Mut. Fire Ins. Co. v. Gervais, 715 A.2d 938, 941.

Me.1997. Com. (g) cit. in disc. Wife whose leg was broken when she attempted to assist her husband in a fistfight brought personal injury action against husband's opponent. Defendant filed a counterclaim in which he asserted that the initiation of a civil suit against him constituted the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for defendant and, postjudgment, entered judgment as a matter of law for plaintiff on defendant's counterclaim. Affirming, this court held, in part, that the initiation of a lawsuit could not serve as the basis for a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Davis v. Currier, 1997 ME 199, 704 A.2d 1207, 1209.

Me.1996. Quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (h) quot. in case quot. in disc. A man who was insured under a disability policy fell down a flight of stairs and seriously injured his back. The insured sued the insurer for, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress based on actions the insurer took in the course of its investigation and in denying coverage. Jury awarded plaintiff damages, but the trial court set aside the jury verdict in plaintiff's favor on the emotional distress claim. This court affirmed in part and vacated in part, holding, inter alia, that, although plaintiff presented evidence of a cumulative number of acts and circumstances that adversely affected him in a substantial way, he failed to show that defendant's actions arose independently of its denial of the disability claim, were intentionally or recklessly inflicted, and were extreme and outrageous. The rude and sarcastic behavior of the doctor who examined plaintiff could not be attributable to defendant. Furthermore, defendant's attorney's attendance at the workers' compensation hearing and communication with one of the attorneys for the employer's insurer did not constitute the kind of conduct that supported an emotional-distress claim. Colford v. Chubb Life Ins. Co. of America, 687 A.2d 609, 616, cert. denied 520 U.S. 1264, 117 S.Ct. 2433, 138 L.Ed.2d 194 (1997).

Me.1993. Com. (h) cit. in disc. A woman whose child had been removed from her home by the state sued the state and governmental officials, bringing various civil rights and tort claims, including one for intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court, vacating in part a dismissal of all claims, held that the state could be liable for negligence if it was proved to have handled the investigation preceding the removal carelessly, but all other claims were properly dismissed. The court saw no extreme or outrageous conduct in the state case worker's alleged neglect of the case and misrepresentations that would support an emotional distress claim, particularly in light of the competent evidence on which the state based its decision. Gray v. State, 624 A.2d 479, 484.

Me.1993. Cit. and quot. in sup. Wife sued former husband after her divorce complaint was granted on the ground of irreconcilable differences, alleging, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress resulting from physical and psychological abuse. The trial court entered judgment in favor of wife. Affirming, this court held that interspousal immunity did not apply to husband's conduct, since there was no longer any marital harmony to be preserved, evidentiary requirements safeguarded against frivolous litigation, and the divorce provided no compensatory relief. Henriksen v. Cameron, 622 A.2d 1135, 1138, 1139.

Me.1990. Quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (g) cit. in sup. A fire insurance policy issued to the owner of a clam depuration plant contained provisions denying coverage if the plant was left vacant for more than 60 consecutive days or if the risk of fire was increased by any means within the control or knowledge of the insured. The insurer cited both provisions in denying the owner's claim for payment after the plant was destroyed by fire and the owner was indicted for soliciting to commit arson, charges that were later dismissed. The owner sued the insurer, inter alia, for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and the trial court dismissed those counts. The jury returned a special verdict against the plant owner on the other counts, finding no breach of contract by the insurer or malicious prosecution of the arson charge. This court held that although the dismissal of the intentional infliction of emotional distress claims prior to trial may have been premature, it was harmless error as the evidence adduced at trial demonstrated that the insurer's conduct in asserting the policy defenses and its refusal to pay the fire loss did not constitute extreme and outrageous conduct. Chiapetta v. Lumbermens Mut. Ins. Co., 583 A.2d 198, 201.

Me.1990. Subsec. (1) and com. (k) cit. in disc., subsec. (2) quot. and cit. but dist., com. (d) quot. in disc. Parents sued their son for a declaratory judgment to establish their right under a lease agreement to live rent-free in an apartment as life tenants and for damages for emotional distress. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for the plaintiffs and awarded them damages for emotional distress. Affirming, this court held that there was ample evidence to uphold the jury's finding that the defendant's conduct was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support liability. The court said that the defendant demanded that the plaintiffs pay up to $3,000 a month in rent, threatened to evict them if they failed to pay the rent, even though the plaintiffs were aged and in poor health, and telephoned his sister to seek her assistance in having their father declared mentally incompetent. The court stated that s 46(2) of the Restatement (Second) of Torts did not apply to the facts of this case to exclude the sister's testimony about the telephone conversation. Latremore v. Latremore, 584 A.2d 626, 630-633.

Me.1989. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (h) cit. in disc. A computer specialist who was fired for operating a company car under the influence of alcohol and for erasing computer files sued his employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that a new departmental manager had humiliated him, demoted him without cause, and told him to remove software from a computer against his better judgment. The trial court granted summary judgment for the defendant. Vacating in part, affirming in part, and remanding, this court held that, even when viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, his evidence created no genuine issue that the manager's conduct was so extreme and outrageous as to exceed all possible bounds of decency. Staples v. Bangor Hydro-Electric Co., 561 A.2d 499, 501, appeal after remand 629 A.2d 601 (Me.1993).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Me.1988. Cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (h) cit. in disc. A landowner's suit against an adjoining landowner for malicious prosecution was dismissed for want of prosecution. The plaintiff then sued the same defendant on theories of false accusation and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted summary judgment to the defendant on the false accusation claim, giving preclusive effect to the prior dismissal, and a jury awarded damages to the plaintiff on the emotional distress claim. Affirming, this court held that the plaintiff was not precluded from litigating issues of fact common to the two different causes of action; because no issue of fact was actually tried in the malicious prosecution action, the judgment of dismissal in that action did not bar the presenting of any factual issue in this case. The court stated further that it would not disturb the jury's finding that all of the elements of the claimed emotional distress were adequately supported by credible evidence. Gurski v. Culpovich, 540 A.2d 764, 767.

Me.1987. Cit. in disc. A husband sued his wife's divorce attorney for intentional interference with parental custody rights and intentional infliction of emotional distress as a result of the interference. Affirming the trial court's grant of summary judgment to the defendant, this court held that to prove claims for both intentional interference with parental custody rights and intentional infliction of emotional distress, either some direct contact between the individual held liable and the child or a violation of a court order by that individual was needed. The court concluded that since there was no contact alleged between the defendant attorney and the plaintiff's children, summary judgment was proper. Finn v. Lipman, 526 A.2d 1380, 1382.

Me.1987. Cit. in disc. After the plaintiff discovered a human leg in a bag that he believed contained his recently deceased father's personal belongings, he sued the hospital and funeral home that had arranged for the delivery of his father's personal belongings for negligent infliction of severe emotional distress. The trial court granted the defendants' motions for a directed verdict, holding that the plaintiff's severe emotional distress was not proximately caused by the intentional or reckless conduct of either defendant. Vacating and remanding, this court held that, since a jury could conclude that the defendants reasonably should have foreseen that members of the deceased's family would be vulnerable to emotional shock at finding a severed leg in what was supposed to be the decedent's personal effects, the lower court erred in granting the defendants' motions for directed verdict. The court said that a plaintiff who alleged negligently inflicted severe emotional distress need not show physical impact, objective manifestation, underlying or accompanying tort, or special circumstances. Gammon v. Osteopathic Hosp. of Me., Inc., 534 A.2d 1282, 1284.

Me.1986. Com. (d) cit. in sup., com. (h) quot. in sup. The buyer of a memorial stone for her mother's grave sued the seller for breach of contract, negligence, and negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress, after the stone was delivered too late for an unveiling ceremony. The trial court granted summary judgment to the seller. Affirming in part, vacating in part, and remanding, this court applied the general rule that emotional distress was not compensable on a breach of contract theory; in addition, the complaint did not sufficiently state a claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress. The court found, however, that the buyer's allegations of repeated misrepresentations by the seller of a timely delivery sufficiently set forth conduct on which liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress could be predicated. Rubin v. Mathews Intern. Corp., 503 A.2d 694, 699, 700.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Me.1979. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in part and cit. in disc. in sup., com. (k) cit. in disc. in sup. The Worker's Compensation Commission awarded a total of three months compensation to a claimant for her mental anxiety, which required hospitalization, caused by the pressures of day to day employment as the first woman on the state police force. The trial court entered a pro forma decree from which the employer appealed. This court vacated the trial court's judgment and remanded the case for further findings. The court held that gradual mental injuries were recoverable under the Workman's Compensation Act, however, there were certain guidelines which had to be met for recovery. The court held that a plaintiff would have to show either that she was subjected to pressures greater than the average worker which caused the injury, or that it was the usual work related pressures which caused the injury. Townsend v. Maine Bureau of Public Safety, 404 A.2d 1014, 1018.

Me.1979. Quot. and cit. in disc., com. (i) cit. in disc. and coms. (d), (j) and (k) quot. in part and cit. in disc. The plaintiff debtor brought an action against a creditor and a credit life insurer for damages for, among other things, conversion and mental suffering resulting from the intentional acts of the defendants' employees. The trial court, after the jury found for the plaintiff and against the defendants on all counts, granted the defendants' motion for judgment n.o.v. with regard to the jury's finding that the defendants had committed conversion and intentional infliction of emotional distress. All parties appealed. This court held that the trial court had properly found that the transaction was a consumer credit transaction. The court held that the trial court had properly ruled on the defendants' motion for judgment n.o.v. with regard to the conversion claim and the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. However the trial court had set aside the award of compensatory damages for the intentional infliction of emotional distress claim but had allowed the punitive damage award to stand and this court held that this was error and set aside the punitive damage award. The court held that one could recover for the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress for pain and suffering which is accompanied by physical injury and caused by tortious conduct or for distress which is manifested by illness or bodily harm and caused by negligent conduct even if no direct physical injury occurred or for severe emotional distress which is caused by extreme or outrageous conduct which is either intentional or reckless. Vicnire v. Ford Motor Credit Co., 401 A.2d 148, 154.

Md.

Md.2008. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Father brought a claim for intentional interference with custody and visitation rights against his former wife and her mother, alleging that defendants fled to Egypt with the couple's two minor children. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiff. This court affirmed, holding that the tort of interference with parent-child relations was recognized by this court in a prior case, in which, after noting that the plaintiff's allegations in that case were insufficient to sustain a cause of action for assault, battery, or intentional infliction of emotional distress, the court indicated that abduction and enticement were precursor causes of action for the tort. Khalifa v. Shannon, 404 Md. 107, 945 A.2d 1244, 1254.

Md.2003. Com. (d) quot. generally in ftn. Husband sued wife for malicious prosecution, alleging that, as a result of false criminal charges brought against him by wife, he was arrested on three occasions and charged with stalking, harassment, and violation of a protective order. The trial court granted wife's motion to dismiss, ruling that the action was barred by the doctrine of interspousal immunity. The court of special appeals affirmed in part, holding that malicious prosecution was not so outrageous as to bring it within the exception to interspousal immunity. Reversing and remanding, this court abrogated the interspousal-immunity rule as to all cases alleging an intentional tort. Bozman v. Bozman, 376 Md. 461, 830 A.2d 450, 453.

Md.2000. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. Female employee sued employer and various individuals for, inter alia, violations of Title VII, alleging that defendants were liable for male co-worker's creation of a sexually hostile work environment. Plaintiff also asserted a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court dismissed the complaint, and the intermediate appellate court affirmed. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held, among other things, that plaintiff's allegations were sufficient to state a claim under Title VII; however, even assuming that defendants' alleged failure to protect her from co-worker was extreme and outrageous, plaintiff had failed to establish that her resulting emotional distress was severe. Manikhi v. Mass Transit, 360 Md. 333, 758 A.2d 95, 114.

Md.1993. Com. (j) quot. in part in case quot. in sup., com. (e) cit. in case quot. in diss. op. A 16-year-old former employee sued his employer and several co-workers, alleging false imprisonment, malicious prosecution, defamation, wrongful discharge and intentional infliction of emotional distress after he was detained for four hours by security personnel and accused of stealing. After the jury returned a verdict for plaintiff, the trial court granted judgment notwithstanding the verdict on the emotional distress and wrongful discharge claims. Affirming in part, this court held that the embarrassment and distress suffered by the employee were not sufficiently severe to support the emotional distress claim. A dissent argued that when conduct was shown to be sufficiently outrageous, the distress need not be so severe to establish a cause of action. Caldor, Inc. v. Bowden, 330 Md. 632, 643-645, 673, 625 A.2d 959, 964, 965, 979.

Md.1992. Cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in sup. and quot. in case quot. in disc. A local union president sued a national union and its president for defamation and intentional infliction of emotional distress. After the local union improperly entered into a contract without the national's approval, a heated labor dispute arose in which the defendants circulated leaflets accusing the plaintiff of lying, perjury, and misappropriating union funds. The trial court entered a jury verdict for the plaintiff on both the defamation and intentional infliction of emotional distress claims, and the intermediate appellate court affirmed. Affirming in part, this court upheld the defamation judgment but reversed the intentional infliction of emotional distress judgment and remanded for a new damage determination. It noted that labor struggles were often vicious and that the defendants' conduct was hardly extreme and outrageous in that context. Batson v. Shiflett, 325 Md. 684, 602 A.2d 1191, 1216, 1217.

Md.1992. Com. (d) quot. in disc., quot. in case quot. in diss. op., cit. in diss. op.; com. (e) quot. in disc., quot. in case cit. in diss. op.; com. (f) quot. and cit. in disc.; com. (h) quot. in disc. and cit. in diss. op. An employee suffering from borderline personality disorder was accused of stealing from her employer, suspended without pay, and demoted from her managerial position. After receiving psychiatric treatment, employee sued her employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress and obtained a jury verdict in her favor. Trial court granted defendant's motion for judgment n.o.v., and intermediate appellate court reversed. Reversing the appellate court and reinstating trial court's judgment, this court held that, since there was no evidence that defendant knew of plaintiff's particular psychological vulnerability, defendant's actions did not reach the required level of outrageousness. Dissent contended that, since reasonable persons may differ as to the outrageousness of defendant's conduct, the jury determination should not have been disturbed. Kentucky Chicken Co. v. Weathersby, 326 Md. 663, 607 A.2d 8, 11, 12, 15-19, 23.

Md.1991. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (e) cit. in case quot. in disc. A patient sued on a theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, a psychologist whom the plaintiff and his wife had consulted for marriage counseling, alleging that the defendant and the plaintiff's wife had engaged in a sexual relationship that resulted in the dissolution of the plaintiff's marriage. The trial court dismissed the complaint for failure to state a claim. This court reversed and remanded on the ground that a jury might find extreme and outrageous conduct where a psychologist who was retained to improve a marital relationship implemented a course of extreme conduct that was injurious to the patient and designed to facilitate a romantic, sexual relationship with the patient's spouse. Figueiredo-Torres v. Nickel, 321 Md. 642, 584 A.2d 69, 75, 76.

Md.1988. Com. (d) cit. in disc. A physician who knew he suffered from genital herpes entered into a sexual relationship with a nurse without informing her of his condition; the nurse contracted the disease. The nurse sued the physician for fraud, negligence, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The federal district court certified to this court the question of whether a cause of action existed in this state for each of the plaintiff's claims. This court held, inter alia, that one who knowingly engaged in conduct that was highly likely to infect another with an incurable disease had committed sufficiently extreme and outrageous conduct to give rise to a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. B.N. v. K.K., 312 Md. 135, 538 A.2d 1175, 1181.

Md.1986. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. A noncustodial parent sued a noncustodial, nonparental third party for intentional interference with child visitation rights. The trial court dismissed for failure to state a cause of action, and the plaintiff appealed. This court affirmed, finding first that the plaintiff had not pleaded a cause of action for assault or battery. The court then found that, under current state law, no action for damages existed pursuant to the cause of action pleaded by the plaintiff, because the third party's alleged interference with the plaintiff's visitation rights in this case was not substantial enough to require any payment of damages. Hixon v. Buchberger, 306 Md. 72, 507 A.2d 607, 609.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Md.1985. Com. (d) quot. in sup. A workers' compensation claimant brought an intentional tort claim against his employer's workers' compensation insurer because of the insurer's failure to timely pay disability benefits and medical bills. The trial court entered judgment for the insurer, holding that the claimant's sole and exclusive remedy against the insurer was under the state's workers' compensation law. This court held that the Workers' Compensation Act's exclusive remedy provision did not preclude damages for the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress caused by the nonpayment of benefits. The court remanded to allow the claimant to amend his complaint to adequately plead the extreme and outrageous conduct requirements of intentional infliction of emotional distress in order to distinguish his claim from ordinary nonperformance of a statutory duty. Gallagher v. Bituminous Fire & Marine Ins., 303 Md. 201, 492 A.2d 1280, 1285.

Md.1985. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (g) quot. and cit. in disc. Plaintiff was assaulted at work and suffered physical and emotional trauma. The defendant insurer failed to pay for the plaintiff's therapy although it was ordered to do so by the workmen's compensation commission. Despite warnings from the plaintiff's psychiatrist that an examination by another doctor could result in a suicide attempt, defendant insisted on the exam, and plaintiff attempted suicide four days later. Plaintiff's suit for negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress resulted in a judgment for the defendant, and the Maryland Court of Appeals granted certiorari prior to review by the intermediate court. The court affirmed dismissal of the negligence count, finding the workmen's compensation act to be the exclusive remedy for negligent claims investigation, but it reversed and remanded the claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress, as the plaintiff's allegation that the defendant ordered the examination to harass the plaintiff into abandoning her claim or into committing suicide stated something more than the permissible exercise of the defendant's legal rights. Young v. Hartford Accident & Indemnity, 303 Md. 182, 492 A.2d 1270, 1277, 1278.

Md.1979. Coms. (d) and (i) cit. in sup. Woman instituted a suit against spouse for negligent misrepresentation and intentional infliction of emotional distress upon learning after 20 years that her marriage to the defendant was void. The parties participated in a religious marriage ceremony in 1956. They lived together as husband and wife for 18 years and had two children. In 1974 the defendant left the plaintiff for another woman, prompting the plaintiff to seek and obtain a decree awarding her alimony and child support. The defendant filed a motion to strike the decree on the ground that the marriage was void because he was not divorced from his first wife at the time he purported to marry the plaintiff. In the present action, the plaintiff seeks compensatory damages for the emotional distress she claimed to have suffered as a result of the defendant's negligent misrepresentation of his marital status and damages for the intentional infliction of emotional distress which plaintiff claimed resulted from that concealment. On appeal from a verdict favorable to the plaintiff, the court found that the evidence was sufficient to support a jury finding that the plaintiff had been physically injured as a foreseeable result of defendant's negligent misrepresentation. In addition, the court affirmed the lower court's holding that the defendant was not liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress, since plaintiff did not show that when defendant made the misrepresentation he could have anticipated that 20 years later he would reveal what he had concealed and cause plaintiff to suffer emotional distress. Thus, the court concluded that the plaintiff failed to establish the requisite element of intentional or reckless conduct by the defendant. Vance v. Vance, 286 Md. 490, 408 A.2d 728, 736.

Md.1977. Quot. in sup. Coms. (d), (f), (i) and (j) quot. and dist., coms. (h), (e) cit. and dist. The plaintiff, a stutterer, brought this action against his employer and his supervisor to recover damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress, allegedly caused by defendant supervisor's repeated ridicule of plaintiff's impediment and defendant employer's ratification of that conduct. Verdicts and judgments for plaintiff were reversed on appeal. Reversal was affirmed upon further review. The court held that plaintiff had failed to establish that his distress was "severe" within the contemplation of the rule requiring establishment of that element of the tort. Harris v. Jones, 281 Md. 560, 380 A.2d 611, 613, 614, 615, 616.

Md.Spec.App.

Md.Spec.App.2021. Quot. in sup.; com. (d) cit. in sup.; com. (e) cit. in case quot. in sup. Father of two minor children sued mother, who had de facto legal and physical custody of children following the parties' separation and eventual divorce, alleging, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress based on mother's conduct in badmouthing him to children and distancing children from him emotionally. The trial court granted mother's motion to dismiss. Affirming, this court held that father failed to state a claim against mother for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court reasoned that, while mother's conduct was arguably intentional or reckless in some instances, it was not sufficiently extreme or outrageous to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress; in addition, father did not allege that mother's conduct caused him severe emotional distress. Haines v. Vogel, 249 A.3d 151, 162-164.

Md.Spec.App.2017. Cit. and quot. in sup.; com. (g) quot. in sup. Mechanic on leave from work due to stress filed, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against his supervisor who had informed management of rumors that plaintiff owned guns with a permit to carry, was returning to work, and might use guns against co-workers. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant. This court affirmed, holding that defendant's alleged conduct did not rise to the level of "outrageousness" that was necessary to state an IIED claim, and was protected by the qualified privilege of common interests. The court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46 in setting forth theelements of an IIED claim and noting that, even where a prima facie case was established, situations existed where such conduct was privileged. Lindenmuth v. McCreer, 165 A.3d 544, 559.

Md.Spec.App.2010. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Divorced wife sued former husband for conversion, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), breach of fiduciary duty, and fraud premised largely on husband's alleged financial misfeasance during the marriage. The trial court granted summary judgment for husband. Affirming, this court held, as to the IIED claim, that husband's alleged behavior in causing wife to believe that she was to blame for their financial difficulties, yelling at her on several occasions, and deceiving her about their finances and his personal life was not so extreme in degree as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and thus did not rise to the level of extreme or outrageous conduct necessary to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Lasater v. Guttmann, 194 Md.App. 431, 448, 5 A.3d 79, 89.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Md.Spec.App.2002. Quot. in case quot. but dist. Husband sued wife for malicious prosecution after she filed false criminal charges against him on three occasions. Affirming in part trial court's dismissal, appellate court held that doctrine of interspousal immunity barred husband's complaint, as conduct underlying claim of malicious prosecution, while causing humiliation and hardship, did not rise to level of outrageousness contemplated by narrow exception to interspousal immunity. Bozman v. Bozman, 146 Md.App. 183, 806 A.2d 740, 749, reversed 376 Md. 461, 830 A.2d 450 (2003). See above case.

Md.Spec.App.1999. Coms. (d) and (e) cit. generally in headnotes and quot. in cases quot. in disc. Church member sued church and pastor for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that pastor exploited his position to initiate a sexual relationship with her when she sought advice from him about marital problems. Affirming the trial court's dismissal of the claim, this court held, in part, that because the case did not involve an officially sanctioned treatment relationship between the relevant parties, the conduct alleged was not extreme enough to merit recovery for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Borchers v. Hrychuk, 126 Md.App. 10, 727 A.2d 388, 389, 392.

Md.Spec.App.1998. Cit. in headnotes, cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. and cit. in disc., com. (e) and illus. 15 and 16 quot. in disc., com. (h) quot. in sup., com. (i) cit. in disc. In divorce proceedings, husband sued wife for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress after he discovered that two of the three children born during the couple's marriage were fathered by the man with whom wife was having an extramarital affair. Husband also sought recovery under a theory of promissory estoppel, arguing that he chose not to contribute to his employer's 401(k) plan in reliance on wife's assurances that he could depend on her stock holdings once he retired. The trial court dismissed the complaint. Affirming in part and reversing in part, this court held that a jury could conclude that wife acted outrageously in concealing her extramarital affair, lying about the children's paternity, and affirmatively misrepresenting to husband that he was the children's biological father; however, husband's promissory-estoppel claim failed where he did not establish that wife made a clear and definite promise to him regarding the future use of her stock holdings. Doe v. Doe, 122 Md.App. 295, 712 A.2d 132, 133, 134, 152-154, 157, 159, 160.

Md.Spec.App.1997. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. A woman sued her former boyfriend and his brother for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that, while she was ill from undergoing radiation treatment for breast cancer, the boyfriend repeatedly woke her up in the middle of the night admonishing her to leave. She also alleged that the brother telephoned her during the same period, calling her “bitch,” “whore,” and a “one-breasted woman,” and telling her that she was a financial burden and was going to die. Trial court granted defendants summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state an emotional-distress claim, because the verbal language, although it included threats, was for the purpose of pressuring plaintiff to leave the boyfriend's house, where, regardless of the morality of his position, she had no legal right to remain. Considering that defendants had the legal right to require plaintiff to leave, the court did not perceive their verbal actions alone to be of such egregiousness so as to satisfy the elements of the tort. Miller v. Ratner, 114 Md.App. 18, 688 A.2d 976, 996.

Md.Spec.App.1993. Cit. in sup., coms. (d) and (f) quot. in sup. Corporation and its officers sued their lender for breach of contract and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, after defendant demanded immediate repayment of loan under parties' loan agreement. The trial court granted defendant summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding that claim for emotional distress was properly dismissed because defendant's conduct was rude, insensitive, and callous but not beyond bounds of decency when it demanded payment or more collateral in a threatening manner from one corporate officer while officer was ill and hospitalized; instead, defendant had contractual right to insist on repayment of plaintiffs' debts and to seek collateral to protect itself. Waller v. Maryland Nat'l Bank, 95 Md.App. 197, 620 A.2d 381, 400, 401, cert. granted and judgment vacated 332 Md. 375, 631 A.2d 447 (1993).

Md.Spec.App.1993. Com. (g) quot. in case quot. in sup. Decedent's mother and siblings sued decedent's stepmother, a cemetery, and a vault company for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, after decedent's body was disinterred and moved to a new vault at stepmother's request without mother's notification or consent. Affirming the trial court's dismissal of the complaint, this court held, inter alia, that, as mother's averment was that stepmother wanted gravesites switched so that she could be buried next to her natural son, there was no allegation that the movement of decedent's body was done to inflict emotional distress on mother. Walser v. Resthaven Memorial Gardens, Inc., 98 Md.App. 371, 394, 633 A.2d 466, 477.

Md.Spec.App.1992. Subsec. (2) and com. (l) quot. in sup., subsec. (2)(a) cit. in case quot. in sup. A husband alleged that a psychiatrist used personal and confidential information that he received from the husband regarding the husband's wife to seduce the wife and become sexually intimate with her, apparently as part of his treatment of her. The husband sued the psychiatrist for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. The trial court dismissed the complaint. This court affirmed, holding that the husband's absence at the time of the seduction precluded him from recovering for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court said that although there were situations in which conduct directed principally at one person had been regarded as extreme and outrageous as to another, normally the other person must have been present to witness the conduct to recover; the limitation was justified by the practical necessity of drawing the line somewhere. The court reasoned that to relax the presence requirement in cases such as this would greatly expand the scope of the tort. Homer v. Long, 90 Md.App. 1, 599 A.2d 1193, 1199.

Md.Spec.App.1992. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Doctor who was discharged from position as director of department of medicine sued hospital and its administrators for, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiff was discharged immediately before a no-confidence vote that could have resulted in the dismissal of one of hospital's administrators. The trial court granted defendants' motion to dismiss; this court affirmed, holding that defendants' conduct in discharging an employee with whose service they were no longer satisfied was an everyday occurrence and, moreover, that there was no indication that plaintiff was particularly susceptible to the stress of being terminated or that defendants knew of any such susceptibility. Hrehorovich v. Harbor Hospital, 93 Md.App. 772, 614 A.2d 1021, 1035.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Md.Spec.App.1991. Cit. in case quot. in disc. After a seven-year-old child allegedly was traumatized by a horror movie shown at an after-school program she attended, she and her parents sued workers at the program and the city that operated it for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. The trial court dismissed the claim. Affirming in part, this court held that no reasonable mind could properly conclude that the defendants desired to inflict emotional distress on the child or that they knew that such distress was substantially certain to occur. The court said that, although the record showed that the child had been frightened once by a scary story told to her a year-and-a-half earlier, it was not enough to demonstrate a high probability that she would be distressed by watching the movie. The court also stated that the plaintiffs failed to show that the defendants' conduct was extreme in degree and outrageous in character. Abrams v. City of Rockville, 88 Md.App. 588, 596 A.2d 116, 120.

Md.Spec.App.1991. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. The former president of a local union sued a national union and its president for conspiracy, defamation, and intentional infliction of emotional distress after the defendants distributed flyers and made statements at local meetings accusing plaintiff of misconduct. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding plaintiff compensatory and punitive damages on the defamation and emotional distress claims. Affirming, the court of special appeals held, inter alia, that the evidence supported plaintiff's claim of severe emotional distress where defendants' accusations of perjury, illegal acts, and misappropriation of funds triggered negative reactions in local union members and caused plaintiff to lose his local's election, after which plaintiff took to drinking and drugs, became incapable of working or performing daily activities, and eventually was hospitalized for depression and substance abuse. Batson v. Shiflett, 86 Md.App. 340, 586 A.2d 792, 801, affirmed in part and reversed in part 325 Md. 684, 602 A.2d 1191 (1992). See above case.

Md.Spec.App.1991. Com. (d) quot. in sup., com. (j) quot. generally in case quot. in sup. An employee sued her former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. The employer fired the plaintiff for misconduct and then rescinded the discharge pending an investigation. The employee did not return to work. The trial court dismissed the claims and granted the defendant's motion for attorney's fees incurred in its defense. On remand, the court awarded the defendant $12,000 against the plaintiff's attorney. This court vacated the award of attorney's fees and remanded for a trial on that issue and held that evidence supported the finding that the plaintiff's attorney did not have substantial justification for filing and maintaining the claim because the defendant's conduct did not come close to meeting the standard needed for a finding of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Beery v. Maryland Med. Lab., 89 Md.App. 81, 597 A.2d 516, 524.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Md.Spec.App.1989. Subsec. (1) quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in sup. A church member sued a church elder for intentional infliction of emotional distress after she was "disfellowshipped" and subjected to ostracism, surveillance, name-calling, and obscene gestures over a period of years. The trial court granted judgment n.o.v. for the defendant. Affirming, this court held that the plaintiff failed to establish the required element of severity to impose liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress because mere insults, indignities, annoyances, and other trivialities were insufficient to create tortious liability. Vauls v. Lambros, 78 Md.App. 450, 553 A.2d 1285, 1289, 1290.

Md.Spec.App.1987. Cit. in disc., com. (j) quot. in case cit. in sup., com. (k) cit. in case cit. in disc. A young woman was sexually abused by her stepfather throughout her adolescence. She eventually sued him for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court found for the plaintiff and awarded her compensatory and punitive damages. This court affirmed, holding that the emotional distress inflicted on the plaintiff was sufficiently severe to be actionable, and that there was more than adequate evidence from which the jury could find that the defendant's conduct was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to cause the plaintiff's emotional distress. Reagan v. Rider, 70 Md.App. 503, 521 A.2d 1246, 1246, 1249, 1251.

Md.Spec.App.1986. Quot. in case cit. in sup. A labor union business agent sued employers, their agents, an attorney, an investigative bureau and its director for intentional infliction of emotional distress, invasion of privacy, and conspiracy to commit those torts, alleging that the defendants circulated evidence of his prior criminal record to union officials, hired an investigator to put him under surveillance, and sent his wife evidence of his extramarital affair. The defendants moved to dismiss and motioned for summary judgment. The trial court dismissed the case as to one employer and its agents for lack of subject matter jurisdiction, and as to all other defendants granted summary judgment on one count and dismissed all other counts for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. The business agent appealed. This court affirmed in part, and held that the business agent had failed to establish a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress based on the defendants' conduct and the plaintiff's personality. This court reversed and remanded the invasion of privacy issue, as the surveillance could have constituted an actionable intrusion upon seclusion. This court did not find actionable the claim for public disclosure of private facts. Pemberton v. Bethlehem Steel Corp., 66 Md.App. 133, 502 A.2d 1101, 1115, cert. denied 306 Md. 289, 508 A.2d 488 (1986).

Md.Spec.App.1985. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in disc. In repeated attempts to collect on a delinquent loan, a bank employee allegedly shouted at the plaintiffs, spoke in angry tones, threatened to attach the plaintiffs' homes and wages if the plaintiffs declared bankruptcy, and called one of the plaintiffs a liar. The plaintiffs sued the bank alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress and a violation of the Maryland Consumer Debt Collector Act. The Maryland Court of Special Appeals affirmed a trial court judgment for the bank because the employee's conduct, though rude, was not extreme and outrageous enough to support a count of intentional infliction of emotional distress, nor was the language he used grossly abusive enough to sustain a count charging violation of the Consumer Debt Collector Act. Dick v. Mercantile-Safe Dep. & Trust, 63 Md.App. 270, 492 A.2d 674, 677.

Md.Spec.App.1985. Com. (f) quot. in case quot. in sup. (Erron. cit. as com. (5).) A civil servant sued the county and several county supervisory employees on several claims, including one for intentional infliction of emotional distress, arising out of the civil servant's termination of employment. The plaintiff was a part-time worker who applied for, but was denied, a newly created full-time position. After the plaintiff took steps to appeal the county hiring panel's decision not to give the position to him, the plaintiff's part-time employment was terminated. The trial court dismissed all of the civil servant's claims. On appeal, this court affirmed the trial court's dismissal of the intentional infliction of emotional distress claim, stating that even if all of the facts alleged in the civil servant's complaint were true, the defendants' conduct was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous, nor was the civil servant sufficiently distressed, to allow recovery. This court reversed the trial court on other grounds, and remanded the case for further proceedings. Leese v. Baltimore County, 64 Md.App. 442, 497 A.2d 159, 174, cert. denied 305 Md. 106, 501 A.2d 845 (1985).

Md.Spec.App.1985. Coms. (e), (f), and (j) quot. in sup. Employees who were terminated because they refused to submit to polygraph examinations regarding inventory shortages sued their former employer and certain of its officers for wrongful discharge and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court rendered a verdict in favor of the employees on both theories and awarded compensatory and punitive damages. The court of special appeals reversed in part, holding that the employer's officers were not liable for wrongful discharge, and affirmed only one of the employees' intentional infliction of emotional distress awards. The court held, inter alia, that only the employee who suffered such emotional distress that she was unable to perform her household chores had suffered a disabling emotional response severe enough, and yet reasonable in light of her devotion to her employer, to allow her to recover for intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with being wrongfully discharged. Moniodis v. Cook, 64 Md.App. 1, 494 A.2d 212, 219, 220, 221, cert. denied 304 Md. 631, 500 A.2d 649 (1985).

Md.Spec.App.1984. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. After resigning his position, plaintiff sued three of his supervisors, alleging that defendants had coerced his resignation in retaliation for his having reported illegal activities of fellow employees. The complaint included charges of abusive discharge and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court sustained defendants' demurrers and this court affirmed. In support of his claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress, plaintiff alleged that defendants had threatened, harassed and assaulted him, appointed one of the people he had reported to police as his supervisor, and deceived him into resigning with promises of reinstatement. The court observed that extreme and outrageous conduct may arise from a defendant's abuse of a position of authority, but found that the conduct alleged did not meet the standards required to establish the tort charged. Beye v. Bureau of National Affairs, 59 Md.App. 642, 477 A.2d 1197, 1205, certiorari denied 301 Md. 639, 484 A.2d 274 (1984).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Md.Spec.App.1982. Coms. (d) and (f) quot. in sup. An employee brought suit for assault and battery, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and other tort actions against his employer and several of his supervisors. Under company policy, employees were given annual performance ratings by their supervisors. The plaintiff was given a rating of "competent," which was later changed to a "needs improvement" rating. Based on that rating the plaintiff was not given a raise in salary for that year, and the plaintiff brought suit against the defendants for fraud and deceit. The plaintiff alleged that after bringing the action he was subjected to daily harassment until one day one of his supervisors screamed in the plaintiff's face and pushed him repeatedly. The plaintiff added the torts of assault and battery and intentional infliction of emotional distress to his action against the defendants. The trial court directed a verdict for the defendants on the emotional distress count, and a jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff on the assault and battery count against the defendant supervisor. Both parties appealed. This court affirmed the trial court on both counts. As to the assault and battery count, the court held that there was sufficient evidence from which a jury could conclude that such torts had occurred. On the emotional distress count, a directed verdict had been proper because the defendant's conduct had not been sufficiently extreme or outrageous. Continental Cas. Co. v. Mirabile, 52 Md.App. 387, 449 A.2d 1176, 1186.

Md.Spec.App.1979. Com. (f) quot. in part in sup. Plaintiff instituted suit for fraud, negligent misrepresentation, assault and battery, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted the defendant's motion for a directed verdict on the count alleging emotional distress and, after the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff on the court charging negligent misrepresentation, granted the defendant's motion for a judgment n.o.v. and the plaintiff appealed. The court reversed and remanded, holding, inter alia, that the directed verdict was erroneously granted, since although the evidence did not establish that the defendant intentionally inflicted emotional injury upon the plaintiff, whether he did so with extreme and outrageously reckless conduct was a determination that should have been left to the jury, not made by the trial judge. Vance v. Vance, 41 Md.App. 130, 396 A.2d 296, 302, judgment affirmed in part, judgment reversed in part 286 Md. 490, 408 A.2d 728 (1979). See above case.

Md.Spec.App.1977. Quot. and fol., cit. in ftn. This was an action by an employee against his employer and supervisor for the intentional infliction of emotional distress allegedly resulting from the supervisor's mimicking of the employee's stuttering speech pattern and the way in which he shook his head when speaking. In reversing the lower court's verdict for the plaintiff, the court held that although the supervisor's conduct was intentional and intended to inflict emotional distress, and was outrageous and intolerable in form, the evidence of the employee's nervousness and irritation during the time the emotional distress was allegedly being inflicted was insufficient to show severe emotional distress or any causal connection. Jones v. Harris, 35 Md.App. 556, 371 A.2d 1104, 1106, aff'd 281 Md. 560, 380 A.2d 611 (See above case).

Mass.

Mass.2022. Quot. in case quot. in sup.; com. (i) cit. in case cit. in sup.; com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. and in conc. op. Purported descendant of subjects of 19th century daguerreotype photographs brought, among other things, a claim for reckless infliction of emotional distress against university, alleging that defendant dismissed plaintiff's ancestral connection to the photographs, which were created by defendant's faculty, and that defendant failed to contact plaintiff after using the photographs in publications. The trial court granted defendant's motion to dismiss. This court vacated in part and remanded, holding that plaintiff stated a claim for reckless infliction of emotional distress. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, the court observed that it was appropriate to examine defendant's historical connection to the photographs in determining whether its present conduct was extreme and outrageous, and explained that the fact that defendant's faculty created the photographs by treating the subjects in a dehumanizing fashion was relevant to the analysis. The concurring opinion cited § 46 in pointing out that defendant's present violation of ethical codes governing research institutions further informed the extreme and outrageous nature of its conduct. Lanier v. President and Fellows of Harvard College, 191 N.E.3d 1063, 1075, 1084.

Mass.2014. Illus. 4 quot. in sup. Property owners brought a claim for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress against neighbor, alleging that defendant made a "verbal attack" against plaintiffs when police responded to defendant's report that plaintiffs' car prevented him from pulling out of his driveway. The trial court granted defendant's motion to dismiss that claim. Affirming that portion of the decision, this court held that, because plaintiffs did not describe the content of the verbal attack, their allegation supported nothing more than mere "insults" or "threats" of the sort that failed to establish extreme and outrageous conduct. Polay v. McMahon, 468 Mass. 379, 387, 10 N.E.3d 1122, 1130.

Mass.2012. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Veterinarian brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against private college, after she was excluded from a continuing-veterinary-education lecture on its campus because she had not paid a bill she owed to college for its care of her horse. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant. Affirming, this court held that the alleged conduct of college officials in accusing plaintiff of cruelty and malpractice in connection with her horse that had developed cancer, cursing, and making statements that were generally dismissive of her integrative veterinary practices, along with college assistant director's exclusion of plaintiff from the lecture under threat of arrest, did not approach the type of behavior that could be considered extreme and outrageous for purposes of sustaining her IIED claim. Roman v. Trustees of Tufts College, 461 Mass. 707, 718, 964 N.E.2d 331, 341.

Mass.2010. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case cit. in sup. Terminated sewer department official brought a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, against newspaper publisher and reporters, alleging that defendants made defamatory statements in certain newspaper articles about his having stored inappropriate images on computers owned by the sewer department. The appeals court affirmed the trial court's denial of defendants' motion for summary judgment on plaintiff's IIED claim. This court reversed, and directed that judgment be entered for defendant, holding that plaintiff's IIED claim failed because it rested on the same newspaper articles on which plaintiff's defamation claim was based, and the court had already held that, save one sentence in one of the articles, the articles were fair and accurate reports of official actions and statements. The court additionally concluded that the one erroneous statement that had been made did not constitute "extreme and outrageous" conduct sufficient to support an IIED claim. Howell v. Enterprise Publishing Co., LLC, 455 Mass. 641, 672, 920 N.E.2d 1, 28.

Mass.1997. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Blood relatives of a testator brought an action for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress against the testator's wife and against the law firm that drafted his estate planning documents. Affirming the trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendants, this court held, inter alia, that the wife's conduct in asking the testator to put his home in both of their names shortly before he died did not constitute the extreme or outrageous conduct necessary to prevail on a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court also held that the law firm's attorney who prepared the documents for the testator believed that he was acting consistently with the testator's intent and thus was not liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Tetrault v. Mahoney, Hawkes & Goldings, 425 Mass. 456, 466, 681 N.E.2d 1189, 1197.

Mass.1994. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Husband and wife who were arrested, prosecuted, and acquitted of charges of receiving stolen property sued arresting officers, among others, for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. On transfer from the intermediate appellate court, this court affirmed in part, holding that defendants' conduct was, as a matter of law, not extreme and outrageous. The court said that neither applying for an arrest warrant nor making an arrest pursuant to an issued warrant could be considered utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Sena v. Com., 417 Mass. 250, 629 N.E.2d 986, 994.

Mass.1993. Subsec. (2) cit. in disc. Two brothers sued defendant and defendant's mother and aunt for negligence and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendant's sexual molestation of the older brother severely traumatized him and caused him to sexually molest his younger brother. The jury awarded plaintiffs damages against all defendants. After transferring the case from the appeals court on its own initiative, this court affirmed the trial court's judgment n.o.v. for defendant as to the younger brother's claims and reversed judgment for the older brother against defendant's mother and aunt and dismissed that claim, holding, inter alia, that the younger brother was not entitled to emotional distress damages because he was not present at the time of defendant's misconduct toward his older brother, and there was no evidence that he suffered a severe emotional response on learning of defendant's molestation of his older brother. Anthony H. v. John G., 415 Mass. 196, 199, 612 N.E.2d 663, 665.

Mass.1988. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. An at-will employee sued his former employer for wrongful discharge and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that he was fired from his sales position after complaining to his superiors about false shortage claims made by store managers, manufacturers, and suppliers. The trial court directed a verdict for the defendant.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Affirming in part and reversing in part, this court held, inter alia, that the evidence did not warrant a finding that the employer's conduct was sufficiently extreme in degree or outrageous in character to cause the plaintiff to lose his sales accounts and therefore suffer emotional distress. Mello v. Stop & Shop Companies, Inc., 402 Mass. 555, 524 N.E.2d 105, 109.

Mass.1988. Subsec. (2) cit. in disc. and quot. in ftn., caveat quot. in ftn. A sexually abused child and her mother and brother sued the abuser for assault and battery, and intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress. The trial court awarded damages to the abused child, but denied the mother's and brother's claims for infliction of emotional distress. Affirming, this court held that because the mother did not suffer physical harm and did not witness the injury or come upon the injured child promptly after she suffered the injury, she could not recover for negligent infliction of emotional distress; and that the mother could not recover for intentional infliction of emotional distress because she was not present when the extreme and outrageous conduct was directed at her daughter. Nancy P. v. D'Amato, 401 Mass. 516, 517 N.E.2d 824, 827.

Mass.1987. Com. (c) quot. in ftn. to conc. and diss. op., com. (d) quot. in sup., com. (e) cit. in ftn. to conc. and diss. op., com. (h) cit. in conc. and diss. op., com. (j) quot. in conc. and diss. op. After an employee reported to her supervisor that a coemployee had sexually assaulted her in a conference room at their workplace, criminal charges of rape and assault and battery were filed against the accused employee; however, a jury returned verdicts of not guilty. The accused employee's wife sued the employer for loss of consortium, arising from the employer's alleged intentional infliction of emotional distress on her husband. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for the plaintiff. Reversing and remanding in part, this court held that there was insufficient evidence that the employer's conduct toward the employee ever rose to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct requisite for the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Two concurring and dissenting opinions argued that the majority erred when it reversed the jury's finding that the defendant's conduct was extreme and outrageous. They reasoned that this was a question of fact and the factfinder's judgment should not have been disturbed. Foley v. Polaroid Corp., 400 Mass. 82, 508 N.E.2d 72, 82, 84, 87.

Mass.1985. Com. (d) cit. in disc. Tenants filed a class action against a landlord and his agents for violating the state consumer protection act by including deceptive and illegal clauses in the defendants' standard apartment lease. An individual plaintiff brought an additional action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court found for the class of plaintiffs, awarding treble damages, and for the defendants on the emotional distress claim. This court affirmed the class finding, concluding that the plaintiffs had suffered an injury, but disallowed the award of treble damages. The court also concluded that the defendants' conduct was not “beyond all possible bounds of decency” and thus did not constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress. Leardi v. Brown, 394 Mass. 151, 474 N.E.2d 1094, 1106.

Mass.1985. Com. (d) cit. in conc. and diss. op. A church employee sued her employer on several grounds after she was terminated from her job as a writer for a church-published newspaper, allegedly because she was a lesbian. The trial court denied the employer's motion for summary judgment and dismissal. Reversing in part, this court held that the church had a right to terminate the employee because of her sexual preference. Affirming in part this court held that although the allegations in the employee's complaint failed to state causes of action against the church defendants for defamation and intentional infliction of emotional distress, the employee would be given the opportunity to replead her claims on these issues. A concurring and dissenting opinion argued that the employee had no cause of action for defamation because the newspaper's supervisors were conditionally privileged to discuss the employee's sexual preference, and that there was no cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress because the church defendants' conduct fell far short of being so outrageous and extreme as to incur tort liability. Madsen v. Erwin, 395 Mass. 715, 481 N.E.2d 1160, 1171.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Mass.1982. Com. (d) cit. in disc. The plaintiffs brought suit against the defendant, seeking damages for emotional distress and injuries they allegedly suffered after the defendant erroneously commenced a collection action against the plaintiffs on behalf of his client. The defendant filed a motion to dismiss the plaintiffs' claims on the ground that they failed to state any claim upon which relief could be granted. The trial court granted the defendant's motion to dismiss, and the plaintiffs appealed. This court stated that one who, without a privilege to do so, by extreme and outrageous conduct intentionally caused severe emotional distress to another, with bodily harm resulting from such distress, was subject to liability for such emotional distress and bodily harm. This court found that the defendant's conduct could not be characterized as extreme and outrageous. Therefore, he court upheld the lower court's dismissal of the plaintiff's complaint. Judgment affirmed. Beecy v. Pucciarelli, 387 Mass. 589, 441 N.E.2d 1035, 1040.

Mass.1982. Cit. in disc., com. (i) quot. in disc. The plaintiffs in this action were daughters of women who, while pregnant, ingested the drug DES. The plaintiffs sought damages for their emotional distress arising from the statistical likelihood of their suffering abnormalities of the reproductive organs or contracting clear cell adenocarcinoma. The plaintiffs had not yet exhibited symptoms of these disorders. Some plaintiffs submitted to regular early-detection examinations, which were expensive and traumatic for them, on the advice of their physicians. The plaintiffs asserted that the defendant manufacturers were negligent in marketing the drug without adequate testing or warnings. The federal district court, where the suit was filed, certified questions of law to this court. This court first determined that the plaintiffs' alleged injuries were inadequate to permit recovery. After examining the various methods of treating such claims, the court concluded that a plaintiff seeking recovery for negligent infliction of emotional distress must also introduce evidence of physical harm resulting from the conduct which caused the emotional distress. Secondly, the court declared that the fact that a plaintiff would probably not have been born had her mother not ingested DES would act to bar that plaintiff's recovery. In so concluding, the court rejected the plaintiffs' interpretation of the “would-be rescuer” doctrine, in which a duty of reasonable care is imposed to protect the endangered person from being placed in a worse position due to the rescuer's intervention. Thirdly, the court recognized a right of action for injury to a plaintiff in utero. Finally, the court rejected the theory of market share liability advanced by the plaintiffs. The court based its ruling in part on the deleterious effect which the imposition of such broad liability could have on the development and marketing of new drugs. Payton v. Abbot Labs, 386 Mass. 540, 437 N.E.2d 171, 177.

Mass.1982. Cit. in sup. and coms. (d) and (i) cit. in sup. The plaintiff landlord began summary proceedings to evict the defendant tenant for nonpayment of rent. The tenant counterclaimed for damages for injuries, based upon a claim that water and sewage had flooded her basement apartment approximately thirty times. The defendant did not suffer physical injury because of the flooding, but testimony indicated that she had suffered serious emotional injury as a result of her living conditions. The jury awarded the defendant damages, based, inter alia, upon her claim for reckless infliction of emotional distress. The plaintiff landlord appealed. This court stated that a plaintiff may recover for emotional distress if he can show (1) that the actor intended to inflict emotional distress or that he knew or should have known that emotional distress was likely to result from his conduct, (2) that the conduct was extreme and outrageous, (3) that the defendant's actions caused the plaintiff's distress, and (4) that the plaintiff's emotional distress was severe. Therefore, proof of physical injury is not required. The court stated that the jury could have found, inter alia, that the landlord knew or should have known that unless it fixed the porous wall, flooding would occur, and that floods of sewage and water were very likely to cause emotional harm. The jury could also have found that the landlord had displayed, over a long and repetitious course, such a pattern of indifference that its conduct was outrageous, beyond all possible bounds of decency. The court therefore found that the jury had been warranted in holding the landlord liable for reckless infliction of emotional distress. Simon v. Solomon, 385 Mass. 91, 431 N.E.2d 556, 561, 562.

Mass.1982. Com. (i) cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) cit. in sup. In a summary process action by a landlord against tenants for nonpayment of rent, the trial court denied the tenants' counterclaim for damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The tenants appealed, arguing that the landlord knew or should have known that his failure to alleviate a problem of rodent infestation would cause the tenants severe emotional distress. This court rejected the argument and affirmed the dismissal of the tenants' claim. The court found that the conduct of the landlord was not so outrageous as to form a basis for liability. The landlord did eventually take action to alleviate the problem, and there was insufficient evidence for a finding that he had intended to cause the tenants any emotional distress. Wolfberg v. Hunter, 385 Mass. 390, 432 N.E.2d 467, 471, 472.

Mass.1980. Subsec. (1) and (2) cit. in ftn. A wife and her two children filed a complaint alleging that her husband, their father, had been injured as a result of the negligent, wilful, wanton and reckless conduct of his employer. The plaintiffs had been notified that the victim had been injured, they rushed to the hospital and found the victim paralyzed. The plaintiffs claimed that the injures to the victim caused, inter alia, the wife's loss of consortium and the children's loss of society. The trial court denied the defendant's motions for summary judgment on the claims for the loss of consortium and loss of society but granted the defendant's motions to dismiss the claims of mental anguish and impaired health. This court affirmed the denial of summary judgment on the consortium claim. The court examined the loss of society claim more carefully because it was a case of first impression in Massachusetts. The court stated that allowing recovery for loss of society may create a multiplicity of suits, extortionary litigation, vague guidelines concerning when a child becomes an adult and the possibility that juries would be unable to fix damages which are so speculative. The court noted, however, that a child can recover in a wrongful death action, and found that a minor's loss of society was an extension of that doctrine. The court looked to the children's dependence on their father and stated that not only economic considerations but also filial needs for nurture and guidance should be considered. Therefore the court held that children should be able to recover for the reasonable expectation of parental society when a parent suffers a severe but nonfatal injury. The court then discussed the claims of mental anguish and impaired health. The court noted that the plaintiffs had not been at the scene of the accident but stated that the effect of seeing the victim a few minutes later at the hospital was just as injurious. The court stated that as long as the plaintiffs' shock immediately followed the accident, whether at the scene of the accident or at the hospital, the injury to the plaintiffs was foreseeable. The defendant argued that the Workmen's Compensation Act precluded all of the plaintiffs' claims. The court rejected this argument and stated that a victim, who had accepted such payments, had waived his right to sue, but that his wife and children had not waived their rights. Their claims were consequential to claims which might have arisen if the victim had sued for lost wages. The court noted that the plaintiffs alleged wilful, wanton and reckless infliction of emotional distress but stated that it did not appear that there were sufficient facts to support this claim. The court stated that it was not ruling on the validity of a claim for intentional infliction of mental distress through conduct directed at a third party because it was not reaching that issue in this case. The court therefore affirmed the denial of the defendant's motion for summary judgment for the loss of consortium and the loss of society, but reversed the grant of summary judgment on the claims of mental anguish and impaired health. Ferriter v. Daniel O'Connell's Sons, Inc., 381 Mass. 507, 413 N.E.2d 690, 697.

Mass.1980. Subsec. (1) quot. in ftn. and com. (d) quot. in part in sup. The plaintiff brought an action for severe emotional distress allegedly caused by the outrageous conduct of his employer following his discharge. Plaintiff's attendance record was poor and several times he had not notified the office that he would not be present. At least some of the absences were caused by a nervous condition. Because the plaintiff was on a six-month probationary period, it was determined that he was not a good risk for long term employment because of the attendance problems and also because there was a doubt about his ability to withstand the strain of the position. The trial court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The issue to be considered was whether the trier of fact could have reasonably found that the supervisors' conduct toward the plaintiff was so outrageous in character and extreme in degree as to go beyond the bounds of decency, be regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. It was found that the plaintiff failed to make out a plausible case of “outrage” and the judgment of the trial court was affirmed. Richey v. American Auto. Ass'n, Inc., 380 Mass. 835, 406 N.E.2d 675, 676-678.

Mass.1979. Com. (d) and (h) cit. in disc. and com. (f) and illus. (9) through (11) cit. in sup. The plaintiff brought an action for intentional or reckless infliction of emotional distress against a private investigator engaged in investigating the plaintiff's brother-in-law. The trial court entered judgment for the plaintiff. This court affirmed the trial court's judgment and held that it was for the jury to decide whether the plaintiff's conduct was such as could be characterized as “extreme and outrageous.” Boyle v. Wenk, 378 Mass. 592, 392 N.E.2d 1053, 1055-1057.

Mass.1976. Cit. in sup., coms. (i), (d), (j), (h) cit. in disc. and com. (b) cit. in ftn. in disc. A wife brought suit against an employer-restaurant for mental anguish and emotional distress resulting from her summary dismissal from employment and her husband sued for the loss of services and companionship of his wife. On appeal from dismissal of their claims, the court held that mental anguish, even without resulting physical injury, caused by defendant's extreme and outrageous conduct and without privilege subjects defendant to liability for such emotional distress. It is for plaintiff to show that defendant's conduct was of such a nature to, and did indeed, cause her distress. If it should be found that she has a cause of action against defendant, her spouse also has a cause of action for loss of consortium arising out of the distress. Agis v. Howard Johnson Co., 355 N.E.2d 315, 317, 318.

Mass.1971. Cit. and subsec. (1) quot. and coms. (e), (f) and (j) cit. andquot. in sup. and com. (d) Rptr's. notes quot. in part in sup. Plaintiff brought suit to recover damages for emotional distress and resultant physical injuries caused by defendants. The defendants sold goods to plaintiff's emancipated son on credit. They then falsely alleged that plaintiff had guaranteed to pay her son's debt, and in an attempt to intimidate her, began to harass her by constant telephone calls, letters, and other tactics. Plaintiff's health deteriorated, and she sustained a heart attack. Plaintiff's attorney warned defendants that plaintiff's health had deteriorated, but defendants continued to harass the plaintiff. Plaintiff alleged that as a result she sustained another heart attack. Plaintiff sued on the theory that the defendants intentionally caused her emotional distress which resulted in her physical injuries. The trial court sustained defendants' demurrer. On appeal, the court reversed, holding that one who intentionally causes another severe emotional distress by extreme and outrageous conduct is liable for the emotional distress and resulting physical injuries, even though he has committed no other common law tort. George v. JordanMarsh Company, 268 N.E.2d 915, 921, 46 A.L.R.3d 762.

Mass.App.

Mass.App.2018. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Former employee of university brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against university and individuals associated with its student newspaper, after the newspaper published articles reporting that he had allegedly taken photographs of women on the campus without their permission. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. Reversing in part, this court held that a trier of fact could reasonably find that newspaper's publication, both online and in print, of plaintiff's photographs alongside allegations that he was surreptitiously photographing women on campus was so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious, and utterly intolerable in a civilized community, as required to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Butcher v. University of Massachusetts, 111 N.E.3d 294, 303.

Mass.App.2007. Quot. in part in case quot. in sup., cit. in ftn., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. (general cites). After landlord served a notice to quit on tenant and sued tenant for possession of the premises and unpaid rent despite having been repeatedly informed by tenant that her section 8 subsidy had been terminated wrongfully and that her rent should be adjusted accordingly, landlord, on the day of trial, effectively settled all rental issues. The trial court entered judgment on tenant's counterclaim for statutory interference with quiet enjoyment, awarded her emotional-distress damages, and then doubled the award. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that the trial court's finding that landlord's actions were extreme and outrageous and caused tenant severe distress were warranted. The court pointed to landlord's "contumacious" refusal to correct the mistake, and the disastrous nature of the eviction threat to a single mother with children. Homesavers Council of Greenfield Gardens, Inc. v. Sanchez, 70 Mass.App.Ct. 453, 459, 874 N.E.2d 497, 503.

Mass.App.2003. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in ftn. Commercial lessee sued lessor for breach of lease agreement and constructive eviction, claiming, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with lessor's alleged attempts to cause lessee to break lease. Trial court dismissed emotional-distress claim. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that excerpts from individual lessee's discovery transcripts supported lower court's ruling that lessor's conduct was not so extreme or outrageous as to support claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Northern Associates, Inc. v. Kiley, 57 Mass.App.Ct. 874, 884, 787 N.E.2d 1078, 1086.

Mass.App.2001. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Surviving spouse of patient sued hospital and physicians for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that scope of husband's autopsy for which she had given written consent had been exceeded. Affirming in part the trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendants, this court held, inter alia, that nothing in plaintiff's deposition testimony or defendant physician's statements to autopsy team supported a theory that physician had recklessly misled plaintiff or that he had actual knowledge that the procedure would be so intrusive, and thus his conduct did not rise to the level of outrageousness necessary to maintain a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Kelly v. Brigham & Women's Hosp., 51 Mass.App.Ct. 297, 311, 745 N.E.2d 969, 979.

Mass.App.2000. Com. (d) quot. in disc. Husband brought tort action against man with whom wife was engaged in an extramarital affair. The trial court dismissed the complaint for failure to comply with the applicable statute of limitations. Affirming, this court held that, while the action was timely, the allegations amounted to the torts of alienation of affections and criminal conversation, and thus the complaint failed to state a claim upon which relief could be granted, and that an extramarital affair, even if conducted for the purpose of hurting the other spouse, did not rise to the level of outrageousness necessary to support an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Quinn v. Walsh, 49 Mass.App.Ct. 696, 732 N.E.2d 330, 339.

Mass.App.1999. Coms. (d) and (i)-(k) cit. in ftn., illus. 1, 15, 16, 19 cit. in ftn. After a teenage boy died while having sexual relations with a married woman, the woman drove to the boy's home and left his body in the gutter in front of the house. The boy's mother suffered a nervous breakdown upon learning of the circumstances of the discovery of her son's body. She sued the woman and the woman's homeowners' insurer for wrongful death and intentional infliction of emotional distress. After the insurer settled the wrongful-death claim, trial court granted the insurer summary judgment on the emotional-distress claim, holding that coverage for injuries resulting from the woman's disposal of the body was precluded under the exclusion for injuries expected or intended by the insured. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that the plaintiff's emotional distress was not a "bodily injury" within the meaning of the policy. Richardson v. Liberty Mutual Fire Insurance Company, 47 Mass.App.Ct. 698, 716 N.E.2d 117, 120.

Mass.App.1994. Com. (d) cit. in sup. and in ftn., coms. (e) and (f) cit. in disc., com. (j) cit. in ftn., illus. 1-13 cit. generally in disc. Bookkeeper quit job after employer asserted that she had diverted inventory and sold it for her own account, or had collaborated with employer's shipping manager in selling inventory for his account. When contacted by employment agency as to why he would not rehire woman, employer's president stated that circumstances surrounding woman's leaving were the subject of a police investigation. Woman sued employer and president, alleging, inter alia, malicious prosecution and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Jury found for plaintiff except as to defamation count. The trial court entered judgment n.o.v. for defendants as to malicious prosecution and emotional distress counts. Affirming in part, this court held, in part, that judgment n.o.v. was proper as to emotional-distress claim, since investigation and reporting of suspected theft was founded in reasonable apprehension based on objective facts. Furthermore, defendants handled plaintiff with comparative graciousness, as they did not fire her, vilify her, or take steps to maximize her shame in her co-workers' eyes. Conway v. Smerling, 37 Mass.App.Ct. 1, 635 N.E.2d 268, 273.

Mass.App.1992. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in sup. Plaintiffs, who attributed their financial difficulties to various acts of a bank, sued the bank for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Affirming the trial court's entry of summary judgment for defendant, this court held that the facts upon which plaintiffs based their claim did not rise to the level required for liability. Botschafter v. F.D.I.C., 33 Mass.App.Ct. 595, 603 N.E.2d 235, 237.

Mass.App.1974. Cit. in sup. The plaintiff, the father of a minor who had been killed in a motorcycle accident, brought an action against the defendant newspaper and the county medical examiner for extreme and outrageous conduct causing emotional distress. The newspaper had printed the medical examiner's statement, without revealing the victim's name, that the victim had a long history of involvement with drugs. The court sustained the defendants' demurrer to the complaint, holding that, assuming the existing of such a cause of action, in the absence of bodily harm resulting from the defendants' conduct, the alleged conduct was neither extreme and outrageous nor indicative of an intent to harm the plaintiff. Casamasina v. Worcester Tel. & Gazette, Inc., 307 N.E.2d 865, 866.

Mich.

Mich.1985. Quot. in disc., cit. but dist., cit. in conc. op., cit. generally in case quot. in ftn. to conc. op., cit. in ftn. to conc. op.; coms. (d), (g), and (j) quot. in disc., com. (k) cit. in disc., coms. cit. generally in conc. op., coms. (e) and (f) cit. in ftn. to conc. op.; illus. cit. generally in conc. op., illus. 1, 2, 3, 5, 7, and 9 quot. in ftn. to conc. op., illus. 7, 12, and 14 cit. in ftn. to conc. op., illus. 12 cit. in conc. op. Plaintiffs' daughter was struck by a car while riding her bicycle. The defendant insurance company paid the medical bills, but denied plaintiffs' claim for replacement services benefits under the state no-fault insurance statute. Plaintiffs sued for breach of the insurance contract and claimed damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered judgment for the plaintiffs; the court of appeals affirmed. The supreme court reversed, holding that the defendant's failure to provide application forms for the benefits did not constitute extreme and outrageous conduct. Since the plaintiffs merely became angry, but did not suffer grief, depression, or disruption of life style, or need treatment for anxiety, they did not sufficiently prove severe emotional distress. One concurring justice would have the court join the trend in recognizing the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress, but another concurring justice questioned the wisdom of extending this tort to cover unfair insurance claim settlement practices. Roberts v. Auto-Owners Ins. Co., 422 Mich. 594, 374 N.W.2d 905, 908, 909, 911-913, 915, 916, 920, 921.

Mich.App.

Mich.App.2003. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. After boyfriend surreptitiously videotaped intimate acts of sexual relations with three of his girlfriends without their consent, former girlfriends sued boyfriend for common-law right to privacy and intentional or reckless infliction of emotional distress. Trial court entered judgment on jury verdict for plaintiffs. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that the act of secretly videotaping plaintiffs having sexual relations was deceptive and a breach of trust, and a reasonable person could conclude that such an act would cause emotional distress. Lewis v. Legrow, 258 Mich.App. 175, 670 N.W.2d 675, 689.

Mich.App.2002. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Hospital visitor who had inadvertently left her wedding ring and watch at the hospital sued hospital and the security company to which the hospital turned over the jewelry, alleging conversion, breach of bailment, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. The trial court granted defendants' summary disposition, concluding that the plaintiff failed to prove that her claim exceeded the court's $25,000 statutory jurisdictional minimum. This court affirmed, holding that, because defendants' failure to locate plaintiff's jewelry was not extreme and outrageous conduct, plaintiff could not establish emotional-distress claim so as to meet the court's jurisdictional limit. Bernhardt v. Ingham Regional Medical Center, 249 Mich.App. 274, 278, 641 N.W.2d 868, 870.

Mich.App.1999. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in disc. Former employees of department of corrections sued supervisor for racial discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered summary judgment for defendant. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held that material factual issues existed as to whether defendant discriminated against plaintiffs because of their race and because of their associations with persons of other races; however, the court could not say that defendant's actions were sufficiently extreme or outrageous as to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Graham v. Ford, 237 Mich.App. 670, 604 N.W.2d 713, 716, appeal after remand 2004 WL 790313 (Mich.App.2004).

Mich.App.1999. Com. (h) cit. in case cit. in sup. Parishioner brought suit for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress against minister who had engaged in a sexual relationship with her. Affirming the trial court's grant of summary disposition in favor of minister, this court held, inter alia, that defendant's behavior did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Teadt v. Lutheran Church, 237 Mich.App. 567, 603 N.W.2d 816, 824.

Mich.App.1996. Cit. in headnote, com. (j) quot. and cit. in sup. Orthopedic surgeon sued his co-worker, a nurse, for intentional infliction of emotional distress following a two-year period during which nurse threatened doctor and his fiancee with physical harm, left lingerie on doctor's car and outside his home, and left a hatchet, and later an axe, on the fiancee's vehicle. The trial court entered judgment for doctor. Affirming, this court held that nurse's conduct was so extreme and outrageous as to exceed the bounds of acceptable behavior, and that doctor had established that he suffered mental distress so severe that no reasonable person could be expected to endure it. Haverbush v. Powelson, 217 Mich.App. 228, 551 N.W.2d 206, 206, 209.

Mich.App.1992. Cit. in case cit. in sup. Physician who had opened a family practice clinic under an arrangement with a hospital sued the hospital for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, after it discharged her. Affirming the trial court's granting of summary disposition for defendant, this court held that plaintiff did not specifically allege conduct that was sufficiently extreme or outrageous to establish liability in tort. The court also stated that in a contractual setting a tort claim must rest on a breach of duty distinct from contract. Kamalnath v. Mercy Memorial Hosp. Corp., 194 Mich.App. 543, 487 N.W.2d 499, 506.

Mich.App.1992. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee sued former employer and supervisor for sexual and religious harassment and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Trial court granted partial summary disposition for defendants on the harassment charges and granted summary disposition for defendants on the emotional distress claim. Reversing in part, this court held that plaintiff's claim for incidents occurring before 1984 was not barred by the statute of limitations because defendants' course of discriminatory conduct constituted a continuing violation. The court affirmed the grant of summary judgment for defendants on the emotional distress claim, holding that where the supervisor and other employees continually made derogatory comments to plaintiff concerning her gender and religion, these actions were not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support a claim for emotional distress. Meek v. Michigan Bell Telephone Co., 193 Mich.App. 340, 483 N.W.2d 407, 410, appeal denied 440 Mich. 872, 486 N.W.2d 743 (1992).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Mich.App.1991. Com. (d) quot. in disc., com. (g) cit. in case quot. in disc. In the presence of another employee, the immediate supervisor of a credit union employee told her that she was being terminated because of allegations of theft made against her by two credit union members. The employee sued her employer and supervisor alleging negligent termination, defamation, breach of contract, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that the defendants' conduct was not sufficiently outrageous to constitute a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court noted that the defendants' conduct occurred in the presence of only a small group of business principals, and that allegations of wrongdoing by the plaintiff were not bandied about unnecessarily in an outrageous manner. Gonyea v. Motor Parts Fed. Credit Union, 192 Mich.App. 74, 480 N.W.2d 297, 301.

Mich.App.1988. Coms. (d) and (g) cit. in case quot. in disc. After an insurance company repeatedly threatened to cut off an insured's workers' compensation benefits and demanded that he repay them a large sum of money, the insured sued the insurance company on a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court denied the defendant's motion for summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that the plaintiff alleged sufficient facts of a deliberate pattern of harassment by the defendant to satisfy the threshold requirement of extreme and outrageous conduct, which is conduct that goes beyond all possible bounds of decency. Atkinson v. Farley, 171 Mich.App. 784, 431 N.W.2d 95, 97.

Mich.App.1988. Coms. (d) and (g) quot. in case quot. in sup. A noncustodial divorced mother sued her ex-husband, who had custody, for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that he used his psychiatric training to destroy the relationship between the children and their mother. The trial court granted summary disposition for the custodial parent. Reversing and remanding, this court held that a jury could find that the deliberate destruction of the parent-child relationship constituted outrageous conduct sufficient to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Bhama v. Bhama, 169 Mich.App. 73, 425 N.W.2d 733, 735.

Mich.App.1988. Cit. and quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc., coms. (j) and (k) cit. in case quot. in disc. An individual negotiated with the Amateur Hockey Association of the United States (AHAUS) to purchase the exclusive right to distribute posters of the gold-medal-winning 1980 United States Olympic Hockey Team. The AHAUS then sold to an automobile company the right to use the team in a television advertisement promoting its products. Despite having knowledge of the individual's exclusive poster rights, the automobile company procured a team photograph and created a poster to give away at its dealerships. The individual sued the company and the AHAUS for tortious interference with a business relationship and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court dismissed the emotional distress claim and entered judgment for the plaintiff on the claim for tortious interference. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that the defendants intentionally and improperly interfered with the plaintiff's exclusive rights to distribute posters; however, their conduct was not sufficiently outrageous to state a cause of action for emotional distress. Bonelli v. Volkswagen of America, Inc., 166 Mich.App. 483, 421 N.W.2d 213, 228, 229.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Mich.App.1988. Cit. in disc., quot. in diss. op., com. (d) cit. in sup. and quot. in case quot. in diss. op., com. (i) quot. in diss. op. After several years of receiving benefits from an insurance company, a claims agent suggested to the plaintiff that she have her leg amputated rather than endure continued treatment. She sued the insurance company for intentional infliction of emotional distress, claiming that the statements made to induce the amputation created suicidal thoughts. The trial court granted the defendant summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that merely insensitive remarks would not create liability and said that relating an unpleasant option was not atrocious or intolerable. The dissent contended that the claims agent, by discussing amputation, may have abused his authority over the plaintiff at a time when the insurer was dilatory in the payment of benefits due to the plaintiff, and that this could be deemed both outrageous and in deliberate disregard of a high probability of causing emotional distress. Grochowalski v. Detroit Auto. Inter-Ins., 171 Mich.App. 771, 430 N.W.2d 822, 824, 826, 827.

Mich.App.1988. Com. (d) quot. in disc. and generally in sup. A male supervisor allegedly made a sexually suggestive comment to a female auto worker, who was discharged when she refused to accede to his suggestion. When she sued him for intentional infliction of emotional distress, the trial court denied the defendant's motion for summary judgment. Reversing and dismissing the claim, this court determined, inter alia, that the trial court erred in concluding that the defendant's conduct would support such a claim. The court reasoned that although the defendant's overture was repulsive, his statements made in the atmosphere of an adult workplace were insufficient to meet the standard of extreme and outrageous conduct required for a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Trudeau v. Fisher Body Div., General Motors Corp., 168 Mich.App. 14, 423 N.W.2d 592, 594.

Mich.App.1987. Quot. in sup., com. (j) quot. in sup., com. (k) cit. in sup. Plaintiff sued his co-worker for intentional infliction of emotional distress after defendant, apparently unhappy with plaintiff's performance as a union steward, made continual complaints and accusations against him at work and harassed him and his family at home. The abuse continued from August 1980 up to the time of trial. This court affirmed the trial court's award of damages to the plaintiff, holding that the evidence was sufficient for a jury to determine that defendant's actions were extreme and outrageous, and that this conduct caused plaintiff to suffer severe emotional distress as manifested by his change in behavior and his medical treatment for stress-related symptoms. Dickerson v. Nichols, 161 Mich.App. 103, 409 N.W.2d 741, 743.

Mich.App.1987. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. A man who was acquitted of a crime sued a state trooper for malicious prosecution and intentional infliction of emotional distress, claiming that the trooper excluded some exculpatory facts from his incident report. Affirming the trial court's dismissal of the claims, this court held that the conduct of the defendant was not sufficiently "extreme or outrageous" to constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court also held that proof of malicious intent was necessary to support a claim for malicious prosecution for the protection of the interests of the public and of private people aiding prosecutions; in this case the evidence showed that the trooper wrote his report in good faith, not with malice. King v. Arbic, 159 Mich.App. 452, 406 N.W.2d 852, 854.

Mich.App.1987. Coms. (d) and (g) quot. in case quot. in sup. A mortgagor sued its mortgagee for intentional infliction of emotional distress, having received numerous threatening and abusive phone calls concerning alleged nonpayment, despite timely payment. The trial court granted the defendant's motion to dismiss on the ground that the conduct was insufficiently extreme and outrageous to permit recovery. Reversing, this court argued that such conduct could be regarded as sufficiently extreme and outrageous within the criteria for intentional emotional distress; this was a proper question for the trier of fact, and summary disposition was inappropriate. Margita v. Diamond Mortgage Corporation, 159 Mich.App. 181, 406 N.W.2d 268, 271.

Mich.App.1986. Quot. in part in disc., coms. (d) and (g) quot. in case quot. in disc. A motorist had a bowel movement in his clothing in the presence of his fiancee and a police officer when the policeman detained the motorist to write out a speeding ticket. The motorist sued the policeman for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment, on the grounds that the motorist had failed to state a claim. Affirming, this court held that the policeman was not liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress simply because he had refused to allow the motorist to use a restroom while he wrote out the ticket. Cebulski v. City of Belleville, 156 Mich.App. 190, 401 N.W.2d 616, 618, 619.

Mich.App.1986. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. An insurance company refused to pay a policy holder's fire damage claim, alleging that he had exaggerated the loss, and had purposely caused the fire. The policy holder sued the company for breach of contract and resultant intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted summary judgment for the plaintiff and awarded damages. This court reversed, holding that the defendant's conduct was not sufficiently outrageous to support a claim of intentional infliction of distress where the plaintiff rested his mental distress damages claim on the insurer's failure to reasonably investigate his claim and the allegation that the insurer accused the plaintiff of arson and fraud when it had no evidence to support those allegations. Crossley v. Allstate Ins. Co., 155 Mich.App. 694, 400 N.W.2d 625, 628.

Mich.App.1986. Quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc., com. (g) quot. in case quot. in sup. After an insurer successfully defended a lawsuit brought by a man claiming to be disabled, the insurer sued the man's doctors for insurance fraud. When the doctors prevailed, they sued the insurer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress and invasion of privacy. The trial court granted summary judgment to the insurer. Affirming, this court held that the insurer was not liable for inflicting emotional distress where it had done no more than to insist upon its legal rights in a permissible way, and even if this conduct were not privileged, the act of filing suit was not sufficiently outrageous to sustain a claim for emotional distress. Early Detection Ctr. v. N.Y. Life Ins., 157 Mich.App. 618, 403 N.W.2d 830, 833, 834.

Mich.App.1986. Com. (d) quot. in sup. The plaintiffs were arrested for robbery after the employees of a restaurant wrongly identified them as the perpetrators of an earlier robbery. The plaintiffs sued the restaurant for false imprisonment, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and false light invasion of privacy. The trial court denied the defendant's motion for summary judgment. Reversing, this court held that the employees did not commit a false arrest in merely supplying information to the police because it was the police who had to act on the information. The court also held that the defendant's employees' conduct was not so outrageous as to justify a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and that the plaintiffs' false light claim was groundless because communications between a citizen and the police are privileged. Hall v. Pizza Hut of America, Inc., 153 Mich.App. 609, 396 N.W.2d 809, 812.

Mich.App.1986. Subsec. (1) quot. in case cit. in sup., coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case cit. in sup. A maintenance supervisor who suffered an injury on the job collected workers' compensation benefits until he was fired after he attempted to return to work and his benefits were cut off. He sued his employer, the workers' compensation insurer, and the insurer's servicing agent, alleging that they had conspired to cut off his benefits and that resulted in his suffering emotional distress. The trial court denied the defendants' motions for summary judgment. This court reversed, holding that the defendants' alleged conduct was not sufficiently outrageous or atrocious to support a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress, even though the conduct would call into serious question the business practices of the defendants. Lisecki v. Taco Bell Restaurants, Inc., 150 Mich.App. 749, 389 N.W.2d 173, 174, 175.

Mich.App.1986. Cit. in case cit. in disc. An insured's diesel tractor rig was damaged when the vehicle jackknifed. The insured sued his insurer for breach of contract, negligence in adjustment, and intentional infliction of emotional distress in willfully failing to settle the plaintiff's collision claim in a timely and proper manner. The trial court dismissed the plaintiff's intentional infliction of emotional distress claim. This court affirmed in part and reversed in part, holding that the plaintiff failed to adequately plead the elements of an independent cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court reasoned that the plaintiff's allegation that the defendant negligently adjusted his claim fell short of the requirement that the conduct be intentional or reckless, and that the defendant's alleged intentional or willful refusal to settle the plaintiff's claim did not constitute outrageous conduct. Wendt v. Auto Owners Ins. Co., 156 Mich.App. 19, 401 N.W.2d 375, 378.

Mich.App.1985. Cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. The plaintiff sued an insurance company and its attorneys for bringing a subrogation action against her. The defendants had mistaken the plaintiff for another woman with the same name who had been involved in an accident, and they had pursued the action despite the plaintiff's numerous protestations that she had not been involved. The plaintiff won judgments on all counts, and this court affirmed the judgments for breach of contract, malicious prosecution, and defamation. The court held that "special injury" for purposes of defamation meant actual harm. The court reversed judgment for intentional infliction of emotional distress, however, because it felt that the defendants' conduct had not been sufficiently extreme or outrageous. It reversed the judgment for invasion of privacy because the defendants had not discovered any secret or private matter. Hall v. Citizens Ins. Co. of America, 141 Mich.App. 676, 368 N.W.2d 250, 254.

Mich.App.1985. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in sup. A physician brought an action against his attorney and the firm that represented him in a medical malpractice action. The physician alleged that his attorney wrote a defamatory letter and distributed the letter to the physician's insurer, to codefendants' attorneys, and to a nonparty. The physician brought counts of defamation, publicity placing him in a false light, infliction of emotional distress, and legal malpractice. The trial court granted summary judgment for the attorney on the legal malpractice claim, but denied it for the other allegations. This court affirmed in part and reversed in part, granting summary judgment for defendants on all counts. The defamation and false light publicity claims failed because the court held that the letter did not injure the physician's reputation, and that its distribution was limited rather than publicly disseminated. The intentional infliction of emotional distress claim failed because the court held that the defendants' conduct was not extreme or outrageous. The court dismissed the legal malpractice claim for prematurity because it was based on a medical malpractice action that was still pending. Sawabini v. Desenberg, 143 Mich.App. 373, 372 N.W.2d 559, 565.

Mich.App.1984. Quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. The plaintiffs joined the defendant's health spa pursuant to a contract in which the defendant reserved the right to make future rules and regulations. After the defendant instituted a dress code, the plaintiffs sued for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The defendant's motion for summary judgment was granted on the theory that plaintiffs had failed to state a claim upon which relief could be granted. This court affirmed. Noting that the plaintiffs had to allege that the defendant's actions were extreme and outrageous, the court observed that the complaints alleged merely that the defendant had enforced the dress code. This court held that these allegations were insufficient to establish extreme and outrageous conduct. Ferrell v. Vic Tanny International, Inc., 137 Mich.App. 238, 357 N.W.2d 669, 673-674.

Mich.App.1984. Quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in sup. Plaintiff was discharged as general manager of defendant's store for failure to correct inventory shortages. In a suit for wrongful discharge, defamation, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, the trial court granted summary judgment for defendant on all counts. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that defendant had a legal right to terminate plaintiff's employment with or without cause. On the defamation count, plaintiff admitted that she did not know who had been told that she was discharged for inventory shortages. The court held that plaintiff had not established the necessary elements of defamation, including the defamatory words, colloquium, and publication. On the issue of intentional infliction of emotional distress, the court noted that no liability would be imposed when the actor did no more than insist on his legal rights, and agreed with the trial court that defendant's conduct was not sufficient to meet the “extreme and outrageous” requirement. Ledl v. Quik Pik Food Stores, Inc., 133 Mich.App. 583, 349 N.W.2d 529, 532, 533.

Mich.App.1984. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc., coms. (e), (f), (g) cit. in case quot. in disc. A widow sued her husband's brothers and their accountants and attorneys for breach of contract, breach of fiduciary duties, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. One count of the plaintiff's complaint alleged that the defendants engaged in extreme and outrageous conduct to inflict emotional distress for the purpose of forcing her to sell her stock in the various corporations and business ventures with which her husband had been involved. The trial court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment on the ground that the plaintiff's claims did not present the type of gross or outrageous conduct required to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court reversed and reinstated that count. The court found that questions of material fact precluded summary judgment, which is not appropriate in cases involving intent, credibility, or state of mind. Rosenberg v. Rosenberg Bros. Special Account, 134 Mich.App. 342, 351 N.W.2d 563, 567-568.

Mich.App.1984. Quot. in ftn. in sup., com. (d) quot. in ftn. in sup. The plaintiff, a pre-trial detainee in a suicidal state who was kept disrobed in her cell for several days, sued for intention infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted the defendant a directed verdict. Affirming, this court held that the conduct of which the plaintiff complained was not outrageous and was a precautionary measure to protect detainee in a suicidal state. Rushing v. Wayne County, 138 Mich.App. 121, 358 N.W.2d 904, 909, 910, appeal denied 430 Mich. 867, 449 N.W.2d 106 (1988), order vacated on reconsideration 433 Mich. 917, 449 N.W.2d 410 (1989).

Mich.App.1984. Cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. A teacher sued the parent of a student, alleging that statements in the parent's letter written to the principal pursuant to an established grievance procedure were libelous and intended to inflict emotional distress upon the teacher. The trial court granted summary judgment for the parent and the intervening school board. Affirming, this court held that the parent's use of a school district's complaint procedure cannot, as a matter of law, be regarded as so outrageous and extreme to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Swenson-Davis v. Martel, 135 Mich.App. 632, 354 N.W.2d 288, 292.

Mich.App.1983. Quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. Decedent, a minor employee, was assisting his co-workers in moving an overloaded cart when the 2,500 pounds of glass loaded on the cart fell on him. Decedent's co-workers delayed taking him to a hospital and cleaned up the accident site to mislead police. Decedent's parents brought suit against decedent's employer and co-workers alleging negligence and intentional torts committed against decedent, and intentional infliction of emotional distress committed against themselves. The trial court granted accelerated judgment for the defendants on the negligence and emotional distress counts. Affirming in part and reversing in part, this court found error only in the trial court's granting of accelerated judgment for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Such claim, belonging only to the parents, was not derivative and was outside the scope of the wrongful death act and the Workers' Disability Compensation Act. Barnes v. Double Seal Glass Co. Inc., Plant 1, 129 Mich.App. 66, 341 N.W.2d 812, 817.

Mich.App.1983. Com. (g) cit. in disc. An insurance company was to provide plaintiff benefits for replacement services pursuant to the settlement of a lawsuit. When the insurance company demanded daily, detailed reports of the services, plaintiff protested. The company offered a reduction in benefits as an alternative to the reports, and plaintiff brought suit for breach of the settlement agreement and for intentional infliction of emotional distress. A jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff. This court reversed in part and held that the settlement agreement constituted a commercial contract, therefore barring any recovery for emotional distress. The court added that one was not liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress where he had only insisted upon his legal rights in a permissible way, even though he knew that such insistence would cause emotional distress. Butt v. Detroit Auto. Inter Insurance Exch., 129 Mich.App. 211, 341 N.W.2d 474, 478.

Mich.App.1983. Cit. in sup., com. (d) cit. in sup. An insured sued a no-fault insurer for breach of contract and intentional infliction of emotional distress, claiming that defendant refused to pay or delayed payments of personal injury benefits to plaintiff. Defendant's motion for partial summary judgment on the emotional distress count was denied. The appellate court reversed, holding that defendant was entitled to partial summary judgment because defendant's alleged acts did not, as a matter of law, rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to sustain a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Harris v. Citizens Ins. Co., 141 Mich.App. 110, 366 N.W.2d 11, 12-13.

Mich.App.1983. Quot. in disc. and com. (d) quot. in disc. An employee was sexually assaulted by her supervisor and brought suit against the supervisor and her employer. Plaintiff moved to amend her complaint to allege violations of civil rights and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court denied the motion and dismissed the complaint for lack of jurisdiction. This court reversed, holding that plaintiff could amend her complaint to add the allegation of civil rights violations. As for intentional infliction of emotional distress, however, plaintiff could amend her complaint to add the allegation against her supervisor, but not against the employer. This court stated that an employer was liable only for the acts of its employee committed within the scope of his employment, not outside such scope as here. McCalla v. Ellis, 129 Mich.App. 452, 341 N.W.2d 525, 528.

Mich.App.1983. Com. (h) quot. in sup. A bicyclist, injured when she was struck by an automobile, and her parents sued and recovered a judgment against the insurer for breach of contract and intentional infliction of mental distress. On appeal, the insurer argued that a breach of an insurance contract is insufficient to support a claim for intentional infliction of mental distress. This court affirmed, holding that the case involved more than a mere failure to pay benefits, as it was based on allegations that the insurer intentionally attempted to frustrate the claimants' application for benefits. The jury's determination that the insurer's conduct was extreme and outrageous was found to be supported by credible evidence. Roberts v. Auto Owners Ins. Co., 135 Mich.App. 595, 354 N.W.2d 271, 273, reversed 422 Mich. 594, 374 N.W.2d 905 (1985). See above case.

Mich.App.1982. Quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc., com. (g) cit. in case quot. in disc. An injured worker brought an action against a workers' compensation carrier to recover for the intentional infliction of emotional distress in the handling of the plaintiff's workers' compensation benefits claim. The trial court granted the insurance company's motion for a directed verdict, and the court of appeals affirmed. The worker could not recover for intentional infliction of emotional distress in the handling of his claim, since the unjustified termination of the worker's benefits for over three months when he failed to attend vocational rehabilitation, and did not provide the proper medical authorization to justify the failure, did not establish an intent to cause the worker severe emotional distress and was not done in reckless disregard of the consequences. The insurance company's refusal to guarantee payment of the worker's doctor bills without a report from the doctor stating that the treatment was for a work-related injury was not intended to cause the worker the requisite emotional distress nor was it intended to harass him. The insurance company's conduct could have been viewed as a proper attempt to protect its interests. Holmes v. Allstate Ins. Co., 119 Mich.App. 710, 326 N.W.2d 616, 618.

Mich.App.1982. Quot. and com. (d) quot. in sup.; com. (c) cit. in ftn.; coms. (e) through (g) cit. in disc. The plaintiff brought an action against a shopowner who had called the plaintiff a "nigger" and had ejected him from the store. The plaintiff alleged, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress and invasion of privacy. The trial court granted summary judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed. This court reversed as to the count for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court noted that while a racial slur alone was not actionable if characterized as mere "rough language," the slurs here could be considered by a jury to be extreme and outrageous. The circumstances of this case, with the slur having been delivered in the act of throwing the plaintiff out of a public place, were held sufficient to preclude summary judgment. The court then affirmed the grant of summary judgment for the defendant on the invasion of privacy claim. The plaintiff had proceeded on the theory of public disclosure of private facts. The court noted that the offensive remarks merely revealed that the plaintiff was black, which was not a private fact. Further, there were no allegations that revealing the plaintiff's race would be highly offensive to a reasonable person. Ledsinger v. Burmeister, 114 Mich.App. 12, 318 N.W.2d 558, 561, 562.

Mich.App.1982. Cit. in case quot. in disc. A plaintiff filed a civil complaint against the defendants alleging "perjury/false swearing" and conspiracy to commit the same. The plaintiff subsequently sought to amend the complaint. The trial court denied the plaintiff's motion and granted accelerated judgment for the defendants; the plaintiff appealed. On appeal, the plaintiff argued that the trial court erred in denying the plaintiff's motion to file an amended complaint alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress and interference with economic advantage. According to this court, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress was defined as follows: one who by extreme and outrageous conduct intentionally or recklessly caused emotional distress to another was subject to liability for such emotional distress, and if bodily harm to the other resulted from it, for such bodily harm. Liability was confined to conduct so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as a atrocious, and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. The court found that the defendants' act of circulating a judicial opinion to several hundred members of the community could not be characterized as "outrageous" or "extreme" conduct so as to expose the defendants to liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Thus, since the plaintiff could not have succeeded in his suit against the defendants, it would have been futile to allow the plaintiff to amend his complaint to include the intentional infliction of emotional distress tort, and it was not error to refuse to permit amendment. Judgment affirmed. Meyer v. Hubbell, 117 Mich.App. 699, 324 N.W.2d 139, 142.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Mich.App.1980. Quot. in case quot. in sup. The plaintiff brought an action against the defendant newspaper for invasion of privacy and intentional infliction of emotional distress arising from the publication of a newspaper story concerning her husband's accidental death. The article stated that a body believed to be that of the plaintiff's husband was removed from a fire which destroyed a cottage. The report stated that a second body, believed to be that of a named woman had also been recovered. The story stated that the victims' cars were found near the cottage and that the victims had been seen together the night before the fire. The defendants filed a motion for summary judgment. The lower court found that any right of privacy of the plaintiff's husband terminated upon his death and found that plaintiff and her children did not have a reasonable expectation of privacy concerning the information in the article. The lower court also held that there had not been a tortious act on which the plaintiff could base recovery. The plaintiff appealed the lower court's grant of summary judgment on both counts. This court stated that in order for an invasion of privacy claim to be grounded on the public disclosure of embarrassing private facts about the plaintiff, the plaintiff must show that the information disclosed was highly offensive to a reasonable person and of no legitimate concern to the public. Additionally, a cause of action for the invasion of privacy could exist where there had been an unreasonable intrusion upon the seclusion of another or publication which placed one in false light or the appropriation of one's name or likeness. Liability for the tort of invasion of privacy is limited though to private information about an individual which has in fact been kept private by the plaintiff and that matter cannot be of legitimate concern to the public. The court held that because the publication of matters concerning the plaintiff and her children was obtained from a public record, was not highly offensive to a reasonable person and was briefly mentioned in an article of legitimate public interest, there was no support for plaintiff's claim of invasion of privacy. The court held that the portion of the article which concerned the woman could not support the plaintiff's allegations because an action for invasion of privacy cannot be maintained by a relative of the person concerned unless the relation was brought into unjustifiable publicity. The lower court's grant of summary judgment was therefore affirmed. Fry v. Ionia Sentinel-Standard, 101 Mich.App. 725, 300 N.W.2d 687, 691.

Mich.App.1976. Quot. and fol., com. (d) quot. in sup. and com. (g) quot. in part in sup. Cit. in ftn. in disc. Plaintiffs brought suit against a mobile home village owner for breach of contract and intentional infliction of emotional distress after defendant refused to approve the prospective purchasers of plaintiffs' mobile home as new tenants on defendant's mobile home site, pursuant to defendant's right to approve new tenants. From dismissal of the complaint, plaintiffs appealed. The court affirmed. Liability for emotional distress may be found only where defendant's conduct has been “extreme and outrageous.” The causation of plaintiff's distress was in conflict, and, therefore, it could not be said that the court's ruling was clearly erroneous. It is not clear that an unfriendly attitude and name calling constitute extremely outrageous conduct. It is also possible that defendant was simply relying on his legal right to refuse a prospective tenant. Finally, realizing the importance of the trial judge's role as fact finder, the court would not disturb the decision that there was not a contract implied in fact or in law. Warren v. June's Mobile Home Village and Sales, 66 Mich.App. 386, 239 N.W.2d 380, 382, 383.

Minn.

Minn.2007. Subsec. (1) adopted in case cit. in disc. In this case in which this court recognized the tort of negligent credentialing against a hospital, relying, in part, on the tort of negligent selection of an independent contractor, as outlined in Restatement Second of Torts § 411, the court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46(1) for the proposition that it had frequently relied on the Restatements of Torts to guide its development of tort law in areas that it had not previously had an opportunity to address. Larson v. Wasemiller, 738 N.W.2d 300, 306.

Minn.2003. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) cit. in disc., com. (e) cit. and quot. but dist., com. (j) cit. in sup. and adopted in case quot. in sup. After former employee of radio station sued station and its principal owner for, in part, sexual harassment, owner counterclaimed for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for owner on his counterclaim. The court of appeals affirmed. Reversing and remanding, this court held that the trial court erred in submitting the counterclaim to the jury. The court said that allegations by owner that employee made false reports to police about him, repeatedly threatened him with legal action, and frequently engaged him in loud workplace arguments did not describe the requisite extreme and outrageous conduct; furthermore, there was no causal connection between employee's conduct and owner's emotional distress. Langeslag v. KYMN Inc., 664 N.W.2d 860, 864-866, 869.

Minn.1999. Com. (b) quot. in disc., com. (j) cit. and quot. in diss. op. Arrestees brought action for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress against arresting officers, among others. The trial court entered judgment for defendants; the court of appeals reversed in part. Reversing, this court held, inter alia, that jury's findings that defendants engaged in intentional infliction of emotional distress during brawl leading to arrests but acted without malice were not inconsistent, and that, in absence of malice, defendants were entitled to official immunity. The dissent argued that a new trial was necessary because the jury's findings were inconsistent. Kelly v. City of Minneapolis, 598 N.W.2d 657, 663, 666.

Minn.1993. Cit. in sup., subsec. (1) quot. in sup. and cit. in case cit. in sup., subsec. (2) cit. in ftn. and in syllabus and cit. and quot. in sup., com. (d) cit. in disc., coms. (j) and (l) quot. in sup. A wife whose husband was killed when struck by a car while changing a flat tire sued the motorist and the underinsured motorist carrier, seeking damages for intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress. The court of appeals affirmed the trial court's entry of judgment on a jury verdict for the wife; reversing, this court held that the motorist's reckless driving was not intentionally directed at the husband or any other third person as needed to state a claim for reckless or intentional infliction of emotional distress. Furthermore, the motorist was not aware of the wife's presence, as she was sitting inside the car at the time of the collision. The court stated that mere reckless driving was directed, if at all, only at the driving community generally rather than at a particular individual. Dornfeld v. Oberg, 503 N.W.2d 115, 116-120.

Minn.1990. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. A pickup truck driver sued three law enforcement officers and their governmental employers arising from an incident in which he was mistakenly chased, fired at, and arrested by the officers. The trial court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants on all federal and state tort claims. The intermediate appellate court affirmed in part but vacated the award of summary judgment as to one of the officers. This court reversed the intermediate appellate court's decision reinstating the plaintiff's federal and state claims against the officer with the exception of his state assault claim, which was remanded for trial. The court held, inter alia, that the driver's "signs and symptoms of depression" fell far short of the type of distress needed to successfully maintain an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. It noted that the plaintiff's comments at the time of his arrest and in a later deposition indicated that he regarded the whole situation as a "joke." Johnson v. Morris, 453 N.W.2d 31, 41.

Minn.1986. Cit. in case quot. in disc. A machinist sued his employer after he suffered an injury during the course of his employment. After the case settled out of court, the machinist alleged that he was the object of racial slurs by other employees, and that several unfounded rules-violation investigations were brought against him that eventually resulted in his discharge. He sued his employer for intentional infliction of mental distress based on its harassment and surveillance. The trial court denied the defendant's motion to dismiss the emotional distress claim on the ground that state court jurisdiction in the matter was preempted by the Railway Labor Act. The intermediate appellate court and this court affirmed on this issue, holding that the harassment claim transcended the collective bargaining dispute terms of the act, and was outside its administrative procedures because the act provided no remedy for conduct that constituted the intentional infliction of emotional distress. Pikop v. Burlington Northern R. Co., 390 N.W.2d 743, 750, cert. denied 480 U.S. 951, 107 S.Ct. 1616, 94 L.Ed.2d 800 (1987).

Minn.1983. Subsec. (1) quot. in disc., cit. in sup., and cit. in ftn.; com. (d) cit. in sup. and cit. in case quot. in disc.; com. (j) cit. in sup. and quot. in disc.; subsec. (2) cit. in ftn. A discharged employee brought an action against his former employer, claiming that he suffered emotional distress which was intentionally inflicted by his supervisors. The plaintiff also asserted that he was discriminated against because of his alcoholism and that he was discharged in retaliation for filing complaints. The jury returned a verdict in the plaintiff's favor on his emotional distress claim and determined, in an advisory capacity, that the defendant had discriminated against the plaintiff on the basis of an alcoholism disability. The trial court held that the employer was liable for retaliation, adopted the jury's advisory findings, and entered judgment for the plaintiff on all his claims. On appeal, this court for the first time recognized the independent tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress, and, having determined that the Restatement sufficiently narrowed the possibilities for recovery, adopted the Restatement definition set forth in s 46(1). The court ruled that the plaintiff's evidence failed to satisfy any of the tort's elements, particularly the requirements for extreme and outrageous conduct and for severe emotional distress. The supervisors' acts, even when considered altogether, failed to rise to the requisite level of outrage, and despite the plaintiff's allegations of injury, he never missed work or saw a physician. Finally, the defendant's ample evidence of its prior, long-standing dissatisfaction with the plaintiff's managerial abilities both precluded the plaintiff from establishing a prima facie discrimination claim and successfully rebutted the plaintiff's prima facie retaliation claim. Reversed. Hubbard v. United Press Intern., Inc., 330 N.W.2d 428, 437-440.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Minn.1979. Com. (d) cit. in ftn. The plaintiff brought an action against his insurer to recover under the no-fault provisions of an automobile liability policy. The plaintiff also claimed damages for the intentional infliction of emotional distress caused by the nonpayment of his claims, and for punitive damages. The plaintiff had been severely injured by electrical wires when he tried to enter a pickup truck. The trial court entered judgment on a jury's verdict for the plaintiff and the insurance company appealed. This court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded the case. The court held that there was sufficient evidence to support the jury's finding that the injury occurred while the plaintiff was entering an automobile and that those injuries were covered under the no-fault provisions of the policy. The court found however, that the insured was not entitled to damages for the intentional infliction of emotional distress nor was he entitled to punitive damages because such recovery was usually allowed only in cases where the breach was accompanied by an independent tort and that situation was not present here. The court stated that a remand was necessary because the plaintiff was entitled to a ten percent statutory penalty for the delay in the payment of his benefits. Haagenson v. Nat. Farmers U. Property & Cas., 277 N.W.2d 648, 652.

Minn.App.

Minn.App.2006. Com. (j) cit. in cases quot. in sup. Former farm employee sued former employer for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and the trial court found defendant liable on the claim. Affirming that portion of the decision, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff demonstrated that defendant's extreme and outrageous conduct caused him severe emotional distress of a kind that no reasonable person could be expected to endure. The court pointed out that plaintiff, who had a mental impairment that materially limited his social and economic opportunities, suffered mental distress in the form of nightmares, crying spells, and hurt feelings as a result of defendant's constant name calling and taunting, and that the record showed that plaintiff suffered from post-traumatic stress disorder and that his experiences working for defendant constituted the traumatic stressor for the disorder. Wenigar v. Johnson, 712 N.W.2d 190, 207, 208.

Minn.App.2001. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. City council member sued city and three individuals for malicious prosecution and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that defendants caused a document to be prepared containing member's forged signature, which led to a criminal investigation of the member. Trial court granted defendants' motion to dismiss. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because even if the creation of a document with her forged signature, which allegedly set her up for criminal prosecution, was extreme and outrageous, there was no showing that defendants' conduct caused plaintiff to suffer severe emotional distress. Stead-Bowers v. Langley, 636 N.W.2d 334, 343.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Minn.App.1994. Com. (j) quot. in case cit. in sup. Plaintiff, who was present when his friend was run over and killed by an oil tanker driven by defendant, brought suit for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Reversing in part the trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendant, this court held that fact issues as to whether defendant's intentional act of leaving the accident scene surpassed the bounds of decency and caused plaintiff to suffer severe distress precluded summary judgment on the emotional-distress claim. Iacona v. Schrupp, 521 N.W.2d 70, 73.

Minn.App.1992. Cit. generally in case cit. in disc., subsecs. (1) and (2) quot. in sup., com. (j) quot. in disc. Automobile passenger who was present when her husband, while changing a flat tire, was struck and killed by a car operated by a drunk driver sued her underinsured motorist carrier and the driver for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Affirming the trial court's entry of judgment on a jury verdict awarding plaintiff damages, this court held that, although plaintiff did not suffer physical injury, she could recover for emotional distress because she was within the zone of danger. The court stated that the jury apparently rejected defendants' argument that plaintiff could not recover because she was particularly susceptible to emotional distress and found instead that plaintiff's recovery was warranted because she experienced severe emotional distress as a result of defendant driver's conduct. Dornfeld v. Oberg, 491 N.W.2d 297, 300, reversed in part 503 N.W.2d 115 (Minn.1993). See above case.

Minn.App.1992. Com. (j) cit. generally in case cit. in sup. Patient's wife sued doctor and clinic, alleging, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress arising from doctor's notations on patient's medical charts regarding possible child abuse by patient's wife; the notations caused the couple's health insurance application to be denied and the wife to suffer anxiety. The trial court granted defendants summary judgment, finding that doctor's conduct could not be considered outrageous and that wife failed to show severe emotional distress. Affirming on the claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress but reversing and remanding on claims of defamation and negligent infliction of emotional distress, this court held that, while wife's allegations might have supported a finding of malice, they did not amount to extreme or outrageous conduct, and that her embarrassment and anxiety were not in themselves a sufficient basis for a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Strauss v. Thorne, 490 N.W.2d 908, 913.

Minn.App.1987. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. A former employee sued his former employer, officers, shareholders, and other employees, alleging inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress arising mainly from verbal abuse that stated or implied that his sexual preference was other than heterosexual. The trial court granted summary judgment for the defendants and dismissed the complaint. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that summary judgment was properly granted on the claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court discussed the extreme nature of the conduct and the severity of the consequent mental distress that are required to prove a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress and concluded that summary judgment was properly granted because the plaintiff did not prove that his paranoid disorder was caused by the alleged harassment. Bohdan v. Alltool Mfg. Co., 411 N.W.2d 902, 908, appeal after remand 1989 WL 23330 (Minn.App.1989).

Minn.App.1985. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup., coms. (f) and (j) quot. in sup. An employee sued his employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress after being terminated for allegedly exercising poor judgment that led to a theft of cash from his office. The trial court entered judgment for the employer, and the court of appeals affirmed. The court held, inter alia, that the employer was not liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress arising out of the employee's termination even though the employee suffered severe emotional distress, because the employee's distress was exaggerated in comparison to that which a reasonable man would have experienced under the circumstances. The court stated that the employer would not be liable for such exaggerated distress unless it resulted from a peculiar susceptibility to such distress of which the employer had knowledge. Cafferty v. Garcia's of Scottsdale, Inc., 375 N.W.2d 850, 853-854.

Minn.App.1985. Subsec. (1) cit. in disc. Passenger sued airline for negligent infliction of emotional distress after an airliner dove 34,000 feet in an uncontrolled tailspin. Plaintiff alleged that as a result of the incident he experienced anxiety on flights, which manifested itself as adrenaline surges, sweaty hands, and elevated pulse and blood pressure. Defendant appealed a jury verdict for plaintiff. This court affirmed. It rejected defendant's argument that a plaintiff under a negligent infliction of emotional distress theory must meet the intentional infliction of emotional distress burden of proving severe emotional distress. The court held that plaintiff had satisfied the physical injury or symptom requirement, which was imposed as an obstacle to false claims. The court reasoned that the unusually disturbing experience plaintiff endured combined with his physical symptoms assured that his claim was real. Quill v. Trans World Airlines, Inc., 361 N.W.2d 438, 442.

Minn.App.1984. Quot. in disc., quot. in case quot. in sup. The president of the defendant corporation and the plaintiff agreed on an employment arrangement that the parties intended to be permanent, so long as the plaintiff performed his duties satisfactorily, until retirement. Four years after the plaintiff began work, the defendant fired him. The plaintiff sued for wrongful termination of employment and claimed intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court affirmed the trial court's dismissal of this claim, reasoning that the emotional distress that the plaintiff suffered was not sufficiently severe to sustain this tort action. Eklund v. Vincent Brass and Aluminum Co., 351 N.W.2d 371, 378, 379.

Minn.App.1984. Cit. in sup., com. (e) quot. in part in sup. The trial court awarded debtors damages against a collection agency for emotional distress suffered as a result of statutory violations. This court affirmed, holding that the debtors sustained their burden of proving the elements necessary to recover for infliction of severe emotional distress. Evidence that the agency made abusive telephone calls to the debtor and attempted to collect interest on the debtors' account when the agency was not authorized to do so and after it received notice that the principal amount was paid in full was sufficient to justify the jury's findings that the conduct was extreme and outrageous and that the agency exceeded its legal rights and recklessly or intentionally inflicted severe emotional distress on the debtors. Venes v. Professional Service Bureau, Inc., 353 N.W.2d 671, 674.

Miss.

Miss.2021. Com. (d) quot. in diss. op. Former employee brought, among other things, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against employer and affiliated companies, alleging that plaintiff's supervisor terminated her on the basis of her pregnancy, replaced her with a non-pregnant employee, commented that her pregnancy was a disease, and that women with children did not belong in the workplace. The trial court granted defendants' motion to dismiss. This court affirmed in part, holding that supervisor's remark that pregnancy was a disease did not rise to the level of outrageousness necessary to sustain a claim for IIED. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, the dissent argued that plaintiff satisfactorily alleged her IIED claim because supervisor's conduct rose to an outrageous and revulsive level above an employment dispute. Spiers v. Oak Grove Credit, LLC, 328 So.3d 645, 657.

Miss.2018. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former firefighters and their family members brought a claim for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress against city and others in connection with firefighters' termination, based on allegations that fire chief threatened to cut off one plaintiff's head, that city's mayor made disparaging comments about plaintiffs, and that an article was published in city's newspaper regarding one plaintiff's termination. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. Affirming, this court held that plaintiffs had not alleged any facts that would support outrageous or revolting conduct sufficient to create a genuine issue of material fact as to the issue of intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Collins v. City of Newton, 240 So.3d 1211, 1220.

Miss.2013. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employees of law firm brought multiple claims against firm, its individual partners, and its office administrator in connection with the presence of toxic mold in two of the offices in which the firm had worked. The trial court denied defendants' motion to dismiss. On interlocutory appeal, this court reversed and rendered judgment dismissing all claims against defendants, holding, among other things, that plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress failed as a matter of law, because, while defendants' handling of the mold problem might have been negligent, plaintiffs' allegations did not rise to the level of outrageous and extreme conduct that was necessary to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The fact that defendants attempted to remediate the mold issue, and ultimately decided to relocate their offices due to the mold, led to the inevitable conclusion that defendants' actions were not done with the actual intent to inflict emotional distress on plaintiffs. Bowden v. Young, 120 S.W.3d 971, 980.

Miss.2001. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Employee who was fired for allegedly stealing inventory and selling it for profit sued former employer and its president for defamation, intentional infliction of emotional distress, actionable words, and false imprisonment. Trial court granted a directed verdict for defendants on the emotional-distress claim because plaintiff was a terminable-at-will employee and there was no evidence that president acted in bad faith. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's emotional-distress claim failed because president's conduct was not extreme and outrageous, he did not attempt to inflict emotional distress, and he did what was necessary to resolve a serious problem. Clark v. Luvel Dairy Products, Inc., 821 So.2d 827, 831.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Miss.2001. Cit. in ftn., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Volunteer fireman sued fire chief for slander and intentional infliction of emotional distress after chief called him a thief and a liar. Trial court entered judgment on jury verdict for plaintiff. Appellate court reversed. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that defendant's conduct was not so outrageous or extreme as to support finding of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Speed v. Scott, 787 So.2d 626, 629, 630.

Miss.1999. Quot. in disc. After discovering that the former property owner disposed of oil field waste on the property, property buyer sued a bank and several oil companies that contracted with the prior owner, alleging strict liability, negligence per se, and outrageous conduct, among other claims. Trial court dismissed plaintiff's complaint, concluding, inter alia, that Mississippi did not recognize the tort of outrageous conduct. This court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded, holding, inter alia, that the trial court erred in dismissing plaintiff's emotional-distress claim, because Mississippi recognized "outrageous conduct" as the tort more commonly known as intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiff sufficiently alleged that defendants willfully and wantonly caused the property to become contaminated and that he suffered personal injury, anxiety, distress, fear, aggravation, and inconvenience. Donald v. Amoco Production Co., 735 So.2d 161, 178.

Miss.1997. Cit. in sup., cit. in case cit. in sup.; com. (d) cit. in headnote, quot. in sup., quot. in case quot. in sup. A doctor sued a hospital that had decided to revoke his surgical privileges, alleging breach of contract and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. The trial court dismissed plaintiff's claims, holding that the factual bases of the claim did not evoke the outrage or revulsion necessary to sustain the claim. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that the hospital's conduct did not rise to the level of willful, wanton, malicious, or intentional wrong sufficient to evoke outrage or revulsion. Furthermore, plaintiff failed to place into the record any proof of his mental anguish, a necessary element of the claim. Wong v. Stripling, 700 So.2d 296, 297, 306, 307.

Miss.1996. Cit. in headnotes, cit. in disc., quot. but dist. Farmer who was dissatisfied with the magnets and water filters that he had recently purchased sued sales representative to recover damages sustained as a result of the mental anguish farmer allegedly suffered when representative refused to grant him a full refund. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for farmer. Reversing and remanding, this court held that the evidence was insufficient to support an award of damages for mental anguish, since farmer failed to show that representative's conduct was so intolerable, outrageous, and extreme as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency. Morrison v. Means, 680 So.2d 803, 803-805, 805-806.

Miss.1995. Subsec. (1) quot. but dist. Borrower who breached the obligations of his loan agreement by incurring additional debt without first securing the consent of his lender sued lender for, inter alia, breach of fiduciary duty and intentional infliction of emotional distress when lender accelerated his outstanding indebtedness. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for borrower but this court reversed and remanded, holding that the lower court misinstructed the jury as to lender's duty since there was generally no fiduciary relationship between lender and borrower and borrower here failed to show, by clear and convincing evidence, that one existed. In addition, the issue of emotional distress should not have been submitted to the jury as the behavior borrower complained of was not extreme and outrageous. Peoples Bank and Trust Co. v. Cermack, 658 So.2d 1352, 1365.

Miss.App.

Miss.App.2008. Quot. in case quot. in sup. Home buyers brought claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, against real-estate agent for sellers, alleging that agent should have disclosed that the house was not 3,000 square feet as was stated in the marketing for the house, the disclosure statement, and the parties' contract for sale. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant, and this court affirmed, holding that defendant could not have caused plaintiffs emotional distress, because they knew that the house was not 3,000 square feet when they closed on it, and they chose to buy it even though sellers offered to let them out of the contract. Waters v. Allegue, 980 So.2d 314, 319.

Miss.App.1999. Com. (d) quot. in cases quot. in disc. Former employee sued former employer for breach of contract and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that she was terminated on the basis of age and gender. The trial court entered summary judgment for defendant. Affirming, this court held that plaintiff was an at-will employee who was terminable without cause, and that discharge for allegedly discriminatory reasons did not rise to the level of outrageousness needed to support an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Brown v. Inter-City Federal Bank, 738 So.2d 262, 265.

Mo.

Mo.1996. Cit. in headnote, cit. in disc. Twenty-eight-year-old woman who came to remember that her father had sexually abused her during childhood sued father for, inter alia, child molestation, sexual abuse, incest, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court treated plaintiff's complaint as stating a cause of action for battery and dismissed, concluding that the applicable statute of limitations had expired. On transfer from the intermediate appellate court this court affirmed, holding that plaintiff's battery claim was barred. Furthermore, plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress was legally insufficient, as it was based on the same facts underlying her battery claim and failed to allege an independent tort. K.G. v. R.T.R., 918 S.W.2d 795, 796, 799.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Mo.1980. Cit. in diss. op. The plaintiffs contracted with the defendant real estate company to buy a lot in a development. Prior to purchasing the lot, the plaintiffs asked the defendant whether water was available for the house that they planned to build on the lot. The defendant assured them that water service would be installed by the time their home was completed. After completion of the home, the plaintiffs' request for water service was denied by the public district. The defendant broker contacted the defendant seller to try and get water service. The plaintiffs had not spoken to the defendant seller prior to signing the contract, but the seller's name did appear on the contract. Eventually, the plaintiffs and a neighbor built a common well and split the cost. The plaintiffs sued based upon fraudulent misrepresentation in the sale of real estate. The trial court ordered the defendants to pay actual and punitive damages. The appeal was transferred from the intermediate court to this court to determine whether there was a submissible case on the stated cause of action. This court stated that in order to prevail on a fraudulent misrepresentation claim, the plaintiffs must prove that there was a false representation, that the defendant knew of the falsity or was ignorant of its truth, that the defendant intended that it should be relied upon by the plaintiffs, that the plaintiffs were unaware of the falsity, that the plaintiffs relied on the statement and that the statement proximately caused the plaintiffs' injuries. The plaintiffs conceded that they did not try the case on the premise that the defendant knew of the falsity, but rather that the defendant did not know if the representations were true or false. Evidence showed that the defendant seller had based his statements on the only two authorities available, the water district and the Department of Health. Thus, this was a case of negligent misrepresentation, not fraudulent misrepresentation. The plaintiffs had not alleged negligent misrepresentation because by claiming fraud they had the opportunity to recover punitive damages which was the bulk of the award. This court reversed the judgment in favor of the plaintiffs. The dissenting opinion agreed that there was insufficient evidence to prove whether the defendants knew of the falsity of their statements but argued that the case should have been remanded to determine whether negligent misrepresentation had occurred. The dissent argued that the facts justified a remand to permit the plaintiff to seek recovery under a more appropriate theory of liability. The dissent stated that negligent misrepresentation merely requires that one failed to obtain the truth of a communicated statement but that he need not be aware that it was false, as required for a fraudulent misrepresentation claim. The dissent argued that Missouri should recognize an action for a monetary loss suffered by one who has relied on the statement of another in a business transaction, if reasonable care was not exercised by the advisor when he made his statement. Huttegar v. Davis, 599 S.W.2d 506, 513.

Mo.1977. Cit. in disc. Plaintiff, an employee of a general contractor which had a contract to perform a job which included laying underground cables for the defendant telephone company, was injured when the wall of a trench in which he was working caved in on him. The plaintiff sued the telephone company and an engineering firm which designed the project and which had a contract with the telephone company to inspect the job and make sure that it was built in accordance with the plans and specifications. The lower court entered judgment on a verdict in favor of the employee after the jury was instructed to grant recovery if it found that the telephone company had the right to control the trenching and excavating and negligently failed to brace the trench properly. On appeal, the court noted that the state case law had clearly recognized a cause of action against one who contracts for work to be done by an independent contractor for breach of the employer's nondelegable duty imposed by law where performance of the contract necessarily involves inherently dangerous activity, and that this cause of action is an exception to the general rule that the employer is not ordinarily liable for the acts or omissions of an independent contractor. The court held that the evidence presented a jury question as to whether the telephone company was liable under the inherent danger exception to the general rule, and that the furtherance of justice required that the case be reversed and remanded as to the telephone company to afford the plaintiff an opportunity to seek recovery under the inherent danger theory. The court also held that the engineering firm could not be held liable, and that judgment was reversed. Smith v. Inter-Cty. Telephone Co., 559 S.W.2d 518, 525.

Mo.1969. Quot. in sup. Plaintiffs drove their car to defendant's shop to have it repaired. Defendant put the car on a lift, and refused to return it, and defendant also subjected plaintiffs to verbal abuse in front of other people. Plaintiffs suit for false imprisonment and mental distress was dismissed. On appeal, the court sustained the dismissal of the count of false imprisonment, holding that plaintiffs had other means of leaving the shop. The court reversed the order dismissing the count of mental distress, holding if defendant's conduct could be proven, it could be considered outrageous, and could be actionable. Warrem v. Parrish, 436 S.W.2d 670, 672, 673.

Mo.1969. Cit. in sup. and quot. in sup. The plaintiff, a schoolteacher, was not rehired by a local school board, apparently for publishing a speech deploring the emphasis on athletics in the public schools. The plaintiff sued the board for emotional and physical damages resulting from her dismissal. The court ruled, inter alia, that absent extreme or outrageous conduct, a plaintiff must suffer a traumatic physical injury, but remanded on other grounds. Williams v. School District of Springfield R-12, 447 S.W.2d 256, 266, 267.

Mo.1969. Cit. in sup. This was an action for damages for invasion of privacy from alleged oppressive and unreasonable telephone calls against the employer of the callers. The court held that the recipient of the telephone calls failed to make a submissible case under the theory of invasion of privacy where no person other than herself heard what was said to her, but where she had shown a state of facts which might entitle her to recover. If the case were brought upon a proper theory, the case would be remanded. Zimmerman v. Associates Discount Corp., 444 S.W.2d 396, 398.

Mo.1967. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in sup. The plaintiff lessee of a grocery store sought a declaratory judgment relative to his interest in the lease and to recover damages for an alleged trespass and mental anguish resulting therefrom against the defendant-lessors, who were constructing a new building to be leased to the lessee at the same rent. In reversing a judgment for the plaintiff lessee, the court held that the lower court had erred in reforming the lease by inserting a description of the lessors' entire lot as being covered by the lease and that the lessors were not liable for trespass in constructing the new building, even though they violated the agreement by raising the rental rate. Nelson v. Grice, 411 S.W.2d 117, 125.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Mo.App.

Mo.App.1998. Cit. in disc., com. (j) cit. and quot. in disc. Property owner challenged the entry of an order of protection against him providing that he would not stalk, abuse, threaten to abuse, molest, or disturb the peace of his neighbor. Reversing, this court held that the order, which was issued pursuant to § 455.010(10) of the Adult Abuse Act, should not have been entered where neighbor failed to establish that property owner harassed her by engaging in a course of conduct directed at her that served no legitimate purpose and that would cause a reasonable person to suffer substantial emotional distress. Wallace v. Van Pelt, 969 S.W.2d 380, 386.

Mo.App.1997. Subsec. (1) cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. and quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (h) quot. in sup. Children's mother, who had arranged for an airline to release the children to their grandfather after their flight, brought, together with the grandfather, an action for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress against the children's father and his wife, alleging that defendants picked up the children at the airport following the flight and prevented plaintiffs from contacting them for three weeks. Affirming the trial court's grant of summary judgment for the children's father's wife, this court held, inter alia, that defendant wife's conduct could not be characterized as so extreme or outrageous as to be tortious for the purpose of plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Hyatt v. Trans World Airlines, Inc., 943 S.W.2d 292, 297, 298.

Mo.App.1997. Cit. in headnote, com. (d) quot. in sup. and quot. in case quot. in diss. op., com. (h) quot. in sup. Whistleblower who discovered and reported that her supervisor was falsifying reports to their employer's board of directors, making employer appear more successful than it actually was, sued employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court dismissed the complaint. Reversing and remanding, this court held that defendant's conduct, which included confiscating files from plaintiff's office, altering vacation records relating to her vacation time, following her to the bathroom, making prank calls to plaintiff while she was on sick leave, misrepresenting to plaintiff's co-workers that she was the cause of defendant's lack of success, and demoting plaintiff, was sufficiently outrageous to support a cause of action for the intentional infliction of emotional distress. Dissent did not believe that defendant's behavior was so extreme as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency. Polk v. Inroads/St. Louis, Inc., 951 S.W.2d 646, 647-649.

Mo.App.1994. Cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in part in case quot. in disc. Former employee sued former employer under statute providing that former employer's provision of letter of discharge that failed to provide reason for discharge was equivalent to letter's nonissuance, for which punitive damages were available. Jury awarded punitive damages. This court affirmed the trial court's entry of judgment on jury award for plaintiff, rejecting defendant's contention that it was entitled to directed verdict on punitive damages, holding that degree of outrageousness needed for punitive submission in intentional tort case was not same, high threshold needed for compensatory damages in intentional infliction of emotional distress case. Ryburn v. General Heating & Cooling, Co., 887 S.W.2d 604, 608.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Mo.App.1993. Cit. in case cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in part in case quot. in sup. A dentist and his wife sued the author and publisher of a dental newsletter, alleging, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress on the wife, who miscarried the couple's child after reading the allegedly libelous article. Affirming a dismissal for failure to state a cause of action, this court held, inter alia, that the article, which allegedly concerned an IRS investigation of the dentist and referred to him as a "yo-yo," "wacko," and "axe murderer," was not so outrageous in character or so extreme in degree as to go beyond all bounds of decency, as required to support the emotional distress claim. The court reasoned that the article included only generalized statements not particularly directed at the dentist, who was not identified by name, and much of it was written in a humorous vein. May v. Greater Kansas City Dental Soc., 863 S.W.2d 941, 948.

Mo.App.1992. Cit. in case cit. in ftn., com. (d) quot. in sup. A man sued his employer, a railroad, pursuant to the Federal Employers' Liability Act, alleging the infliction of emotional distress through harassment and intimidation by his supervisors. The trial court granted summary judgment to the defendant, holding that the plaintiff had failed to state a claim sufficient to withstand various defenses advanced by the defendant. Affirming, this court held that the defendant's alleged conduct was not sufficiently outrageous to permit recovery for emotional distress. Morris v. Union Pacific R. Co., 825 S.W.2d 911, 916.

Mo.App.1989. Cit. in sup., cit. and quot. in ftn., com. (d) quot. in sup., com. (e) quot. in disc., com. (f) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (l) cit. in sup. A woman believing herself to be pregnant consulted a pregnancy center and was shown a film featuring mutilated advanced fetuses by the clinic in spite of the fact that she informed them that she had previously had an abortion, suffered emotional problems as a result, which had required hospitalization and continuing medication, and that she would not terminate this pregnancy if found pregnant. The woman sued the clinic and the director for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss without specifying its reasons. Reversing and remanding in part, this court held, inter alia, that the complaint was improperly dismissed as to the clinic. The court reasoned that the defendant clinic knew the plaintiff was vulnerable to emotional distress, satisfying the standard for extreme and outrageous conduct required for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Boes v. Deschu, 768 S.W.2d 205, 207, 208.

Mo.App.1989. Quot. in case cit. in disc. After the medical records of a former employee's ex-husband, possibly indicating treatment for a venereal disease, were disclosed during discovery in the employee's suit for wrongful discharge against her former employer, a partnership of medical doctors, she brought this suit against the former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted summary judgment for the defendant. Affirming, this court held that the defendant's conduct was not so extreme or outrageous as to justify an action based on that conduct. The court stated that there was nothing in the record to indicate that anyone other than the plaintiff's attorney saw the medical records, and medical records pertaining to the plaintiff and her former husband were sometimes kept by the defendant on the same card. J.R. v. P.B.A., 773 S.W.2d 235, 236.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Mo.App.1987. Com. (d) cit. in disc. Parents were invited by a minister to confide their family problems in him. The minister later divulged the confidential communications to various other people, spread untrue information about the parents, encouraged their children to claim that they were abused so that they would be removed from the home, and encouraged the parents' employees to quit. The parents sued the minister for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court dismissed the claim. This court affirmed, holding that the plaintiffs' allegations in the distress claim alone did not represent conduct sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support the claim, and that supporting it by incorporating allegations made in other claims in the suit, such as defamation, would be to allow, not an alternative remedy, but a redundant and duplicative remedy. Hester v. Barnett, 723 S.W.2d 544, 560.

Mo.App.1987. Cit. in disc. (Erron. cit. as § 96 on p. 517.) When a sum of money was found missing from one of the cash drawers at a savings and loan association, an employee was suspected and subjected to intimidating interviews and a polygraph test and was then fired. Alleging that she suffered emotional stress, the employee sued the savings and loan association on theories of intentional infliction of emotional distress and prima facie tort. The jury found for the plaintiff and the trial court overruled the defendant's motions for judgment n.o.v. and a new trial. Reversing, this court stated that, since Missouri recognized the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress, the plaintiff must sue on that theory and not on the more general prima facie tort theory. Moreover, the elements of a prima facie tort were insufficiently shown. The court stated that, in an evaluation of the plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, the nature of the harm, the interests promoted by the defendant's conduct, the means used by the defendant, and its motive must be balanced. Here, there was no specific intent to injure the plaintiff, no physical threat, and only temporary harm. The defendant did not exceed the bounds of legitimate interrogation and had a valid motive, seeking the truth. Kiphart v. Community Fed. Sav. and Loan Ass'n, 729 S.W.2d 510, 516, 517.

Mo.App.1987. Cit. in sup. A father of three children sued his former wife, the custodial parent, for damages on the ground that she interfered with his visitation and temporary custody rights. The trial court dismissed the petition for failure to state a claim upon which relief could be granted. Affirming, this court held that a noncustodial parent could not maintain an action for interference with custody rights under s 700 of the Restatement (Second) of Torts. The court suggested that if money damages were a goal, the plaintiff could have sued for intentional infliction of emotional distress or brought the enigmatic action of prima facie tort. Politte v. Politte, 727 S.W.2d 198, 201.

Mo.App.1987. Quot. in sup., coms. (d) and (h) cit. in sup. A health club member who had a history of back problems suffered an episode of back pain while showering at the facility. The club member sued the health club for intentional infliction of emotional distress allegedly caused by the defendant's treatment of him at the time of his back pain. This court affirmed the trial court's dismissal of the action, holding that the defendant's conduct in allowing the plaintiff to lie on a bench in the shower room, unattended, for two or three hours before an ambulance was called, in refusing to allow the plaintiff's girlfriend in to see him, and in telling the plaintiff he would have to get off the floor, was not so outrageous as to be utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Viehweg v. Vic Tanny Intern. of Missouri, 732 S.W.2d 212, 213.

Mo.App.1985. Cit. and quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. An employee sued a convenience store operator and its supervisor for intentional infliction of emotional distress arising from her termination from employment at the store and the administration of a polygraph test before her termination. The trial court entered judgment for the employee. Reversing, this court ruled that the polygraph testing and later firing were not such extreme and outrageous conduct on the part of the defendants as to justify a decision for the employee. Gibson v. Hummel, 688 S.W.2d 4, 5, 7.

Mo.App.1985. Cit. and quot. in part but dist., coms. (a) and (b) cit. in sup. A borrower/wife sued a bank for wrongful foreclosure when the bank failed to obtain credit life insurance on her deceased husband in order to cover the unpaid balance of a note due on their home. This court reversed and remanded a jury decision for the plaintiff. Analogizing this cause of action to wrongful interference with property, the court held that recovery for emotional distress unaccompanied by physical injury was inappropriate in this case because there was no evidence of conscious or reckless wrongdoing, and severe emotional distress was not a natural or probable consequence of the defendant's conduct. Medlock v. Farmers State Bank of Texas County, 696 S.W.2d 873, 878.

Mo.App.1984. Cit. in sup., coms. (d) and (h) cit. in sup. An employee of a television station sued the station and its general manager for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The plaintiff had been hired by the station as an art director and then reassigned to work as a camera operator, a position for which he did not possess the requisite training. Consequently, he could not perform the technical assignment and was subjected to ridicule. The plaintiff further alleged that he suffered severe physical and mental pain because the reassignment required standing for extended periods, even though he had a partially amputated foot. The trial court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment, and this court affirmed, holding that the station's alleged conduct was not of the extreme and outrageous nature contemplated by the Restatement. Frye v. CBS, 671 S.W.2d 316, 319, 320.

Mo.App.1984. Subsec. (1) and coms. (d), (h), and (j) quot. in disc. Plaintiff, discharged from her job for informing a job seeker about an opening in her department without authorization, sued her former supervisor and her employer alleging outrageous conduct and prima facie tort. This court affirmed a summary judgment for defendants, holding that neither defendants' conduct, though not above reproach, nor plaintiff's consequent humiliation and emotional distress were sufficient to make out a cause of action. Rooney v. National Super Markets, Inc., 668 S.W.2d 649, 651.

Mo.App.1982. Cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in ftn. Upon her escape, a crime victim reported to the police her abduction by an unknown armed male. Although the assailant was still at large, the police disclosed this information to a newspaper reporter without the victim's consent. Following the newspaper's publication of the story, including the victim's name and address, the assailant appeared on numerous occasions outside her home and place of work. The victim brought an action against the city, charging the police with negligent disclosure of her name and address, and against the newspaper, charging negligent publication. The trial court dismissed the complaint for failure to state a claim. On appeal, this court reversed and remanded. Initially, the court determined that the plaintiff's report was not a public record, thus its disclosure by the police was wholly gratuitous. The court ruled that the plaintiff's petition pleaded a state of facts which would give rise to a duty by the city police to foresee that their disclosure of the plaintiff's identity and address would expose her to an unreasonable risk of criminal aggression by the assailant. As to the defendant newspaper, the court weighed the public's right to know against the individual's right to personal security and concluded that in these circumstances, the victim's name and address were of such trivial public concern that the defendant owed a duty to use reasonable care not to give likely occasion for the assailant to injure the plaintiff. Hyde v. City of Columbia, 637 S.W.2d 251, 267, 270, certiorari denied 459 U.S. 1226, 103 S.Ct. 1233, 75 L.Ed.2d 467 (1983).

Mo.App.1982. Quot. in sup. An associate professor brought an action against officials at the university where he was employed, claiming that the defendants wrongfully refused to recognize his earned doctorate degree. The trial court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss the complaint for failure to state a claim. On appeal, this court held that the plaintiff was entitled to provide evidence as to his breach of contract claim. However, the court affirmed the dismissal of the plaintiff's claim seeking recovery for the defendants' outrageous conduct, since it had determined that the defendants' acts, as set forth in the complaint, failed to rise to the requisite standard of outrage. Kemp v. Board of Regents of Northwest, 644 S.W.2d 675, 678.

Mo.App.1982. Cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in sup., com. (h) quot. in part in sup. The owner of an automobile damaged in a collision with the defendant's bus sought to recover damages. The lower court granted the defendant's motion to dismiss the count for emotional distress allegedly caused by the defendant's outrageous conduct in refusing to settle the claim. The plaintiff appealed, but this court affirmed. The court noted that the state recognized a cause of action for outrageous conduct, but held that the defendant's conduct was not extreme or outrageous. The court also noted that the state recognized the doctrine of prima facie tort, but the plaintiff never pleaded any of the elements necessary to support this claim. Wilt v. Kansas City Area Transportation Authority, 629 S.W.2d 669, 671.

Mo.App.1981. Quot. in sup. and coms. (f) and (h) quot. in part in sup. The plaintiff was the wife of a man who had been employed by the defendant corporation. The defendants herein were the corporation and several employees. The plaintiff's husband had allegedly stolen a car from the defendant corporation and employees of the defendant corporation went to the plaintiff, allegedly making loud and angry statements. The plaintiff became very upset and developed a rash. The employees knew that the plaintiff had been under medical care for emotional problems. The lower court directed a verdict in favor of the defendants and the plaintiff appealed. This court recognized the tort of outrageous conduct, stating that one who, by extreme and outrageous conduct, intentionally or recklessly causes severe emotional distress, is liable for any resulting emotional distress or bodily harm. The conduct here by the employees could be characterized as extreme and outrageous because the conduct arose from the actor's knowledge of another's peculiar susceptibility to emotional distress. Here, the employees were aware of the plaintiff's peculiar susceptibility. The employees also could be charged with committing an intentional outrageous act or acting with reckless disregard which caused the emotional distress. The court stated that generally where reasonable men may differ it is for a jury to determine whether the conduct was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to result in liability. The court therefore reversed the lower court and remanded the case. LaBrier v. Anheuser Ford, Inc., 612 S.W.2d 790, 793, 794.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Mo.App.1981. Quot. in sup., cit. generally in sup., com. (d) quot. in part in sup. and com. (h) cit. in sup. The plaintiffs' child was injured and died as a result of those injuries. The adjuster for the defendant insurance company repeatedly contacted the plaintiffs in an attempt to settle their wrongful death claim before the plaintiffs had talked with an attorney. Most of the adjuster's actions took place shortly after the death of the child. The plaintiffs alleged, inter alia, that the adjuster's actions were an unreasonable intrusion upon the plaintiffs' solitude and seclusion, causing the plaintiffs severe emotional distress. The lower court dismissed this claim and the plaintiffs appealed. This court stated that the adjuster's actions were inconsiderate and unkind but not utterly intolerable in a civilized community. The court found that the adjuster had been callously indifferent but held that his actions did not measure up to the extreme and outrageous conduct which the law recognizes to be actionable. Affirmed. Luster v. Columbia Mut. Ins. Co., 624 S.W.2d 890, 891-893.

Mo.App.1979. Cit. in sup. and com. (i) cit. in sup. Property owners brought suit against a pro forma corporation, seeking equitable and legal relief with respect to buildings allegedly allowed to deteriorate. The plaintiffs' petition was based upon the claimed action of the defendant allowing buildings in an historic district to deteriorate in order that the defendant could obtain authority to demolish them. The plaintiffs allege, inter alia, that the conduct of the defendant was willful, extreme, outrageous, and beyond all possible bounds of decency and has affected the plaintiffs' mental and emotional well being, and that the plaintiffs have incurred physical and mental harm as a result of stress and fear. The plaintiffs now appeal from the action of the trial court dismissing that portion of the complaint. The court affirmed the action of the lower court, finding that there was no allegation by the plaintiffs that the conduct of the defendant was engaged in with any intent to injure anyone, and it was, therefore, insufficient to state a cause of action. In its discussion, the court remarked that the tort of outrageous conduct causing severe emotional distress requires that the outrageous actions be committed intentionally or recklessly with the desire to inflict severe emotional distress or in deliberate disregard of a high degree of probability that the emotional distress will follow. Kelly v. Boys' Club of St. Louis, Inc., 588 S.W.2d 254, 256.

Mo.App.1978. Cit. and quot. in disc. Com. (d) quot. in disc. Appeal by funeral director from verdicts in favor of plaintiffs granting actual and punitive damages for mental anguish sustained from the improper burial of plaintiffs' mother where, as a result of the negligence of defendant, the decedent was not buried in a vault as called for by the contract, but rather was buried in a shallow grave, and where her body was uncovered by heavy equipment and parts of it could be seen by plaintiffs at the grave site. The court affirmed, finding that defendant's conduct was extreme and outrageous enough to sustain the verdict, and it held that one of the children of the decedent, who was not personally present to testify, could recover. In addition, the court reversed and remanded an order of the trial court dismissing, as a plaintiff, the decedent's sister, who had assisted the decedent's minor children in making the arrangements for the burial, holding that she was qualified as a member of the decedent's "immediate family." Golston v. Lincoln Cemetery, Inc., 573 S.W.2d 700, 705, 709, 710.

Mo.App.1978. Cit. in dictum, subsec. (1) quot. but dist., cit. in case cit. in sup., com. (d) cit. in dictum and quot. in part but dist. (Erron.cit. as Torts) Plaintiff sued defendant newspaper publisher for damages, alleging outrageous conduct in the publishing of his name and address as a sole witness to a murder while the suspects were still at large. A lower court sustained defendant's motion for summary judgment, and plaintiff appealed. This court affirmed, holding that the alleged acts did not constitute outrageous conduct as a matter of law because, although it may have been unwise, the publication did not go beyond the bounds of human decency. Hood v. Naeter Bros. Pub. Co., 562 S.W.2d 770, 771.

Mo.App.1978. Cit. in sup. and fol.; coms. (d) and (j) quot. in sup. Debtor and debtor's employer each filed a separate lawsuit against a creditor for damages due to the creditor's conduct in his efforts to collect notes signed by the debtor. The employer's claim was based on a theory of outrageous conduct, and the debtor's claim was submitted on theories of outrageous conduct and invasion of privacy. The creditor counterclaimed for the unpaid balance of the note. After the cases were consolidated for trial, the trial court entered judgment in favor of the plaintiffs and judgment in favor of the defendant on its counterclaim against the debtor, and all parties appealed. The creditor contended that the employer's claim for outrageous conduct was beyond her pleadings, and that the evidence presented did not support a finding of outrageous conduct. The court noted that Missouri does recognize a cause of action for outrageous conduct as defined by Section 46 of the Restatement, and that the elements of this action are that the defendant must have, by extreme and outrageous conduct, intentionally or recklessly caused severe emotional distress to the plaintiff from which bodily harm results. The court found that the conduct of the creditor in attempting to collect the notes signed by the debtor, whereby the creditor's agents called the home of the debtor's employer several times after unsuccessfully attempting to reach the debtor at home, subsequently went to the beauty shop where the debtor worked and, mistaking the debtor's employer for the debtor since both parties had the same last name, talked to the employer in an allegedly rude and loud voice for a few minutes about her delinquent account before realizing their mistake and leaving, and waited outside the shop for the debtor after the employer refused to let them talk to the debtor, was not so outrageous as to give rise to a cause of action by the employer against the creditor for damages. The court also noted that such a cause of action arises only when the plaintiff has been caused by severe emotional distress. The court found that since the employer complained of no loss of working time, she required only tranquilizers for merely two or three days and she was back to normal in a week following her confrontation with the collection agents, she did not suffer the severe emotional distress required to give her a cause of action against the creditor for the outrageous conduct of its agents. Accordingly, the court held, inter alia, that a cause of action on theory of outrageous conduct did not exist since the employer failed to show that the defendant's conduct was extreme, outrageous, atrocious, utterly intolerable, and beyond all possible bounds of decency, and that portion of the trial court's judgment was reversed. Leonard v. Pioneer Finance Co., 568 S.W.2d 937, 940, 942.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Mo.App.1978. Cit. in sup. The plaintiff, a credit card holder, brought an action against the credit card company for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The plaintiff alleged that the company's conduct, while attempting to collect a bill from her, consisted of letters from the company, three telephone calls from the company's credit department, three form letters from a financial collection agency, all of which were admittedly nonabusive in nature, and three telephone calls from the agency. The plaintiff testified that the letters and calls "upset" her. The lower court awarded the plaintiff damages against the credit card company, and the company appealed. The court noted that the standard of liability for outrageous conduct, adopted from Section 46 of the Restatement, is conduct so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency and to be regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. The court also noted that mere insults, indignities, inconsiderations, or petty oppressions do not rise to the level of the outrageous conduct essential to a plaintiff's right of recovery. The court found that the alleged outrageous conduct which "upset" the plaintiff was not, as a matter of law, of the extreme and outrageous nature contemplated by Section 46 of the Restatement, where all of the communications took place over the course of twelve months and where the telephone calls were made during usual working hours. Accordingly, the court held, inter alia, that the alleged conduct did not give rise to a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and that the judgment against the company should be reversed. Smith v. Standard Oil, Div. of Amoco Oil Co., 567 S.W.2d 412, 415, 416.

Mo.App.1977. Cit. and com. (d) cit. but dist. In an action for conversion brought by plaintiff against defendant bank for its appropriation of ten dollars which plaintiff had deposited in her savings account, the trial court awarded plaintiff actual damages in the amount of $1,500. On appeal, the court held, inter alia, that an award for damages for injury to plaintiff's economic reputation was unwarranted, since plaintiff introduced no evidence of refusal of credit or action by the defendant which might have affected her credit rating, that plaintiff's testimony that she was upset, angry, and embarrassed by defendant's action was entirely too speculative to support an award of damages for severe emotional distress, and the court, therefore, reduced the amount of actual damages to ten dollars. Young v. Mercantile Trust Co. Nat. Ass'n, 552 S.W.2d 247, 250, appeal after remand 598 S.W.2d 482 (1980).

Mo.App.1976. Cit. in ftn. in sup. A debtor brought this action against his creditor alleging intentional infliction of mental distress resulting from defendant's alleged harassment and humiliation of the plaintiff which aggravated the plaintiff's medical condition. The lower court dismissed the action. On appeal, the court reversed, saying that the debtor's petition complied with the rule that the petition set forth a short and plain statement of the facts, showing that the pleader is entitled to relief. Watson v. Franklin Finance Co., 540 S.W.2d 186, 189.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Mo.App.1975. Cit. but dist. A department store brought suit and obtained judgment against defendant for unpaid bills. Defendant counterclaimed, alleging that plaintiff's prior efforts to collect the balance due by telephone constituted harassment, thus violating federal law. The counterclaim was denied, and defendant appealed. This court affirmed, holding that the calls were not made solely for the purpose of harassment. The court noted that there was a legitimate business purpose in making them, and that the calls were not "repeated" in the sense in which the statute had been interpreted. R.H. Macy & Co. v. Bell, 531 S.W.2d 58, 63.

Mo.App.1974. Cit. and subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in sup. A borrower brought this action against a loan company to recover actual and punitive damages as a result of the loan company's effort to collect payment. The trial court rendered judgment on a verdict in favor of the loan company, and the borrower appealed. This court affirmed, holding that the trial court gave a correct statement of the law when it instructed that the borrower was required to show (a) that the loan company's conduct was so outrageous in character and so extreme in degree as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency and to be regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized community and (b) that the conduct was intentional, reckless, and malicious. Kuehner v. Denny Loan Corp., 518 S.W.2d 94, 96.

Mo.App.1973. Cit. and com. (d) quot. in part in sup. In an action by a loan company on a promissory note, the borrower counter-claimed for invasion of privacy and unnecessary harassment. A jury verdict was given in favor of the loan company, and the trial court granted the borrower's motion for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence. The court affirmed, holding that where there was evidence that the loan company's president used violent and abusive language in talking on the telephone with the borrower at the borrower's place of employment, where he made numerous calls within an hour or an hour and a half, where he threatened to harm borrower's teenage daughter, and where he was told by a policeman who listened to one of the conversations to collect the debt through legal channels and stop harassing borrower, there was substantial evidence to support a verdict for borrower based on invasion of privacy, and the trial court had not abused its discretion in granting a new trial. Liberty Loan Corporation of Antioch v. Brown, 493 S.W.2d 664, 667.

Mont.

Mont.2021. Com. (j) cit. in case cit. in sup. Vehicle owners sued repair provider, alleging, inter alia, that they suffered extreme emotional harm when defendant negligently gave the keys to plaintiffs' vehicle to a person falsely claiming to be their son, resulting in the third party absconding with the vehicle and stealing plaintiffs' handgun, ammunition, sensitive documents, and house keys stored in the vehicle. The district court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiffs. The court of appeals certified a question to this court. This court answered, holding that defendant's negligent treatment of plaintiffs' vehicle did not support an award of parasitic emotional-distress damages, because plaintiffs failed to set forth any evidence that the stolen property was intertwined with their identity or family dynamic. The court noted that the level of outrageousness necessary to support parasitic emotional-distress damages was less than the high bar set by a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment j. Childress v. Costco Wholesale Corporation, 493 P.3d 314, 316.

Mont.2013. Coms. (j) and (k) quot. in cases quot. in sup. Customer brought claims for, inter alia, intentional and negligent emotional distress against bank, alleging that she suffered extreme physical and emotional distress as a result of bank's negligent supervision of its employee, who pled guilty to federal fraud and money-laundering charges in connection with customer's loan from bank, as well as other loans, and the FBI's questioning of her about her knowledge of the employee's financial dealings. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant. Affirming, this court held that plaintiff failed to produce substantial evidence tending to show that her emotional distress was so severe that no reasonable person could be expected to endure it, when she testified in her deposition that she was scared after being interviewed by the FBI, that she was worried about her financial situation and what others would think of her, that she experienced headaches, that her sleep was interrupted, that the stress caused tightness in her shoulders, and that she took herbal remedies for anxiety. Feller v. First Interstate Bancsystem, Inc., 2013 MT 90, 299 P.3d 338, 344, 345.

Mont.2009. Com. (j) adopted in case quot. in sup. Individual who sustained injuries in an automobile accident caused by insured motorist sued motorist's insurer, seeking compensatory damages for statutory and common-law bad faith, intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress, and actual malice. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant on plaintiff's emotional-distress claims on grounds that plaintiff failed to prove serious or severe emotional distress. Reversing that portion of the decision and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that the "serious or severe" standard applied only to independent claims of negligent or intentional infliction of emotional distress, and not to an emotional-distress claim parasitic to an underlying tort such as the bad-faith claim asserted here. Jacobsen v. Allstate Ins. Co., 2009 MT 248, 351 Mont. 464, 215 P.3d 649, 663.

Mont.2008. Com. (g) cit. in sup. and quot. in case cit. and quot. in sup. After railroad sued owner/operator of weed-spraying business for indemnification in connection with its settlement of an action by employee who was injured when he stepped into a hole covered by high grass, and a jury returned a verdict in favor of business, owner sued railroad for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant. Affirming, this court held that an actor did not engage in outrageous or extreme conduct simply by exercising a legal right, and a privileged action could not be the basis of an IIED claim. Judd v. Burlington Northern and Santa Fe Ry. Co., 343 Mont. 416, 2008 MT 181, 186 P.3d 214, 218.

Mont.2008. Com. (j) adopted in case cit. in disc. In this case in which horse owner was found not strictly liable for injuries allegedly sustained by horse-bite victim, this court noted that defendant's argument that Restatement Second of Torts § 509, regarding harm done by abnormally dangerous domestic animals, had not been adopted in Montana and was not binding did not end the court's analysis, since the court had previously adopted other sections of the Restatement, including

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment j; nevertheless, the court concluded that this was not an appropriate case in which to consider and adopt § 509. Peterson v. Eichhorn, 2008 MT 250, 344 Mont. 540, 189 P.3d 615, 620.

Mont.2007. Cit. in sup., subsec. (1) and com. (j) quot. in sup., com. (b) cit. in disc., com. (d) cit. and quot. in sup., com. (k) cit. in sup. Owners of a subdivision lot sued adjoining landowners for violation of restrictive covenants; adjoining landowners counterclaimed for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). The trial court entered judgment for counterplaintiffs on their counterclaim. Affirming, this court held that counterplaintiffs established a compensable claim for IIED on proof that they endured an unrelenting barrage by counterdefendants of intentional and outrageous behavior consisting of obscene gestures, vile verbal abuse, and ongoing surveillance of their every outdoor activity for over four years, and that counterplaintiff wife exhibited physical manifestations of severe emotional distress, consisting of lost weight and sleep and shaking hands, and her husband suffered serious emotional distress in feeling extreme anger and apprehension. Czajkowski v. Meyers, 339 Mont. 503, 172 P.3d 94, 100-102.

Mont.2007. Com. (j) adopted in case cit. in disc. In a case where this court adopted Restatement Second of Torts § 929 and its Comment b as a flexible measure of damages to adequately compensate injured property owners whose land was contaminated by benzene that had migrated from oil company's neighboring refinery, the court cited case authority adopting Restatement § 46, Comment j, for the proposition that it had previously adopted other Restatement sections. Sunburst School Dist. No. 2 v. Texaco, Inc., 338 Mont. 259, 165 P.3d 1079, 1088.

Mont.2004. Com. (j) cit. in case cit. in sup., com. (k) quot. in sup. Mother whose three-year-old son was injured at state-university library when he slipped between stairway balusters of second-story open stairwell and fell 20 feet to the concrete floor sued state for, in part, negligent infliction of emotional distress, seeking to recover damages for her emotional distress, loss of consortium, and posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD) related to her son's fall. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiff. Affirming in part, this court held, inter alia, that although the jury instruction on emotional distress erroneously failed to state that the severe-or-serious standard applied, the fact that plaintiff suffered a physical manifestation of bodily harm in the form of PTSD was sufficient evidence that her emotional distress was genuine and severe. Henricksen v. State, 2004 MT 20, 319 Mont. 307, 84 P.3d 38, 55.

Mont.2004. Coms. (j) and (k) quot. in case quot. in sup. After her adult son died as a passenger in a car accident, his mother sued driver's estate for negligence and negligent infliction of emotional distress. Trial court granted defendant summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that the negligent-infliction-of-emotional-distress claim failed because there was insufficient evidence that plaintiff suffered severe emotional distress. There was no evidence of any physical manifestation of grief, no counseling was sought or recommended, plaintiff chose not to take antidepressants, her use of Valium had not dramatically increased, she did not have continuous nights of sleeplessness or days without appetite, and she maintained close relationships with family members and friends. Renville v. Fredrickson, 2004 MT 324, 324 Mont. 86, 101 P.3d 773, 776, 777.

Mont.2003. Com. (j) cit. in disc. After a car struck a seven-year-old child, child's father sued the driver and driver's insurer for negligent infliction of emotional distress, alleging that he suffered severe emotional distress as a result of driver's negligent operation of his car. Trial court granted insurer summary judgment, holding that father was not a foreseeable plaintiff because he had not witnessed the accident. This court reversed and remanded for a determination whether father was a foreseeable plaintiff, holding that, although the father did not actually witness the accident, he could state a claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress. The court noted that father met the requirement that he suffered severe emotional distress. Wages v. First Nat. Ins. Co. of America, 318 Mont. 232, 79 P.3d 1095, 1098.

Mont.2000. Com. (d) quot. in disc., com. (j) adopted in case quot. in sup. Prospective purchasers sued president of real-estate agency for, in part, tortious interference with their first-option to buy parcel of land from owner, after defendant arranged for sale of land to third party without first offering it to plaintiffs. Affirming in part the trial court's award of economic, punitive, and emotional-distress damages to plaintiffs, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiffs' property interest sufficiently involved use and enjoyment of land to warrant award of emotional-distress damages under Montana law for defendant's acts of interference, given plaintiffs' testimony that they suffered "shock, worry, anger, disappointment, and frustration" when the parcel, on which they had planned to build their retirement home, was sold to third party. Maloney v. Home and Investment Center, Inc., 298 Mont. 213, 994 P.2d 1124, 1135, 1136.

Mont.2000. Com. (j) quot. in disc. Property sellers sued real estate agent and agency, alleging that defendants misled them regarding a counteroffer made on their property. Defendants counterclaimed, alleging breach of listing agreement. The trial court granted defendants summary judgment. Affirming in part, reversing, and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiffs did not establish the "serious or severe" requirement necessary for negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress, and issues of fact remained regarding whether defendants misrepresented information, thereby precluding summary judgment on negligent-misrepresentation claim. May v. Era Landmark Real Estate of Bozeman, 302 Mont. 326, 15 P.3d 1179, 1186.

Mont.1997. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Husband and wife were riding their bicycles together when husband was struck and killed by a passing automobile. Although wife received $25,000 pursuant to the "Each Person" limitation of liability contained in motorist's automobile insurance policy, she sought a declaration that the emotional distress she experienced as a result of witnessing the accident constituted an independent injury that was subject to the policy's $50,000 "Each Accident" provision. The trial court entered summary judgment for wife. Affirming, this court held that wife's cause of action for negligent infliction of emotional distress stemmed from an injury that was separate and apart from that sustained by her husband, and therefore the "Each Accident" provision applied. Treichel v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins., 280 Mont. 443, 930 P.2d 661, 664.

Mont.1995. Com. (j) cit. in case cit. in disc. Deceased's family sued funeral homes for negligent preparation of deceased's body, emotional-distress damages, and breach of contract. Trial court granted defendants summary judgments. This court affirmed in part and reversed in part, holding, inter alia, that one who negligently removes, withholds, mutilates, embalms, provides funeral, burial, or crematory services, or operates upon the body of a dead person or prevents its proper interment or cremation is subject to liability to the deceased person's close relatives for resulting emotional distress. The court determined that the right to damages for negligent infliction of emotional distress resulting from the mishandling of a corpse did not require that the distress be accompanied by physical injury. Contreraz v. Michelotti-Sawyers, 271 Mont. 300, 896 P.2d 1118, 1120.

Mont.1995. Cit. in headnote, com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (j) cit. and quot. in sup. Former newspaper reporter sued newspaper and its owners as well as a police officer, alleging civil-rights violations, defamation, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Trial court, among other rulings, granted defendants summary judgment on the claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court reversed and remanded, holding, inter alia, that the better approach to intentional infliction of emotional distress as an independent cause of action was to require that the same basic elements be proven in an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress as in a cause of action for negligent infliction of emotional distress—that an independent cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress would arise under circumstances where serious or severe emotional distress was the reasonably foreseeable consequence of the defendant's intentional act or omission. Sacco v. High Country Independent Press, 271 Mont. 209, 896 P.2d 411, 412, 425-427, 429.

Mont.1993. Cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in part in case quot. in sup. A church member injured on church property sued the church for breach of fiduciary duty, fraud, negligent misrepresentation, and intentional infliction of emotional distress after the church allegedly promised to pay her medical bills if she submitted to a physical examination, but then refused to pay and attempted to dissuade her from bringing suit, threatening her with excommunication. The trial court dismissed all claims except a claim for breach of fiduciary duty. Affirming in part, this court held, inter alia, that, even if Montana recognized intentional infliction of emotional distress as a separate tort, the church's conduct here was not so outrageous as to support such a claim. Davis v. Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, 258 Mont. 286, 294, 852 P.2d 640, 645.

Mont.1993. Com. (j) cit. in sup. An attorney sued a newspaper for allegedly libelous articles concerning a client's complaint charging him with professional misconduct and concerning his alleged violation of the city building code. This court affirmed a grant of summary judgment for the newspaper, holding, inter alia, that the attorney could not recover for intentional infliction of emotional distress, as his visit to a hospital emergency room for stress and other problems and his missing a meeting of a client's board of directors shortly after one of the articles appeared were not evidence of severe emotional distress, and the newspaper's truthful reporting did not constitute outrageous conduct. Lence v. Hagadone Inv. Co., 258 Mont. 433, 444, 853 P.2d 1230, 1237.

Mont.1993. Com. (j) cit. in sup. A former delivery driver sued his employer, alleging various tort claims including intentional infliction of emotional distress from working swing shifts. This court affirmed a grant of summary judgment for the employer, holding, inter alia, that the employer's refusal to alter the work schedule and its subsequent discharge of him was not sufficiently outrageous conduct to support recovery of emotional distress damages, even though the employer was aware that the employee had sought counseling and was prescribed medication while working the schedule he was assigned. Lueck v. United Parcel Service, 258 Mont. 2, 11, 851 P.2d 1041, 1046.

Mont.1992. Cit. in case cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case cit. in sup. Discharged employee sued her former employer and supervisor for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. The trial court directed a verdict for defendants. Reversing in part and remanding, this court held that the trial court erred in concluding that plaintiff's claim was subject to a directed verdict solely on the basis that it was brought as a separate cause of action and stated that the evidence established the threshold level of conduct necessary to survive a motion for a directed verdict. Foster v. Albertsons, Inc., 254 Mont. 117, 835 P.2d 720, 728.

Mont.1992. Quot. and cit. in sup., subsec. (2) cit. in sup., subsec. (2)(a) cit. in disc., com. (l) cit. in case cit. but dist., Caveat quot. in disc. Mother, individually and as guardian of retarded woman raped by employee of state mental institution, sued state for negligence and infliction of emotional distress under vicarious liability theory. The trial court directed a verdict that state was liable and allowed mother to maintain action for emotional distress. Reversing in part, this court declined to extend to this case the nondelegable duty exception to respondeat superior, holding that the state was not liable under principles of respondeat superior, since rape was outside scope of employment. Moreover, plaintiff could not maintain an action for emotional distress, since she was not present at time of conduct and the institution owed no direct duty to her as patient's mother. Maguire v. State, 254 Mont. 178, 835 P.2d 755, 761, 762.

Mont.1992. Quot. in disc., cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (j) quot. in disc. and cit. in case quot. in disc. Store owner brought an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, against the owner of an adjacent establishment after a third party drove his automobile into the building that housed both businesses. Affirming in part the trial court's dismissal of the claim and remanding, this court held that defendant's pressuring plaintiff to reopen her business quickly after the accident and to accept the third party's insurance settlement claim did not constitute extreme and outrageous conduct. The court said that plaintiff's embarrassment and worry as well as her stress-induced acne flare-up were not sufficiently severe to warrant a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, stating that a reasonable person in this society should be expected to endure the problems plaintiff suffered. McNeil v. Currie, 253 Mont. 9, 830 P.2d 1241, 1247.

Mont.1991. Quot. in sup., coms. (d) and (j) quot. in sup. The former superintendent of a school district sued the school district and two school board trustees for intentional infliction of emotional distress and denial of due process based on constructive discharge, alleging that the defendants made his working conditions intolerable, forcing him to take a medical disability retirement. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiff. Reversing and remanding for a new trial, the supreme court held that the trial court erroneously instructed the jury on the due process claim, and that, where plaintiff's evidence tended to show that the defendant trustees engaged in a campaign to oust plaintiff from his position, undermine his credibility, and circumvent his authority by criticizing him to the school board, the media, and the community, their actions did not reach the level of outrageousness necessary to establish a prima facie case of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Doohan v. Bigfork School Dist. No. 38, 247 Mont. 125, 805 P.2d 1354, 1362, 1363, 1365-1366.

Mont.1990. Cit. in disc., cit. but not fol., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (j) cit. in sup. After a restaurant was destroyed in a gas explosion that allegedly was caused by the negligence of a utility company employee, the married couple who owned the restaurant sued the utility for damages. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding damages to the plaintiffs for property destruction, to the plaintiff wife for personal injuries, and to the plaintiff husband for emotional distress damages. Reversing in part, this court denied the award of emotional distress damages, declining to extend recovery for emotional distress damages to cases where the defendant negligently damaged or destroyed real property and the plaintiff suffered no physical injury. Day v. Montana Power Co., 242 Mont. 195, 789 P.2d 1224, 1226, 1227.

Mont.1990. Coms. (d) and (g) quot. in sup. Borrowers sued a bank, its owner, and the bank's credit service for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, claiming that the bank continued to loan, and encouraged them to borrow, more money at the same time that the bank and its credit service planned to liquidate the borrowers' assets and foreclose on their debt. The trial court granted the defendants' joint motion for summary judgment, dismissing the plaintiffs' complaint with prejudice, and granting the bank's motion for summary judgment on its counterclaim for foreclosure. This court affirmed, stating that the plaintiffs failed to produce evidence of outrageous, extreme, unlawful, or unreasonable acts by the defendants. Noting that the bank did not stand to gain anything from its actions but was simply exercising sound business judgment as a creditor in acting to foreclose a problem loan, the court said that the defendant bank could not be said to have acted beyond all possible bounds of decency where it merely exercised a legal right to foreclose on a mortgage and notes. Lachenmaier v. First Bank Systems, Inc., 246 Mont. 26, 803 P.2d 614, 619, 620.

Mont.1989. Com. (b) cit. in disc., com. (j) quot. in sup. and adopted. The president of a company personally guaranteed loans to the company. When the bank and the president began liquidation negotiations, the president accepted the bank's offer to take a trust indenture for the company's real property in exchange for releasing the president's guaranty. After the company was purchased and some property sold, the bank sued the president on his guaranty for the amount of the loan still outstanding. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for the defendant and awarded him damages on his counterclaim for the bank's alleged bad faith and constructive fraud. Reversing, this court held that there was insufficient evidence to support the defendant's counterclaims and that most of the evidence submitted by the defendant in opposition to the plaintiff's claims was inadmissible. The court stated that the trial court erred in submitting the issue of emotional distress damages to the jury, since the evidence was insufficient to raise a question of fact about the existence of severe emotional distress. First Bank (N.A.)—Billings v. Clark, 236 Mont. 195, 771 P.2d 84, 91.

Mont.1988. Cit. and quot. but dist., com. (d) quot. but dist. An employee sued her former employer and supervisors for several causes of action relating to the termination of her employment, and for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted the defendants summary judgment on all counts. Affirming, this court held that emotional distress under state law had been, and remained, primarily an element of damages rather than a distinct cause of action, yet heard the plaintiff's argument that an earlier case had opened the door for emotional distress as a singular cause of action if the defendant's conduct could be characterized as outrageous. The court concluded that here the defendants' conduct could not be so characterized. Frigon v. Morrison-Maierle, Inc., 233 Mont. 113, 760 P.2d 57, 63, 64.

Neb.

Neb.2006. Cit. in disc., com. (d) cit. in sup. Niece sued her uncle, asserting several claims relating to sexual abuse he allegedly committed against her between 1967 and 1974. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding plaintiff damages on her claim that defendant intentionally inflicted emotional distress upon her by contacting her in 2002 and threatening her. Affirming, this court held that, in light of evidence that plaintiff was particularly susceptible to mental distress as defendant's past victim, defendant's conduct in 2002 was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support plaintiff's emotional-distress claim; in addition, the trial court did not err in refusing to give defendant's tendered instruction citing the Restatement for the definition of outrageous conduct, since the substance of the proposed instruction was contained in the instructions actually given. Roth v. Wiese, 271 Neb. 750, 762, 767, 716 N.W.2d 419, 432, 435.

Neb.2006. Com. (b) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former nursing-home employee sued former employer, alleging that she was discharged in retaliation for reporting an incident in which a patient was injured. The trial court entered a jury verdict awarding plaintiff, among other things, noneconomic damages for mental suffering. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that it was not necessary for plaintiff to show severe emotional distress or that she sought medical treatment or counseling in order for her to recover for mental suffering. The court reasoned that, while severe emotional distress was an element of the torts of negligent or intentional infliction of emotional distress, it was not an element of the tort of retaliatory discharge in contravention of public policy; thus, there was no threshold limitation based on the degree or severity of mental suffering in order for it to be recoverable as past and present damages. Wendeln v. The Beatrice Manor, Inc., 271 Neb. 373, 392, 712 N.W.2d 226, 242.

Neb.2005. Com. (d) cit. in sup. and cit. in case cit. in sup. Natural son of deceased sued stepson, a licensed funeral director, and others for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that stepson transported and embalmed father's body without son's consent and in breach of statutory duties. This court affirmed the trial court's dismissal of the action, holding that son failed to allege facts giving him control of the remains and that stepson's alleged failures to obtain permit and file timely death certificate were, at best, unprofessional or careless, but not outrageous. The court noted that the facts must have been such that, when heard, an average member of the community would resent the actor; minor indignities suffered as a result of living in society did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct. Heitzman v. Thompson, 270 Neb. 600, 605, 705 N.W.2d 426, 431.

Neb.2005. Coms. (b) and (j) quot. in disc. Pharmaceutical sales representative sued physician for civil battery, alleging physician molested her in his office during a sales call. After the jury returned a verdict for plaintiff and awarded damages for emotional distress, the trial court granted physician's motion for a new trial, determining that the jury was not properly instructed on the standard for actionable emotional distress. This court reversed and remanded for reinstatement of the verdict, holding that, in contrast to a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, the tort of battery did not require plaintiff to prove severe emotional distress in order to recover compensatory damages caused by the battery; plaintiff's testimony as to the emotional effects of the alleged incident on her life, including a subsequent fear of being alone with male customers, was sufficient to submit the issue to the jury. Kant v. Altayar, 270 Neb. 501, 505, 506, 704 N.W.2d, 537, 540, 541.

Neb.2000. Coms. (d)-(f), (h) and (j) cit. in sup. Mother of rape victim who was murdered after reporting rape sued county and sheriff for negligence, wrongful death, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendants failed to protect victim despite knowledge of threats against victim's life, and that sheriff's crude and dehumanizing language, expressions of disbelief, and irrelevant questions while interviewing victim constituted extreme and outrageous conduct. Trial court awarded damages for negligence, but denied recovery on the emotional-distress claim. This court reversed in part and remanded, holding, inter alia, that trial court erred in not holding as a matter of law that sheriff's conduct was extreme and outrageous, and that this error removed important evidence as to whether the victim sustained emotional distress. Brandon ex rel. Estate of Brandon v. County of Richardson, 261 Neb. 636, 656, 662, 624 N.W.2d 604, 621, 624, appeal after remand 264 Neb. 1020, 653 N.W.2d 829 (2002).

Neb.1994. Cit. in disc. The children of a warehouse worker allegedly injured from contact with agricultural chemicals sued the storer of the chemicals, seeking loss of consortium damages and asserting a claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress. After ordering bypass of the intermediate appellate court, this court affirmed the trial court's dismissal, holding, inter alia, that the storer of chemicals could not be liable, as there was no allegation that the worker suffered her injury suddenly, and the manner in which the children became aware of it was not sudden, shocking, or startling so as to have produced emotional distress so severe that no person could be expected to endure it. Vosburg v. Cenex-Land O'Lakes Agronomy, 245 Neb. 485, 488, 513 N.W.2d 870, 873.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Neb.1993. Quot. in sup., cit. in case cit. in disc., cit. in diss. op., subsec. (2) cit. in disc., com. (i) quot. in diss. op. The mother of a passenger killed in a traffic accident sued the motorist for intentional infliction of emotional distress after motorist dragged passenger's body from accident scene and told no one of accident. This court, affirming trial court's entry of judgment on jury verdict for mother, held, inter alia, that mother was not required to be at the accident scene in order to recover, since an intimate familial relationship existed between victim and plaintiff, defendant's actions nullified any chance of victim's survival, and the shock plaintiff suffered when she learned the details surrounding her daughter's death exacerbated and finalized the anxiety that began nine hours earlier when defendant telephoned plaintiff at 5:45 a.m., concealed the fact of victim's death, and falsely accused victim of stealing his vehicle. Dissent argued that motorist's conduct was not intended by him to inflict emotional distress and that he could not be said to have been certain or substantially certain that severe emotional distress would result from his actions. Nichols v. Busse, 243 Neb. 811, 819, 838, 503 N.W.2d 173, 180, 181, 190, 191.

Neb.1985. Cit. but dist., com. (d) cit. in diss. op., com. (e) quot. in diss. op., com. (f) cit. in case quot. in diss. op. The wife of an employee injured on the job brought an action for outrage against her husband's employer, alleging that the employer's claims agent placed telephone calls to her threatening that her husband's benefits would be revoked if he did not accept the offer of a new position. This court upheld a summary judgment for the employer, holding that the employer's conduct was not outrageous where the employer attempted to assert its legal rights in a permissible way. The dissent argued that a genuine issue of fact existed regarding the nature of the employer's conduct and that the issue should have gone to the jury. Gall v. Great Western Sugar Co., 219 Neb. 354, 363 N.W.2d 373, 376, 379, 380.

Neb.1983. Cit. in sup., coms. (d) and (j) cit. in case quot. in sup. The plaintiff wife and the defendant husband were married for about 30 years until their divorce in 1977. Shortly thereafter, the defendant began to harass the plaintiff, and when the plaintiff remarried in 1979 the harassment intensified. The plaintiff brought suit against the defendant seeking to recover damages for severe emotional distress caused by the harassment. The trial court entered judgment in favor of the plaintiff and the defendant appealed. This court reversed and remanded. The court held that although the harassment had caused the plaintiff to be embarrassed and humiliated, and resulted in her crying, losing sleep, and consulting a psychiatrist, she had not shown that her distress was so severe that no reasonable person could have been expected to endure it. Hassing v. Wortman, 214 Neb. 154, 333 N.W.2d 765, 767, 768.

Neb.1981. Cit. and quot. in sup. and coms. (d) and (j) quot. in part in sup. The plaintiff was injured when a gas station attendant removed the radiator cap on the plaintiff's vehicle and hot fluid splashed onto the plaintiff. The lower court did not submit the plaintiff's claim for mental distress to the jury, but the jury awarded damages to the plaintiff based upon other claims. The plaintiff appealed, arguing that the trial court erred by refusing to submit her claim for mental distress. The plaintiff asserted that she had to remove some of her clothing after the incident and repeatedly had to request something to cover herself before the attendant complied. In addition, the plaintiff was delayed because the attendant had removed a part from the engine to prevent it from starting until the plaintiff returned the covering she borrowed. This court stated that an action for intentional infliction of mental distress would not lie unless the defendant's actions were outrageous and the plaintiff's resulting emotional distress was severe. The court stated that the conduct necessary to support such a claim must exceed that which a reasonable person could be expected to endure. The court held that the attendant's conduct did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to be actionable. Affirmed. Davis v. Texaco, Inc., 210 Neb. 67, 313 N.W.2d 221, 223.

Neb.App.

Neb.App.1993. Com. (j) quot. in part in disc. The insured under a homeowners' policy sued the insurer for coverage and mental distress damages after the insurer denied coverage for replacement costs when the home collapsed while being reconstructed. Affirming judgment for the insured, this court held, inter alia, that the insured was entitled to mental distress damages, as the coverage denial was in bad faith and the impoverished, disabled insured lived a "makeshift" existence for over three years, farming out her children and wondering whether she would ever be able to rebuild her home. Bailey v. Farmers Union Co-op. Ins. Co. of Nebraska, 1 Neb.App. 408, 498 N.W.2d 591, 604.

Neb.App.1992. Subsecs. (1) and (2)(a) quot. in sup., com. (l) cit. in disc. Husband brought action against wife's employer, seeking recovery for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress arising from employer's alleged sexual harassment of wife and wife's consequent development of posttraumatic stress disorder. The trial court sustained employer's demurrer and dismissed the action. Affirming, this court held that husband did not plead a cause of action to support recovery under a theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress, since he failed to allege that he was present when employer's alleged harassment occurred. Carlson v. Chain, 490 N.W.2d 469, 473, 474.

Nev.

Nev.2020. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Attorney and law firm brought a lawsuit against, among others, president of corporation that published articles and videos discussing attorney, alleging, inter alia, that defendant intentionally inflicted emotional distress upon attorney by stating in the articles and videos that attorney acted badly, violated ethical rules, bullied a family-court judge, and covered up dubious behavior by sealing her cases. The trial court granted defendant's special motion to dismiss under anti-SLAPP statutes. This court affirmed in part, holding that plaintiffs failed to demonstrate that their claims had minimal merit, because defendant's statements amounted to petty insults and indignities that were not actionable under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d. Abrams v. Sanson, 458 P.3d 1062, 1070.

Nev.2017. Coms. (j) and (k) cit. and quot. in sup. and adopted. Taxpayer who had moved from California to Nevada sued California's Franchise Tax Board, alleging, among other things, that defendant intentionally inflicted emotional distress upon him during audits of his California tax returns. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict in favor of plaintiff. This court affirmed in part, holding that plaintiff sufficiently established that he suffered severe emotional distress by presenting testimony from multiple people as to how defendant's treatment physically and emotionally affected him. The court rejected defendant's argument that plaintiff was required to present medical records in support of such a claim, explaining that, under the sliding-scale approach described in Restatement Second of Torts § 46, when, as here, the defendant's conduct was more extreme, less evidence of the physical injury suffered by the plaintiff was required. Franchise Tax Board of State of California v. Hyatt, 407 P.3d 717, 741.

Nev.2017. Coms. (j) and (k) adopted, cit. and quot. in sup. Taxpayer who had moved from California to Nevada filed, inter alia, a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against California tax agency in connection with its audits of his state-tax returns, alleging, among other things, that defendant had improper motives for conducting the audits. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiff. On remand from the United States Supreme Court, this court affirmed in part, holding that medical records were not mandatory in order to establish an IIED claim where a defendant's acts were sufficiently severe, and that substantial evidence supported the jury's findings as to liability for IIED and its award of damages. The court adopted the sliding-scale approach set forth in Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comments j and k, and determined that, here, the facts supported the conclusion that defendant's actions were at the more extreme end of the scale, such that less proof of emotional distress was required. Franchise Tax Board of California v. Hyatt, 401 P.3d 1110, 1134.

Nev.2014. Coms. (j) and (k) cit. and quot. in sup. Taxpayer sued state's franchise tax board, alleging, among other things, that defendant was liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with its conduct while auditing his state tax returns. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiff. While reversing in part and remanding for a new trial on damages, this court held that plaintiff provided sufficient evidence from which a jury could reasonably determine that he suffered severe emotional distress under the definition set forth in Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court pointed to evidence that plaintiff's mood changed dramatically, that he became distant and much less involved in various activities, that he started drinking heavily, that he suffered severe migraines and stomach problems, and that he became obsessed with his legal issues involving defendant. Franchise Tax Bd. of Cal. v. Hyatt, 335 P.3d 125, 147, 148.

Nev.2000. Com. (k) cit. in disc. and quot. in ftn. Construction worker who was attacked and threatened at gunpoint by site owner sued owner for assault and battery and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered judgment for plaintiff. Affirming, this court held, in part, that the damages awarded as compensation for the serious emotional distress that plaintiff suffered as a result of defendant's tortious conduct were not excessive. Olivero v. Lowe, 116 Nev. 395, 995 P.2d 1023, 1026-1027.

Nev.1981. Subsec. (2) cit. in disc. A suit was brought against the defendant to recover for assault and battery. The plaintiff also sued as guardian ad litem for her daughter, a witness to the attack, for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court awarded the plaintiff damages and awarded the daughter $300.00. The defendant appealed, arguing, inter alia, that the daughter should not be entitled to recover under an intentional infliction of emotional distress cause of action. The court reversed the judgment in favor of the daughter. The court held that, while recovery on the part of a third party witness to an outrageous act is permitted if that third party is a close relative of the person against whom the outrageous act was directed, an assault of the kind presented on this appeal is, as a matter of law, insufficiently outrageous to warrant recovery by the witness to such an assault. Star v. Rabello, 97 Nev. 124, 625 P.2d 90, 92.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Nev.1980. Subsec. (1) cit. in sup. The plaintiff sued her attorney for malpractice alleging that the defendant had been negligent in failing to prosecute the appeal of a summary judgment against her, in dismissing a claim against an opposing party and in advising her to release certain funds. A jury awarded her damages. The defendant's motion for a new trial was granted because a jury instruction improperly allowed compensation for mental anguish. The plaintiff appealed the order granting the new trial and the court's grant of partial summary judgment concerning the defendant's failure to prosecute the appeal. This court stated that the plaintiff's claims were predicated on ordinary negligence and, because she had not attempted to prove that the defendant's conduct was extreme or outrageous, the lower court should not have instructed the jury concerning mental anguish. This court found that the lower court should not have granted partial summary judgment for the defendant because it was up to a jury to determine whether the defendant's conduct was below that of a reasonable attorney. The court therefore affirmed the order which granted the new trial, but reversed the order of partial summary judgment. Selsnick v. Horton, 96 Nev. 944, 620 P.2d 1256, 1257.

N.H.

N.H.2011. Com. (d) quot. in sup. After attorney and his wife agreed to give up personal assets to attorney's former client's new lawyers in exchange for lawyers' promise that they would not report attorney's purported misappropriation of client's assets, lawyers nonetheless reported attorney to authorities; wife sued lawyers for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, alleging that lawyers subjected her to constant and continuous threats that deprived her of property and caused her hospitalization. The trial court dismissed plaintiff's claim. Affirming in part, this court, noting that the only conduct that plaintiff alleged in her complaint involved threats made to her husband, held that such threats did not constitute conduct sufficiently outrageous in character to support an IIED claim. Tessier v. Rockefeller, 162 N.H. 324, 33 A.3d 1118, 1131.

N.H.2009. Coms. (d) and (e) quot. in sup. Administrator of the estate of seventh-grade student who committed suicide sued student's special-education teacher, guidance counselor, and school, alleging that, shortly before student's death, teacher misused her position of authority over student by making a false report of misconduct—namely, that student had referred to two mints on his desk as medicine—in an effort to affect his disciplinary record and eventually expel him from the school, and that this false report was a substantial cause of the suicide. The trial court granted defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that, while false accusations could be grounds for liability under an IIED claim, the alleged false accusation at issue here, even coupled with teacher's position of authority, did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to sustain an IIED claim. Mikell v. School Administrative Unit No. 33, 158 N.H. 723, 972 A.2d 1050, 1055.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

N.H.1999. Subsec. (1) and coms. (h) and (j) cit. in disc. Former wife sued former husband for violations of New Hampshire's wiretapping and eavesdropping statute and for common-law invasion of privacy after defendant secretly taped recorded telephone conversations between plaintiff and parties' daughter. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiff. Reversing and remanding, this court held that the lower court erred in instructing the jury as to the mens rea required for a finding of statutory liability; that plaintiff could claim a reasonable expectation of privacy in her telephone conversations with daughter, even though daughter was likely to discuss those conversations with her court-appointed therapist or guardian ad litem; that plaintiff was not required to establish severe mental distress in order to prove that she sustained emotional harm; and that the lower court's failure to define “acquiescence” did not invalidate the jury charge on the doctrine of implied consent. Fischer v. Hooper, 143 N.H. 585, 732 A.2d 396, 401.

N.H.1991. Cit. in case cit. in disc., quot. in sup. and adopted, com. (j) quot. in sup., Appendix cit. in disc. Spouses sued the husband's former wife for intentional infliction of emotional distress from actions including alleged harassing telephone calls and scratching the paint on the plaintiffs' vehicle. The trial court found that a tort had been committed, whether it was called harassment, invasion of privacy, or outrageous conduct. It awarded the plaintiffs limited damages. This court adopted the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress but reversed, because neither plaintiff had suffered severe mental distress. The court also concluded that the trial court erred in grounding its decision on a privacy theory, because privacy issues were not advanced in the plaintiffs' original declarations. Morancy v. Morancy, 134 N.H. 493, 593 A.2d 1158, 1159.

N.H.1985. Subsec. (1) quot. in disc. The plaintiff's decedent committed suicide after police officers allegedly falsely arrested and battered him. The plaintiff sued the officers and the town for wrongful death. Questions were certified to this court regarding the plaintiff's ability to maintain a tort action seeking damages resulting from the suicide of another. The court held that the plaintiff might maintain an action for wrongful death by suicide where the plaintiff could demonstrate that the tortfeasor, by extreme and outrageous conduct, intentionally wronged a victim, and that this conduct caused severe emotional distress in the victim, which was a substantial factor in bringing about his suicide. The court reasoned that liability for suicide was an extension of the recognized tort liability for intentional infliction of mental distress. Mayer v. Town of Hampton, 127 N.H. 81, 497 A.2d 1206, 1210.

N.H.1984. Com. (j) cit. in sup. In an action for wrongful death and emotional distress, the lower court transferred without ruling the question whether parents could recover for emotional distress when their child died shortly after arrival at the defendant hospital, allegedly due to malpractice by the defendant doctors. This court held that the parents could not recover under a theory of negligent infliction of emotional distress because they had not witnessed the death and were informed of it shortly after their arrival at the hospital. Dismissed. Natter v. Frisbie Memorial Hospital, 474 A.2d 584, 587.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

N.H.1983. Cit. in sup. A woman moved to another state with her two minor children in violation of a divorce decree awarding custody of the children to her husband. The husband brought suit against his ex-wife's parents, alleging that they aided and abetted his wife in depriving him of the rightful custody of his children. The trial court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss, stating that the plaintiff had failed to state a cause of action cognizable under state law. This court reversed, holding that a parent was entitled to a remedy for injuries sustained as a result of another's intentional interference with the parent's custody of his or her child. Recovery would be permitted even where the defendant did not directly interfere, but intentionally aided and abetted another in interfering with the parent's custodial rights. The court noted, however, that the plaintiff's claim for emotional distress should be treated as a separate cause of action. Plante v. Engel, 124 N.H. 213, 469 A.2d 1299, 1302.

N.H.1982. Cit. in sup. The plaintiffs brought an action against their insurance company, asserting several contract and tort claims based on the defendant's refusal to reimburse certain medical expenses. The insurance company moved to dismiss all but the plaintiffs' breach of contract claim for failure to state a cause of action. The trial court transferred, without ruling, the defendant's challenge to this court. The court dismissed the plaintiffs' tort claims based, in part, on its finding that an insurer's wrongful refusal to pay a claim did not give rise to a cause of action in tort. The plaintiff wife's charge of intentional infliction of emotional distress was rejected because the insurance company's actions failed to meet the requirement for “outrageous conduct.” The plaintiff wife was also denied recovery for the negligent infliction of emotional distress. Finally, the plaintiffs' claim of fraud was rejected for failure to set forth specific factual grounds. The court remanded the case for consideration of the plaintiffs' bad-faith breach of contract claim, pending the outcome of a declaratory judgment action seeking to ascertain whether the policy covered the plaintiffs' medical expenses. Jarvis v. Prudential Ins. Co. of America, 122 N.H. 648, 448 A.2d 407, 409.

N.J.

N.J.2004. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. Former female employee of car dealership filed sexual-harassment suit against dealership and its owner, alleging she was harassed by male employees. Trial court dismissed plaintiff's claim for emotional-distress damages, entered judgment on a jury verdict finding dealership liable for the harassment, and granted plaintiff attorney's fees as the prevailing party. The appellate division, inter alia, reversed the dismissal of plaintiff's emotional-distress claim, and remanded for a new trial on those damages. Affirming in part, this court held, inter alia, that a trial on damages was warranted, as an emotional-distress claim under the discrimination statute had a lower standard of proof than that necessary for a tort claim, such that a victim could recover for all natural consequences, including intangible injuries, resulting from the discrimination. Tarr v. Ciasulli, 181 N.J. 70, 853 A.2d 921, 924.

N.J.1998. Com. (d) cit. in headnote, quot. in case quot. in disc., and quot. in case quot. in conc. and diss. op., com. (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. An African-American county sheriff's officer sued the county sheriff for intentional infliction of emotional distress after the sheriff called her a "jungle bunny." The trial court granted defendant summary judgment, and the intermediate appellate court affirmed. This court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's proffered evidence was sufficient to establish fact issues regarding her emotional-distress claim. The court determined that a rational factfinder could find that defendant's conduct would have caused severe emotional distress to the average African-American. An opinion concurring in part and dissenting in part argued that a single racial epithet, though uttered by a superior, would not cause severe emotional distress to an African-American of ordinary experience and of normal constitution, sensitivity, and susceptibilities. Taylor v. Metzger, 152 N.J. 490, 706 A.2d 685, 685, 694, 696, 703.

N.J.1992. Quot. in case quot. in diss. op. After parent publicly questioned school teacher's fitness and competency, teacher sued parent for infliction of emotional distress and defamation, and parent's insurer refused to defend her. In the instant suit, parent sued insurer for breach of contractual duty to defend. Trial court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment, but intermediate appellate court reversed, disagreeing with trial court's conclusion that the underlying complaint alleged only defamation. Affirming, this court held that the complaint also alleged intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress and therefore defendant was obligated to defend plaintiff. Dissent argued that teacher's allegations against plaintiff did not meet the stringent requirements of intentional infliction of emotional distress, and thus the claim was one for defamation, for which there was neither coverage nor a duty to defend under plaintiff's homeowner's policy. Voorhees v. Preferred Mut. Ins. Co., 128 N.J. 165, 607 A.2d 1255, 1266.

N.J.1988. Cit. and quot. in sup., coms. (d) and (j) cit. and quot. in sup., com. (k) cit. in sup. A bank customer sued his bank for intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress caused by the wrongful dishonoring of checks that the plaintiff had written to his wife. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff on the intentional infliction of emotional distress claim and the trial court entered a judgment. Reversing and remanding, the intermediate appellate court ruled that the trial court had failed to delineate the distinction between mistake and intentional breach or between willful, wanton, or reckless misconduct. Modifying the judgment of the intermediate appellate court, this court remanded for the entry of an order dismissing the complaint, holding that a bank customer could not be compensated for the intentional infliction of emotional distress when a bank wrongfully dishonored a check, unless the bank's conduct was both intentional and reckless or outrageous, and unless the distress was severe or resulted in bodily injury. The court reasoned that the slight distress arising from the occasional dishonoring of a check was one of the aggravations of contemporary life; the plaintiff's allegations that he suffered aggravation, embarrassment, an unspecified number of headaches, and loss of sleep did not warrant compensation for the intentional infliction of emotional distress. Buckley v. Trenton Saving Fund Soc., 111 N.J. 355, 544 A.2d 857, 863, 864.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

N.J.Super.App.Div.

N.J.Super.App.Div.2020. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Patient who had been implanted with four screws and washers to stabilize a broken femur sued surgeon who later operated on him to remove the screws, after learning approximately four years following the surgery that surgeon had left the washers in his leg. The trial court granted summary judgment for surgeon. Affirming, this court held that patient failed to demonstrate that he suffered compensable damages as a result of the retained washers. The court pointed out that patient acknowledged that he was seeking damages related only to emotional distress, and that, under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, generally, for conduct to be actionable, the emotional distress had to be so severe that no reasonable person could be expected to endure it. Clark v. Nenna, 244 A.3d 291, 295.

N.J.Super.App.Div.2011. Com. (i) cit. in sup. Former employee sued former employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), alleging that she suffered emotional injury when employer told her to remove pictures of her deceased daughter and to no longer speak of her daughter at work, because it was a disruption in the workplace. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant. Affirming, this court held that although defendant might have been insensitive, there was no evidence that he intended to cause plaintiff emotional distress, and his conduct did not rise to the level of recklessness so as to support a claim of IIED; although a reasonable employer should have known that telling a grieving mother not to talk about her deceased daughter might cause emotional distress, a severe reaction was not a risk that one should have predicted, and an employer was not charged with a duty to avoid all emotional distress to employees, but only such distress that was extreme, outrageous, and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Ingraham v. Ortho-McNeil Pharmaceutical, 422 N.J.Super. 12, 25, 25 A.3d 1191, 1198.

N.J.Super.App.Div.2009. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Physician whose patients were primarily women of the Orthodox Jewish faith sued Jewish newspaper and others, after newspaper falsely published that a rabbinical court had issued an order of contempt against him for refusing to comply with an order to give his wife a religious divorce. The trial court granted defendants' motions to dismiss, finding that adjudication of plaintiff's claims would entail excessive entanglement of the court into religious affairs and practices. Affirming, this court held, as to plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, that no jury could evaluate whether defendants' conduct was “extreme and outrageous,” or whether the conduct caused plaintiff to suffer “severe” emotional distress, without understanding whether the conduct would be viewed as “extreme and outrageous” within the Orthodox Jewish community or whether such conduct would cause a person of that faith to suffer “severe” emotional distress. Abdelhak v. Jewish Press Inc., 411 N.J.Super. 211, 234, 985 A.2d 197, 210.

N.J.Super.App.Div.2006. Com. (j) quot. in case cit. in sup. Jewish funeral home brought a collection action against son-in-law of deceased for nonpayment of its bill for services that it discounted for its failure to fulfill an orthodox Jewish ritual that required the body of the deceased to be accompanied at all times until it was buried. The trial court entered summary judgment in favor of home, and dismissed defendant's counterclaim for, in part, breach of contract. Reversing and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that, unlike in a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, there was no requirement of a heightened showing of emotional distress in a tort or contract action seeking consequential damages for emotional distress, and, therefore, the damages alleged by son-in-law could be sufficient as a matter of law to warrant an award. Menorah Chapels At Millburn v. Needle, 386 N.J.Super. 100, 116, 899 A.2d 316, 325.

N.J.Super.App.Div.2005. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. Children who witnessed mother's highway death after a stray tire crashed into their minivan, crushing minivan's windshield header downward and fracturing mother's skull, brought crashworthiness products-liability action against minivan manufacturer. After a first trial in which the jury returned a verdict for plaintiffs, the trial court granted defendant a new trial on damages only, and entered the second jury's lesser damages awards. This court reversed in part and restored the first jury's damages awards on the children's emotional-distress claims, holding that the awards were not excessive in light of a record that showed that the children suffered severe emotional distress, both as direct victims in the accident and as bystanders to their mother's gruesome death. Boryszewski ex rel. Boryszewski v. Burke, 380 N.J.Super. 361, 401-402, 882 A.2d 410, 434.

N.J.Super.App.Div.2005. Com. (d) quot. in disc. and quot. in case quot. in disc. Members of decedent's family sued funeral home and decedent's adopted daughter and her husband for, in part, negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress, after plaintiffs were not told that they could have a private viewing with decedent's body. Trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that as to plaintiffs' intentional-infliction-of-emotional-distress claim, plaintiffs failed to show any evidence that they suffered severe emotional trauma as a result of not attending a private viewing, or that defendants' actions were so extreme or outrageous as to go beyond all bounds of decency. Cole v. Laughrey Funeral Home, 376 N.J.Super. 135, 148, 869 A.2d 457, 465.

N.J.Super.App.Div.2005. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee sued former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress and other claims in connection with her termination. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant. Affirming, this court held as a matter of law that the conduct referenced by plaintiff, that former supervisor commented that plaintiff was close to retirement and was not in it for the long haul, clearly did not meet the enhanced standard of outrage that was required to recover for intentional infliction of emotional distress in New Jersey. Young v. Hobart West Group, 385 N.J.Super. 448, 468, 897 A.2d 1063, 1074.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

N.J.Super.

N.J.Super.2002. Cit. in case cit. in sup. Employee who had acted as a whistleblower sued employer for retaliation under Conscientious Employee Protection Act (CEPA) and for intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court dismissed plaintiff's claims, holding, inter alia, that her emotional-distress claim failed because the underlying facts were the same facts that formed basis of CEPA claim; thus, CEPA's waiver provision applied to both claims. Even if defendant's conduct was not in retaliation for plaintiff's whistleblowing activities, defendant's actions were not extreme and outrageous. While workplace environment became annoying and emotionally oppressive to plaintiff, extreme and outrageous conduct did not extend to indignities, threats, annoyances, petty oppressions, or other trivialities. Cokus v. Bristol Myers Squibb Co., 362 N.J.Super. 366, 391, 827 A.2d 1173, 1188, affirmed 362 N.J.Super. 245, 827 A.2d 1098 (2003).

N.J.Super.2001. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Caucasian employee sued employer and her African-American supervisor for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that supervisor's racially charged comment and sexual misconduct involving unwanted physical contact created a hostile work environment and caused her severe mental anguish. Trial court granted defendants summary judgment. This court reversed in part and remanded, holding, inter alia, that jury could reasonably find that supervisor's conduct was extreme and outrageous, given supervisor's knowledge that plaintiff was child-abuse victim. Testimony that plaintiff visited a psychologist after the incident, that she suffered from nightmares, insomnia, and depression, and that she was unable to work sufficiently established severe emotional distress. Flizack v. Good News Home For Women, Inc., 346 N.J.Super. 150, 162, 163, 787 A.2d 228, 234, 235.

N.J.Super.2001. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Appliance-store salesman who was discharged for selling a television set to his brother-in-law for below cost sued former employer and managers for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiff. Reversing and dismissing the complaint, this court held that evidence that managers incorrectly characterized plaintiff's role in the sale of the television set as “stealing” and that their personal dislike of plaintiff motivated their decision to fire him fell far short of showing the degree of outrageousness required to support plaintiff's claim, and plaintiff failed to show that he suffered any greater emotional distress than a person ordinarily would experience as a result of losing a job. Griffin v. Tops Appliance City, Inc., 337 N.J.Super. 15, 25, 26, 766 A.2d 292, 298.

N.J.Super.1999. Com. (d) quot. in disc. (erron. cit. as § 4b). A husband was led to believe that children born during his marriage were his own, when, in fact, they were products of an ongoing affair between his wife and her paramour. The wife filed for divorce, and the husband brought a third-party complaint against the paramour for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. This court denied the paramour's motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that keeping the duration of the affair a secret from plaintiff, as well as suppressing the true paternity of the first-born child for almost three years, including four months after the paternity of the second-born child had been disclosed, without regard to the high degree of probable harm to defendant, would constitute outrageous behavior. C.M. v. J.M. v. W.P., 320 N.J.Super. 119, 726 A.2d 998, 1002.

N.J.Super.1999. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Owners of beach club sued neighboring homeowner for, inter alia, defamation and intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with defendant's efforts to rally official and community support against defendants' expansion of the facility. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiffs. Reversing and remanding, this court held, in part, that none of the statements included in defendant's flyers or letters to public officials was capable of a defamatory meaning, and that defendant, who was doing nothing more than exercising her legal right to protest a certain land use application, could not be said to have acted outrageously. LoBiondo v. Schwartz, 323 N.J.Super. 391, 733 A.2d 516, 530.

N.J.Super.1998. Com. (d) cit. in disc. A police officer sued the city for intentional infliction of emotional distress, defamation, invasion of privacy, and violations of 42 U.S.C. § 1983. After the officer's wife filed a domestic-violence claim, alleging that he had violated a restraining order, had slashed four tires of a family car, and had attempted to cut telephone and cable television wires, the police officer's superiors ordered the officer to undergo psychological treatment and drug testing. The trial court dismissed plaintiff's complaint. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff made no prima facie showing that defendants intended to cause plaintiff distress or that they deliberately disregarded the risk that severe emotional distress would occur, nor was there any conduct rising to the level of outrageousness on defendants' part. Thus, plaintiff failed to establish two essential elements of the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Hart v. City of Jersey City, 308 N.J.Super. 487, 706 A.2d 256, 258.

N.J.Super.1998. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. A store manager was fired and became the subject of a police investigation after the bank did not receive the store's deposit receipt for $1,325.52. The missing receipts were later found. The manager sued the bank and the store for negligence, defamation, and intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress. The defamation and emotional-distress claims were dismissed, and the jury awarded plaintiff damages for negligence. This court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded, holding, inter alia, that the trial court properly dismissed the emotional-distress claims. Although plaintiff was “acutely upset” by reason of the incident, her emotional distress was not so severe that no reasonable man could be expected to endure it. Schillaci v. First Fidelity Bank, 311 N.J.Super. 396, 709 A.2d 1375, 1380.

N.J.Super.1997. Quot. in case quot. in disc. Woman who contracted with agency to provide a caretaker for her disabled husband while she was away sued agency for, inter alia, consumer fraud, negligent hiring, negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress, and invasion of privacy after the caretaker agency assigned to husband abandoned him and stole various items from couple's home. The trial court dismissed the complaint. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held that plaintiff had stated a claim for consumer fraud and negligent hiring; however, the couple's emotional distress was not sufficiently severe for purposes of the torts of negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress, and they could not sustain a claim for invasion of privacy where they invited caretaker into their home. Lingar v. Live-In Companions, Inc., 300 N.J.Super. 22, 692 A.2d 61, 67.

N.J.Super.1996. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Highly dissatisfied owners of newly constructed homes sued real estate agency, individual realtors, and builder for violations of the state Consumer Fraud Act (Act), common law fraud, and intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress. Following dismissal of all claims but the claim against real estate agency under the Act, the trial court held a bench trial and entered judgment for plaintiffs. Affirming in part and reversing in part, this court held, inter alia, that individual realtors materially misrepresented builder's experience and qualifications; real estate agency was vicariously liable for the misrepresentations since they were within realtors' purview and seemingly authorized by agency; and punitive damages could be assessed against agency in the form of the treble damages allowed under the Act; however, plaintiffs' emotional-distress claims against agency were properly dismissed for lack of evidence that agency acted intentionally or outrageously or that plaintiffs experienced severe emotional distress. Gennari v. Weichert Co. Realtors, 288 N.J.Super. 504, 672 A.2d 1190, 1213.

N.J.Super.1995. Com. (d) quot. in conc. and diss. op. Wife brought an action for the dissolution of her marriage and asserted tort claims against her husband for damages. The trial court struck plaintiff's tort claims on statute-of-limitations grounds. Affirming in part and reversing in part, this court held, inter alia, that the statute of limitations could be tolled on proof by plaintiff that she suffered from "battered-woman's syndrome." The concurring and dissenting opinion saw no need for the creation of a new tort cause of action for battered-woman's syndrome, arguing that emotional encounters within a marriage should not form a basis for the imposition of tort liability unless one of the parties had engaged in conduct that could support a claim for assault, battery, or intentional infliction of emotional distress; here, the kind of verbal abuse that defendant allegedly directed at plaintiff, though offensive, was not sufficiently outrageous to provide the basis for a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Giovine v. Giovine, 284 N.J.Super. 3, 35, 663 A.2d 109, 126.

N.J.Super.1993. Cit. in sup. Former county department director sued county board and officials, alleging constructive discharge based on his political affiliation and seeking to recover damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Affirming in part the trial court's dismissal of plaintiff's claims, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's claims of severe humiliation, anxiety, and distress from alleged harassment were not sufficient to support an emotional distress claim. Morgan v. Union Cty. Bd. of Chosen Freeholders, 268 N.J.Super. 337, 354, 633 A.2d 985, 993.

N.J.Super.1992. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case cit. in disc. A former employee of a package delivery service who was discharged for stealing packages brought an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, against, among others, his employer for discharging him on the ground of dishonesty, an arbitration panel for upholding the discharge, and several employees for signing with the employer's knowledge and approval criminal complaints against him for theft and assault. The court dismissed the claim, holding that, because probable cause existed to prosecute the plaintiff, he could not show the kind of outrageous conduct by the defendants necessary to maintain his action, nor did he prove that his emotional distress was so severe that no reasonable man could be expected to endure it. Fleming v. UPS, 255 N.J.Super. 108, 604 A.2d 657, 686.

N.J.Super.1991. Com. (h) cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in sup. A husband sued his wife for divorce on the ground of adultery, and subsequently filed an amended complaint that included a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court dismissed the complaint based on the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court held, inter alia, that one spouse may sue the other in a divorce action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, even in absence of physical injury. Nonetheless, it concluded that the wife's engaging in an adulterous affair that lasted 11 years of the marriage failed to reach the level of outrageousness necessary for liability under the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court commented that a recitation of the facts of this case to an average member of the community would not lead him to exclaim, "Outrageous!" Ruprecht v. Ruprecht, 252 N.J.Super. 230, 599 A.2d 604, 607, 608.

N.J.Super.1991. Cit. and quot. in sup., com. (b) cit. and quot. in sup. A teacher was suspended from her teaching duties and directed to undergo psychiatric examinations as a result of the claims of several parents concerning her alleged lack of fitness. The teacher sued the parents for the embarrassment, humiliation, emotional distress, and the mental anguish she suffered as a result of the claims. After settling the suit, one of the parents brought a declaratory judgment action against her insurer seeking to hold the insurer responsible for reimbursement of all defense costs as a result of its failure to defend her in accordance with its obligations under her homeowner's policy. The trial court granted summary judgment for the insurer holding that the complaint alleged defamation, which was not covered under the insuring agreement. Reversing and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that the torts of outrage and negligent infliction of emotional distress were alleged as separate causes of action and that the mental anguish she claimed to suffer qualified as "bodily injury" under the policy; therefore the insurer had the duty to defend. Voorhees v. Preferred Mut. Ins., 246 N.J.Super. 564, 588 A.2d 417, 422, certification denied 126 N.J. 340, 598 A.2d 897 (1991), judgment affirmed 128 N.J. 165, 607 A.2d 1255 (1992). See above case.

N.J.Super.1989. Cit. but dist. Plaintiff sued two private investigators and their employer for invasion of privacy and negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress caused by their surveillance of her activities. Defendants had been retained by an insurance company to investigate plaintiff's personal injury claims. The trial court granted summary judgment for the defendants. Affirming, this court held that the evidence was insufficient as a matter of law to support a finding of severe mental distress resulting from an insurance investigation, and that the defendants' private surveillance from such public places as a street, a parking lot, and a highway did not support an invasion of privacy claim. Figured v. Paralegal Tech. Serv., 231 N.J.Super. 251, 555 A.2d 663, 665, certification granted117 N.J. 118, 564 A.2d 847 (1989).

N.J.Super.1987. Cit. in disc. When a bank wrongfully dishonored two support checks a husband had sent to his separated wife and children, he was widely criticized by relatives and friends for not providing for his family. The husband sued the bank for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and he was awarded substantial damages. Reversing and remanding, this court held that the judge's instructions failed to distinguish between mistake and intentional breach or to adequately address the subject of proximate causation. The court stated that, regardless of whether wrongful dishonor gave rise to a tort claim or an action for breach of contract, under the U.C.C. the plaintiff could recover all consequential damages from wrongful dishonor, including damages for emotional distress, if they were proximately caused. Buckley v. Trenton Sav. Fund Soc., 216 N.J.Super. 705, 524 A.2d 886, 891, certification granted 108 N.J. 211, 528 A.2d 31 (1987).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

N.J.Super.1985. Cit. in sup. A divorced father sued a hospital and certain staff members, a parochial school, its principal, a pastor, and one of its teachers. He sought compensatory and punitive damages from the hospital and staff members of its Center for Evaluation and Counseling on grounds of negligence and malpractice in the preparation of a report recommending that his children be transferred to a public school. He sought damages for negligent infliction of emotional distress from all the defendants. The trial court dismissed all claims, and this court affirmed. It held that the plaintiff had failed to show a proximate causal relationship between the alleged negligence and the damages he had sustained. Henderson v. Morristown Memorial Hosp., 198 N.J.Super. 418, 487 A.2d 742, 749, certification denied 101 N.J. 250, 501 A.2d 922 (1985).

N.J.Super.1984. Quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in sup. The plaintiffs appealed a dismissal of their complaint for failure to state a claim upon which relief could be granted. This court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The plaintiffs, husband and wife, had taken a neighbor's child to a circus. The child was killed when attacked by a circus cat. The husband, who had had a close relationship with the child, had tried to rescue the boy from the animal's mouth. Both plaintiffs suffered severe, permanent psychological trauma. This court affirmed as to the wife, but reversed and remanded as to the husband. The court held that because the husband's rescue attempt was a reasonably foreseeable result of the defendants' negligence, his injuries were compensable. While noting that compensability for emotional harm was not limited to harm from fear for one's own safety, this court held that the wife had no cause of action under theories of negligence, outrageous conduct, or the harboring of wild animals. Eyrich for Eyrich v. Dam, 193 N.J.Super. 244, 473 A.2d 539, 547.

N.J.Super.1981. Cit. and quot. in sup. and com. (d) quot. in part in case quot. in sup. The plaintiffs complaint alleged that the defendant doctor told the plaintiffs, the parents of the patient, that their child was suffering from a rare disease, knowing that the child had nothing more than a mildly infected appendix, and the plaintiffs sought damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The defendant moved for summary judgment. This court stated that New Jersey recognizes emotional distress as an element of damages in actions based either on negligence or an intentional tort and that the existence or nonexistence of an underlying independent cause of action is not essential to a cause of action for the intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court stated that substantial bodily injury is also not an essential element but rather, it is sufficient that the conduct produced severe emotional distress. The court held that the complaint stated a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress which precluded summary judgment against the parents. Hume v. Bayer, 178 N.J.Super. 310, 428 A.2d 966, 968, 970.

N.J.Super.1980. Cit. in disc. (erron. cit. as § 47), quot. in disc. and com. (1) quot. in part in disc. The defendant and his wife agreed to sell their home to the plaintiffs, and they signed a contract of sale. Thereafter, the defendant's wife was found buried in the backyard of this property and the plaintiffs refused to consummate the purchase because they believed that the defendant had murdered his wife. The plaintiffs sued, alleging breach of the agreement, because the property was not able to be conveyed in the same condition as when the agreement was signed, and therefore sought rescission. The plaintiffs also sought damages for the intentional infliction of mental and physical distress and for intentional damage to the property. The defendant moved to dismiss the damage claims, alleging that they did not state a claim upon which relief could be granted. This court stated that there was doubt as to whether the tort for the intentional infliction of emotional distress, the tort of outrage, had been recognized in New Jersey. The court stated that indirect victims of intentional misconduct have been permitted to recover only when the conduct occurred in their presence. The court found that the plaintiffs were not the persons toward whom any outrageous actions by the defendant were directed, they were not members of the defendant's family, nor were they present at the time of the alleged murder. The court held that the plaintiffs could not recover for their emotional distress. The court also held that the plaintiffs' demand for rescission and for damages relating to the real property should not be dismissed as a matter of law, although the plaintiffs must elect between rescission or damages. Calliari v. Sugar, 180 N.J.Super. 423, 435 A.2d 139, 140, 141, 142.

N.J.Super.1977. Sec. and coms. cit. in ftn. in sup. in disc. This was an appeal by the parents of a baby who died at a hospital from the trial court's dismissal of their complaint against the hospital as failing to state a claim for which relief could be granted. The Superior Court, without addressing the merits of plaintiffs' case, reversed and remanded for further proceedings. The court held that it was error to have dismissed the complaint without having afforded the plaintiffs an opportunity to amend or granting additional time for discovery where the gravamen of the cause of action for damages arising from the hospital's method of informing them of their baby's death, its failure to locate the baby's body or to confirm the death for a period of some weeks, could have been stated, in an amended complaint, so as to conform to the requirements for a cause of action in malpractice, negligence, or some other theory of liability. Muniz v. United Hospitals, Etc., 153 N.J.Super. 79, 379 A.2d 57, 59.

N.J.Super.1976. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup. and illus. (1) cit. in sup. Erron. cit. in part of op. as § 416A. The parents of a premature baby, who died shortly after birth, brought an action against the hospital in which the baby died for recovery under the tort of "outrage." The plaintiffs alleged negligent deviation from standard methods of hospital administration, labeling the hospital's handling of the death as callous and inhumane. This court found that the hospital's telephone call to the plaintiffs announcing the death could only be called careless in that the message was conveyed without any prior warnings. This conduct might demonstrate negligence if the defendant realized that this conduct involved an unreasonable risk of bodily harm and even if such risk existed, no bodily harm had occurred. The court observed that generally negligence is not actionable without its production of physical consequences to an emotional disturbance. The suit was thus dismissed as the facts did not constitute a cause of action. Muniz v. United Hosp. Med. Ct.-Presby. Hosp., 146 N.J.Super. 512, 370 A.2d 76, 79, 80, 86.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

N.J.Super.1975. Com. (d) quot. in part and fol. This was an action brought by a widow against her deceased husband's son and daughter-in-law for intentional infliction of mental distress and wrongful interference with a wife's right to receive support from her husband. Plaintiff alleged that defendants moved her husband to defendant's home after he had suffered a stroke and prevented plaintiff from seeing him. Defendants' motion for summary judgment as to the support payments was denied but was otherwise granted. It was held, inter alia, that plaintiff's complaint did not make out a cause of action of the intentional infliction of mental distress, but rather one for alienation of affections, which was proscribed by the Heart Balm Act. The court held, as a matter of law, that the defendants' conduct was not of the type required by the tort of intentional infliction of mental distress. An essential element of that tort requires the wrongful conduct to be so extreme and outrageous "as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized community." Hafner v. Hafner, 135 N.J.Super. 328, 343 A.2d 166, 169.

N.M.

N.M.2007. Cit. in disc., quot. in sup., cit. in case cit. in disc., adopted in case quot. in disc., subsec. (2) cit. in disc., com. (e) quot. in disc., com. (g) quot. in sup., com. (l) cit. but dist. Firefighters who responded to a pipeline explosion in which 12 members of an extended family camping near the pipeline either were killed outright or died later from severe burns, and witnessed the conscious survivors' visible agony brought suit for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against natural-gas company that owned and operated the pipeline. The trial court dismissed the IIED claim, and the court of appeals reversed with respect to that claim. Affirming and remanding, this court adopted a policy-based reformulated firefighter's rule whereby a firefighter could recover damages proximately caused by intentional or reckless conduct. The court concluded that plaintiffs in this case alleged sufficient facts to support each element of a claim for IIED. Baldonado v. El Paso Natural Gas Co., 143 N.M. 288, 176 P.3d 277, 280, 282, 283, 285-286.

N.M.1998. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. Sales representative sued former employer and former supervisors for, inter alia, violations of Title VII, defamation, and intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with employer's failure to promote her and defendants' actions vis-à-vis her new employer. The trial court entered summary judgment for defendants. Affirming in part and reversing in part, this court held that material factual issues existed as to whether employer engaged in gender discrimination by promoting a male employee to a management position for which plaintiff was allegedly qualified, and that plaintiff's defamation claim, based on a letter sent by former supervisors to her new employer and calling plaintiff a liar, gossip, and problem employee, survived the motion for summary judgment; however, plaintiff failed to establish that defendants' conduct caused her to suffer severe mental distress. Silverman v. Progressive Broadcasting, Inc., 125 N.M. 500, 964 P.2d 61, 70, 71.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

N.M.1997. Cit. in case cit. in disc. Siblings of decedent who was buried in family plot sued mortuary for, inter alia, breach of contract, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and prima facie tort after defendant, in interring decedent, disturbed the grave of plaintiffs' mother and exposed her remains. The trial court entered summary judgment for defendant. Affirming, this court held, in part, that, while defendant breached the contract of burial for plaintiffs' mother, plaintiffs incurred no damages as a result; that defendant's conduct was not extreme or outrageous, nor was plaintiffs' mental distress sufficiently severe to give rise to a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress; and that plaintiffs failed to establish the "intent to cause injury" requirement necessary to sustain a prima facie tort action. Jaynes v. Strong-Thorne Mortuary, Inc., 124 N.M. 613, 954 P.2d 45, 50.

N.M.1994. Com. (j) cit. in case cit. in sup. A decedent's wife and children sued a funeral director for, among other claims, breach of contract and infliction of emotional distress, alleging that the director had failed to embalm the decedent's body completely as required by the contract for funeral services. After trial court set aside jury's initial award and granted a new trial on the damages issue, this court reversed and remanded a reduced award of compensatory damages, holding, inter alia, that damages for mental anguish caused by the alleged breach were recoverable and that mental distress in connection with exhumation was a general damage arising from the breach, making a showing of foreseeability unnecessary. The court stated that compensation for only serious mental distress from breach of contract should be implied in fact as within the contemplation of the parties to a funeral and burial contract, and, in this case, decedent's wife presented evidence of long-term, severe distress associated with the condition of her husband's body and her feelings that his body was disgraced and dishonored. Flores v. Baca, 117 N.M. 306, 871 P.2d 962, 969.

N.M.1990. Cit. in disc. A property owner in a three-party land exchange filed an action in interpleader against the accountant involved in the transaction, among others, when he used a note payable to another party as collateral for a loan on which he defaulted and on which the bank collected causing injury to the other parties involved. A second party filed a cross-claim against the bank, among others, in negligence. The trial court directed a verdict in favor of the defendants and ruled in favor of the cross-claimants on their negligence claim. Affirming, this court held that prima facie tort was recognized in New Mexico. The court noted that, in recognizing this tort, the court was acting within the tradition of the development of tort law in this jurisdiction, since New Mexico previously had recognized the torts of inducing breach of contract, intentional interference with prospective contractual relations, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, relying on the Restatement views of those torts. Schmitz v. Smentowski, 109 N.M. 386, 785 P.2d 726, 736.

N.M.1989. Quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case cit. in sup. A discharged employee sued his employer for intentional or reckless infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. The trial court directed a verdict for the employer. Affirming, this court held that the employer's conduct in discharging the plaintiff in a loud voice on the sales floor did not constitute the extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to satisfy the standard for intentional or reckless infliction of emotional distress. Newberry v. Allied Stores, Inc., 108 N.M. 424, 773 P.2d 1231, 1239.

N.M.1989. Cit. in case quot. in disc. Neighbors had an argument about the location of a roadway easement giving one of them access to a highway. The owner of the dominant estate sued the owners of the servient estates, seeking to resolve the placement of the easement and seeking damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court ruled on the easement location and denied the plaintiff's emotional distress claim. Affirming, this court stated that, even if the defendants had provoked the plaintiff while knowing that he was suffering from a stress-related disorder, the defendants' behavior was not sufficiently outrageous as to support the emotional distress claim. Sanders v. Lutz, 109 N.M. 193, 784 P.2d 12, 15.

N.M.1969. Cit. com. (j) in sup. This was an action for malicious prosecution. Defendant instigated criminal proceedings against plaintiff as a result of which plaintiff was arrested. The trial court found plaintiff to be suffering from embarrassment and humiliation. The court in affirming for plaintiff held, inter alia, that he could recover general damages for injury to reputation and for emotional distress. Sweitzer v. Sanchez, 80 N.M. 408, 456 P.2d 882, 884.

N.M.App.

N.M.App.2008. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Property owner sued city after city's sewer system backed up, causing a pool of sewer water to accumulate under the bathroom floor of owner's home. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding owner damages for the injury to the property and for the emotional distress that he suffered as a result of the property damage. Reversing the judgment as to the emotional distress damages, this court held that a plaintiff could not recover for emotional distress based solely on a claim for negligent damage to property; here, plaintiff offered no proof of personal injury and there were no allegations or proof of willful, wanton, or malicious conduct that would support an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Castillo v. City of Las Vegas, 2008-NMCA-141, 145 N.M. 205, 195 P.3d 870, 876.

N.M.App.2006. Cit. and quot. in sup., subsec. (1) cit. in sup. and disc., subsec. (2) cit. in disc. and cit. but not fol, com. (l) cit. and quot. in sup., caveat cit. and quot. in disc. Firefighters who responded to a pipeline explosion in which 12 members of an extended family camping near the pipeline either were killed outright or died later from severe burns, and witnessed the conscious survivors' visible agony brought suit for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against natural-gas company that owned and operated the pipeline. This court reversed the trial court's dismissal of the IIED claim, overruling the “fireman's rule” it had adopted in a previous case and concluding that plaintiffs stated a claim for IIED. The court held that the tort of IIED did not require that a defendant's conduct be directed at a plaintiff, or that a plaintiff be present at the time of the injury to a third person; in addition, plaintiffs' allegations of defendant's indifference to a potential failure of its pipeline were sufficient to plead the element of outrageous conduct. Baldonado v. El Paso Natural Gas Co., 143 N.M. 297, 176 P.3d 286, 294, 295.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

N.M.App.1999. Adopted in cases cit. in disc., subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in sup., coms. (e), (g), and (h) cit. in disc., com. (f) cit. in sup. Husband brought damages action for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress against friend for having engaged in pattern of intrusive and oftentimes sexual behavior with plaintiff's wife, former wife, and former fiancee. Affirming trial court's dismissal of complaint, this court held, inter alia, that defendant's participation in consensual sexual relations with adult women who had a past or present relationship with plaintiff was not so extreme and outrageous as to permit plaintiff to recover for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Padwa v. Hadley, 127 N.M. 416, 981 P.2d 1234, 1237-1239, 1241, 1999-NMCA-067.

N.M.App.1998. Quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in disc., com. (f) quot. in sup., com. (g) cit. in disc., illus. 12 cit. in sup. Nanny who ruptured her colon while in parents' employ sued parents for negligence and breach of contract. Plaintiff also asserted a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendants terminated her services while she was in the hospital recovering from abdominal surgery, and lied to the Department of Labor about her employment. The trial court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held that defendants were under no duty to warn plaintiff of the dangers associated with lifting their infant son or the risks posed by overwork, and that summary judgment was properly entered on the contract claim; however, material factual issues existed as to whether defendants' discharge of plaintiff while she was recuperating from surgery constituted extreme and outrageous conduct. The court noted that defendants' alleged lying to the Labor Department could have been privileged. Stock v. Grantham, 125 N.M. 564, 964 P.2d 125, 135-136.

N.M.App.1995. Quot. in case quot. in sup. Village council member who was also the promoter of a for-profit motorcycle race sued newspaper and reporter for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with reporter's investigations for and articles published about plaintiff's activities. Affirming the trial court's dismissal, this court held that neither the reporter's cooperation with the IRS regarding plaintiff's suspected tax law violations nor his writing of three accurate articles concerning newsworthy events was so obnoxious or intolerable as to give rise to a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Andrews v. Stallings, 119 N.M. 478, 892 P.2d 611, 624.

N.M.App.1995. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Newspaper reporter who was promoted to special-projects reporter sued newspaper for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, after defendant assigned plaintiff so many beat stories and daily assignments that insufficient time remained for her to research and write special-project stories, contrary to defendant's assurances of fewer daily beats. Affirming the trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendant, this court held, in part, that defendant's conduct did not reach the level of extreme and outrageous behavior necessary to support plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Stieber v. Journal Pub. Co., 120 N.M. 270, 901 P.2d 201, 205.

N.M.App.1993. Quot. in case quot. in disc., coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. A former employee sued her former employer for sexual harassment, alleging that the harassment embarrassed, shamed, and degraded her and caused her mental anguish. Trial court dismissed plaintiff's complaint on the ground that plaintiff failed to exhaust her administrative remedies under the New Mexico Human Rights Act (NMHRA). Reversing and remanding, this court held that, although trial court correctly determined that plaintiff could not sue under the NMHRA unless she exhausted her administrative remedies, plaintiff's complaint sufficiently stated an independent common law claim for relief as to the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court noted, however, that whether the alleged conduct satisfied the claim could not be determined from the complaint's bare allegations, so that the trial court had to determine whether defendant, by extreme and outrageous conduct, intentionally or recklessly caused plaintiff severe emotional distress. Phifer v. Herbert, 115 N.M. 135, 848 P.2d 5, 9-10.

N.M.App.1993. Quot. in part in sup. and com. (d) quot. in part in sup. A commercial tenant's employee sued the tenant and its landlord to recover for injuries incurred in an attack by an intruder on the premises and for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming the trial court's grant of the landlord's motion to dismiss and an award of attorney fees incurred by the employee in obtaining a default judgment that later was set aside, this court held, inter alia, that the landlord's failure to provide adequate security on the premises was not extreme and outrageous conduct that would support an emotional distress claim. The court noted that nothing indicated a special relationship between the landlord and employee giving rise to a duty to protect the employee from criminal acts of third parties. Rummel v. Edgemont Realty Partners, Ltd., 116 N.M. 23, 859 P.2d 491, 496.

N.M.App.1991. Cit. and quot. in disc., cit. in spec. conc. op., subsec. (2) cit. in disc., illus. 4 quot. in sup., illus. 13 quot. in disc. and sup., com. (j) cit. in sup. Following numerous marital conflicts, a husband sued his wife for divorce. The wife counterclaimed, seeking damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted the divorce and awarded the wife damages. This court reversed the damages award, holding that the husband's insults and outbursts failed to meet the requisite legal standard of outrageousness when taken in the marital context in which they arose. Hakkila v. Hakkila, 112 N.M. 172, 812 P.2d 1320, 1323, 1324, 1327, 1329, 1330.

N.M.App.1989. Cit. in disc. A nontenured university professor sued members of the university administration, alleging that the reasons given for failing to renew his teaching contract were pretextual and that the real reason for nonrenewal was his speech activity of frequently voicing criticism of the university administration. The trial court awarded the plaintiff damages for emotional distress, and this court affirmed, concluding that the damages award was supported by substantial evidence, and noting that whether a plaintiff has established emotional distress damages was a question for the fact finder. Jacobs v. Meister, 108 N.M. 488, 775 P.2d 254, 262, certiorari denied 108 N.M. 582, 775 P.2d 1299 (1989).

N.M.App.1984. Quot. in part in disc., subsec. (1) cit. in disc. A patient sued a physician who had removed a cataract from his eye for malpractice and intentional infliction of emotional distress.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

The physician moved for partial summary judgment, and the trial court denied his motion. On appeal, the physician argued that the trial court had erred in refusing to consider the affidavit of a physician who had previously treated the patient and in concluding that the patient's allegation of emotional distress stated a claim upon which relief could be granted, since the conduct alleged was neither extreme nor outrageous and the plaintiff had failed to allege any attendant physical injury. This court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The court held that the affidavit was not privileged and should have been allowed and that the complaint sufficiently alleged a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Remanding, the court concluded that the trial court had not erred in denying the physician's motion, since, in considering the sufficiency of a claim, the court accepts as true all facts pleaded. Trujillo v. Puro, 101 N.M. 408, 683 P.2d 963, 969, 970, certiorari denied 101 N.M. 362, 683 P.2d 44 (1984).

N.M.App.1981. Quot. in sup., cit. in sup., com. (c) quot. in part in sup., coms. (d) and (j) quot. in sup. The plaintiff, a Mexican national employed as the director of a senior citizens' program, brought this action against the defendant, a member of the Board of Trustees which supervised the program, alleging, inter alia, defamation of reputation and the intentional infliction of emotional distress. At a public meeting of the Board of Trustees and later during a closed session, the defendant made statements to the effect that the plaintiff was not suited for her employment because she was a Mexican, and that the program director should not be a Mexican because the program was funded with American tax dollars. The defendant also interrogated the plaintiff at the meeting concerning her payment of income and property taxes, whether she applied for United States citizenship, and whether she had registered to vote in the United States. The trial court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendant. This court reversed and remanded. On the intentional infliction of emotional harm issue, this court found there was an issue of fact precluding summary judgment. This court stated that the defendant's position of authority over the plaintiff, the plaintiff's freedom to flee from the defendant's remarks, the social conditions of the geographic area, and the plaintiff's own susceptibility should be considered on remand. Dominguez v. Stone, 97 N.M. 211, 638 P.2d 423, 426, 427.

N.M.App.1972. Quot. but dist. and com. c and d quot. in part but dist. Plaintiff, after having a mastectomy performed by defendant physician, brought this action pressing numerous claims against defendant. In affirming judgment for defendant, the court held, inter alia, that defendant's alleged failures of disclosure and diagnosis did not constitute “extreme and outrageous conduct” so as to entitle plaintiff to have the jury instructed on her claim of intentional infliction of severe mental suffering and anguish. Mantz v. Follingstad, 84 N.M. 473, 505 P.2d 68, 75.

N.Y.

N.Y.2021. Quot. in conc. op.; com. (l) cit. and quot. in conc. op. After bringing claims of negligence and wrongful death against building owner and others arising from an incident where falling building debris struck and killed a child, the child's grandmother, among others, filed a motion for leave to amend the complaint, seeking to add a claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress

(NIED) and alleging that she was in the proximity of the child at the time of the incident. The trial court granted plaintiffs' motion for leave to amend. The court of appeals reversed. This court reversed, holding that it extended the definition of "immediate family member" for the purpose of NIED claims to include grandmothers who contemporaneously witnessed the death of their grandchildren. The concurring opinion observed that Restatement Second of Torts §§ 46 and 436 left open the possibility of any person with sufficiently strong emotional ties to the victim to recover under an NIED claim, so long as their emotional distress caused them bodily harm. Greene v. Esplanade Venture Partnership, 168 N.E.3d 827, 842, 844, 850.

N.Y.2008. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Synagogue member brought suit for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, against synagogue and rabbi employed by synagogue, alleging that she had acquiesced in a sexual relationship with rabbi as a "course of sexual therapy" to assist her in her quest to attain marriage and a family, and that he had threatened to "have her placed in a straight jacket" and banned from the synagogue if she disclosed their sexual arrangement. The trial court denied defendants' motion to dismiss; the appellate division reversed. Affirming, this court held that plaintiff's complaint did not establish that rabbi's conduct rose to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to support a claim for IIED. Marmelstein v. Kehillat New Hempstead, 11 N.Y.3d 15, 23, 862 N.Y.S.2d 311, 892 N.E.2d 375, 379.

N.Y.1993. Adopted in case cit. in disc., subsec. (1) quot. in disc., coms. (h) and (f) cit. in disc., com. (g) quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case cit. in sup. A patient at a private psychiatric facility who appeared incidentally in a photograph published by a newspaper sued the newspaper for invasion of privacy and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming the appellate division's affirmance of dismissal of the action, this court held, inter alia, that the newspaper's qualified privilege extended to publication of the photograph even though it revealed the confidentially-kept fact that the patient was undergoing psychiatric treatment, and privileged conduct could not be the basis for liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Howell v. New York Post Co., Inc., 81 N.Y.2d 115, 121, 122, 125, 596 N.Y.S.2d 350, 353, 354, 356, 612 N.E.2d 699, 702, 703, 705.

N.Y.1985. Subsec. (1) quot. in disc. A newspaper company obtained information from confidential court records of the plaintiff's divorce proceedings and published three articles reporting charges of mental and physical cruelty and adultery. The plaintiff, owner of a well-known baking company, alleged 12 causes of action, including intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted the newspaper company's motion for summary judgment on the emotional distress claim, and the appellate division affirmed, holding that the plaintiff did not sufficiently prove that the publications constituted outrageous conduct. This court also affirmed, holding that liability for the intentional infliction of emotional distress must be based on extreme and outrageous conduct, and that the newsworthy content of the articles constituted sufficient justification for their publication and warranted summary judgment. Freihofer v. Hearst Corp., 65 N.Y.2d 135, 490 N.Y.S.2d 735, 741, 480 N.E.2d 349, 355.

N.Y.1983. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. A discharged employee brought an action to recover for abusive discharge, prima facie tort, intentional infliction of emotional distress, breach of contract, and age discrimination. The trial court dismissed all causes of action except that for abusive discharge. The appellate court modified by dismissing all causes of action and affirmed. This court held that the New York courts did not recognize a cause of action for abusive discharge, and the complaint did not state a cause of action for prima facie tort or intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court further held that there was no implied obligation of good faith in an at-will contract of employment. The appellate court's judgment was modified to reinstate the plaintiff's age discrimination claim. Murphy v. American Home Products Corp., 58 N.Y.2d 293, 461 N.Y.S.2d 232, 236, 448 N.E.2d 86.

N.Y.1978. Subsec. (1) quot. in part in sup., cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in part in sup., com. (e) cit. in sup. Plaintiff, a tenant and shareholder in a residential co-operative corporation, brought suit against the individual members of the board of directors of the corporation, alleging, inter alia, that the directors had commenced a defamation action against him deliberately to malign, harass, and intimidate him and thereby intentionally to inflict great mental and emotional distress. A lower court refused to dismiss this cause of action on the ground that it presented questions of fact which could be resolved only after a trial. This court concluded that plaintiff's allegations were not sufficient to state a cause of action for intentional infliction of severe emotional distress under any proper definition of the doctrine, and granted summary judgment in favor of defendants dismissing the complaint. Fischer v. Maloney, 43 N.Y.2d 553, 402 N.Y.S.2d 991, 992, 993, 373 N.E.2d 1215.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.2018. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Member of yacht club and member's domestic partner who had used club as a guest brought an action against club, club board, and individual club members, asserting, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) after a complaint was filed against plaintiffs that resulted in a hearing and a one-year ban of domestic partner from club. The trial court granted defendants' motions to dismiss. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that domestic partner did not have a cause of action for IIED. The court quoted Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, for the standard of conduct necessary to support an IIED claim, determining that defendants' alleged conduct was not sufficiently outrageous and extreme to support a finding of liability. Nachbar v. Cornwall Yacht Club, 75 N.Y.S.3d 494, 496.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.2017. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. A preceding for pre-action disclosure was brought on behalf of a minor student against high school, seeking the names of unidentified individuals who allegedly disseminated a photograph depicting an unclothed portion of the minor's body to students and faculty at the school and elsewhere and identified the minor in the photograph for the purpose of causing her emotional distress. The trial court granted plaintiff's petition. Affirming, this court held that plaintiff's requested disclosure was limited to obtaining the identity of prospective defendants and that the petition set forth sufficient facts to support a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). The court quoted Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, in describing the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to support an IIED claim. Matter of Leff v. Our Lady of Mercy Academy, 55 N.Y.S.3d 392.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.2017. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Tenant who had a dispute with landlords regarding his entitlement to a parking space filed, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against landlords, alleging that defendants defamed him in a letter that they sent to various people, including plaintiff's friends and relatives, by describing him as quixotic, self-absorbed, and narcissistic, among other things. The trial court granted defendant's motion to dismiss. This court affirmed, holding that plaintiff failed to allege conduct that was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support an IIED claim based on the standard set forth in Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d. Scialdone v. Derosa, 48 N.Y.S.3d 471, 473.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.2015. Cit. in sup. Stalking victim brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against stalker, seeking to recover damages after stalker pled guilty to various crimes in connection with an incident in which he entered victim's home and threatened her with a weapon. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant, finding that plaintiff's IIED claim was time-barred, and denied plaintiff's cross-motion to amend the complaint to replace the time-barred IIED claim with claims for reckless infliction of emotional distress and negligent infliction of emotional distress. Affirming as modified, this court held that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying plaintiff's cross-motion to amend her complaint. The court reasoned, in part, that, under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, reckless conduct was encompassed within the tort of IIED and did not constitute a separate and distinct cause of action. James v. Flynn, 19 N.Y.S.3d 618, 620.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.2015. Cit. and quot. in sup., cit. in case quot. in sup., subsec. (1) quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Property owners brought claims for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress against neighbors in connection with allegations that neighbors' tenants breached the peace and engaged in illegal activity by hosting large parties that lasted all hours of the night, impeded traffic, and involved loud music, public alcohol consumption, and the open use and sale of illegal drugs. The trial court denied defendants' motion for summary judgment. Reversing, this court held that defendants' alleged failure to mediate the continuing conflict between plaintiffs and tenants was not sufficiently extreme or outrageous to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Taggart v. Costabile, 14 N.Y.S.3d 388, 393, 394.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.2014. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Plaintiff brought claims for malicious prosecution, false arrest, defamation, and intentional infliction of emotional distress against his sister and brother-in-law, alleging that he was arrested and held overnight but then released without being charged after defendants informed police officers that he had refused to return their vehicle despite his breach of an oral agreement in which he would make monthly loan and insurance payments on the vehicle in return for the right to use the vehicle. The trial court granted defendants' motion to dismiss. Affirming, this court held, among other things, that plaintiff failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because none of defendants' alleged acts was sufficiently extreme or outrageous to state such a claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court pointed out that defendants merely furnished information to the officers, who were then free to exercise their own judgment as to how to act, and defendants' alleged conduct did not rise to the level of undue zeal such that the officers' arrest of plaintiff was not of the officers' own volition. Zapata v. Tufenkjian, 998 N.Y.S.2d 435, 438.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.2012. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee sued employer, asserting, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). The trial court denied defendant's motion to dismiss. Reversing, this court held that plaintiff failed to state a cause of action to recover damages for IIED, since defendant's alleged conduct in unlawfully terminating plaintiff from her position in retaliation for reporting illegal and incorrect activities on the part of two of defendant's officers was not so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to qualify as IIED. Klein v. Metropolitan Child Services, Inc., 100 A.D.3d 708, 954 N.Y.S.2d 559, 562.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.2011. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Residents of a beachfront townhouse development who opposed developer's plans to develop the property between the lake and plaintiffs' lots sued developer, asserting a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). The trial court denied the parties' cross-motions for summary judgment. This court modified the trial court's order by granting summary judgment for defendant, and, as so modified, affirmed, holding that plaintiffs failed to plead conduct sufficient to establish a prima facie claim of IIED; defendant's alleged conduct, including constructing a fence to block access to the beach, stripping all the grass from the beach area, and constructing a 20-foot-high boat rack directly in front of plaintiffs' home, fell squarely within the bounds of the traditional torts of nuisance and trespass. Doin v. Dame, 82 A.D.3d 1338, 1340, 918 N.Y.S.2d 253, 254.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.2011. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. School district employee and his wife sued district and district's director of facilities, who was employee's supervisor, alleging that supervisor used his position with district to “conduct a reign of terror” upon plaintiffs. The trial court denied district's motion to dismiss. This court reversed in part, holding that district was not liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) based on either direct or vicarious liability. The court reasoned as to the former that, although supervisor's conduct in allegedly vandalizing plaintiffs' property on five different occasions, menacing plaintiffs with phone calls, and threatening their personal safety was sufficiently outrageous to support a claim for IIED against supervisor, district's mere inaction after receiving complaints about supervisor was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support a direct claim against district. Gray v. Schenectady City School Dist., 86 A.D.3d 771, 772, 773, 927 N.Y.S.2d 442, 445.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.2011. Subsec. (1) cit. in sup. Parents of two 15-year-old students who were killed while passengers in a motor vehicle accident brought claims for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress against school district, after it published statements in a high school newspaper that suggested that the two students were an example of what happened when kids drank and drove, despite the fact that they had no drugs or alcohol in their systems at the time of their deaths. The trial court granted defendant's motion to dismiss. Affirming, this court held that, even accepting the facts as alleged in the complaint as true, according plaintiffs the benefit of every possible inference, and according the complaint a liberal construction, defendant's conduct, as alleged by plaintiffs, did not constitute extreme and outrageous conduct. Reilly v. Garden City Union Free School Dist., 89 A.D.3d 1075, 934 N.Y.S.2d 204, 206.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.2010. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Parents of mentally challenged adult son sued, among others, employees of a group home where son resided, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress arising from employees' report of son's allegations that mother sexually abused him. The trial court denied in part defendants' motion for summary judgment. This court modified the trial court's order to grant the motion as to plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that defendants were immune from such a claim as to their report of the alleged sexual abuse, and that any other conduct allegedly committed by defendants, unrelated to the report, did not, as a matter of law, support plaintiffs' claim, because that conduct was not so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious, and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Marilyn S. v. Independent Group Home Living Program, Inc., 73 A.D.3d 895, 904 N.Y.S.2d 70, 72.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.2010. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Parents of mentally challenged adult son who resided at a group home sued home's operator and employees, alleging that defendants improperly restricted their visitation rights with son by requiring them to provide advance notice before any visit and limiting each visit to three hours. The trial court granted in part summary judgment for defendants. Affirming as to plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held that defendants' conduct in implementing and enforcing the visitation restrictions was not so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious, and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Marilyn S. v. Independent Group Home Living Program, Inc., 73 A.D.3d 892, 903 N.Y.S.2d 403, 406.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.2010. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup. Female former employees of plumbing and heating company sued company and its owner for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) and constructive discharge, alleging that owner installed a video camera in company's restroom to tape their use of the restroom. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict in favor of plaintiffs. Affirming, this court held, as to the IIED claim, that owner's conduct in installing a video camera in a workplace restroom in order to surreptitiously view and record plaintiffs while they used the restroom was conduct that was unquestionably outrageous and extreme, and the evidence was sufficient, as a matter of law, to establish that this conduct caused plaintiffs severe emotional distress. Sawicka v. Catena, 79 A.D.3d 848, 849, 912 N.Y.S.2d 666, 667.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.2009. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup. After former employees commenced an action against former employer, alleging sexual harassment in a hostile work environment and assault and battery, employer sued employees for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia. Granting employees' motion to dismiss, this court held that the documentary evidence contradicted any finding that employer suffered the intentional infliction of emotional distress by employees. The court cited an affidavit attached to employer's pleadings in which employer admitted, among other things, sending sexually suggestive e-mails to employees, and reasoned that employer could not sustain an IIED claim based on acts that he himself initiated. Kaisman v. Hernandez, 61 A.D.3d 565, 566, 878 N.Y.S.2d 305, 307.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.2008. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Corporate tenant and its principal sued landlords, alleging that, after landlords' legal proceedings to evict tenant and invalidate its lease were unsuccessful, landlords deprived tenant of basic services to which it was entitled under the lease and engaged in practices aimed at driving it out of business. The trial court denied defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Reversing that portion of the decision, this court held that, while defendants' attempts to terminate the lease were potentially unfounded or improper, they were not so extreme in degree as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious, and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Benyo v. Sikorjak, 50 A.D.3d 1074, 1077, 858 N.Y.S.2d 215, 218.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.2008. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. In a sexual-harassment action brought by two ex-waitresses against restaurant and others for, among other things, allegedly ordering female employees to be weighed to keep track of their weight, this court affirmed the trial court's grant of plaintiffs' motion to dismiss several of defendants' counterclaims, including one for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). The court held that defendants failed to specify sufficiently the conduct alleged to be extreme and outrageous; furthermore, the conduct complained of—making statements to news media about this litigation—fell far short of the standard of extreme and outrageous conduct required to sustain the claim. McRedmond v. Sutton Place Restaurant and Bar, Inc., 48 A.D.3d 258, 851 N.Y.S.2d 478, 479.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.2007. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Employee who lost her job when her position was eliminated sued employer for employment discrimination, breach of contract, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court denied defendant's motion for summary judgment. Reversing, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's intentional-infliction-of-emotional-distress claim failed; termination of employment alone could not form the basis of an intentional-infliction cause of action in an at-will employment situation such as the one in this case, and plaintiff presented no evidence to support her claims of the requisite outrageous behavior on the part of defendant. Bailey v. New York Westchester Square Medical Centre, 38 A.D.3d 119, 125, 829 N.Y.S.2d 30, 35.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.2007. Com. (d) quot. in diss. op. Congregant brought, inter alia, claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against synagogue and its founder/spiritual leader, alleging that, after she sought counseling from leader, he induced her to enter a sexual relationship as purported therapy toward achieving her goals of marriage and children, and then physically and emotionally abused her. The trial court denied defendants' motion to dismiss this claim. This court reversed and dismissed the action, holding that the complaint alleged nothing more than thinly veiled claims of seduction barred by New York's Civil Rights Law. The dissenting opinion argued that the allegations that leader repeatedly advised plaintiff that her "only hope" of achieving her goal of getting married and having children was to engage in a course of "sexual therapy" with him were of the type of conduct held sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss under the statute. Marmelstein v. Kehillat New Hempstead, 45 A.D.3d 33, 36, 841 N.Y.S.2d 493, 496, affirmed 862 N.Y.S.2d 311, 11 N.Y.3d 15, 892 N.E.2d 375 (N.Y.2008).

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.2006. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Parents and sisters of a woman who died suddenly in her home brought suit against decedent's husband for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that husband obstructed their access to decedent's remains for further testing after the medical examiner failed to determine the cause of death, and surreptitiously had decedent's heart removed by a retired medical investigator with whom husband was friendly. The trial court, inter alia, granted defendant summary judgment dismissing the claim. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that defendant proved his entitlement to summary judgment by demonstrating that his conduct was not sufficiently outrageous to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and plaintiffs failed to submit adequate evidence in admissible form to raise a triable issue of fact. Jorbel v. Kopko, 31 A.D.3d 611, 612, 819 N.Y.S.2d 96, 98.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.2005. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Employee sued his employer to recover damages for violation of the state whistleblower's act, and also asserted a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment, and this court affirmed. The court held, inter alia, that defendant's alleged conduct was not outrageous so as to support an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress; plaintiff failed to raise a triable issue of fact in opposition to defendant's submissions on this issue. Mazzacone v. Corlies Associates, 21 A.D.3d 1066, 1067, 802 N.Y.S.2d 182, 183.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.2005. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. The trial court granted defendant city's motion to dismiss after plaintiff sued for emotional distress. This court affirmed, concluding that plaintiff failed to meet burden of proof necessary to sustain a complaint for emotional distress. Plaintiff provided only conclusory allegations, some of which were claims against civilians that did not constitute actions against the city, and none of which were so outrageous and extreme as to go beyond the bounds of decency, or to be regarded as atrocious and intolerable. Millan v. City of New York, 16 A.D.3d 290, 791 N.Y.S.2d 419, 420.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.2005. Com. (d) cit. in sup. Plaintiff sued village and others with whom she had entered settlement agreement for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, claiming, without factual allegations or other support, that defendants acted in concert or conspired to deprive her of her constitutional rights. The trial court granted defendants' motions to dismiss the complaint. Affirming, this court held that plaintiff failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress because, even accepting plaintiff's allegations as true, defendants' conduct was not so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious, and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Scarfone v. Village of Ossining, 23 A.D.3d 540, 542, 806 N.Y.S.2d 604, 606.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.2004. Subsec. (1) quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Restaurants, restaurateurs, and employees who were subjects of university professor's research study, in which he sent letters to the restaurants to elicit their responses to fake food-poisoning complaints from putative customers, sued professor and university for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court denied in part defendants' motion to dismiss. Affirming, as modified, this court held that an adequate factual basis existed to allow a jury to decide whether defendants' conduct was sufficiently outrageous to sustain a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Although professor did not intend to harass plaintiffs, his reckless disregard of the potential consequences of his conduct might have resulted in a campaign of harassment, since making a claim of food poisoning could destroy a restaurant's viability in a highly competitive trade. 164 Mulberry Street Corp. v. Columbia University, 4 A.D.3d 49, 56, 771 N.Y.S.2d 16, 21.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.2004. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Teenager who was a guest on television talk show sued host, program, television studio, and program employees for various torts suffered after she was allegedly raped by one of the show's employees. The trial court dismissed three of plaintiff's five claims, namely, negligent infliction of emotional distress, negligence per se, and slander per se. Affirming in part, this court held that plaintiff made no showing of negligent infliction of emotional distress, as plaintiff's allegations that defendants wanted her to act provocatively on the show, and allowed her to be introduced to the employee and meet with him again while no longer in defendants' custody, were not so extreme and outrageous as to be regarded as intolerable in a civilized community. Sheila C. v. Povich, 11 A.D.3d 120, 131, 781 N.Y.S.2d 342, 351.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.2004. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Husband and wife sued the pastor of their former church and various ecclesiastical entities and officials for intentional infliction of emotional distress, sexual battery, breach of fiduciary duty, and negligent supervision, alleging that they suffered damages due to pastor's adulterous relationship with the wife. Trial court granted pastor summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that trial court properly dismissed the emotional-distress claim, because pastor's conduct was not extreme and outrageous. Wende C. v. United Methodist Church, 6 A.D.3d 1047, 776 N.Y.S.2d 390, 392-393, affirmed 4 N.Y.3d 293, 794 N.Y.S.2d 282, 827 N.E.2d 265 (2005), certiorari denied 546 U.S. 818, 126 S.Ct. 346, 163 L.Ed.2d 57 (2005).

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.2002. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. After criminal charges against former employee for unauthorized use of a customer's credit card were dropped, former employee sued former employer for, in part, malicious prosecution and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court denied dismissal of the malicious-prosecution claim, but did not rule on defendant's request to dismiss the emotional-distress claim. Reversing, this court held that the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress should have been dismissed, since plaintiff's allegation that defendant's loss-prevention manager gave false information to the police, even if true, did not describe conduct sufficiently outrageous to support the claim. Brown v. Sears Roebuck and Co., 297 A.D.2d 205, 212, 746 N.Y.S.2d 141, 148.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.2002. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Employee who was discharged after employer allegedly received an anonymous letter accusing employee of participating in a kickback scheme sued employer and others for defamation, unpaid pension and severance benefits, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court denied defendants' motion to dismiss. Affirming as modified, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress should have been dismissed, because the actions complained of were not sufficiently outrageous to support the claim. Skarren v. Household Finance Corp., 296 A.D.2d 488, 490, 745 N.Y.S.2d 556, 558.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.2001. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Adult children of decedent's first marriage brought an action against decedent's third wife and widow for, in part, undue influence and intentional infliction of emotional distress, based on transfers of funds by decedent, while mentally impaired during his final illness, from an individual retirement account (IRA) of which plaintiffs were partial beneficiaries to an IRA of which defendant was sole beneficiary. Affirming the trial court's dismissal of the complaint, this court held, inter alia, that defendant's alleged conduct did not rise to the level of being atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized community, and thus did not support an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Thea v. Thea, 284 A.D.2d 245, 246, 726 N.Y.S.2d 655, 656.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.2000. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Property owner who was involved in disputes with a neighbor over the erection of a fence and alleged damage to his walls sued the neighbor for intentional infliction of emotional distress, trespass, and violation of the Human Rights Law. The trial court denied defendant's motion for summary judgment. Affirming as modified, this court held, inter alia, that alleged acts of vandalism and threats by defendant were not sufficiently outrageousness to give rise to plaintiff's emotional-distress claim, which should have been dismissed. Seltzer v. Bayer, 272 A.D.2d 263, 709 N.Y.S.2d 21, 23.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1999. Subsec. (1) quot. in disc. Employees who were terminated for falsifying time sheets sued former employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court denied defendant's motion for summary judgment. Reversing, this court held, in part, that the conduct complained of, which included defendant's security personnel questioning plaintiffs and then escorting them to their desks to retrieve personal items, was not so extreme and outrageous as to go beyond all bounds of decency and be considered intolerable in civilized society. Arrington v. Liz Claiborne, Inc., 260 A.D.2d 267, 688 N.Y.S.2d 544, 546.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1999. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Trial court granted defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiff's suit for intentional infliction of emotional distress and prima facie tort. This court affirmed in a slip opinion, holding that defendants' conduct was not extreme and outrageous. Cunningham v. Mertz, 265 A.D.2d 370, 696 N.Y.S.2d 839, 839.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1998. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. A government public relations employee who was fired from her job sued her supervisor and two other government officials, alleging, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiff had argued with an executive department official in a restaurant, and the official induced plaintiff's supervisors to fire her. Trial court granted defendants' motions to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction. This court affirmed as modified, holding, inter alia, that even if the executive department official influenced or ordered the deputy commissioner of the public relations department to fire her, knowing that he had no legal basis for doing so, because she had insulted him during an after-hours discussion, those actions did not constitute outrageous conduct. Cavanaugh v. Doherty, 243 A.D.2d 92, 675 N.Y.S.2d 143, 150.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1998. Cit. in headnotes, com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Teenager who was expelled from a synagogue-run cross-country tour after affirming her belief in Jesus Christ and fundamentalist Christian teachings sued synagogue for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court denied defendant's motion to dismiss. Reversing, this court held that, under the circumstances, the expulsion did not constitute intentional, deliberate, and outrageous behavior sufficient to satisfy the "extreme and outrageous conduct" element of the cause of action pleaded. Cohn-Frankel v. United Synagogue, 246 A.D.2d 332, 667 N.Y.S.2d 360, 361, 362,.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1998. Com. (d) cit. in disc. A woman sued her employer and its owners, alleging "quid pro quo" and "hostile work environment" sexual harassment and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted defendants' motion to dismiss. This court affirmed in part and modified in part, holding that plaintiff failed to state a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. While some of defendants' conduct was questionable, it was not extreme or outrageous. Ferrandino v. Alvin J. Bart & Sons, Inc., 247 A.D.2d 428, 668 N.Y.S.2d 99, 100.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1998. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup. Farmers sued neighboring landowner for, inter alia, tortious interference with contract and intentional infliction of emotional distress after defendant began a campaign against the aerial spraying of pesticides. The trial court denied defendant's motion for summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that material factual issues existed as to whether defendant knew of plaintiffs' contract with their aerial sprayer, and whether defendant's alleged harassing telephone calls constituted outrageous conduct sufficient to support an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Gill Farms Inc. v. Darrow, 256 A.D.2d 995, 682 N.Y.S.2d 306, 308.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1997. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Adult-care-facility administrator who was removed from his position by the Department of Social Services for allegedly abusing an elderly patient sued state for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court dismissed the complaint. Affirming, this court held, in part, that plaintiff's claim was untimely and that, in any event, where the act complained of constituted official conduct, public policy prohibited the maintenance of a suit for intentional infliction of emotional distress against the state. Furthermore, even if such a cause of action did exist, defendant's conduct was not so outrageous and extreme as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency. Augat v. State, 244 A.D.2d 835, 666 N.Y.S.2d 249, 251.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1997. Cit. in headnote, subsec. (1) quot. in sup., com. (i) cit. in disc. Female marina patron who discovered that marina had installed surveillance cameras in its rest rooms sued marina for negligent and reckless infliction of emotional distress, breach of contract, and sex discrimination in violation of Executive Law § 296. The trial court granted defendant's motion to dismiss the complaint inasmuch as plaintiff alleged violations of Executive Law § 296. Affirming as modified, this court held, in part, that, to the extent plaintiff alleged defendant's conduct violated General Business Law § 395-b (2), she had stated a claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress, and that New York recognized reckless infliction of emotional distress as a valid a cause of action as well; however, plaintiff's breach of contract claim failed, since the only harm alleged was the mental anguish she endured. Dana v. Oak Park Marina, Inc., 230 A.D.2d 204, 660 N.Y.S.2d 906, 907, 909, 910.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1997. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Parents of 13-year-old student sued school district and student's teacher for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress after teacher allegedly told student that "… you Polish Nazis are smart." The trial court denied defendants' motion to dismiss. Reversing, this court held, in part, that, while teacher's alleged remark was inappropriate and irresponsible, it was not so outrageous and extreme as to be considered utterly intolerable in civilized society. Harville v. Lowville Cent. School Dist., 245 A.D.2d 1106, 667 N.Y.S.2d 175, 176.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1996. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Insured sued insurer for intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with the manner in which insurer processed insured's claim for no-fault benefits. The trial court dismissed the complaint. Affirming, this court held that, while insurer's conduct might have been questionable, it was not so extreme or outrageous as to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Citron v. Allstate Ins. Co., 226 A.D.2d 577, 641 N.Y.S.2d 569, 569.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1996. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Plaintiff sued defendant for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court dismissed. Affirming in a memorandum opinion, this court held that defendant's words and actions were not so outrageous and extreme in degree as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Fried v. Schlossberg, 232 A.D.2d 607, 648 N.Y.S.2d 1018, 1018.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1996. Subsec. (1), com. (d) quot. but dist. In action to recover damages for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, the trial court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that plaintiff was not entitled to recovery because the conduct she complained of was not so extreme or outrageous as to go beyond all bounds of decency, such that it would be considered intolerable by a civilized society. Glendora v. Walsh, 227 A.D.2d 377, 642 N.Y.S.2d 545, 545.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1996. Cit. in headnote, com. (d) quot. in case quot. but dist. Grown daughters of professional baseball manager sued manager for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with manager's failure to resume relationship with them or mention them to the press. The trial court dismissed the complaint. Affirming, this court held that manager's behavior was not so outrageous or extreme as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency. LaRussa v. LaRussa, 232 A.D.2d 297, 648 N.Y.S.2d 567, 567, 568.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1996. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in diss. op., com. (f) cit. in diss. op. A man who was suffering the physical and emotional effects of cancer and major surgery was threatened by his neighbor during an ongoing dispute concerning a murky condition in a lake that abutted their adjoining properties. The man and his family sued the neighbor and his family for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding compensatory and punitive damages. This court affirmed as modified, holding, inter alia, that the jury could rationally conclude that neighbor's conduct was extreme and outrageous and that he had engaged in a deliberate and malicious campaign of harassment and intimidation directed at plaintiffs. Dissent argued that a new trial should be had, at which plaintiffs would have to prove that defendants' conduct within the statute-of-limitations period was performed with the requisite culpability, rose to the level necessary to justify the imposition of liability, and caused plaintiffs serious emotional distress. Plaintiffs would have to show their susceptibility to injury and defendants' awareness of plaintiffs' vulnerability. Stram v. Farrell, 223 A.D.2d 260, 646 N.Y.S.2d 193, 198.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1995. Subsec. (1), com. (d) quot. but dist. Hospital patient sued nontreating physician for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress after physician, without consent, used patient's medical records in his own divorce action in an attempt to establish that his wife and patient were having an affair. The trial court denied physician's motion to dismiss but this court reversed, holding that while physician's conduct could not be condoned, it did not rise to the level of outrageous and extreme behavior necessary to sustain a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Andrews v. Bruk, 220 A.D.2d 376, 631 N.Y.S.2d 771, 772.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1995. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Plaintiff, who claimed that defendants sexually harassed and discriminated against her, sued defendants for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. The trial court denied defendants' motions to dismiss. This court modified the trial court's order and as modified affirmed, granting defendants' motions to dismiss plaintiff's cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress on the ground that defendants' alleged acts were legally insufficient to support plaintiff's claim. The court said that, although defendants' conduct alleged in the complaint was wholly inappropriate, it was not so outrageous in character and so extreme in degree as to be utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Foley v. Mobil Chemical Co., 214 A.D.2d 1003, 626 N.Y.S.2d 906, 907.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1995. Com. (d) cit. in headnotes and quot. in case quot. in sup. Museum volunteers complained to museum officials that the museum's supervisor of volunteers had made anti-Semitic remarks to them. After the museum fired the supervisor, she sued the museum and the volunteers for, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Trial court granted museum summary judgment but denied the volunteers' motions for summary judgment.

This court affirmed in part but dismissed the emotional-distress claim, holding, inter alia, that while defendants' alleged conduct of falsely labeling plaintiff as a user of ethnic slurs was clearly reprehensible, it did not rise to the level of outrage required to recover under a cause of action that was limited to only the most egregious of acts. Herlihy v. Metropolitan Museum of Art, 214 A.D.2d 250, 633 N.Y.S.2d 106, 108, 114.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1994. Cit. in sup. A person who allegedly clapped her hands in approval after a neighbor struck an infant who had gratuitously insulted the neighbor and his wife was sued by the infant and others for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Reversing the trial court's denial of defendant's motion for summary judgment and dismissing, this court held that these facts failed to establish any of the elements of the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Clennan v. Cooke, 202 A.D.2d 467, 609 N.Y.S.2d 44, 45.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1994. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Landowner sued town for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, after she entered settlement whereby court issued order directing her to abide by town zoning law in town's civil action seeking a permanent injunction against her. This court affirmed the trial court's granting of defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding that town's commencement of both criminal and civil actions seeking enforcement of zoning laws and, in the process, sending copies of the town inspector's report to 26 people including each member of the town board, planning board, zoning board of appeals, the assessor, and two neighbors who had complained was not outrageous conduct. Deising v. Town of Esopus, 204 A.D.2d 940, 611 N.Y.S.2d 964, 965.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1994. Com. (d) quot. in part in case quot. in sup. A physician sued a hospital, asserting infliction of emotional distress in his discharge and other claims. Reversing the trial court's denial of defendant's motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that defendant's failure to award plaintiff disability benefits and its sending to plaintiff two letters setting forth “ground rules” for future contact between the parties and advising plaintiff that his appointment was terminated did not constitute outrageous conduct that would support an emotional distress claim. Mangla v. Univ. of Rochester, 202 A.D.2d 1019, 609 N.Y.S.2d 476, 477.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1994. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. in headnote and in sup. Employee whose wife had died of granulocytic leukemia sued employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, after employer obtained decedent's medical records against employee's wishes. Affirming the trial court's grant of summary judgment for employer, this court held that, since it was undisputed that employer extended compassionate support to employee during and after decedent's illness and that employer obtained decedent's medical records to aid it in the defense of a claim brought against it by another worker diagnosed with the same rare form of leukemia, employer's actions did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Waldron v. Ball Corp., 210 A.D.2d 611, 619 N.Y.S.2d 841, 842, 844.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1993. Subsec. (1), com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. The former director of a county veterans' service agency sued the county and its officials, alleging, inter alia, wrongful discharge and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court affirmed summary judgment dismissing the complaint, holding that plaintiff was an employee at will whose employment could be terminated at any time, and plaintiff failed to allege any extreme or outrageous conduct by defendants sufficient to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Moore v. County of Rockland, 192 A.D.2d 1021, 1023, 596 N.Y.S.2d 908, 911.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1990. Subsec. (1) quot. in disc. A woman who was sexually abused by her stepfather when she was a child sued her stepfather for battery and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered judgment for the plaintiff on both claims and awarded her $200,000 in compensatory damages and $275,000 in punitive damages. Reversing, this court held, inter alia, that although the defendant intentionally or recklessly caused the plaintiff severe emotional distress and was subject to liability for such emotional distress, the trial court's award of compensatory damages was excessive in view of the absence of the plaintiff's proof of special damages and the paucity of proof of permanent psychological damages. While also determining that punitive damages were appropriate, the court reduced the amount of the award, stating that in light of the large size of both the compensatory and punitive awards, a certain amount of duplication likely existed and the jury was likely motivated by passion in the award of punitive damages. Laurie Marie M. v. Jeffrey T.M., 159 A.D.2d 52, 559 N.Y.S.2d 336, 338-339.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1990. Subsec. (1), com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. A man stopped paying spousal and child support, as required by a separation agreement, after his ex-wife remarried and moved with the children to a county 35 miles away. The ex-wife sued to recover arrears in maintenance and reimbursement for expenses incurred on behalf of the children, and the man counterclaimed, alleging, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress caused by his ex-wife's sale of her engagement ring and mink coat, making disparaging remarks to the children, and changing her address after remarriage. This court modified the trial court's order denying both parties summary judgment, dismissed the counterclaim and affirmed the order as modified. The court held, as a matter of law, that the conduct alleged in the man's complaint failed to state a cause of action. Partridge v. Myerson, 162 A.D.2d 507, 556 N.Y.S.2d 707, 710, appeal denied 76 N.Y.2d 710, 563 N.Y.S.2d 61, 564 N.E.2d 671 (1990).

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1990. Subsec. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. An employee who alleged that she had been harassed and discharged from her employment because of her pregnancy sued her former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. The trial court denied the defendant's motion to dismiss. This court reversed, holding that the plaintiff had failed to allege the requisite extreme and outrageous conduct. The court said that the law did not compensate one for threats, annoyances, or petty oppressions that must necessarily be expected and were incidental to modern life. Ruggiero v. Contemporary Shells, Inc., 160 A.D.2d 986, 554 N.Y.S.2d 708, 709.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1989. Subsec. (1) and com. (i) cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case cit. in disc., com. (j) cit. and quot. in disc. A father sued the defendant on behalf of his infant daughter for intentional infliction of emotional distress after the defendant pleaded guilty to sexual abuse in the second degree. The trial court denied the father's motion for partial summary judgment, holding that the admissions the defendant made in pleading guilty did not preclude him from contesting his civil liability. Affirming, this court held that the defendant's guilty plea did not collaterally estop him from litigating issues not decided by virtue of the prior judgment, such as whether the defendant's conduct went beyond all possible bounds of decency, whether he intended or knew that his conduct would result in emotional distress, whether the infant suffered severe emotional distress, and whether the defendant's conduct caused the distress. Richard L. v. Armon, 144 A.D.2d 1, 536 N.Y.S.2d 1014, 1015, 1016.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1988. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. A former employee sued her employer for wrongful termination of employment and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court denied the defendant's motion for summary judgment. Reversing, this court held that, because the plaintiff had no employment contract, her employment was at will. The court also stated that the defendant's conduct was not sufficiently outrageous to support a claim for emotional distress. Hartman v. R.P. McCoy Apparel, Ltd., 145 A.D.2d 464, 535 N.Y.S.2d 423, 425.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1988. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Following divorce proceedings, an ex-husband who owned a one-half interest in former marital property sued the purchasers of his ex-wife's one-half interest in the same property in order to rescind a sheriff's deed that had conveyed the ex-wife's one-half interest to the purchasers for a price far below the property's value. The trial court granted the motion by one defendant purchaser to dismiss several causes of action asserted. Affirming, this court held that the plaintiff's causes of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress were properly dismissed because the acts alleged were not so outrageous in character, nor so extreme in degree, as to have gone beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to have been regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized society. Schlotthauer v. Sanders, 143 A.D.2d 84, 531 N.Y.S.2d 334, 336.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1988. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. An attorney sued an opposing attorney who had instituted a libel action against him for libel and emotional distress, alleging that the defendant's libel action had been brought to coerce an unconscionable settlement in a matrimonial action. The trial court dismissed the plaintiff's libel claim, but not the emotional distress claim. Reversing, this court dismissed the entire complaint, holding that the plaintiff failed to prove an unlawful interference with his person or property sufficient to support a claim of abuse of legal process, and that he failed to show that the defendant's conduct was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Siegel v. Smith, Panish & Shapiro, P.C., 136 A.D.2d 620, 523 N.Y.S.2d 866, 868.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1987. Subsec. (1), com. (d) quot. in sup. A law firm that represented a hospital brought a collection action against a former patient. The action was dismissed because the court lacked in personam jurisdiction over the patient. After the patient sued the firm for intentional infliction of extreme emotional distress, the trial court granted the defendant's motion to dismiss for failure to state a cause of action. Affirming, this court stated that intentional infliction of extreme emotional harm required proof of conduct so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency and be regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. The court reasoned that the allegations in the plaintiff's complaint did not rise to that level. Crandall v. Bernard, Overton & Russell, 133 A.D.2d 878, 520 N.Y.S.2d 237, 239, appeal dismissed 70 N.Y.2d 940, 524 N.Y.S.2d 672, 519 N.E.2d 618 (1988).

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1987. Cit. in disc. A woman was discharged by her employer. She sued for intentional infliction of emotional distress based on the allegation that her dismissal was a breach of her employment contract. The trial court denied the defendant's motion to dismiss the claim. This court reversed, holding that the employee failed to allege sufficient evidence to sustain a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Gibouleau v. Society of Women Engineers, 127 A.D.2d 740, 511 N.Y.S.2d 932, 933.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1987. Subsec. (1) cit. in sup. After defendant driver ran into plaintiffs' car, he threatened to harm plaintiff wife's writing career if they pursued any claims against him. Defendant's girlfriend, a publisher, then told plaintiff wife that one of her articles could not be published until the matter of the car collision was settled. The plaintiffs sued the defendant for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and tortious interference with contractual relations; the trial court denied the defendant's motion for summary judgment. Modifying and affirming, this court dismissed a number of plaintiffs' claims, including the emotional distress claim, holding that the defendant's conduct, as a matter of law, was simply not outrageous enough to support such a claim. Novak v. Rubin, 129 A.D.2d 780, 514 N.Y.S.2d 523, 524, appeal denied 133 A.D.2d 223, 518 N.Y.S.2d 771 (1987).

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1986. Subsec. (1) cit. in disc. A seller of art objects sued a buyer for breach of contract. The trial court granted the seller's motion for summary judgment and awarded damages totaling $34,500, representing breach of contract damages, traveling expenses, and punitive damages. The buyer appealed, and this court affirmed and modified the damages award. The court stated that the trial court's breach of contract award unjustly enriched the seller, that its award of travel expenses was excessive, and that, since the buyer had no control over the behavior of the bank manager that caused the buyers' humiliation, punitive damages assessed against the buyer were improper. Charles Adams Importers, Ltd. v. Dana, 121 A.D.2d 279, 503 N.Y.S.2d 53, 55.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1986. Com. (d) quot. in disc. A tenant sued his landlord and the landlord's attorney for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that the defendants had engaged in conduct designed to interfere with the quiet enjoyment of his tenancy. The trial court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that the plaintiff's allegations of baseless eviction proceedings and of drastic deterioration of the tenant's living conditions were evidence of sufficiently extreme and outrageous conduct to support a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Green v. Fischbein Olivieri Rozenholc & Badillo, 119 A.D.2d 345, 507 N.Y.S.2d 148, 152.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1986. Quot. in case quot. in disc. An employee brought eight causes of action against his former employer, alleging that he had been unlawfully accused of stealing and harangued into resigning. The employer moved to dismiss the employee's second through eighth causes of action. The trial court dismissed counts four to seven, but not counts two and three. On appeal, this court found that, although the trial court erred in not dismissing the employee's third cause of action for tortious interference with contract, the trial court was correct in not dismissing the employee's second cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, since a trier of fact could find that the acts complained of amounted to extreme and outrageous behavior that could not be tolerated in a civilized community. Kaminski v. United Parcel Service, 120 A.D.2d 409, 501 N.Y.S.2d 871, 873.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1986. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. After having worked as the controller of an association for several years, an employee was told by the executive director that his job performance was unsatisfactory. Within a month he was abruptly fired in the middle of a working day, and told not to return to his office. The employee sued the association and its director for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that his dismissal was deliberately humiliating. This court affirmed the trial court's dismissal of that cause of action, holding that the defendants' conduct and method of firing the plaintiff had not been sufficiently extreme or outrageous, nor had the plaintiff's emotional distress been sufficiently extreme, for an emotional distress cause of action to lie. Lapidus v. New York City Chapter, 118 A.D.2d 122, 504 N.Y.S.2d 629, 633.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1986. Subsec. (1), com. (d) quot. in disc. A boy committed suicide two months after leaving a church training program, and his father sued the church on behalf of his deceased son, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court denied the church's motion to dismiss, but this court reversed, stating that liability for the infliction of emotional distress required extreme and outrageous conduct intentionally or recklessly causing severe emotional distress to another, and that the church's requisite program of physical and mental training, entered into by individuals voluntarily, could not be deemed outrageous and extreme. Meroni v. Holy Spirit Ass'n for Unification, 119 A.D.2d 200, 506 N.Y.S.2d 174, 176.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1986. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup. After a nurse was discharged from her job, she sued her former employer on theories of unlawful age discrimination, breach of contract, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The lower court denied the employer's motion for partial summary judgment. This court modified, granting summary judgment for the cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Although the court reasoned that one who, by extreme and outrageous conduct, intentionally or recklessly caused severe emotional distress to another was subject to liability for such emotional distress, the employer's conduct consisted only of withholding appropriate staff assistance in an effort to compel the nurse's retirement, which was not indicative of outrageous conduct. Oakley v. St. Joseph's Hosp., 116 A.D.2d 911, 498 N.Y.S.2d 218, 220.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1986. Subsec. (2) cit. in disc. A dentist sued the defendants for alleged injuries that occurred to the dentist during his professional association with the defendants and termination thereof. The defendants submitted a motion for summary judgment as to counts three through five of the complaint, the trial court denied the motion, and the defendant appealed. This court affirmed in part and reversed in part, holding, inter alia, that the dentist's third cause of action should have been dismissed. This court stated that the third count, seeking damages for fraud, was insufficiently pleaded as to any cause of action for fraud, intentional infliction of emotional distress, or of prima facie tort. The court also found that the dentist failed to submit any proof of actual pecuniary injury, which was the sole compensable form of damages in a fraud action. Stich v. Oakdale Dental Center, P.C., 120 A.D.2d 794, 501 N.Y.S.2d 529, 531.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1986. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. An insurance company suspected a physician of insurance claim fraud and hired investigators to collect evidence. The investigators presented their case to the district attorney's office, which terminated its investigation without indictment because of insufficient evidence. The physician sued the insurance company for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted the insurance company's motion for summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that the insurance company's conduct did not amount to the depraved conduct necessary to maintain an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress and that there was no evidence to suggest that the defendants had acted with malice. Torian v. Lumbermen's Mut. Cas. Co., 120 A.D.2d 820, 502 N.Y.S. 2d 105, 107.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1986. Subsec. (1) cit. in sup., com. (d) cit. in sup. and quot. in case quot. in sup. A teacher sued a school superintendent for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that the superintendent had said that the teacher was unfit to be a member of the teaching profession. The lower court granted the superintendent's motion for summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that the alleged facts were insufficient to meet the standard of extreme and outrageous conduct required for a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Van Swol v. Delaware Valley Cent. School, 117 A.D.2d 962, 499 N.Y.S.2d 274, 275, 276.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1985. Com. (d) cit. in disc. Police officer sued city and city employees, asserting various theories of liability arising from the disclosure of plaintiff's personnel records to third parties. When plaintiff appealed various summary judgments granted to defendants, this court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that the state civil rights law protecting the confidentiality of personnel records did not create a private cause of action. The court also held that the conduct alleged did not meet the test of extreme and outrageous conduct required to establish the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress, especially in light of the fact that the legislature had not provided for a private cause of action for such violations of the civil rights law. Carpenter v. Plattsburgh, 484 N.Y.S.2d 284, 287.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1985. Subsec. (1) and coms. (b), (d), and (i) cit. in sup. Plaintiff female lived with defendant male for 14 years. Although they never married, plaintiff maintained their home and cared for defendant's children from a prior marriage. Relations between the parties disintegrated and plaintiff moved out, suing defendant for conversion of personal property and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court awarded plaintiff damages for conversion and emotional distress. The appellate division affirmed, but modified as to the amount of damages. The court held that defendant's extreme and outrageous conduct, including property destruction, forcible entry, threats, assaults and abusive conduct, caused plaintiff severe emotional distress and defendant so desired such effect. The court reduced damages for emotional distress because there was no evidence that plaintiff's injuries were permanent. Murphy v. Murphy, 486 N.Y.S.2d 457, 459.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1984. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. A divorced husband sued the newspaper that had published his name and picture, together with allegations made by him and his wife in affidavits submitted during their divorce proceeding. The plaintiff alleged infliction of emotional distress, abuse of process, and violations of the state Domestic Relations Law and Civil Rights Law. The trial court dismissed the abuse of process and Domestic Relations Law claims, granted the newspaper summary judgment on the emotional distress claim, and denied the newspaper summary judgment on the Civil Rights Law claim. Affirming, this court held that the law prohibiting an officer of the court from copying documents filed in a divorce action did not apply to a newspaper. The court concluded that the plaintiff had failed to show that the defendant's conduct had been sufficiently outrageous to sustain a claim for emotional distress and pointed out that an alleged Civil Rights Law violation must be decided on a case-by-case basis, including a factual determination. Freihofer v. Hearst Corp., 477 N.Y.S.2d 847, 849, judgment modified and affirmed 65 N.Y.2d 135, 490 N.Y.S.2d 735, 480 N.E.2d 349 (1985). See above case.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1984. Subsec. (2)(a) cit. in disc. Plaintiff brought a tort action to recover for mental suffering allegedly incurred as a result of the defendant shooting of the plaintiff's brother. The trial court dismissed the complaint for failure to state a cause of action, and the plaintiff appealed. This court modified the trial court's ruling by granting the plaintiff leave to amend, and it affirmed as modified. The prerequisites for maintaining this cause of action, said the court, are that the plaintiff either must have witnessed or have become instantaneously aware of the injury to his family member, and must himself have been physically in the “zone of danger” at the time of the incident. Maney v. Maloney, 477 N.Y.S.2d 436, 438.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1982. Subsec. (1), com. (d) quot. and cit. in disc. Former employees of a contractor brought an action in tort arising from the defendant company's publishing of a memorandum prohibiting the employment of any of the plaintiffs on the defendant's property by the defendant or any other individual. The trial court denied the defendant's motions to strike certain allegations of the complaint as prejudicial and to dismiss causes of action in intentional infliction of emotional distress and interference with contractual rights. This court modified and affirmed. The plaintiffs failed to state a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress where their allegation that the publication exceeded all reasonable bounds of decency was conclusory and not factual, and where their allegation that the memorandum was published to inflict severe emotional distress related to the defendant's motivation in publishing the memorandum, and as such, did not constitute conduct within the scope of the rule. The plaintiffs stated a cause of action for interference with contract property rights, since alleged that they were the third-party beneficiaries of contracts between the union and the contractors and therefore suffered economic injury by reason of the defendant's inducing others not to deal with them without justifiable cause. Burba v. Rochester Gas and Elec. Corp., 90 A.D.2d 984, 456 N.Y.S.2d 578, 579.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1981. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in part in diss. op. The plaintiffs, as tenants, sued their landlord, alleging harassment and the intentional infliction of emotional distress. The lower court, inter alia, granted the defendant's motion to dismiss for failure to state a cause of action. This court reversed, having found that the allegations were sufficient to state a cause of action for the intentional infliction of severe emotional distress. The dissent argued that the plaintiffs had not alleged conduct so outrageous or atrocious as to transcend all bounds of decency. The dissent would have affirmed the lower court, but without prejudice, so that the plaintiffs could replead their cause of action. Carter v. Andriani, 84 A.D.2d 513, 443 N.Y.S.2d 157, 159, appeal after remand 88 A.D.2d 799, 450 N.Y.S.2d 494 (1982).

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1981. Cit. in disc. The plaintiff brought an action against his former employer and his union. The plaintiff alleged that the employer wrongfully discharged him on account of the union's malicious acts directed against the plaintiff, and that other employers would not hire the plaintiff because of the defamatory remarks made by the union and the employer. The trial court dismissed the action and the plaintiff appealed. This court found that the plaintiff's cause of action with regard to his wrongful discharge was a federal claim preempted by the National Labor Relations Act; thus it was not within the state court's jurisdiction. But the plaintiff's complaint also included counts which alleged slander and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court distinguished between the two causes of action, noting that when a defendant's conduct upon which the action for libel is based is extraordinarily vindictive, it may be regarded as so outrageous as to give rise to an action for emotional distress. The court modified the judgment and remanded, as it found that the plaintiff had sufficiently established a cause of action for slander but not for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Dazzo v. Meyers, 83 A.D.2d 14, 443 N.Y.S.2d 245, 250.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1981. Subsec. (1) cit. in sup. The plaintiff sued his wife for alleged wrongful conversion of property. The wife counterclaimed, inter alia, for the intentional infliction of emotional distress, based upon the husband's loud and abusive language and numerous acts which resulted in the wife's severe emotional distress and physical debilitation. The lower court denied the husband's motion to dismiss this counterclaim, and the husband appealed. This court stated that, absent physical contact or direct physical injury, the acts complained of did not amount to a cognizable action in tort unless they were beyond all reasonable bounds of decency. The court stated that a necessary element of the tort is an allegation that the conduct alleged exceeded all bounds usually tolerated by decent society or that it is extreme and outrageous. The court found that the wife's allegations were no more than disputes which would best be resolved by bringing an action under the Domestic Relations Law or Family Court Act. Reversed. Wiener v. Wiener, 84 A.D.2d 814, 444 N.Y.S.2d 130, 131.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1980. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in sup. During a custody proceeding a psychiatrist submitted an affidavit to the court stating that the mother had severe emotional problems and should not retain custody of her children. Two years later the mother sued the psychiatrist for severe emotional distress and injury to her reputation which was caused by his public affidavit. The trial court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment. This court found that the plaintiff's complaint did not establish a cause of action for the intentional infliction of emotional distress because the psychiatrist's conduct was neither extreme nor outrageous. The court also held that the plaintiff had not established a prima facie tort in that her complaint had not alleged particular losses which were related to the alleged tortious acts and such a request for special damages was an essential element of the tort. The court found that the plaintiff's last claim, of defamation, was barred by the one year statute of limitations. The decision of the trial court was therefore affirmed. Luciano v. Handcock, 78 A.D.2d 943, 433 N.Y.S.2d 257, 258.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1979. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. and coms. (e) and (f) cit. in sup. Individual, who had been involved in prior litigation, brought an action against the opposing attorney to recover for intentional infliction of mental and emotional distress. The trial court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment, and the plaintiff appealed. Affirming, the court held, inter alia, that the complaint, which alleged that the attorney for the opposing party had approached the plaintiff during a recess in the prior trial and made remarks indicating that the plaintiff's rejection of an offer of settlement was going to cause him to lose his business, did not state a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Nestlerode v. Federal Ins. Co., 66 A.D.2d 504, 414 N.Y.S.2d 398, 400.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1975. Cit. but dist. Plaintiff bank sued on a note, and defendant counterclaimed that plaintiff intentionally inflicted emotional distress in threatening to encourage Internal Revenue Service action against defendant unless additional security for the note was provided. The lower court dismissed the counterclaim, and this court affirmed, holding that the conduct did not constitute the tort charged, being intended only to secure an economic benefit for the bank, not to injure defendant's reputation or property, and it was not outside all reasonable bounds of decency as would make it actionable. Lincoln First Bank v. Barstro & Associates Contracting, Inc., 49 App.Div.2d 1025,374 N.Y.S.2d 485, 487.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1972. Subsec. (e) cit. in sup. The plaintiff debtor brought this action against defendant creditor for infliction of emotional distress upon plaintiff by a planned program of harassment to induce plaintiff to make payments in excess of what she could afford. On defendant's appeal from a denial of a motion to dismiss, the court modified the order by dismissing plaintiff's counts charging a criminal offense and negligence, but allowing plaintiff's action to stand as to the intentional infliction of mental distress. The court held that alleged infliction of mental distress arising out of a debtor-creditor relationship is actionable in New York. Long v. Beneficial Finance Company of New York, 39 App.Div.2d 11, 330 N.Y.S.2d 664, 667.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.App.Div.1970. Cit. in sup. in conc. op. The State Division of Human Rights in two proceedings sought the enforcement of the order of the Commissioner of the State Division of

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Human Rights directing respondent to pay compensatory damages to a person he discriminated against. The court set aside the order, stating that the commissioner had no authority to award damages for mental anguish. The concurring opinion contended that the commissioner had such power, but that the proof of discrimination alone was not enough to found a claim for damages for mental anguish. State Division of Human Rights v. Luppino, 35 A.D.2d 107, 313 N.Y.S.2d 28, 35, rev'd State Com. for Human Rights v. Speer, 29 N.Y.2d 555, 324 N.Y.S.2d 297, 272 N.E.2d 884 (1971), and aff'd 29 N.Y.2d 558, 324 N.Y.S.2d 298, 272 N.E.2d 885 (1971).

N.Y.Sup.Ct.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.2018. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Member of volleyball club's travel team brought claims for, among other things, breach of fiduciary duty and negligent infliction of emotional distress against club in connection with allegations that, when she was a minor, she had a sexual relationship with the team's assistant coach during tournaments set up by club where she and coach stayed with the team at hotels. This court granted club's motion to dismiss member's claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress, holding that that claim was essentially duplicative of member's claim for breach of fiduciary duty. The court noted that, under New York law and Restatement Second of Torts § 46, a plaintiff seeking to assert a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress had to allege conduct that was so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious, and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Mulligan v. Long Island Fury Volleyball Club, 76 N.Y.S.3d 784, 788.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.2011. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Residents of condominium apartment sued owner of nearby building and building's tenant, seeking to have a cell-phone tower adjudged a common-law nuisance and removed from the building's rooftop on their allegations that the towers had caused high levels of radio frequency (RF) radiation in their apartment resulting in various physical and mental ailments to their family. Dismissing plaintiffs' additional claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), this court, noting that defendants were in compliance with all applicable standards for RF emissions as established by the Federal Communications Commission, held that the facts alleged by plaintiffs did not rise to the level of outrageous conduct required to support an IIED claim. Stanley v. Amalithone Realty, Inc., 31 Misc.3d 995, 1005, 921 N.Y.S.2d 491, 500.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.2008. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Congregant sued her pastor and another church employee for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendants circulated among the congregation her criminal record. This court, after noting the extremely high burden of proof for this tort under New York law, entered summary judgment for defendants, holding that plaintiff's claim could not surmount at least two of several problematic obstacles. First, because the criminal record was a public document, its distribution, while embarrassing, could violate no constitutional right to privacy. Second, plaintiff, after significant discovery, was unable to establish the requisite causal link between defendants and the distribution of the document. Guice-Mills v. Forbes, 21 Misc.3d 599, 605, 863 N.Y.S.2d 874, 879.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.2005. Com. (d) quot. in sup. and adopted in case cit. in disc. Client sued her former attorney for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, arising from consensual sexual relations between them on two occasions. Granting attorney's motion to dismiss, this court held, inter alia, that there was no credible evidence that attorney intended to inflict severe emotional distress upon client or had reason to know that his conduct was reasonably certain to have that effect, or that he did, in fact, inflict severe emotional distress upon client. In addition, the sexual encounters fell far short of the required threshold of outrageous conduct on the part of defendant, and emotional damages were not supported by competent medical evidence, as a social worker's affidavit was unreliable and inadmissible. Guiles v. Simser, 9 Misc.3d 1083, 1084, 804 N.Y.S.2d 904, 905, affirmed 35 A.D.3d 1054, 826 N.Y.S.2d 484 (3d Dep't 2006).

N.Y.Sup.Ct.2000. Com. (j) quot. but dist. In divorce proceedings, wife sued husband for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendant tapped the phones in the couple's residence in order to gather evidence to use against her in the divorce. Dismissing the complaint, the court held, in part, that the conduct complained of was not sufficiently extreme or outrageous to permit recovery. Talmor v. Talmor, 185 Misc.2d 293, 712 N.Y.S.2d 833, 837.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.1999. Subsec. (1) cit. in headnote, com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Congregant brought suit against two rabbis for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendants disclosed confidential communications in violation of the clergy-penitent privilege to plaintiff's husband and in divorce proceeding. Denying in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, the court held that plaintiff's allegations described conduct that was outrageous in character and thus stated a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Lightman v. Flaum, 179 Misc.2d 1007, 1008, 1018, 687 N.Y.S.2d 562, 564, 571, reversed 278 A.D.2d 373, 717 N.Y.S.2d 617 (2000).

N.Y.Sup.Ct.1996. Cit. generally in disc. After a bridal photograph of a radio station employee and her husband was published in the wedding section of a local newspaper, broadcasters at a rival radio station made derogatory remarks about the wife's physical attractiveness, as part the station's routine called the “Ugliest Bride Contest.” The wife sued the rival radio station and its employees for intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court granted plaintiff's motion for leave to serve an amended complaint, holding that plaintiff stated fact issues as to the emotional-distress claim, because she was demeaned and injured by the speech and conduct of defendants, not only as a woman, but as a bride and a human being at what ought to be one of the most beautiful and memorable occasions of life. The fact that plaintiff's name, address, place of employment, and the names of her supervisors were fully set forth raised the specter of a possibly high level of vindictiveness on defendants' part. Esposito-Hilder v. SFX Broadcasting, Inc., 171 Misc.2d 286, 654 N.Y.S.2d 259, 262, affirmed 236 A.D.2d 186, 665 N.Y.S.2d 697 (1997).

N.Y.Sup.Ct.1996. Subsec. (1), com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Former chairperson of hospital anesthesiology department who claimed he was constructively discharged sued hospital for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that hospital subjected him to a continuing campaign of harassment. Hospital moved for summary judgment. Granting the motion, the court held that chairperson could not sustain his claim because the conduct complained of, namely hospital's criticism of the workings of the anesthesiology department, was not so extreme or outrageous as to exceed all possible bounds of decency. Kripke v. Benedictine Hospital, 169 Misc.2d 98, 641 N.Y.S.2d 996, 1001, affirmed 255 A.D.2d 725, 680 N.Y.S.2d 687 (1998).

N.Y.Sup.Ct.1996. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in disc. After a topless dancer and frequent guest of a well-known radio talk show died, her sister gave half the cremated remains to a friend. The friend later appeared on the show with the remains and participated in the host's irreverent and tasteless tribute to the dancer, which used excerpts of her appearances on the show. These excerpts included the dancer's description of her alleged sexual encounters with females from outer space and clips of her partially disrobing to expose her tattoos. The sister sued the friend, the host, and the broadcast company for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. This court granted defendants' motion to dismiss, holding, inter alia, that while the program was certainly vulgar and disrespectful, the acts complained of were not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress. Roach v. Stern, 171 Misc.2d 80, 653 N.Y.S.2d 532, 534, order reversed 252 A.D.2d 488, 675 N.Y.S.2d 133 (1998).

N.Y.Sup.Ct.1995. Cit. in headnotes and sup., subsec. (1) cit. in headnotes and sup., com. (d) cit. in sup.; cit. in disc. (1948 Supp.). A tenured member of a college faculty was demoted from full professor to associate professor, reduced in salary, and given restricted academic duties following an investigation which led the college to conclude that he had been guilty of serious professional misconduct. Professor sued college for breach of contract, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and prima facie tort. Trial court ordered that college and its officers were not liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress, but that plaintiff could add two professors who allegedly disclosed the false and defamatory plagiarism charges to members of the campus community to his emotional-distress claim. It held that an unprivileged publication of a charge of plagiarism in an academic community, if false or made with reckless indifference to its truth, met the threshold test of Restatement Second of Torts § 46 and, a jury could find, amounted to extreme and outrageous conduct. Klinge v. Ithaca College, 167 Misc.2d 458, 634 N.Y.S.2d 1000, 1001, 1004-1006.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.1994. Cit. in headnote, cit. and quot. in sup.; subsec. (1) cit. in headnote, quot. in sup., and quot. in cases quot. in sup.; com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup.; com. (h) quot. in sup. and cit. in case quot. in sup. Plaintiff brought an action for intentional infliction of severe emotional distress against staff physician at the hospital where plaintiff underwent a vasectomy, alleging that defendant improperly accessed plaintiff's confidential hospital records and annexed them, without consent, as an exhibit to an affidavit in defendant's divorce action. Denying defendant's motion to dismiss, the court held that defendant's alleged actions constituted “extreme and outrageous conduct” necessary to state a claim for intentional infliction of severe emotional distress. Andrews

v. Bruk, 160 Misc.2d 618, 610 N.Y.S.2d 752, 752, 754-756, judgment reversed 220 A.D.2d 376, 631 N.Y.S.2d 771 (1995).

N.Y.Sup.Ct.1992. Cit. generally in case cit. in disc. A former secretary and her husband sued her employer and its executive for sexual harassment, alleging loss of consortium damages and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. Granting in part and denying in part partial summary judgment for the defendants, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiffs stated a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, since the alleged behavior of the executive in "courting" a married woman could be viewed as extreme and outrageous behavior. Collins v. Willcox, Inc., 158 Misc.2d 54, 58, 600 N.Y.S.2d 884, 885.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.1992. Subsec. (1) cit. in sup. Mother, individually and on behalf of her son, sued her parish priest and church for damages, alleging that the priest molested her son. On defendants' motion to dismiss, the court held, inter alia, that the free exercise clause of the First Amendment did not protect defendants from plaintiff's two causes of action for outrageous conduct causing severe emotional distress and that, since those causes of action were recognized intentional torts under New York law, there was no reason why they should be dismissed at this stage. Jones by Jones v. Trane, 153 Misc.2d 822, 591 N.Y.S.2d 927, 933.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.1983. Cit. in disc., subseq. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup., and com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Plaintiff brought an action for damages claiming that the defendants had violated New York's General Business Law by maliciously procuring and serving process on him on Saturday, which day he observed as a holy time. The court ruled that for any civil liability to result from the defendants' actions, plaintiff would have to allege and prove a case of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Noting that the plaintiff had failed to make the necessary allegations, the court ruled as a matter of law that the conduct complained of was not so outrageous as to be deemed compensable. The court dismissed for failure to state a cause of action. Gurkin v. Siegel, 122 Misc.2d 302, 470 N.Y.S.2d 540, 542.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.1983. Subsec. (1) quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. The plaintiff brought suit against two former husbands seeking damages for her first and second husbands' alleged conspiracy to deprive her of alimony under a separation agreement with her first husband. The separation agreement called for payment of alimony until she remarried. The plaintiff also brought actions on behalf of her three children who were born of the first marriage, seeking damages for the children's alleged extreme emotional distress suffered as a result of the defendants' failure to deal honestly and fairly with the plaintiff. The second husband moved for summary judgment. This court found that even if it were assumed that all the plaintiff's claims were true, there was no basis upon which she could be afforded the relief she sought. Regarding the children's claims, this court cited s 46 of the Restatement of Torts 2d in stating that, to afford recovery, the defendant's conduct must be so outrageous in character as to be regarded as utterly intolerable in a civilized community. The court concluded that while the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint did not show the defendant's actions in a praiseworthy light, the defendant's conduct was not outrageous.

Therefore, the court held that the complaint as to the children had to be dismissed. The motion for summary judgment was granted. Langley v. Langley, 118 Misc.2d 559, 461 N.Y.S.2d 202, 204.

N.Y.Sup.Ct.1968. Cit. in sup. The plaintiff alleged that the defendant had intentionally inflicted mental distress upon him by making threatening gestures to him, laughing at him, driving his automobile very closely behind that of the plaintiff, and calling him on the telephone and hanging up or remaining silent, and he sued for physical and mental damages therefrom. The court, finding that the plaintiff had alleged acts sufficiently extreme and outrageous to constitute a cause of action, denied the defendant's motion to dismiss. Flamm v. Van Nierop,56 Misc.2d 1059, 291 N.Y.S.2d 189, 191.

N.Y.Ct.Cl.

N.Y.Ct.Cl.2001. Subsec. (d) quot. in ftn. Patient whose finger was pierced by a hidden hypodermic needle as she was getting into her bed at state university hospital sued state for negligent infliction of emotional distress, seeking to recover for her phobia of AIDS. Denying defendant's motion for summary judgment, this court held that genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether there were any "special circumstances" that would permit a finding of liability despite absence of proof that plaintiff was actually exposed to HIV. The court noted that, in contrast to an AIDS-phobia action, which arose from conduct that unreasonably endangered plaintiff's physical safety, an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress required proof that defendant's conduct was extreme and outrageous. Harris v. State, 187 Misc.2d 512, 513, 723 N.Y.S.2d 824, 827.

N.Y.Ct.Cl.1992. Subsec. (1), com. (d) cit. but dist. Former correction officer sued state officials for injuries that allegedly occurred when the state controverted his stress-related claim for workers' compensation benefits. This court dismissed the claims, holding that defendants' alleged actions in controverting plaintiff's workers' compensation claim and in calling his house and threatening him with the loss of his job if he did not return to work were not sufficiently serious to support a claim for prima facie tort, bad faith breach of the employment relationship, or intentional infliction of emotional distress, particularly where the calls were not necessarily made with an intent to harass, but to warn plaintiff of the possible outcome of his continued absence. Huzar v. State, 156 Misc.2d 370, 590 N.Y.S.2d 1000, 1004.

N.Y.Dist.Ct.

N.Y.Dist.Ct.1971. Cit. in sup. Plaintiff sought to recover for alleged emotional distress caused when school officials leaked to the general public the contents of statements made by plaintiff in confidence. The court denied defendant's motion to dismiss for failure to state a cause of action. Although the alleged disclosures are ordinarily not sufficient to sustain an action for emotional distress, they may constitute outrageous actionable conduct in view of the special confidential relationship existing between a student and his family and a school and its professional employees.

Blair v. Union Free School District#6, Hauppauge, Suffolk County, 67 Misc.2d 248, 324 N.Y.S.2d 222, 227.

N.Y.City Civ.Ct.

N.Y.City Civ.Ct.2005. Subsec. (2) cit. in disc. Mother and her daughter sued restaurant for slander and intentional infliction of emotional distress after the manager accused mother of passing counterfeit money, and otherwise denigrated her. Denying in part defendant's motion for summary judgment, this court held, inter alia, that cashier's accusation constituted slander per se, and, although mother's emotional-distress claim was duplicative of the defamation action, allegations that her daughter suffered emotional distress and contemporaneous physical harm—in the form of an asthma attack requiring medical attention—stated a claim for emotional distress on the part of daughter. The doctrine of transferred intent could be applied to the defamation claim, since the daughter was present when the incident happened and allegedly suffered a physical injury. Kinsler ex rel. Kinsler v. International House of Pancakes, Inc., 8 Misc.3d 836, 799 N.Y.S.2d 863, 866.

N.Y.City Civ.Ct.1980. Cit. in sup. This case involved two nonpayment proceedings concerning two adjoining apartments rented by a tenant for himself and his children. The tenant counterclaimed for a breach of the warranty of habitability and requested punitive damages, damages for emotional distress and attorney's fees. The tenant testified that almost from the inception of the tenancy for each apartment, the ceilings leaked and there was defective plaster in the ceilings and around the windows. All parties agreed that the primary source of the leaks was the terrace located above the two apartments. The owner's contractor had in fact recommended that the terrace be repaired but such repairs were not undertaken until the summer of 1980. The tenant also testified that one of the apartments did not have hot water for the summers of 1979 and 1980. The court held that the tenant was entitled to an abatement of rent based upon the conditions relating to the leaks, the damaged plaster and the lack of hot water. Because the delay in the repairs for the leaking terrace was a deliberate decision of the landlord the court also awarded the tenant punitive damages. The court considered the claim of emotional distress as the substantial equivalent of a claim for the intentional infliction of mental distress. The standard for such a claim is conduct that is so extreme and outrageous as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency and which is atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civil society. The court found that the landlord's conduct was reprehensible, but did not reach the required standard. Century Apartments, Inc. v. Yalkovsky, 106 Misc.2d 762, 435 N.Y.S.2d 627, 630.

N.C.

N.C.2016. Com. (e) quot. in sup. Husband who was found not guilty of first-degree murder of his wife by reason of self-defense brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against law-enforcement agents who participated in the investigation and prosecution. The trial court granted defendants' motions to dismiss; the court of appeals reversed in part and reinstated the IIED claim. This court affirmed that portion of the decision. The court noted that, under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, an abuse by an actor of a position that gave the actor power to affect the interests of another could constitute extreme and outrageous conduct, and plaintiffs' allegations—that defendants concocted a motive for plaintiff to murder his wife and a theory of how he carried it out, conducted experiments until they achieved a bloodstain pattern that supported their theory, and rewrote the conclusion of their earlier report—painted a picture of law-enforcement officials deliberately abusing their authority as public officials to manipulate evidence and distort a case for the purpose of reaching a foreordained conclusion of guilt. Turner v. Thomas, 794 S.E.2d 439, 446.

N.C.1994. Com. (a) cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (j) quot. in sup. After harassment by bank agent trying to repossess a car owned by woman who had obtained bank financing, the woman and her family sued bank and agent for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress and violation of state debt collection act. Trial court granted defendants summary judgment on emotional-distress claim, but jury found for plaintiffs on debt collection claim. Court of appeals affirmed summary judgment on emotional-distress claim. Affirming in part, this court held, in part, that defendants had shown that summary judgment against car owner on the emotional-distress claim was proper, but that summary judgment was improper on emotional-distress claims of other plaintiffs. Defendants demonstrated that car owner did not suffer severe and disabling emotional distress, but failed to cite to support in record for their assertion that other plaintiffs did not receive any medical treatment or experience any effects from the incident. Holloway v. Wachovia Bank & Trust Co., N.A., 339 N.C. 338, 452 S.E.2d 233, 242, 243.

N.C.1992. Cit. generally in sup., subsec. (1) cit. in disc., coms. (d) and (j) quot. in sup. Two female employees sued their supervisor for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that the defendant frequently used vulgar language and made lewd gestures to them. The trial court granted summary judgment for the defendant. The intermediate appellate court affirmed the summary judgment entered against one of the plaintiffs, but reversed the other. Reversing in part, this court held, inter alia, that the intermediate appellate court erred in reversing the summary judgment for the defendant because the plaintiff's forecast of evidence failed to show that she had suffered the requisite degree of emotional distress necessary to maintain her cause of action, as there was no forecast of any medical documentation of her alleged severe emotional distress nor evidence of any other severe and disabling psychological problems. Waddle v. Sparks, 331 N.C. 73, 414 S.E.2d 22, 27, 28.

N.C.1988. Quot. in case cit. in disc. A store customer and his wife sued the store on theories of false imprisonment, slander per se, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that the store manager accused them of stealing and threatened them with prosecution. The trial court granted a directed verdict for the store, and the intermediate appellate court affirmed. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held that the plaintiffs asserted a valid claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court stated that the store manager's confrontation with the wife after he was told that she was an outpatient at a local hospital, his refusal to acknowledge offered proof of purchase, and his threats of future arrests manifested extreme and outrageous conduct. West v. King's Dept. Store, Inc., 321 N.C. 698, 365 S.E.2d 621, 625.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

N.C.1981. Cit. and quot. in sup.; com. (a) cit. in disc.; and com. (i) cit. and quot. in part in sup. The plaintiff sought damages for intentional infliction of mental distress, alleging that he was handcuffed, beaten, and threatened with death and bodily injury by men wielding clubs and knives and that he was instructed to leave the state or be killed. The plaintiff's complaint was filed more than one year but less than three years after the incidents complained of occurred. The defendants moved for summary judgment, and much of the factual showing at the hearing for summary judgment related to assaults and batteries committed against the plaintiff by the defendants. The defendants' motions for summary judgment were allowed on the ground that the plaintiff's claim was for assault and battery and, therefore, was barred by the one-year statute of limitation applicable to assault and battery. The Court of Appeals agreed with the trial court's judgment that the plaintiff's action was grounded in assault and battery and affirmed the summary judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff appealed, arguing that the factual showing on the motion supported a claim for intentional infliction of mental distress—a claim which was governed by a three-year period of limitations and that, at least, his factual showing was such that it could not be said as a matter of law that he would be unable to prove such a claim at trial. The issue before the court was whether the evidentiary showing demonstrated as a matter of law that the plaintiff's only claim, if any, was for assault and battery; if the plaintiff, as a matter of law, had no claim for intentional infliction of mental distress but had a claim, if at all, only for assault and battery, then the plaintiff could not surmount the affirmative defense of the one-year statute of limitations and the defendants would be entitled to summary judgment on the ground of the statute. The court found that much of the factual showing at the hearing related to assaults and batteries committed by the defendants against the plaintiff; the physical beatings constituted batteries; the threats of bodily injury and death, being threats which created apprehension of immediate harmful or offensive contact, were assaults. Therefore, the plaintiff's recovery for injuries, mental or physical, caused by these actions would be barred by the one year statute of limitations. However, the court also found that the evidentiary showing on the summary judgment hearing did indicate that one of the defendants threatened the plaintiff with death in the future unless the plaintiff left the state. The Court of Appeals characterized this threat as being an immediate threat of harmful or offensive contact and a present threat of harm to the plaintiff, concluding that this threat was also an assault barred by the one-year statute of limitations. The court disagreed with the Court of Appeals characterization of this threat, finding that the threat was not one of imminent, or immediate harm, but rather a threat for the future apparently intended to and which allegedly did inflict serious mental distress and, therefore, it was actionable, if at all, as an intentional infliction of mental distress. Having concluded that the factual showing on the motions for summary judgment was sufficient to indicate that the plaintiff may have been able to prove at trial a claim for intentional infliction of mental distress, the court held that summary judgment for the defendants based upon the one-year statute of limitations was error, and the case was remanded for further proceedings on this issue. Dickens v. Puryear, 302 N.C. 437, 276 S.E.2d 325, 331-334.

N.C.App.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

N.C.App.2014. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. After a jury found husband not guilty of murdering his wife, by reason of self-defense, husband sued, among others, two special agents at the state bureau of investigation, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) and other claims. The trial court granted defendants' motions to dismiss. Reversing as to the IIED claim and remanding, this court held that plaintiff's complaint sufficiently alleged outrageous conduct, as required to state such a claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court pointed to plaintiff's allegations that defendants essentially manufactured evidence to establish guilt and to negate plaintiff's self-defense claim by performing unscientific tests designed to prove a theory that plaintiff's stab wounds were self-inflicted and the scene staged to look like self-defense, altering their initial report to reflect their new findings arising out of those tests, writing the altered report in a manner that hid the existence of the initial report, and bolstering the theory by making false statements in the altered report. Turner v. Thomas, 762 S.E.2d 252, 264.

N.C.App.2011. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Wife sued husband and his attorney, alleging malicious prosecution, abuse of process, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted attorney's motion to dismiss. Affirming in part, this court held, among other things, that wife failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court reasoned that, while attorney's alleged conduct in procuring a criminal proceeding against her with malice and without probable cause, and in misusing legal process with an ulterior purpose after initiating a civil action against her, would be unprofessional and sufficient to give rise to other tort claims, it did not exceed all bounds of decency tolerated by society and therefore did not constitute extreme and outrageous conduct as a matter of law. Chidnese v. Chidnese, 708 S.E.2d 725, 738.

N.C.App.2003. Cit. generally in case quot. but dist., com. (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. Widow sued cemetery for intentional infliction of emotional distress and breach of fiduciary duty after cemetery, pursuant to exhumation order obtained by husband's mother, disinterred husband's body for reburial in Puerto Rico without notifying widow. Affirming trial court's grant of summary judgment for cemetery, court of appeals held that cemetery owed no fiduciary duty to widow at time of disinterment, and widow failed to submit any evidence in support of her unverified allegation of severe emotional distress. Pacheco v. Rogers and Breece, Inc., 157 N.C.App. 445, 449, 451, 579 S.E.2d 505, 508, 509.

N.C.App.2002. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former office assistant at correctional facility sued superintendent and supervisor for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming the trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendants, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's allegations that she was forced to return to her assignment with supervisor after she had accused him of sexual harassment, was required to perform an excessive amount of work, and was given an unsatisfactory job evaluation did not describe conduct that was sufficiently outrageous to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Wells v. North Carolina Dept. of Correction, 152 N.C.App. 307, 567 S.E.2d 803, 814.

N.C.App.2001. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Teacher sued school board for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that she was subjected to hostile atmosphere after parent complained to principal about her. Principal changed conduct rules without teacher's consent, test scores of teacher's class were falsified and published to other teachers, and teacher was transferred to new school. Trial court granted board summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding that emotional-distress claim failed, because board's conduct in following procedures to evaluate and eliminate problematic teachers, even if done in bad faith, was not extreme or outrageous. Stamper v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Bd. of Educ., 143 N.C.App. 172, 173, 544 S.E.2d 818, 820.

N.C.App.2000. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in conc. and diss. op. Employee who sustained an on-the-job shoulder injury sued employer and employer's insurer for bad faith, deceptive trade practices, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendants conspired to alter and manipulate evidence presented to plaintiff's physician in a successful attempt to convince physician to list the injury as age-related, not work-related. The trial court entered judgment for defendants. Affirming in part and reversing in part, this court held that, with the exception of the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, the elements of which plaintiff had successfully pled, plaintiff's action was barred by the exclusivity provision of the workers' compensation statute. Concurring and dissenting opinion argued that defendants' alleged actions in doctoring evidence, while objectionable, were not extreme and outrageous. Groves v. Travelers Ins. Co., 139 N.C.App. 795, 535 S.E.2d 105, 108.

N.C.App.2000. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. After stepmother shot and killed their father, the victim's daughters sued stepmother for negligent infliction of emotional distress. Affirming the trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendant, this court held that plaintiffs, who alleged loss of sleep and loss of appetite but received no medical treatment, did not demonstrate the requisite level of severe and disabling emotional distress. Johnson v. Scott, 137 N.C.App. 534, 528 S.E.2d 402, 405.

N.C.App.1994. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Estate of hospital patient who, nine days prior to his death, received a blood transfusion allegedly in contravention of his wishes based on his faith as a Jehovah's Witness sued the hospital and the treating physician for negligent infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Affirming the trial court's grant of defendants' motions for directed verdict, this court held that plaintiff's evidence failed to establish that decedent suffered the requisite degree of emotional distress necessary to maintain plaintiff's cause of action, since it tended at best to show only that decedent was temporarily upset and did not show that decedent suffered distress so severe that no reasonable man could be expected to endure it. Clark v. Perry, 114 N.C.App. 297, 442 S.E.2d 57, 68, 69.

N.C.App.1993. Com. (d) cit. in sup. University's former employee who was found not guilty of a larceny charge for which he had been arrested at his place of employment on campus sued university for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Affirming the trial court's dismissal of the claim, this court held, inter alia, that conduct of university officers in stopping and later arresting plaintiff was not so outrageous as to support an emotional distress claim. Furthermore, said the court, there was no evidence that the officers intended to cause severe emotional distress in arresting plaintiff. Best v. Duke University, 112 N.C.App. 548, 556, 436 S.E.2d 395, 401.

N.C.App.1993. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. A former employee sued her employer and its owner/president for wrongful discharge and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered summary judgment for defendants. Reversing in part and remanding, this court held that a genuine issue of fact existed regarding whether plaintiff's discharge violated public policy where plaintiff alleged that she was harassed and ultimately fired for expressing her willingness to testify honestly after being subpoenaed in a coemployee's lawsuit against the employer, but that defendants' conduct in taking away plaintiff's responsibilities, monitoring her activities, going through her desk, moving her to a smaller office with no telephone or heat, and making harassing telephone calls to plaintiff and her family was not so extreme or outrageous as to support an emotional distress claim. Daniel v. Carolina Sunrock Corp., 110 N.C.App. 376, 383, 430 S.E.2d 306, 311, reversed in part 335 N.C. 233, 436 S.E.2d 835 (1993).

N.C.App.1993. Quot. in sup., subsec. (1) cit. in sup., coms. (d) and (j) quot. in sup. Doctor who performed abortions and his family sued abortion protesters for intentional infliction of emotional distress, private nuisance, and injunctive relief after protesters picketed their home and directed threats towards them. Trial court granted the preliminary injunction, concluding that there was a reasonable likelihood that plaintiffs would prevail on the emotional distress and nuisance claims. Affirming in part and modifying in part, this court held, inter alia, that there was insufficient evidence to support trial court's decision that there was a likelihood that plaintiffs would succeed on their emotional distress claim. There was no evidence of any medical documentation of plaintiffs' alleged severe emotional distress or of any forecast of evidence of severe and disabling psychological problems. Plaintiff's mere allegations that they were frightened, intimidated, and upset, and had suffered severe and irreparable fear, embarrassment, and humiliation were insufficient to indicate a likelihood of meeting the requisite high standard of proof. Kaplan v. Prolife Action League, 111 N.C.App. 1, 431 S.E.2d 828, 836, 837.

N.C.App.1993. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Plaintiff consulted a certified employee assistance professional at her workplace for emotional problems. After the professional shared alcohol and drugs and engaged in sexual relations with plaintiff, plaintiff sued the professional for professional malpractice and intentional infliction of emotional distress, and sued her employer for negligent retention of an employee. Affirming a grant of summary judgment for defendants, this court held, inter alia, that the professional's alleged conduct was not so extreme and outrageous as to give rise to liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Reich v. Price, 110 N.C.App. 255, 261, 429 S.E.2d 372, 376, cert. denied 334 N.C. 435, 433 S.E.2d 178 (1993).

N.C.App.1992. Cit. in case quot. in disc. Landowners built a fence which encroached on adjoining lots. After more than 20 years, the adjoining lots were sold. The new owners began harassing the landowners over the location of the fence; this harassment included obscene gestures, cursing, death threats, and initiating a proceeding against one of the landowners for criminal trespass. The landowners sued the neighbors for malicious prosecution, adverse possession, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted the defendant landowner's wife's motion for directed verdict and dismissed the claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress by the plaintiff landowner's wife. It then entered judgment on a jury verdict for the plaintiffs, but refused to submit the punitive damages issue to the jury. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that there was sufficient evidence of extreme and outrageous conduct by the defendant landowner which intentionally or recklessly caused severe emotional distress for the plaintiffs. Wilson v. Pearce, 105 N.C.App. 107, 412 S.E.2d 148, 152.

N.C.App.1992. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. A college student who claimed that several members of a fraternity sexually assaulted her at a fraternity party sued the fraternity members, among others, for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. The trial court granted directed verdicts for the defendants. Affirming in part, this court held that the plaintiff did not prove her claim, since the record only presented some evidence of a sexual battery, and a sexual battery, standing alone, did not constitute on this record the required extreme and outrageous conduct. Wilson by Wilson v. Bellamy, 105 N.C.App. 446, 414 S.E.2d 347, 359, review denied 331 N.C. 558, 418 S.E.2d 668 (1992).

N.C.App.1991. Com. (i) quot. in case quot. in sup. Following a tornado, an employee of a neighboring company wandered onto the property of a local retail store, after being warned by police to keep away from the property. The store's security guards apprehended and searched the neighboring employee, and told police that he was picking up items of the store's merchandise. After subsequently being arrested for trespass and looting and found not guilty at trial, the employee sued the retail store alleging, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted the retail store's motion for a directed verdict. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that the refusal of the retail store's employees to listen to the plaintiff's explanations that he was looking for his company's lost property, although rude and officious, could not reasonably be regarded as extreme and outrageous conduct. The court reasoned that there was a state of emergency and that the guards' statements were not intended to cause extreme emotional distress. Shillington v. K-Mart Corp., 102 N.C.App. 187, 402 S.E.2d 155, 161.

N.C.App.1990. Quot. in case quot. in disc. A shopper at a department store who was accused of shoplifting sued the store and one of its employees for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. The trial court granted the defendants' motion for a directed verdict. Affirming, this court held that the plaintiff's evidence presented on her claim was insufficient as a matter of law to withstand the defendants' motion because she did not show that the defendants' conduct was outrageous and extreme. Lenins v. K-Mart Corp., 98 N.C.App. 590, 391 S.E.2d 843, 848.

N.C.App.1990. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. A newspaper article about a dispute between the plaintiff and her neighbor reported that the plaintiff had previously fled Europe after being charged in the alleged kidnapping and rape of a Mormon missionary. The paper drew its information about the plaintiff's alleged criminal history principally from wire services and daily newspapers. The plaintiff sued the paper and its editor for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss the emotional distress claim, and this court affirmed. The court said that, since the defendants merely reported information that had already been widely published in reputable newspapers, their actions as a matter of law did not amount to outrageous conduct. McKinney v. Avery Journal, Inc., 99 N.C.App. 529, 393 S.E.2d 295, 298, review denied 327 N.C. 636, 399 S.E.2d 123 (1990).

N.C.App.1989. Com. (k) quot. in disc. A husband who allegedly threatened his wife with a pistol and sexually abused her was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon inflicting serious injury. Affirming, this court held that the state presented sufficient evidence of physical or bodily injury and that the seriousness of the injury was properly placed before the jury. The court said that serious physical injury may be proven even when it was not evident immediately upon the impact of the assault, since physical injury may later manifest itself as the result of psychological trauma. State v. Everhardt, 96 N.C.App. 1, 384 S.E.2d 562, 570.

N.C.App.1987. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. A gas station owner who was allegedly threatened and insulted by a city-employed animal warden sued the warden for assault, defamation, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court dismissed the action. Affirming in part and reversing in part, this court held that the facts did not give evidence of the extreme conduct required to sustain an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and that it would not permit recovery for hurt feelings. The court further held that the plaintiff had stated a legally sufficient claim for assault, reasoning that the warden's words plus the fact that he was carrying a pistol were enough to cause the plaintiff to fear an imminent battery. Johnson v. Bollinger, 86 N.C.App. 1, 356 S.E.2d 378, 382.

N.C.App.1987. Cit. in disc. An employee whose employment had been abruptly terminated sued his ex-employer for breach of an employment contract and intentional infliction of emotional distress resulting from the unexplained dismissal. The trial court granted the defendant a directed verdict on the claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that the plaintiff failed to produce expert medical testimony that he suffered severe distress, but it allowed a jury to award damages on the breach of contract claim. Affirming as to both claims, this court held, inter alia, that although the plaintiff did not have to provide expert medical evidence where the distress was within the common knowledge of laymen, the defendant's conduct was not sufficiently outrageous to give rise to a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. McKnight v. Simpson's Beauty Supply, Inc., 86 N.C.App. 451, 358 S.E.2d 107, 109.

N.C.App.1986. Com. (d) quot. in disc., com. (h) cit. in disc. Former female employees of a country club sued for wrongful termination, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and negligent hiring and retention of abusive coemployees. The trial court entered summary judgment in favor of the employer. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held that sexual advances toward and nonconsensual sexual touchings of one of the plaintiffs could reasonably be found to be sufficiently outrageous to permit recovery on a theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court stated that whether the employer's conduct in retaining the abusive coemployee and declining to intervene signified an intention to ratify the coemployee's acts was a question for the jury. The court stated, however, that liability did not extend to mere insults, indignities, and threats and affirmed the entry of summary judgment against the other plaintiffs. Hogan v. Forsyth Country Club Co., 79 N.C.App. 483, 340 S.E.2d 116, 121, 123, review denied 317 N.C. 334, 346 S.E.2d 140 (1986).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

N.C.App.1985. Com. (h) cit. in sup., coms. (d) and (f) quot. in sup. Plaintiffs whose only son was killed in an automobile accident sued a magazine and a writer for intentional infliction of emotional distress as a result of the publication of an article about their son. The trial court granted defendants' motion to dismiss and the court of appeals affirmed. The court held that whether the article was offensive was a question of law for the court, and although the article was offensive to the plaintiffs, it did not reach the levels of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to sustain a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Briggs v. Rosenthal, 73 N.C.App. 672, 327 S.E.2d 308, 311-312, certiorari denied 314 N.C. 114, 332 S.E.2d 479 (1985).

N.D.

N.D.2013. Cit. in case quot. in sup. Terminated employee brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against former employer and employer's CEO, alleging that CEO sexually assaulted her during an out-of-town work conference. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. Reversing as to this claim and remanding, this court held that genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether CEO's alleged conduct was sufficiently extreme and outrageous, whether it was sufficiently intentional or reckless, and whether it caused plaintiff severe emotional distress so as to preclude summary judgment on her IIED claim. Hysjulien v. Hill Top Home of Comfort, Inc., 2013 ND 38, 827 N.W.2d 533, 549.

N.D.2011. Cit. in case cit. in sup., coms. (d) and (h) quot. in case quot. in sup. (erron. cit. as coms. of Rptr's Notes). Former husband, who had adopted minor child of ex-wife during their marriage, brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against ex-wife and child's biological father, alleging that defendants destroyed his relationship with child. Affirming the trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendants, this court held that ex-wife's alleged threats to disclose to child that defendant biological father was child's biological father were not, as a matter of law, sufficiently extreme or outrageous to sustain plaintiff's IIED claim, and plaintiff failed to provide facts that demonstrated how fostering a relationship between plaintiff's adopted child and the child's biological father was extreme and outrageous conduct. G.K.T. v. T.L.T., 2011 ND 115, 798 N.W.2d 872, 875-877.

N.D.2004. Cit. in disc., cit. in case cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Hospital physician who had reported a doctor for deficiencies in her medical practice sued hospital and doctor, alleging, in part, that hospital's retaliatory conduct and doctor's initiation and continuation of a series of meritless administrative actions against him constituted intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming in part the trial court's dismissal of plaintiff's complaint, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's emotional-distress claim failed because defendants' conduct did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct. Vandall v. Trinity Hospitals, 2004 ND 47, 676 N.W.2d 88, 90, 96, 97.

N.D.2004. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. (Erron. cit. as com. (d) of Rptr's Notes.) Applicant for state employment sued state for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, after state failed to interview him for a position. Affirming the trial court's dismissal of the complaint, this court held, inter alia, that state's decision not to interview applicant for an attorney position because his ranking was below the required level based on use of a scoring device giving credit for factors contained in a position-information questionnaire was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Zuger v. State, 2004 ND 16, 673 N.W.2d 615, 622.

N.D.2003. Cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. generally in case quot. in sup. Patient who had an outstanding account balance with a medical clinic for treatment rendered sued, among others, debt collector and its representatives, alleging, in part, that defendants' collection efforts on behalf of the clinic constituted intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming the trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendants on the emotional-distress claim, this court held, inter alia, that defendants' conduct in contacting plaintiff four times by letter, including a letter implying that defendants would seize her vehicles, and once on the telephone over a period of three months was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support plaintiff's claim. Weiss v. Collection Center, Inc., 2003 ND 128, 667 N.W.2d 567, 573.

N.D.2001. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. and quot. in sup. Recreational therapist sued employer and supervisor for retaliatory discharge, breach of contract, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that employer created an environment of intimidation and a workplace of fear and anxiety. Trial court granted defendants summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that defendants' conduct was not so extreme and outrageous as to constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiff was an at-will employee, her termination was not outrageous, her allegations of a hostile work environment were conclusory, and she failed to show specific instances in which defendants' conduct was outrageous. Dahlberg v. Lutheran Social Services of North Dakota, 625 N.W.2d 241, 248-249.

N.D.1995. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. and cit. in headnote. The widow of a clinic's business manager who was involuntarily terminated sued the clinic for, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Trial court granted clinic summary judgment. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that trial court properly dismissed the emotional distress claim, because there was no evidence that the clinic engaged in extreme and outrageous conduct. Minutes from a meeting of the board of directors showed that manager was not satisfactorily performing his duties, and he admitted overpaying himself more than $40,000 by failing to deduct car lease payments from his salary. Hummel v. Mid Dakota Clinic, P.C., 526 N.W.2d 704, 705, 710.

N.D.1995. Cit. in headnote and in sup., com. (d) cit. in headnote and quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (g) cit. in headnote and quot. in sup. Lender sued borrowers to recover on a note and foreclose its security interest in borrowers' personal property; borrowers counterclaimed for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that lender's refusal to release insurance proceeds for the purchase of a combine to replace one destroyed by fire prevented them from harvesting their crops. Affirming the trial court's dismissal with prejudice of borrowers' emotional distress counterclaim, this court held, in part, that lender's actions did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct, since lender was under no obligation to release the insurance proceeds to borrowers and its conduct reasonably could not be regarded as so extreme in degree as to be beyond all possible bounds of decency or to be utterly intolerable in a civilized society. Security Nat. Bank, Edgeley v. Wald, 536 N.W.2d 924, 924, 925, 927.

N.D.1993. Quot. in case cit. in sup., coms. (d), (e), (f), and (h) quot. in case cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in part in spec. conc. op. A former employee sued her employer for gender discrimination, equal pay violations, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Reversing in part summary judgment for the employer and remanding, this court held in a plurality opinion that issues of material fact precluded summary judgment on the emotional distress claim where the employee alleged that her supervisor discriminated against her, oppressed her repeatedly on the basis of her gender, continually reminded her of his plan to replace her with a male, ignored her, refused to discuss her employment situation, and knew of her unstable and deteriorating emotional condition. A specially concurring opinion asserted that reasonable jurors should have the opportunity to consider whether sex discrimination was outrageous and intolerable in current society. Swenson v. Northern Crop Ins., Inc., 498 N.W.2d 174, 181, 182, 185, 186, 188.

N.D.1992. Com. (h) quot. in ftn. (Erron. cit. as Rptr's Note.) Automobile accident victim's legal malpractice action against the attorney who initially represented him in his lawsuit against the other driver involved in the collision was dismissed without prejudice by the trial court as premature and the statute of limitations tolled until the action against the driver ended. When plaintiff again sued the attorney for legal malpractice, alleging infliction of emotional distress, after appeal had been taken and a mandate issued in the underlying action against the driver, the trial court dismissed on the ground that the statute of limitations had run. Reversing and remanding, this court held that since plaintiff's underlying action was not actually completed until appeal in that case had been taken and a mandate issued in 1988, the instant legal malpractice action should not have been dismissed on the ground that the statute of limitations had been tolled only until the 1987 entry of judgment by the trial court in the underlying action. Finch v. Backes, 491 N.W.2d 705, 707.

N.D.1989. Cit. in disc., quot. in ftn., coms. (d) and (h) quot. in sup., coms. (i), (j), and (k) cit. in sup. Family members of a woman who was found dead in a nearby river sued the detective who investigated the case and the city for intentional or negligent infliction of emotional distress, alleging that the detective failed to conduct a serious investigation of the death, which he concluded was a suicide but was later determined to have been a homicide, and gave them false information about the woman's death. The trial court granted summary judgment for the defendants. This court affirmed, holding that plaintiffs' evidence of loss of weight and sleep did not meet the requirement of bodily harm necessary for a claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress, and that the detective's conduct, while inconsiderate and unkind, did not rise to the level of egregious conduct necessary to sustain an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Muchow v. Lindblad, 435 N.W.2d 918, 923, 924.

N.D.1988. Com. (b) quot. in sup. A child was injured when playing on a cage-style elevator. The parents sued the building's owners and the elevator manufacturer, seeking damages for loss of the child's society and companionship and for their own emotional distress. The trial court dismissed the parents' claims for damages on the ground that North Dakota law did not allow this type of recovery. Reversing, this court held that recent enactments permitting recovery for noneconomic damages arising from loss of society and companionship rendered judicial distinctions between economic and noneconomic aspects of the parent-child relationship implausible. Denying a petition for rehearing, this court held that, in the case of injury to a child, damages for emotional distress may arise along with damages for loss of society and companionship. Jacobs v. Anderson Bldg. Co., 430 N.W.2d 558, 560, appeal after remand 459 N.W.2d 384 (1990).

N.D.1983. Subsec. (1) cit. in ftn. The plaintiffs brought suit for intentional infliction of emotional distress arising from the defendant cemetery's removal of a headstone from the grave of the plaintiffs' relative. The defendant prevailed on a counterclaim which it interposed and appealed from a judgment awarding the plaintiffs compensatory damages. This award was set aside by the supreme court on the grounds that compensatory damages had not been pleaded and that no evidence supported the award. Accordingly, the judgment was modified in part and remanded; judgment as to the defendant's counterclaim was affirmed. Ouren v. Krebsbach, 338 N.W.2d 836, 837.

Ohio

Ohio, 1998. Subsec. (1) quot. in diss. op., com. (g) quot. in diss. op. A female employee and her husband sued the employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, after the company insisted that the employee get a second-opinion examination to determine whether her recto-vaginal fistula required surgery. The trial court granted defendants summary judgment, but the appellate court reversed and remanded for trial. This court dismissed the appeal sua sponte. The dissent argued that plaintiffs did not establish a prima facie case of intentional infliction of emotional distress, because the employer had a clear legal right to condition the employee's disability benefits on a second-opinion medical examination by a physician of the company's choosing. Neither the employer's general manager nor any other representative of the company ever threatened the employee with loss of her job for failure to submit to the second-opinion medical examination. Kovacs v. Bauer, 80 Ohio St.3d 1224, 687 N.E.2d 779, 781.

Ohio, 1995. Quot. in conc. op., coms. (d) and (j) quot. in conc. op. Former railroad employee sued railroad under Federal Employers' Liability Act (FELA) for emotional distress allegedly inflicted by employer and co-workers. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding employee $500,000 but the intermediate appellate court vacated and entered judgment for employer. Reversing and remanding, this court held that employee, who suffered such debilitating depression that he could no longer work, could recover for negligent infliction of emotional distress upon a showing that he was in a zone of danger, i.e., that his injuries were caused by a threat of imminent physical impact resulting from employer's negligence. Concurrence believed that employee actually sought to recover for intentional infliction of emotional distress caused by his co-workers' threatening behavior that resulted from employer's negligent hiring, retention, or supervision and that, under FELA, intentionally inflicted, severe emotional harm that was caused in part by physically menacing behavior constituting unconscionable abuse was a compensable injury. Vance v. Consol. Rail Corp., 73 Ohio St.3d 222, 652 N.E.2d 776, 787, 788, cert. denied 516 U.S. 1073, 116 S.Ct. 776, 133 L.Ed.2d 728 (1996).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ohio, 1991. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in diss. op. An at-will employee was assured that the employer's process of inflating labor and capital costs in conjunction with its federal procurement contracts was legitimate; however, he was subsequently discharged for following those practices, and his name was given to federal authorities in connection with a contract fraud investigation. The employee sued his former employer alleging, inter alia, fraudulent misrepresentation and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for the employee, and the intermediate appellate court affirmed in part but remanded for a new trial on damages. Affirming on liability, this court held as to the emotional distress count that an at-will employee's action for intentional infliction of emotional distress against his employer was not foreclosed merely because his discharge was obtained in a lawful manner. It stated that the employer's conduct constituted extreme and outrageous conduct. The dissent argued that the employer's actions were not sufficiently outrageous because the employer's liability arose from its agents' conduct and, upon discovery of the fraud, the employer properly discharged the employee and turned him over to law enforcement officials. Russ v. TRW, Inc., 59 Ohio St.3d 42, 570 N.E.2d 1076, 1086-1087.

Ohio, 1984. Cit. in sup., cit. in ftn., cit. in conc. and diss. op., com. (d) quot. in sup. and cit. in conc. and diss. op., coms. (j) and (k) cit. in conc. and diss. op. After plaintiff's car was hit by a van, he obtained a rental car under the van driver's insurance. During negotiations for settlement, insurance agent threatened to take the rental car away if plaintiff refused to settle at agent's price. Finally, insurance agent stopped payment on the rental car, resulting in rental car agent's telling plaintiff that he had reported the car stolen and ordering him to return the car or he would “tear [plaintiff's] face off.” Plaintiff brought action for intentional infliction of emotional distress against insurance agent and rental car agent. This court reversed the trial court's judgment against insurance agent, but affirmed the judgment against rental car agent, holding that rental car agent's conduct was extreme and outrageous. A concurring and dissenting justice argued that rental car agent's conduct was not sufficiently outrageous to state a claim for emotional distress. Reamsnyder v. Jaskolski, 10 Ohio St.3d 150, 462 N.E.2d 392, 394-396, appeal after remand 1985 WL 7573 (1985).

Ohio, 1983. Subsec. (1) quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in part in disc. A businessman brought an action for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress against a labor union whose members had allegedly made threats against the plaintiff and his family. Summary judgment for the defendant on this count was granted by the trial court and affirmed by the appeals court on the ground that the tort was not actionable absent accompanying physical injury. The supreme court overruled previous case law and adopted the standard that liability existed if the defendant's conduct was "extreme and outrageous" and caused serious emotional distress. Accordingly, the judgment on this issue was reversed and the cause remanded. Yeager v. Local Union 20, Etc., 6 Ohio.St.3d 369, 453 N.E.2d 666, 671.

Ohio App.

Ohio App.2023. Quot. in case quot. in sup. Former public-school principal filed, among other things, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against member of the board of education and its former human-resources director, alleging that plaintiff suffered severe emotional distress when defendants failed to investigate allegations made against her by parents of students she had disciplined before offering her the option to resign or be terminated. The trial court granted defendants' motion to dismiss. This court affirmed, holding that plaintiff failed to state a claim for IIED. Quoting Restatement Second of Torts § 46(1), the court explained that defendants' conduct did not rise to the requisite level of outrageousness necessary to sustain an IIED claim. Burks v. Dayton Public School Board of Education, 212 N.E.3d 1197, 1214.

OhioApp.

OhioApp.2022. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup. Churchgoer who was involved in youth ministry at church sued church and pastor, alleging, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress, after pastor informed church leaders and parents of children who had interactions with plaintiff that plaintiff had an admitted history of sexually abusing male children and that pastor had spoken with unnamed professionals who indicated that plaintiff had an "incurable disease." The trial court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment. On appeal, this court affirmed, holding that defendants were not liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because plaintiff failed to present a genuine issue of material fact that pastor's conduct, arising out of church's internal investigation, rose to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to support such a claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Tharp v. Hillcrest Baptist Church of Columbus, 204 N.E.3d 709, 730.

Ohio App.

Ohio App.2021. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former teacher sued board of education that formerly employed her, alleging, among other things, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with board's actions in investigating and firing her after multiple students accused her of making threatening statements. The trial court granted summary judgment for board on teacher's emotional-distress claim. Affirming, this court held that teacher failed to show that the board's conduct was extreme and outrageous, as required for her to be able to prevail on her claim against board for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts §

46. The court reasoned that the board's actions taken in response to receiving credible evidence that she engaged in detrimental classroom conduct were simply actions with which she disagreed. Martcheva v. Dayton Board of Education, 179 N.E.3d 687, 705.

Ohio App.2021. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Mother, individually and as administrator of the estate of decedent who was fatally shot by members of a gang, sued mayor, whose grandsons were affiliated with the gang, and city police chief, alleging that mayor and chief used their public offices to obstruct the investigation of decedent's murder. The trial court denied chief's motion to dismiss mother's claims against him in his personal capacity on the basis of statutory immunity, holding that chief failed to show that mother could prove no set of facts to show that he acted with malicious purpose, in bad faith, or in a wanton or reckless manner relating to the investigation, such that an exception to immunity applied. While the court noted that chief was not immune from mother's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, it expressed no opinion as to whether mother could ultimately prove the elements of her claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Para v. Jackson, 171 N.E.3d 452, 461.

Ohio App.2019. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Neighbor's estate and relatives brought, among other things, claims of intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against mother whose mentally-ill son murdered neighbor with defendant's firearm, alleging that defendant caused relatives extreme emotional distress when she failed to report the location of neighbor's body to authorities, initially concealed the murder weapon, and lied to authorities about the location of the weapon. The trial court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding that defendant's failure to report the body's location did not rise to the level of outrageous conduct necessary to sustain an IIED claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, because she was not obligated to report the body, and her misconduct in lying to authorities, while wrongful, was not extreme or outrageous solely by the fact that it was criminal. Estate of Ciotto v. Hinkle, 145 N.E.3d 1013, 1035.

Ohio App.2018. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in cases quot. in disc. Decedent's family members brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against funeral home services company, funeral-home operator, and their employees, alleging that company's driver damaged decedent's body by transporting it at extremely high speeds, company had a heated argument with plaintiffs regarding whether decedent's body should be embalmed, and company prevented plaintiffs from seeing decedent's body before the embalming process, and that operator and its employees rushed plaintiffs through the funerary process, left decedent's body in a highly unkempt state during the viewing ceremony, demanded that plaintiffs leave when they attempted to have a private moment with decedent, and made rude and unprofessional remarks immediately following the eulogy. The trial court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment. This court affirmed in part, holding that defendants' conduct did not rise to the high level of outrageousness required under Ohio law and Restatement Second of Torts § 46, and that plaintiffs' emotional distress was not attributable to defendants' conduct, but rather the deaths of other family members following decedent's. Clay v. Shriver Allison Courtley Co., 118 N.E.3d 1027, 1038, 1043.

Ohio App.2018. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. After a district court entered summary judgment against police officer regarding her federal sex-discrimination claims against her employer, supervisors, lieutenant, and sergeant, police officer brought an action in state court, alleging, inter alia, that defendants committed intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) when supervisors, lieutenant, and sergeant screamed at her in front of multiple people, grabbed a radio off her chest, cursed at her, made insensitive remarks about plaintiff's sister's death from cancer, and made sexually inappropriate remarks. The trial court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding that defendants' conduct did not rise to the level of extreme outrageousness required for an IIED claim. The court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, in explaining that, although defendants' actions were disrespectful and inappropriate, plaintiff was expected to be hardened to a certain amount of rough language. Silvers v. Clay Township Police Department, 117 N.E.3d 954, 965-966.

Ohio App.2017. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup.; com. (j) quot. in sup. Student at a training school for professional nannies and governesses brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against school and its executive director, alleging that defendants discouraged her from reporting an act of child abuse that she witnessed during a placement arranged by defendants and subsequently refused to place her with another family. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict in favor of plaintiff. Affirming in part, this court held that plaintiff presented sufficient evidence from which reasonable minds could find that she suffered severe and debilitating emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, and that the question of whether the evidence proved that defendants' conduct caused plaintiff's emotional distress was for the jury to determine. Cruz v. English Nanny & Governess School Inc., 92 N.E.3d 143, 154, 155.

Ohio App.2017. Cit. and quot. in cases quot. in sup.; subsec. (1) quot. in sup. and in conc. op.; coms. (d) and (j) quot. in sup., cit. in cases quot. in sup. Homeowners filed, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against dozens of individuals, alleging that defendants harassed plaintiffs through phone calls, emails, and repeated car-horn honking, threatened physical harm, and defamed their reputations. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants on plaintiffs' IIED claim. This court affirmed, holding that summary judgment was appropriate where the record demonstrated an absence of evidence specifically identifying defendants, the dates of occurrence when defendants allegedly drove by plaintiffs' house honking or making lewd gestures, and plaintiffs' damages. The court quoted Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comments d and j, in setting forth the proposition that conduct giving rise to an IIED claim had to be extreme and outrageous. Krlich v. Clemente, 98 N.E.3d 752, 758, 759, 762.

Ohio App.2017. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in sup. Emergency-room secretary filed, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against former employer, alleging that she was wrongfully terminated for allegedly engaging in inappropriate, threatening, and retaliatory behavior toward hospital staff members. The trial court granted defendant's motion to dismiss as to plaintiff's IIED claim. Affirming, this court held that defendant's alleged conduct related to its investigation of staff members' reports against plaintiff and its eventual termination of her employment did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous necessary for a prima facie IIED claim. The court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46(1) in describing the conduct necessary for an IIED claim, explaining that the allegations of a defendant's conduct had to lead an average member of the community to exclaim, "Outrageous!" Meminger v. Ohio State University, 102 N.E.3d 642, 646.

Ohio App.2017. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in sup. Licensed practical nurse filed, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against long-term residential-care facility that formerly employed her, alleging that she was terminated in retaliation for reporting an abuse by a nursing aide who raised all four rails of a resident's bed in order to confine the resident. The trial court granted defendant's motion to dismiss. This court affirmed, holding that the evidence did not create a genuine issue of material fact that defendant's conduct was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support an IIED claim. The court relied on the standard of conduct necessary for an IIED claim as set forth in Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comments d and j, concluding that the evidence did not establish that defendant's conduct was so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency such that it could be considered utterly intolerable in a civilized community. O'Malley-Donegan v. MetroHealth System, 89 N.E.3d 113, 123, 124.

Ohio App.2017. Cit. in case cit. in sup.; com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup.; com. (e) cit. and quot. in disc.; com. (f) cit. in disc. Former assistant principal who was terminated by school district after complaints from a new principal about plaintiff's lack of professionalism and other conduct resulting in disciplinary charges brought, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against district's board of education and administrative employees. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to plead sufficient facts to support her IIED claim. The court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46 for the standard of proof applicable to IIED claims, noting that, under Comments e and f, actionable conduct could arise from abuse by a person in a position of authority, like defendants, but determined that, here, defendants' alleged conduct did not rise to the level of outrageousness necessary to support an IIED claim. Speller v. Toledo Public Schools Board of Education, 98 N.E.3d 1066, 1075, 1076.

Ohio App.2017. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Children of decedent filed an action against physicians, among others, alleging that they suffered severe emotional distress by witnessing the apnea test physicians conducted on their mother to confirm that she was brain dead, which caused son to take three weeks of bereavement leave and, one year after her death, to seek one counseling session, and which worsened daughter's preexisting anxiety and depression, leading to an increased dosage of medication. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. This court affirmed, holding that the trial court did not err in finding that plaintiffs failed to establish a genuine issue of material fact regarding whether they suffered serious emotional distress due to defendants' conduct. The court quoted Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment j, in explaining that it was for the court to determine whether severe emotional distress could be found by a reasonable jury, and determined that expert testimony was necessary in this case to show that defendants' actions, rather than decedent's death, were the cause of plaintiffs' harm. White v. Bhatt, 102 N.E.3d 607, 615.

Ohio App.2015. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Car-accident victim filed a negligence claim against police officers who pursued a burglary suspect until suspect drove into the opposing traffic lane and crashed into plaintiff's car, alleging that defendants were wanton and reckless in pursuing a nonviolent suspect through residential and commercial areas. The trial court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding that defendants were not the proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries. The court determined that no reasonable jury could find that defendants' conduct was outrageous and extreme, as described by Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d,which state law required for a claim to succeed against police officers involved in a pursuit. Argabrite v. Neer, 26 N.E.3d 879, 882.

Ohio App.2015. Quot. in case cit. and quot. in sup. Former mayor brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, against city officials and others, stemming from defendants' disclosure of personal and confidential information about plaintiff regarding a closed police investigation. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, this court affirmed, holding that defendants' disclosure of the closed police investigation in response to a public records request did not constitute extreme or outrageous conduct sufficient to establish an IIED claim under Ohio law. Bentkowski v. Trafis, 56 N.E.3d 230, 242.

Ohio App.2015. Com. (d) quot. in sup. (general cite). Property owners brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against neighbors, alleging that defendants made over 100 false complaints about them to various governmental entities in order to harass them, made knowingly false statements about plaintiffs to others, videotaped and photographed plaintiffs in their fenced backyard, and intentionally interfered with plaintiffs' use of their property and residence. The trial court granted defendants' motion for judgment on the pleadings. This court reversed and remanded, holding that plaintiffs' allegations were sufficient to satisfy the threshold requirement of extreme and outrageous conduct required to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Mangelluzzi v. Morley, 40 N.E.3d 588, 600.

Ohio App.2015. Com. (d) quot. in cases quot. in sup. Former mayor of village filed a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against village, village council, and others, alleging that defendants conspired and attempted to force her to resign from her position immediately upon taking office. The trial court granted defendants' motion for a directed verdict on plaintiff's IIED claim. This court affirmed, holding that, although plaintiff presented evidence that defendants were consistently inconsiderate, unkind, rude, and unprofessional toward her, defendants' actions were not, as a matter of law, sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support a claim for IIED under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Mender v. Chauncey, 41 N.E.3d 1289, 1299.

Ohio App.2015. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in ftn. Township fire chief who resigned after a report was issued that implicated her in the fire department's noncompliance with Ohio law filed, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against township and township's trustees, alleging that defendants caused her emotional distress by releasing the report to the public and violating the confidentiality provision of the parties' agreement, which had been provided in exchange for plaintiff's resignation. The trial court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding that the trial court did not err in finding that plaintiff's IIED claim was derivative of her separate breach-of-contract claim. The court noted that the trial court did not find that defendants' conduct was sufficiently "extreme and outrageous" to meet the standard of Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, but it declined to address that finding because it affirmed the dismissal on other grounds. Teodecki v. Litchfield Twp., 38 N.E.3d 355, 364.

Ohio App.2014. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former at-will employee who was fired because his employer believed he had deceptively attempted to obtain workers' compensation benefits for a non-work related injury brought, inter alia, an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against employer. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant. Affirming that portion of the judgment, this court held that no reasonable factfinder could find that defendant's conduct rose to the level of outrageousness sufficient to support an IIED claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d. The court explained that, under the circumstances, defendant's actions in terminating an at-will employee did not go beyond all possible bounds of decency so as to be regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Onderko v. Sierra Lobo, Inc., 20 N.E.3d 322, 332.

Ohio App.2009. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Current and former tenants sued owners of apartment building for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress based on defendants' alleged failure to maintain the property in habitable condition, which allowed for the accumulation of moisture and hazardous mold in their apartments. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. Affirming, this court held that plaintiffs were unable to present any evidence that they had suffered severe emotional distress, and thus had a complete failure of proof concerning an essential element of their case; there was no evidence that any plaintiffs ever sought treatment for their emotional distress, and none of them reported having been diagnosed with any mental or psychological condition at any point during or after their tenancy at the apartment building. Finley v. First Realty Property Mgt., Ltd., 185 Ohio App.3d 366, 382-383, 2009-Ohio-6797, 924 N.E.2d 378, 391.

Ohio App.2005. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Former employee brought, inter alia, claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against employer, its owners, and owners' business associate, alleging that associate exposed his penis to her and to others on employer's premises and used a banana to simulate a penis. The trial court granted summary judgment for employer and owners, and denied summary judgment for associate on the emotional-distress claim. This court reversed in part and remanded as to employer and owners, holding, inter alia, that, although it was unclear whether plaintiff, who suffered visual impairments, saw plaintiff's penis or merely a banana, exposure of a penis or simulated penis in a work environment for the purpose of retaliation rose to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct as a matter of law, as did an employer's sanctioning of such conduct. Radcliff v. Steen Elec., Inc., 164 Ohio App.3d 161, 2005-Ohio-5503, 841 N.E.2d 794, 803.

Ohio App.2003. Com. (d) adopted in case quot. in disc. and quot. generally in case quot. in sup. Hospital employee sued hospital for intentional infliction of emotional distress and harassment in violation of public policy. Affirming the trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendant, this court held, inter alia, that behavior of defendant's personnel in telling plaintiff, a migraine sufferer, that she was missing a lot of work, repeatedly asking her how she was feeling, and sending her to a rehabilitation center for treatment did not constitute the extreme and outrageous conduct required to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Scarabino v. E. Liverpool City Hosp., 155 Ohio App.3d 576, 579, 580, 802 N.E.2d 188, 190, 191.

Ohio App.2002. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. After a dock leveler collapsed and fell on employee's head, employer fired employee when he did not return to work at the end of 12 weeks of medical leave. Employee and his wife sued employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Trial court granted employer summary judgment. This court reversed in part, holding, inter alia, that fact issues existed as to whether the number of phone calls made by employer's controller to plaintiffs and the substance of those calls constituted outrageous conduct. Plaintiffs alleged that employee got very upset and agitated over controller's numerous phone calls and his lack of understanding in repeatedly asking employee to return to work. Rigby v. Fallsway Equip. Co., Inc., 150 Ohio App.3d 155, 166, 779 N.E.2d 1056, 1064-1065.

Ohio App.2002. Subsec. (g) cit. in sup. (Erron. cit. as § 46.9(g).) Employee of state department of transportation brought suit for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress against department, alleging that his supervisor swore at him on a regular basis, called him derisive names, and directed sexually suggestive gestures toward him. Affirming the trial court's entry of judgment for defendant, this court held, inter alia, that, in determining whether supervisor's conduct was extreme and outrageous, the trial court properly considered the context in which supervisor's conduct occurred and plaintiff's own part in contributing to, if not creating, the crude, abusive environment about which he now complained. Strausbaugh v. Ohio Dept. of Transp., 150 Ohio App.3d 438, 445, 446, 782 N.E.2d 92, 97, 98.

Ohio App.2001. Com. (d) quot. generally in case quot. in disc. Former client sued attorneys for legal malpractice and intentional infliction of emotional distress, arising from defendants' failure in plaintiff's underlying wrongful-discharge suit to file a proof of claim during bankruptcy proceedings of plaintiff's former employer. The trial court dismissed plaintiff's emotional-distress claim. Affirming, this court held that there was no evidence that defendants intended to cause plaintiff emotional distress, or knew or should have known that their conduct in, among other things, failing to consult a bankruptcy attorney and ignoring plaintiff's inquiries into the progress of his case would result in serious emotional distress. Furthermore, their behavior did not constitute the extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to support plaintiff's claim. Cunningham v. Hildebrand, 142 Ohio App.3d 218, 229, 755 N.E.2d 384, 392.

Ohio App.2001. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in sup. Parents sued memorial company for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, after a photograph of their son's headstone appeared in defendant's sales brochure. Affirming the trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendant, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress failed because plaintiffs did not present any specific facts showing that defendant intended to cause them emotional distress or knew or should have known that the actions taken would result in serious emotional distress to them. Walkosky v. Valley Memorials, 146 Ohio App.3d 149, 152, 765 N.E.2d 429, 432.

Ohio App.2000. Com. (l) quot. in case quot. in disc. Former husband sued former wife and her paramour for intentional infliction of emotional distress after discovering that paramour was father of child born during marriage. Trial court held defendants jointly and severally liable, and awarded plaintiff compensatory and punitive damages. Reversing, this court held, inter alia, that defendants' behavior did not rise to the level of "extreme and outrageous" conduct necessary to sustain finding of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Bailey v. Searles-Bailey, 140 Ohio App.3d 174, 181, 746 N.E.2d 1159, 1164.

Ohio App.2000. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Blood donor who had been notified by Red Cross that he had tested positive for syphilis sued Red Cross for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress after subsequent test results were negative. Affirming the trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendant, this court held, inter alia, that defendant's communication to plaintiff of the test results did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, since defendant was simply following the regulations, dictated by the FDA, that required positive test results to be reported to the donor. Fisher v. Am. Red Cross Blood Serv., 139 Ohio App.3d 658, 662, 745 N.E.2d 462, 464.

Ohio App.2000. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Due to a clerical error, county children services board falsely identified a white male as the father of an illegitimate African-American child, and threatened him to pay child support. He sued the board and a caseworker for, in part, intentional or reckless infliction of emotional distress. Trial court granted caseworker summary judgment, holding that he was protected by political subdivision employee tort immunity. This court reversed and remanded, holding that fact issues existed as to whether caseworker engaged in reckless conduct that could eliminate immunity by making official allegations of moral turpitude and potential criminal conduct against a citizen without any attempt to verify that the accused was the proper party. Irving v. Austin, 138 Ohio App.3d 552, 741 N.E.2d 931, 934.

Ohio App.1999. Coms. (d)-(f) quot. in cases quot. in sup. Former firefighter sued fire chief and department captain for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court denied defendants' motions for summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that material factual issues existed as to whether the complained-of conduct, which included suggesting to co-workers that plaintiff was a danger to others and arresting him for setting a recreational fire, supported recovery under a theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Garrison v. Bobbitt, 134 Ohio App.3d 373, 731 N.E.2d 216, 220, 223.

Ohio App.1999. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. Elementary school teacher sued school board for discrimination based on age and disability. Plaintiff also asserted a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered summary judgment for defendant. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that material factual issues existed as to whether defendant made reasonable accommodations for plaintiff's bad back; however, allegations that plaintiff was ridiculed by supervisors and assigned difficult students did not rise to the level of outrageousness necessary to support an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. McCafferty v. Cleveland Bd. of Edn., 133 Ohio App.3d 692, 729 N.E.2d 797, 808.

Ohio App.1999. Subsec. (1) cit. in sup. and cit. in ftn., com. (d) quot. in sup. and cit. in ftn., com. (j) quot. in sup. Restaurant patron sued owner for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with the crass and vulgar comments that defendant allegedly made to her. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding plaintiff compensatory and punitive damages. Affirming, this court held, in part, that the evidence supported the jury's conclusion that defendant's conduct was extreme and outrageous and caused plaintiff to suffer severe emotional distress, or that, even if defendant's conduct was less than outrageous, he owed plaintiff a heightened duty of care by virtue of the proprietor-customer relationship. Meyers v. Hot Bagels Factory, Inc., 131 Ohio App.3d 82, 721 N.E.2d 1068, 1075, 1076.

Ohio App.1999. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in appendix. City police officer sued city and police captain for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendants' improper disclosure of confidential information, including accusations of sexual assault, contained in his background investigation file proximately caused him to suffer mental anguish. Affirming the trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendants on plaintiff's claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to prove that defendants' conduct was extreme and outrageous, since he was unable to present clear evidence that city authorized disclosure of his background information, and since police captain's disclosure did not mention plaintiff's name. Patrolman “X” v. Toledo, 132 Ohio App.3d 374, 725 N.E.2d 291, 310-311.

Ohio App.1998. Coms. (d) and (j) cit. in headnotes and quot. in part in sup. After nurse whose silicone breast implants had been removed by plastic surgeon for whom she worked initiated litigation against breast-implant manufacturer, surgeon reassigned nurse's job duties to restrict her contact with his breast-implant patients. Nurse quit her job and subsequently sued surgeon for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming the trial court's grant of summary judgment for surgeon, this court held, inter alia, that the reassignment of duties was based on justifiable business concerns and did not give rise to claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Takach v. Am. Med. Technology, Inc., 128 Ohio App.3d 457, 459, 471, 715 N.E.2d 577, 578, 586.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ohio App.1997. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Discharged employee sued former employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that employee's supervisor, knowing of employee's mental disorder, subjected him to coarse, angry language and threatening behavior. Defendant moved for summary judgment. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held, among other things, that defendant's conduct was not so extreme and outrageous as to give rise to a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Thatcher v. Goodwill Industries of Akron, 117 Ohio App.3d 525, 690 N.E.2d 1320, 1331.

Ohio App.1997. Cit. in headnote, subsec. (1) cit. in headnote and quot. in case quot. in disc., coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. The buyer of a home sued the seller for specific performance of the contract to sell the house, and the seller brought a third-party claim against the real estate broker for intentional infliction of emotional distress arising out of an altercation between the broker and the seller's teenage son. The trial court granted summary judgment to the buyer and entered judgment for the seller on her emotional-distress claim. This court affirmed, holding that the trial court properly found that the broker's conduct was extreme and outrageous where, knowing that the seller was divorced, that she was having trouble with her ex-husband and son, and that she was being treated by a psychiatrist, the broker nevertheless initiated a violent argument with the son, placing the seller under such duress that she felt that the only way to save her household and her son and rid herself of the broker was to sign the contract for the sale of her home. Wilkins v. Ondrovich, 118 Ohio App.3d 93, 691 N.E.2d 1122, 1122, 1125.

Ohio App.1996. Cit. in headnote, com. (d) cit. in case cit. in disc. Graduate of nanny and governess school who was not considered for certain child-care positions sued school and placement agency for, inter alia, handicap-based discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that, because she had a cerebral palsy-induced speech impediment, defendants refused to recommend her to families whose children were just beginning to develop language skills. The trial court entered summary judgment for defendants. Affirming in part and reversing in part, this court held, among other things, that material factual issues existed as to whether defendants engaged in discrimination on the basis of handicap, but that defendants' conduct was not so extreme and outrageous as to give rise to a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Bryans v. English Nanny & Gov. School, 117 Ohio App.3d 303, 690 N.E.2d 582, 584, 592.

Ohio App.1996. Cit. in headnote, coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in sup., quot. in case quot. in diss. op., subsecs. (1) and (2) cit. in case quot. in diss. op. Employee who submitted to her employer's request for a second-opinion examination in order to receive disability benefits sued employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiff, who agreed to the exam against the advice of her treating physician, underwent a recurrence of her condition, which, in turn, caused her to undergo further surgery. The trial court entered summary judgment for defendant. Reversing and remanding, this court held that material factual issues existed as to whether defendant's actions were such as to support recovery under a theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Dissent believed that defendant did not act intentionally; that, because defendant's conduct was privileged under the circumstances, it could not be considered so extreme and outrageous as to go beyond all bounds of decency; and that there was no evidence that plaintiff's mental distress was so severe as to give rise to an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Kovacs v. Bauer, 118 Ohio App.3d 591, 693 N.E.2d 1091, 1091, 1093, 1099, 1100, appeal dismissed 80 Ohio St.3d 1224, 687 N.E.2d 779 (1998). See above case.

Ohio App.1996. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Employee sued his employer and supervisors for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. Plaintiff cited various incidents, including receipt of blow-up dolls, cartoons, and an item labeled a "penis warmer." He also alleged that the supervisors had restrained him on one occasion and proceeded to tickle and poke him in the stomach and chest areas. Trial court granted defendants summary judgment. This court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to set forth sufficient evidence that defendants' actions were outrageous and extreme. Retterer v. Whirlpool Corp., 111 Ohio App.3d 847, 677 N.E.2d 417, 422, appeal after remand 1999 WL 254412 (Ohio App.1999).

Ohio App.1996. Com. (d) cit. generally in headnote and quot. in case quot. in disc. Family members of a deceased airplane-crash victim sued the victim's wife, alleging wrongful disinterment, trespass, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Trial court granted defendant summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that the act of disinterment was not an outrageous and extreme act, because the wife had statutory authority to enter the gravesite and disinter her husband's remains. Scott v. Spearman, 115 Ohio App.3d 52, 684 N.E.2d 708, 712.

Ohio App.1995. Quot. in case quot. in disc. Individual sued vice president of local branch of national civil rights organization for defamation and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that vice president attributed to plaintiff statements in which plaintiff purportedly expressed his ability to influence the sale of two radio stations. The trial court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that the alleged statements were subject to a qualified privilege, and that defendant's actions did not constitute outrageous behavior causing plaintiff severe mental distress. Burkes v. Stidham, 107 Ohio App.3d 363, 668 N.E.2d 982, 989-990.

Ohio App.1995. Subsec. (1) quot. in disc. A white former housing case supervisor sued the state's regional planning commission for firing him in violation of the state whistleblower statute, intentional infliction of emotional distress, reverse race discrimination, and fraud. Plaintiff alleged that defendant pursued a course of extreme and outrageous behavior by giving plaintiff a poor performance evaluation and offering to demote him because he had notified homeowners when contractors failed to properly perform work on their homes even though, in reality, plaintiff's performance as a supervisor was satisfactory. Trial court granted defendant summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that defendant was not liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because the record did not support plaintiff's contentions. Plaintiff was at-will employee serving a six-month probationary period who received an unsatisfactory evaluation for the first three months and, at the end of the six-month probationary period, was offered a job commensurate with his abilities. Bushman v. Mid-Ohio Reg. Planning Comm., 107 Ohio App.3d 654, 669 N.E.2d 305, 309.

Ohio App.1995. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. An applicant who was denied admission to law school because he had been charged with impersonating a police officer sued the township, the police department, and the arresting officers for intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress, defamation, malicious prosecution, and invasion of privacy. Plaintiff had used a badge, handcuffs, and hunting gun to arrest individuals who were stealing his tree stand. Trial court granted defendants summary judgment. This court affirmed in part and reversed in part, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to prove intentional infliction of emotional distress because the officers' arrest of plaintiff, which was supported by probable cause, was not extreme and outrageous. It stated that arrests of suspected criminals were necessary in keeping the community civilized. Piro v. Franklin Twp., 102 Ohio App.3d 130, 656 N.E.2d 1035, 1043.

Ohio App.1995. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. A bank customer whose picture was published in a newspaper and broadcast on a local television station along with information that he was a suspect in a bank robbery sued the bank, bank employees, the bank security guard, and the guard's employer alleging, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Trial court granted defendants summary judgment. This court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because the bank's failure to carefully review its records before it provided the FBI with information did not rise to the level of outrageous conduct, without some showing of intent to misidentify plaintiff as the robber. Wigfall v. Soc. Natl. Bank, 107 Ohio App.3d 667, 669 N.E.2d 313, 318.

Ohio App.1994. Subsecs. (1) and (2) and coms. cit. in sup., com. (j) cit. in headnote and quot. in sup., coms. (d) and (j) quot. in cases quot. in sup. Union members who allegedly were intimidated and threatened by union officials and other union members because they crossed the picket line and worked during a strike sued unions for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding plaintiffs damages. Reversing, this court held, inter alia, that the verbal exchanges between plaintiffs and union officials amounted to nothing more than the type of robust language commonly found in any bitter strike activities and did not constitute the extreme and outrageous conduct required to support plaintiffs' claim; furthermore, even if the comments caused plaintiffs to suffer emotional distress, defendants were not liable, since the claimed injuries were not severe and debilitating or those with which a reasonable person, normally constituted, would be unable to cope adequately. Dickerson v. Internatl. United Auto Wkrs. Un., 98 Ohio App.3d 171, 172, 178, 183, 648 N.E.2d 40, 41, 45, 48.

Ohio App.1994. Subsec. (1) cit. in headnote and cit. in case quot. in sup. Patient sued hospital for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Affirming in part the trial court's grant of summary judgment for hospital, this court held that hospital's provision of a lifesaving blood transfusion to patient contrary to her written instructions that no blood be administered during her hospitalization was not extreme and outrageous conduct and thus did not support patient's claim. Perkins v. Lavin, 98 Ohio App.3d 378, 383, 648 N.E.2d 839, 839, 842.

Ohio App.1994. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. but dist. Hotel guest with AIDS and bleeding ulcer sued hotel owner for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, after defendant denied him access to his room because he had AIDS. The trial court dismissed for failure to prove actual damage. Reversing and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that while plaintiff's emotional damages did not rise to extreme level, they fell within category of cases that recognized recovery for lesser emotional damages based on relationship between plaintiff and defendant. Phillips v. Mufleh, 95 Ohio App.3d 289, 295, 642 N.E.2d 411, 415.

Ohio App.1994. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in sup., coms. (d) and (g) quot. in case quot. in sup. Employee who was discharged after she consulted an attorney about an employment dispute sued her former employer for wrongful discharge and intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Affirming in part the trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendant, this court held, in part, that neither the conduct of plaintiff's co-workers leading to a food-throwing incident nor the manner in which plaintiff was fired by defendant rose to the level of extreme and outrageous behavior necessary to support plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Simonelli v. Anderson Concrete Co., 99 Ohio App.3d 254, 260, 261, 650 N.E.2d 488, 492, 493.

Ohio App.1994. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. After a construction coordinator for a floral exposition was arrested for gross sexual imposition, rape, and kidnapping, he sued the project's construction management firm and its employees for, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress due to the firm's employees' statements to the exposition organizer that plaintiff would not be able to function on the project after the arrest. Trial court granted defendants summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state an emotional-distress cause of action, because defendants' conduct was not extreme and outrageous, the employees' statements were qualifiedly privileged, and plaintiff did not suffer severe emotional distress. Smith v. Ameriflora 1992, Inc., 96 Ohio App.3d 179, 644 N.E.2d 1038, 1044-1045.

Ohio App.1994. Cit. in disc., coms. (d) and (j) cit. generally in headnote and quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (i) quot. in sup., coms. cit. generally in disc. Former employee sued state auditor for intentional infliction of emotional distress, claiming that she suffered severe emotional distress as a result of an involuntary sexual relationship with defendant, which was exacerbated by her forced participation in improper fundraising activities. Reversing the trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendant and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether defendant's conduct was extreme and outrageous and whether defendant intended to cause emotional distress or knew or should have known that his conduct would result in serious emotional distress to plaintiff. Tschantz v. Ferguson, 97 Ohio App.3d 693, 694, 700, 702, 713, 647 N.E.2d 507, 508, 512, 513, 520.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ohio App.1993. Com. (g) cit. in sup. Supervisor whose employment was terminated sued employee and union steward, among others, for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, after employee filed a grievance concerning a dispute that occurred when supervisor attempted to give employee a written warning for refusing work. Affirming the trial court's granting of summary judgment for defendants, this court held that defendants' statements made during or in connection with the grievance process were subject to the defense of absolute privilege, thus barring plaintiff's claim. Stiles v. Chrysler Motors Corp., 89 Ohio App.3d 256, 624 N.E.2d 238, 244.

Ohio App.1992. Com. (j) quot. in part in sup. A waste oil collector sued a competitor and its customer for defamation, tortious interference with business relations, unfair trade practices, and negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress after it learned that defendants were distributing copies of unfounded criminal complaints against plaintiff. Judgment for plaintiff was vacated in part and affirmed in part by this court, which held, inter alia, that evidence of anxiety on the part of plaintiff's owner, which was not so serious and persistent as to be intolerable, fell far short of that required to warrant judicial relief for infliction of emotional distress. Akron-Canton Waste Oil, Inc. v. Safety-Kleen Oil Serv., Inc., 81 Ohio App.3d 591, 605, 611 N.E.2d 955, 965.

Ohio App.1992. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in sup. A husband who entered into a negotiated marriage and was later ejected from the marital home sued the man who arranged the marriage, alleging fraud and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming a dismissal of the complaint, this court held as a matter of public policy that the complaint could not be maintained, as it argued, in effect, that the woman was defective and thus impermissibly treated females as goods. Furthermore, said the court, even if the claims were actionable, the husband's claim for fraud was not stated with sufficient particularity to survive a motion to dismiss, and he failed to allege any conduct on defendant's part so extreme or outrageous as to support an action for emotional distress. Singh v. Singh, 81 Ohio App.3d 376, 382, 383, 611 N.E.2d 347, 351.

Ohio App.1991. Com. (d) quot. in disc. Father brought action seeking damages from his children's maternal grandparents, alleging, inter alia, that they inflicted on him mental distress by taking the children away in order to help their daughter violate a visitation order. The trial court directed a verdict for the grandparents. Reversing, this court held that the evidence could support a finding that the grandparents helped their daughter to violate the visitation order. It also found that although not every wrongful act was outrageous, reasonable minds could come to differing conclusions regarding whether the grandparents' actions constituted extreme and outrageous conduct that did gross violence to the norms of a civilized society. Brown v. Denny, 72 Ohio App.3d 417, 594 N.E.2d 1008, 1012.

Ohio App.1991. Subsec. (1) quot. and adopted in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (i) quot. in sup. Former employee sued former employer, benefits plan, and plan administrator alleging, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress after employer cancelled plaintiff's medical insurance on the day of her scheduled surgery for colon and rectal cancer. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. Reversing in part, this court held that where employer, knowing of plaintiff's scheduled surgery, cancelled plaintiff's insurance effective the date of her surgery and had a union representative telephone plaintiff with the news as she was preparing to leave for the hospital, a question of fact was presented as to whether this conduct was so extreme and outrageous, and manifested the requisite intent, as to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Clifton v. Van Dresser Corp., 73 Ohio App.3d 202, 208, 209, 596 N.E.2d 1075, 1078, 1079.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ohio App.1991. Com. (d) cit. and quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (j) cit. in case quot. in disc. Family members sued a funeral home, alleging negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress, after learning that their decedent's unembalmed body was not in the casket during calling hours. The trial court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress failed because defendant's conduct did not rise to that extreme level of outrageousness from which severe emotional distress would likely result. The court stated that defendant was simply taking those steps necessary to comply with the family's instructions not to embalm the body and that, while plaintiffs may have had reason to be upset, the law could not protect against and redress in damages all mental anguish a person may suffer. Davis v. Billow Co. Falls Chapel, 81 Ohio App.3d 203, 610 N.E.2d 1024, 1026.

Ohio App.1991. Com. (g) quot. in cases cit. in sup. Nursing assistant who was discharged for violating hospital's sexual harassment policy sued hospital for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Affirming in part the trial court's granting of summary judgment for defendant, this court held that defendant's conduct, e.g., putting plaintiff on decisionmaking suspension, conducting an investigation, and advising him of his discharge, was not so extreme and outrageous as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency and that defendant's publication of defamatory statements that allegedly caused plaintiff emotional distress was protected by a qualified privilege. The court also held that, to the extent that defendant's conduct in discharging plaintiff and publishing the reason for the discharge was not merely an exercise of defendant's legal rights, that conduct was not so extreme and outrageous as to support plaintiff's claim. Hanly v. Riverside Methodist Hosp., 78 Ohio App.3d 73, 603 N.E.2d 1126, 1132.

Ohio App.1991. Com. (g) quot. in cases cit. in disc. Furloughed railroad employee brought an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, against the railroad, alleging that defendant's failure to recall plaintiff to a laborer position or submit the question of his fitness to a board of doctors was motivated by his handicap. The trial court dismissed the claim for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. Affirming, this court held that plaintiff's claim was preempted by the federal Railway Labor Act, since the basis for the claim, defendant's alleged delay in determining whether plaintiff could perform the functions of the position, depended on the terms of the collective bargaining agreement. Hatlestad v. Consolidated Rail Corp., 75 Ohio App.3d 184, 598 N.E.2d 1302, 1306.

Ohio App.1990. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. A private duty nurse sued a hospital for, inter alia, intentional or negligent infliction of emotional distress in connection with her detention by hospital security guards for suspected shoplifting from the hospital gift shop. The trial court granted summary judgment in favor of the hospital. Affirming, this court held that the plaintiff had shown no extreme and outrageous conduct by the defendant. It noted that the plaintiff's complaint that a security guard used names such as "sweetheart" to address her hardly amounted to outrageous treatment and that the plaintiff's deposition testimony stated that she was neither mistreated nor physically threatened. Moreover, the court stated that the guards' actions were not negligent, since they had probable cause to detain the plaintiff. Ashcroft v. Mt. Sinai Medical Ctr., 68 Ohio App.3d 359, 588 N.E.2d 280, 282, 284.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ohio App.1990. Subsec. (1) quot. in disc., com. (e) cit. in disc., coms. (d) and (f) quot. in sup. A former employee sued his former employer and supervisor for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that, following a work-related accident involving his exposure to a toxic chemical, he was threatened with discipline if he did not return to work even though he was still ill and experiencing anxiety in the accident's aftermath, that he was told to take his medicine in private and not to discuss the accident, that he was told to see company doctors rather than private doctors, and that he was constantly being pressured and told that he was not doing a good job. The trial court granted the defendants summary judgment, and this court affirmed, holding that, assuming the truth of the plaintiff's allegations, it was apparent that the defendants were exercising their legitimate right to criticize and correct their employee's work, and that the conduct alleged was not atrocious, utterly intolerable, or outrageous. Boggs v. Avon Products, Inc., 56 Ohio App.3d 67, 564 N.E.2d 1128, 1134.

Ohio App.1990. Subsec. (1) quot. in case cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. At-will employee who was discharged from his job as a cost estimator for a construction company sued the company, claiming, inter alia, that his termination constituted intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming the trial court's granting of summary judgment for defendant, this court held that defendant's unfulfilled promises did not constitute extreme or outrageous conduct or exceed the community's bounds of decency. The court stated that plaintiff's only basis for suit was his alleged reliance on promises made by defendant, which was insufficient for a cause of action; also, plaintiff's claim that he "suffered great loss" did not meet Ohio's definition of severe emotional distress. Colina v. McGraw Construction Co., Inc., 69 Ohio App.3d 422, 590 N.E.2d 1308, 1310.

Ohio App.1990. Com. (d) quot. generally in disc. A criminal defendant and his wife sued the complainant's attorney for invasion of privacy and intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, after the attorney telephoned the plaintiff's home and called the criminal defendant a "son of a bitch." The trial court granted the attorney's motion for summary judgment. Affirming, this court held, in part, that plaintiff failed to state a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress because the attorney's use of foul language did not "go beyond all possible bounds of decency" and, as a matter of law, would not be considered outrageous by an average member of the community. Haller v. Phillips, 69 Ohio App.3d 574, 591 N.E.2d 305, 307.

Ohio App.1990. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup., coms. (d)-(g) quot. in sup. Discharged employee sued his former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that defendant's conduct exacerbated plaintiff's preexisting mental illness. Affirming the trial court's granting of summary judgment for defendant, this court held that plaintiff's allegations that his supervisor told him that "You are going to present me with a problem" and admonished him to stay on long-term disability because no work was available did not as a matter of law establish the extreme and outrageous conduct necessary for a prima facie case of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court also stated that defendant's conduct in discharging plaintiff, an at-will employee, was privileged and that the record did not demonstrate any genuine issue of fact as to whether defendant's conduct was in excess of the privilege. Mason v. United States Fid. & Guar. Co., 69 Ohio App.3d 309, 590 N.E.2d 799, 804.

Ohio App.1990. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. A supervisor sued his employer for, inter alia, intentional or negligent infliction of emotional distress after he was fired for allegedly instructing employees to wrongfully charge overtime. The trial court granted the employer's motion for summary judgment. Reversing and remanding on other claims, this court overruled the plaintiff's assignment of error on the summary judgment for emotional distress, holding, inter alia, that the plaintiff failed to allege emotional distress of a nature sufficient to state a cause of action when the sole basis of his claim was the fact that he was "plenty upset" at being discharged. It stated that, where the plaintiff never saw a doctor concerning any emotional difficulties due to his discharge and testified that "I don't think it [the discharge] affected my health in any way at all," summary judgment for the defendant was proper. Sheets v. Rockwell Internatl. Corp., 68 Ohio App.3d 345, 588 N.E.2d 271, 276-277.

Ohio App.1988. Subsec. (1) quot. in ftn. After a store's theft alarm was activated by a sensormatic tag that store personnel failed to remove from one of the items a shopper had purchased, the store's personnel detained the shopper until the tag was located. The shopper sued the store for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment on statute of limitations grounds. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that the plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress was fairly stated and was timely filed. Bowling v. Brendamour's, Inc., 40 Ohio App.3d 37, 530 N.E.2d 1338, 1339.

Ohio App.1988. Cit. in disc. A painter fell and severely injured his neck while painting the roof of a farmer's barn. The painter sued the farmer for failure to provide a safe place of employment and the farmer's liability insurers for breach of their duty of good faith in failing to settle the case. The trial court granted the defendants' motions for summary judgment. On appeal, the plaintiff asserted in its assignment of trial court error that the insurers wrongly claimed that the plaintiff was barred from suing them directly on a third-party beneficiary theory of liability, when, in fact, the insurers were being sued, instead, for their independent torts of bad faith and outrage. Affirming, this court held that the defendant farmer owed the plaintiff no duty of care that the farmer failed to perform; since as a matter of law the farmer was not liable to the plaintiff, the plaintiff's assignment of error was without merit. McDonald v. Fruth, 51 Ohio App.3d 121, 554 N.E.2d 1354, 1356.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ohio App.1988. Subsec. (1) and coms. (d), (e), and (g) quot. in disc. An employee sued his former employer and supervisor for damages on a theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, after his supervisor allegedly grabbed his wrist and used other employees to block him in his office while discharging him and denied the plaintiff's request to see personnel staff. The trial court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. Affirming in part and reversing and remanding in part, this court held that the trial court improvidently granted summary judgment for the defendants, since issues of fact remained as to whether the defendants' conduct in discharging the plaintiff was extreme and outrageous and caused him to suffer serious emotional distress. Rejecting the defendants' argument that their conduct was privileged, the court held that there were fact issues as to whether the defendants, in discharging the plaintiff, had done no more than insist on their legal rights; even if the defendants' conduct was privileged, questions remained as to whether the conduct was in excess of privilege. Uebelacker v. Cincom Systems, Inc., 48 Ohio App.3d 268, 549 N.E.2d 1210, 1219-1221, appeal after remand 80 Ohio.App.3d 97, 608 N.E.2d 858 (1992).

Ohio App.1987. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. After an employer called an employee in the hospital on medical leave to inform her of a voluntary retirement program being initiated at work, the employee sued the employer for intentional and/or negligent infliction of serious emotional distress, inter alia. The trial court granted summary judgment for the defendant. Affirming, this court held that the defendant's telephone call to the plaintiff was conducted in a businesslike manner, that it was not of an antagonistic or harassing nature, and that it did not rise to the level of an atrocity. Lynn v. Allied Corp., 41 Ohio App.3d 392, 536 N.E.2d 25, 33.

Ohio App.1987. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. generally in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. A man who was stopped by police with their guns drawn because he met the description of an armed man in the area sued the police for civil rights violations and for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding that the officers were justified in conducting an investigatory stop of the plaintiff, given the facts and circumstances known to the officers at the time of the stop. The court also held that the defendants were entitled to summary judgment as to the plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, reasoning that the officers' conduct did not rise to the requisite level of extreme and outrageous conduct. Wells v. City of Akron, 42 Ohio App.3d 148, 537 N.E.2d 229, 231, 232.

Ohio App.1986. Cit. in case quot. in disc., coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. The sister and grandchildren of a decedent sued a cemetery association for damages on the theories of infliction of emotional distress and the mishandling of a dead body after the remains of their relative were disturbed. The trial court found for the plaintiffs. Affirming, this court held that the emotional injuries suffered by the plaintiffs as a result of the defendant's mishandling of the corpse were severe, reasonably foreseeable, and valid injuries under the tort of infliction of emotional distress. Carney v. Knollwood Cemetery Ass'n, 33 Ohio App.3d 31, 514 N.E.2d 430, 432, 435.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ohio App.1986. Subsec. (1) cit. in disc., com. (d) cit. in disc. and quot. in case quot. in sup., coms. (e) and (f) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (g) quot. in sup. The administratrix of the estate of her deceased husband sued his former employer and supervisor, alleging wrongful discharge and intentional infliction of serious emotional distress that eventually caused or contributed to his premature death. The trial court granted summary judgment for the defendants on the claim of wrongful discharge and sustained the defendants' motion for directed verdict on the claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held that the trial court properly sustained the defendants' motion in limine barring all testimony referring to infliction of emotional distress by reason of the termination of the decedent's employment. The court stated that because the decedent had been an at-will employee, the defendants were entitled to terminate his employment, regardless of whether they knew or intended that the termination would add to his emotional distress. The court also held that the trial court erred in directing a verdict for the defendants on the plaintiff's tort claim for serious emotional distress, since this court could not find, as a matter of law, that the conduct of the supervisor was not extreme and outrageous. Foster v. McDevitt, 31 Ohio App.3d 237, 511 N.E.2d 403, 406, 407.

Ohio App.1985. Com. (d) quot. and cit. in case quot. and cit. in disc. The city refused to provide legal counsel to a police officer who had shot a drug suspect, because he had used unauthorized bullets. When he sued the city, he was awarded attorney's fees and damages for serious emotional distress, but the trial court refused to instruct the jury on punitive damages. This court eliminated the plaintiff's award for serious emotional distress on the grounds that the defendant's conduct was not extreme and outrageous and no serious emotional distress had resulted. However, the court affirmed the trial court's position on punitive damages, reasoning that, even if extreme and outrageous conduct were involved, punitive damages could not be assessed against a municipal corporation in the absence of statutory authorization. Koenig v. City of Dayton, 28 Ohio App.3d 70, 502 N.E.2d 233, 236-238.

Ohio App.1985. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Parents and brother of decedent sued a coroner who called decedent a “pusher,” the reporter who reported the coroner's statement, and the publisher who printed the statement. Plaintiffs did not seek to recover for the defamation of the decedent but for injuries allegedly suffered directly by them under the theories of defamation, intentional or negligent infliction of emotional distress, and invasion of privacy. The trial court entered summary judgment in favor of all defendants, and the court of appeals affirmed. The court held, inter alia, that the publication in the newspaper of the coroner's statement that decedent was a “pusher” did not constitute an actionable tort for either intentional or negligent infliction of emotional distress, reasoning that the publication did not meet the necessary level of extreme or outrageous conduct for these torts. Lambert v. Garlo, 19 Ohio App.3d 295, 484 N.E.2d 260, 264.

Ohio App.1984. Subsec. (1) quot. in case cit. in sup. The plaintiff sued for criminal conversation, alienation of affections, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and loss of consortium. The plaintiff alleged that the defendant had repeatedly phoned the plaintiff's wife with the intention of seducing her. Some of the calls were made when the defendant allegedly knew that the plaintiff was at home. Both the plaintiff and his wife told the defendant to desist but he refused and eventually forced the plaintiff's wife to have sexual relations. The trial court granted the defendant's motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim. Although noting that the state had abolished the causes of action for criminal conversation and alienation of affections, this court reversed and remanded. It held that the plaintiff had pleaded a valid cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Slusher v. Oeder, 16 OhioApp.3d 432, 476 N.E.2d 714, 718.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ohio App.1983. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in disc., coms. cit. generally in sup. A father appealed a trial court order denying his motion for change of custody, and the mother appealed an award of tort damages to the father for intentional infliction of emotional stress. The actions were consolidated on appeal. The court of appeals affirmed the order denying a change of custody, as there was insufficient evidence that the children's home situation had changed since the original custody award, and reversed the trial court's judgment for the father on the emotional stress claim. While a cause of action could be stated for intentional infliction of severe emotional distress without a contemporaneous physical injury, the father failed to establish the requisite intent, outrageous behavior, and emotional distress. The mother's behavior in obstructing the father's visitation and permitting a small child to give his father a gift that she knew the father could not use, while unpleasant, did not rise to the necessary level of outrageous conduct. Pyle v. Pyle, 11 Ohio App.3d 31, 463 N.E.2d 98, 103.

Ohio Com.Pl.

Ohio Com.Pl.2007. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Buyers of bulldog puppy sued seller, alleging that, after they ceased making payments for the puppy, seller repeatedly called and e-mailed them, using threatening and outrageous language, and posted websites and other messages on the Internet that defamed them, including a copy of one buyer's driver's license and a mock wanted poster. Denying seller's motions to dismiss and for summary judgment as to buyers' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, this court held that buyers sufficiently alleged that seller, by his outrageous conduct, knowingly, intentionally, and maliciously inflicted emotional distress on them, and that he continued his behavior even after being informed of its effect; defendant, in response, provided no evidence outside of the pleadings. Nicolazzo v. Yoingco, 149 Ohio Misc.2d 44, 58, 2007-Ohio-7269, 898 N.E.2d 94, 105.

Ohio Ct.Cl.

Ohio Ct.Cl.2001. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Corrections officer who was injured while breaking up a fight between two juveniles at a juvenile correctional center, and who had his bruises photographed to document his injuries for an accident report, sued department of youth services for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, arising from conduct of correctional center's security administrator in showing to other employees one of the photographs, which showed plaintiff's inner thigh and part of his penis, and in making remarks to plaintiff and teasing him. Entering judgment for defendant, this court held that security administrator's conduct was not sufficiently extreme or outrageous to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Toth v. Ohio Dept. of Youth Serv., 113 Ohio Misc.2d 1, 8, 754 N.E.2d 305, 310.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Ohio Ct.Cl.1997. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Woman who was denied permission to marry prison inmate pending verification of her gender sued Department of Rehabilitation and Correction for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Entering judgment for defendant, the court held that prison representatives did not act outrageously when they questioned plaintiff's gender, based on their observations of her mannerisms, build, and other physical characteristics. Saffell v. Dept. of Rehab. & Corr., 91 Ohio Misc.2d 30, 696 N.E.2d 1126, 1127.

Ohio Ct.Cl.1990. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in appendix to op. Prisoner sued state department of rehabilitation and correction for physical and emotional injuries allegedly incurred in a confrontation with a corrections officer. Adopting the referee's report, this court rendered judgment for defendant, holding that where plaintiff received minor scrapes and bruises from being pushed along with a piece of wood and forced down onto a wooden bench after his failure to comply with the officer's order, there was no causal relationship between these injuries and the lower back pain he later complained of, and the officer's conduct was not so extreme and outrageous as to support a claim for intentional or negligent infliction of emotional distress. Mason v. Ohio Dept. of Rehab. and Corr., 62 Ohio Misc.2d 96, 593 N.E.2d 482, 486.

Ohio Ct.Cl.1988. Subsec. (1) cit. in case cit. in disc. An employee sued her employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that the defendant intentionally caused her to suffer emotional distress when it mailed directly to the plaintiff's husband's attorney in a domestic relations case a subpoenaed investigative report the defendant had compiled concerning conversations the plaintiff had had with other employees describing several incidents involving the plaintiff and her minor son that had sexual overtones. Entering judgment for the defendant, this court held that the defendant's actions were not extreme or outrageous, because the mailing of the subpoenaed report was an attempt to expedite the custody matter and not a deliberate act to cause emotional distress. Fisher v. Ohio Dept. of Rehab. & Corr., 61 Ohio Misc.2d 303, 578 N.E.2d 901, 903.

Okl.

Okl.2008. Cit. in case quot. in disc. Former parishioner sued his former priest, archbishop, and diocese, alleging that he was a victim of priest's predatory sexual misconduct, and that archbishop and diocese failed to take appropriate actions against priest. The trial court granted summary judgment for archbishop and diocese, and the court of civil appeals affirmed. Vacating the judgment of the appellate court, reversing in part the judgment of the trial court, and remanding, this court held that fact issues remained as to plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court pointed to plaintiff's testimony that he sought funds from defendants to pay for past and continuing therapy for the sexual abuse, and to evidence of several priests' knowledge of certain improper conduct by defendant priest, defendant's known reputation to one archbishop of not complying with directions from the archbishop, and the priests' duty to report conduct to the archbishop. Schovanec v. Archdiocese of Oklahoma City, 2008 OK 70, 188 P.3d 158, 175.

Okl.2002. Cit. in disc., subsec. (1) quot. in ftn. Former employer sued former employee for misappropriation of trade secrets, inter alia, and employee brought third-party claim against employer's owner for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Trial court entered judgment for employee on third-party claim; appellate court reversed in part, holding that owner's conduct was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to submit emotional-distress claim to jury. Reversing in part, supreme court held that evidence warranted submission of emotional-distress claim to jury where, following employee's termination of consensual sexual relationship, owner continually harassed employee for two years with letters, cards, phone calls, and visits to her neighborhood and workplace. Computer Publications, Inc. v. Welton, 49 P.3d 732, 735.

Okl.1999. Subsec. (1), com. (d) quot. in disc. Landowners sued neighbors/loggers for trespass and intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with defendants' actions in gaining access to a section line on plaintiffs' property. The trial court directed a verdict for plaintiffs on the trespass claim and entered judgment on a jury verdict in their favor on the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The intermediate appellate court affirmed. Vacating the judgment of the court of appeals and affirming in part and reversing in part that of the trial court, this court held that defendants' conduct, which amounted to a trespass, could not be considered extreme and outrageous. Frank v. Mayberry, 1999 OK 63, 985 P.2d 773, 776.

Okl.1998. Cit. in headnotes, cit. in disc., subsec. (1), com. (d) quot. in ftn. Attorneys specializing in the representation of tort plaintiffs brought defamation action against newspaper publisher that printed stories about organization's efforts to bring about tort reform through the initiative process. Attorneys also asserted claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress and tortious interference with advantageous business relations. After the trial court denied publisher's motion to dismiss, publisher sought a writ of prohibition to prevent attorneys from prosecuting their action. Issuing the writ, this court held that the common-law fair-report and fair-comment privileges protected communications on matters of public interest, that the stories at issue constituted pure political speech that could not serve as the basis for a defamation action, that newspaper did not act outrageously, and that newspaper did nothing improper so as to afford attorneys relief under a theory of tortious interference with business relations. Gaylord Entertainment Co. v. Thompson, 1998 OK 30, 958 P.2d 128, 133, 134, 149.

Okl.1998. Cit. in headnotes and sup., cit. in case cit. in sup., subsec. (1) quot. in ftn., com. (d) cit. in ftn. and headnote and quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. in ftn., com. (j) cit. and quot. in ftn. A man sued his former wife and her parents for damages and equitable relief based on fraud, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and quantum meruit. Plaintiff alleged that, for the purpose of inducing him to marry his wife, defendants in 1980 knowingly misrepresented to him that she was pregnant with his child, and continued to perpetrate this fraud against him for the next 15 years. Trial court dismissed plaintiff's suit and the appellate court affirmed. This court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded, holding, inter alia, that there were fact issues as to whether defendants' conduct was extreme and outrageous. Miller v. Miller, 956 P.2d 887, 889, 890, 900, 901.

Okl.1997. Cit. in disc., subsec. (1) quot. in ftn., com. (d) quot. in ftn. Two lawyers sued an organization, its leaders, and several publishing companies, alleging that defendants disseminated false, deceptive, fraudulent, and defamatory statements, and that defendants' actions constituted intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiffs contended that the organization's publicity campaign, allegedly for an initiative petition drive, was in fact a sham that sought to disguise its sole purpose of maligning the plaintiffs and undermining Oklahoma's democratic processes. This court granted defendants a writ of prohibition enjoining the trial court from proceeding in the suit. The court concluded, inter alia, that plaintiffs failed to state a viable claim for the tort of outrage, because defendants' activity was both protected and nondefamatory. Brock v. Thompson, 948 P.2d 279, 293-294.

Okl.1996. Cit. in headnote, cit. in ftn., subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in ftn., coms. cit. generally in ftn. In husband's action against a drunk driver who struck husband and his wife as they walked through a parking lot, husband sought, among other items of recovery, damages for emotional distress arising from seeing his wife dragged under the driver's truck for 60 feet and fatally injured. The trial court granted defendant's motion for partial summary judgment; the court of appeals affirmed. Vacating the court of appeals' opinion and reversing the trial court's entry of judgment, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff stated a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because he was directly physically involved in the incident, he was damaged from viewing the injury to his wife rather than from learning of the accident later, and he was the spouse of the party whose injury gave rise to his anguish; the court remanded for a jury determination on the issues of the outrageousness of defendant's conduct and the severity of plaintiff's emotional distress. Kraszewski v. Baptist Medical, 916 P.2d 241, 242, 244, 248, 249.

Okl.1994. Cit. in ftn. Plaintiff's name was mentioned by district attorney at news conference in connection with drug investigation; newspaper republished the material verbatim. Plaintiff sued newspaper for libel and intentional infliction of emotional distress, and the trial court dismissed; the intermediate appellate court affirmed. Also affirming, this court held that district attorney's news conference was official function of his office and represented occasion to which common-law fair-reporting privilege attached. Moreover, since fair and accurate media coverage of official public occasions was in public's best interests, defendant's conduct, the court said, could not be actionable as an intentional infliction of emotional distress. Wright v. Grove Sun Newspaper Co., Inc., 873 P.2d 983, 990.

Okl.1992. Cit. in spec. conc. op., quot. in ftn. to spec. conc. op. Injured worker sued insurer in tort for bad faith refusal to timely pay his workers' compensation award. Affirming the trial court's granting of summary judgment for defendant, this court held that the evidence did not support the cause of action since defendant's litigation of the claim, causing delay in payment, did not constitute bad faith; moreover, defendant made an effort to pay the award 18 days after it became due. A specially concurring opinion characterized plaintiff's claim as one for intentional infliction of emotional distress and argued that plaintiff did not prove that he suffered severe emotional distress or that defendant's conduct was outrageous. Goodwin v. Old Republic Ins. Co., 828 P.2d 431, 437.

Okl.1992. Cit. and quot. in ftn. Two parishioners sued their former church, the lay leader of the congregation, and the leader's counselors for intentional or negligent infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that they were excommunicated from the church and suffered harm from the willful or grossly negligent delivery of the expulsion letters and from the communication of the letters' contents to the public. The trial court granted summary judgment for the defendants. Affirming in part and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that, even if a statement made by one of the defendant counselors established a fact issue as to whether the lay leader communicated the letters' contents outside the church, the lay leader's conduct was not so extreme and outrageous as to justify submission of the claim to the jury. The court noted that it was the trial court's responsibility initially to determine whether the defendant's conduct could reasonably have been regarded as sufficiently extreme and outrageous to meet the standards set forth in the Restatement (Second) of Torts § 46. Hadnot v. Shaw, 826 P.2d 978, 985.

Okl.1992. Cit. in case quot. in disc., subsec. (1) quot. in disc., com. (j) quot. in ftn. An at-will employee of the Farmers Cooperative Association (co-op), who was also the mayor of the town and a voting member of the town's board of trustees, was fired by the co-op's board of directors. The employee sued the co-op and its board of directors for wrongful discharge and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that he was fired because the town board did not grant the co-op's zoning variance request. The trial court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The intermediate appellate court reversed and remanded. Vacating the intermediate appellate court's opinion and affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding the trial court, this court held, inter alia, that there was no evidence that the co-op had acted in such an extreme or outrageous manner toward the employee to impose liability under the tort theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Smith v. Farmers Co-Op. Ass'n of Butler, 825 P.2d 1323, 1327.

Okl.1992. Cit. in case quot. in disc., subsec. (1) quot. in sup. Husband sued his estranged wife's parents for damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that defendants aided his wife in concealing his children from him with the intent to cause him mental distress and emotional suffering. Reversing in part the trial court's dismissal of the action and remanding, this court held that, based on the allegations in plaintiff's petition, it appeared that plaintiff possibly could prove a set of facts that would entitle him to relief. Zaharias v. Gammill, 844 P.2d 137, 140, 141.

Okl.1991. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. After a husband left his wife for another woman, the former wife sued the woman for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court sustained the defendant's motion to dismiss under a state statute repealing actions for alienation of affections and seduction. The intermediate appellate court reversed and reinstated the emotional distress action. Vacating the appellate court's opinion and affirming the trial court, this court held that it could not find the conduct of willfully taking away a spouse, which the legislative body had removed from those acts bearing civil liability in tort, so outrageous as to be regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Wilson v. Still, 819 P.2d 714, 716.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Okl.1990. Subsec. (1) quot. in ftn. to diss. op., com. (k) cit. in ftn. to diss. op. A psychological assistant at the state penitentiary experienced major depression and posttraumatic stress disorder following a prison ordeal in which he was held hostage. The assistant sought workers' compensation for permanent partial disability. The workers' compensation court denied recovery upon finding no accidental injury. The intermediate appellate court reversed. Vacating the intermediate appellate court's opinion, this court held that the claimant's mental stress was not compensable where he suffered no accompanying physical injury. Two dissenting opinions argued that denial of recovery for purely psychological injuries was strictly a judicial limitation rather than a statutory one. Moreover, one dissent noted that, even in tort law, recovery for intentional infliction of emotional distress was not limited to cases where there had been bodily harm. Fenwick v. Oklahoma State Penitentiary, 792 P.2d 60, 65, 72.

Okl.1989. Cit. in case quot. in ftn., com. (d) cit. in case quot. in ftn. A former member of a church sued the church elders, alleging invasion of privacy and intentional infliction of emotional distress, to recover damages for the defendants' public denouncement of the plaintiff as a fornicator. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict in the plaintiff's favor. This court reversed and remanded for a new trial confined to the defendants' actionable conduct unprotected by the First Amendment, which followed the plaintiff's unilateral withdrawal from the congregation, holding, inter alia, that the defendants were not entitled to an absolute or a qualified privilege regarding the invasion of privacy claim after the plaintiff had withdrawn from church membership. Guinn v. Church of Christ of Collinsville, 775 P.2d 766, 783.

Okl.1987. Cit. in ftn., com. (k) cit. in ftn. A man sued his brother-in-law and sister-in-law for assault, battery, extortion, trespass, damage to property, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and invasion of privacy after the defendants allegedly kicked in the front door of the plaintiff's home, committed assault and battery, and extorted from him a $32,000 check as payment of the amount claimed to be due them in a prior suit. The trial court held that the assault and battery claims were barred by the statute of limitations, but it subsequently entered judgment on a jury verdict for the plaintiff with respect to the remaining theories of recovery. The intermediate appellate court reversed and directed the trial court to enter judgment for the defendants on remand. Vacating the intermediate appellate court's opinion and affirming the trial court's judgment on the jury verdict subject to the plaintiff's remittitur of punitive damages, this court held that the jury verdict was not lacking in evidentiary support and, with the exception of the award for punitive damages, was not excessive. The court stated that the extreme and outrageous character of a defendant's conduct is in itself important evidence that the distress episodes occurred and that most jurors were capable of estimating the degree and character of distress that may be caused by a defendant's conduct. Chandler v. Denton, 741 P.2d 855, 867.

Okl.1986. Cit. and quot. in disc., com. (d) cit. in ftn. An employee sued a former employer for invasion of privacy and for the tort of outrage, alleging that the supervisor and the employer had harassed and subjected him to ridicule, ultimately causing him to quit his job. The trial court granted summary judgment for the employer, and the intermediate appellate court reversed and remanded for trial. On the employer's petition for certiorari, this court vacated the intermediate appellate court's opinion and affirmed the trial court's judgment. The court held that the tort of outrage did not extend to mere insults and that the employee's complaints of harassment, such as disclosure of psychiatric visits, did not meet the Restatement's standards of extreme and outrageous behavior. In addition, the court said, the employee's claim for invasion of privacy did not satisfy the publicity element of the tort; only a limited number of employees heard that the employee was undergoing psychiatric treatment, and this disclosure did not amount to publicity. Eddy v. Brown, 715 P.2d 74, 75-77.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Okl.1984. Cit. in disc., cit. in ftn.; coms. (b) and (d) cit. in disc., cit. in ftn. in diss. op.; subsec. (1) quot. in ftn. in diss. op.; com. (h) cit. in ftn. in diss. op.; coms. cit. gen. in ftn. in diss. op. An employee sued his employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted the employer's motion for summary judgment. This court reversed, holding that, although the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress is an extension of the tort of assault, the statute of limitations applicable to this action differed from that applicable to an assault action. The court stated that the alleged tort did not require proof of physical injury or invasion of other interests. The dissent noted that, on remand, the trial court would have to determine initially whether the employer's conduct was so extreme and outrageous and the employee's emotional distress so severe as to permit recovery and warrant the claim's submission to the jury. Williams v. Lee Way Motor Freight, 688 P.2d 1294, 1296, 1297, 1298, 1299.

Okl.1978. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in part in sup., illus. (4) cit. in ftn. in sup., com. (e) cit. in ftn. in sup., com. (h) cit., quot. in ftn. in sup., com. (j) cit., quot. in part in ftn. in sup., com. (b) cit. in ftn. in dictum. Plaintiff debtor sued defendant collection companies seeking to recover damages for, inter alia, mental anguish allegedly resulting from the harassing and threatening collecting tactics of the defendants. The lower court granted summary judgment in favor of defendants, and plaintiff appealed. This court affirmed, holding that where defendants mailed three letters to plaintiff at her home address and at her place of employment and made several attempts to contact plaintiff by telephone both at home and her place of employment, but had only one telephone conversation with her, in which she was called a God damned liar and a deadbeat, and all calls were made during reasonable hours, defendants' conduct was not so outrageous as to give rise to a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court also held that the standard against which a defendant's conduct must be measured to impose liability for this tort, without the presence of the elements necessary to any other torts, is that the conduct must be so outrageous in character and so extreme in degree as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized community. The court assumed that because the trial court sustained the summary judgment, it determined that outrageous or extreme conduct could not be found, and that reasonable men could not differ as to that conclusion. Breeden v. League Services Corp., 575 P.2d 1374, 1376, 1377, 1378.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Okl.1978. Cit. in disc.; subsecs. (h) and (j) cit. in disc. A debtor brought an action against a creditor to recover actual and exemplary damages alleging that the creditor's harassment and coercive collection practices invaded her privacy and caused her great emotional and mental distress. The trial court sustained the creditor's motion for summary judgment and dismissed the debtor's complaint. On appeal, the court of appeals reversed and remanded, and the creditor appealed. The court noted that it adopted the standard advanced in Section 46 of the Restatement in actions based upon outrageous conduct causing emotional distress. The court held that where the creditor had a legitimate debt owed to it by the debtor, where the debtor was in possession of personal property securing the debt, and where the debtor avoided all contact with the creditor's agents and refused to contact them, the creditor's conduct, which consisted of leaving business cards at the debtor's apartment door and contacting her landlord after she moved, may not reasonably be regarded as so extreme and outrageous that an issue of fact was framed for submission to the jury on intentional infliction of mental distress. The court adopted the standard advanced in the Restatement Tentative Draft No. 22, Sec. 652, Chapter 28A, in actions based upon invasion of privacy. The court held that, considering the facts most favorable to the debtor, the record will not support a finding that the creditor's agents conducted themselves in a manner highly offensive to a reasonable person in their attempts to contact the debtor and thus did not tortiously invade the debtor's privacy. Therefore, the judgment of the court of appeals was vacated, and the trial court's judgment was affirmed. Munley v. ISC Financial House, Inc., 584 P.2d 1336, 1338, 1340.

Okl.1976. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Plaintiff brought this action against the state and the state's chief medical examiner, alleging that the plaintiff was deprived of her right to the timely possession of her father's body when the examiner refused to perform an autopsy on the body. This refusal led to a delay of two or three days in the performing of an autopsy, and plaintiff alleged that this delay, and the manner in which the autopsy was finally performed, resulted in her suffering mental and physical anguish for which she sought to recover damages. The lower court sustained the defendant's demurrer. On appeal, the court affirmed, saying that the plaintiff's petition did not state a cause of action, since the complaint did not state sufficient facts to constitute a willful wrong of such a character that mental suffering would be recognized as the ordinary, natural, and proximate result of such a wrong. Dean v. Chapman, 556 P.2d 257, 261.

Okl.App.

Okl.App.2016. Cit. in sup., quot. in ftn.; com. (d) quot. in sup.; com. (h) cit. in sup. Husband, individually and as guardian ad litem for wife, brought claims for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress against owner of a retirement facility where wife resided, alleging that, after wife suffered a broken wrist while residing in facility's specialized, memory-care unit, owner failed to adequately investigate the incident, tried to place the blame on sitters hired by husband, and allowed the employee who was allegedly responsible for wife's injury to return to work on the same floor as wife. After a bench trial, the trial court determined that owner was liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court reversed that portion of the decision and remanded, holding that the alleged behavior was not sufficiently outrageous to state such a claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Hicks v. Central Oklahoma United Methodist Retirement Facility, Inc., 423 P.3d 684, 697, 698.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Okl.App.2011. Com. (h) quot. in sup. and adopted in case cit. in sup. High school teacher/basketball coach sued television network, alleging that he was defamed and his privacy was invaded by network's broadcast of a news story concerning parents' complaints about purported threats made by teacher. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant. This court reversed as to plaintiff's claim for invasion of privacy by false light, determining, as a threshold matter of first impression for that tort, that whether the broadcast was capable of the meaning plaintiff alleged was initially a question of law. The court noted that this was the approach taken when the claim was based on the tort of outrage. Grogan v. KOKH, LLC, 2011 OK CIV APP 34, 256 P.3d 1021, 1029.

Okl.App.2006. Quot. in sup. After employer hired attorney and law firm to investigate an incident in which a worker's drink was contaminated, and attorney accused former employee of being the perpetrator and a liar, former employee sued attorney and law firm for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that attorney's actions caused him to suffer embarrassment, humiliation, physical pain, and the loss of his job. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to establish a prima facie case of intentional infliction of emotional distress, since, in the context of a workplace investigation into the dangerous contamination of an employee's drink, attorney's alleged conduct was not outrageous, atrocious, or beyond all possible bounds of decency as a matter of law. Ishmael v. Andrew, 2006 OK CIV APP 82, 137 P.3d 1271, 1277.

Okl.App.2006. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Parents of children who played on an eight-and-under baseball team sued national, nonprofit sports association for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress, after state director of association forced the team to forfeit a tournament game based on an official complaint lodged against them by another team and, when parents tried to discuss the matter, allegedly became enraged, jumped out of his chair, charged directly at one parent, and screamed at her in a threatening and menacing manner. The trial court granted defendant's motion to dismiss the emotional-distress claim. This court affirmed, holding that director's conduct was not so extreme and outrageous as to meet the standard for the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Warren v. United States Specialty Sports Ass'n, 2006 OK CIV APP 78, 138 P.3d 580, 585.

Okl.App.2003. Cit. in case quot. in disc., subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Male former employees who alleged that they had been sexually harassed by a co-worker sued former employer for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming in part the trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendant, this court held, inter alia, that defendant's alleged conduct in failing to remedy the harassment in a timely and reasonable manner was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Miner v. Mid-America Door Co., 68 P.3d 212, 223.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Okl.App.2000. Cit. in case quot. in disc., cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in sup. Former employee sued former employer for wrongful discharge, asserting various tort and contract theories of recovery. The trial court dismissed the complaint. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held, among other things, that, even if plaintiff were able to establish a contractual right of employment, defendant could not be found liable for tortious interference with present and prospective business relations where it was a party to the alleged agreement, and that allegations that defendant had verbally and mentally abused plaintiff after plaintiff refused to commit a crime for business purposes were not sufficient to support recovery under a theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Gabler v. Holder and Smith, Inc., 11 P.3d 1269, 1280.

Okl.App.2000. Cit. and quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. Law student expelled for falsifying student loan application sued state university for negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress after university refused student's readmission application. Affirming trial court's dismissal, this court held, inter alia, that student did not present evidence sufficient to establish "outrageous" conduct necessary to support claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Mason v. State ex rel. Bd. of Regents of University of Oklahoma, 23 P.3d 964, 969, 970, cert. denied 534 U.S. 853, 122 S.Ct. 124, 151 L.Ed.2d 79 (2001).

Okl.App.1999. Cit. in case cit. in disc. Landowners involved in a neighborhood property dispute brought a claim for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress against newspaper and its owner, which had published an editorial about the dispute. The trial court dismissed for failure to state a claim, and denied plaintiffs' motion to amend. Reversing and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that, although plaintiffs' petition failed to allege outrageous conduct necessary to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, plaintiffs were entitled to amend their petition to allege additional facts to support recovery under that theory. Sturgeon v. Retherford Publications, Inc., 1999 OK CIV APP 78, 987 P.2d 1218, 1227.

Okl.App.1998. Cit. in case quot. in disc. Former medical research foundation employee sued employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that the employer denied his request to transfer research grants, funding, and equipment, and denied access to research files. In addition, employer required plaintiff to turn in his keys and to publicly collect all keys from his employees, and his clinic was padlocked at nighttime and weekends. Trial court granted employer summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that, although plaintiff was embarrassed and humiliated, defendant's conduct was not extreme and outrageous. Corder v. Oklahoma Medical Research Foundation, 980 P.2d 1122, 1127.

Okl.App.1998. Cit. in headnote, cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. Former employee sued former employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered judgment for defendant. Affirming, this court held, in part, that the conduct complained of, which included telephoning plaintiff at home during early morning hours, calling his wife by his first wife's name, disciplining plaintiff in front of co-workers, and denying plaintiff's request for a day off following the birth of his son, was not so extreme and outrageous as to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Mirzaie v. Smith Cogeneration, Inc., 962 P.2d 678, 678, 682.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Okl.App.1996. Quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (e) quot. in sup., coms. (h) and (j) adopted in case quot. in sup. Former employee brought an action for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress against her former employer. Affirming the trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendant, this court held, inter alia, that the allegedly vulgar, insensitive, and annoying conduct of one of plaintiff's female supervisors was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court said that some of the crude conduct was not specifically directed at plaintiff, plaintiff did not complain to persons higher in the chain of command, and plaintiff admitted that she also used "cuss words" at times. Anderson v. Okl. Temporary Services, Inc., 925 P.2d 574, 576.

Okl.App.1996. Cit. in headnotes, com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc., coms. (h) and (j) cit. in disc. Woman who contended that she was mistreated by city police officers sued city for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted city's motion for summary judgment on the ground that at the time of the alleged acts in question, the officers were not acting within the scope of their employment. Affirming, this court held that governmental employees acted within the scope of their employment only when they acted in good faith, but that, by definition, an actor charged with outrageous conduct never acted in good faith, thus relieving his governmental employer of liability for his actions. McMullen v. City of Del City, 920 P.2d 528, 528, 531.

Okl.App.1990. Coms. (h) and (j) quot. in disc. Beneficiaries of a life insurance policy sued the insurer after it refused to pay benefits allegedly due them. After sustaining the defendant's demurrer to the plaintiffs' evidence of a bad-faith breach of contract, the trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for the plaintiffs in a sum equal to the face value of the policy. Affirming and remanding, this court held that the trial court properly disposed of the plaintiffs' bad-faith claim. The court stated that, before the issue of the defendant insurer's bad faith could be submitted to the jury, the trial court must determine whether the defendant's conduct could reasonably be perceived as tortious, analogous to the inquiry involving a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court reasoned that, because the evidence adduced at trial revealed that the defendant's refusal to pay the claim was based on what the defendant believed to be material misrepresentations of fact by the insured on his application for insurance, constituting grounds for avoidance of liability, the trial court properly determined that the defendant's conduct was not tortious. City Nat. Bank v. Jackson Nat. Life Ins., 804 P.2d 463, 469.

Okl.App.1990. Cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. In the course of investigating possible diversion of medications from patients at a hospital, a director of nursing requested a urine sample from a nurse for drug screening. The nurse said she would comply if given a statement acknowledging her admission that she had recently taken prescription drugs. The director, after initially agreeing, told the nurse there would be a delay in getting the statement and invited her to resign if she was displeased. The nurse quit and then sued the director, the hospital, and several co-workers for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court affirmed the trial court's award of summary judgment to the defendants on the ground that the director's investigative tactics were not sufficiently outrageous in character to support an emotional distress claim. The court said that while the director may have exercised poor judgment in initially agreeing to furnish the written statement without stating that there would be a delay, she used no physical action to coerce or intimidate the nurse. Haynes v. South Com. Hosp. Mgmt., Inc., 793 P.2d 303, 306, 307.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Okl.App.1989. Coms. (h), (i) and (j) cit. in sup. Employees of a community services company sued former employees and other parties for invasion of privacy and intentional infliction of emotional distress arising from alleged abuse of the discovery process in obtaining court-ordered document discovery of the company's personnel files in a prior suit. The trial court granted summary judgment on these claims to the former employees and other parties, and this court affirmed. As a threshold issue, the court determined that abuse of the discovery process by a party to litigation could support an independent tort action against the discovering party. However, it proceeded to hold that the copying of documents by the former employees and other parties pursuant to the court-ordered discovery did not constitute an unreasonable intrusion into the seclusion of another so as to support a cause of action for invasion of privacy. It also ruled that the trial court did not err in determining that the conduct of the former employees and other parties during the court-ordered discovery was not so outrageous and extreme so as to permit recovery. Big Five Community Services, Inc. v. Jack, 782 P.2d 412, 414.

Okl.App.1984. Cit. in case quot. in sup. The plaintiff and the defendant lived together in the defendant's house, for which the plaintiff supplied a portion of the downpayment. The plaintiff vacated the premises when their relationship soured and filed a joint venturer's lien. The defendant used nude photographs of the plaintiff to obtain a release of the lien to sell the house. In the plaintiff's suit for intentional infliction of emotional distress, the trial court found for the plaintiff. The defendant argued that the jury had been improperly instructed on the elements of intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court affirmed in part and reversed and remanded in part. The court held that a defendant's conduct must be extreme and outrageous, not merely unreasonable, to support the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Floyd v. Dodson, 692 P.2d 77, 80.

Okl.App.1976. Cit. in sup. Plaintiff brought this action against a bank for mental anguish and severe emotional distress, claiming that a bank employee made threatening and abusive telephone calls in an attempt to collect a debt owed by the plaintiff's son. The lower court sustained the bank's demurrer. On appeal, the court held that a valid cause of action was alleged, and that intentional infliction of mental anguish is an independent cause of action where mental suffering is recognized as the ordinary, natural, and proximate result of a wrong. The court also held that in such an action, expert testimony to prove the existence of mental anguish is not needed. Bennett v. City National Bank and Trust Con., 549 P.2d 393, 397.

Okl.App.1973. Quot. and coms. (b), (h), (j) quot. in sup. This was a suit for replevin of a combination stereo record player and television set which had been sold and delivered to the defendants by the plaintiff's salesman. The defendants cross-petitioned for actual damages and punitive damages, and possession and ownership of the goods, claiming that payment had been made. Defendants also claimed that they had been maliciously harassed and threatened by the plaintiff and his employees. Judgment was rendered on a verdict for defendants. Plaintiff appealed contending the court committed a fundamental error in submitting to the jury a question of damages for mental suffering unaccompanied by physical injury. The court affirmed judgment for the defendants, stating that intentional infliction of mental distress is a separate and distinct tort, and one may recover without showing physical injury. There is evidence which substantiates the view that injuries to the nervous system are physical and recovery may be had for such injuries, just as recovery is permitted for any other physical injuries. The plaintiff's conduct was extremely outrageous and totally unwarranted and the defendant wife's mental state caused by the plaintiff's actions could not be ignored. Reeves v. Melton, 518 P.2d 57, 62.

Or.

Or.2002. Cit. in case cit. in sup., com. (i) quot. generally in case quot. in sup. After several security guards arrested concert audience members for illegal drug possession, concert arena owner discharged the entire group of security officers, who then sued arena owner for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted defendant's motion to dismiss, and the court of appeals affirmed in part and reversed in part. Affirming in part and reversing in part, this court held that plaintiffs' allegation that defendant acted with the purpose of causing plaintiffs severe emotional distress was sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss. Plaintiffs were not required to allege also that defendant acted with knowledge that severe emotional distress was substantially certain to result from its conduct. Babick v. Oregon Arena Corp., 333 Or. 401, 412, 40 P.3d 1059, 1064.

Or.1995. Adopted in case cit. in disc., cit. in case cit. in disc., cit. in sup., com. (e) cit. in case cit. in disc., com. (i) cit. in headnote and quot. in sup. and adopted. Former employee of a collection agency sued her former employer and supervisor for intentional infliction of severe emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that her supervisor engaged in conduct constituting a continuing pattern of sexual harassment against her. The trial court granted in part defendants' motion to dismiss, and the court of appeals reversed in part. Affirming in part, this court held, inter alia, that the trial court erred in dismissing the claim, since plaintiff's allegation that defendants acted volitionally with knowledge that the acts would cause severe emotional distress pleaded the requisite intent to state a claim for intentional infliction of severe emotional distress. McGanty v. Staudenraus, 321 Or. 532, 545, 550, 551, 901 P.2d 841, 843, 849, 850, 853.

Or.1991. Cit. in ftn., com. (e) cit. in ftn. Wife of a decedent sued, among others, the agency responsible for maintaining a 9-1-1 emergency telephone system for negligent infliction of severe emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that, after she called 9-1-1 to report that her husband had no pulse and was not breathing and a 9-1-1 operator told her that someone would be right over, no one arrived for 45 minutes and that the operator knew that she lived in an unincorporated area where proper services would never have been sent. The trial court granted summary judgment for the defendant, and the intermediate appellate court affirmed. Affirming, this court held that the plaintiff could not recover because she had sustained no physical injury and that it would not recognize the tort of negligent infliction of emotional distress without the impact rule. The court noted that it had never expressly adopted as state law the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress as defined in s 46 of the Restatement (Second) of Torts. Hammond v. Central Lane Communications, 312 Or. 17, 816 P.2d 593, 597.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Or.1986. Cit. in conc. and diss. op. An employee was fired from his job by his supervisor after refusing the supervisor's demands to stop seeing a female coemployee socially. The former employee sued the supervisor, another supervisor, and the store for wrongful discharge and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, and the intermediate appellate court affirmed the dismissal of the wrongful discharge claim but reversed and remanded on the intentional infliction of emotional distress claim. This court affirmed the wrongful discharge decision, saying that the employee could be fired at will and reversed the intentional infliction of emotional distress decision, because the behavior complained of was not outrageous. A concurring and dissenting opinion agreed with the majority's dismissal of the wrongful discharge claim but stated that a claim might exist against the two supervisors for tortious interference with contract, since the supervisors may have used their positions for their own purposes rather than for the company's. Patton v. J.C. Penney Co., Inc., 301 Or. 117, 719 P.2d 854, 859.

Or.1981. Com. (g) quot. in ftn. in disc. and quot. in diss. op. The plaintiff, a former employee at the defendant's store, brought an action for damages for defamation and for intentional infliction of emotional distress allegedly suffered after she was questioned by the store security personnel about shortages in her cash register. The lower court granted the defendant's motion for judgment n.o.v. and the appellate court affirmed. The plaintiff appealed, and the state supreme court reversed the decision as to the verdict for compensatory damages. The court reasoned that considering the evidence most favorable to the plaintiff, the jury could find that the security officer's conduct was extreme and outrageous and that he intentionally inflicted emotional distress. The case was accordingly reversed and remanded. The dissenting opinion argued that the extreme conduct required for the intentional tort could not be found by the jury. Hall v. May Dept. Stores Co., 292 Or. 131, 637 P.2d 126, 133, 139.

Or.1981. Cit. in diss. op. The plaintiff contracted to buy cattle from a third person, but the defendant caused the third-person seller to breach the contract with the plaintiff by buying the same cattle at a higher price. The plaintiff brought an action to recover for the defendant's alleged interference with contractual relations. The trial court awarded damages for mental anguish only. The appellate court reversed, holding that damages for mental suffering could not be awarded for the tort of interference with contractual relations in the absence of physical injury. The plaintiff appealed, and this court reversed and reinstated the jury verdict. The court held that damages for emotional suffering could be recoverable in an intentional interference with contractual relations suit, depending upon what type of contractual relation was disrupted and whether the mental suffering was a predictable outcome of the interference. The dissent argued that before any mental distress damages were recoverable in such an action, the plaintiff should be required to prove that the defendant's conduct was either malicious or outrageous. In a special concurring opinion, one justice stressed that the majority, by focusing on the type of contract in question, was imposing a new requirement which made the test unworkable and subjective. Mooney v. Johnson Cattle Co., Inc., 291 Or. 709, 634 P.2d 1333, 1341, 1342.

Or.1979. Cit. in disc. and Tentative Draft 1 cit. in disc. and coms. cit. in disc. Plaintiff, a tenant, brought suit against her landlords, originally asking for injunctive relief arising out of allegedly wrongful efforts by the defendants to evict her by force, and subsequently adding claims for damages. The trial court granted an involuntary nonsuit in favor of two of the defendants, directed a verdict in favor of two other defendants on an emotional distress count, and entered judgment on the verdict against those defendants on a battery count. The plaintiff appealed, and the defendants cross-appealed, and the court reversed and remanded. The court held that the tenant was not entitled to punitive damages for violation of a statutory provision and, though the plaintiff could not charge to her landlords her emotional or psychological distress over the nonculpable shortcomings of her rented quarters, she could recover for her actual psychological harm suffered from the defendants' deliberate, wilful and retaliatory acts. Brewer v. Erwin, 287 Or. 435, 600 P.2d 398, 410, 411.

Or.1978. Cit. in diss. op.; com. (i) quot. in diss. op. The buyer of a used automobile brought an action against the dealer for damages resulting from the failure of the dealer to provide title to the car. Subsequent to the purchase, the car was stolen, "stripped," and "totaled," and the buyer's insurance company refused to pay the claim for the loss because of the buyer's inability to produce a certificate of title to the car. The lower court awarded the buyer compensatory and punitive damages and attorney's fees, and the dealer appealed, contending that there was no evidence under any standard for the award of punitive damages. The court held, inter alia, that, even under a test which included "gross negligence" and "recklessness," the evidence was insufficient to create a jury question as to whether, in representing to the buyer that title would be forthcoming, the dealer's conduct was such as to justify an award of punitive damages. The lower court's judgment was affirmed, except for the award of punitive damages and attorney's fees. The dissent noted that the dealer had in its possession neither a "duly assigned certificate of title" nor a "bill of sale from the registered owner" of the car at the time of its sale to the plaintiff. The dissent believed that if the trier of fact were to find that this conduct on the part of the dealer amounted to recklessness, the trier of fact should be permitted in its sole discretion to award punitive damages. Chamberlain v. Jim Fisher Motors, Inc., 282 Or. 229, 578 P.2d 1225, 1232.

Or.1978. Cit. in ftn.; illus. and coms. generally cit. in ftn. The plaintiff brought an action against the defendant, an operator of a towing company, for trespass to her automobile when the defendant towed away the plaintiff's car by mistake after being called by the police department to tow away a different car. The court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment, and the plaintiff appealed. The plaintiff contended that the trial court erred in granting the motion because, in every trespass case, the plaintiff is entitled to at least nominal damages and, where a basis of liability exists, recovery may be had for mental suffering. The court held that the owner of the car was not entitled to recover for mental suffering and anguish unaccompanied by physical injury or loss of property. The judgment of the lower court was affirmed. Melton v. Allen, 282 Or. 731, 580 P.2d 1019, 1022.

Or.1977. Coms. (d) and (e) quot. in part in cases quot. in sup. Plaintiff brought an action against a collection agency to recover damages for defendant's alleged outrageous conduct. The court affirmed a judgment for plaintiff, holding, inter alia, that evidence that plaintiff, a blind woman, despite her statements that she had made arrangements to pay her bill to an eye clinic in installments, was subjected to a number of phone calls over a nine-day period in which she was referred to as "scum" and "deadbeat," and was the subject of profanity and other abuses by an agent of defendant, and consequently suffered emotional distress and headaches which caused her to be hospitalized, was sufficient to support a verdict for plaintiff, and, therefore, the trial court did not err in denying defendant's motion for a directed verdict. Turman v. Central Billing Bureau Inc., 279 Or. 443, 568 P.2d 1382, 1384.

Or.1972. Com. (j) cit. in ftn. in sup. The plaintiff brought this action against the defendant telephone company for emotional distress resulting from defendant's erroneous listing, in an advertisement in the yellow pages, of plaintiff's residential phone number as an after hours telephone number for a floral shop. On defendant's appeal from a judgment for plaintiff, the court affirmed the judgment and held that evidence of numerous calls to plaintiff during the late evening hours, resulting in an unreasonable invasion of plaintiff's right to enjoy property without unreasonable interference, established a nuisance, warranting imposition of liability upon defendant for plaintiff's mental distress, even though unaccompanied by physical injuries. Macca v. General Telephone Co. of Northwest Inc., 262 Or. 414, 495 P.2d 1193, 1196.

Or.1971. Cit. but question not reached in maj. op.; cit. in sup. in con. op.; quot. in sup., com (d). quot. in sup. in diss. op. Plaintiff brought an action against the defendant for damages sustained as a result of an alleged scheme to defraud him. Although the case was argued on appeal on the theory of extreme and outrageous conduct, the court refused to decide the issue because it was not argued before the trial court. The concurrence would have decided the issue and would have held that conduct intended to defraud was not sufficiently outrageous to be a cause of action on this theory. The dissent would have also decided the issue, but would have held that the defendant's attempt to wrongfully force the plaintiff to pay him money was sufficiently outrageous to state a cause of action. Chaney v. Fields Chevrolet Co., 258 Or. 606, 484 P.2d 824, 827, 828, 834.

Or.1971. Quot. in sup.; coms. (j), (k), cit. in sup.; com. (d) quot. but dist. Plaintiff appealed a nonsuit entered for defendant physician in her action to recover for alleged severe emotional distress caused by defendant's alleged outrageous conduct. In reviewing plaintiff's evidence, the court found that there was sufficient support from the record to submit the issue of outrageous conduct to the jury, inasmuch as the plaintiff and her baby, automobile accident victims, were treated rudely by the defendant, improperly diagnosed, and forced to wait in sub-freezing weather outside of the defendant's office after he refused to properly examine them. Rockhill v. Pollard, 259 Or. 54, 485 P.2d 28, 29, 31, 32.

Or.1970. Cit. but not fol. Plaintiff recovered general and punitive damages for emotion distress incurred as a result of defendant's conversion of his truck. Defendant, or an employee, had altered the date of a note in order to foreclose a lien on plaintiff. The court affirmed, holding that in a case where both parties assumed that plaintiff was entitled to recover for mental anguish and humiliation, if liability was established and damages proven satisfactorily to a jury, in an action for conversion, testimony as to plaintiff's mental and physical condition at the time, as to personal and family problems, and as to subsequent psychiatric care was admissible on the issue of mental anguish. The court refused to reverse for failure to sustain objections to such testimony where the objections were of a general nature only. Mays v. Carner, 476 P.2d 794, 796.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Or.1969. Coms. (d) and (e) quot. in sup. and also disc. of hist. of dev.of s 46. The issue here is whether an involuntary nonsuit of plaintiff was proper. Plaintiff had been in a mental hospital in 1960. As a result to a dispute between plaintiff and certain police officer, plaintiff was recommitted to a mental hospital. Plaintiff brought on an action against the police officer for the insults to him, which resulted in the dispute causing him to be returned to the mental hospital, on the basis that one who by extreme and outrageous conduct intentionally and recklessly caused severe emotional distress to another is subject to liability for such emotional distress. The court here stated liability is only found when the conduct has been so outrageous as to be regarded as atrocious by the average member of the community. Although one who, without a privilege to do so, intentionally causes severe emotional distress to another is liable, the issue is, how severe the distress. The court held, even if there was some evidence here of conduct unbecoming a peace officer, it was not actionable as not sufficiently outrageous. Pakos v. Clark, 253 Or. 682, 453 P.2d 682, 687, 688, 691.

Or.App.

Or.App.2023. Com. (j) cit. and quot. in sup. Elected school board officials brought an action against parents of students under state anti-doxing statute, alleging that plaintiffs suffered severe emotional distress after defendants disclosed information regarding plaintiffs' employers in private social media groups. The trial court denied defendants' special motion to strike. This court reversed and remanded, holding that plaintiffs failed to make a prima-facie case that the severe emotional distress they suffered as a result of defendants' disclosures was reasonable under state anti-doxing statutes. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment j, the court could not find that a reasonable person under these circumstances would suffer severe emotional distress, given that plaintiffs had previously publicized where they worked. DeHart v. Tofte, 533 P.3d 829, 846.

Or.App.2023. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. Former patient brought, among other things, an intentional-infliction of emotional distress (IIED) claim against former physician, alleging that defendant terminated the parties' physician-patient relationship and mistakenly sent automated messages to plaintiff for scheduling appointments despite termination of the relationship. The trial court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment. This court affirmed in part, holding that defendant's conduct was not sufficiently extreme or outrageous to sustain an IIED claim. The court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, in defining extreme and outrageous conduct and explained that defendant's failure to follow internal policies by failing to issue additional warnings before terminating the parties' relationship on the ground that plaintiff abused painkillers, as well as its failure to stop its automated messages from being sent to plaintiff after the termination of the parties' relationship, were not extraordinary transgressions of the bounds of socially-tolerable conduct. Wecker v. Salem Clinic, P.C., 529 P.3d 991, 996.

Or.App.2015. Com. (i) quot. in case quot. in sup. Corrections officer brought claims for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress against television station and reporter, alleging that defendants showed plaintiff in a television news report about gunshots fired in his neighborhood despite his telling reporter of his safety concerns about revealing his address due to his work and reporter's agreement not to use his image. The trial court denied defendants' special motion to strike plaintiff's tort claims under the state anti-SLAPP statute. This court reversed and remanded, holding that plaintiff failed to show a probability that he would prevail on his claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because there was no evidence that defendants desired or intended to cause him emotional distress. While Restatement Second of Torts § 46 provided that the element of intent could depend on whether a defendant knew that emotional distress was certain, or substantially certain, to result from his or her conduct, plaintiff had not presented evidence that the person or persons responsible for broadcasting the footage knew that depicting plaintiff would result in plaintiff's severe emotional distress. Mullen v. Meredith Corp., 353 P.3d 598, 607.

Or.App.2010. Cit. in ftn. Petitioner sought a permanent stalking protective order (SPO) pursuant to Oregon's civil-stalking statute, alleging that former co-worker had engaged in repeated unwanted contact with her that caused her reasonable apprehension regarding her safety. Affirming the trial court's entry of an SPO, this court held that co-worker was not constitutionally entitled to a jury trial. The court reasoned that a statutory claim for civil stalking was not "of like nature" to those causes of action, like the common-law torts of assault and battery, for which a jury trial was guaranteed at the time that the Oregon Constitution was adopted. While co-worker also referred to the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress, the court declined to address that tort, since it was not recognized at common law at the time that the Oregon Constitution was adopted. Foster v. Miramontes, 236 Or.App. 381, 388, 236 P.3d 782, 787.

Or.App.2008. Com. (d) quot. in sup. and cit. in case quot. in sup., coms. (g) and (h) quot. in sup., com. (i) quot. and adopted in case cit. in conc. op. Individual who was excluded from university campus for stalking university employee sued employee, university, and others for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that, as a matter of law, employee's conduct in reporting the unwanted contacts to university was not extreme and outrageous as required by this tort, even though some portions of the complaint were false or incomplete; additionally, the conduct of university, which employed ordinary means to deal with the complaint, was also not extreme or outrageous. The concurring opinion maintained that, while a jury could find the filing of a false report of stalking to be an extraordinary transgression of socially tolerable conduct, there was no evidence here that defendants intended to cause plaintiff severe emotional distress. House v. Hicks, 218 Or.App. 348, 358, 359, 368, 179 P.3d 730, 736, 737, 742.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Or.App.2008. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (j) cit. and quot. in disc. Employee sued employer, asserting claims for workers' compensation discrimination and intentional infliction of severe emotional distress. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for employee on the emotional-distress claim. Affirming, this court held that the trial court did not err in concluding that employee adduced sufficient evidence to send that claim to the jury; employee's co-worker's acts did not necessarily cross the line of outrageousness when taken individually, but given employee's injured condition, as well as the persistent and repetitive nature of the demeaning treatment by several co-workers and its duration over five months, a jury could find the conduct as a whole to be intolerable. Schoen v. Freightliner LLC, 224 Or.App. 613, 625, 627, 199 P.3d 332, 340, 341.

Or.App.2005. Com. (j) cit. in disc. Guardian for his disabled brother sued church congregation and church elder and his wife for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that elder and wife, while acting under congregation's direction and control, coerced brother to bring guardianship action to have plaintiff removed as guardian by convincing him that plaintiff stole money from him, abused and neglected him, and was Satan's instrument. On remand, trial court granted defendants summary judgment. This court reversed in part and remanded, holding, inter alia, that fact issues existed as to whether plaintiff suffered severe emotional distress due to charges that he neglected his brother and the pursuit of guardianship action. Checkley v. Boyd, 198 Or.App. 110, 107 P.3d 651, 664.

Or.App.2002. Cit. in disc., quot. in ftn., subsecs. (1), (2), and (2)(a) cit. in disc., com. (i) quot. in case quot. in disc. Patient's former husband sued professional counselor and clinical psychologist for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging severe emotional distress as a collateral consequence of the counseling relationship between patient and defendants. The trial court granted defendants summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that the complaint did not plead sufficiently egregious conduct to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court declined to resolve the question of whether third-party claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress generally should be acknowledged in Oregon, or whether, if such a claim were acknowledged, Oregon should adopt a “presence” requirement. Delaney v. Clifton, 180 Or.App. 119, 125-127, 130, 132, 41 P.3d 1099, 1104-1106, 1108.

Or.App.2001. Cit. in disc. Husband sued wife's paramour for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Trial court granted paramour summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that paramour's conduct in entering extramarital relationship that resulted in a pregnancy did not constitute extraordinary transgression of bounds of socially tolerable conduct so as to support plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Rosenthal v. Erven, 172 Or.App. 20, 23, 17 P.3d 558, 560.

Or.App.2000. Quot. in disc., com. (j) cit. in disc. Guardian ad litem brought, inter alia, claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress and wrongful use of civil proceedings against religious congregation and its members, alleging that defendants coerced guardian's disabled brother into filing guardianship proceeding against him. Trial court dismissed guardian's claim. Reversing in part and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that guardian's complaint satisfied outrageousness element of emotional-distress claim where defendants manipulated brother and falsely accused guardian of neglecting, abusing, and stealing from brother. Checkley v. Boyd, 170 Or.App. 721, 14 P.3d 81, 89, 95.

Or.App.1999. Com. (i) quot. in case quot. in disc. School bus driver sued parents of student passengers, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, arising from the parents' false allegations to the school board that the driver had sexually molested students. Trial court entered judgment on jury verdict for plaintiff. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that defendants' conduct was so extraordinary that a reasonable jury could have found it to be beyond all bounds of socially tolerable conduct. Based on its duration and intensity, the jury could have inferred that plaintiff's distress was severe. Kraemer v. Harding, 159 Or.App. 90, 976 P.2d 1160, 1173.

Or.App.1999. Com. (i) quot. in case quot. in sup. Employee of group home for individuals with developmental disabilities sued home for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that facility was liable for house manager's failure to come to employee's assistance after one of the residents attempted to strangle her. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiff. Reversing the trial court's order of remittitur of punitive damages but otherwise affirming, this court held that the jury was entitled to infer from the circumstances surrounding manager's refusal to come to employee's aid that he acted with the deliberate intent of causing her emotional injury, that manager's behavior was such as to transcend all bounds of socially tolerable conduct, and that the preremittitur award of punitive damages was not excessive. MacCrone v. Edwards Center, Inc., 160 Or.App. 91, 980 P.2d 1156, 1160.

Or.App.1998. Cit. in headnote, quot. in disc. Physically disabled bus passenger sued metropolitan transportation district for intentional infliction of emotional distress after bus driver allegedly belittled, berated, and insulted her, questioned her right to bring an assistance dog on the bus, and suggested that she was just pretending to be disabled in order to pay a reduced fare. The trial court granted defendant's motion for judgment on the pleadings. Reversing and remanding, this court held that the complaint, which included allegations of a public servant's harassment of an individual based on that individual's status as a disabled person, stated a claim sufficient to survive a motion for judgment on the pleadings. Williams v. Tri-County Met. Transp. Dist., 153 Or.App. 686, 958 P.2d 202, 204.

Or.App.1995. Com. (e) cit. generally in headnotes and quot. in sup. Apartment resident brought an action for intention infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, against police officers and an employee of an investigations company, arising from employee's failed attempt to serve a summons and complaint and from police officers' ensuing actions in permitting employee to enter the apartment and verbally assault the residents. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding plaintiff damages. Affirming in part, this court held, inter alia, that defendant officers' conduct in permitting the employee's unlawful entry, notwithstanding plaintiff's objections and the officers' knowledge of an earlier altercation, and in standing by and doing nothing while the employee verbally abused plaintiff and his family in their home was so extraordinary as to warrant tort liability. Mauri v. Smith, 135 Or.App. 662, 676, 901 P.2d 247, 249, 256.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Or.App.1994. Com. (d) quot. in part in sup. Plaintiff sued defendant for intentional infliction of emotional distress after defendant intentionally ordered several magazine subscriptions in plaintiff's name by forging plaintiff's signature on the order forms. This court affirmed the trial court's dismissal for failure to state a claim, holding that, even if defendant's conduct of signing his name on magazine subscription forms was a felony under state law, it was not the type of conduct that constituted an extraordinary transgression of the bounds of socially tolerable behavior. Shay v. Paulson, 131 Or.App. 270, 884 P.2d 870, 872.

Or.App.1993. Cit. and quot. in cases cit. in disc., quot. in ftn. Defendant who was convicted of first-degree rape and sodomy for engaging in sexual intercourse with a female child under the age of 12 appealed the trial court's order that he make restitution, as part of his sentence, to the child's mother for her counseling costs. Vacating the restitution order and remanding for resentencing, this court held that since the state presented no theory of civil liability under which the mother could recover her counseling costs from defendant, she was not a "victim" under the applicable statute and was not entitled to restitution. The court rejected the state's argument that the mother could recover those expenses in an action against defendant for intentional infliction of emotional distress, noting that the state supreme court had left undecided the issue of whether a plaintiff might recover damages for emotional distress from a defendant who engaged in conduct directed at a third person. State v. Carrillo, 125 Or.App. 52, 865 P.2d 379, 381.

Or.App.1984. Cit. generally in ftn. State appealed trial court's order sustaining defendant's demurrer to complaint alleging racial intimidation and harassment. This court affirmed, finding that harassment statute, which prohibited abusive or obscene language, violated free speech provision of state constitution. The court noted that state constitution did not preclude a civil action for abusive speech, such as an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. State v. Harrington, 67 Or.App. 608, 680 P.2d 666, 670, review denied 297 Or. 547, 685 P.2d 998 (1984).

Or.App.1982. Com. (d) quot. in ftn. and cit. in disc. The plaintiff, a former member of a religious organization, brought this action against the religious corporation and others to recover for intentional infliction of emotional harm and for fraud. The plaintiff's cause of action for outrageous conduct alleged a scheme to gain control of her mind and to force her into a life of service to the defendants, and a course of retaliatory conduct after the plaintiff disassociated herself from the defendants. The plaintiff's fraud cause of action alleged 14 misrepresentations which induced her to pay some $3,000 to the defendants. The jury awarded the plaintiff compensatory and punitive damages on both causes of action. On appeal, the defendants argued, inter alia, that there was not sufficient evidence of outrageous conduct or resultant severe emotional distress to have permitted the case to go to the jury. This court reversed, holding that the defendants' motion for a directed verdict on the cause of action for outrageous conduct should have been granted, because there was nothing in the record which constituted conduct beyond the limits of social toleration. This court noted that there was no evidence that the plaintiff was threatened or forced to remain in Scientology, that her recruitment and indoctrination were not so very different from methods used by any number of organizations, and that the drills the plaintiff was subjected to were not in themselves outrageous. The fraud cause of action was reversed as to two of the defendants and reversed and remanded for a new trial as to the third defendant. Christofferson v. Church of Scientology, Etc., 57 Or.App. 203, 644 P.2d 577, 584, review denied 293 Or. 483, 650 P.2d 928 (1982), certiorari denied 459 U.S. 1206, 103 S.Ct. 1196, 75 L.Ed.2d 439 (1983), certiorari denied 459 U.S. 1227, 103 S.Ct. 1234, 75 L.Ed.2d 468 (1983).

Or.App.1982. Com. (j) cit. in case quot. in disc. and cit. in case quot. in conc. and diss. op. The plaintiff brought suit against the defendant, seeking recovery for damages to his real property caused by a fire allegedly resulting from the defendant's negligence in installing insulation in direct contact with the fluepipe of a woodstove in the plaintiff's residence. The plaintiff also sought to recover damages for mental distress arising out of the defendant's alleged negligence. The trial court dismissed the action and the plaintiff appealed. On appeal, the plaintiff contended that the trial court erred in striking the plaintiff's allegation of mental distress from his complaint. This court stated that while a plaintiff need not plead more than he must prove, he must at least plead that which he must prove for a minimum to recover damages for emotional distress. The court found that the plaintiff pleaded only negligently caused damage to his property, and no facts from which it could be inferred that the defendant's conduct amounted to a private nuisance of the type allowing recovery for mental distress. Therefore, the court declined to extend the recovery of damages for mental distress to this particular case. The court affirmed in part and reversed and remanded in part, holding that the trial court should not have dismissed the plaintiff's remaining claim for damages. The concurring and dissenting justice argued that the plaintiff alleged more than damage to his property and concluded that the plaintiff should have had an opportunity to present evidence in support of his mental distress claim. Meyer v. 4-D Insulation Co., Inc., 60 Or.App. 70, 652 P.2d 852, 855, 861.

Or.App.1981. Com. (j) cit. in ftn. in sup. The plaintiff worked as a part-time checker at the defendant store. The defendant customer entered the plaintiff's lane and the plaintiff began to ring up the items. There was a dispute as to one item, so the customer left the check-out lane to locate the item and the plaintiff moved her merchandise and voided the receipt. The plaintiff had begun to check out other customers when the defendant customer returned and accused the plaintiff of stealing the twenty dollars she had left on her merchandise. The store manager questioned the plaintiff, counted the money in her register and eventually demanded that the plaintiff submit to a strip search. The defendant customer was irate throughout the incident and other persons in the store gathered and watched the plaintiff. It appeared ultimately that the defendant customer had been mistaken. The next day the store implemented a procedure which the plaintiff felt was being used to watch her, and she quit at the end of her shift. The plaintiff brought a tort action for outrageous conduct against the defendants. The lower court granted the defendants' motions for summary judgment. This court stated that the plaintiff would have to prove that she suffered severe emotional distress. The court stated that in this case it was not unreasonable to expect that a shy, modest, young woman who had been put in the plaintiff's position would suffer the effects that she claimed, and that her distress was more than that which a person might reasonably be expected to pay as the price for living among people. The lower court's decision was reversed and the case remanded for trial. Bodewig v. K-Mart, Inc., 54 Or.App. 480, 635 P.2d 657, 662.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Or.App.1981. Com. cit. generally in disc. Landlords brought an action for forcible entry and detainer and the tenants counterclaimed for landlords' alleged outrageous conduct in attempting to evict them. The lower court entered judgment on a verdict in favor of the tenants on their counterclaim and the landlords appealed. This court stated that in order to recover on the counterclaim for intentional infliction of mental distress, the tenants must show that the landlords' conduct was deliberately aimed at harassing and distressing the tenants and exceeded the level of offensive conduct which a person should be expected to endure under contemporary societal standards. The court held, inter alia, that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the findings that the landlords had attempted to harass the tenants into surrendering their leaseholds and that the landlords acted beyond the bounds of societally tolerable conduct in their attempt to evict the tenants. The judgment of the lower court was affirmed. Fitzpatrick v. Robbins, 51 Or.App. 597, 626 P.2d 910, 913.

Or.App.1979. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup. Owner of an automobile brought action against garage, from which automobile had been stolen and damaged, to recover for the cost of repairs, loss of use of the vehicle, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered judgment on the verdict in favor of the owner for the cost of repair, but struck the cause of action for emotional distress and refused to submit to the jury the issue of compensation for loss of use of the automobile, and the automobile owner appealed. The court held, inter alia, that the owner was entitled to recover for the loss of use of the vehicle during the time that it was being repaired, but not for the time during which she delayed authorizing repairs, and that the complaint failed to state a basis for recovery for emotional distress, since it did not allege facts that showed that defendant's conduct was outrageous in the extreme. Graf v. Don Rasmussen Co., 39 Or.App. 311, 592 P.2d 250, 256.

Pa.

Pa.2010. Cit. in sup. After an accident in which a hose from a fire engine struck two ten-year-old bystanders, killing one and injuring the other, bystanders' family members brought strict-products-liability claims against successors of the fire engine's manufacturer. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding damages for bystanders' injuries and wrongful death and for emotional distress suffered by family members who witnessed the accident. The court of appeals affirmed. Affirming in part, this court held that the trial court did not err in its instruction to the jury concerning the product-line exception to the rule against successor liability. The court stated in dicta that, for purposes of a strict-products-liability claim, a plaintiff's recovery for emotional distress was limited to that which was proximately caused by contemporaneous physical impact. Schmidt v. Boardman Co., 608 Pa. 327, 11 A.3d 924, 951.

Pa.2000. Quot. in sup., cit. in conc. op., subsec. (1) cit. in ftn. to conc. op., subsec. (2) cit. in sup. and in conc. op., com. (l) quot. in sup. and cit. in conc. op. After a teenage girl died while being treated for pneumonia at a hospital, her parents sued the hospital and two doctors for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Trial court entered judgment on jury verdict awarding plaintiff mother damages for emotional distress. Appellate court vacated in part and remanded for new trial, but it upheld trial court's denial of one doctor's motion for judgment n.o.v. on the emotional-distress claim. This court reversed in part, holding that inasmuch as mother had no contemporaneous observation of the tort allegedly committed to her child, recovery on the theory of liability set forth in Restatement (Second) of Torts § 46(2) was barred. Concurring opinion agreed that presence was required to pursue the severe emotional distress tort, and it observed that mother could not ascertain from her position in the waiting room that a pediatrician, rather than a cardiologist, performed the catheterization. Taylor v. Albert Einstein Medical Center, 562 Pa. 176, 754 A.2d 650, 650-655.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Pa.1998. Cit. in headnotes, cit. in disc., cit. in ftn., subsec. (1) quot. in disc., quot. in conc. and diss. op., com. (d) quot. in disc., quot. in conc. and diss. op. Female employee sued former supervisor and employer for violations of the Pennsylvania Human Relations Act (Act). Plaintiff also asserted a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with supervisor's sexually abusive behavior. The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff, but the trial court entered judgment n.o.v. The intermediate appellate court vacated the jury's award of punitive damages under the Act and reversed as to supervisor's liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming and remanding, this court held that punitive damages were not available under the Act; that consideration of retaliatory conduct was but one factor to be used in assessing liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress; and that, in this case, supervisor's conduct was not extreme or outrageous. Concurring and dissenting opinion believed that supervisor's actions, which included using sexually explicit language and profanity and posting inappropriate photographs and other materials in the workplace, were utterly intolerable in civilized society. Hoy v. Angelone, 554 Pa. 134, 720 A.2d 745, 746, 753-755. See above case.

Pa.1987. Cit. but not fol., cit. in conc. op., subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in disc., coms. (h) and (j) quot. in conc. op. A husband and wife sued a cemetery for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that the cemetery failed to care for the gravesites of their deceased children and that it demanded payments in addition to the purchase price of the plots. The trial court granted the defendant's motion for a compulsory nonsuit. Affirming, this court held that the plaintiffs could not recover because they had presented no medical evidence concerning their alleged emotional distress, reasoning that the requirement of some objective proof did not present an unsurmountable obstacle to recovery. One concurring justice rejected a per se rule requiring competent medical evidence to prove severe emotional distress in all cases. Another concurring justice expressly rejected the tort; a third concurring justice argued that the defendant's conduct was not sufficiently outrageous to support a claim for damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Kazatsky v. King David Memorial Park, 515 Pa. 183, 527 A.2d 988, 988, 991-993, 995-997.

Pa.1981. Subsec. (1) cit. and quot. in ftn. The plaintiff's insured motor boat and outboard motor were damaged by a severe storm. The plaintiff filed a complaint seeking, inter alia, damages for emotional distress and punitive damages for the defendant insurer's bad faith conduct in denying the insured's claim. The lower court dismissed the count in trespass and the plaintiff appealed. This court held that the Unfair Insurance Practices Act served to deter bad faith conduct and applied not only to the plaintiff's attempt to recover punitive damages but also to his claim for emotional distress. The court therefore affirmed. D'Ambrosio v. Pa. Nat. Mut. Cas. Ins. Co., 494 Pa. 501, 431 A.2d 966, 971.

Pa.1970. Cit. in sup. The plaintiff parents filed a trespass action for mental anguish allegedly caused by defendant's intentional action of withholding and burying the body of their son after one of the defendants had hit the son with a car. The court held that plaintiffs stated a cause of action because the law now allows recovery for mental anguish alone. Papieves v. Lawrence, 437 Pa. 373, 263 A.2d 118, 121.

Pa.Super.

Pa.Super.2022. Com. (d) cit. in sup. After student-athlete's pro se medical-malpractice claims were dismissed with prejudice, plaintiff filed an amended complaint asserting, among other things, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against university and university officials, alleging that defendants failed to correctly diagnose an infection in plaintiff's knee caused by injuries sustained in university football activities. The trial court sustained defendants' preliminary objection, holding that plaintiff failed to allege a claim for IIED under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, because defendants' conduct in declining to provide transportation for plaintiff but offering to reimburse his transportation costs did not amount to the level of extreme outrageousness necessary to sustain a claim for IIED. This court affirmed and adopted the trial court's opinion for purposes of appellate review. Jordan v. Pennsylvania State University, 276 A.3d 751, 775.

Pa.Super.2019. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup.; coms. (f) and (h) cit. in case quot. in sup.; illus. 4 quot. in sup., quot. in case quot. in sup. Customer of a pizza restaurant sued restaurant and its employee, alleging, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with an incident in which employee repeatedly called customer, who was African American, a "nigger" after he asked for a refund for a burnt pizza. The trial court sustained restaurant and employee's preliminary objections. Affirming, this court held that the trial court did not err in finding that the use of a racial slur in an argument was not enough to establish extreme and outrageous conduct that gave rise to liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, particularly given that this was not a case involving continuous malicious actions or a special relationship between the parties. John v. Philadelphia Pizza Team, Inc., 209 A.3d 380, 383-385.

Pa.Super.2012. Cit. in ftn., subsec. (2) quot. in sup. and cit. in ftn., com. (h) quot. in case quot. in ftn. Son of deceased patient sued hospital, among others, for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, alleging that, although hospital knew that he did not want any post-mortem operations performed on his father's body, hospital, without his knowledge or permission, transferred the body to medical school, where he was unable to locate it for several days; plaintiff further averred that, when the body was located, he and his family suffered mental and emotional distress through viewing disfiguring scars to decedent's face, head, and torso, and evidence that the brain had been removed or operated on. The trial court dismissed. Affirming, this court held that, while factfinders could reasonably disagree as to whether hospital's conduct was "outrageous," plaintiff did not sufficiently plead a claim for IIED, because he was not present when the allegedly tortious conduct that caused his severe distress occurred. Weiley v. Albert Einstein Medical Center, 51 A.3d 202, 216, 217.

Pa.Super.2009. Cit. in ftn., quot. in case quot. in ftn. Parents of son who sustained injuries at birth sued hospital's insurer, insurer's attorney's and attorney's law firm for abuse of process, alleging that defendants improperly filed a petition for appointment of a guardian ad litem over son while the parties were negotiating a settlement of parents' underlying suit against hospital. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. Reversing and remanding, this court held that plaintiffs were not required to present medical documentation of distress-related symptoms or evidence of a physical impact in order to establish that they sustained emotional harm; while such evidence was necessary to establish emotional harm for emotional-distress claims—where the emotional harm itself constituted the cause of action—it was not necessary for abuse-of-process claims, which relied for their impetus on the filing of a docketed action, petition, or other legal modality. Cruz v. Princeton Ins. Co., 972 A.2d 14, 18.

Pa.Super.2008. Cit. in sup., cit. in case quot. in ftn., subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in sup. Patient brought professional negligence action against physician and others, alleging that defendants failed to properly read pelvic ultrasound examinations performed during her pregnancy that should have revealed profound fetal anomalies, including limb deformities, suffered by her unborn son, which she only discovered, first hand, upon his birth. The trial court sustained defendants' preliminary objections. Affirming in part, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because she did not supply any factual allegations to support a legal conclusion of recklessness or intentional acts by defendants. Toney v. Chester County Hosp., 961 A.2d 192, 201, 203.

Pa.Super.2007. Cit. in case quot. in ftn. (general cite), subsec. (1) cit. in ftn. and adopted, com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. After college determined that student had plagiarized a classmate's work, student sued college, professor, and classmates for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court dismissed the case. Affirming, this court held that plaintiff's allegations that defendants intentionally and wrongly accused her of violations of the college's honor code, despite their knowledge of the falsity of the allegations, and that college and professor acted to deprive her of her rights to a fair and impartial hearing did not describe behavior rising to the requisite level of clearly desperate and ultra extreme conduct. While noting that the Pennsylvania Supreme Court had not formally adopted Restatement Second of Torts § 46, this court named § 46(1) as the appropriate legal standard to be applied in reviewing a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Reardon v. Allegheny College, 926 A.2d 477, 487, 488.

Pa.Super.2005. Cit. in ftn., cit. in case cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Husband brought claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress and professional negligence against ex-wife's therapist, alleging that therapist, who was treating ex-wife before the marriage was consummated, had a duty to warn husband that ex-wife would not be able to commit to the relationship. Trial court dismissed complaint. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that, as to plaintiff's intentional-infliction-of-emotional-distress claim, plaintiff failed to show that therapist's actions rose to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct that went beyond all possible bounds of decency and would be considered intolerable in a civilized society. Swisher v. Pitz, 2005 PA Super 56, 868 A.2d 1228, 1231.

Pa.Super.2001. Cit. in disc. and ftn., cit. in case cit. in disc. Husband sued wife's lover for interference with contractual relations and conspiracy. This court affirmed trial court's dismissal, holding that there was no basis for plaintiff's claims, as tort claims based upon enabling or consorting with an unfaithful spouse in derogation of duties of marital fidelity were not actionable. The court distinguished a prior case that asserted intentional interference with contractual rights, because that case relied on Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court stated that the tort of intentional interference with performance of contract by third persons, as embodied by Restatement Second of Torts § 766, was intended to reach commercial and employment contracts, not domestic contracts. Atkinson v. Evans, 787 A.2d 1033, 1035.

Pa.Super.2000. Cit. in disc. After a mentally ill truck driver fatally shot a homeowner and injured a motorist who gave him a ride, the motorist and the homeowner's widow sued the driver's employer for negligence, vicarious liability, and negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Trial court granted employer summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that plaintiffs' claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress failed, because employer did not engage in any extreme or outrageous conduct. Brezenski v. World Truck Transfer, Inc., 755 A.2d 36, 45.

Pa.Super.2000. Cit. and quot. in disc., com. (e) quot. in ftn. Employees sued county sheriff for defamation after sheriff provided deputies to accompany employer when he terminated employees. The trial court granted defendant summary judgment. Affirming, this court noted that since the Pennsylvania Supreme Court had not adopted certain portions of the Restatement Second of Torts, this court was not authorized to adopt new tort standards. Therefore, the court held that the sheriff's action in providing deputies to accompany employer when he terminated employees did not constitute defamation. D'Errico v. DeFazio, 763 A.2d 424, 434.

Pa.Super.2000. Cit. generally in ftn., subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. After mother who had been estranged from her son and daughter for 20 years sought a reconciliation with them and signed a power of attorney in favor of her son, the son used the power of attorney to close out his mother's bank accounts and take control of the funds. After mother confronted her children about these matters and was ejected from her daughter's house, she sued the children for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding plaintiff damages on this claim. Reversing in part and vacating the award, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff could not recover because she failed to present expert medical testimony that she suffered severe emotional distress. Paves v. Corson, 765 A.2d 1128, 1134, appeal granted in part 566 Pa. 213, 779 A.2d 1142 (2001).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Pa.Super.1999. Cit. in case cit. in disc. A political figure sued a newspaper and a publishing company, among others, for defamation and "false light" invasion of privacy. Trial court granted defendants summary judgment. This court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded, holding, inter alia, that expert medical testimony was necessary in order to show both the emotional distress itself and that the plaintiff's particular distress was the kind that normally resulted from the particular invasion of privacy. Wecht, M.D., J.D. v. PG Publishing Co., 725 A.2d 788, 791.

Pa.Super.1998. Cit. and quot. in disc., cit. in case quot. in disc., cit. in conc. and diss. op., subsec. (2) cit. in case cit. in sup. and cit. in conc. and diss. op., com. (l) quot. in ftn. to conc. and diss. op. Parents whose 16-year-old daughter died during a catheterization procedure in a hospital brought wrongful-death and survival actions against hospital, pediatrician, and cardiologist. Vacating the trial court's entry of judgment on a jury verdict against pediatrician and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that the trial court did not err in refusing to enter a judgment n.o.v. in pediatrician's favor as to the verdict based on intentional infliction of emotional distress, since whether mother suffered severe emotional distress as a result of pediatrician's outrageous conduct in disregarding her limitation of consent for performance of the procedure to cardiologist was for the jury to determine. The concurring and dissenting opinion argued that mother was not entitled to recover damages for emotional distress because she did not witness pediatrician's outrageous conduct in performing the procedure himself despite her lack of consent. Taylor v. Albert Einstein Medical Center, 723 A.2d 1027, 1038, 1040, 1041, reversed in part 562 Pa. 176, 754 A.2d 650 (Pa.2000). See above case.

Pa.Super.1997. Cit. in headnote, cit. but dist. Former supermarket employee sued former supervisor and supermarket for violations of the Pennsylvania Human Relations Act, alleging that supervisor created and subjected employee to a sexually hostile work environment. Employee also asserted a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for employee. Affirming in part and reversing in part the judgment against supermarket, and reversing the judgment against supervisor, this court held, inter alia, that supervisor created a sexually hostile work environment by groping employee, making lewd and suggestive comments, and posting sexually explicit photographs in the work area, and that supermarket knew or should have known of the situation; however, supervisor's conduct was not sufficiently egregious to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Hoy v. Angelone, 456 Pa.Super. 596, 691 A.2d 476, 478, 482, affirmed 554 Pa. 134, 720 A.2d 745 (1998).

Pa.Super.1996. Cit. in conc. op., subsec. (1) quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. and cit. in conc. op., com. (h) cit. in conc. op. A terminated safety director for a sanitation company sued the company and its owner for wrongful discharge and negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Trial court granted defendants summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that the fact that plaintiff was fired for embarrassing his employer and a customer was not shocking or outrageous. Furthermore, plaintiff failed to substantiate that he actually suffered the claimed distress with expert medical confirmation. Concurring opinion agreed that plaintiff's allegations that defendants harassed plaintiff concerning plaintiff's actions with regard to his duties as a safety director and that defendants expressed resentment and ill feelings towards plaintiff were insufficient to establish outrageous conduct. Hunger v. Grand Cent. Sanitation, 447 Pa.Super. 575, 670 A.2d 173, 177, 181, 182.

Pa.Super.1996. Cit. in headnote, subsec. (1) quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. generally in case quot. in disc., com. (h) quot. in disc. A college football coach who was fired after several players complained about the coach to school officials sued the college, school administrators, and three of the complaining players for intentional infliction of emotional distress and intentional interference with contractual relations, among other claims. Trial court granted defendants summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because the conduct of the players, in expressing concerns about their coach to the college administration, was not extreme and outrageous conduct. Small v. Juniata College, 452 Pa.Super. 410, 682 A.2d 350, 351, 355.

Pa.Super.1995. Cit. in disc., subsec. (1) quot. but dist. Woman who confided to psychotherapist that she suffocated her four-month-old son sued psychotherapist, among others, for, inter alia, infliction of emotional distress, claiming that psychotherapist caused her severe emotional suffering by disclosing the information to the authorities. The trial court dismissed the complaint and this court affirmed. Since plaintiff did not specify whether she was alleging negligent or intentional infliction of emotional distress, the court analyzed the facts under both standards and held that, because there was no physical impact, plaintiff had not shown negligent infliction, and, because psychotherapist's actions were not extreme or outrageous, plaintiff had not proven intentional infliction either. Fewell v. Besner, 444 Pa.Super. 559, 664 A.2d 577, 581, 581-582.

Pa.Super.1995. Cit. in sup., subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in sup. Employee who was reprimanded and demoted for arriving late to work as a result of stopping to administer emergency medical treatment to an automobile-accident victim sued supervisors, among others, for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming the trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendants, this court held, inter alia, that defendants' conduct in screaming at plaintiff for being late, telling him that he would have to choose between being an emergency medical technician and his employment, reprimanding him, and demoting him to an entry-level position did not rise to the level of outrageousness required to permit recovery for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Snyder v. Speciality Glass Products, Inc., 441 Pa.Super. 613, 658 A.2d 366, 374, 375.

Pa.Super.1994. Cit. in cases cit. in disc. Mobile-home-park owners brought an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, against neighbor who had filed suit in equity against planning commission to enjoin it from approving application of plaintiffs to expand their mobile-home park. Affirming in part and reversing in part the trial court's dismissal of the case, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiffs failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Pennsylvania law, since they failed to allege physical injury. Hart v. O'Malley, 436 Pa.Super. 151, 647 A.2d 542, 553, 554.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Pa.Super.1994. Cit. in case cit. in ftn., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Doctor sued professional corporation that formerly employed him, alleging tortious interference with contract and intentional infliction of emotional distress. He asserted that he was underpaid and wrongfully discharged, and that the corporation and its officers had wrongfully excluded him from the activities and revenues of corporation and eventually from the practice of medicine as corporation's employee. Affirming in part the trial court's dismissal, this court held, inter alia, that none of the allegations contained in plaintiff's complaint described conduct approaching the type of behavior that might give rise to liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress, since this case involved a straightforward business and contractual dispute. Zikria v. Ass'n of T. & C. Surgeons, 432 Pa.Super. 248, 637 A.2d 1367, 1370.

Pa.Super.1993. Cit. but dist., cit. in case quot. in ftn., cit. in ftn. Wife sued hospital for negligent infliction of emotional distress after defendant erroneously informed her that her husband had been injured in a serious accident. Reversing the trial court's denial of defendant's motion for judgment n.o.v., this court held that, although plaintiff's allegation of loss of continence, depression, nightmares, and insomnia adequately alleged physical injury as required to support a negligent infliction of emotional distress claim, she was not a bystander entitled to recover, since she was not related to the actual victim of the accident and had no contemporaneous perception of the accident. Armstrong v. Paoli Memorial Hosp., 430 Pa.Super. 36, 43, 49, 633 A.2d 605, 608, 611.

Pa.Super.1993. Cit. in case quot. in sup., subsec. (1) quot. in sup. Student sued college he was attending and one of his teachers for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that teacher did everything in his power to sabotage plaintiff's reputation and academic career after plaintiff objected to an exercise in teacher's "Gender Stereotyping" course as being improper. Affirming the trial court's granting of defendants' preliminary objections to plaintiff's emotional distress claim, this court held that the facts were insufficient to support plaintiff's claim and that plaintiff's failure to allege that teacher's conduct caused him to seek medical treatment required dismissal of the claim. Britt v. Chestnut Hill College, 429 Pa.Super. 263, 272, 632 A.2d 557, 561.

Pa.Super.1993. Cit. and quot. in disc., cit. in case quot. in diss. op., com. (d) cit. in disc. and in diss. op., coms. (e) and (h) cit. in disc., com. (j) cit. and quot. in disc. Employee sued employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that employer sexually harassed her repeatedly. Jury found for employee on emotional distress claim, but trial court granted employer's motion for judgment n.o.v. on the ground that employee had not sustained her burden of proof as to damages because she failed to introduce expert medical testimony. Reversing and remanding, this court held that expert medical testimony was not required under the facts of this case. The court noted that certain cases of intentional infliction of emotional distress required expert testimony, but the suffering of fright, humiliation, embarrassment, and loss of self-esteem in this case was within the average juror's understanding. Dissent argued that expert testimony was required because mental anguish was not easily identified, and because the Pennsylvania Supreme Court previously held that expert testimony was required. Hackney v. Woodring, 424 Pa.Super. 96, 622 A.2d 286, 288, 290-292, reversed ___ Pa. ___, 652 A.2d 291 (1994).

Pa.Super.1993. Cit. in disc., cit. in diss. op. (erron. cit. in diss. op. as § 646), subsec. (1) cit. in disc., subsec. (2) cit. in sup. and in ftn., com. (l) cit. and quot. in disc. and quot. in ftn. to diss. op., com. (d) quot. in disc., caveat to com. (l) cit. in diss. op. An altar boy and his parents sued a priest, their church, and their diocese for damages resulting from alleged sexual abuse of the boy by the priest. This court affirmed a dismissal of the parents' claims, holding, inter alia, that the parents, who were not present at the time of the abuse, could not recover for intentional infliction of emotional distress. A dissent argued that the priest's conduct was so outrageous as to obviate the requirement of presence for the parents' emotional distress claim. Johnson v. Caparelli, 425 Pa.Super. 404, 410-412, 415-417, 625 A.2d 668, 671-674.

Pa.Super.1993. Cit. in disc., cit. in case quot. in disc., subsec. (1) quot. in disc., subsecs. (2)(a) and (2)(b) cit. and quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Claiming that veterinarian viciously beat a dog to death because he was having difficulty getting dog out of recovery room, veterinary assistants and dog's owners picketed veterinary hospital, and veterinarian sued them for defamation. Dog owners counterclaimed for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Trial court dismissed emotional distress counterclaim. Affirming, this court held that dog owners did not state cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress because veterinarian's principal misconduct was directed at dog, not at owners themselves. Furthermore, veterinarian's acts of calling owner stupid, trying to lure owner into a fight, calling the dog “fat and ugly,” and telling owners that he would soon own their truck and house were not sufficiently outrageous to justify emotional distress damages. Miller v. Peraino, 426 Pa.Super. 189, 626 A.2d 637, 640, 641.

Pa.Super.1992. Subsec. (1) quot. but not fol. and cit. generally in disc. The daughter of a woman who died in a nursing home sued the nursing home for intentional, reckless, or negligent infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Plaintiff's claim was based on her presence in the room while her mother's dressings were removed, revealing a spreading gangrenous infection that caused plaintiff to become upset, nauseated, and ill at the scene. Affirming the trial court's dismissal of the complaint, this court held that plaintiff could not prevail because defendant's actions were rendered in the normal course of treatment and were not calculated to induce emotional distress to bystanding family members. The court also noted that plaintiff, who averred no injury other than momentary nausea, had voluntarily chosen to be present and observe her mother's treatment. Kelly v. Resource Housing of America, 419 Pa.Super. 393, 615 A.2d 423, 426.

Pa.Super.1991. Cit. in disc., subsec. (1) quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. A hospital patient left unattended while awaiting an x-ray heard loud noises and vulgar language in the hallway coming from a birthday celebration for a hospital employee. The patient sued the hospital alleging that its employees, by their conduct, had intentionally and negligently caused her emotional distress. The trial court sustained the hospital's demurrer. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that the plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress failed due to the lack of any averment in her complaint of physical harm, injury, or illness occurring as a result of the employees' conduct. The court stated that the plaintiff's allegations of outrageousness did not rise to the level of the extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to sustain a cause of action for the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Abadie v. Riddle Memorial Hosp., 404 Pa.Super. 8, 589 A.2d 1143, 1145, 1146.

Pa.Super.1991. A woman's husband came to visit her in a hospital psychiatric unit and found her hanging by the neck from shoestrings behind a bathroom door adjacent to her hospital room in a failed suicide attempt. The husband sued the hospital, the psychiatric unit's manager, and a psychiatrist for negligent infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. This court affirmed the trial court's dismissal, holding that plaintiff had not sufficiently pleaded a cause of action for negligent infliction of emotional distress, in that he failed to allege that he had witnessed defendants' failure to adequately care for his wife but alleged only that he witnessed the aftermath of defendants' negligence. The court did not reach the issue of whether plaintiff sufficiently pleaded a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because plaintiff alleged neither intentional misconduct by defendants nor outrageous behavior needed for that tort. Bloom v. Dubois Regional Medical Ctr., 409 Pa.Super. 83, 597 A.2d 671, 680.

Pa.Super.1991. Com. (d) quot. in diss. op. A motorist sued his insurer and a law firm for infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that he was forced to undergo unnecessary and embarrassing medical examinations for his claim following an automobile accident. After the trial judge had denied the defendant's preliminary objections and denied reconsideration, a different judge sitting on the same court entered an order, on reconsideration, granting the defendants' preliminary objections and dismissing the case. Reversing and remanding, this court held that it was impermissible for another judge of the same court simply to ignore the previous decision and, without explanation, enter his own inconsistent order. The dissent would affirm, arguing that no allegation proffered by the plaintiff in the complaint could cause the court to regard any of the conduct attributed to the defendants as outrageous. Golden v. Dion & Rosenau, 410 Pa.Super. 506, 600 A.2d 568, 575.

Pa.Super.1991. Cit. in disc., cit. in case quot. in disc., cit. in cases cit. in ftn., com. (d) quot. in ftn. A patient sued, among others, her treating doctor after her post-spontaneous miscarriage, alleging, in addition to medical malpractice claims, that defendant's comment, “if you lose [the baby], you lose it,” intentionally or negligently caused her emotional distress. The trial court entered summary judgment for defendant. Affirming, this court held that damages for negligent infliction of emotional distress could not be awarded without a physical manifestation of plaintiff's emotional distress, evidence of which plaintiff failed to offer. It also held that defendant's comment was not extreme and outrageous. Moreover, the court agreed with defendant that an intentional infliction of emotional distress claim was not cognizable where defendant's negligence formed the basis of the claim. Strain v. Ferroni, 405 Pa.Super. 349, 592 A.2d 698, 703, 704.

Pa.Super.1990. Cit. in disc., cit. in case cit. and quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. A decedent, who had contracted with a corporation to be placed in a mausoleum on his death, was temporarily interred underground, in accordance with a provision in the contract, because the mausoleum was unfinished when he died; he was then transferred to the mausoleum on its completion. The decedent's widow sued the corporation, alleging that the defendant intentionally caused her severe emotional distress by the manner in which it provided for her husband's interment. The trial court granted the defendant's motion for a compulsory nonsuit. Affirming, this court held meritless the plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because she was not present during the defendant's treatment of the corpse, did not see the damage to the casket or the condition of the body, and failed to establish the extreme and outrageous conduct that Pennsylvania law required for a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Baker v. Morjon, Inc., 393 Pa.Super. 409, 574 A.2d 676, 678, 679.

Pa.Super.1990. Cit. in disc., cit. in case cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (h) cit. in disc. During a bitter custody dispute, a man allegedly threatened to kill his wife's mother, resulting in the filing of criminal charges, all of which were later dropped or nolle prossed. As a result of the filing of the criminal charges, which the man contended were unfounded, he filed this action against his now former mother-in-law, inter alia, for intentional infliction of emotional distress and malicious prosecution. The trial court dismissed the intentional infliction of emotional distress count, finding that the allegations were not outrageous, but refused to dismiss the malicious prosecution count. This court held that the dismissal of the intentional infliction of emotional distress claim was interlocutory rather than final and could not be appealed. Explaining that the harm alleged in both counts was substantially the same, the court concluded that the plaintiff had proffered alternative theories for the recovery of a given loss as would often be the case, for instance, in a claim for strict liability or, alternatively, negligence. Motheral v. Burkhart, 400 Pa.Super. 408, 583 A.2d 1180, 1188.

Pa.Super.1989. Cit. and quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in sup. An independent contractor sued an electric company for injuries resulting from an alleged intentional exposure to high levels of radiation and for lost wages due to alleged wrongful termination. The trial court dismissed the claims for intentional exposure to radiation, wrongful discharge, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, and it struck the demands for punitive damages. This court reversed and remanded, holding, inter alia, that punitive damages could be awarded if the allegations contained in the complaint were established at trial. The court determined that intentionally venting radioactive steam on a worker solely to keep its reactor operational, especially after being warned that the situation was dangerous, would demonstrate the company's outrageous conduct through reckless indifference to the worker's safety. The court also held that the false statements allegedly made to the worker, which tended to conceal the level of radiation to which he had been exposed, satisfied the requirements of outrageous conduct needed for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Field v. Philadelphia Elec. Co., 388 Pa.Super. 400, 565 A.2d 1170, 1183, 1183-1184.

Pa.Super.1988. Subsec. (1) quot. in disc., com. (b) cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. Husband and wife employees were discharged after the wife complained to the firm's president of sexual harassment by a management-level employee. The couple sued the employer, the president of the corporation, and the manager for wrongful discharge, breach of implied contract of employment, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court dismissed the complaint. Reversing the dismissal of the wrongful discharge claim, and affirming the dismissal of the other two claims, this court held, inter alia, that the allegations that the manager attempted to have sexually suggestive private conversations with the wife and that he had given the wife sexually explicit gifts did not reach the standard of extreme and outrageous conduct required to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Clay v. Advanced Computer Applications, 370 Pa.Super. 497, 536 A.2d 1375, 1384.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Pa.Super.1988. Cit. in sup. and in disc., cit. in case quot. in disc. and in ftn., subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in disc., com. (h) cit. in disc. A family sued two veterinarians and an animal hospital after their pet dog died, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress, loss of companionship and comfort, and breach of express and implied warranties. The trial court granted summary judgment to the defendants. This court affirmed in part, holding that the plaintiffs failed to set forth a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress as a matter of law because the principal misconduct alleged was directed at their dog, and was not extreme and outrageous conduct directed at them; and that the plaintiffs could not recover for the dog's loss because the dog was not a unique chattel. The court also reversed in part, holding that the plaintiffs had a viable cause of action on the breach of express and implied warranties theory. Daughen v. Fox, 372 Pa.Super. 405, 539 A.2d 858, 860-864, appeal denied 520 Pa. 605, 553 A.2d 967 (1988).

Pa.Super.1988. Cit. in case quot. but not fol. The owners of a condominium unit sued the other residents of the complex for civil conspiracy and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court sustained the defendant's preliminary objections and dismissed the plaintiff's amended complaint with prejudice. Affirming, this court held that not only was the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress not recognized in Pennsylvania, but the plaintiffs failed to allege any outrageous conduct. Ford v. Isdaner, 374 Pa.Super. 40, 542 A.2d 137, 139, appeal denied 520 Pa. 617, 554 A.2d 509 (1988).

Pa.Super.1988. Com. (g) cit. in conc. and diss. op. During a medical malpractice suit between the plaintiff hysterectomy patient and a hospital, the plaintiff's treating physician discussed her medical condition with the hospital's counsel, permitted the counsel to copy portions of her confidential file, and testified for the hospital. The plaintiff sued the physician, the hospital's counsel, and the hospital's insurer that hired the counsel in tort for breach of the professional code of confidentiality and inducement of the breach. The trial court granted summary judgment for the defendants. Affirming, this court held that the plaintiff's right to privacy and confidentiality was not absolute, particularly since she had voluntarily put her medical history into dispute by filing a suit for personal injuries. The concurring and dissenting opinion argued that the physician had a fiduciary duty to the plaintiff and that breaching that duty by releasing confidential information without the plaintiff's knowledge should be actionable. Moses v. McWilliams, 379 Pa.Super. 150, 549 A.2d 950, 969, appeal denied 521 Pa. 630, 558 A.2d 532 (1989).

Pa.Super.1988. Cit. generally in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. A research scientist was discharged by a hospital for removing discarded equipment from the hospital. After the scientist sued the hospital for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, the trial court granted a nonsuit on the claim. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held that the defendant's termination of the plaintiff's employment after 10 years of service was not the outrageous conduct for which Pennsylvania courts have held defendants liable in tort for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Paul v. Lankenau Hosp., 375 Pa.Super. 1, 543 A.2d 1148, 1158, 1159, appeal granted 520 Pa. 607, 553 A.2d 969 (1988).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Pa.Super.1988. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in sup. A community college president, who was working without a contract, was fired after he requested an audit that showed that certain individuals had embezzled college funds. When he sued the college for intentional infliction of emotional distress, the trial court granted the defendant a nonsuit. Affirming, this court held that the plaintiff had been fired because his employer was displeased with the manner in which he handled the situation. It concluded that the dismissal was not so outrageous in character and so extreme in degree as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency. Rinehimer v. Luzerne Cty. Com. College, 372 Pa.Super. 480, 539 A.2d 1298, 1305, appeal denied 521 Pa. 606, 555 A.2d 116 (1988).

Pa.Super.1988. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. disc. A shooting victim and his wife sued a newspaper for defamation, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and negligent infliction of emotional distress when the paper reported his shooting and that there was an organized crime retaliation motive behind it. The trial court granted summary judgment in favor of the newspaper and the plaintiffs appealed. This court affirmed, holding that the trial court was correct in its findings that the article was not capable of defamatory meaning, was not sufficiently extreme or outrageous to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and that its publication did not state a cause of action for negligent infliction of emotional distress. Salerno v. Philadelphia Newspapers, 377 Pa.Super. 83, 546 A.2d 1168, 1172.

Pa.Super.1987. Cit. in case quot. in ftn., subsec. (1) quot. but dist., com. (d) cit. in sup. Mortgagors sued a bank and one of its officers on theories including intentional interference with a contract and intentional infliction of emotional distress after the bank refused a mortgage to a potential buyer of mortgagors' property. The trial court dismissed the complaint. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that the defendant did not act improperly to interfere with the sales contract of the plaintiffs, and that the defendant's conduct was not so outrageous as to impose liability. The court reasoned that Pennsylvania had not adopted the Restatement's doctrine of intentional infliction of emotional distress, and that even if it had, the evidence in this case was insufficient to support the claim. Buczek v. First Nat. Bank, 366 Pa.Super. 551, 531 A.2d 1122, 1125.

Pa.Super.1987. Cit. in case cit. in disc. A rape victim sued three construction companies, alleging that they undertook and negligently performed a duty to secure the building in which she was raped. The trial court sustained the defendants' demurrer and dismissed the plaintiff's complaint for failure to state a cause of action. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that the defendants could not be held liable under a theory that imposed a duty to exercise reasonable care in preventing a risk from taking effect upon one who performed an act and subsequently realized or should have realized that it had created an unreasonable risk of causing physical harm to another. The court reasoned, inter alia, that the description of the prohibited conduct was too vague to permit principled use of the theory. The court noted that a theory, involving outrageous conduct had similarly been rejected for providing a nebulous definition of the term outrageous. Glick v. Martin and Mohler, Inc., 369 Pa.Super. 428, 535 A.2d 626, 629, appeal denied 519 Pa. 665, 548 A.2d 255 (1988).

Pa.Super.1987. Quot. but dist. An employee and his wife sued his employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress resulting from the defendant's failure to clear the employee's name with his fellow employees after he was wrongly accused of making sexual advances to a customer's daughter. The trial court granted summary judgment to the employer. Affirming, this court held that the employer had no legal duty to clear the employee's name where the employee had not shown that the employer had any intention to harm him, or that the employer had any knowledge that his failure to act would cause the employee emotional distress. Jackson v. Sun Oil Co. of Pennsylvania, 361 Pa.Super. 54, 521 A.2d 469, 471.

Pa.Super.1986. Cit. in case quot. in sup., quot. and cit. in sup., coms. (d) and (i) quot. in ftn. in sup. A patient with a history of emotional problems known to her physicians sued them for the intentional infliction of severe emotional distress when they refused to give her copies of her medical records, which she was legally entitled to receive. The trial court awarded the plaintiff compensatory and punitive damages. Affirming, this court stated that intentional infliction of emotional distress was an actionable wrong and that reckless conduct rendered an actor as liable as if he had acted intentionally. The court reasoned that, although the physicians might not have actually intended to cause the patient severe emotional distress, their reckless conduct was extreme and outrageous enough to support an action for damages. Pierce v. Penman, 357 Pa.Super. 225, 515 A.2d 948, 951, 953, appeal denied 515 Pa. 608, 529 A.2d 1082 (1987).

Pa.Super.1986. Quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in disc., com. (h) cit. in sup. An American student chose to attend medical school in the Caribbean, but she remained at the school for only 11 days. After her attempts to receive a refund of her fees and tuition failed, the former student sued the school for, inter alia, intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted the defendant's motion for a directed verdict. This court affirmed, holding that the conduct alleged in the complaint, such as other students banging on her dormitory room door and giving the plaintiff pornography, and class size being larger than the plaintiff expected, was not sufficiently extreme or outrageous to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court also held that the plaintiff did not sufficiently prove bodily injury as a result of any negligence by the defendants to support a claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress. Reimer v. Tien, 356 Pa.Super. 192, 514 A.2d 566, 569.

Pa.Super.1986. Cit. in disc. Two children sued the telephone company for loss of their mother's consortium after an operator placed their mother on hold during an emergency call and she was subsequently raped by an unknown assailant before she could get help. The trial court sustained the telephone company's demurrer. Affirming, this court held that there was no cause of action for parental loss of consortium. The court stated that emotional injury could be compensated through claims of intentional infliction of emotional distress or of negligent infliction of emotional distress accompanied by direct sensory and contemporaneous observance of the injury. Steiner by Steiner v. Bell Telephone Co., 358 Pa.Super. 505, 517 A.2d 1348, 1352.

Pa.Super.1986. Quot. in sup., quot. in ftn. in sup., subsec. (2) cit. and quot. in sup. A motorist who drove over the corpse of a hit-and-run victim sued the hit-and-run driver for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court dismissed the action. Affirming, this court held that the plaintiff could not recover because the plaintiff was neither a member of the victim's family nor present at the time of the injury. The court noted that the fact that the extreme and outrageous conduct was not directed at plaintiff would not have barred recovery had the two requirements been met. Stoddard v. Davidson, 355 Pa.Super. 262, 513 A.2d 419, 422, 423.

Pa.Super.1985. Cit. in diss. op., coms. (h) and (f) cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. and quot. in diss. op., illus. 4 quot. in sup. A woman who was called a “nigger” by a department store employee sued the store for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court sustained the defendant's demurrer and the plaintiff appealed. The superior court affirmed, holding that the conduct complained of was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous, nor was there liability for mere insults. The court also denied the plaintiff's attempt to establish a cause of action on a theory of special liability of owners of public places, noting that special liability had not been extended to conduct affecting an ordinary business invitee. The dissent argued that other jurisdictions allowed emotional distress claims for racial slurs and gave special notice of blacks' susceptibility to the term “nigger” in particular. Dawson v. Zayre Dept. Stores, 346 Pa.Super. 357, 499 A.2d 648, 649-651.

Pa.Super.1985. Com. (d) quot. in sup. The plaintiff's employment contract as a pathologist in the defendant's hospital was not renewed, based on letters of no confidence from several department heads. The plaintiff alleged intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court dismissed the complaint. This court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. It held that the letters of no confidence were not an extreme and outrageous act that could be considered atrocious and utterly intolerable in a civilized society. Gordon v. Lancaster Osteopathic Hosp. Ass'n, 340 Pa.Super. 253, 489 A.2d 1364, 1371.

Pa.Super.1985. Quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. An employee sued his employer's insurer and the insurer's attorney for intentional infliction of emotional distress, resulting from a statement made at the employee's workers' compensation hearing when the insurer's attorney stated in the employee's presence that the employee would only receive workers' compensation benefits if he was not represented by his counsel. The employee claimed that he suffered nervousness, insomnia, and stomach disorders as a result of the statement. The trial court sustained the insurer's objections, based on a finding that the insurer was immune from suit and the employee's sole remedy was outside of the court's jurisdiction under the workers' compensation act. The superior court affirmed on different grounds, holding that the employee could bring the claim, but that the attorney's conduct was not sufficiently outrageous to support the emotional distress claim. Jones v. P.M.A. Ins. Co., 343 Pa.Super. 411, 495 A.2d 203, 205.

Pa.Super.1985. Com. (i) cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc., coms. (f) and (g) cit. in sup., illus. 2 quot. in sup. A club member sued her club's board of directors for intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress after she received a letter from the board reprimanding her for alleged misconduct and promising disciplinary action if her behavior continued. The trial court sustained the defendant's preliminary objections and the superior court affirmed. Defendants' conduct was not sufficiently extreme or outrageous to sustain a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and plaintiff failed to aver the physical harm necessary to maintain a claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress. Lazor v. Milne, 346 Pa.Super. 177, 499 A.2d 369, 370, 371.

Pa.Super.1985. Com. (g) quot. in sup., illus. 14 quot. in sup. The family of a couple that had been successful in a trespass action brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against the attorney that had opposed the couple in the trespass action. The trial court granted a demurrer to the complaint. This court ruled that the attorney's remarks that he was going to appeal the decision in the trespass case and that the couple would never see the money awarded them in that case could not form the basis of a claim for intentional infliction, since the attorney was privileged to utter them. Thompson v. Sikov, 340 Pa.Super. 382, 490 A.2d 472-474.

Pa.Super.1984. Cit. and quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup., com. (i) cit. in sup. A father alleged that his sister, her husband, and their daughter persuaded the father's son to stay away from home. The father sued for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alienation of his son's affections, and harboring a child. The defendants filed preliminary objections in the nature of a demurrer. This court affirmed the trial court's order insofar as it sustained the demurrer to the purported causes of action for alienation of affections and harboring, but held that the complaint stated sufficient facts to sustain a potential cause of action for the intentional infliction of emotional distress and reversed on that issue. The court observed that Pennsylvania does not recognize causes of action by a parent for alienation of a child's affections or for harboring a child, but that if the father's allegations were true, it appeared that the defendants had intentionally manipulated his son in a manner “peculiarly calculated” to cause the father serious emotional distress. Bartanus v. Lis, 332 Pa.Super. 48, 480 A.2d 1178, 1184, 1185.

Pa.Super.1984. Cit. in case quot. in disc. The plaintiff, as executrix of her husband's estate and in her own right, sought damages from a manufacturer for injuries suffered by her husband from 20 years of working with asbestos, and for her own emotional distress resulting from a fear of contracting asbestosis herself by exposure to asbestos dust brought home by her husband. The lower court awarded summary judgment for the defendant, holding that the plaintiff did not commence the action within the two-year statutory limit. This court upheld the summary judgment regarding the husband's claims and refused to consider the plaintiff's personal claim of emotional distress on the ground that it was not raised at the trial level. Berardi v. Johns-Manville Corp., 334 Pa.Super. 36, 482 A.2d 1067, 1072.

Pa.Super.1984. Cit. in disc., quot. in ftn., cit. in case quot. in sup. Diagnosed as suffering from asbestosis, a shipyard worker with his wife brought actions against various asbestos producers.

The trial court entered orders non-prossing the first action except as to five defendants and granting summary judgment in the second action to all but three defendants. On appeal, this court affirmed and remanded. The court noted that the defendants dismissed from the first action had not submitted to the jurisdiction of the court. Concerning the second action, the court held that the trial court had properly ruled that the statute of limitations had run as to those defendants which had been granted judgment. The court also affirmed the trial court's dismissal of the wife's claims for negligent infliction of emotional distress, finding that she failed to aver that she had suffered physical harm, but it refused to rule on a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress because of an incomplete record. Cathcart v. Keene Indus. Insulation, 324 Pa.Super. 123, 471 A.2d 493, 508, 509.

Pa.Super.1984. Cit. and quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. (Erron. cit. as § 461.) The defendant was convicted of involuntary deviate sexual intercourse, indecent assault, and the corruption of minors. In addition to his prison sentence, the defendant was ordered to pay $7,500 in restitution for psychological treatment and counseling for the two children that he had victimized. The defendant appealed the restitution portion of his sentence, arguing that, while restitution was appropriate for actual bodily harm, it was not proper for emotional or mental disturbances. The defendant also contended that no evidence linked his alleged conduct to the children's psychological disturbances. This court held that “actual bodily harm” included actual emotional or mental disturbances for the purpose of imposing restitution and vacated and remanded the case to proportion the award of damages between the disturbance to the children caused by the defendant's conduct and other contributing factors. Commonwealth v. Balisteri, 329 Pa.Super. 148, 478 A.2d 5, 8.

Pa.Super.1984. Subsec. (1) quot. but dist., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Landlord sued tenant for accelerated rent when tenant vacated the apartment prematurely. Tenant counterclaimed, alleging that landlord's breach of an oral agreement to allow the tenant to find a replacement amounted to the intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court affirmed a demurrer to the tenant's counterclaim for damages, holding that a simple breach did not constitute outrageous conduct capable of causing emotional distress. The case was reversed and remanded on the tenant's claim regarding her security deposit. Rittenhouse Regency Affiliates v. Passen, 333 Pa.Super. 613, 482 A.2d 1042, 1043.

Pa.Super.1982. Subsec. (1) quot. in disc., com. (f) quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. The plaintiffs, a woman and her attorneys, brought an action against a physician and his attorneys for libel and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The defendants had previously brought an action for malicious prosecution against the plaintiffs, but had later dropped that action. The plaintiffs in this suit alleged that the defendants had made defamatory statements about the plaintiffs in their complaint in the previous action, and that such statements had caused the plaintiffs severe emotional distress. The trial court sustained the defendants' demurrer and dismissed the plaintiffs' complaint. On appeal, the dismissal was affirmed, the court holding that the plaintiffs had failed to state a cause of action. The allegations in the defendants' previous complaint were privileged, and there was no showing of malicious motives. The conduct of the defendants in filing their complaint was not so extreme and outrageous as to support an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Rose v. Wissinger, 294 Pa.Super. 265, 439 A.2d 1193, 1195, 1198, 1199.

Pa.Super.1981. Quot. in part. in sup., com. (d) quot. in part in sup., com. (i) cit. in case quot. in sup. The plaintiff, a man involved in an altercation with another man who subsequently suffered a fractured jaw, brought this action against the hospital, doctors and nurse who attended the injured man in order to recover damages for the mental distress which they allegedly caused him to suffer. In his complaint, the plaintiff stated that the injured man had died during his hospital stay due to the negligence of the named defendants, and not due to an act on the part of the plaintiff. He maintained that the defendants had prepared records indicating that the death was due solely to the injuries inflicted by the plaintiff; as a result of these records, he was charged with criminal acts. The plaintiff charged the defendants with both intentionally and negligently inflicting emotional distress upon him. The trial court sustained preliminary objections in the nature of a demurrer and dismissed the complaint. This court affirmed the order as to the negligence count but reversed the dismissal on the count alleging an intentional infliction of mental distress. The court held, inter alia, that the facts, if proven, would entitle the plaintiff to relief for the intentional infliction of mental distress because an intentional misstatement of the cause of death was intolerable professional conduct and extreme and outrageous. Banyas v. Lower Bucks Hospital, 293 Pa.Super. 122, 437 A.2d 1236, 1238, 1239.

Pa.Super.1981. Quot. in disc., com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc. The plaintiff notified the defendant book publisher that portions of one of the defendant's books had been plagiarized by the authors of a later book on the same subject. The defendant pursued a copyright infringement claim against the authors, and the plaintiff demanded compensation for his services in volunteering the information concerning the infringement. The defendant denied that it had any contract with the plaintiff or that it was liable to him for compensation, but nevertheless offered an honorarium of $200. The plaintiff refused the money and filed suit to recover one-third of the recovery effected by the defendant in the infringement suit. The plaintiff also sued for intentional infliction of emotional distress based on the defendant's alleged threat of a counterclaim. The trial court held for the defendant. On appeal, this court affirmed. The court held that when a person requested another to perform services, it was ordinarily inferred that he intended to pay for them. However, when one's work was voluntarily given to another, there was no such inference. Volunteers could not be reimbursed for unjust enrichment. As to the emotional distress claim, liability had been found only where the conduct was so outrageous in character and so extreme in degree as to go beyond all possible bounds of human decency. Martin v. Little, Brown and Co., 304 Pa.Super. 424, 450 A.2d 984, 988.

Pa.Super.1980. Quot. in disc. Plaintiff brought an action in assumpsit and trespass, alleging that the defendant had agreed that if the plaintiff would leave her job and make herself available to travel with him and spend time with him, he would take care of her for the rest of her life, that the defendant had breached the agreement which resulted in the plaintiff's financial and emotional damage. The lower court sustained the defendant's preliminary objections and dismissed the complaint and the plaintiff appealed. The court held that the complaint was not barred by the fact that the defendant was a married man, because a sexual relationship between the parties was not mentioned and because the agreement was no more than collaterally conducive to divorce. However, the court found that the complaint failed to state a cause of action for the intentional infliction of emotional distress because the alleged actions of the defendant, although "inconsiderate and unkind," were not extreme and outrageous. Accordingly, the judgment of the lower court was reversed in part and the case was remanded. The concurring opinion stated that, in light of the increasing number of cases involving nonmarital contracts, it was important to clarify the standards which would be used to determine whether such a contract violated public policy and would be unenforceable. Mullen v. Suchko, 279 Pa.Super. 499, 421 A.2d 310, 313.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Pa.Super.1978. Quot. in sup. Tenants brought an action against their landlords alleging that the landlords had breached the implied warranty of habitability on each of the dwellings. The tenants cited, inter alia, rodent and insect infestation, structural defects, inadequate heating, defective plumbing, and exposed electrical wiring as the defects amounting to a breach. As damages, the tenants sought the difference between the amount of rent they paid and the actual fair rental value of the properties. The lower court sustained the landlords' demurrer to the counts of the complaint alleging breach of the implied warranty of habitability. On appeal, the court reversed the lower court's order and held that implied warranty of habitability is a proper basis for a complaint. The court noted that should the tenants prove that the landlords breached the implied warranty, standard contract remedies would be available to them. The court also noted that, in order to succeed on their complaint, the tenants must prove that they gave notice to the landlords of the defective conditions, that the landlords had a reasonable opportunity to correct the defects, and that they failed to do so. The tenants complaint also alleged a cause of action for the tort of "slumlordism." The landlords again demurred to the complaint, and the lower court sustained the demurrer. On appeal, the court noted that, while the reference to the tort as "slumlordism" is not adopted, the court does recognize that the theory upon which the count of the complaint is based is the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court stated that tenants have the right to allege and to prove that landlords, by breaching the warranty of habitability, have intentionally inflicted emotional distress upon the tenants. Accordingly, the court held that count of the complaint did state a valid cause of action, and that the landlords' demurrer to the count was improperly sustained. Beasley v. Freedman, 256 Pa.Super. 208, 389 A.2d 1087, 1088.

Pa.Super.1978. Quot. in disc., cit. in diss. op. in disc. Appeal by plaintiff from demurrer sustained in favor of defendant to a count in trespass in an action brought by plaintiff insured against insurer, alleging causes of action in assumpsit and trespass, on the theory that denial by defendant insurer of the insured's claim was outrageous, malicious, and oppressive and caused the insured to suffer mental distress. Plaintiff alleged that defendant denied plaintiff's claim, refused to pay the claim even after plaintiff had conducted its own investigation and had informed the defendant that it was in error, and insinuated that the plaintiff was submitting a fraudulent claim. Plaintiff further alleged that, as a result of defendant's actions, plaintiff suffered severe emotional distress and undue worry about his credit standing and professional reputation as a police officer, and had been subjected to repeated demands for payment from the party who repaired plaintiff's boat. The order of the lower court was affirmed by an equally divided court, holding that defendant's refusals to pay the claim did not give rise to a cause of action for intentional infliction of mental distress or any other cause of action for mental distress. The dissent would have overruled the demurrer, holding that the plaintiff could proceed on the complaint on the theory of a breach of the insurer's duty of good faith dealing. The dissent noted that if the insured is able to prove that the conduct of the insurer was, as alleged, outrageous and intentional or reckless, he may recover for the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress, and in doing so he would have already proved that the insurer breached its duty of good faith. If the insured could not prove that the insurer's conduct reached the level of outrageous, he could still recover for emotional distress resulting from the insured's breach of its duty of good faith dealing. D'Ambrosio v. Pennsylvania Nat. Mut. Cas. Ins. Co., 262 Pa.Super. 331, 396 A.2d 780, 781, 782, order affirmed 494 Pa. 501, 431 A.2d 966. See above case.

Pa.Super.1978. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup. and quot. in part in disc. in diss. op., com. (e) quot. in part in sup., comments cit., com. (d) quot. in part in disc., and com. (j) quot. in part in sup., all in diss. op. Tenants sought to recover against a landlord for breach of the implied warranty of habitability and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court sustained defendant's demurrer, and this court reversed and remanded, holding that leases include an implied warranty of habitability, which could be used as the basis of a complaint. Furthermore, the court held that the warranty could not be waived, citing public policy grounds. Among the policy factors considered by the court were public health and safety, inequality of bargaining power between landlord and tenant, the adhesive nature of the lease agreement, and the unreasonable burden imposed by the lease upon tenants, who were required under its terms to maintain the property. Based on these factors, any attempted waiver of the warranty would be unconscionable and, therefore, ineffective. The court refused to hold that breach of the warranty of habitability constituted intentional infliction of emotional distress as a matter of law, but it did hold that plaintiff had the right to attempt to prove that the landlord, in breaching the warranty, intentionally inflicted emotional distress on the tenants. A dissent argued that the majority's decision to allow no waiver of the implied warranty of habitability was offensive to contract principles and not in the interest of public policy. The dissent argued that the Restatement required specific intent to establish intentional infliction of emotional distress, and that it was inconceivable on the facts of this case that the landlord had such intent. Fair v. Negley, 257 Pa.Super. 50, 390 A.2d 240, 245, 246, 248.

Pa.Super.1976. Quot. in part., quot. in diss. op., com. (d) quot. in disc. and diss. op., com. (e) cit. in disc., com. (g) quot. in ftn., com. (h) quot. in diss. op. This was an appeal by a debtor and the administratrix of an estate from an order sustaining demurrers to a complaint which sought to recover for the intentional infliction of mental distress. Holding that the order was appealable, the court found that defendant's conduct in informing a debtor by letter that his property would be sold at a sheriff's sale without further notice and informing him of such in the presence of others in an insulting manner did not amount to the extreme or outrageous type of conduct necessary for such a cause of action. This was the case even if defendant should have known that such an execution sale could not possibly be held or completed. Jones v. Nissenbaum, Rudolph & Seidner, 244 Pa.Super. 377, 368 A.2d 770, 772, 773, 774, 775.

Pa.Super.1974. Cit. in ftn. A woman received injuries and underwent an operation as a result of an automobile accident. She and her husband brought this action against the other driver. After testimony by the plaintiff's doctor that he discharged the wife from treatment on March 16, 1970, the trial judge limited recovery for pain and suffering and loss of consortium to the time between the accident and March 16, 1970. Plaintiffs appealed from a denial of their motion for a new trial. The court reversed and remanded for a new trial on the grounds that the court below should have allowed the plaintiffs themselves to testify as to the loss of consortium and pain and suffering in order to prove causation and extent of injuries. Reist v. Manwiller, 332 A.2d 518, 520.

Pa.Cmwlth.

Pa.Cmwlth.2002. Cit. in disc., cit. in ftn. to diss. op. Child's adoptive parents brought state tort-law claims against county, county employees, and child's natural mother who allegedly physically abused him, contending that county acted with gross negligence and in willful disregard for child's safety. The trial court dismissed the complaint against all parties other than the natural mother. Affirming, this court held that plaintiffs did not state a claim that individual employees committed willful misconduct serving to vitiate their immunity, since plaintiffs failed to allege that any of the individual employees acted with the requisite specific intent to injure the child. The dissent argued that defendants' failure to protect the child was extreme and outrageous, and that plaintiffs set forth a viable cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Robbins v. Cumberland County Children and Youth Services, 802 A.2d 1239, 1252, 1256, 1257.

Pa.Cmwlth.1995. Cit. in disc., cit. in case cit. in ftn. A woman sued the state police and individual officers for intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress, citing defendants' mishandling of her dead daughter's remains and failure to return those remains to plaintiff. Affirming the trial court's decision to sustain defendants' demurrers, this court held that plaintiff's intentional-infliction-of-emotional-distress claim was barred by sovereign immunity and the facts she pled in support of her remaining claim were insufficient. The court disagreed with plaintiff's contention that she could recover on her negligence claim despite the fact that she had not witnessed the harm defendants allegedly inflicted on her daughter's remains. Ray v. Pennsylvania State Police, 654 A.2d 140, 141.

Pa.Cmwlth.1992. Cit. in case quot. in disc. Adoptive parents and their adopted son, who manifested aggressive behavior against other children after the adoption was finalized, brought an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, against the agency, among others, responsible for the child's placement, alleging that defendant's failure to disclose that the child had been in 10 placements before being classified as eligible for adoption and had been physically and sexually abused by his biological parents was extreme and outrageous. Affirming the trial court's denial of defendant's motion to strike this allegation, this court held that whether defendant's failure to disclose vital negative information concerning the child and his natural parents constituted extreme and outrageous conduct, recklessly causing plaintiffs to sustain emotional distress, was an evidentiary question for the trier of fact. Gibbs v. Ernst, 150 Pa.Cmwlth. 154, 615 A.2d 851, 856.

Pa.Cmwlth.1991. Quot. in sup., cit. in ftn., subsec. (1) cit. in case cit. and quot. in disc., illus. 4 and 8 cit. in disc., illus. 13 cit. in disc. and quot. in ftn. Alleging that he was made a target of harassment and ridicule by his co-workers, a former city plant operator and his wife sued his former supervisors for intentional infliction of emotional distress, negligent supervision, and loss of consortium. The trial court entered summary judgment in favor of the supervisors. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that the supervisors' failure to prevent the operator's co-workers from taunting was not outrageous enough to sustain a complaint of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court reasoned that the supervisors had no knowledge of the taunting, that the outrageous conduct was principally that of the co-workers, and that taunts alone would not create liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress. McNeal v. City of Easton, 143 Pa.Cmwlth. 151, 598 A.2d 638, 640, 641.

Pa.Cmwlth.1990. Cit. in disc. The police arrested one of two roommates who were engaged in a dispute and charged him with aggravated and simple assault and terroristic threats. After the arrestee was acquitted of all charges, he sued the city, the police commissioner, and others for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. The trial court granted the defendants' motions for summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that the alleged statements and conduct of the police department were not so extreme or outrageous as to subject the city-related defendants to liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Carson v. City of Philadelphia, 133 Pa.Cmwlth. 74, 574 A.2d 1184, 1187.

R.I.

R.I.2004. Com. (d) cit. generally in sup. and quot. in case quot. in sup. Apartment tenants sued property manager for retaliation, intentional infliction of emotional distress, abuse of process, and malicious prosecution, alleging that manager had filed false and malicious allegations of criminal conduct by tenants with the police department. In the police complaint, manager alleged that tenants were making multiple, annoying phone calls to her and taping notes to her door. Trial court granted manager summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that plaintiffs' intentional-infliction-of-emotional-distress claim failed, because plaintiffs did not allege specific facts that rose to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct, and they did not allege any physical manifestation of their alleged injuries. Hoffman v. Davenport-Metcalf, 851 A.2d 1083, 1089, 1090.

R.I.2003. Com. (d) cit. and quot. in sup. and quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. in sup. After nursing home banned resident's son from visiting resident for six weeks allegedly because he had complained about home's nurses, son sued home and its administrator for intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress and statutory retaliation. Jury found for defendants on retaliation claim, but for plaintiff on emotional-distress claims. Trial court granted defendants judgment as a matter of law on claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court affirmed, holding that home's nonretaliatory banishment of plaintiff together with its monitoring conduct of having nurses follow plaintiff when he was on premises was not extreme and outrageous conduct. Home did not prevent plaintiff from visiting resident off premises and did not prevent resident from relocating. Jalowy v. Friendly Home, Inc., 818 A.2d 698, 707-709.

R.I.1998. Cit. in disc. and in headnote, cit. in case cit. in disc., quot. in ftn., com. (d) quot. in sup. and cit. in headnote, com. (g) cit. in disc. and in headnote. Husband and wife sued a neighbor for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that defendant engaged in an ongoing surveillance of various business activities occurring outside their home. Trial court dismissed plaintiffs' claims. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that defendant's conduct was not extreme and outrageous, because his surveillance was a legitimate attempt to document an alleged zoning violation. Swerdlick v. Koch, 721 A.2d 849, 852, 861, 862-864.

R.I.1997. Cit. in disc., cit. in case quot. in disc., cit. in ftn. in diss. op., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in diss. op. A client sued her former attorney for, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiff alleged that she was compelled to perform sexual acts with the attorney in part because of an alleged threat that the attorney had once made to her, stating that if he discontinued his representation of her, she would be deported and lose custody of her child. Trial court entered judgment on jury verdict for plaintiff. This court vacated and remanded, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's emotional-distress claim failed because it was founded on the inadmissible testimony of a social worker psychotherapist, who should not have been allowed to give an expert medical opinion on, and a diagnosis of, post-traumatic stress disorder. Dissent argued that, by conditioning his legal services on plaintiff's granting him sexual favors, defendant was guilty of outrageous conduct. It asserted that plaintiff was competent to testify about her own physical condition and about whether, after her sexual encounters with him, she developed symptoms of extreme nervousness, sleeplessness, and nightmares. Vallinoto v. DiSandro, 688 A.2d 830, 841, 842, 850, 851.

R.I.1996. Cit. in headnotes, cit. in case cit. in disc., quot. in conc. and diss. op., cit. in ftn. in conc. and diss. op., com. (d) quot. in conc. and diss. op., com. (f) cit. in disc., com. (g) cit. in disc. and quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (h) cit. in disc. After her husband committed suicide, a wife sued the owner of a television station that recorded a telephone interview with the husband shortly before his death, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. Trial court granted defendant summary judgment. This court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded, holding, inter alia, that the unsupported conclusory assertions of physical ills contained in plaintiff's complaint were insufficient to state a viable claim for emotional distress. It also held that, while perhaps lacking in good taste, the reporter's conversation with the decedent did not rise to the level of an actionable intrusion into the decedent's family's seclusion. An opinion concurring in part and dissenting in part argued that proof of physical symptoms of emotional distress should not be a necessary element of this cause of action. Clift v. Narragansett Television L.P., 688 A.2d 805, 805, 812-816.

R.I.1988. Quot. in disc. and in diss. op., coms. (d) and (k) quot. in disc. Two parents made various claims against the United States, including claims for medical malpractice and negligent infliction of emotional distress, after their newborn daughter suffered severe brain damage resulting from a negligent delivery performed at a naval hospital. The district court awarded damages for the daughter's injuries, but certified to this court questions regarding whether the parents, who had suffered psychic injury, need also manifest physical symptoms in order to recover damages for negligent infliction of emotional distress. This court held that, under state law, a plaintiff must suffer physical symptoms to recover damages for negligent infliction of emotional distress because emotional disturbance, without more, was too easily feigned, and that where a defendant has been merely negligent, without any intent to do harm, he should not be subject to potentially unlimited and undeserved liability for a purely mental disturbance. The dissent argued that spurious claims and excessive damages could be precluded by means other than requiring plaintiffs to show physical symptoms. Reilly v. U.S., 547 A.2d 894, 898, 902.

R.I.1984. Cit. and quot. in sup., cit. in ftn., coms. (f), (g), and (j) cit. in sup. A bank hired an attorney to collect on overdue notes allegedly signed by a husband and wife who had since filed for divorce. Informed that the wife's father had just died, the attorney telephoned to ask the wife to assign her father's estate to the bank. In the wife's suit for intentional infliction of emotional distress, she testified that she had already been upset because of a lack of money, overdue mortgage payments, and the death of her father, and that after the call she became nervous, ill, and unable to work. The jury found that the wife's signatures on the notes had been forged and awarded her compensatory and punitive damages. The bank appealed, contending that it should be liable only for extreme and outrageous conduct described under s 46 of the Restatement 2d of Torts. The wife contended that § 312 or § 313, which impose liability for intentionally caused emotional distress, should apply. This court reversed, holding that s 46 described the applicable standard in debt collection cases. Champlin v. Washington Trust Co., of Westerly, 478 A.2d 985, 987-990.

S.C.

S.C.2007. Cit. in case quot. in ftn.; coms. (d) and (i) quot. in case quot. in sup.; com. (j) quot. in sup., quot. in ftn., and quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee sued employer and supervisor for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), alleging that his co-workers and supervisor constantly derided him with callous and vulgar remarks and gestures related to homosexuality. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants; the court of appeals reversed. Reversing, this court held that, assuming, without deciding, that defendants' conduct was sufficiently outrageous to come within the ambit of an IIED claim, plaintiff's allegations of fairly ordinary symptoms—lost sleep and teeth grinding—failed to make a prima facie showing that his resulting emotional distress was sufficiently severe to sustain this claim. Hansson v. Scalise Builders of South Carolina, 374 S.C. 352, 650 S.E.2d 68, 70-72.

S.C.1993. Quot. in case cit. in disc., subsec. (2) cit. and quot. in disc. After man died while driving home from gymnasium, a white, powdery substance was detected in man's nostrils during police examination of body. Newspaper published front page article and deceased man's picture under a banner headline exclaiming “Cocaine Suspected in Death.” The same day article was published, toxicology reports came back negative as to presence of cocaine and established that deceased died of coronary atherosclerosis. Deceased's family members sued newspaper and reporter for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Trial court directed verdict for defendants on ground that article's statements were substantially true at time of publication. Affirming, this court held that plaintiffs possessed no viable cause of action for emotional distress against defendants because there was no evidence defendants directed their allegedly tortious conduct at plaintiffs or that defendants physically attacked deceased in plaintiffs' presence. Upchurch v. New York Times Co., 314 S.C. 531, 431 S.E.2d 558, 561, 562.

S.C.1991. Coms. (i) and (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. A murder victim's mother sued a newspaper for defamation and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The newspaper printed an article describing the victim as a drifter from a broken home who had no family support to encourage her to continue her education. The trial court granted the paper's motion for a directed verdict on both claims. Reversing in part, this court held that the issue of defamation should have been submitted to the jury. Affirming in part, the court held that the language of the article was not so extreme and outrageous as to exceed all possible bounds of decency. Holtzscheiter v. Thomson Newspapers, 306 S.C. 297, 411 S.E.2d 664, 666.

S.C.1991. Com. (h) cit. in disc. An employee who required bladder surgery was told by her employer that her surgery would have to be postponed and she would have to work and participate in daily group exercises or be fired. When the employee lost control of her bladder as a result of the employer's requirements, she sued the employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court denied the employer's motion for summary judgment on the ground that the employee had alleged a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, which would remove the action from the exclusive jurisdiction of the workers' compensation commission. Affirming, this court held that the exclusivity provision of the workers' compensation laws did not bar a common-law action against an employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court stated that the trial court properly determined as a matter of law that the conduct of the employer, in intentionally and repeatedly forcing an employee with bladder problems to participate in daily exercises, could reasonably be found to be an outrageous and intentional act outside the realm of an accidental injury. McSwain v. Shei, 304 S.C. 25, 402 S.E.2d 890, 892.

S.C.1981. Cit. and quot. in sup. and fol.; coms. (d), (i), (j) and (k) cit. in case quot. in sup. 1948 Supp. and Tentative Draft 1 cit. in case quot. in disc. Real estate agent brought an action against a home purchaser for intentional infliction of emotional distress arising out of arguments between the purchaser and the agent regarding the state of disrepair of the purchased premises. The lower court entered judgment on a jury verdict for the agent, and appeal was taken. The Supreme Court of South Carolina adopted the rule of liability stated in Section 46 of the Restatement (Second) of Torts relating to the intentional infliction of emotional distress which states that one who by extreme and outrageous conduct intentionally or recklessly causes severe emotional distress to another is subject to liability for such emotional distress and, if bodily harm to the other results from it, for such bodily harm. The court found that the evidence was sufficient for the jury as to whether the purchaser's continuing pattern of highly questionable conduct over a period of almost two years was intentional, whether it was extreme or outrageous, and whether the real estate agent's injuries were as severe, as is required for the agent to recover for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Accordingly, the judgment of the lower court was affirmed. Ford v. Hutson, 276 S.C. 157, 276 S.E.2d 776, 777-779.

S.C.1979. Cit. and com. (d) quot. in part. An employee of the defendant engraving company injured his back and received temporary total disability compensation. The employee later sustained a similar injury and sought both temporary and permanent compensation, which he received. However, because of the injury the employee was continuously absent from work and was eventually terminated from employment. The employee sued the defendant alleging mental distress based upon a belief that he was discharged in retaliation of his pursuing workmen's compensation benefits. The employer stated that the plaintiff was terminated because he had given no indication that he intended to return to work and because the position the plaintiff had no longer existed. The lower court granted summary judgment for the defendant. The appellate court affirmed and stated that in order to prevail in a tortious action based upon damages for mental distress, the plaintiff must show that the conduct of the defendant was extreme and outrageous. The court rejected the plaintiff's contention that the defendant's act of intentionally and maliciously discharging him in retaliation, by itself constituted extreme and outrageous conduct. Hudson v. Zenith Engraving Co., Inc., 273 S.C. 766, 259 S.E.2d 812, 814.

S.C.1968. Subsec. (1) cit. in conc. op. in sup. The plaintiff, who, with her husband, agreed to purchase aluminum siding for their house from an agent of the defendant, sued the defendant for permanent injuries received when, upon their attempt to rescind the contract after the agent subsequently admitted that the siding was of an inferior quality, the agent threatened and verbally abused the plaintiff, thereby allegedly causing damage to the plaintiff's nervous system. The court overruled the defendant's demurrer, holding that the plaintiff had stated a cause of action in mental distress. The concurring opinion emphasized that, as a physical injury to the plaintiff was alleged, it need not be decided whether such a cause would be stated without an allegation of bodily harm. Turner v. A B C Jalousie Co. of N. Am., 251 S.C. 92, 160 S.E.2d 528, 530.

S.C.App.

S.C.App.2000. Subsec. (1) adopted and quot. in case quot. in disc. Retired state trooper sued his former supervisor and the director of the Department of Public Safety for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, after he was accused in a press release issued by the department of failing to pass on crucial details concerning a car accident involving other state troopers. Affirming in part the trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendants, this court held, inter alia, that defendants' conduct with respect to the press release was not so extreme and outrageous as to constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress. Fleming v. Rose, 338 S.C. 524, 526 S.E.2d 732, 739, decision reversed 350 S.C. 488, 567 S.E.2d 857 (2002).

S.C.App.1993. Cit. in case cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. generally in disc. The mother of a premature infant whose heart rate decreased brought an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress against the doctor who told her that her child was dead when the child actually revived. Trial court granted doctor's motion for summary judgment, finding that the conduct was not extreme and outrageous and that the doctor's actions and statements were based on his good faith belief that the baby was incapable of sustaining life on his own. This court affirmed, stating that where evidence was undisputed that the defendant acted in good faith and in a reasonable manner, his conduct could not be characterized as so extreme as to exceed all possible bounds of decency. Hawkins v. Greene, ___ S.C.App. ___, 427 S.E.2d 692, 693, 694.

S.C.App.1987. Cit. in sup. A woman sued her former husband, her two children, and a psychiatrist for outrageous conduct after she was committed to a mental health hospital. The trial court granted the defendants' motions for summary judgment, and this court affirmed, stating that in order to recover for intentional infliction of mental distress, the alleged conduct must be so extreme and outrageous as to exceed all possible bounds of decency and be regarded as atrocious. The court concluded that the defendants acted in good faith and in a reasonable manner and were justified in committing the woman to the hospital. Manley v. Manley, 291 S.C. 325, 353 S.E.2d 312, 314.

S.C.App.1987. Com. (f) cit. in sup. and quot. in case cit. in disc. An employee sued his employer for outrageous conduct, inter alia, after the employer fired him for failing to keep psychiatrist's appointments pursuant to a job-related injury. The trial court dismissed the complaint with prejudice. Reversing and remanding in part, this court held that a material issue of fact existed as to whether there was outrageous conduct by the employer. The court said that conduct may be adjudged outrageous because a defendant acts with knowledge that a plaintiff is peculiarly susceptible to emotional distress, if major outrage is shown. Nash v. AT & T Nassau Metals, 294 S.C. 248, 363 S.E.2d 695, 700, decision reversed 298 S.C. 428, 381 S.E.2d 206 (1989).

S.C.App.1984. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. The plaintiffs sued their former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress and invasion of privacy. The trial court overruled the defendant's demurrers. This court reversed and remanded, holding that alleged threats of retaliatory discharge for failing to withdraw workman's compensation claims did not amount to extreme, intolerable conduct necessary for the tort of outrage, and that allegations of threats of dismissal and the mailing of a letter informing the plaintiffs of their discharge failed to state a cause of action for invasion of privacy. Corder v. Champion Road Machinery Intern., 283 S.C. 520, 324 S.E.2d 79, 81, certiorari denied 286 S.C. 126, 332 S.E.2d 533 (1985).

S.C.App.1984. Com. (j) cit. in disc. A former employee sued her former employer for wrongful discharge after she was discharged for attending a government hearing pursuant to a subpoena during working hours. The lower court ordered a nonsuit and this court affirmed, holding that South Carolina courts did not recognize a “public policy” exception to the doctrine of employment at will. The court also noted that there was no cause of action for outrage or intentional infliction of emotional distress where the employee pleaded only that she was embarrassed and humiliated by the discharge. Ludwick v. This Minute of Carolina, Inc., 283 S.C. 149, 321 S.E.2d 618, 621.

S.C.App.1984. Cit. in disc., coms. (e), (f) and (h) cit. in disc., coms. (d), (i) and (j) cit. in case quot. in disc. After the plaintiff was fired from his job for refusing to take a lie detector test regarding allegations that he leaked information to a suspected arsonist, he brought this action against his former employer for breach of an employment contract and conduct causing severe emotional distress. This court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff, holding that defendant's acts could not be deemed sufficiently "outrageous" to support the tort action. Todd v. South Carolina Farm Mut. Ins., 283 S.C. 155, 321 S.E.2d 602, 609, 610.

S.D.

S.D.2018. Quot. in case quot. in sup.; com. (d) quot. case quot. in sup. Former personal-care assistant at a senior-care facility who was terminated for gross misconduct following coworkers' reports that she had slapped and secluded a resident filed a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against facility's management and parent company, alleging that defendants conducted an inadequate and conclusory investigation in violation of health-department rules, and submitted the mandatory investigative report to the department of labor fourth months late, misrepresenting that residents had been interviewed. The trial court entered summary judgment for defendants. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff did not demonstrate that defendants' conduct surrounding her termination was extreme and outrageous, despite her subsequent acquittal of felony elder-abuse charges in a criminal case. The court quoted Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, to define the extreme and outrageous behavior necessary for establishing liability for an IIED claim. Harvey v. Regional Health Network, Inc., 906 N.W.2d 382, 395.

S.D.2011. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Possessor of house that owners had conveyed to bank in lieu of foreclosure brought claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) and abuse of process against bank, after defendant sold the property to a third party and sought to remove plaintiff from the property. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant on the IIED claim, and, following a jury trial on the abuse-of-process claim, the jury returned a verdict finding bank liable but awarding no damages. While reversing and remanding on the abuse-of-process claim, this court held that defendant's acts of selling and requiring plaintiff to vacate the house in direct contravention to a letter in which it allegedly promised her possession for life did not constitute extreme and outrageous conduct for purposes of her IIED claim. Fix v. First State Bank of Roscoe, 2011 S.D. 80, 807 N.W.2d 612, 618.

S.D.2002. Quot. and cit. but dist., com. (d) quot. in sup. Bus passenger injured in traffic accident sued bus company and driver for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendants' failure to summon emergency medical care, transport him to bus terminal, and provide him with free transportation home was outrageous conduct. Affirming trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendants, supreme court held that defendants' conduct, while indifferent, was not sufficiently outrageous to support liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and passenger failed to plead lesser tort of gross insult applicable to common carriers. Harris v. Jefferson Partners, L.P., 2002 SD 132, 653 N.W.2d 496, 500, 501.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

S.D.2001. Com. (d) quot. in sup. and quot. in ftn. in diss. and conc. op., com. (h) quot. in diss. and conc. op., com. (j) quot. in diss. and conc. op. Wife filed for dissolution of marriage from husband and asserted tort claims. The trial court granted dissolution, divided marital property, and assessed punitive damages against husband. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that wife proved elements of tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress where husband made public accusations of child abuse and caused wife to lose job. The dissent argued that wife did not present evidence of sufficiently outrageous conduct, or of sufficiently severe emotional distress, to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Christians v. Christians, 637 N.W.2d 377, 382, 385, 389, 390.

S.D.2001. Com. (l) cit. in sup. One of several physicians who formed a closely held corporation that operated a medical clinic sued the clinic and the other shareholders, among others, for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, after the others voted to terminate his services for the clinic. On remand, the trial court directed a verdict against plaintiff on the claim. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's contention that defendants mistreated his patients and that this mistreatment caused him emotional distress could not support his claim. The court said that a plaintiff could not recover under an intentional-infliction-of-emotional-distress cause of action when the alleged conduct was directed at a third person, and the plaintiff was not present when the conduct occurred. Hayes v. Northern Hills General Hospital, 628 N.W.2d 739, 744.

S.D.2000. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in sup. Former wife brought suit for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress against former husband, alleging that he had harassed her, arranged to have her criminally prosecuted on a bogus theft charge, and sent her threatening letters. After the jury returned a verdict awarding plaintiff no compensatory damages and $50,000 in punitive damages, the trial court granted plaintiff's motion for a new trial. Affirming, this court held that a new trial was warranted because the jury had shown by its verdict that it believed that plaintiff had been the victim of outrageous conduct, but that it had palpably mistaken the rules of law by which damages were measured. Henry v. Henry, 2000 SD 4, 6, 604 N.W.2d 285, 288.

S.D.1999. Com. (g) quot. in disc. Physician and sole shareholder of medical corporation sued former partners, hospital, and others for, inter alia, breach of contract and intentional infliction of emotional distress after defendants unilaterally terminated plaintiff's services. The trial court entered summary judgment for defendants. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held, among other things, that summary judgment on the contract claim was proper; that material factual issues existed as to whether defendants' conduct, which allegedly included placing plaintiff on 24-hour-a-day, seven-day-a-week emergency room call, mistreating his patients, and tampering with his charts, could be considered extreme and outrageous; and that defendants failed to establish that their actions were privileged. Hayes v. Northern Hills General Hosp., 1999 SD 28, 590 N.W.2d 243, 251, appeal after remand 628 N.W.2d 739 (S.D.2001).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

S.D.1995. Cit. generally in sup., com. (d) cit. in ftn., com. (g) cit. and quot. in ftn., com. (h) quot. in disc. Former employee sued former employer and its general manager for wrongful discharge and intentional infliction of emotional distress. After a series of anonymous letters accusing general manager of illegal and unethical behavior was sent to employer's board of directors, general manager, believing plaintiff to be the author of at least one, gave her the choice of resignation or termination. The trial court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment and this court affirmed, holding that plaintiff, an at-will employee who could be dismissed without cause, was not treated abominably or intolerably when general manager assembled her, her immediate supervisor, and his supervisor in a private, professionally conducted meeting to explain plaintiff's options. Richardson v. East River Elec. Power Co-op., 531 N.W.2d 23, 27, 28, 27-28.

S.D.1994. Cit. generally in case quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. in case cit. in sup., com. (i) cit. generally in case quot. in sup. and quot. in case quot. in spec. conc. op. Female employees sued their employer for invasion of privacy and intentional infliction of emotional distress after discovering that company president was spying on them in the women's restroom through a hole in the wall. The trial court granted defendant a directed verdict on the emotional-distress claim and entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiffs on the invasion-of-privacy claim. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that there was sufficient evidence produced so that reasonable minds could differ on whether defendant's actions amounted to extreme and outrageous conduct. The court stated that it was for the jury to determine if company president knew to a substantial certainty that his act would cause an invasion of the interest of his female employees. Special concurrence emphasized that it was also for jury to determine if president engaged in reckless conduct. Kjerstad v. Ravellette Publications, Inc., 517 N.W.2d 419, 429, 431.

S.D.1994. Com. (d) quot. in sup. and in ftn. Juvenile female sued juvenile male who accompanied her to party for assault and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. The trial court granted defendant summary judgment. Reversing and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that nature and extent of intoxicated plaintiff's consent to sexual activity with second juvenile male was genuinely in dispute, and that defendant's conduct in placing plaintiff in bedroom with second juvenile male, who was known by defendant to have body lice, was extreme enough to permit claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress to go to jury as well. Reeves v. Reiman, 523 N.W.2d 78, 84, 85.

S.D.1993. Com. (d) cit. in case cit. in sup. The former manager of a corporation sued it and its directors, alleging various claims including one for intentional infliction of emotional distress arising from his discharge. Affirming in part and reversing in part the trial court's grant of summary judgment for the defendants and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that the defendants' conduct in discussing the manager's job performance after a motion was made at a public meeting to fire him and then firing him that same day did not rise to the outrageous level necessary to support an emotional distress claim. Nelson v. Web Water Development Ass'n, Inc., 507 N.W.2d 691, 699.

S.D.1992. Cit. generally in disc., subsec. (1) quot. in ftn., com. (i) cit. in case quot. in disc. Discharged employee sued hospital for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant, and this court reversed in part and remanded. On petition for rehearing, this court held that the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress encompassed liability for reckless infliction of emotional distress. Petersen v. Sioux Valley Hosp. Ass'n, 491 N.W.2d 467, 468, 469.

S.D.1992. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in disc.; com. (i) cit. in case quot. in disc., quot. in conc. and diss. op. Employee who was discharged for habitual absenteeism and inability to get along with her co-workers sued hospital for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Reversing in part the trial court's granting of summary judgment for defendant and remanding, this court held that a genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether plaintiff's supervisor's conduct in calling plaintiff to a meeting with co-workers to discuss her problems without first informing her could be considered reckless, given the supervisor's knowledge of plaintiff's fear of confrontational group meetings. The concurring and dissenting opinion argued that there was no evidence of reckless conduct causing plaintiff severe emotional distress, since plaintiff's own testimony indicated that her supervisor was simply trying to help resolve the friction between plaintiff and her co-workers. Petersen v. Sioux Valley Hosp. Ass'n, 486 N.W.2d 516, 518, 522, on rehearing 491 N.W.2d 467 (S.D.1992). See case below.

S.D.1992. Subsec. (1) quot. in disc. and cit. in ftn., com. (d) cit. in disc., com. (h) quot. in ftn. A family horse trainer's membership in a horse club was terminated on the grounds of her unsportsmanlike behavior and disruptive conduct. Various comments and observations were made by horse club members regarding this behavior. The trainer sued the horse club officers and directors alleging tortious interference with business relations, slander resulting in injury to profession, trade or business, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court dismissed the emotional distress claim against all of the defendants. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that the defendants' termination of the plaintiff's membership in the horse club together with the statements allegedly made by the defendants did not amount to extreme and outrageous conduct. The court set forth the following definitive delineation of the elements of the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress: (1) an act by defendant amounting to extreme and outrageous conduct; (2) intent on the part of the defendant to cause plaintiff severe emotional distress; (3) the defendant's conduct was the cause in-fact of plaintiff's injuries; and (4) the plaintiff suffered an extreme disabling emotional response to defendant's conduct. Tibke v. McDougall, 479 N.W.2d 898, 906, 907.

S.D.1989. Com. (j) quot. in disc. After the plaintiff's farm equipment dealership was terminated by the manufacturer, whose spokesman allegedly stated in a newspaper article that the plaintiff's dealership was not a good business, the plaintiff sued the manufacturer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for the defendant on this claim. Affirming in part, this court held that the evidence was insufficient to make a jury issue of the claim and that the fact that the jury was erroneously instructed was not reversible error. Groseth Intern., Inc. v. Tenneco Inc., 440 N.W.2d 276, 280.

S.D.1988. Cit. in case quot. in disc.; subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in conc. and diss. op.; com. (h) cit. in disc., cit. in conc. and diss. op., cit. in ftn. to conc. and diss. op.; com. (i) cit. in ftn. to conc. and diss. op. A recently hired hospital laboratory supervisor was discharged at the end of the probationary period of his employment allegedly for poor performance. He sued the hospital and its administrator, who had recommended him for the position, claiming, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, fraud, and deceit. The trial court granted summary judgment for the defendants on all counts except fraud. Affirming in part and reversing in part, this court held that a question of material fact existed concerning the plaintiff's allegation that the dissatisfaction that led to his dismissal was really due to his lack of academic credentials, which the administrator had fraudulently assured him were sufficient for the position. The court also stated that reasonable minds could differ as to whether the defendants' conduct was so outrageous as to cause severe emotional distress. A concurring and dissenting opinion argued that there was no evidence of actions by the hospital that could reasonably be regarded as so extreme as to permit recovery for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Another concurring and dissenting opinion argued that the trial court should not have denied the plaintiff's motion to add a claim for breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, claiming that the adoption of this concept would not interfere with the principle of employment at will; the administrator's assurances gave the plaintiff a justified expectation of fair treatment. French v. Dell Rapids Community Hosp., 432 N.W.2d 285, 289, 291, 292.

S.D.1988. Subsec. (1) and com. (f) quot. in sup., com. (i) cit. in sup. An employee sued his employer and related individuals for intentional infliction of emotional distress resulting from the manner in which he was treated when it was discovered that he was suffering from depression and alcohol abuse. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding the employee compensatory and punitive damages, but ordered a new trial on the issue of punitive damages unless the employee agreed to a reduction of the jury award. This court affirmed in part and reversed in part and held that the punitive damages award was not excessive; therefore a new trial was not warranted. The court concluded that evidence that the defendants had knowledge of the plaintiff's mental condition when they confronted him was adequate for a jury to determine that the defendants' conduct was sufficiently reckless, extreme, and outrageous to find them liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Wangen v. Knudson, 428 N.W.2d 242, 248.

S.D.1987. Subsec. (1) cit. in disc. The plaintiff sued a soft drink company for negligent infliction of emotional distress after he consumed a beverage from a bottle that allegedly contained a decomposed mouse. The trial court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment. Reversing and remanding, this court held that it was for a jury to determine whether the plaintiff's injury was sufficiently serious or substantial to warrant recovery. The court reasoned that while the plaintiff's physical injuries seemed trivial, a jury might find the defendant liable for conduct exceeding all bounds usually tolerated by society, including liability for fright. Wright v. Coca Cola Bottling Co., 414 N.W.2d 608, 609.

S.D.1986. Coms. (e) cit. in disc., com. (f) quot. in disc. A tenant suffering from psychological problems sued her landlord for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that the landlord made sexual advances toward her knowing that she was psychologically incapable of resisting those advances and that his actions constituted outrageous conduct. The tenant also alleged that the landlord continued to harass her with obscene remarks and phone calls following her complaint to the police. The trial court did not address the harassment action and granted the landlord's motion for summary judgment, concluding that there was no evidence that the landlord knew or should have known of the tenant's psychological problems. Reversing and remanding, this court stated that extreme and outrageous conduct might arise from the actor's knowledge that the other is particularly susceptible to emotional distress and found that a factual question was presented as to the landlord's knowledge. The court also found that a jury question existed concerning the reasonableness of the landlord's actions. Ruane v. Murray, 380 N.W.2d 362, 364.

S.D.1984. Subsec. (1) quot. in ftn. and in diss. op., com. (f) cit. in disc., com. (h) quot. in disc., quot. in ftn. The plaintiff brought an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress against the defendant, who had made a series of obscene phone calls to her home. After the plaintiff had the police trace one of the calls, the defendant pleaded guilty to a criminal charge. The plaintiff then brought this civil action. At the close of the plaintiff's case the court granted her motion for a directed verdict on the issue of liability. The jury awarded actual and punitive damages. On appeal, the defendant contended that the jury, rather than the court, should have determined whether all of the elements of the tort had been present and that the directed verdict had foreclosed him from presenting evidence of his motivation in making the obscene calls. This court affirmed, holding that the directed verdict was properly sustained by the evidence. The dissent argued that it was improper for the trial court to render a directed verdict against the defendant before he had had a chance to present any evidence. Ruple v. Brooks, 352 N.W.2d 652, 654, 655, 657, 658.

Tenn.

Tenn.2021. Com. (d) cit. and quot. in sup., quot. in case quot. in sup.; coms. (h) and (j) quot. in sup. Second-grade teacher who resigned from her tenured position at an elementary school filed claims for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress against school district and others based on allegations that she was constructively discharged. After the trial court granted defendants' motion to dismiss, the court of appeals affirmed in part. This court affirmed as to the dismissal of plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that defendants' alleged actions—including falsely and inaccurately reviewing her work, accusing her of child abuse in the form of using physical conduct to discipline a student, and placing cameras and a retired teacher in her classroom to monitor her actions—did not rise to the level of outrageous conduct required to state such a claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Lemon v. Williamson County Schools, 618 S.W.3d 1, 21, 22.

Tenn.2012. Quot. in sup.; cit. in case quot. in sup. (general cite). After crematorium operator pleaded guilty to multiple felonies in connection with his failure to cremate hundreds of bodies, parents of deceased son sued operator for allegedly mishandling son's body. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict in favor of plaintiffs. The court of appeals affirmed. Affirming, this court rejected defendant's argument that plaintiffs were precluded from recovery because they failed to specifically allege reckless infliction of emotional distress in their complaint, holding that a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress could be proven by showing that a defendant acted recklessly, and that plaintiffs had presented sufficient proof from which the jury could have concluded that defendant acted recklessly. Akers v. Prime Succession of Tennessee, Inc., 387 S.W.3d 495, 502, 503.

Tenn.2012. Quot. in sup., cit. in case cit. and quot. in sup., com. (j) quot. in part in sup. and quot. in part but dist. (erron. cit. as § 45 on p. 208). Mother of deceased son sued owner of cemetery where her son was buried, and owner's sole shareholder, alleging, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) and outrageous conduct arising from defendant's inadequate maintenance of the cemetery. The trial court entered judgment against defendants, and awarded plaintiff compensatory and punitive damages; the court of appeals reversed the damages awards and the judgment against sole shareholder personally. Affirming, this court held that plaintiff provided insufficient proof of serious mental injury to support a judgment for damages based on the tort of IIED; plaintiff offered no evidence, by her own testimony or of anyone else, that she suffered physiological or psychological symptoms, sought medical or professional treatment, or incurred any significant impairment in her daily functioning resulting from defendants' conduct. Rogers v. Louisville Land Co., 367 S.W.3d 196, 205-210.

Tenn.2008. Com. (j) cit. in ftn. Family members of a child who was seriously injured in an automobile accident brought a claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress against driver of the vehicle that struck the child and, because driver lacked adequate insurance, served a copy of their complaint on their own insurer, in accordance with Tennessee's uninsured motorist statutes; plaintiffs alleged that they sustained severe emotional injuries after they observed child lying on the pavement in a pool of blood. The trial court granted summary judgment for insurer; the court of appeals reversed and remanded. Affirming, this court held that persons who observed an injured family member shortly after an injury-producing accident could pursue a claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress. The court noted that recovery was limited to serious or severe emotional injuries and could not be predicated on hurt feelings, trivial upsets, or temporary discomfort. Eskin v. Bartee, 262 S.W.3d 727, 737.

Tenn.2005. Cit. in disc.; quot. in sup.; cit. generally in case cit. in disc.; subsecs. (1) and (2) cit. in sup., cit. in disc., and cit. in ftn.; com. (d) quot. in ftn. and quot. in case quot. in disc.; com. (i) cit. in disc. Victims of child molestation by former priest sued church for reckless infliction of emotional distress, alleging that church's inadequate response to prior allegations enabled priest to continue pattern of abuse and infliction of severe emotional harm. Trial court granted summary judgment for defendant, and the court of appeals affirmed. Vacating and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that because reckless-infliction-of-emotional-distress claim did not have to be based upon conduct directed specifically at plaintiffs, genuine issues of material fact existed concerning defendant's conduct and awareness that the priest presented a substantial and unjustifiable risk of harm to young males. Doe 1 ex rel. Doe 1 v. Roman Catholic Diocese of Nashville, 154 S.W.3d 22, 31-37, 39, 40.

Tenn.2004. Com. (d) quot. generally in sup. and adopted in case quot. in sup. Children of decedent who had consented to organ donation and/or harvesting particular organs sued funeral-home employees, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress following upsetting comments made by employees regarding condition of decedent's body after it was embalmed. Trial court granted employees' motion to dismiss. The court of appeals affirmed in part. Reversing in part and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that children sufficiently alleged claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and reasonable inferences could be drawn from complaint that defendants knew the falsity of their statements. Leach v. Taylor, 124 S.W.3d 87, 92.

Tenn.2004. Quot. and adopted in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Postal carrier who witnessed a man shoot his wife in the head and then shoot himself sued the man's estate for intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress. Trial court dismissed suit, but court of appeals reversed. This court affirmed, holding that plaintiff stated a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, since plaintiff's allegations described outrageous conduct that was intentional and caused plaintiff serious mental injury; that conduct, which occurred in plaintiff's presence and involved her as a participant, was not simply a tragedy common to daily life. Lourcey v. Estate of Scarlett, 146 S.W.3d 48, 51.

Tenn.1999. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) cit. in headnotes and sup. and quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (j) quot. in sup. and quot. in ftn. (Erron. cit. as § 45 com. (j) on p. 614.) Parents of a newborn sued a doctor and the hospital for intentional infliction of emotional distress, after the doctor diagnosed the baby as suffering from Drug Withdrawal Syndrome, spread rumors throughout the hospital that the infant was a “drug baby,” and reported his suspicions concerning the mother's alleged drug use to the county health department. Trial court granted defendants summary judgment because plaintiffs failed to present expert proof to corroborate their claims of having sustained serious mental injuries. Appellate court affirmed. This court reversed and remanded, holding that expert medical or scientific proof of a serious mental injury was generally not required to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Miller v. Willbanks, M.D., 8 S.W.3d 607, 612, 614-616.

Tenn.1997. Cit. in headnotes, subsec. (1) quot. but dist., com. (d) quot. in disc., com. (h) quot. in case quot. in disc. Patient in drug and alcohol rehabilitation program sued program for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress after he discovered that his roommate was HIV-positive. The trial court denied defendant's motion for summary judgment, even though defendant's expert testified that the American Hospital Association recommended segregating HIV-positive patients from those not infected with the virus in only three situations, none of which was present here. The intermediate appellate court affirmed. Reversing, this court held that, as a matter of law, defendant's conduct was not outrageous where it complied with applicable health care standards. Bain v. Wells, 936 S.W.2d 618, 618, 619, 622, 623.

Tenn.1977. Com. (d) quot. in part in sup., illus. (1) and (3) cit. and illus. (4) quot. in part in disc. A state university professor was struck in the face with a pie during a class. The professor accused plaintiff student of the assault and ejected him from the building the following day when he attempted to enter the class, and he also accused the student of attempted blackmail. Plaintiff brought this action against the professor for outrageous conduct, alleging that defendant wrongfully accused him. Plaintiff appealed from a dismissal for failure to state a claim, but the court affirmed. It was held that the student's allegations failed to state cause of action where the student claimed innocence but did not allege that defendant knew, or should have known, that his accusations were false, and where defendant's accusation of blackmail, though excessive, was the product of an unprovoked and humiliating attack, and where the defendant, having no reason to believe he was acting against the wrong person, ejected the student from the building when he attempted to take his seat in class. Goldfarb v. Baker, 547 S.W.2d 567, 568-69.

Tenn.1977. Cit. in disc. and com. (e) cit. in disc. The defendant, a department store, erroneously charged the plaintiffs, charge account customers, for a purchase after they returned the goods and were informed that they would receive credit. After being repeatedly notified of the error, the defendant failed to correct it, continued to bill the plaintiffs for the amount, and continued to send letters and make telephone calls to the plaintiffs threatening them with a lawsuit if they did not make payment. The plaintiffs brought an action against the defendant for compensatory and punitive damages for the alleged infliction of severe emotional distress. The lower court dismissed the complaint on the ground that it failed to state a cause of action, and the plaintiffs appealed. The court held that the plaintiffs' allegations stated a cause of action for intentional or reckless infliction of severe emotional distress by means of extreme and outrageous conduct. The court noted that two factors must concur in order to outweigh the policy against allowing an action for the infliction of mental distress: (a) the conduct complained of must have been outrageous, not tolerated by civilized society, and (b) as a result of the outrageous conduct, there must be serious mental injury. The court found that a jury could reasonably conclude that the defendant's conduct, considered as a whole, was extreme and outrageous, and that the mental and emotional injury alleged to have resulted from the defendant's conduct was serious. Therefore, the lower court was reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings. Moorhead v. J.C. Penney Co., Inc., 555 S.W.2d 713, 717.

Tenn.1976. Cit. in sup. and com. (d) quot. in sup. and coms. cit. in sup. An employee filed this action against his employer and a detective agency charging that the defendants were guilty of “outrageous conduct” and “invasion of privacy” which caused him to suffer severe emotional harm. The lower court dismissed the action. On appeal, the court affirmed, holding that the complaint, which alleged that defendants investigated and harassed him for a period of approximately six months, did not allege actionable conduct with sufficient specificity so as to state a cause of action for the tort of “outrageous conduct” or “invasion of privacy.” Swallows v. Western Elec. Co., Inc., 543 S.W.2d 581, 582, 583.

Tenn.1966. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in sup. The plaintiffs seek to recover damages from the defendant, a loan company, for intentional interference with the plaintiffs' peace of mind caused by the defendant's agents, who allegedly were insulting and abusive in the course of several phone conversations pertaining to disputed loan payments. The Supreme Court affirmed defendant's demurrer, because the plaintiffs had failed to allege and prove the substance and severity of the abuse, which supposedly aggravated a nervous condition by causing headaches. Medlin v. Allied Investment Company, 398 S.W.2d 270, 274.

Tenn.App.

Tenn.App.2022. Com. (d) quot. in sup. and quot. in case quot. in sup. School secretary brought, among other things, a claim for reckless infliction of emotional distress against employer of school bus driver, alleging that defendant failed to address repeated instances of bus driver's dangerous driving, resulting in driver causing a bus to flip over and kill elementary-school passengers. The trial court denied defendant's motion to dismiss. This court affirmed in part and remanded on other grounds, holding that plaintiff sufficiently alleged that defendant's conduct was outrageous and extreme. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, the court explained that, according to plaintiff's complaint, defendant repeatedly ignored warnings about driver's dangerous driving, knew that driver failed to attend mandatory safety meetings, and failed to address warnings by a third-party monitor about driver's tendency to violate speed limits. Bibbs v. Durham School Services, L.P., 666 S.W.3d 327, 334.

Tenn.App.2022. Com. (d) quot. in sup., quot. in case quot. in sup. School brought, among other things, a claim for reckless infliction of emotional distress against employer of school bus driver, alleging that defendant failed to address repeated instances of bus driver's dangerous driving, resulting in driver causing a bus to flip over and kill elementary-school passengers. The trial court denied defendant's motion to dismiss. This court affirmed in part and remanded on other grounds, holding that plaintiff sufficiently alleged that defendant's conduct was outrageous and extreme. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, the court explained that, according to plaintiff's complaint, defendant repeatedly ignored warnings about driver's dangerous driving, knew that driver failed to attend mandatory safety meetings, and failed to address warnings by a third-party monitor about driver's tendency to violate speed limits. Cothran v. Durham School Services, L.P., 666 S.W.3d 355, 379.

Tenn.App.2022. Com. (d) quot. in sup., quot. in case quot. in sup. School educational assistant brought, among other things, a claim for reckless infliction of emotional distress against employer of school bus driver, alleging that defendant failed to address repeated instances of bus driver's dangerous driving, resulting in driver causing a bus to flip over and kill elementary-school passengers. The trial court denied defendant's motion to dismiss. This court affirmed in part and remanded on other grounds, holding that plaintiff sufficiently alleged that defendant's conduct was outrageous and extreme. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, the court explained that, according to plaintiff's complaint, defendant repeatedly ignored warnings about driver's dangerous driving, knew that driver failed to attend mandatory safety meetings, and failed to address warnings by a third-party monitor about driver's tendency to violate speed limits. Franklin v. Durham School Services, L.P., 666 S.W.3d 340, 348.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Tenn.App.2022. Com. (d) quot. in sup., quot. in case quot. in sup. School teacher brought, among other things, a claim for reckless infliction of emotional distress against employer of school bus driver, alleging that defendant failed to address repeated instances of bus driver's dangerous driving, resulting in driver causing a bus to flip over and kill elementary-school passengers. The trial court denied defendant's motion to dismiss. This court affirmed in part and remanded on other grounds, holding that plaintiff sufficiently alleged that defendant's conduct was outrageous and extreme. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, the court explained that, according to plaintiff's complaint, defendant repeatedly ignored warnings about driver's dangerous driving, knew that driver failed to attend mandatory safety meetings, and failed to address warnings by a third-party monitor about driver's tendency to violate speed limits. Muhammed v. Durham School Services, L.P., 666 S.W.3d 355, 363.

Tenn.App.2022. Com. (d) quot. in sup., quot. in case quot. in sup. School teacher brought, among other things, a claim for reckless infliction of emotional distress against employer of school bus driver, alleging that defendant failed to address repeated instances of bus driver's dangerous driving, resulting in driver causing a bus to flip over and kill elementary-school passengers. The trial court denied defendant's motion to dismiss. This court affirmed in part and remanded on other grounds, holding that plaintiff sufficiently alleged that defendant's conduct was outrageous and extreme. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, the court explained that, according to plaintiff's complaint, defendant repeatedly ignored warnings about driver's dangerous driving, knew that driver failed to attend mandatory safety meetings, and failed to address warnings by a third-party monitor about driver's tendency to violate speed limits. Schrick v. Durham School Services, L.P., 667 S.W.3d 259, 266.

Tenn.App.2020. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Ex-husband brought, among other things, claims of intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against attorney and law firm that represented ex-wife in divorce proceedings, alleging that defendants, after being informed that plaintiff had forwarded to close friends several photographs of ex-wife engaging in sexual acts with another man while she and plaintiff were dating, advised ex-wife to file criminal charges of unlawful exposure against him in order to obtain leverage in the divorce proceedings. The trial court granted defendants' motion to dismiss. This court affirmed, holding that plaintiff failed to establish the elements of his IIED claim. The court explained that defendants' actions of providing ex-wife legal advice to file a truthful report with law enforcement and referring her to a criminal-defense attorney did not constitute sufficiently outrageous behavior as defined by Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, to sustain a claim for IIED. Pagliara v. Moses, 605 S.W.3d 619, 628.

Tenn.App.2016. Com. (d) quot. in sup. and cit. in case quot. in sup. Mother sued assistant district attorney general for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), alleging that, while she was engaged in a prolonged standoff with police officers related to a custody dispute, she overheard defendant, who was on speakerphone, use derogatory language to refer to her. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant. Affirming, this court held that plaintiff failed to state an IIED claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. While defendant's comments—that plaintiff was a "jerk," a "troublemaker," and a "bitch"—were derogatory and inappropriate, none of them rose to the high standard of outrageousness necessary to sustain such a claim. Odom v. Claiborne County, Tennessee, 498 S.W.3d 882, 887.

Tenn.App.2013. Cit. in treatise quot. in sup., com. (j) quot. in sup. Paternal grandparents of minor child filed a petition for visitation against child's biological mother and her new husband, who adopted child after child's biological father relinquished his parental rights. The trial court found that cessation of visitation between the child and grandparents was likely to cause substantial harm to the child and awarded visitation. This court reversed, holding that the evidence preponderated against a finding that the child would likely suffer substantial harm or severe emotional harm as a result of the loss of the relationship. The court pointed out that the evidence showed only that the child became excited at the mention of grandparents, not that he became inconsolable, or otherwise upset, due to the loss of connection with them, and feelings of excitement did not rise to the level of other emotions that were customarily associated with findings of severe emotional harm, such as grief, shame, humiliation, embarrassment, anger, chagrin, disappointment, worry, or nausea. McGarity v. Jerrolds, 429 S.W.3d 562, 578-580.

Tenn.App.2012. Cit. in case quot. in sup.; com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup.; com. (h) quot. in sup.; com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. (erron. cit. as § 45). Customer brought, inter alia, claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) and negligent infliction of emotional distress (NIED) against gas station, alleging that a verbal exchange between him and defendant's employee —in which the employee accused him of trying to "do a money-switch" and threatened to call the police—caused him severe emotional distress. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant. Affirming, this court held, among other things, that the employee's alleged conduct fell squarely within the realm of mere insults, indignities, threats, annoyances, petty oppression, or other trivialities and was insufficiently outrageous to permit recovery for an IIED claim; similarly, the alleged conduct was not so extreme and outrageous that it would have caused a reasonable person to suffer serious or severe emotional injury, as required to state a claim for NIED. Brown v. Mapco Exp., Inc., 393 S.W.3d 696, 704, 705.

Tenn.App.2010. Cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. in sup. Witness in a divorce action between husband and wife sued wife's attorney, alleging, among other things, outrageous conduct, after attorney deposed him, treated him as a hostile witness, filed suit against him for participating in defamation of wife, and then dismissed that suit against him with prejudice. The trial court dismissed plaintiff's action. Affirming, this court held, among other things, that plaintiff failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress as a matter of law; while the taking of the deposition and the filing of the lawsuit might have caused plaintiff some level of emotional distress, such conduct was not atrocious, and thus did not rise to the level of the “outrageous conduct” required to state such a claim. Lane v. Becker, 334 S.W.3d 756, 763.

Tenn.App.2008. Quot. and adopted in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Limited liability company member brought a claim of outrageous conduct, inter alia, against fellow members, alleging, among other things, that defendants withheld information regarding the company from plaintiff, failed to assist plaintiff with company's day-to-day operations, verbally assaulted plaintiff with regard to the company, and did not notify plaintiff of certain meetings. This court affirmed the trial court's dismissal of plaintiff's claim, reasoning that defendants' actions of which plaintiff complained were the same types of acts that occurred in virtually every dispute that arose between members of a limited liability company and did not rise to the level of being "so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency and to be regarded as atrocious, and utterly intolerable in a civilized community." O'Dell v. O'Dell, 303 S.W.3d 694, 696-697.

Tenn.App.2007. Cit. in conc. and diss. op, com. (b) cit. in conc. and diss. op. Parents and siblings of decedent whose body was sent to funeral home for cremation sued funeral home and its owner, after the body was not cremated, and plaintiffs were never told and never found out what had happened to decedent's body. The trial court dismissed for lack of standing. This court affirmed, holding that, consistent with Restatement Second of Torts § 868, any tort claims for negligent, reckless, or intentional interference with a dead body and the like could be brought in Tennessee only by the person or persons who had the right to control disposition of the body, here, decedent's widow. The concurring and dissenting opinion argued that the causes of action asserted by plaintiffs were not premised upon § 868, but rather upon the concept of outrageous conduct found in § 46 and other sections of the Restatement Second of Torts, e.g., §§ 312, 313, 436, and 436A, and that plaintiffs stated a claim for intentional, reckless, and negligent infliction of mental distress. Crawford v. J. Avery Bryan Funeral Home, Inc., 253 S.W.3d 149, 163.

Tenn.App.2006. Com. (d) quot. and adopted in case quot. in sup. (general cite). Terminated employee brought various discrimination claims against her former employer, as well as claims for negligent and/or intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging, among other things, that defendant's employees continually harassed and mocked her because of her physical and mental disabilities. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that, because plaintiff provided no evidence to create a genuine issue of material fact as to whether she suffered severe emotional injury, a necessary element of her emotional-distress claims, it was irrelevant whether the alleged conduct was severe enough to be deemed negligent or outrageous. Oates v. Chattanooga Pub. Co., 205 S.W.3d 418, 428.

Tenn.App.2004. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. Owners of small parcel of rural land sued owners of large, surrounding parcel for, inter alia, outrageous conduct, after defendants, learning of plaintiffs' anonymous complaints to authorities over defendants' business use of their land, threatened and intimidated plaintiffs. The trial court dismissed the outrageous-conduct claim. This court affirmed in regard to defendant wife, but reversed and remanded in regard to defendant husband, holding that husband's malicious issuance of death threats and firing of gunshots near plaintiffs' home was atrocious behavior that was utterly intolerable in a civilized community, and that plaintiffs presented substantial, undisputed evidence that they had suffered serious mental injury as a result of husband's conduct. Levy v. Franks, 159 S.W.3d 66, 83, 85.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Tenn.App.2003. Cit. in sup., coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Ninety-two African-American residents sued pizza-delivery company that refused to deliver pizza to their neighborhood, alleging discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Trial court granted company summary judgment. Affirming in part, this court held, inter alia, that record was devoid of evidence of severe mental injury resulting from company's actions, and company's conduct did not rise to level of outrageousness necessary to support claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Arnett v. Domino's Pizza I, L.L.C., 124 S.W.3d 529, 539, 540.

Tenn.App.1995. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Employee sued former employer, asserting that the employer's actions, in connection with the employee's demotion and subsequent termination, violated the Age Discrimination in Employment Act and constituted intentional infliction of emotional distress. Employee alleged that employer reported his actions in the competitive bidding process to the federal government without probable cause and before a thorough investigation. He further alleged that he was humiliated after his firing by being given a large garbage bag for his personal possessions and then being ushered to exit through a common area in front of his work peers. Trial court granted employer summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that employer's actions did not rise to the requisite level of outrageousness to state a viable emotional distress cause of action. Newsom v. Textron Aerostructures, 924 S.W.2d 87, 98.

Tenn.App.1992. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Trust beneficiaries sued trustee alleging, among other claims, failure to manage the trust prudently, by not converting the trust property into cash and investing in more productive securities, and infliction of emotional distress arising from the trustee's indifference to the beneficiaries' needs in managing the trust. The chancery court found the trustee liable to the trust estate for failure to convert the trust property and awarded beneficiaries damages for negligent infliction of emotional distress. Modifying in part the chancellor's decree, affirming in part, and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that the trustee was not negligent in failing to sell the trust property because the trust did not authorize him to sell the property in gross, and that his conduct was not intentional or so reckless as to constitute outrageous indifference to the beneficiaries' reasonable financial needs. Phillips v. Taylor, 833 S.W.2d 927, 934.

Tenn.App.1991. Com. (d) quot. in disc. A husband sued his former wife's lover for outrageous conduct, inter alia, alleging that the defendant's affair with his wife ended the plaintiff's marriage, causing him to file for divorce, and that the defendant perjured himself concerning these activities in the plaintiff's divorce proceedings. The trial court dismissed the claim. Affirming, this court held that, although the defendant's conduct was inappropriate and unacceptable, an average member of the community would not find it to be so atrocious that it went beyond the bounds of decency. Alexander v. Inman, 825 S.W.2d 102, 105.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Tenn.App.1991. Cit. in cases quot. in disc., subsec. (1) quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. and quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (h) quot. generally in case quot. in disc. Film-developing company customer whose partially nude photograph was shown to others sued the company, among others, for outrageous conduct, inter alia. The trial court granted a directed verdict for defendant on the ground that no serious damage was proved. Reversing and remanding, this court held that there was evidence in the record to support a verdict that defendant's conduct was outrageous and that plaintiff suffered serious mental or emotional injury as a result. Dunn v. Moto Photo, Inc., 828 S.W.2d 747, 748, 751-753.

Tenn.App.1991. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. and quot. in case quot. in sup. A hospital patient and her husband brought an action for infliction of emotional distress against a nurse who allegedly committed sexual battery upon the plaintiff husband. The trial court entered summary judgment for the defendant. Affirming, this court held that the plaintiffs failed to cite any evidence as to the standards of civilized society within a hospital environment and therefore failed to prove that the defendant's alleged actions were sufficiently outrageous to merit the imposition of liability. Highfill v. Baptist Hosp., Inc., 819 S.W.2d 436, 440.

Tenn.App.1988. Com. (d) quot. in disc. A former employee sued his supervisor and his employer for assault, outrageous conduct, and breach of implied contract in connection with workplace altercations between the employee and his supervisor. The trial court granted the defendants summary judgment. This court affirmed in part and vacated in part, holding that the plaintiff had not substantiated his outrageous conduct claim. The court stated that the pushing, shoving, and swearing that allegedly occurred between the two was not the type of conduct that an average member of the community would consider outrageous. Moreover, the plaintiff conceded that he had suffered no physical or emotional effects from the altercations; he had therefore failed to establish both essential elements of the tort. Blair v. Allied Maintenance Corp., 756 S.W.2d 267, 273.

Tenn.App.1988. Subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc., coms. cit. in case quot. in disc. Shortly after a child abuse and murder suspect was shot to death by the grandfather of the victim, the police announced that the suspect would have been charged with the child's murder. The suspect's parents sued the police chief and a police captain for intentional infliction of emotional distress by reckless and outrageous conduct, alleging that the defendants had no evidence to support their accusations against the plaintiffs' son. The trial court granted summary judgment for the defendants. Affirming and remanding, this court held that the defendants' conduct was not outrageous, because it was not intolerable in civilized society. The court held that the defendants were acting in good faith, with a reasonable belief that they were doing right, and that the plaintiffs had not carried their burden of proving that the defendants had acted with the intention of injuring the plaintiffs. Gann v. Key, 758 S.W.2d 538, 543, 544.

Tenn.App.1988. Coms. cit. in case quot. in disc. Examinees who failed the state bar examination sued the board of law examiners and the individual members of the board, among others, alleging, inter alia, that the defendants' publication of the names of those who passed the test was outrageous conduct that caused the plaintiffs severe mental and emotional damage. The trial court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that the plaintiffs' allegations were general and inconclusive and contained absolutely no allegation concerning the conduct of the individual defendants that caused the damages alleged by the plaintiffs. Hampton v. Tennessee Bd. of Law Examiners, 770 S.W.2d 755, 764, certiorari denied 493 U.S. 975, 110 S.Ct. 498, 107 L.Ed.2d 501 (1989).

Tenn.App.1987. Quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. A trucking company employee sued the company's health insurance providers for benefits due under the policy, outrageous conduct, fraud, and gross misconduct. The trial court denied the defendants' motion for a directed verdict, and held that the plaintiff could recover on all of the claims. Reversing, this court held that the trial court should have directed a verdict for the defendants on the issues of outrageous conduct, fraud, and deceit. The court stated that the plaintiff failed to show that the defendant intentionally or even recklessly acted in a manner that would naturally lead to the infliction of emotional distress; therefore there could be no recovery for outrageous conduct. Holt v. American Progressive Life Ins., 731 S.W.2d 923, 926-927.

Tenn.App.1986. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup. but dist., com. (h) cit. in case quot. in disc. (cit. as Comment, p. 77), com. (d) cit. and quot. but dist. A mortgagor sued a mortgagee for outrageous conduct resulting in mental and financial injury allegedly suffered when the mortgagee refused to endorse an insurance check. The jury returned a verdict for the mortgagor; the mortgagee appealed, contending that no material evidence existed to support the jury's verdict. This court reversed the trial court's judgment and dismissed the case, stating that in an action for outrageous conduct causing severe emotional distress, the conduct must be so outrageous or extreme as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and that the mortgagee's conduct did not rise to such an atrocious level. Bryan v. Campbell, 720 S.W.2d 62, 64-65.

Tenn.App.1986. Coms. cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. in disc., coms. (h) and (j) cit. in sup. An insurance company terminated disability payments to a former employee of a policy holder. The former employee sued the insurer, claiming that the termination involved outrageous conduct. The defendant was granted summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that the plaintiff's complaint failed to state a cause of action, because no instances of abusive or outrageous conduct were alleged. The court stated that the plaintiff's allegations utilized conclusory words repeating the test for abusive conduct by claiming that the defendant's acts were not to be tolerated in a civilized society, but the complaint did not describe the substance and severity of the defendant's conduct that allegedly amounted to actionable behavior. Chandler v. Prudential Ins. Co., 715 S.W.2d 615, 622, 623.

Tenn.App.1986. Com. (h) quot. in case cit. in disc. A husband and wife sued a doctor and a hospital for damages suffered when the doctor failed to remove a drainage tube from the wife's surgical incision. A jury found for the plaintiffs, but the trial court remitted the judgment by 75%. All parties appealed. Plaintiffs contended, inter alia, that the trial court should have permitted them to amend their complaint to allege the tort of outrageous conduct against the hospital. The court of appeals held that it was not error to deny the amendment because plaintiffs, in their motion, did not allege facts for the court to evaluate, but only legal conclusions. The court, however, reversed and remanded, holding that because the misconduct of plaintiff's counsel may have prejudiced the jury, the trial court should have granted a new trial rather than remittitur. Guess v. Maury, 726 S.W.2d 906, 921.

Tenn.App.1981. Cit. in sup., com. (e) cit. in ftn. and com. (f) quot. in ftn. in sup. (Erron. cit. as Torts.) The plaintiffs, husband and wife, brought an action against the county medical examiner to recover compensatory and punitive damages for alleged "severe emotional stress" suffered by the wife as a result of the defendant's alleged "outrageous conduct." The defendant had told the plaintiffs that the thought that their daughter had been suffocated after being sexually abused, even though the defendant did not have any concrete evidence to support his belief and was aware that the wife had experienced a mental breakdown. The lower court granted the defendant's motion to dismiss and the plaintiffs appealed. The appellate court reversed and remanded with respect to the issue of the intentional or reckless infliction of severe emotional distress by means of outrageous conduct, because reasonable minds could differ as to whether the defendant's conduct was outrageous. Dunbar v. Strimas, 632 S.W.2d 558, 561.

Tenn.App.1981. Coms. (h) and (j) cit. in disc., coms. (d) and (e) quot. in disc., illus. 7 cit. in disc. The debtors of the appellant credit company had brought an action against the credit company for outrageous conduct. The debtors had paid their bills; however, through error, the debtors' account was not credited properly and appeared to be one month in arrears. Because of the appearance of the account, the credit company repeatedly sent letters stating that the account was past due and demanding payment. On remand, the trial court entered judgment for the debtors and awarded damages. The credit company appealed and the higher court reversed and remanded for a dismissal of the case. The court found that merely seeking to collect a debt believed to be outstanding was not sufficiently outrageous to sustain recovery. Nelson v. Ford Motor Credit Co., 621 S.W.2d 573, 575, 576.

Tex.

Tex.2008. Com. (b) quot. in ftn. to diss. op. Former church member brought negligence and intentional-tort claims against church, senior pastor, youth minister, and others, alleging that, in two incidents when she collapsed during worship services, individual defendants physically restrained her against her will. After the trial court denied defendants' protective order, the court of appeals granted them mandamus relief barring the litigation of those claims involving church's religious practices; subsequently, the trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding plaintiff damages on her false-imprisonment claim. The court of appeals affirmed on this claim. This court reversed and dismissed on First Amendment grounds. A dissent argued that the cases cited by the majority involved situations where no physical assault occurred, unlike the situation in this case, and noted that the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress was developed because it was thought that extreme and outrageous conduct should be actionable despite the lack of a physical invasion. Pleasant Glade Assembly of God v. Schubert, 264 S.W.3d 1, 17.

Tex.2006. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Shopper who was acquitted on misdemeanor theft charges arising from an alleged shoplifting incident sued grocery store and assistant store manager for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, arguing that defendants intentionally subjected her to embarrassment and emotional distress knowing that she was innocent. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiff; the court of appeals affirmed. Reversing and rendering judgment for defendants, this court held that plaintiff's evidence was legally insufficient to support a finding that defendants' conduct was extreme and outrageous. The court reasoned that plaintiff's claimed innocence was insufficient to find that defendants did not honestly and reasonably believe that plaintiff was guilty; further, plaintiff produced no evidence of prior bad relations, racial animus, or other ulterior motives. Kroger Texas Ltd. Partnership v. Suberu, 216 S.W.3d 788, 796.

Tex.2005. Com. (d) cit. in ftn., com. (g) quot. in ftn. Former employee sued employer and CEO for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendants refused to give her a reference letter, did not take reference calls on her behalf, forbade employees to contact ex-employees, and ordered one employee to evict plaintiff, who had moved into employee's home after being fired. Trial court granted defendants summary judgment. Court of appeals affirmed as to defendants' pretermination conduct, but reversed as to posttermination conduct. This court reversed in part and rendered judgment that plaintiff take nothing, holding that, while defendants' conduct might have been callous, meddlesome, overbearing, and vindictive, it was not so extreme and outrageous as to constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress. Creditwatch, Inc. v. Jackson, 157 S.W.3d 814, 817, 818.

Tex.2003. Com. (d) quot. in sup. and quot. in case quot. in disc. Concrete contractor's widow sued project owner for intentional infliction of emotional distress based on defendant's conduct as a party to two commercial-construction contracts. After the jury returned a verdict for plaintiff, the trial court granted defendant's motion for judgment n.o.v. The court of appeals reversed and remanded. Reversing and remanding, this court held that defendant's course of conduct in making numerous rude and insensitive phone calls to plaintiff relating to the contracts and threatening to terminate the contracts if the construction site was closed for the entire day of contractor's funeral did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to support jury's verdict. Tiller v. McLure, 121 S.W.3d 709, 713, 715.

Tex.2003. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Former employee brought suit for disability discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress against former employer. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiff, and the court of appeals affirmed. Reversing, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress failed because defendant's investigation into sexual-harassment charges made against plaintiff and the subsequent termination of plaintiff amounted to an ordinary business dispute, and did not constitute the requisite extreme and outrageous conduct as a matter of law. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Canchola, 121 S.W.3d 735, 741.

Tex.2002. Com. (d) cit. in ftn. to diss. op. Homeowners brought class action against builder, seeking to enjoin it from asserting that implied warranties of habitability and good and workmanlike construction had been waived by provisions in the sales contracts. Trial court dismissed; court of appeals reversed and remanded. Affirming, this court held that implied warranty of good workmanship could be disclaimed when the parties' agreement provided for manner, performance, or quality of construction, but implied warranty of habitability could not be disclaimed generally. Dissent argued that the court's new, undisclaimable implied warranty of habitability would be alleged in virtually every case involving residential defects, just as its creation of a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress resulted in allegations of the claim in hundreds of cases in every context imaginable. Centex Homes v. Buecher, 95 S.W.3d 266, 279.

Tex.2002. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. in cases quot. in sup. In suit by insurance agent who was terminated for allegedly participating in kickback scheme, former employer appealed jury verdict finding it liable for negligence and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Court of appeals affirmed in part. Reversing and rendering judgment that plaintiff take nothing, supreme court declined to recognize a cause of action against employers for negligent investigation of their at-will employees' alleged misconduct, and held that employer's actions in investigating plaintiff and reporting results of investigation to state and federal enforcement agencies did not rise to level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to support claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Texas Farm Bureau Mut. Ins. Companies v. Sears, 84 S.W.3d 604, 610.

Tex.2000. Com. (h) cit. in headnote and quot. in case quot. in disc. Current and former city police officers sued two other officers and the city, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. Trial court granted defendants summary judgment; the appellate court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and reversed in part. This court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded, holding, inter alia, that the city's decision to reclassify positions formerly held by police officers as civilian positions did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct that was required to establish intentional infliction of emotional distress. City of Midland v. O'Bryant, 18 S.W.3d 209, 217.

Tex.2000. Cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Stranded motorist sued other driver for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendant harassed her as she sat in her vehicle by the side of the road and followed her when she tried to escape him. The trial court entered summary judgment for defendant and the intermediate appellate court affirmed. Reversing and remanding, this court held that defendant intentionally engaged in threatening behavior, which caused plaintiff severe mental distress. Morgan v. Anthony, 27 S.W.3d 928, 929.

Tex.1999. Cit. in sup., subsec. (1) adopted in case cit. in ftn., com. (d) quot. in sup. and cit. in ftn., com. (h) cit. in ftn. and quot. in case quot. in sup. State university professor who was terminated after receiving negative evaluation brought suit for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress against, among others, three administrators who had participated in evaluation process. The trial court granted defendants summary judgment; the court of appeals reversed in part and remanded. This court reversed in part and rendered judgment that plaintiff take nothing, holding, inter alia, that, even assuming that defendants had retaliatory motives, their conduct in, for example, making negative comments that were reflected in plaintiff's tenure file did not rise to level of extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to maintain action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Brewerton v. Dalrymple, 997 S.W.2d 212, 215, 216.

Tex.1999. Com. (d) cit. in headnote and cit. and quot. in sup., cit. and quot. in conc. op. and quot. in case quot. in conc. op., com. (e) cit. in headnote and cit. and quot. in sup., com. (g) cit. in sup., com. (h) cit. in headnote and sup. and quot. in case quot. in sup., illus. 2 cit. in sup., illus. 4 cit. in conc. op. Employees sued employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress premised on the constant humiliating and abusive behavior of their supervisor. Trial court entered judgment on jury verdict for plaintiffs, and the appellate court affirmed. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that the severity and regularity of the supervisor's abusive and threatening conduct brought his behavior into the realm of extreme and outrageous conduct. Concurring opinion argued that the supervisor's cursing was not intentional infliction of emotional distress when that cursing was not directed at plaintiff and was not simultaneously accompanied by sexual harassment or physically threatening behavior. GTE Southwest, Incorporated v. Bruce, 998 S.W.2d 605, 611-612, 616, 617, 621, 622.

Tex.1998. Com. (d) cit. in case cit. in ftn. Former customer-service representatives for provider of mobile-telephone systems sued former employer for retaliatory discharge and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiffs. The intermediate appellate court affirmed in part and reversed in part. Affirming in part and reversing in part, this court held, inter alia, that termination for a wrongful purpose, even, as in this case, in retaliation for reporting sexual harassment, was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous as to give rise to a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Southwestern Bell Mobile Systems v. Franco, 971 S.W.2d 52, 54.

Tex.1998. Cit. in headnotes, cit. and quot. in disc., subsec. (1) cit. in disc., com. (b) quot. in disc., com. (i) cit. in disc., illus. 1-22 cit. in ftn. March participant brought action for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress against tractor-trailer driver and his employer. Specifically, plaintiff alleged that defendants were liable for the injuries caused by driver's failure to be vigilant on a public roadway, which resulted in his driving into the rear of the procession, killing one and injuring others. The trial court entered summary judgment for defendants. The intermediate appellate court affirmed in part and reversed in part. Reversing, this court held that intentional infliction of emotional distress was not available as an independent cause of action unless the wrongdoer intended to cause such distress or such distress was the primary risk created by his reckless conduct. Standard Fruit and Vegetable Co., Inc. v. Johnson, 985 S.W.2d 62, 62, 65-68.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Tex.1996. Com. (d) quot. in sup. and quot. in case quot. in sup. Mother of a child who was removed from her home by the state department of human services (DHS) and placed in foster care sued a DHS caseworker, among others, for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. After the jury returned a verdict for plaintiff, the trial court granted judgment n.o.v. in favor of defendant; the court of appeals reversed. Reversing in part and rendering, this court held, inter alia, that defendant's conduct in asking plaintiff to sign a plan of permanent placement for the child during the same telephone conversation in which she informed plaintiff that the child was missing from her foster home was not extreme and outrageous behavior, as required to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress; it was appropriate behavior in the context of defendant's job as a DHS caseworker. Mattix-Hill v. Reck, 923 S.W.2d 596, 597, 598.

Tex.1995. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. After a store manager bought several items from the store, but did not pay for a Christmas wreath that she was holding, employer's security personnel questioned manager about possible theft. Manager sued store and security employees for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Trial court granted defendants summary judgment. Appellate court reversed in part. Reversing the appellate court and rendering a judgment that plaintiff take nothing, this court held, in part, that, as a matter of law, defendants' conduct was not extreme and outrageous and did not constitute a willful detention of plaintiff. Noting that employers act within their legal rights in investigating reasonably credible allegations of dishonesty of their employees, the court stated that the store merely asked a management-level employee to explain a report of wrongdoing. Randall's Food Markets, Inc. v. Johnson, 891 S.W.2d 640, 644.

Tex.1994. Cit. in ftn. to diss. op. On a certified question from a United States court of appeals, this court held that Texas did not recognize the tort of false-light invasion of privacy because it largely duplicated other rights of recovery, particularly defamation, which was more narrowly tailored than false-light invasion of privacy to restrict free speech as little as possible. A dissent argued that false-light invasion of privacy should be recognized in Texas, despite reservations about possible infringement of free speech rights, since related torts were designed to protect different interests. Cain v. Hearst Corp., 878 S.W.2d 577, 586.

Tex.1994. Cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. and quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (h) quot. in case quot. in sup. Workers' compensation claimant sued adjusting firm and a claims adjuster for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, arising from defendants' handling of her claim. The intermediate appellate court remanded plaintiff's cause of action after the trial court had rendered a take-nothing summary judgment for defendants. After the intermediate appellate court's ruling, this court adopted in a separate case the elements of this section for proving intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court reversed the intermediate appellate court and rendered judgment that plaintiff take nothing, holding that, although plaintiff's allegations, taken as true, might constitute bad faith, they did not go beyond all possible bounds of decency. Natividad v. Alexsis, Inc., 875 S.W.2d 695, 696, 698, 699.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Tex.1993. Cit. in disc. and in ftn., cit. generally in conc. op., cit. in diss. op., subsec. (1) cit. in diss. op. College student had his friends covertly videotape female student engaging in sexual intercourse with him. She sued student and his friends for invasion of privacy and negligent infliction of emotional distress arising from video and surrounding gossip. Trial court entered judgment on jury verdict for plaintiff on emotional distress claim and appeals court affirmed. This court reversed and remanded, holding that there was no general duty in Texas not to negligently inflict emotional distress, as a claimant could recover mental anguish damages only in connection with defendant's breach of some other legal duty. Concluding that grossly negligent infliction of emotional distress was not pled or preserved as separate cause of action, the court expressed no opinion whether this theory referred to same mental state as intentional infliction of emotional distress. Concurrence maintained that defendants' conduct was intentional, but that plaintiff intentionally gave up her rights to recover under theory of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Dissent contended that legal duty not to cause harm must be breached by reckless, extreme, or outrageous conduct, resulting in severe psychic harm, and argued that this standard was met through defendants' highly offensive conduct and conscious indifference to others' rights. Boyles v. Kerr, 855 S.W.2d 593, 600, 601, 603, 615.

Tex.1993. Com. (d) cit. in diss. op. In divorce proceeding, wife asserted intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress claims against her husband. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding wife damages on her emotional distress claims, and the intermediate appellate court affirmed. Denying application for writ of error, this court held that wife could recover for intentional, but not negligent, infliction of emotional distress. The dissent argued that jury members had no standard by which to measure the outrageousness of husband's conduct other than their own personal opinions and contended that this was not a workable legal standard. Massey v. Massey, 867 S.W.2d 766, 767.

Tex.1993. Cit. in sup. and adopted, cit. in ftn., cit. in conc. and diss. op. and in ftn. to conc. and diss. op., cit. in diss. op.; subsec. (1) cit. in sup. and in ftn. to conc. and diss. op.; com. (d) quot. in sup., cit. and quot. in conc. and diss. op.; com. (h) cit. in ftn., cit. and quot. in conc. and diss. op.; com. (i) quot. in diss. op. During divorce proceeding, wife asserted general claim for emotional harm from husband's bondage activities without specifying whether claim was based on negligent or intentional infliction of emotional distress. Trial court dissolved marriage and awarded wife emotional distress damages. Appeals court affirmed, holding that wife could recover for negligent infliction of emotional distress. This court reversed and remanded based on its recent decision that no cause of action for negligent infliction of emotional distress existed in Texas; however, the court expressly adopted the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that such a claim could be brought in a divorce proceeding. Concurring and dissenting opinion argued that tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress should not be recognized or should at least be carefully restricted because nebulous standard of “outrageousness” was a subjective notion and resulted in erratic decisions with no unifying principle. Dissent argued that negligent infliction of emotional distress claim was viable and that the plurality decision should have acknowledged severe emotional distress often caused unintentionally. Twyman v. Twyman, 855 S.W.2d 619, 621, 622, 624, 625, 630-632, 636, 644, 645.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Tex.1993. Cit. in sup., coms. (d) and (h) quot. in part in sup. A terminated employee sued her former employer, alleging, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The intermediate appellate court reversed the trial court's grant of summary judgment for employer. This court reversed the intermediate appellate court and rendered judgment that plaintiff take nothing, holding that employer's conduct in having a security guard escort plaintiff from the employment premises after her termination was, as a matter of law, not sufficiently outrageous to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Wornick Co. v. Casas, 856 S.W.2d 732, 734.

Tex.1992. Quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc., cit. in ftn. to diss. op. Employee who was fired after admitting he stole company property sued former employer for "false light" invasion of privacy and intentional infliction of emotional distress after employer circulated information about his termination among fellow employees. Trial court entered judgment on jury verdict for plaintiff on both counts. The court of appeals affirmed the judgment under the "false light" theory but held that no evidence supported the jury's verdict as to intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court reversed and remanded for a new trial on the "false light" theory, but affirmed as to the emotional distress claim. The court declined to expressly recognize the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress, but concluded as a matter of law that defendant's actions did not reach the requisite level of outrageousness. Dissent argued that defendant's actions of falsely and deliberately blackening the name of a worker to co-workers and other potential employers constituted sufficiently outrageous conduct. Diamond Shamrock Refining v. Mendez, 844 S.W.2d 198, 201, 202, 219.

Tex.1967. Subsec. (1) cit. but dist. The plaintiff, a mathematician invited to eat at a buffet luncheon given by a certain corporation, sued in assault and battery for damages from humiliation and exemplary damages when the manager of the defendant club where the luncheon was held, which was located in the defendant motel, snatched the plaintiff's plate from him and shouted that he could not be served because he was a Negro. Although the court recognized that recovery could be had when intentional or reckless conduct causes emotional distress, it did not invoke that tort here, finding that the damages for a battery embraced damages to the personal dignity of the victim. The court on those grounds affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff. Fisher v. Carrousel Motor Hotel, Inc., 424 S.W.2d 627, 630.

Tex.App.

Tex.App.2023. Quot. in case quot. in sup. Development company sued lot owners for breach of contract after owners decided not to use developer's company to build on their lot; owners counterclaimed, asserting, among other things, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) after developer threatened to ruin their lives and prevented them from developing their lot. The trial court, among other things, entered judgment on a jury verdict in favor of owners for their IIED claim. This court reversed, holding that developer's conduct was not so extreme or outrageous as to support owners' IIED claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court explained that meritorious claims for IIED were rare because most human conduct, even verbal abuse and threats, could not be characterized as extreme and outrageous, and that developer's single five-minute confrontation in which he verbally abused, intimidated, and bullied owners was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to warrant recovery. Bill Wyly Development, Inc. v. Smith, 680 S.W.3d 679, 684.

Tex.App.2018. Com. (d) cit. and quot. in cases cit. and quot. in conc. and diss. op. Dentist brought a lawsuit against employer and dental practice, alleging that defendants had, inter alia, intentionally inflicted emotional distress upon her when they reported plaintiff to police for allegedly stealing funds from practice. The trial court denied the parties' motions to dismiss. This court affirmed in part and entered judgment for defendants, holding that defendants' alleged conduct was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. In agreeing with the majority that defendants' actions were not extreme enough, the concurring and dissenting opinion explained that reporting plaintiff's actions to the police under the belief that plaintiff had stolen money did not rise to the level of going beyond all possible bounds of decency, as set forth in Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d. Robert B. James, DDS, Inc. v. Elkins, 553 S.W.3d 596, 627, 628.

Tex.App.2017. Subsec. (1) cit. in sup.; com. (d) quot. in cases cit. and quot. in sup.; coms. (e) and (f) and illus. 7 and 8 cit. in sup. Operator of a radio station sued advertising firms, seeking to recover amounts allegedly owed for advertising and other services that firms purchased from station on behalf of their clients; firms and their principal counterclaimed for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that station demanded payment based on false invoices and told other public-media outlets that firms and their principal were "deadbeats." The trial court denied station's motion to dismiss the emotional-distress counterclaim. This court reversed that portion of the decision and remanded, holding that station's alleged conduct in reporting a disputed debt as unpaid and in calling firms and their principal deadbeats was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. MVS International Corporation v. International Advertising Solutions, LLC, 545 S.W.3d 180, 203, 204.

Tex.App.2015. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee who left employment with church after making sexual-harassment allegations against a church elder filed, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against church, alleging that defendant caused her new employer to terminate her by prompting the new employer to check plaintiff's references and by church employees having conversations with the new employer regarding her reasons for leaving church's employment. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant; this court affirmed in part. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, the court held that defendant's conduct of instigating a conversation with plaintiff's new employer about plaintiff's termination and providing an unfavorable reference was not "so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree," as required to support an IIED claim. Shannon v. Memorial Drive Presbyterian Church U.S., 476 S.W.3d 612, 630.

Tex.App.2014. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former college track coach brought claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, against college, college president, and college's athletic director, alleging that president intentionally lied to the track team by telling them that certain of plaintiff's actions made them ineligible to compete in the 2010 championships, when in fact it was because athletic director failed to submit required paperwork. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. Affirming in part, this court held that, even accepting all of plaintiff's evidence as true, it was not sufficient to show that defendants' conduct was so extreme and outrageous as to permit recovery for IIED. Porter v. Southwestern Christian College, 428 S.W.3d 377, 384.

Tex.App.2010. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in conc. op. Plaintiffs brought action for defamation and intentional infliction of emotional distress against website publisher in connection with several derogatory statements about them that were posted by anonymous users to a portion of the website titled "Guest Book." The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant. This court affirmed, holding, among other things, that there was no summary judgment evidence that proved defendant's failure to remove the anonymous posts constituted extreme and outrageous conduct under the circumstances. The concurring opinion argued that the availability in Texas of a tort claim like that described in Restatement Second of Torts § 577, which imposed liability on a property owner for an intentional and unreasonable failure to remove material that might be easily removed and that was known to be defamatory, might preclude the exceptional "gap-filler" type remedy of intentional infliction of emotional distress that plaintiffs asserted here. Milo v. Martin, 311 S.W.3d 210, 222.

Tex.App.2008. Adopted in case cit. in conc. op., com. (g) quot. in ftn. High-school vice-principal sued students for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), inter alia, alleging that they created a website that would look as if it had been created by her, and that contained lewd, false, and obscene comments and pictures that implied that she was a lesbian. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. Affirming, this court held that plaintiff's IIED claim failed because the gravamen of her complaint was defamation, and she failed to allege facts independent of her defamation claim, which also failed. The court rejected plaintiff's allegations that opposing counsel threatened to sue her co-worker and drafted correspondence that severely distressed her during the litigation, explaining that a person could not be liable for asserting his legal rights even though he was aware that, in doing so, he was sure to cause emotional distress. The concurrence expressed frustration with the fact that an injured target of outrageous Internet conduct such as plaintiff could find no civil remedy under Texas law, since the tort of IIED was no more than a "gap-filler" tort that was virtually impossible to establish. Draker v. Schreiber, 271 S.W.3d 318, 324, 326.

Tex.App.2008. Cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Co-owners of a 40-acre property that they purchased at sheriff's sale brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), along with their claim for "cloud on title," against former owner and his wife, alleging that defendants interfered with plaintiffs' use of the property and harassed them. While the trial court found for plaintiffs on the title issues, it awarded them zero damages on their IIED claim. This court affirmed, holding that the trial court did not err in concluding that plaintiffs failed to prove that defendants' conduct was extreme and outrageous, an essential element of their IIED claim. Smith v. Hennington, 249 S.W.3d 600, 605.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Tex.App.2006. Coms. (d) and (e) cit. in sup., com. (f) cit. in sup. and in ftn. Judgment creditor sued for a declaratory judgment that judgment debtor's wife's business properties were community property and thus subject to execution to satisfy the debt, and obtained a temporary restraining order and an ex parte receivership to prevent dissipation of business assets; wife counterclaimed for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding wife actual and punitive damages on the counterclaims. Reversing and rendering judgment that wife take nothing, this court held, inter alia, that creditor's act of securing the appointment of a receiver, who had the authority to monitor sales and purchases, but who was never rude, insolent, or interfering, and whose presence was court-sanctioned, did not constitute the extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Montemayor v. Ortiz, 208 S.W.3d 627, 655, 656.

Tex.App.2005. Com. (d) quot. generally in case quot. in disc. and cit. in ftn. Former employee sued her employer for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, contending that she was forced to resign after refusing to follow her supervisor's instructions, which she believed violated federal law. The trial court entered judgment on the jury's take-nothing verdict on the emotional-distress claim. Affirming in part, this court held, inter alia, that, although plaintiff's testimony about her termination and the reasons for it was relevant evidence of whether supervisor engaged in extreme and outrageous conduct, and the trial court abused its discretion by refusing to permit plaintiff's counsel to discuss that evidence in closing argument, the trial court's error did not result in the rendition of an improper judgment, because plaintiff failed as a matter of law to establish her claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Bryant v. Lucent Technologies, Inc., 175 S.W.3d 845, 849.

Tex.App.2005. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former city employee brought age-discrimination claims against city and intentional-infliction-of-emotional-distress claim against former supervisor. The trial court entered judgment for plaintiff against both the city and supervisor on all claims. This court modified the judgment against the city and reversed on plaintiff's claim against supervisor, holding, inter alia, that evidence that supervisor, among other things, insulted plaintiff daily over a period of eight months, calling her “stupid, senile, and incompetent,” was legally insufficient to support a finding that supervisor engaged in the extreme and outrageous conduct required to sustain an intentional-infliction-of-emotional-distress claim. City of Houston v. Fletcher, 166 S.W.3d 479, 492.

Tex.App.2005. Cit. in disc. Stepfather sued his stepdaughter for defamation after she told her mother and others that he had repeatedly sexually abused her. The stepdaughter counterclaimed for assault and intentional infliction of emotional distress, and the trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding her $300,000 in damages against stepfather. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that sufficient evidence supported the damages award for stepdaughter's emotional-distress claim, particularly in light of the emotional harm she suffered from learning that her stepfather had made videotapes of their sexual encounters and threatened to show them to others. Separate and apart from the actual sexual assaults, stepfather's actions were extreme and outrageous as a matter of law, and thus the emotional-distress damages were recoverable in addition to damages for assault. Conley v. Driver, 175 S.W.3d 882, 886, 888.

Tex.App.2004. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee sued employer and its officers for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that he was discriminated against and fired for filing workers' compensation claim. Trial court granted defendants summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding that plaintiff did not provide evidence as to job assignments that raised fact issue as to whether defendants' conduct in assigning work to plaintiff was extreme or outrageous. Furthermore, plaintiff's allegations that defendants verbally attacked and threatened him and told him to engage in illegal activities such as ignoring safety regulations did not show that defendants' conduct constituted more than ordinary employment disputes in management of the business, which did not constitute extreme and outrageous conduct. Benners v. Blanks Color Imaging, Inc., 133 S.W.3d 364, 373.

Tex.App.2003. Com. (h) cit. in disc. Contractor on a project to build a house for homeowners brought suit for, in part, malicious prosecution and intentional infliction of emotional distress against homeowners and lender, after criminal charges against contractor for misapplication of funds from a construction loan were dropped. The trial court entered judgment for plaintiff. Reversing in part and rendering judgment that plaintiff take nothing on his emotional-distress claim, this court held, inter alia, that homeowners' filing of a criminal complaint against plaintiff was not sufficiently outrageous to permit recovery for intentional infliction of emotional distress. San Antonio Credit Union v. O'Connor, 115 S.W.3d 82, 101.

Tex.App.2002. Subsec. (1) cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. and quot. in case cit. in disc. Author of internet commentary that called high-school prom a “huge gang fight” filed a countersuit for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress against school district that had sued him for defamation. After the trial court severed the countersuit from the district's original suit, it granted summary judgment for district. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that although the district's defamation lawsuit had no legal merit, neither the suit nor public comments of the district's trustees constituted extreme and outrageous conduct sufficient to support a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Klein & Associates Political Relations v. Port Arthur Independent School, 92 S.W.3d 889, 898.

Tex.App.2002. Com. (h) quot. in case quot. in disc. Neighbors of warehouse in which oil company stored chemicals sued company for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, in relation to chemical spill and statements made by company employees. One employee had threatened countersuit if plaintiffs brought suit over spill, and another employee criticized plaintiffs in discussions with fellow church parishioners and suggested that illness of plaintiff's relatives was a punishment from God. Jury awarded plaintiffs damages. This court reversed and rendered judgment for company, holding, inter alia, that employees' statements did not constitute extreme and outrageous conduct. Quaker Petroleum Chemicals Co. v. Waldrop, 75 S.W.3d 549, 554.

Tex.App.2001. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Father of girl who was being hidden by mother after father was awarded custody brought action against television station and reporter who interviewed mother with daughter for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress for failing to disclose daughter's location and for interfering with his possessory right in his daughter. The trial court denied defendants summary judgment. Reversing and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that defendants' conduct was not so extreme or outrageous as to support claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. A.H. Belo Corp. v. Corcoran, 52 S.W.3d 375, 383.

Tex.App.2001. Com. (d) cit. in case cit. in sup. Hospital patient sued hospital for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendant withheld from plaintiff for 18 months four pathology slides that plaintiff had requested to enable her to obtain a second opinion on her Crohn's disease diagnosis. Reversing in part the trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendant and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that defendant's failure to provide the pathology slides, apparently without any explanation or excuse, for an extended period of time during which it had reason to know that plaintiff was suffering and delaying further treatment constituted sufficiently extreme and outrageous conduct to allow a jury to assess liability. Elliott v. Methodist Hosp., 54 S.W.3d 789, 797.

Tex.App.2001. Com. (d) quot. in disc. After attorney sued client for past-due legal fees, client counterclaimed for fraud and misrepresentation and also sued for emotional distress. Jury found that attorney defrauded client and intentionally inflicted emotional distress upon her. This court affirmed the sanctions against the attorney, but reversed the damages award to client, holding, inter alia, that client's emotional-distress claim failed. Even though attorney did not behave in a socially appropriate manner when he had a sexual relationship with client during her divorce proceeding, and sent her a bill for legal fees that client thought attorney would do for free after he ended their relationship, attorney's actions were not extreme and outrageous conduct. Gaspard v. Beadle, 36 S.W.3d 229, 238.

Tex.App.2001. Com. (d) cit. in sup. Wife of a city employee who was fired for unauthorized use of a city-owned camera to take provocative photographs of wife sued law firm and its partner who enlarged one of the photos to poster size for use at public hearing, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress. Trial court entered judgment on jury verdict for plaintiff. This court reversed and rendered judgment for defendants, holding that partner's actions in displaying and commenting on photos, while rude and unprofessional, did not rise to requisite level of extreme and outrageous conduct. Haynes & Boone, L.L.P. v. Chason, 81 S.W.3d 307, 309-310, 314.

Tex.App.2001. Subsec. (1) cit. in case cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. After university fired employee because of accusations that he sexually harassed a female student who worked as a parttime employee in the same office, employee sued the student for libel and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. Trial court entered judgment on jury verdict for employee on the emotional-distress claim. This court reversed and rendered a take-nothing judgment, holding, inter alia, that student's complaint about employee, her coworker, to a supervisor and her signing of a statement based upon her complaint did not constitute extreme and outrageous conduct. Henderson v. Wellmann, 43 S.W.3d 591, 596.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Tex.App.2001. Cit. generally in case quot. in sup., com. (d) quot. generally in sup. and cit. in case cit. in ftn. Widow of contractor who contracted to build storage units sued customer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, after customer made repeated rude and demanding phone calls during course of contractor's illness and after his death. Jury awarded widow damages, but trial court granted customer's motion for judgment n.o.v. This court reversed and remanded, holding, inter alia, that evidence supported jury's findings that customer acted intentionally or recklessly and that his conduct was extreme and outrageous. The court rejected customer's assertion that his actions were privileged because he was insisting on his legal rights in enforcing contract. Although customer knew widow was susceptible to emotional distress due to husband's fatal illness, he continued to engage in harassing and intimidating conduct. McLure v. Tiller, 63 S.W.3d 72, 82, judgment reversed 121 S.W.3d 709 (Tex.2003). See above case.

Tex.App.2001. Cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. and cit. in conc. and diss. op. Former employee sued employer for wrongful termination and intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Trial court entered judgment on jury verdict for plaintiff. This court reversed in part, holding that plaintiff's emotional-distress claim failed because defendant's threat to "blackball" plaintiff in the industry and defendant's alleged firing of plaintiff for failing to perform illegal acts, while deplorable, did not constitute extreme and outrageous conduct. Concurring and dissenting opinion argued that defendant's conduct was extreme and outrageous, and that the issue of whether severe emotional distress existed was question of fact for jury. Rescar, Inc. v. Ward, 60 S.W.3d 169, 180, 187.

Tex.App.2001. Cit. in sup, subsec. (1) adopted in case cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in sup. and in diss. op. and cit. and quot. in cases quot. in disc., com. (j) cit. in sup. Insurance agent sued insurance company for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendant terminated his employment after falsely implicating him in a kickback scheme. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiff. Affirming in part, this court held that defendant's conduct in pursuing a damaging course of action against plaintiff, even after plaintiff was fired, by involving several federal agencies, such as the IRS, with punitive powers and by attempting to have plaintiff's insurance license revoked was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to result in liability. The dissent argued that defendant's acts did not constitute outrageous conduct, and thus did not support plaintiff's claim. Texas Farm Bureau Ins. Companies v. Sears, 54 S.W.3d 361, 373-375, 379, judgment reversed 84 S.W.3d 604 (Tex.2002). See above case.

Tex.App.2001. Coms. (d), (h) and (j) quot. in sup. Wife countersued husband for divorce and filed tort claim for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Trial court bifurcated the actions and entered judgment n.o.v. for husband on tort claims. Reversing in part and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that evidence of physical and mental abuse was sufficient to support finding that husband caused wife severe emotional distress and that husband's behavior was extreme and outrageous. Toles v. Toles, 45 S.W.3d 252, 261, 262, 263.

Tex.App.2001. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Store employee sued former employer for disability discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress, after he was fired for violating the company's policy on sexual harassment. Trial court entered judgment on jury verdict for plaintiff. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that there was sufficient evidence that employer's conduct was extreme and outrageous. There was evidence that employer's investigation of the charges against plaintiff was incomplete and biased, that employer failed to uniformly implement its policy regarding sexual harassment by demoting one person accused of harassment, yet firing plaintiff, and that the store's director instructed a witness to falsify her statement implicating plaintiff. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Canchola, 64 S.W.3d 524, 540, judgment reversed 121 S.W.3d 735 (Tex.2003). See above case.

Tex.App.2000. Cit. in case cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. and cit. in case quot. in sup., coms. (e), (f), (h), and (j) cit. and quot. in sup., illus. 7 quot. in sup., illus. 11 and 13 cit. in sup. Former employee of a local union sued the union and a union trustee for sexual harassment and retaliation and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. Trial court granted defendants summary judgment. This court affirmed in part and reversed in part, holding, inter alia, that the trustee's conduct, viewed in light of trustee's harassment directed toward plaintiff, his position of authority over her, and his manipulation of plaintiff's peculiar susceptibilities to emotional distress, could be regarded as extreme and outrageous conduct. Plaintiff claimed that her suffering was severe, pervasive, and involved her job, and that she felt threatened, intimidated, and humiliated when trustee implied that her job was conditioned on acquiescing to his advances. Fields v. Teamsters Local Union No. 988, 23 S.W.3d 517, 530-533.

Tex.App.1999. Subsec. (1) cit. in headnote and cit. in case cit. in sup., com. (d) cit. in headnote, cit. and quot. in sup., and quot. in conc. op., coms. (e) and (h) cit. in headnote and sup., com. (j) cit. in headnote and quot. in sup. A female job seeker sued a car dealership and its employee for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that the employee made sexual advances toward her while ostensibly assisting her in obtaining a job at the dealership. Trial court entered judgment on jury verdict for plaintiff. This court affirmed in part and reversed in part, holding, inter alia, that it was reasonable for the jury to conclude that defendant's conduct constituted extreme and outrageous conduct, but the evidence was insufficient to establish severe emotional distress. Concurrence argued that defendant's conduct was not extreme and outrageous. Gonzales v. Willis, 995 S.W.2d 729, 735, 736, 740.

Tex.App.1999. Cit. in headnote, cit. in case cit. in disc. An employee was fired after testing positive for cocaine in a company drug test. He sued the company for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. Trial court entered judgment on jury verdict for plaintiff. This court reversed and rendered a take-nothing judgment, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to prove that defendant acted intentionally or recklessly. There was no evidence that the urine sample collectors conspired with the plaintiff's supervisor and the company's assistant district manager to taint or switch plaintiff's samples with those of another employee. Halliburton Company v. Sanchez, 996 S.W.2d 216, 218.

Tex.App.1999. Quot. in case cit. in ftn. County department employee was fired for assisting a co-worker in writing a letter criticizing the department; employee sued the department director for libel, slander, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendant made false, misleading, and untrue statements about her, directed other employees to assist in his scheme to cast plaintiff in a false light, and violated the department's confidentiality provisions. Trial court granted defendant summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that defendant's conduct was not outrageous, because plaintiff was unexpectedly terminated in a private meeting with defendant after he had investigated the situation and discussed it with other managers. Leatherman v. Rangel, 986 S.W.2d 759, 764.

Tex.App.1998. Com. (d) quot. in disc. School district employee sued television station for defamation and intentional infliction of emotional distress after station reported that employee, assistant superintendent for business services for school district, engaged in bid-rigging and racketeering. The trial court entered summary judgment for station. Affirming, this court held that employee was a public official, that employee failed to establish that station acted with actual malice when reporting the allegations against him, and that reporting employee's involvement in criminal activity was not extreme, outrageous, or beyond all bounds of decency in a civilized society. Beck v. Lone Star Broadcasting Co., 970 S.W.2d 610, 619.

Tex.App.1998. Com. (d) cit. in case cit. in disc. Discharged television-station manager sued the station for breach of contract and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. Trial court granted defendant summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that neither plaintiff's termination nor the manner in which it was done constituted outrageous behavior, because there was no harassment and the behavior did not continue for an extended period of time. Gilmartin v. KVTV—Channel 13, 985 S.W.2d 553, 557.

Tex.App.1998. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in disc. Debtor brought tort action against creditor in connection with defendant's collection attempts. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiff. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and rendering in part, this court held, among other things, that defendant's persistent, vulgar, and abusive telephone calls to plaintiff at both her home and office constituted intentional infliction of emotional distress, as well as an actionable invasion of privacy. Household Credit Services, Inc. v. Driscol, 989 S.W.2d 72, 81.

Tex.App.1998. Coms. (d) and (h) cit. generally in headnote and cit. in sup. Former employee brought an action for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress against former employer and supervisor. The trial court entered judgment for defendants. Affirming in part, this court held, inter alia, that, although supervisor's conduct in swearing at plaintiff about work-related matters, giving out bad references, and beeping him at night 20 to 30 times for no reason was, if true, insensitive or rude, it did not, as a matter of law, constitute extreme and outrageous behavior and thus did not support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Saucedo v. Rheem Mfg. Co., 974 S.W.2d 117, 118, 123.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Tex.App.1998. Com. (d) cit. generally in headnote and cit. in disc. Twenty-two plaintiffs brought suit against pipeline companies for damages resulting from an explosion at an underground salt-dome storage facility and pipeline pumping station. The trial court entered judgment awarding plaintiffs damages. Vacating in part, this court held, inter alia, that, because plaintiffs presented no evidence to suggest that defendants' actions were motivated by animus, hostility, malevolence, or ill will, the presence of gross negligence alone was not sufficient to support an award for mental anguish arising solely from damage to property. Seminole Pipeline v. Broad Leaf Partners, 979 S.W.2d 730, 754.

Tex.App.1998. Com. (h) cit. in disc. Former employees sued former employer for assault and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendant subjected them to unwanted touching and made sexually suggestive remarks. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding plaintiffs actual and punitive damages, but ordered a remittitur. Affirming in part, this court held, inter alia, that the evidence was both legally and factually sufficient to support the jury's finding of intentional infliction of emotional distress, showing that defendant acted intentionally or recklessly, that his conduct was extreme and outrageous and caused plaintiffs emotional distress, and that the emotional distress was severe. Additionally, the evidence showed that defendant's conduct went beyond all possible bounds of decency, and was utterly intolerable in a civilized society. Stokes v. Puckett, 972 S.W.2d 921, 924.

Tex.App.1997. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Parents sued a hospital and a doctor for, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress arising from defendants' failure to dispose of the mother's stillborn fetus in a respectful way. The trial court granted the hospital's motion for a directed verdict on the claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court affirmed in part and reversed in part, holding, inter alia, that defendants' actions of preserving the fetus in a sealed container and storing it in the hospital's morgue did not constitute extreme and outrageous conduct. Although defendants' conduct was nonchalant and insensitive, they did not abuse the fetus. Angeles v. Brownsville Valley Reg. Med., 960 S.W.2d 854, 860.

Tex.App.1997. Subsec. (1) cit. in headnote, cit. in case cit. in sup., and quot. in sup. After a 15-year-old rape victim was refused treatment in a hospital emergency room, her mother sued the hospital, its director of emergency services, and an emergency room nurse for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that the nurse refused to examine the victim, implied that the victim had not been raped, and violated the victim's privacy by interviewing her in the public waiting room. The trial court granted a take-nothing summary judgment in favor of defendants. This court affirmed in part and reversed in part, holding, inter alia, that, although the nurse was rude, insensitive, and uncaring, her conduct did not rise to the level necessary for intentional infliction of emotional distress. C.M. v. Tomball Regional Hosp., 961 S.W.2d 236, 238, 244.

Tex.App.1997. Com. (d) quot. but dist. Owner of company that contracted with airline to provide mail and baggage handling services sued airline for, inter alia, defamation and intentional infliction of emotional distress after airline terminated the parties' contract because company's employees had engaged in theft while on the job. The trial court denied airline's motion for summary judgment. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held that statements on the part of airline representatives that company did not meet airline's standards under the contractual agreement were either not defamatory or were substantially true, and that representatives' actions in making the statements did not constitute conduct that was extreme, outrageous, or utterly intolerable in a civilized society. Delta Air Lines, Inc. v. Norris, 949 S.W.2d 422, 428.

Tex.App.1997. Cit. in headnote, com. (g) cit. in case cit. in disc. A newspaper ran an article reporting on the various arrests made by the city police department at local parks in conjunction with an undercover operation targeting sex offenders. A man who was arrested for indecent exposure committed suicide shortly after publication of the article. The man's estate sued the newspaper publisher and the reporter who wrote the article, alleging invasion of privacy and intentional infliction of emotional distress, in that the defendants printed private facts about the man that essentially "outed" him as a homosexual against his wishes. Trial court granted defendants summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state an emotional-distress claim, because defendants' conduct in publishing information contained in public records, as a matter of law, was not outrageous. Although the court expressed no opinion concerning whether a newspaper should exercise its right to publish the names of persons arrested for lewd conduct, it could not conclude that a newspaper's otherwise lawful conduct was beyond all possible bounds of decency. Hogan v. Hearst Corp., 945 S.W.2d 246, 247, 251.

Tex.App.1997. Cit. in headnotes, cit. in disc., quot. in diss. op., subsecs. (1) and (2) cit. in disc. and cit. in diss. op., subsecs. (2)(a) and (b) cit. in diss. op., coms. (d)-(l) and illus. 1-22 cit. in diss. op. March participant brought action for negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress against tractor-trailer driver and his employer. Specifically, plaintiff alleged that defendants were liable for the injuries caused by driver's failure to be vigilant on a public roadway, which resulted in his driving into the rear of the procession, killing one and injuring others. The trial court entered summary judgment for defendants. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held that plaintiff had not stated a viable claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress; however, material factual issues existed as to whether driver's actions in possibly falling asleep at the wheel and jeopardizing the lives of those around him constituted extreme or outrageous conduct. Dissent believed that, in order to prevail, plaintiff was required to show that the tortious conduct was directed specifically at him. Johnson v. Standard Fruit and Vegetable Co., Inc., 984 S.W.2d 633, 633, 639-641, 643, reversed 985 S.W.2d 62 (Tex. 1998). See above case.

Tex.App.1997. Cit. in case quot. in disc., subsec. (1) cit. in disc. Husband and wife were arrested and charged with criminal trespass after a visit to the home of husband's elderly mother; they sued complainant, husband's brother, among others, for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Mother, who had previously informed complainant that husband and wife had been harassing and disturbing her, gave complainant her power of attorney authorizing him to file complaints against trespassers. The trial court granted complainant's motion for summary judgment. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held, among other things, that complainant's decision to file a criminal complaint against husband and wife did not constitute outrageous conduct where he was doing no more than what he was entitled to do under the circumstances. Lang v. City of Nacogdoches, 942 S.W.2d 752, 759.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Tex.App.1997. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in sup. Female employee of gas company sued employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that she was the victim of a co-worker's continuing offensive and abusive conduct and remarks. The trial court granted employer's motion for summary judgment. Reversing and remanding, this court held, in part, that co-worker's conduct, which included touching employee at the site of her breast cancer surgery, ridiculing her surgery, and referring to her as "lopsided," was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and that material factual issues existed as to employer's liability for co-worker's behavior. Soto v. El Paso Natural Gas Co., 942 S.W.2d 671, 681.

Tex.App.1997. Cit. in headnote, cit. in case cit. in disc., com. (h) quot. in case cit. in diss. op. Employees who were discharged in retaliation for having complained to the Texas Commission for Human Rights of sexual harassment in the workplace sued employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiffs. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding in part, this court held, among other things, that the termination of plaintiffs in retaliation for protesting the illegal act of workplace sexual harassment constituted extreme and outrageous conduct. Dissent believed that the law required the manner of termination to be extreme and outrageous, and that the mere act of firing an at-will employee, even for an illegal reason, was not sufficiently outrageous to support an action for the intentional infliction of emotional distress. S.W. Bell Mobile Systems v. Franco, 951 S.W.2d 218, 218, 221, 231, affirmed in part, reversed in part 971 S.W.2d 52 (Tex.1998). See above case.

Tex.App.1997. Cit. in headnote, com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (j) cit. in disc. and cit. in case cit. in disc. Individual sued former life partner for breach of contract and breach of oral or implied partnership agreement, seeking recovery for services rendered in consideration of the parties' nonmarital, conjugal relationship. Plaintiff also asserted a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that defendant exposed him to the human immunodeficiency virus. The trial court dismissed the complaint. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held that, to the extent plaintiff sought recovery for services rendered in consideration of his relationship with defendant, his claim was one for palimony and, as such, was barred by the Statute of Frauds, and that the pleadings failed to allege intentional or outrageous conduct on the part of defendant, or that plaintiff sustained severe mental distress; however, plaintiff was entitled to amend the pleadings to cure any defects related to his claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Zaremba v. Cliburn, 949 S.W.2d 822, 823, 828.

Tex.App.1996. Com. (g) cit. in case quot. in disc. Hospital patient sued hospital for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress when she discovered, postsurgery, that hospital had assigned her a semiprivate room, not the private room she requested prior to admission. After complaining, however, patient was placed in a private room. Affirming the trial court's entry of summary judgment for hospital, this court held, in part, that hospital's insistence that patient pay for the private room did not subject it to liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Delgado v. Methodist Hosp., 936 S.W.2d 479, 486.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Tex.App.1996. Cit. in headnote, adopted in case cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. but dist. Individual who was prosecuted in connection with his roommate's scheme to embezzle funds and launder money through individual's checking account sued bank for, inter alia, malicious prosecution, negligence, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court directed a verdict for bank on the malicious prosecution claim, and entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding individual approximately $3 million in damages on the remaining claims. Reversing and rendering a take-nothing judgment, this court held that bank, which merely provided the authorities with the relevant facts but did not initiate the criminal proceedings, could not be found liable for malicious prosecution; that bank owed individual no duty of care and thus could not be adjudged negligent; and that bank's conduct in reporting information to the district attorney was not outrageous. ITT Consumer Financial Corp. v. Tovar, 932 S.W.2d 147, 148, 158.

Tex.App.1996. Cit. in headnote, subsec. (1) cit. in disc. Fast-food restaurant employee who claimed to have been sexually harassed by two managers sued employer and managers for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted employer's motion for summary judgment and severed employee's action against it from the remainder of the case. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held that, even if the exclusive remedy provision of Texas's Workers' Compensation Act did not bar employee's claim, she could not recover absent proof that employer intentionally or recklessly committed the acts causing the alleged mental distress. Mackey v. U.P. Enterprises, Inc., 935 S.W.2d 446, 447, 454.

Tex.App.1996. Cit. in sup., subsec. (1) adopted in case quot. in disc. Woman sued employees of the department of human services for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, claiming that they acted outrageously while investigating allegations that woman's daughter had been sexually molested by her stepfather. After the jury returned a verdict finding some employees liable and exonerating others, the trial court entered judgment n.o.v. for all employees. Affirming in part and reversing in part, this court held that, while most of the acts complained of did not constitute extreme conduct, the jury could have found outrageous behavior on the part of the employee who attempted to get mother to agree to give up custody while mother was hysterical over her daughter's disappearance from a foster home. Reck v. Londow, 926 S.W.2d 589, 593, judgment reversed in part 923 S.W.2d 596. See above case.

Tex.App.1995. Coms. (d) and (h) cit. in headnotes, quot. in case quot. and cit. in disc. Former employees of thread distributor sued one of distributor's principal customers for tortious interference with contract and intentional infliction of emotional distress after distributor, believing that customer would not enter into a lucrative new contract with it unless plaintiffs were dismissed, terminated them. The trial court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment and this court affirmed, holding that defendant, which, from experience, had reason to doubt plaintiffs' business abilities, was legally justified in interfering with their employment contracts in order to protect its own contractual rights. Given that defendant's conduct was justified, the court refused to find that it acted atrociously or in a manner considered intolerable in civilized society. Lee v. Levi Strauss & Co., 897 S.W.2d 501, 502, 506.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Tex.App.1995. Subsec. (1) cit. in headnote and disc. Employee sued former employer for, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that employer forced him to do on-site engineering work and desert driving even though it knew that employee had suffered a back injury. Trial court forced plaintiff to elect between pursuing a workers' compensation claim and a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and it directed a verdict for defendant at the conclusion of the trial. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state an emotional-distress cause of action because defendant's conduct was not outrageous. While company did not provide him with an independent medical examination to determine whether or not his disability prevented him from driving, it provided him with medical care, paid his salary, and afforded him hearings through various levels. Nayef v. Arabian American Oil Co., 895 S.W.2d 825, 826, 828.

Tex.App.1995. Com. (g) quot. in sup. Certified public accountant who was reported to the Board of Public Accountancy for alleged misconduct sued attorney who reported him for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted attorney's motion for summary judgment and this court affirmed, holding that the letter he sent detailing accountant's supposed improprieties was protected by an absolute privilege, as it constituted a communication published during proceedings of a quasi-judicial board. Rose v. First American Title Ins. Co. of Texas, 907 S.W.2d 639, 643.

Tex.App.1995. Com. (g) cit. in disc. and headnotes. Tenant sued landlord for wrongful eviction and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Trial court granted landlord summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that, although an eviction is an unpleasant legal proceeding for both landlord and tenant, action taken pursuant to a lease contract does not rise to the level of outrageous conduct necessary to satisfy this element of intentional infliction of emotional distress. It stated that landlord was entitled to terminate the lease as a matter of law. Straus v. Kirby Court Corp., 909 S.W.2d 105, 106, 109.

Tex.App.1995. Subsec. (1) cit. in disc. Two transportation company employees reported that a security officer employed by the company had stolen an electronic bug zapper from transportation company's terminal. Based on the employees' report, the terminal manager contacted the police department and made a complaint. Following an investigation, the officer was arrested and charged with a misdemeanor of theft of property. After being acquitted of all charges, the officer sued the transportation company and the two employees for malicious prosecution, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and civil conspiracy. Trial court entered a take-nothing judgment after jury returned verdict for defendants. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that trial court did not err in refusing to define the term “recklessly” in the court's instructions on the emotional distress issue.

The court stated that the term "reckless" had a commonly understood meaning that did not require any special legal or technical knowledge. Turner v. Roadway Express, Inc., 911 S.W.2d 224, 227.

Tex.App.1995. Cit. in headnote, com. (j) cit. in case cit. in disc., com. (l) cit. in disc. After a divorce, the wife sought modification of the support, visitation, and domicile provisions of the divorce decree. Husband counterclaimed for modification and asserted claims for slander and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that wife had denied access to his children, placed over 100 harassing phone calls to his home, and told his new wife that he had affairs with other women that placed the new wife at risk of contracting AIDS. Trial court awarded husband damages on the emotional-distress claim. This court affirmed in part and reversed in part, holding, inter alia, that husband failed to prove the requisite elements of the emotional-distress claim, because he offered no evidence of the severity of his pain, nor did he demonstrate how the duress was unendurable. Husband did not experience nausea, loss of appetite, sleeplessness, depression, fear, or rage, and he did not consult professional help or suffer a pecuniary loss as a result of wife's actions. Villasenor v. Villasenor, 911 S.W.2d 411, 412, 417.

Tex.App.1994. Coms. (d), (h), and (j) cit. in sup. and cit. generally in headnotes. During a divorce proceeding, husband sued wife for intentional infliction of emotional distress. He specifically alleged that his wife threatened to get a hit man to kill him, that she burst into the bedroom at 1:30 a.m. and pointed a gun at him, and that she falsely accused him of adultery and hired private investigators to trail him. The trial court awarded the husband damages. Affirming, this court held that the evidence supported the trial court's findings that wife intentionally and recklessly engaged in extreme and outrageous conduct that caused husband severe emotional distress. Husband suffered sufficiently severe emotional distress in that, as a result of wife's threats and actions, husband was in fear of his life every day, all the time, and had lost weight, appeared nervous, and cried frequently. Behringer v. Behringer, 884 S.W.2d 839, 840, 841, 844.

Tex.App.1994. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in disc., com. (h) quot. in case cit. in disc. A horse rancher charged with cruelty to animals on the basis of a humane society investigator's complaint sued the investigator and others for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress after the charges were dismissed. Plaintiff, whose horses appeared malnourished because they ingested contaminated water and who had contacted authorities about it, contended that defendant's act of filing his complaint constituted outrageous conduct. Affirming the trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendant, this court held that, although he had misunderstood the situation, he did so in good faith, and societal interests in preventing animal cruelty militated against holding him liable for any harm suffered by plaintiff as a result of these misperceptions. Furthermore, defendant's honest mistake was neither atrocious nor intolerable. Carr v. Mobile Video Tapes, Inc., 893 S.W.2d 613, 620, 621.

Tex.App.1994. Com. (d) quot. in part in sup. Former employee sued her former employer, alleging sexual harassment and retaliatory discharge and seeking to recover damages for, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress for employees' retaliatory conduct after plaintiff's supervisor was dismissed in connection with plaintiff's sexual-harassment claim.

Affirming the trial court's granting of summary judgment for employer, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff, who had returned to work after termination of the supervisor who had sexually harassed her, failed to state an emotional-distress claim, since the hostility of coemployees upon her return in their circulating of a petition suggesting that plaintiff had lied about the sexual harassment was not conduct so extreme or outrageous that employer's actions in not separating plaintiff from them could be said to be beyond all possible bounds of decency. Ewald v. Wornick Family Foods Corp., 878 S.W.2d 653, 660.

Tex.App.1994. Com. (h) cit. in sup. Deaf-mute customer sued car dealership and its employees, bringing various claims, including one for intentional infliction of emotional distress during negotiations for sale of a vehicle. Affirming the trial court's entry of judgment awarding plaintiff damages but not attorney fees, this court held, inter alia, that there was sufficient evidence to support plaintiff's emotional-distress claim in that plaintiff's requests for return of his check and that he be allowed to go home became more and more frequent and, although the salesman did not think plaintiff was lying when he stated that they were making him crazy and that he was becoming sick and confused and needed rest, the decision was made to subject plaintiff to takeover of the negotiations by another salesman. George Grubbs Ent., Inc. v. Bien, 881 S.W.2d 843, 853.

Tex.App.1994. Cit. in sup. and in diss. op., subsec. (1) cit. in diss. op., com. (j) quot. in part in sup. Motorist sued another driver who had used vulgar language to her during and after a traffic altercation, seeking to recover damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Reversing the trial court's entry of judgment for plaintiff motorist and rendering, this court held that the evidence was legally insufficient to support a finding of severe emotional distress, particularly when plaintiff did not seek professional help for her alleged depression, offered no evidence of the severity of her depression or humiliation, did not demonstrate how her distress was unendurable, offered no evidence of pecuniary loss, and it appeared that her primary purpose in bringing suit was to punish the other driver. Dissent argued that other driver's conduct was sufficiently egregious to support an emotional-distress claim. Regan v. Lee, 879 S.W.2d 133, 136, 137.

Tex.App.1994. Com. (d) quot. in part in sup. and cit. in case cit. in sup., com. (h) cit. in sup. Former employee sued former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that defendant fired her because of her jury service. This court affirmed the trial court's granting of defendant's motion for summary judgment, holding that supervisor's yelling at plaintiff for not getting out of jury duty, employer's policy not to pay employees serving on jury duty, and employer's termination of plaintiff were not extreme and outrageous. The court noted that even illegal conduct was not necessarily extreme and outrageous. Sebesta v. Kent Electronics Corp., 886 S.W.2d 459, 462.

Tex.App.1994. Coms. (d) and (h) cit. in sup. Former employee sued former employer, alleging wrongful discharge and seeking damages for negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress and false-light invasion of privacy. Affirming in part and reversing in part the trial court's granting of summary judgment for defendant and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that, since plaintiff did not allege that the manner of his discharge was outrageous, but, rather, that the employer's motivation may have been outrageous and, since the meeting where the discharge took place was conducted privately and in a businesslike manner, plaintiff had not made out a prima facie case of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Shaheen v. Motion Industries, Inc., 880 S.W.2d 88, 92.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Tex.App.1994. Cit. in disc., subsec. (1) cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in part in case quot. in sup. A third party named in a counterpetition for interference with the familial relationship of a husband and wife filed by the wife's attorney in a divorce action moved for sanctions against the wife's attorney. This court, affirming the trial court's imposition of sanctions, held that, at the time the counterpetition was filed, there was no viable cause of action for interference with familial relationships and, because the pleadings filed were not seeking extension of existing law in good faith, as the pleadings never asserted that plaintiff's conduct was extreme or outrageous, the sanctions were warranted for filing of a groundless suit. Stites v. Gillum, 872 S.W.2d 786, 792, 793.

Tex.App.1994. Cit. in disc., com. (d) cit. in case cit. in disc., com. (j) cit. in disc. Widow of diabetic having unsound mind who died after surgery to which plaintiff had refused consent brought suit for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, against nurse who had ripped out patient's I.V., saying that if patient was not going to have surgery, he would not need I.V.; medical center where this took place; and clinic and associated physician who had ordered plaintiff to sign consent forms permitting surgery, telling her that if she did not sign that Medicare would not pay bills, then exceeding $100,000. This court reversed and remanded for further proceedings the trial court's granting of summary judgment for defendants, holding that their conduct could reasonably be considered intentional or reckless, extreme, and outrageous, and a cause of plaintiff's severe emotional distress. Washington v. Knight, 887 S.W.2d 211, 216.

Tex.App.1994. Cit. in sup. and in case cit. in sup., com. (g) cit. in sup., com. (j) quot. in case cit. in sup. Mortgagors sued mortgage company for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, after mortgage company provided plaintiffs with several contradictory figures for total amount that they owed and ultimately foreclosed on their house. This court affirmed the trial court's granting of summary judgment for defendant, holding that there was no evidence that plaintiffs' embarrassment and anger went beyond plaintiffs' expected endurance. Moreover, it said that, even if defendant's conduct were extreme or outrageous, defendant could not commit the tort when it did no more than insist on its legal rights through foreclosure in compliance with loan terms. Wieler v. United Sav. Ass'n of Tex., FSB, 887 S.W.2d 155, 159.

Tex.App.1994. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. A woman sued grocery store corporation for negligence and intentional infliction of emotional distress after she and her daughter witnessed an act of indecent exposure at one of the stores. She alleged that defendant took grossly inadequate measures both to bar the perpetrator from the store and to protect its customers before and after the arrest. She also asserted that store personnel failed to call the police until she insisted they do so, and that they let her stand face-to-face with the perpetrator while he berated her verbally. Trial court granted defendant summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that defendant's conduct did not amount to intentional infliction of emotional distress because there was no showing of extreme and outrageous conduct. Wyatt v. Kroger Co., 891 S.W.2d 749, 753.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Tex.App.1993. Com. (d) cit. and quot. in disc. and quot. in case cit. in disc. A waitress was fired, allegedly on the basis of two job-related incidents: she went "over the head" of her manager to seek an investigation by the restaurant chain's corporate headquarters, and she advised a co-worker who was pregnant with the manager's child not to have an abortion, despite manager's pressures to contrary. Waitress sued manager and corporation for wrongful termination on the basis of, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Trial court dismissed plaintiff's claims. Affirming, this court held, in part, that trial court did not abuse its discretion in finding that plaintiff failed to state a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, as the manager's retaliatory actions based on animosity did not constitute extreme and outrageous conduct. Amador v. Tan, 855 S.W.2d 131, 135.

Tex.App.1993. Com. (d) quot. in part in case quot. in sup. Former employee sued her former employer and corporate manager for intentional infliction of emotional distress based on manager's alleged sexual harassment. Affirming the trial court's granting of summary judgment for defendants, this court held, inter alia, that manager's conduct in allegedly observing employee from top to bottom, making her feel as if she were being undressed, asking employee if she did her best work in the dark, and telling her about his wife's magazine discussing sizes and shapes of men and conduct "in the sack" was not so extreme and outrageous as to support an emotional distress claim. Garcia v. Andrews, 867 S.W.2d 409, 412.

Tex.App.1993. Com. (d) quot. in part in conc. and diss. op. Former grocery store manager sued store owner, among others, asserting various claims arising from her discharge, including one for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming in part and reversing in part the trial court's granting of summary judgment for defendant and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that the fact that plaintiff was crying during part of her interrogation by supervisors regarding her alleged theft from the market was some evidence of emotional distress precluding summary dismissal of her emotional distress claim. A concurring and dissenting opinion argued that, since plaintiff had admitted to taking store property without paying for it, it was permissible for defendant to respond by asking questions regarding the alleged theft and placing plaintiff's job in jeopardy. Johnson v. Randall's Food Markets, Inc., 869 S.W.2d 390, 402, judgment reversed 891 S.W.2d 640 (Tex.1995).

Tex.App.1993. Cit. in disc. After a mall distributed fliers and pictures to mall merchants accusing two shoppers of passing counterfeit money, the shoppers sued the mall, alleging, among other claims, defamation and intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court affirmed in part and reversed in part the trial court's entry of a take-nothing summary judgment, holding, inter alia, that whether the humiliation and damage to reputation plaintiffs suffered was the type of mental or emotional injury required to support the emotional distress claim presented a fact question precluding summary judgment. The court also determined that the mall did not negate the emotional distress claim's element of intent, which required that the defendant's conduct be either intentional or reckless. Mitre v. La Plaza Mall, 857 S.W.2d 752, 755.

Tex.App.1993. Cit. in case cit. in sup., cit. and quot. in ftn., subsec. (2) cit. in ftn., com. (d) cit. in sup., quot. in case quot. in sup., and quot. in ftn., coms. (f), (g), and (h) quot. in sup., com. (j) cit. and quot. in sup. Seller of a business who had been retained by buyer as a consultant sued buyer and others, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress and other claims, after buyer caused the deductible on a health insurance policy covering seller, who was suffering from terminal cancer, to be raised from $300 to $50,000 in order to save on premium costs. Affirming a trial court judgment on a jury verdict for seller, this court held, inter alia, that seller's conduct of agreeing to provide seller the same health insurance as other employees, but then allowing seller to continue to accumulate medical bills and learn of increase in deductible only when his doctors complained of claims not being paid by insurer, was sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support emotional distress claim. Plaintiff's emotional distress was deemed sufficiently severe given testimony that he was seriously contemplating suicide, or giving up the fight against the disease, as a result of effectively losing his insurance coverage. Motsenbocker v. Potts, 863 S.W.2d 126, 131-133, 135.

Tex.App.1993. Cit. in sup., coms. (d) and (j) cit. and quot. in part in sup. An employer sued its former employees, asserting various claims, and defendants counterclaimed against the employer supervisors for intentional infliction of emotional distress, after the employees had resigned and formed their own competing business and the supervisors and other employees of the employer allegedly engaged in threatening and harassing behavior. Affirming a trial court judgment for defendants on their counterclaim, this court held, inter alia, that evidence, though disputed in many respects, of threats, surveillance, hang-up phone calls at all hours, and delivery of a black floral arrangement to each of the former employees was sufficient to support the emotional distress counterclaim. Qualicare of East Texas, Inc. v. Runnels, 863 S.W.2d 220, 222.

Tex.App.1993. Cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup., com. (g) cit. in sup. Applicant denied a job because he tested positive for alcohol in employer's screening test sued for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Affirming the trial court's granting of employer's motion for judgment n.o.v., this court held, inter alia, that employer's conduct in following its established policy and denying the job to applicant on the basis of the test result was not extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to support an emotional distress claim. Reeves v. Western Co. of North America, 867 S.W.2d 385, 391, 392.

Tex.App.1993. Com. (d) quot. generally in sup. Hospital nurse sued hospital and her supervisor for, among other claims, intentional infliction of emotional distress allegedly arising out of an employment performance appraisal. Affirming the trial court's grant of summary judgment for the hospital, this court held, inter alia, that the hospital's conduct was not so outrageous as to support an emotional distress claim, as it consisted merely of reviewing the nurse's job performance and recording observations according to policy. The nurse was neither demoted nor reduced in pay, and the appraisal was provided only to the nurse's immediate supervisor and was neither shared nor discussed with co-workers or physicians. Schauer v. Memorial Care Systems, 856 S.W.2d 437, 451.

Tex.App.1993. Cit. in headnote, cit. in sup., com. (d) cit. in headnote and quot. in part in sup. Professor brought a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, against state university and its president and vice president, alleging that he was denied tenure because he spoke out against president's proposal to sell a ranch belonging to university. Reversing the trial court's entry of judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiff and rendering judgment that plaintiff take nothing, this court held, inter alia, that president's conduct in refusing to recommend tenure was not so outrageous as to support an emotional distress claim. Tarleton State University v. Rosiere, 867 S.W.2d 948, 949, 951.

Tex.App.1992. Com. (j) cit. in disc. Female insurance agent who had been yelled at by her supervisor and was eventually fired sued insurance company, her supervisor, and district sales manager, alleging sexual harassment, retaliatory discharge, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Trial court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress because she offered no evidence that directly showed the severity of her distress. Noting that plaintiff had not consulted mental health professionals and that she gave a tangential response to the inquiry as to whether she could work out the stress and anguish by herself, the court stated that whatever stress she suffered did not rise to the level that a reasonable person could not be expected to endure. Benavides v. Moore, 848 S.W.2d 190, 195.

Tex.App.1992. Com. (d) quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. in sup. Employee sued her employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress after a co-worker insulted her on several occasions and threw a paper wad at her. The trial court granted summary judgment for employer, and this court affirmed, holding that employee failed to prove the element of outrageous conduct. The court said that co-worker's actions were mere indignities and insults, which did not rise to the level of outrageous conduct. Horton v. Montgomery Ward & Co., Inc., 827 S.W.2d 361, 369.

Tex.App.1992. Cit. in sup. A man and a woman sued various shopping mall stores for intentional infliction of emotional distress and invasion of privacy, inter alia, after stores posted pictures of plaintiffs, given to them by mall security, that falsely accused plaintiffs of passing counterfeit money. The trial court granted defendants summary judgment. This court affirmed on the issue of privacy but reversed and remanded the issue of emotional distress. It held, in part, that a jury could find that the stores posted the signs in reckless disregard of their truthfulness and that plaintiffs' humiliation in their community, as well as the outrageousness of defendants' actions, could satisfy the elements of such a tort. Mitre v. Brooks Fashion Stores, Inc., 840 S.W.2d 612, 621.

Tex.App.1992. Cit. in disc. Employee who had sustained work-related injuries sued insurance adjusting company hired to handle workers' compensation claims, alleging, inter alia, breach of duty of good faith and fair dealing and extreme and outrageous conduct causing severe emotional distress arising from delay in compensation payments. The trial court granted summary judgment for adjuster, finding that defendant had no duty to employee. Reversing and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that defendant did have a duty to employee and that an affidavit of the adjuster handling employee's claim stating that he had not intended to cause employee emotional distress was insufficient to support summary judgment, since the adjuster had a vital interest in the suit's outcome and the issue of intent was generally a question for the factfinder. Natividad v. Alexsis, Inc., 833 S.W.2d 545, 547, judgment reversed 875 S.W.2d 695 (Tex.1994).

Tex.App.1991. Cit. in disc., subsec. (1) quot. in disc. and cit. in case cit. in disc., com. (j) cit. in disc. A hospital administrator left his job to accept a position as executive administrator at another hospital, but the offer was removed because of opposition in the hospital staff. The prospective executive administrator sued the hospital, its parent corporation, the parent's vice president, the hospital's assistant administrator, and individual physicians for tortious interference with business relationships, fraud, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for the plaintiff. Affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that there was sufficient evidence to support the jury's finding that the defendants intentionally inflicted severe emotional distress on the plaintiff through outrageous conduct, as part of a conspiracy. The court cited evidence that the assistant administrator spread rumors that once the plaintiff became executive administrator he would fire all department heads and supervisors, that several doctors organized to berate him at a party held in his honor, and that the plaintiff became severely depressed and frustrated as a result of what happened. American Medical Intern. v. Giurintano, 821 S.W.2d 331, 340, 343.

Tex.App.1991. Cit. in case cit. in disc., coms. (d) and (e) quot. in diss. op., com. (h) cit. in diss. op. illus. 5, 6, and 7 cit. generally in ftn. to diss. op. An at-will employee was terminated from her position when she refused to misrepresent facts to government auditors. Upon termination, she allegedly was told to leave the premises in five minutes and a security guard was called to escort her off the premises in the presence of her co-workers. The employee sued her former employer and its parent company for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. Reversing the trial court's entry of summary judgment on the intentional infliction of emotional distress count of the complaint, this court held that the evidence suggested there was action independent of the discharge of the employee that might meet the criteria for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and that fact issues were raised both as to the outrageousness of the conduct and to the severity of the injury which resulted. The dissent argued that the plaintiff had not alleged any facts amounting to extreme or outrageous conduct by the defendants, and that there was no evidence of vituperative language or vindictive conduct. Casas v. Wornick Co., 818 S.W.2d 466, 471-473, reversed 856 S.W.2d 732 (Tex.1993). See above case.

Tex.App.1991. Cit. in sup., coms. (i) and (g) quot. in sup. An employee was terminated from his job for allegedly stealing a handful of nails. The employee sued his employer for false light publicity and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered judgment for plaintiff. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that, although the evidence did not establish the employer's liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress when the employer did not act intentionally or recklessly in firing the employee for stealing, this error did not require reversal when the trial court did not distinguish between the independent causes of action or make separate awards. Diamond Shamrock Refining v. Mendez, 809 S.W.2d 514, 522, affirmed in part, reversed in part 844 S.W.2d 198 (1992). See above case.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Tex.App.1991. Cit. in sup., com. (j) quot. in sup. In this divorce action, a jury awarded the couple's child, who had been conceived by artificial insemination, damages against the husband for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. The husband was not the child's biological father, and the wife had alleged that the husband's tortious acts included threats to publicize the artificial insemination as well as actual publication. This court reversed the child's damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding that there was no evidence that the husband ever told the child about the artificial insemination or publicized the matter except in his pleading, and no evidence that the child ever suffered any distress, severe or otherwise. Because the law protected statements made in judicial pleadings, and because the law did not allow recovery for damages from a future, threatened publication, the court held that the damage award was improper. K.B. v. N.B., 811 S.W.2d 634, 640, certiorari denied ___ U.S. ___, 112 S.Ct. 1963, 118 L.Ed.2d 564 (1992).

Tex.App.1990. Cit. in disc. A mother and children sued a father and the father's mother under the state family code and numerous common law theories after the children were allegedly kidnapped by their father. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for the plaintiffs. Reversing in part as to the father's mother, this court held, inter alia, that no cause of action existed for negligent interference with a family relationship in Texas in the context of a child abduction case. While noting that a common law cause of action for child abduction exists in Texas, and under such a cause of action, damages for emotional distress to the parent are recoverable, the court also held that Texas did not recognize an independent cause of action for negligent infliction of emotional distress in the context of a child abduction case. It determined that the infliction of emotional distress must be intentional and that the father's mother had merely acted negligently. Weirich v. Weirich, 796 S.W.2d 513, 516, judgment reversed 833 S.W.2d 942 (Tex.1992).

Tex.App.1986. Cit. in disc. A woman filed a lawsuit claiming that she had sustained mental and emotional injuries while attending group awareness training sessions conducted by the defendants. The trial court granted summary judgment to the defendants on the ground that the plaintiff's complaint was barred by the statute of limitations. Affirming, this court held that the plaintiff's argument that the limitations period was suspended because of her unsound mind could not be considered on appeal because it had not been raised during the trial. The court reasoned that issues not expressly presented to the trial court could not be considered as grounds for reversal. Smith v. Erhard, 715 S.W.2d 707, 708.

Tex.App.1985. Cit. in sup. A widower sued an automobile club for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that the club had denied a life insurance claim on the erroneous ground that the insured, the plaintiff's deceased wife, had been intoxicated. The trial court entered judgment for the plaintiff. Affirming, this court recognized the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress and held that the evidence, including the daughter's testimony that the club's assertion had distressed her father to the point of his seeking medical help, supported the finding that the plaintiff had suffered severe emotional distress. Tidelands Auto. Club v. Walters, 699 S.W.2d 939, 942.

Utah,

Utah, 2018. Com. (j) cit. in ftn. Father brought a claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress against therapist and medical center that mother hired without his knowledge to treat their 4-year-old daughter, alleging that therapist's use of inappropriate treatment methods resulted in father being falsely accused of sexually abusing daughter. The trial court granted defendants' motion to dismiss, ruling that a therapist did not owe a duty to a potential sexual abuser when treating an alleged victim. Reversing and remanding, this court held that a therapist owed a duty to a minor patient's parent to refrain from affirmative acts that recklessly violated the standard of care in a manner that gave rise to false memories or false allegations of sexual abuse by the parent, and that a therapist who breached that duty was liable for damages, including damages for severe emotional distress, resulting from that breach. The court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46 in stressing that the duty created under its analysis was limited to a duty to refrain from causing severe emotional distress. Mower v. Baird, 422 P.3d 837, 854.

Utah, 2014. Cit. in cases cit. in ftn., com. (j) quot. in ftn. Son who had a seizure disorder and suffered from mental disabilities sought a temporary civil-stalking injunction against mother, alleging that mother's near daily phone calls to him after he enrolled in a program to assist with his transition to independent living and moved out of her home were causing him emotional distress within the meaning of the state's stalking statute. The trial court granted the injunction. Vacating the injunction and remanding for further proceedings, this court held that the trial court erred in applying a subjective rather than an objective standard to the statute's emotional-distress element. The court rejected mother's argument, based on a prior state appellate court case that relied on Restatement Second of Torts § 46 to define "emotional distress," that the statute's definition of that term included an "outrageous and intolerable" conduct requirement, explaining that the appropriate standard to determine whether son was entitled to an injunction on remand was whether mother's conduct would have caused emotional distress to a reasonable person in son's circumstances. Baird v. Baird, 2014 UT 08, 322 P.3d 728, 738.

Utah

Utah, 2010. Com. (h) quot. in case quot. in sup. Employee of city's power company sued supervisor and company's director for intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that supervisor and director engaged in a pattern of harassment, intimidation, and abuse at his workplace. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. This court affirmed as to employee's claim against director, holding that employee failed to demonstrate that director's conduct was directed toward employee with the intent to inflict emotional distress; while employee argued that director failed to curb supervisor's outrageous conduct, there was no Utah support for the position that the failure to prevent another from inflicting emotional anguish gave rise to a valid claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and the court declined to expand the rule here. Cabaness v. Thomas, 2010 UT 23, 232 P.3d 486, 499.

Utah, 2008. Com. (h) quot. in case quot. in sup. Terminated employee brought claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, against school district. The trial court granted summary judgment for district. Noting that district followed the procedures of both the contract and the Utah Orderly School Termination Procedures Act when it terminated employee for cause, this court affirmed, holding, as a matter of law, that no reasonable person could conclude that firing an employee under the terms of an employment contract and according to procedures provided by law was so extreme and outrageous as to permit recovery for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Oman v. Davis School Dist., 2008 UT 70, 194 P.3d 956, 969.

Utah, 2006. Subsec. (2) cit. in disc.; com. (b) quot. in disc. (erron. cit. as § 46(2)). Applicant that was denied a position at state park sued park manager for assault, and park manager counterclaimed for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress, based on applicant's conduct toward manager's wife. The trial court, inter alia, entered judgment on a jury verdict for manager on his emotional-distress claim. The court of appeals remanded the claim for a new trial. This court affirmed the remand, holding, inter alia, that it could not answer the court of appeals' certified question on an incomplete record as to whether applicant's behavior directed at wife outside of manager's presence qualified as an exception to the "presence" rule. While the court emphasized that only the most egregious case could carve out an exception to the rule, it noted that wife was truly a noncombatant in the men's long-running feud, and stated that the facts of this case could well satisfy the exception. Hatch v. Davis, 2006 UT 44, 147 P.3d 383, 386, 388.

Utah, 2003. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Corporation's minority shareholder sued law firms and several of firms' partners for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress. Trial court granted defendants' motion to dismiss the emotional-distress claim. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff's emotional-distress claim failed regarding defendants' alleged conduct associated with defendants' initiation of bar-order litigation and use of legal process to enforce the bar order, because defendants' conduct was not outrageous. Bennett v. Jones, Waldo, Holbrook & McDonough, 2003 UT 9, 70 P.3d 17, 32.

Utah, 2001. Subsec. (1) cit. in case quot. in sup. Following an automobile accident, insureds sued automobile-liability insurer for bad-faith refusal to settle within policy limits, fraud, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. On remand, the trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding plaintiffs damages. Affirming in part, this court rejected defendant's challenge of the jury's finding of intentional infliction of emotional distress, holding, inter alia, that plaintiffs were required only to show that they subjectively experienced severe emotional distress regarding the situation they found themselves in, not that an ordinary reasonable person would have experienced it that way. Campbell v. State Farm Mutual Automobile Ins. Co., 65 P.3d 1134, 1165.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Utah, 2001. Com. (d) cit. in disc. Teenager and her parents sued church, bishop, and church official for injuries suffered when they counseled teenager to "forgive and forget" past sexual abuse and referred her to unlicensed therapist. Trial court dismissed, and this court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that defendants' referral of plaintiff to an unlicensed counselor was not intentional and outrageous conduct sufficient to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because there was no evidence that defendants knew that counselor was unlicensed when they made the referral or that their conduct in referring plaintiff to the counselor might cause emotional distress. Franco v. The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, 21 P.3d 198, 207.

Utah, 2001. Adopted in case quot. in disc., coms. (h) and (j) quot. in disc. Former patient sued psychotherapist for intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other things, based on broken promises of marriage made by defendant during sexual relationship with plaintiff. Trial court granted defendant summary judgment. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that distress plaintiff suffered as a result of defendant's actions was not so severe that a reasonable person could not be expected to endure it. Schuurman v. Shingleton, 26 P.3d 227, 233.

Utah, 1992. Subsec. (1) cit. in sup.; com. (d) cit. in disc., cit. generally, and quot. in ftn.; illus. 1 cit. in disc. Former employee who alleged retaliation by co-workers after complaining of co-workers' sexual harassment sued co-workers for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and sued employer for negligent employment. The trial court granted summary judgment for all defendants. Reversing summary judgment as to employee's claims against co-workers and her claims of negligent employment against employer, this court held that, since employee alleged a pattern of retaliatory harassment, it was such behavior in its aggregate that constituted extreme and outrageous conduct, and the statute of limitations applicable to her claims did not begin to run until she had suffered severe emotional distress, which, measured subjectively, occurred when plaintiff took sick leave for psychiatric attention. In addition, since co-workers could be liable for an independent tort, employer could be liable for negligent employment premised on its negligence in hiring and supervising the co-workers. Retherford v. AT & T Communications, 844 P.2d 949, 975-978.

Utah, 1985. Cit. in sup. The plaintiff sued her apartment manager for forcibly evicting her and her two children without court process and retaining her furniture and belongings. The plaintiff's complaint was verified. The defendant filed a verified answer and moved for summary judgment, supporting his motion with an affidavit that he was an agent for the owners of the apartment and that the plaintiff had failed to pay rent or security. The belongings had been kept as security. The motion was granted, and the plaintiff appealed. This court reversed, holding that the plaintiff's verified pleading met the requirements for a summary judgment motion. Further, the pleadings, taken together, alleged several different tort claims against the apartment manager including conversion, forcible entry, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Pentecost v. Harward, 699 P.2d 696, 700.

Utah, 1972. Com. (h) cit. and quot. in sup. Plaintiff alleged that defendant intentionally and unreasonably subjected the decedent to extreme emotional distress that precipitated his suicidal act.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

In affirming summary judgment for defendant, the court held that where the 37-year-old defendant refused to marry the 27-year-old decedent and instead terminated their9-month relationship, the record did not support the assertion of plaintiff that reasonable men could differ as to whether the conduct of defendant was so outrageous and extreme that it offended the generally accepted standards ofdecency and morality. Gygi v. Storch, 28 Utah 2d 399, 503 P.2d 449, 450.

Utah App.

Utah App.2013. Com. (g) quot. in sup. Borrower who obtained a construction loan from credit union to build a new home sued credit union for, inter alia, negligent infliction of emotional distress, alleging that he suffered severe emotional distress because credit union refused to allow a potential buyer to assume the loan, delayed in approving a short sale, and then foreclosed on his home. The trial court granted credit union's motion to dismiss. Affirming, this court held that borrower's allegations did not support his claim, concluding that nothing in borrower's promissory note required credit union to approve an assumption of the loan or a short sale of the home, and that, therefore, credit union's actions were consistent with the parties' contractual agreements. Further, borrower failed to allege facts that would cause a reasonable person to suffer severe injury rendering him unable to cope in his daily life, noting that credit union was merely pursuing the collateral that borrower agreed to pledge as security for repayment of the loan proceeds. Snow v. Chartway Federal Credit Union, 2013 UT App 175, 306 P.3d 868, 873.

Utah App.2007. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Church member/custodial parent of two minor children who were kidnapped by their noncustodial parent and taken to Japan, where they received religious ordination against custodial parent's wishes from the church, brought various claims against church. The trial court dismissed the complaint. This court reversed as to plaintiff's claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress, the only claim that the court concluded did not necessarily implicate church doctrines and raise First Amendment entanglement issues; whether defendant's conduct in allegedly instructing its leaders in Japan to conceal the location of the children from plaintiff was sufficiently outrageous and whether plaintiff's resulting distress was sufficiently severe to support plaintiff's distress claim were questions of fact requiring further factual development. Gulbraa v. Corporation of the President of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, 2007 UT App 126, 159 P.3d 392, 396.

Utah App.2006. Com. (f) cit. and quot. in sup. In response to female college student's petition, the trial court entered an ex parte civil stalking injunction against male college student. Following an evidentiary hearing, the trial court granted male student's motion to dismiss and revoked the injunction. Reversing and remanding, this court held that the trial court erred in its interpretation and application of the statutory provisions governing civil stalking injunctions, since it failed to apply the definition of emotional distress as the product of the accused stalker's extreme and outrageous conduct from the perspective of a reasonable person under all the circumstances of the case, which circumstances here included male student's knowledge of his previous vicious sexual assault of petitioner and her subsequent reactions to his presence; thus, the trial court inappropriately limited its analysis in a way that negated the cumulative effect of the alleged course of conduct. Ellison v. Stam, 2006 UT App 150, 136 P.3d 1242, 1249.

Utah App.2003. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. After she terminated sexual relationship with her attorney, former client sued attorney for breach of fiduciary duty, fraud, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and reckless misconduct, inter alia. Trial court granted summary judgment for attorney. Reversing in part and remanding, court of appeals held that plaintiff sufficiently stated claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress by alleging that attorney used position of trust, information gained in representing client in divorce action, and misrepresentations about his marital status and her legal affairs to lure client into sexual relationship, and by alleging emotional distress resulting in physical and emotional pain, medical bills, loss of employment, and need for counseling and therapy. Walter v. Stewart, 2003 UT App 86, 67 P.3d 1042, 1048, 1049.

Utah App.2002. Com. (j) cit. in case quot. in sup. Former husband brought suit for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress against church trust and religious leaders who counseled his former wife after she decided to divorce him. Affirming the trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendants, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's alleged injuries were no different than the type normally suffered when a relationship failed, and thus were not sufficiently severe to support a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Williams v. Jeffs, 57 P.3d 232, 237.

Utah.App.

Utah.App.1989. Coms. (h) and (j) quot. in disc., com. (b) quot. in ftn. A testator's survivors sued the children and son-in-law of the deceased's former wife seeking to invalidate a family settlement agreement (FSA) that was contrary to the will and to recover for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The survivors argued that the testator's intent in forming a trust was to dispose of the estate and that the agreement was not formally approved in probate court. The trial court ruled in favor of the defendants. Affirming in part, reversing in part and remanding, this court held that the FSA was enforceable without formal approval, even if it destroyed the testator's intent, since mutual promises of family harmony constituted consideration for the FSA. The court also held that a jury trial should have been granted for the emotional distress claim. It noted allegations that the defendants had continually pressured, threatened, and harassed the surviving wife, demanding that she have the deceased execute a new will during his final illness. Matter of Estate of Grimm, 784 P.2d 1238, 1246, certiorari denied 795 P.2d 1138 (1990).

Vt.

Vt.2013. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee of city's parks-and-recreation department sued city for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), alleging that defendant, motivated by politics, sparked a criminal investigation against him that tarnished his reputation and caused him distress. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant. Affirming, this court held that plaintiff failed to present evidence creating a genuine issue of fact as to whether defendant engaged in conduct that was so outrageous as to surpass all possible bounds of decency, as required to state an IIED claim. The court reasoned that defendant's reaction in referring the matter to police was not unreasonable given the undisputed fact that, immediately after plaintiff was notified that he was being placed on administrative leave, he contacted two subordinates and requested that they hide a laptop and remove cash from a safe. Cate v. City of Burlington, 2013 VT 64, 79 A.3d 854, 864.

Vt.2004. Com. (d) cit. in disc. and quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (h) cit. in case cit. in disc. Corrections officer sued employer and employer's superintendent for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to show outrageous conduct that met the threshold standard for a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court said that plaintiff was trying to combine a series of workplace indignities without showing a significant outrageous act. Fromson v. State, 176 Vt. 395, 848 A.2d 344, 347, 349.

Vt.2002. Com. (d) quot. in sup. Parents sued social services center and employee for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with defendants' role in taking and retaining custody of their runaway son. Affirming the trial court's grant of judgment as a matter of law for defendants, this court held, inter alia, that defendants' alleged violation of the Juvenile Proceedings Act by failing to return child to plaintiffs within a specified period of time, and their refusal to tell father the child's location did not meet the standard for outrageous conduct for purposes of an intentional-infliction-of-emotional-distress claim. Dalmer v. State, 174 Vt. 157, 811 A.2d 1214, 1227, cert. denied 537 U.S. 1110, 123 S.Ct. 891, 154 L.Ed.2d 782 (2003).

Vt.2002. Com. (h) cit. in case cit. in sup. Terminated nurse appealed trial court's grant of summary judgment for hospital on her claims of breach of contract, wrongful discharge, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming, supreme court held, inter alia, that nurse failed to state claim for emotional distress because hospital's actions in investigating patient complaints, conducting disciplinary proceedings, and discharging nurse for failure to conform to hospital's policy on narcotic administration were not extreme and outrageous. Dulude v. Fletcher Allen Health Care, Inc., 174 Vt. 74, 807 A.2d 390, 398.

Vt.1999. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Shareholder sued other shareholders for breach of contract and deceit. Defendants filed a counterclaim and a third-party complaint against plaintiff's former employer, a food wholesaler, and employer's law firm, alleging that third-party defendants conspired with plaintiff to destroy defendants' recently created food wholesaling entity. The trial court dismissed the third-party complaint for lack of personal jurisdiction. Affirming, this court held that even if it recognized the conspiracy theory of in personam jurisdiction, defendants had failed to establish the existence of a conspiracy, and that, with the possible exception of the allegations of intentional infliction of emotional distress against law firm, none of the acts attributed to firm's members was sufficient to support the imposition of tort liability upon firm. Schwartz v. Frankenhoff, 169 Vt. 287, 733 A.2d 74, 84.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Vt.1995. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. and cit. in headnote. Two car-accident victims sued the other driver's insurer, alleging that defendants' failure to settle plaintiffs' claims in an expeditious manner constituted a breach of defendants' duty to deal with plaintiffs in good faith as well as intentional infliction of emotional distress. Trial court granted defendants summary judgment. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that defendants' delay in settling plaintiffs' claims was not so outrageous and extreme so as to constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress. Larocque v. State Farm Ins. Co., 163 Vt. 617, 660 A.2d 286, 287, 288.

Vt.1995. Cit. in headnotes, Caveat cit. in disc., subsec. (2) quot. and cit. but dist., com. (l) quot. in disc. Family of woman who was abducted and murdered by her ex-boyfriend brought survival claims and action for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress against psychologist who was treating boyfriend and who was aware of his obsession with victim. The trial court granted psychologist's motion for summary judgment insofar as it concerned the claim for emotional distress but otherwise denied. Affirming, this court held that family could not recover for intentional infliction of emotional distress where the allegedly outrageous conduct was directed at a third person, the victim, and family members were not present. As for the survival claims, however, psychologist could not take advantage of a valid release executed by family and ex-boyfriend, since there was no indication that the document was intended to discharge from liability any tortfeasors other than the actual murderer. Leo v. Hillman, 164 Vt. 94, 665 A.2d 572, 573, 578.

Vt.1994. Com. (d) cit. in case cit. in sup. Residential facility attendant sued his former employer after being discharged, asserting various claims, including one for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming the trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendant on the emotional-distress claim, this court held, inter alia, that, even though plaintiff had been dismissed after filing complaints for unpaid compensation and sexual harassment, defendant's conduct was not outrageous and could not support an intentional-infliction-of-emotional-distress claim, considering that plaintiff had previously been suspended for trying to buy drugs on the premises and had refused to meet with defendant to discuss the terms of that suspension. Baldwin v. Upper Valley Services, Inc., 162 Vt. 51, 644 A.2d 316, 319.

Vt.1994. Com. (d) cit. in headnotes, quot. in sup., and quot. in diss. op; com. (e) quot. in sup., com. (f) quot. in sup. and quot. in diss. op., com. (h) cit. in diss. op. Employee and his family sued former employer and supervisor for intentional infliction of emotional distress and invasion of privacy, inter alia,, alleging that supervisor embarked on an insulting, demeaning, and vindictive course of conduct toward employee that included ridicule, invasions of privacy, intentional interference with ability to car pool, and an unreasonable workload. Trial court granted defendants summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, in part, that supervisor's conduct did not reach the requisite level of extreme outrage because the record did not support a reasonable inference that supervisor knew plaintiff was susceptible to emotional distress. Dissent argued that jury should have been allowed to decide whether supervisor's conduct was extreme and outrageous, stating that supervisor used his supervisory position to intrude upon plaintiff and his family in their private, nonworking life, and exploited plaintiff's known weaknesses. Denton v. Chittenden Bank, 163 Vt. 62, 655 A.2d 703, 703, 704, 706, 707, 709-711.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Vt.1994. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. and cit. in headnotes. A firefighter who was denied promotions on several occasions due to his known reading problem sued the city and the fire chief for civil rights violations and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. Trial court granted defendants summary judgment. This court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state an emotional-distress claim, because certain disciplinary reprimand letters were not outrageous, and the "detail" chores to which plaintiff was assigned after he filed a fair-employment-practices claim were routine firehouse duties, though they were normally assigned to rookie or junior firefighters. Gallipo v. City of Rutland, 163 Vt. 83, 656 A.2d 635, 637, 643.

Vt.1992. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. in disc. Mother sued state and medical examiner for emotional distress resulting from the removal of her deceased son's brain in connection with an autopsy authorized by statute. Affirming the superior court's grant of summary judgment for defendants, the supreme court held that defendants' removal of the brain and its retention after the cause of death had been established were not actionable; defendants breached no duty to plaintiff where the medical examiner was authorized to conduct an autopsy and to take and preserve portions of the body that might require further study. Plaintiff could not recover for intentional infliction of emotional distress because there was no evidence that defendants intended to cause plaintiff emotional distress, and defendants' conduct was not extreme or outrageous in the context of an authorized autopsy. Jobin v. McQuillen, 158 Vt. 322, 609 A.2d 990, 993.

Vt.1990. Com. (h) cit. in sup. The administratrix of her daughter's estate sued a police chief for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that the defendant's failure to respond to the report of the abduction of the plaintiff's daughter resulted in her daughter's rape and death and caused the plaintiff great emotional distress. The trial court dismissed the claim on the ground that there was no allegation that the plaintiff was in the zone of danger or that physical impact had occurred. Reversing and remanding in part, this court held that the trial court's application of the presence requirement to the plaintiff's claim was error, since the requirement applied not to a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress but to one for negligently caused emotional distress. Applying the correct standard, the court stated that it could not be said as a matter of law that the acts here alleged did not rise to the level of extreme and outrageous conduct that would allow recovery for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Thayer v. Herdt, 155 Vt. 448, 586 A.2d 1122, 1126.

Vt.1986. Cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc. A widow sued her late husband's employer and the employer's workers' compensation insurer for death benefits and for the intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court dismissed the complaint for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. Reversing in part, this court held that the conduct constituting the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress was not within the scope of the Workers' Compensation Act and therefore the trial court was the proper forum with original jurisdiction when a carrier's conduct went beyond simple failure to pay and constituted intent to cause severe emotional distress. Demag v. American Ins. Companies, 146 Vt. 608, 508 A.2d 697, 699.

Vt.1978. Cit. in sup. and fol. and quot. in ftn. An action was brought to recover on the theory that the defendant had intentionally inflicted mental distress on the plaintiff by rendering it impossible for any personal contact or communication to take place between the plaintiff and her daughter for a period of time. The lower court dismissed the complaint for failure to state a cause of action on which relief could be granted, and the plaintiff appealed. The defendant argued that Vermont should not recognize a cause of action for intentional infliction of mental distress but that, should the court recognize the tort, the complaint was legally insufficient on its face because it did not allege the elements necessary to establish a prima facie case. The court held that a cause of action can be maintained for the recovery of damages for intentional infliction of mental distress. The court noted that the tort of intentional infliction of mental distress, as described by Section 46 of the Restatement, has gained sufficient acceptance to be characterized as the general rule, and the court believed that it was appropriate to recognize it in Vermont. The court also held that the complaint adequately alleged the elements necessary to establish a prima facie case, i.e., outrageous conduct, done intentionally or with reckless disregard of the probability of causing emotional distress, resulting in the suffering of extreme emotional distress, actually or proximately caused by the outrageous conduct. Accordingly, the judgment of the lower court was reversed, and the case was remanded. Sheltra v. Smith, 136 Vt. 472, 392 A.2d 431, 432.

Va.

Va.2021. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Member of a church sued church and others, alleging that a former pastor of the church, who had retired but remained active as a minister in the church, sexually molested her when she was a minor. The trial court granted demurrers filed by defendants. This court affirmed in part, holding that the trial court properly dismissed plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because plaintiff's allegations did not clear the high bar necessary to state such a claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court noted that, while plaintiff made broad and nonspecific allegations about the pastor's inappropriate conduct as well as specific allegations of his disturbing conduct toward women over the course of his decades serving as pastor for the church, defendants' alleged failure to take measures stronger than ordering him to attend counseling did not rise to the level of being outrageous and intolerable. Doe by and Through Doe v. Baker, 857 S.E.2d 573, 589.

Va.2007. Com. (j) quot. in ftn. to conc. and diss. op. Plaintiff filed a motion for judgment against, among others, individuals who accused her of sending them anonymous, handwritten letters making accusations of marital infidelity. The trial court sustained defendants' demurrers, and dismissed the action with prejudice. Reversing in part and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff could proceed against defendants on her claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The concurring and dissenting opinion argued that plaintiff failed to allege facts showing emotional distress so severe that no reasonable person could be expected to endure it; it noted that because the parties had not argued whether plaintiff's alleged emotional distress was exaggerated and unreasonable under the circumstances, it declined to express an opinion on that issue. Almy v. Grisham, 273 Va. 68, 639 S.E.2d 182, 190.

Va.1991. Cit. in disc. and in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. in sup., com. (j) cit. and quot. in sup. and quot. in ftn. to diss. op. The plaintiff sought recovery in damages for alleged intentional infliction of emotional distress, independent of any physical injury and unaccompanied by any physical impact, claiming that the defendant made repeated hang-up calls to the plaintiff. The trial court sustained the defendant's demurrer. Affirming, this court held that, since the plaintiff did not claim, for example, that she had any objective physical injury caused by the stress, that she sought medical attention, that she was confined at home or in a hospital, or that she lost income, the alleged effect on the plaintiff's sensitivities was not the type of extreme emotional distress that was so severe that no reasonable person could be expected to endure it. The dissent argued that the plaintiff alleged sufficient facts to indicate the requisite extreme emotional distress, and noted that this was a new requirement created by the majority and that it had not heretofore been articulated by this court. Russo v. White, 241 Va. 23, 400 S.E.2d 160, 162-164.

Va.1974. Quot. in part, com. (i) cit., and com. (h) quot. in sup. This plaintiff sought to recover compensatory and punitive damages for mental shock and distress allegedly caused by the willful, wanton, malicious, fraudulent, and deceitful conduct of an investigator who was employed by a man charged with child molesting to take a picture of the plaintiff in his home, under the pretense of publishing an article about the plaintiff's employment as a skating coach. Actually, the photo was used to ask the child molesting victims in court whether the plaintiff was the one who had molested them, although there was never any question that the plaintiff was innocent of the charges. This court reversed the judgment below, thus reinstating the jury verdict in favor of the plaintiff and holding that a cause of the action will lie for severe emotional distress, unaccompanied by physical injury, provided that the wrongdoer's conduct was intentional or reckless, that there was a casual connection with the wrongdoer's conduct, and that the conduct was intolerable and offended against the generally set standards of decency. Here there were questions for the jury regarding both the last of these elements and whether the emotional distress was severe. Womack v. Eldridge, 215 Va. 388, 210 S.E.2d 145, 147, 148.

Va.App.

Va.App.1994. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. Former husband was convicted of stalking his ex-wife. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that evidence that defendant had followed his ex-wife for several months, watched her in her home, followed her boyfriend, and threatened to kill her and her boyfriend was sufficient to support the conviction, particularly in light of the ex-wife's testimony that defendant's threat and conduct terrified her and that she believed defendant wanted to shoot or otherwise kill her. The court stated that the statutory phrase “intent to cause emotional distress” was not unconstitutionally vague; “emotional distress” was a common and well-recognized legal term that had been discussed by the state supreme court in the context of civil tort actions for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Woolfolk v. Commonwealth, 18 Va.App. 840, 848, 447 S.E.2d 530, 534.

Wash.

Wash.2021. Cit. in diss op. Brother of decedent filed an action for tortious interference with a deceased body against city in federal court, after he learned that employees of city's fire department had repeatedly intubated decedent's body as part of a training exercise without permission from decedent's family. Answering a question certified by the federal court, this court held that brother had standing to bring a claim for tortious interference with decedent's body even though decedent's surviving spouse was the legal custodian of decedent's remains, because he was in the class of foreseeable plaintiffs, namely"close relatives" who had significant and substantial contacts with the decedent during their lives. The dissent argued in favor of adhering to a traditional limited-standing approach, like the one applied to the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress described in Restatement Second of Torts § 46, in order to avoid potentially unlimited liability. Fox v. City of Bellingham, 482 P.3d 897, 905.

Wash.2018. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup.; com. (e) cit. in sup.; com. (g) quot. in sup. Wife of patient who died of liver damage due to undiagnosed liver disease while being treated for tuberculosis brought a claim for, among other things, the tort of outrage against medical providers in connection with allegations that defendants threatened to incarcerate patient if he did not comply with his tuberculosis treatment regimen. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. The court of appeals affirmed. Affirming, this court held that the alleged conduct was not outrageous as a matter of law. The court pointed out that, under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, conduct that would be extreme and outrageous but for a legal privilege to do it immunized conduct from a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and, here, defendants had the power to execute the complained-of conduct under state law, which provided that noncompliance with a tuberculosis treatment regimen was a misdemeanor, and granted local health officers the power to issue a quarantine order for persons who were diagnosed with tuberculosis and were under medical orders for treatment or follow-up examinations. Reyes v. Yakima Health District, 419 P.3d 819, 825.

Wash.2014. Com. (d) cit. in sup. Borrower who executed a deed of trust on her primary residence sued trustee under the deed of trust, alleging, among other things, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) in connection with its conduct during a foreclosure that was initiated by an entity that no longer had any beneficial interest in the loan. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant. This court affirmed as to plaintiff's IIED claim, holding that, although conduct during foreclosure could support an IIED claim, that conduct had to satisfy the high burden applicable to such claims under Restatement Second of Torts § 46, and the alleged conduct—that defendant failed to confirm the proper beneficiary and failed to suspend the trustee's sale when plaintiff contacted it—was not so outrageous as to shock the conscience or go beyond all bounds of decency. Lyons v. U.S. Bank Nat. Ass'n, 336 P.3d 1142, 1151.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Wash.2003. Adopted in case cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc., coms. (j) and (k) quot. in sup. Defendant appealed trial court judgment finding him liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress upon plaintiff, his female former roommate. Court of appeals affirmed. Affirming, supreme court held that, where plaintiff's evidence showed that defendant's conduct of harassing, threatening, and stalking plaintiff over a three-year period was extreme and outrageous, disrupting her life and preventing her from forming relationships, she was not required to prove by objective symptomatology that defendant's actions caused her severe emotional distress. Kloepfel v. Bokor, 149 Wash.2d 192, 196, 198, 202-203, 66 P.3d 630, 632, 633, 635-636.

Wash.2002. Quot. in sup. Employee sued former employer in connection with treatment by co-workers and supervisors after employee filed workers' compensation claim, alleging disability discrimination, retaliation, negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress, and defamation. Trial court entered judgment for employee. Appellate court reversed and remanded. Reversing in part, this court held, inter alia, that evidence supported finding that employees' conduct was sufficiently outrageous to find former employer vicariously liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Robel v. Roundup Corp., 148 Wash.2d 35, 51, 59 P.3d 611, 619.

Wash.2001. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in diss. op. Former employee sued employer for constructive discharge and outrage, inter alia, alleging that her supervisor used threats of physical force against her and mocked her in front of others. Trial court granted company summary judgment, and appellate court affirmed. This court affirmed, holding, in part, that company was not liable for intentional torts committed by supervisor acting outside scope of employment. Dissent argued that summary judgment on plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress should be reversed, because this case was not merely about incivility, but rather involved threats, intimidation, and assault of an employee by a supervisor. Reasonable minds could differ as to whether supervisor's conduct was sufficiently extreme as to constitute outrage. Snyder v. Medical Service Corp. of Eastern Washington, 145 Wash.2d 233, 249, 35 P.3d 1158, 1167.

Wash.1998. Cit. in headnotes, cit. generally in disc., coms. (e)-(g), (j), and (l) quot. in case quot. in disc. Survivors of deceased public officials and others sued county for intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress and invasion of privacy, arguing that members of medical examiner's office misappropriated autopsy photographs of decedents and displayed them for personal gain. The trial court entered judgment for defendant. Affirming in part and reversing in part, this court held that plaintiffs, who were not present when the allegedly outrageous conduct occurred, could not maintain an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and that the claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress failed as well; however, a common law cause of action for invasion of privacy existed in Washington, and plaintiffs had a protectible privacy interest in autopsy records that were statutorily required to be kept confidential and released only to those with a genuine interest in them. Reid v. Pierce County, 136 Wash.2d 195, 961 P.2d 333, 334, 337, 338.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Wash.1997. Cit. in headnote, cit. in case quot. in disc. Between 1974 and 1980, patient received counseling for, among other things, marital problems; in 1992, patient brought malpractice action against his psychologist after he discovered that psychologist had been romantically involved with his wife from 1976 until 1981. Patient also asserted a claim for the tort of outrage. The trial court dismissed the complaint on the ground that the claims were time-barred, but the intermediate appellate court reversed. Affirming and remanding, this court held that, if it was shown that psychologist intentionally concealed his relationship with patient's wife, the statute of limitations governing malpractice claims would be indefinitely tolled, and that material factual issues existed as to whether a two- or three-year statute of limitations applied to the claim for outrage. Doe v. Finch, 133 Wash.2d 96, 942 P.2d 359, 359, 361.

Wash.1995. Cit. in case quot. in sup., cit. in ftn., subsec. (1) cit. and quot. in sup., subsecs. (2) and (2)(a) cit. in sup., com. (d) cit. in case quot. in sup. Airplane parts manufacturer's employees who were exposed to toxic chemicals at the workplace sued employer for, among other claims, the tort of outrage in the context of the industrial insurance act. Federal district court dismissed plaintiffs' claims. In response to the questions of the Ninth Circuit, this court held that plaintiffs stated a claim for the tort of outrage to the extent that they alleged that defendant's deliberate intention to injure was outrageous conduct. Plaintiffs stated a claim of outrage because they alleged a variety of work-related medical symptoms, oppressive behavior by employer's supervisors, human experimentation, prevention of workers from transferring even after the workers had been given medical restrictions from working with phenolic resin, and cleaning and ventilating the workplace immediately before testing by governmental agencies to skew the test results. Birklid v. Boeing Co., 127 Wash.2d 853, 904 P.2d 278, 286, 287.

Wash.1991. Quot. in ftn. Partners in real estate development projects sued another partner for fraud and breach of fiduciary duty. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding the plaintiffs economic and emotional distress damages. The intermediate appellate court reversed the award of emotional distress damages, holding that the plaintiffs had not shown severe emotional distress. Reversing, this court held that there was no requirement that a plaintiff must always show severe emotional distress before emotional distress damages, as a component of compensable damages resulting from a harm, may be awarded upon proof of an intentional tort. The court noted that the requirement of severity of emotional distress must be shown to establish the elements of the independent tort of outrage. Nord v. Shoreline Sav. Ass'n, 116 Wash.2d 477, 805 P.2d 800, 804.

Wash.1991. Cit. in disc. Several ex-employees sued their employer for wrongful discharge and the tort of outrage, seeking a declaratory judgment as to whether a cause of action for the tort of outrage, inter alia, could be maintained in light of the workers' compensation statute. The case was removed to federal court, which certified questions to this court. In another suit involving the same issue, the trial court granted summary judgment for the employer, and the intermediate appellate court affirmed. The two cases were consolidated on appeal. This court answered the questions and reversed and remanded the appellate court's decision, holding that the injured employee was not precluded from bringing an action for the tort of outrage by a provision in the workers' compensation act providing a cause of action for retaliatory discharge for filing a workers' compensation claim. Wilmot v. Kaiser Alum. & Chem. Corp., 118 Wash.2d 46, 821 P.2d 18, 33.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Wash.1989. Cit. in disc., com. (d) cit. in disc. An executive secretary to two medical boards who was discharged after she disclosed that the boards' budget did not include the expenditure of surplus funds accumulated in the medical disciplinary account brought a wrongful discharge action against the state, alleging, inter alia, that the discharge constituted outrageous conduct by the defendant. The trial court dismissed the plaintiff's claims. Affirming, this court held that the plaintiff failed to set forth facts showing that there was a genuine issue of material fact. The court stated that the defendant's method of discharge, which involved a private termination letter to the plaintiff and a brief response to media inquiries, could not be considered atrocious and intolerable in a civilized society; moreover, the plaintiff's assertion that the defendant embarrassed and humiliated her would not support the imposition of liability on a claim of outrage. The court noted that, at worst, the plaintiff's allegations amounted to a showing of bad faith. Dicomes v. State, 113 Wash.2d 612, 782 P.2d 1002, 1012, 1013.

Wash.1987. Cit. in sup., com. (b) quot. in sup. A janitor sued defendants who firebombed the tavern where he worked for assault, outrage, and RICO violations. The trial court found for the janitor, but the intermediate appellate court certified the case for resolution of the RICO issue. Reversing the trial court, this court held that the janitor could not recover for both assault and outrage, or intentional infliction of emotional distress, for the same act. The court stated that recovery for outrage should be permitted only in the absence of any other tort remedy. Rice v. Janovich, 109 Wash.2d 48, 742 P.2d 1230, 1238.

Wash.1984. Cit. in case quot. in sup. The plaintiff brought an action against the state, the state patrol, and an individual trooper, alleging assault, outrage, false arrest, and false imprisonment. The claims were based on the plaintiff's being searched by the trooper, who was informed that a warrant was outstanding for someone with the same physical characteristics and a similar name. This court held that the trooper's actions did not support a claim of outrage, and that the trooper had a qualified immunity from actions for assault, false imprisonment, and false arrest, even where the statute the trooper relied upon to conduct the searched was found unconstitutional. Guffey v. State, 103 Wash.2d 144, 690 P.2d 1163, 1164.

Wash.1984. Quot. in disc., subsec. (2)(a) cit. in sup. A husband brought an action against a church and its pastor alleging that the pastor's sexual relationship with his wife constituted outrageous conduct and impairment of consortium. The trial court granted summary judgment to the defendants, and on appeal this court affirmed. The court ruled that the husband had not established the elements necessary for recovery on the outrageous conduct claim because he failed to allege that he was present at the time of that conduct. The court also ruled that while an impairment of consortium claim was generally a separable claim actionable by the deprived spouse independently, the claim in the case at hand was actually a claim for alienation of affection barred by earlier state decisions abolishing such actions. Lund v. Caple, 100 Wash.2d 739, 675 P.2d 226, 228, 229.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Wash.1980. Cit. in disc. The plaintiff's back was severely injured when his truck left the road and rolled over. The plaintiff and his wife subsequently brought this negligence action against the defendant automobile garage, alleging that it negligently repaired the truck braking system and it was the resultant brake failure that caused the accident. As a result of the plaintiff's spinal injury, he and his wife's social life was altered. They could no longer go bowling or dancing. He was also unable to perform his usual household tasks. The main issue in this case is whether Washington permits a wife to claim damages for loss of consortium when her husband is injured due to the negligence of a third party. The trial court awarded the plaintiff wife $25,000 for loss of consortium. The appellate court affirmed. The majority of American jurisdictions have recognized the wife's right to damages for loss of consortium due to the negligent acts of a third party. While a wife had no right to such damages at common law, it is not necessary for courts to leave abrogation of this rule to the legislature. On the contrary, Washington courts have repeatedly discharged their duty to reassess the common law and alter it where justice requires. There is no rational basis for distinguishing between husbands and wives where a claim of damages for loss of consortium is made. Lundgren v. Whitney's, Inc., 94 Wash.2d 91, 614 P.2d 1272, 1275.

Wash.1979. Subsecs. (1), (2) and (2)(a) cit. and fol. in case cit. Husband sued for alienation of wife's affections. The trial court entered judgment for the plaintiff, but the Court of Appeals reversed and ordered the action dismissed with prejudice based upon the conclusion that the action for alienation of affections should be abolished; discretionary review was granted. The Supreme Court, citing its adoption of the strict products liability theory of the Restatement, and the Restatement view regarding the tort of outrage as indicative of its trend toward expanding tort liability and adopting new remedies, held, nevertheless, that the action for alienation of a spouse's affections should not be reversed by judicial abolition, and the reversal of the judgment for the plaintiff based upon judicial abolition of the action for alienation of affections would be reversed. Wyman v. Wallace, 91 Wash.2d 317, 588 P.2d 1133, 1134, 1135, opinion vacated 94 Wash.2d 99, 615 P.2d 452 (1980).

Wash.1977. Sec. (1) cit., quot., and fol., secs. (1), (2) and subsec. (2)(a) cit. and fol. in case quot. in sup., and coms. (d, e, f, g, j,) and (1) cit. in cases quot. in sup. Sec. (1), coms. (d, e, and f) cit. and com. (h) cit. in sup. in conc. op. The plaintiffs, a Mexican-American employee and his wife, sued his former employer alleging conspiracy under the Civil Rights Act and a claim for damages for the tort of outrage. Plaintiff husband asserted he had been subjected to repeated racial slurs, comments, and conduct which caused him severe emotion distress by intimidation, humiliation, and public exposure to scorn and ridicule. The plaintiffs appealed dismissal of the tort claim. The court held that plaintiff had alleged a cause of action for the tort of outrage and reversed. The concurring opinion urged that the alleged conduct not be equated with the tort of outrage. The actions, if proved, could be deemed by a jury to be tortious but that determination should be left to the jury. Contreras v. Crown Zellerbach Corp., 88 Wash. 735, 565 P.2d 1173, 1174, 1175, 1176, 1177, 1178.

Wash.1975. Subsecs. (1), (2), and (2)(a) and coms. (d), (e), (f), (g), (j)and (l) fol. Subsec. (2)(b) cit. but not ruled on. Section and subsecs. (1), (2)(a), (b) & illus. cit. but dist. in diss. op. A husband brought this action against a hospital and a physician on "tort of outrage" to recover for damages arising from his wife's death. Plaintiff alleged that the physician had negligently, recklessly, wantonly, and outrageously breached the patient-doctor relationship with plaintiff's wife by abandoning her and failing to provide medical care and that, as a result, plaintiff, forced to watch his wife die, suffered physical and emotional injury. The trial court dismissed plaintiff's complaint for failure to state a cause of action. On appeal, reversed and remanded. The court rejected the doctrine providing for liability for emotional injury suffered by a third party because of the negligent injury of another.However, the court held that while a defendant might not be accountable for mere negligent actions which cause emotional stress, one, who by extreme and outrageous conduct, intentionally or recklessly, directed at a third person, causes severed emotional distress to a member of such person's immediate family, is liable if the person so affected is present at the time. The dissent would apply this doctrine only in cases of "active" vis à vis "passive" conduct by the defendant. Grimsby v. Samson, 85 Wash.2d 52, 530 P.2d 291, 294, 296.

Wash.App.

Wash.App.2021. Com. (g) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former wife filed claims for abuse of process and intentional infliction of emotional distress against former husband and his attorney, alleging that husband and attorney pursued parenting-plan-modification proceedings against her in order to place her in intractable circumstances with regard to both her immigration status and finances. The trial court granted husband's and attorney's motions to dismiss. This court reversed and remanded, holding, among other things, that the litigation privilege did not preclude wife's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against either husband or attorney. The court cited Restatement Second of Torts § 46 in noting that, while conduct that was extreme and outrageous could be privileged, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress would not be precluded where the manner of invoking a legal power intentionally inflicted emotional distress. Mason v. Mason, 497 P.3d 431, 453.

Wash.App.2021. Cit. in case quot. in sup.; com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. City resident who was arrested for refusing to stop making a video recording of a city council meeting filed a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress against city and its mayor, among others, after the criminal charges against her were dismissed. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants on resident's emotional-distress claim. This court affirmed, holding that resident failed to produce sufficient evidence to show that she severe emotional distress, as required to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court noted that, while resident claimed to have suffered a panic attack after her arrest, there was no evidence showing that her distress was ongoing or that it led her to seek professional help. Zink v. City of Mesa, 487 P.3d 902, 908.

Wash.App.2019. Cit. in ftn., quot. in diss. op., cit. in ftn. to diss. op.; subsec. (2)(b) cit. in diss. op.; coms. (d), (g), and (h) quot. in cases quot. in diss. op.; com. (i) cit. in ftn. to diss. op.; com. (l) cit. in case cit. in sup. Piano teacher who gave private lessons to children in her home brought claims for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress against neighbor who lived across the street, alleging that, over the course of four months, neighbor parked his diesel pickup truck along the sidewalk next to teacher's home, and regularly and repeatedly remote-started his truck, revved its engine, and activated its alarm in order to scare teacher's students as they walked past the truck on their way to their lessons. After a bench trial, the trial court found that, although neighbor did not cause any loss of business to teacher, his conduct was sufficiently outrageous to constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The dissent argued that, while neighbor's behavior was childish and annoying, it was not outrageous. Spicer v. Patnode, 443 P.3d 801, 806, 808, 810.

Wash.App.2017. Cit. in case cit. in ftn. Estate of shipyard machinist who died of mesothelioma after exposure to asbestos dust from products manufactured by bankrupt subsidiary brought a wrongful-death action against parent corporation, seeking to impose liability under Restatement Second of Torts § 400 on defendant as an apparent manufacturer. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant. This court affirmed, holding that plaintiff failed to create a genuine issue of material fact sufficient to satisfy any test for liability under § 400. The court predicted that Washington would adopt § 400, noting that it had previously applied Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Rublee v. Carrier Corporation, 398 P.3d 1247, 1251.

Wash.App.2015. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in sup. Patient filed, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against doctor, alleging that defendant yelled at plaintiff in his office and attempted to avoid liability for the cauda equina syndrome plaintiff developed, after defendant performed laminectomies on her lower back, by denying that she experienced the syndrome and referring her to numerous specialists, including a neurologist that did not study the critical area of her spine. The trial court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment. This court affirmed in part, holding that plaintiff failed to present sufficient evidence to overcome defendant's motion on the IIED claim. Citing Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, the court concluded that defendant's alleged conduct was not sufficiently outrageous to support her claim, because, among other things, referring a patient to specialists did not suggest that defendant was seeking to avoid liability, and there was no evidence that defendant and the neurologist conspired to hide information from plaintiff. Christian v. Tohmeh, 191 Wash.App. 709, 736, 366 P.3d 16, 30.

Wash.App.2014. Com. (j) cit. and quot. in sup. and quot. in case quot. in sup. Grandmother, on behalf of first-grade student, brought claims for assault, battery, and outrage against school district and teacher in connection with an incident in which teacher allegedly berated student in a loud voice while towering over her and physically bumping her until she was pinned against a wall. The trial court granted summary judgment for district and teacher. Affirming in part, this court held that grandmother failed to come forward with evidence that student suffered severe emotional distress as a result of teacher's conduct, as required to state a claim for outrage. The court noted that, because outrage was an intentional tort, grandmother was not required to show bodily harm or objective symptomatology; however, she did not provide evidence that student suffered any significant emotional distress that was more than transient or trivial. Sutton v. Tacoma School Dist. No. 10, 324 P.3d 763, 769.

Wash.App.2011. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., coms. (g) and (h) cit. in sup. Owners of residential and commercial properties sued utility, its manager, and its elected commissioners, alleging improper termination of electrical service. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants. Affirming, this court held, among other things, that plaintiffs failed to state a claim for the tort of outrage. The court reasoned that defendants' alleged actions and omissions—in failing to make accommodations for plaintiffs' nonpayment and in terminating plaintiffs' service without notice—were not in violation of utility's service contract and were privileged, and, in any event, could not reasonably be regarded as so extreme and outrageous as to permit recovery. Steinbock v. Ferry County Public Utility Dist. No. 1, 165 Wash.App. 479, 269 P.3d 275, 282.

Wash.App.2008. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (j) cit. in sup. Patient sued doctor, alleging sexual abuse, and doctor counterclaimed for, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). The trial court granted doctor's motion to dismiss and, after a bench trial, ruled in favor of doctor on his counterclaims. Reversing in part and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that patient's decision to sue doctor did not rise to the level of outrageous conduct required to state a claim for IIED; filing a suit alleging sexual abuse by a physician, even with malicious intent, was not so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency and to be utterly intolerable in a civilized community. Saldivar v. Momah, 145 Wash.App. 365, 186 P.3d 1117, 1130, 1131.

Wash.App.2008. Adopted in case cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in sup. Former employee of school district sued former supervisor, alleging, among other things, that he verbally abused her daily by screaming at her and criticizing her work in an unprofessional manner, pointedly telling “blonde jokes,” and ridiculing her with remarks about her personal life. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant. Affirming in part, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court rejected plaintiff's argument that the totality of defendant's misconduct over two years was enough to establish this claim, concluding that, at worst, plaintiff's allegations fell within the category of insults, indignities, threats, annoyances, petty oppressions, or other trivial harms that were not encompassed by the tort. Strong v. Terrell, 147 Wash.App. 376, 195 P.3d 977, 981, 982.

Wash.App.2007. Com. (h) cit. in case quot. in sup. Sisters sued their stepfather and church for, in part, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), alleging that they had reported stepfather's sexual abuse to church bishops who had failed to contact state authorities. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict against defendants. Affirming as to the IIED claim, this court held that the trial court correctly allowed the question of whether church's conduct could reasonably be regarded as extreme and outrageous to go to the jury. The court pointed to evidence that a church bishop not only did not report the abuse but also effectively silenced the older sister by advising her that, if the abuse were reported, she would be the cause of her family's breakup and would be at the center of church gossip. Doe v. Corporation of President of Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, 141 Wash.App. 407, 167 P.3d 1193, 1204.

Wash.App.2006. Adopted in case cit. in disc., subsec. (1) quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in sup. and quot. and adopted in case quot. in sup., com. (g) cit. in sup., com. (h) quot. in sup., com. (l) cit. in disc., illus. 14 quot. in sup. Bank teller's husband and her estate sued bank for intentional infliction of emotional distress and other claims, alleging that bank caused teller to commit suicide by accusing her of theft and placing her on administrative leave during an investigation over missing funds. The trial court granted summary judgment for bank. Affirming, this court held that there was no evidence that bank falsely accused teller, willfully withheld exonerating information, or did anything more than it was legally entitled to do; thus plaintiffs' allegations were not sufficient to show that bank engaged in extreme and outrageous conduct. Cook v. Shoshone First Bank, 2006 WY 13, 126 P.3d 886, 891, 892, 895.

Wash.App.2006. Com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Pet owner brought suit against minors and their parents to recover damages for the death of her cat, which the minors set on fire using gasoline. The trial court entered a default judgment against defendants, awarding plaintiff a $5,000 general damages award for emotional distress, but dismissed plaintiff's claim for the tort of outrage. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that the trial court did not err in dismissing the outrage claim, since plaintiff failed to establish that she suffered severe emotional distress or that defendants intended to cause, rather than negligently brought about, that distress. Womack v. Von Rardon, 133 Wash.App. 254, 135 P.3d 542, 545.

Wash.App.2006. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. School-district employees sued their supervisor, among others, asserting, in part, various tort claims stemming from supervisor's alleged bullying and harassment. The trial court dismissed plaintiffs' claims with prejudice. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that because defendant's conduct, which, at worst, fell within the category of nonactionable insults, indignities, and petty oppressions, occurred within the scope of his employment so that the school district was required to defend him, plaintiffs' failure to give the district any notice of their complaint barred their case. The court further held that none of the allegations rose to the level of the intentional tort of outrage. Wright v. Terrell, 135 Wash.App. 722, 145 P.3d 1230, 1239.

Wash.App.2004. Cit. in disc. Guardian ad litem for child who was struck by a car settled negligence suit against insured city regarding curb extensions, but insurer missed deadline for payment of funds under settlement agreement. Guardian sued insurer for fraudulent misrepresentation and intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia. Trial court dismissed suit. This court reversed in part and remanded, holding that plaintiffs' intentional-tort claims of fraudulent misrepresentation and infliction of emotional distress were not barred, since intentional-tort claims did not require preexisting duty. Thus, third-party claimants could bring tort claims against insurer despite lack of duty, as this would not interfere with insurer's good-faith duties to insured and would not place conflicting duties upon insurer. Dussault ex rel. Walker-Van Buren v. American Intern. Group, Inc., 123 Wash.App. 863, 99 P.3d 1256, 1260.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Wash.App.2004. Cit. in case cit. in disc. A gay woman sued her former domestic partner, the biological mother of a minor child, seeking to establish plaintiff's co-parentage of child, who was conceived by artificial insemination during their 12-year relationship. Trial court ruled that no common-law claim for de facto parentage existed in Washington, since common-law actions available in the parent-child area were very limited. This court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded, holding that a common-law claim of de facto or psychological parentage existed in Washington such that plaintiff could petition for shared parentage or visitation with the child. The court noted that common law was creation of the courts rather than of legislatures, and it listed Washington's adoption of the tort of outrage as an example. In re Parentage of L.B., 121 Wash.App. 460, 89 P.3d 271, 279.

Wash.App.2002. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. After protestors occupied top two floors of a building for a week and police ordered utility services to building terminated, a business tenant on first floor suffered irreparable losses and ultimately closed. Tenant sued city, former mayor, former police chief, and utility companies for tort of outrage, inter alia. Trial court granted defendants summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that utilities behaved properly in following police order to terminate utilities, and police decision to follow standard procedures in dealing with building takeover situations by shutting off utilities and waiting protestors out, rather than forcibly evicting them in the face of a high risk of danger to life and property, was not outrageous. Citoli v. City of Seattle, 115 Wash.App. 459, 494, 61 P.3d 1165, 1184.

Wash.App.2001. Cit. in case quot. in disc. Employee sued former employer for sexual harassment and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims, alleging that employer stared at plaintiff, fondled her, and made inappropriate sexual comments. Trial court granted employer summary judgment. This court affirmed in part, holding, inter alia, that although employer's actions were outrageous and inappropriate, plaintiff failed to establish that her emotional distress was manifested by objective symptoms. Although plaintiff claimed that she suffered from nightmares, sleep disorders, intrusive memories, and fear and anger, there was no objective evidence regarding the severity of the distress and the causal link between employer's actions and plaintiff's emotional reactions. Haubry v. Snow, 106 Wash.App. 666, 680, 31 P.3d 1186, 1194.

Wash.App.2001. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. and in sup., coms. (e)-(g) cit. in case quot. in disc. Following the dismissal of murder charges against physician, physician sued state and county for, in part, the tort of outrage. The trial court granted state's motion for summary judgment. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that state's conduct in failing to retain the results of inconclusive drug tests in the murder investigation, failing to initially control for another drug during the testing, and secretly testing the victim's blood was not sufficiently extreme to support a claim for outrage. Stansfield v. Douglas County, 27 P.3d 205, 214, 107 Wash.App. 1, 15, 16.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Wash.App.2000. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Estate and survivors of suspect who was fatally shot by police during a domestic-violence incident sued city and two individual police officers, asserting, in part, a claim for the tort of outrage. Affirming the trial court's summary dismissal of the outrage claim, this court held, inter alia, that the officers' use of deadly force against the suspect, who pointed a shotgun at one officer's chest and refused to put it down, did not constitute outrageous conduct against the suspect's family members, who were victims of the felony that the officers were investigating. Estate of Lee ex rel. Lee v. Spokane, 101 Wash.App. 158, 2 P.3d 979, 990.

Wash.App.2000. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc. Supermarket worker who claimed that she was retaliated against and subjected to a hostile work environment when she complained about unsanitary food-handling procedures sued supermarket for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress and defamation. The trial court entered judgment for plaintiff. Reversing and remanding, this court held, in part, that name-calling and other acts of rudeness by plaintiff's co-workers did not allow for recovery under an intentional-infliction-of-emotional-distress theory, since such behavior could not be considered outrageous, and that, to the extent that vulgarities used by co-workers to describe plaintiff were capable of defamatory meaning, plaintiff had failed to establish damages. Robel v. Roundup Corp., 103 Wash.App. 75, 10 P.3d 1104, 1112, affirmed in part, reversed in part 148 Wash.2d 35, 59 P.3d 611 (2000). See above case.

Wash.App.1999. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. County resident who was injured in attack by neighbors' dogs sued county for, in part, tort of outrage. Affirming in part the trial court's grant of summary judgment for county, this court held, inter alia, that although issue existed as to whether county was under a statutory duty to confiscate surviving dog as a "dangerous dog," its failure to do so was not extreme and outrageous conduct necessary to state a claim for tort of outrage. King v. Hutson, 97 Wash.App. 590, 987 P.2d 655, 659.

Wash.App.1999. Cit. in disc., quot. in case quot. in disc. Former employee sued former employer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that she was compelled to resign because of her supervisor's abusive treatment. The trial court entered summary judgment for defendant. Affirming, this court held, in part, that supervisor's insults, threats, and rude behavior did not rise to the level of outrageous conduct sufficient to support recovery for the intentional infliction of emotional distress. Snyder v. Medical Service Corp. of Eastern Wash., 98 Wash.App. 315, 988 P.2d 1023, 1027, affirmed 145 Wash.2d 233, 35 P.3d 1158 (2001). See above case.

Wash.App.1998. Cit. in ftn. Individual who was terminated shortly after informing her employer that she had been diagnosed with cancer brought disability discrimination action against former employer. Plaintiff also asserted claims for both negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered summary judgment for defendant. Reversing and remanding for plaintiff to proceed with her disability discrimination claim, this court held that the "small employer" exception to the Washington Law Against Discrimination was inapplicable, that defendant's conduct was not negligent, and that, because the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress duplicated the claim for discrimination, and therefore plaintiff would have the chance to raise her claim of emotional distress in her discrimination case, there was no need for the court to make the initial determination as to whether defendant's behavior was so extreme as to support recovery under the theory of outrage. Anaya v. Graham, 89 Wash.App. 588, 950 P.2d 16, 20.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Wash.App.1997. Com. (b) quot. in sup. and cit. in ftn., com. (j) quot. in disc. and in sup. and cit. in ftn., com. (k) quot. in ftn. A community activist who had accused a company of erecting dozens of illegal billboards sued individuals who allegedly made anonymous threatening telephone calls to him at his home. The trial court granted summary judgment to defendants. Affirming in part and reversing in part, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff's claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress was properly dismissed because plaintiff failed to show that his distress was manifested by objective symptomatology, i.e., physical symptoms evidencing and resulting from the emotional distress. A question of material fact as to the severity of the emotional distress suffered by plaintiff, however, precluded summary judgment on plaintiff's claim for the tort of outrage or intentional infliction of emotional distress. Brower v. Ackerley, 88 Wash.App. 87, 96-98, 100, 102, 943 P.2d 1141, 1146-1148.

Wash.App.1996. Cit. in headnote, cit. but dist. Insureds whose home was destroyed by fire sued insurer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with the parties' protracted dispute over the nature and extent of insureds' coverage. The trial court granted insurer's motion for summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that insurer's behavior throughout the dispute was not extreme and outrageous. Dombrosky v. Farmers Ins. Co. of Wash., 84 Wash.App. 245, 928 P.2d 1127, 1130, 1137.

Wash.App.1995. Cit. in case quot. in sup. Plaintiff sued county and law enforcement officials for, inter alia, outrage, arising from the investigation of a fatal shooting for which plaintiff was first convicted and then acquitted on retrial. Reversing the trial court's dismissal of the claim and remanding, this court held that, under Washington law, plaintiff's claim for outrage could not be dismissed on the ground that plaintiff's conviction established probable cause for defendants' actions in arresting and prosecuting plaintiff, since lack of probable cause was not an element of plaintiff's claim, nor did probable cause establish a complete defense. Fondren v. Klickitat County, 79 Wash.App. 850, 861, 905 P.2d 928, 934.

Wash.App.1994. Com. (d) quot. generally in case quot. in sup., coms. quot. in case quot. in sup. Widower with posttraumatic stress disorder linked to police interrogation after his wife's murder sued city and interrogating officer for outrage and negligent infliction of emotional distress, claiming that defendants failed to investigate properly resulting in their premature and overly aggressive interrogation of him. Opposing defendants' summary judgment motion, plaintiff introduced former police chief's affidavit, which said that defendants' investigation and treatment of plaintiff were so lacking in expected professional standard of care as to be callously outrageous. The trial court granted defendants' motion. Affirming, this court held that plaintiff's interrogation was insulting to plaintiff and unbecoming to officer but did not rise to the level of outrage, since officer was investigating serious crime and plaintiff was possible suspect. It also held that defendants owed plaintiff no duty to use reasonable care to avoid inadvertent infliction of emotional distress. Keates v. City of Vancouver, 73 Wash.App. 257, 869 P.2d 88, 91, 93.

Wash.App.1992. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in disc. A father sued a state and several caseworkers for, inter alia, outrage and negligent infliction of emotional distress, alleging that, after his former wife made false accusations that he was sexually abusing their children, the defendants denied him visitation rights and the caseworkers failed to properly investigate the charges. The trial court granted summary judgment for the defendants. Affirming in part, this court held that the claim of outrage was properly dismissed because, even if it were shown that the caseworkers were grossly negligent in choosing to believe the wife's allegations and in deciding not to thoroughly investigate the plaintiff's claims, their conduct could not be characterized as going beyond all possible bounds of decency. The court stated that the caseworkers' conduct could not be said to have been outrageous, particularly since the caseworkers were supported in part by the expert opinions of therapists. Waller v. State, 64 Wash.2d 318, 824 P.2d 1225, 1235.

Wash.App.1990. Quot. in disc. The sister of a shoplifter sued a department store for malicious prosecution, inter alia, arising from an incident in which the plaintiff was falsely charged with shoplifting done by her sister. The trial court granted summary judgment to the defendant. This court reversed and remanded, holding that factual issues remained, including whether the defendant had a duty to inform the prosecutor when it realized that the plaintiff was falsely charged by misidentification, and whether the defendant had lost control of the case once the prosecution had been initiated. It stated that not only affirmative conduct would sustain a malicious prosecution action, since tortious conduct can arise from a failure to act when there is a duty to act affirmatively. The court also determined that the failure to call the prosecutor before trial was insufficient to support a claim for the tort of outrage. The dissent argued that active participation was needed to find malicious prosecution, and additionally that there was no showing of malice on the part of the department store. Banks v. Nordstrom, Inc., 57 Wash.App. 251, 787 P.2d 953, 960, review denied 115 Wash.2d 1008, 797 P.2d 511 (1990).

Wash.App.1990. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. and cit. in ftn. A supervisor who was demoted to a nonsupervisory position following his company's investigation of complaints of sexual harassment sued the company, the employees who accused him of harassment, and the employees who investigated the complaints, for outrage, inter alia. The trial court granted the defendants summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding that the defendants' conduct was not so outrageous in character or extreme in degree as to be utterly intolerable in a civilized community. The court stated that the plaintiff had also failed to allege facts to satisfy the element of severe or extreme emotional distress, noting that the symptoms alleged by the plaintiff: depression; loss of appetite, libido, and energy; sleeplessness; and increased headaches were not signs of distress above that level that was a fact of life. Lawson v. Boeing Co., 58 Wash.App. 261, 792 P.2d 545, 551.

Wash.App.1990. Quot. in ftn. Partners in a real estate company sued their copartner for fraud and breach of fiduciary duty arising from the copartner's creation of a second deed of trust on a property owned by the partnership. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for the partners providing awards for economic damages and emotional distress. This court affirmed in part, but reversed as to the emotional distress damages awarded below. The court, inter alia, rejected the parties' contention that emotional distress damages are recoverable for any intentional tort, ruling that a plaintiff must show severe emotional distress in order to recover. It noted that the language of a prior supreme court case stating that a plaintiff could recover damages for emotional distress upon a showing of actual anguish or emotional distress was not instructive as to the quantum of evidence required to show emotional distress. The court concluded that the partners' statements that they were "distressed and very hurt" and "upset and incensed" did not rise to the requisite level of severe emotional distress. Nord v. Shoreline Sav. Ass'n, 57 Wash.App. 151, 787 P.2d 66, 72, decision reversed 116 Wash.2d 477, 805 P.2d 800 (1991). See above case.

Wash.App.1989. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in disc. After a public official sued for defamation and outrage a publisher and the newspaper columnist who wrote a satirical article, using disreputable fictional characters, about the official's involvement in a controversy over hiring private detectives to follow one of his assistants, the court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The court stated that, although humorous and satirical statements that implied defamatory facts could be actionable, the article's unique format, humorous tone, and narrative style readily distinguished it from more general news articles and indicated that the column did not concern actual events. The court also held that the plaintiff did not make an evidentiary showing sufficient to maintain his outrage claim. Hoppe v. Hearst Corp., 53 Wash.App. 668, 770 P.2d 203, 209.

Wash.App.1987. Quot. in sup., com. (l) quot. in sup. Two men who formerly lived with a hospital patient demanded that he be reconnected to a respirator that had been removed without his consent. The respirator was reconnected and the patient recovered. The men later sued the hospital for outrage, and the trial court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment on the ground that the plaintiffs lacked standing to assert a claim for emotional distress because their mother's marriage to the patient had been invalidated, and they had not lived with him for many years. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that the defendant could be held liable for intentionally or recklessly causing severe emotional distress only to a member of the patient's immediate family, and that the class of immediate family members consisted of those who would be permitted to bring wrongful death actions, which in this state would be spouses, children, stepchildren, parents, and siblings, but not close associates. Strickland v. Deaconess Hosp., 47 Wash.App. 262, 735 P.2d 74, 77.

Wash.App.1985. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. After being fired for allegedly harassing female co-workers, the plaintiff brought an action for the tort of outrage. The trial court granted the defendant summary judgment. Affirming, this court held that the defendant's conduct was not so extreme and outrageous to be considered intolerable in a civilized community. Hurst v. Farmer, 40 Wash.App. 116, 697 P.2d 280, 282.

Wash.App.1984. Com. (d) quot. in case cit. in sup. Mental health patient who was involuntarily committed sued the county, a mental health professional, and a police officer, alleging, inter alia, trespass, assault, battery, false imprisonment, and outrage. Plaintiff appealed the trial court's grant of partial summary judgment for defendants. This court affirmed as to the individual defendants, but reversed and remanded as to the county. The court found that under state law the individuals were personally immune from liability. It noted that although in general the master could not be liable if the servant was not liable, this rule did not apply if the nonliability of the servant was based upon personal immunity. It concluded that plaintiff was entitled to assert his state law tort claims against the county. Regarding the cause of action for outrage, the court upheld summary judgment for defendants, holding that even if the mental health professional was negligent in performing his statutory duties, reasonable minds could not conclude that his conduct was extreme and outrageous. Spencer v. King County, 39 Wash.App. 201, 692 P.2d 874, 880.

Wash.App.1982. Quot. in part in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup., coms. (e), (f) and (g) cit. in case quot. in sup. The plaintiff brought an action against his former employer, the owner of a supermarket, alleging that the defendant had requested him to find purchasers for the company's stock. After he had begun negotiations with several prospective buyers, the defendant abruptly terminated the plaintiff and announced that the company and its stock were not for sale. The plaintiff brought this action claiming, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court dismissed the complaint and this court affirmed, holding that the plaintiff's allegations were insufficient to support his claim. Springer v. Rosauer, 31 Wash.App. 418, 641 P.2d 1216, 1220.

Wash.App.1982. Cit. in sup., cit. in headnotes, coms. (b), (d), (g), and (j) cit. in sup. and cit. in headnotes. The plaintiff attempted to gain entrance into his son's apartment through the landlady, one of the defendants, after receiving a call from his son complaining that he had fallen, wrenched his back, and needed assistance. Although the plaintiff told the landlady that he had a heart condition and should not get excited, she denied entry to the plaintiff because the son had previously expressly instructed her that she was not to enter his apartment without his written consent. The plaintiff allegedly suffered an anxiety attack, mental and emotional distress, and was forced to retire from his job. He sought recovery under the tort of outrage. The jury was instructed that the plaintiff had the burden of proving emotional distress so extreme or so severe that no reasonable man could be expected to endure it. A verdict was returned in favor of the defendants. On appeal, the plaintiff claimed that the instruction was an erroneous statement of the law. Affirming the verdict, the court found that the instruction was in accord with the Restatement (Second) of Torts and the Comments to section 46 thereof, which defined severe emotional distress. Further, it was not error to instruct the jury that the conduct at issue had to go beyond all possible bounds of decency. Woodward v. Steele, 32 Wash.App. 152, 646 P.2d 167, 167-170.

Wash.App.1981. Cit. and quot. in sup. and fol.; coms. (e), (f), (g) and (h) cit. in disc. Purchasers of a home brought an action against the vendors who retained possession of the home past the date provided for in a rental agreement with the purchasers. The purchasers sought damages for the intentional infliction of emotional distress and outrage. The trial court entered judgment for outrageous conduct against the vendors and the vendors appealed. The court held that the purchasers' action was not barred by res judicata following the denial of an unlawful detainer action by the purchasers, since the purchasers' separate cause of action did not specifically relate to possession or related damages, but was much broader and included issues relating to breach of contract, business interruption, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court also held that the evidence that the purchasers were entitled to possession of the home no later than the date set forth under the rental agreement with the vendors, under which the vendors were allowed to remain in possession from the date of closing to that date, that the vendors knew that the purchasers had rented their other residence and that their intentional delay in allowing the purchasers to take possession of the home would result in the purchasers being unable to move, and that as a result the purchasers were unable to enjoy their new home for the holiday season, supported the finding that the vendors' conduct was outrageous beyond the bounds of decency and that their actions resulted in damage to the purchasers. Accordingly, the court found that the purchasers were entitled to recover for intentional infliction of emotional distress by outrageous conduct. Phillips v. Hardwick, 29 Wash.App. 382, 628 P.2d 506, 510.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Wash.App.1980. Com. (k) quot. in sup. The plaintiff brought this action against her former husband and his second wife individually and as a marital community, seeking damages for allegedly outrageous conduct and intentional and negligent infliction of mental distress. The plaintiff alleged that the defendant wife had made over 1000 harassing telephone calls which caused the plaintiff to become nervous and lose weight. The trial court dismissed the complaint against the former husband and the marital community but awarded damages against the defendant wife. The plaintiff appealed from the dismissals and the second wife cross-appealed from the damage award. This court held that the husband could not be held personally liable because there was no evidence that he and his wife had acted as joint tortfeasors nor that he was aware that his wife was making the calls. The court held that the marital community could not be held liable because the wife had acted for her own benefit and not for the benefit of the community. The court held that substantial evidence existed to support the award of damages. The nervousness and weight loss were valid indicators from which the jury could conclude that the plaintiff had suffered an extreme emotional disturbance. The lower court's decisions were affirmed. Farman v. Farman, 25 Wash.App. 896, 611 P.2d 1314, 1319.

Wash.App.1979. Subsecs. (1) and (2) and coms. (d), (f), (g), (h), (i), and (j) cit. in sup.; com. (e) illus. 7 quot. in sup. Plaintiff debtor brought action against defendant creditor, alleging that the creditor's attempted repossession of his automobile constituted the tort of outrage. The lower court entered judgment for the debtor, and the creditor appealed denial of his motion to dismiss. This court held that the creditor's conduct was to be viewed in light of a proper exercise of a right to repossession, and that in view of such lawful repossession, the measures used by the creditor were not clearly had obviously excessive. In addition, the court held that defendant's notice of plaintiff's diabetic condition was not sufficient awareness to render defendant's conduct outrageous because of the other party's known susceptibility to emotional distress; thus defendant's conduct could not be viewed as outrageous because it inflicted severe emotional distress on the plaintiff recklessly or intentionally. Accordingly, the court reversed and ruled that the lower court had erred in denying defendant's motion to dismiss. Jackson v. Peoples Federal Credit Union, 25 Wash.App. 81, 604 P.2d 1025, 1027-1030.

Wash.App.1979. Cit. in sup. and coms. cit. in sup. Parents brought action against insurer seeking, inter alia, damages for intentional and outrageous conduct in cancelling a policy covering losses due to injury or sickness incurred by the plaintiffs' daughter. The trial court denied a motion to dismiss as to the claimed tort of outrage, and the parties appealed. The court affirmed the denial of the motion, holding, inter alia, that the trial judge was correct in his conclusion that, in this case, the question of whether the defendants' conduct could reasonably be regarded as so extreme and outrageous as to permit recovery should have been resolved after the presentation of the plaintiffs' case at trial, since the nature of an outrage claim is such that the trial judge should have the opportunity to hear testimony in open court before resolving the issue as a matter of law. Rounds v. Union Bankers Ins. Co., 22 Wash.App. 613, 590 P.2d 1286, 1288.

Wash.App.1977. Com. (h) cit. in disc. The plaintiff was injured when the car in which she was a passenger was struck by a vehicle driven by the defendant driver. The injuries sustained by the plaintiff were sufficient to temporarily prevent her from working. She depended upon her employment to support herself and her parents. The defendant driver's insurance company offered the plaintiff wages for the period of unemployment. The plaintiff sought an additional amount and did not accept the amount that the insurance company sent her in advance. The company replied and stated that they would not longer make advance payments for loss of wages, but that they would be willing to discuss the final settlement. Thereafter, the company refused to advance her any monies for lost wages. The plaintiff brought an action against the defendant driver for damages for personal injuries and mental distress suffered as a result of the collision, against the insurance company for mental distress and outrage caused by its failure to advance payment for lost wages, and against the insurance company for an unfair and deceptive act or practice in attempting to deduct taxes and other deductions from her wage compensation and in attempting to force her into an early settlement. The trial court granted the insurance company's motion to dismiss the plaintiff's claims against it on the basis that they did not state a claim. On appeal, the court found that as the insurance company had no contractual obligation to the plaintiff, it was under no duty to the plaintiff and had not breached any duty when, following the plaintiff's rejection of the company's offer of payment for lost wages, the company responded that it would not renew its offer, but would negotiate for full and final settlement when the plaintiff's condition had stabilized. The court held that the alleged acts of the company did not constitute aggravated conduct necessary for an action for outrage, and thus any emotional stress or anguish resulting from the company's acts was not compensable under an outrage theory. The court also held that an action for an unfair and deceptive act or practice must involve a consumer transaction in which there is an actual sale of goods or services involving a buyer and a seller and that the plaintiff's dealings with the insurance company was not such a transaction. Therefore, the decision of the lower court was affirmed. Bowe v. Eaton, 17 Wash.App. 840, 565 P.2d 826, 830.

Wash.App.1976. Cit. in ftn. in disc. Suit was brought against a corporation alleging that pollutants from the defendant's factory had caused damage to the plaintiff's farm and to plaintiffs, themselves. After the corporation had admitted liability, the court entered judgment awarding damages to the plaintiffs. On appeal from the damages awarded, the court affirmed, holding the plaintiffs' testimony regarding irritation, annoyance, and anguish which they suffered from the invasion of chloride from the defendant's factory onto their property was sufficient to support an award of damages for these types of suffering. Furthermore, while these damages would not have been proper, absent an actual invasion of the plaintiff's person or property, the court's affirmance of the plaintiffs' award for the loss of use of their property acted to support the award for the intangible injuries listed above. Freeman v. Intalico Aluminum Corporation, 15 Wash.App. 677, 552 P.2d 214, 218.

Wash.App.1971. Cit. in sup. In November, 1963, the plaintiff advised the defendant finance company that she was not agreeable to her husband's mortgaging any personalty as security for his loans; nonetheless, the defendant'h assistant manager notarized both her husband's and the plaintiff's signatures on a subsequent chattel mortgage without the plaintiff's knowledge. After the plaintiff's divorce in December, 1964, and after default, the defendant sought to foreclose the chattel mortgage by notice and sale. The court held that where the plaintiff served the defendant with a court order restraining it from removing any of the personalty from the plaintiff's home, where the defendant disregarded that order, and where there was substantial evidence in the record to support the trial court's conclusion of emotional distress caused by the defendant's conduct in the foreclosure, the plaintiff could recover for the resulting humiliation and embarrassment. Theis v. Federal Finance Co., 4 Wash.App. 146, 480 P.2d 244, 247.

W.Va.

W.Va.2020. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. After a jury found customer not guilty on charges of criminal harassment related to incidents in which he admittedly used inappropriate and aggressive language toward manager of a restaurant, customer filed claims sounding in outrage and intentional infliction of emotional distress against manager and restaurant. The trial court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment on customer's claims for outrage and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Affirming, this court held that customer's allegations fell far short of the required showing that a plaintiff had to make in order to state a claim for intentional or reckless infliction of emotional distress under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. The court reasoned that seeking the assistance of law enforcement and the criminal-justice system was not extreme and outrageous conduct as a matter of law. Zsigray v. Langman, 842 S.E.2d 716, 727.

W.Va.2015. Subsec. (1) cit. in sup., cit. in cases cit. and quot. in sup.; com. (d) cit. and quot. in sup., cit. and quot. in cases cit. in sup.; com. (j) quot. in case cit. in sup. Landowner filed a claim for, inter alia, outrageous conduct against contractor, alleging that despite the remediation work completed by replacement workers that she had hired, the home was still not safe to live in because of the defects caused by defendant. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiff on her negligence claim. This court affirmed, holding that the trial court did not err in including dicta in the jury instruction for plaintiff's outrageous-conduct claim. The court explained that the instruction, which was based on Restatement Second of Torts § 46, Comment d, was a correct recitation of the law and was warranted, even if it was not limited to a bare recitation of the elements of the claim. Sneberger v. Morrison, 235 W.Va. 654, 672, 673, 776 S.E.2d 156, 174, 175.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

W.Va.2007. Com. (d) cit. in case quot. in diss. op. Hotel employee who allegedly was constructively discharged after disobeying hotel management's instruction to have a union organizer arrested, and another employee who allegedly was fired because management became convinced that she assisted unionizing activities sued hotel and management members for wrongful discharge. The trial court dismissed. Affirming, this court held that plaintiffs' claim was preempted by the National Labor Relations Act. The dissent argued that federal preemption was not implicated because plaintiffs had legal remedies under West Virginia law, including a claim for the tort of outrage, since the allegation that management conspired to have a person wrongfully arrested and then retaliated against an employee for refusing to be a part of that conspiracy certainly qualified for the tort of outrage. Lontz v. Tharp, 220 W.Va. 282, 647 S.E.2d 718, 725.

W.Va.2003. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. Customer who had brought underlying slip-and-fall case against store filed this separate action against individual who had testified as a witness for the defense in the underlying case, alleging that defendant had lied on the stand and, in so doing, had committed, inter alia, the tort of outrage. Affirming the trial court's dismissal of the complaint, this court held, in part, that plaintiff failed to state a claim for the tort of outrage because defendant's conduct was not so outrageous as to exceed the bounds of decency. Williamson v. Harden, 214 W.Va. 77, 585 S.E.2d 369, 373.

W.Va.2001. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee sued employer for retaliatory constructive discharge and intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that, after she filed wage suit against employer, she was transferred to another department where she had to wear safety equipment, and other employees would not associate with her. Trial court granted employer judgment as a matter of law on emotional-distress claim. This court affirmed, holding, in part, that, while plaintiff may have endured certain amount of emotional discomfort due to job transfer, her symptoms were not severe, and she did not prove that employer's conduct was extreme and outrageous where she continued to receive salary increases and was praised for community service work. Love v. Georgia-Pacific Corp., 209 W.Va. 515, 550 S.E.2d 51, 61.

W.Va.2000. Com. (i) quot. in case quot. in conc. op. Trial court entered declaratory judgment order, determining that exclusions contained in construction company's commercial general liability insurance policies precluded coverage for a contract claim asserted against construction company by homeowners, but that such exclusions did not bar recovery for homeowners' tort claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. This court denied construction company's request for a writ of prohibition to prevent trial court from enforcing the declaratory judgment order, concluding that trial court had jurisdiction and did not exceed its powers by rendering its declaratory judgment. Concurring opinion asserted that the issue of whether there was coverage for homeowners' emotional-distress claim should be a fact question for a jury, because if the contractor acted recklessly in inflicting the emotional distress, then the "intentional acts" exclusion would not apply. State ex rel. Davidson v. Hoke, 207 W.Va. 332, 532 S.E.2d 50, 59.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

W.Va.1999. Com. (d) cit. in headnote and quot. in case quot. in disc. A doctor sued attorneys who represented a patient in a medical-malpractice action against the doctor, alleging malicious prosecution and the tort of outrage. In the underlying suit, a jury found for the doctor and the judgment was affirmed on appeal. Answering certified questions from the trial court, this court held, inter alia, that both of plaintiff's claims were barred by the statute of limitations. The court determined that any outrageous conduct occurred prior to or on the date of the ultimate termination in the trial court. The attorneys' act of appealing the adverse trial court judgment on behalf of their clients after that date did not constitute the kind of extreme and outrageous conduct contemplated in a tort-of-outrage claim. McCammon, M.D., Facog v. Oldaker, 205 W.Va. 24, 516 S.E.2d 38, 46.

W.Va.1998. Cit. in headnotes; subsec. (1) cit. in headnote, quot. in case quot. in disc., and cit. in sup.; com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup.; com. (e) cit. in sup.; coms. (f), (h), and (i) quot. in sup. Former employee who alleged that he was constructively discharged sued his former employer in federal court, claiming that the termination was caused by the intentional or reckless infliction of emotional distress by plaintiff's supervisor. On certification of questions from the federal district court, this court held, inter alia, that, for plaintiff to prevail on a claim for intentional or reckless infliction of emotional distress, plaintiff must show that defendant's conduct was atrocious, intolerable, and so extreme and outrageous as to exceed the bounds of decency; that defendant acted with the intent to inflict emotional distress or acted recklessly when it was certain or substantially certain that emotional distress would result from his conduct; that defendant's actions caused plaintiff to suffer emotional distress; and that the emotional distress suffered by plaintiff was so severe that no reasonable person could be expected to endure it. Travis v. Alcon Laboratories, Inc., 202 W.Va. 369, 504 S.E.2d 419, 419, 420, 425-430.

W.Va.1997. Com.(d) quot. in case quot. in sup., com. (g) quot. in disc. Employee sued for defamation/libel, invasion of privacy, and intentional infliction of emotional distress arising from his employer's response to union complaints on sick pay. The union had grieved the policy as it related to part-time workers. The employer responded in a letter, posted conspicuously in the business premises, complaining that certain employees, including plaintiff, were “habitual” users of sick pay and would be investigated and possibly disciplined. The trial court ruled that the claims were preempted by the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947. This court reversed, finding nothing in the elements of the wrongs claimed that required interpretation of a collective-bargaining agreement. The offenses were purely matters of state law. Greenfield v. Schmidt Baking Co., Inc., 199 W.Va. 447, 485 S.E.2d 391, 405.

W.Va.1997. Cit. in ftn., quot. in case quot. in disc. A discharged coal-mine foreman sued his former employer, the employer's vice president, and the mine superintendent, alleging that his firing constituted unlawful discrimination against a handicapped person, and that the manner of discharge constituted the tort of outrage. Plaintiff argued that it was outrageous for the employer to include a 16-year employee who was going blind and was on a salary continuance plan in a reduction in force. The trial court granted defendants summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff had not identified any facts suggesting that the employer's conduct was outrageous. The court concluded that plaintiff was essentially asserting a wrongful-discharge claim rather than a claim for the tort of outrage. When he was fired, plaintiff was not singled out, embarrassed, threatened, verbally abused, ridiculed, or humiliated. Hosaflook v. Consolidation Coal Co., 201 W.Va. 325, 497 S.E.2d 174, 184.

W.Va.1997. Cit. in headnote, cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. in sup. and quot. in ftn., com. (j) quot. in disc. and quot. in cases quot. in disc. Four-year-old child who was shopping with her mother when mother was accused of and detained for shoplifting sued department store in which the incident took place for, inter alia, negligent infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted store's motion for directed verdict. Affirming, this court held that child could not recover damages for the emotional distress she allegedly sustained as a result of witnessing store's employees verbally abuse her mother, because employees' behavior, while rude, was not sufficiently extreme or outrageous to serve as a basis for recovery. Johnson v. Hills Dept. Stores, Inc., 200 W.Va. 196, 488 S.E.2d 471, 472, 474-476.

W.Va.1997. Coms. (d) and (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. After two people were killed when a tanker truck crashed into their home and exploded, eleven family members who were at the scene of the fire sued the owner of the truck for negligent infliction of emotional distress. The trial court granted defendant summary judgment, holding that the contemporaneous-observation requirement was not met. However, it determined that plaintiffs could have recovered punitive damages because the claims for negligent infliction of emotional distress were not duplicative of the claims asserted in separate wrongful-death suits. This court reversed and remanded, holding, inter alia, that upon appropriate proof, both compensatory and punitive damages may be awarded to a plaintiff in an action for negligent infliction of emotional distress. The court stated that in a claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress, the focus is on the seriousness of the emotional distress suffered by the plaintiff. Stump v. Ashland, Inc., 201 W.Va. 541, 499 S.E.2d 41, 52.

W.Va.1995. Cit. in sup.; subsec. (1) cit. in headnotes and cit. and quot. in sup.; com. (d) quot. in sup.; com. (j) quot. in ftn., quot. in sup., and quot. in cases cit. and quot. in disc. and in sup.; com. (k) quot. in ftn. Customers who were detained as suspected shoplifters by store sued the store, alleging, inter alia, the tort of outrage. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding plaintiffs compensatory and punitive damages. Affirming, this court held that direct or supplementary testimony by an expert witness on behalf of plaintiffs to prove causation or severity of emotional distress was not required, since the emotions and the manifestations that plaintiffs experienced as a result were well within the common understanding of the average juror and were properly submitted to the panel; the jury accepted evidence that plaintiffs were publicly accused of criminal wrongdoing, endured a public search, were labeled as thieves, and were ridiculed by onlooking customers. Tanner v. Rite Aid of West Virginia, Inc., 194 W.Va. 643, 461 S.E.2d 149, 150, 156, 157, 159-161.

W.Va.1994. Cit. in headnote and in sup., quot. in case quot. in sup., quot. in case cit. generally in sup., com. (g) quot. in sup. and cit. generally in headnote. Management employee sued his former employer for the tort of outrage and intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, after he was fired due to accusations that he had taken kickbacks, approved payment for employees that performed no work, and improperly accepted gratuities from a contractor. The trial court entered judgment on jury verdict for plaintiff. Reversing, this court held that the trial court erred in finding that defendant's conduct during its investigation of plaintiff's alleged improprieties rose to the level required for the tort of outrage. The manner by which defendant effected plaintiff's discharge was not outrageous and defendant's motivations for the discharge were proper. Furthermore, a qualified privilege attached to communications made during the investigation and these communications did not proceed beyond the privilege's scope. Dzinglski v. Weirton Steel Corp., 191 W.Va. 278, 445 S.E.2d 219, 220, 224-227.

W.Va.1994. Cit. in headnotes, cit. generally in disc., quot. in conc. op., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (j) quot. in case cit. in disc., coms. (e) and (f) cit. in ftn. to conc. op. Department store fired employees who, in an attempt to prove that price scanner malfunctioned, purchased tricycles ticketed at $20 for the clearly misscanned price of $3. Store also had employees charged with obtaining goods under false pretenses. After the charges were dismissed, employees sued store for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict for plaintiffs but this court reversed, holding that defendant's conduct, while harsh and arguably overzealous, was not so disgusting as to be intolerable in civilized society. The concurrence, leery of overturning a jury verdict, nevertheless agreed with the majority that plaintiffs had not shown defendant's behavior to be abusive or targeted at a group of people known to be particularly prone to emotional distress. Hines v. Hills Dep't Stores, Inc., 193 W.Va. 91, 454 S.E.2d 385, 386, 389, 390, 392.

W.Va.1993. Quot. in ftn., com. (j) cit. in case cit. in disc. and quot. in ftn. Former wife sued ex-husband for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, as a result of having witnessed defendant battering their son. The trial court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment on the ground that the cause of action was time barred by a one-year statute of limitations. Reversing and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that the claim for emotional distress damages as a result of assault and battery was part of the overall assault and battery claim and was, therefore, subject to the two-year statute of limitations applicable to such claims. Courtney v. Courtney, 190 W.Va. 126, 437 S.E.2d 436, 440.

W.Va.1991. Cit. in sup., subsec. (1) quot. in ftn. and in disc., subsec. (2) cit. in sup. and quot. in ftn., subsec. (2)(b) cit. in ftn., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. and quot. in ftn., com. (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. and cit. in ftn. A woman sued her ex-husband and his mother to recover for injuries she and her minor son suffered as a result of alleged attacks on them by her ex-husband, alleging: that he intentionally assaulted and battered them; that his mother supplied him with drugs and alcohol, knowing that it would make him abusive; and that he intentionally inflicted emotional distress on the child by assaulting the woman in the child's presence. The trial court dismissed the claims against the mother and the claim against the ex-husband of intentional infliction of emotional distress upon the son. Reversing and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that the allegations that the son suffered severe emotional distress because of witnessing his father's attacks on his mother were sufficient to state a cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court stated that the son became emotionally disabled in his ability to communicate and socialize with his mother and had to seek psychiatric care. Courtney v. Courtney, 186 W.Va. 597, 413 S.E.2d 418, 421-424, appeal after remand 190 W.Va. 126, 437 N.E.2d 436 (1993). See case below.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

W.Va.1990. Cit. in sup., com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. A decedent's son sued the decedent's mother, the decedent's brother, and the brother's wife for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, after the defendants did not permit the plaintiff any say in his father's funeral arrangements, despite his appointment as administrator. He also alleged that the defendants conspired to shunt him into an inconspicuous, uncomfortable seat at his father's funeral, his name was not mentioned in the newspaper obituary or at the funeral, he was not allowed to ride with the family at the funeral, and he was not permitted to erect the gravestone he had chosen. After the funeral, he was hindered by the defendants in collecting the estate property. The trial court awarded compensatory damages and punitive damages for willful misconduct. This court reversed and entered final judgment for the defendants, holding that there was no ground for the trial court's finding of emotional distress and explaining that, although this case constituted a serious breach of etiquette and hurt feelings following a death within the family, resort to legal process would do more to aggravate the original slight than to redress it. Keyes v. Keyes, 182 W.Va. 802, 392 S.E.2d 693, 696.

W.Va.1989. Cit. in disc., cit. generally in disc., com. (j) quot. in disc. An employer sued an employee for the return of overpayments made to the employee under the employer's sick leave plan. The employee counterclaimed, alleging intentional infliction of emotional distress by the employer in attempting to recover the overpayments. The trial court entered judgment for the employer. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that the employer's statements to the employee that the employer was "going to get the overpayments," and that they "could discuss the alternatives" to the employee's refusal to return the overpayments did not constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court said the employer's deduction of collateral source monies, in the form of workers' compensation benefits received by the employee, was in accordance with the company's sick leave plan, and that restitution was a proper remedy. Moreover, the court said the company had used no express or implied threats or other impermissible vehicles of coercion. Kanawha Valley Power Co. v. Justice, 181 W.Va. 509, 383 S.E.2d 313, 317.

W.Va.1989. Cit. in ftn. A wife whose husband was undergoing marriage counseling sued the counselor, inter alia, for malpractice and intentional interference with the marital relationship, alleging that her husband and the defendant had engaged in sexual relations, which led to the dissolution of the marriage. After the suit was removed to federal district court, which dismissed the case, the federal appeals court certified to this court the question whether the plaintiff's suit could be maintained. This court stated that the malpractice theory was unavailable since this claim asserted by the plaintiff, who was not counseled by the defendant, did not rest on any professional relationship with the defendant. The court stated, further, that the plaintiff's claim for intentional interference with the marital relationship was substantially the same as one for alienation of affections, which was barred by a state statute. Weaver v. Union Carbide Corp., 180 W.Va. 556, 378 S.E.2d 105, 108, answer to certified question conformed 873 F.2d 78 (4th Cir.1989).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

W.Va.1986. Com. (d) quot. and cit. in sup. An employee sued her former employer and various others for intentional, reckless, and malicious infliction of emotional distress, among other things, arising from her termination from employment. The trial court granted the employer's motion for directed verdict on all but one count, and the plaintiff appealed. This court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded, holding, inter alia, that the plaintiff's evidence in support of her claim for outrageous conduct was not sufficient to pass the Restatement's litmus test for this tort that the conduct be so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency. Cook v. Heck's Inc., 176 W.Va. 368, 342 S.E.2d 453, 461.

W.Va.1985. Com. (j) quot. in ftn. The plaintiff sued her insurer in federal district court for intentional infliction of severe emotional distress, defamation, insulting words, improper handling of an insurance claim, and breach of fiduciary relationship when it came to her attention that the insurer's records contained a reference to her supposed Mafia ties. The plaintiff was permitted to go to the jury only on the issue of a violation of the Unfair Trade Practices Act. On appeal, the Court of Appeals certified questions to this court concerning West Virginia law. This court held that the memorandum in the insurer's file that alleged the Mafia connection was not privileged because it was written with such willful, wanton, and reckless disregard of its truth or falsity. There is, of course, no privilege known to the common law of defamation, said the court, that protects the intentional publication of false material. Mustafis v. Erie Ins. Exchange, 174 W.Va. 660, 328 S.E.2d 675, 690.

W.Va.1982. Quot. but dist., com. (d) quot. in ftn. and in disc. but dist., com. (j) quot. in ftn. but dist. The plaintiff, a former bank employee, brought suit against his immediate supervisor and his employer for retaliatory discharge, outrageous conduct, and blackballing and blacklisting; he sought compensatory and punitive damages. The lower court submitted special interrogatories to the jury and it returned verdicts in favor of the plaintiff on all counts. On the defendants' motion for a new trial, the lower court struck the damages for blackballing and blacklisting as not supported by the evidence, struck the compensatory and punitive damages against the supervisor on the retaliatory discharge theory because he did not directly discharge the plaintiff, and also struck the compensatory and punitive damages against the bank of the outrageous conduct claim as not supported by the evidence. All parties appealed. This court affirmed that the evidence did not support the claim of blackballing and blacklisting. The court held that the tort of outrageous conduct was duplicitous of a claim for retaliatory discharge because the damages were essentially the same. The court also held that a claim for punitive damages did not automatically exist in a retaliatory discharge claim because there was a certain openendedness to the damages available under the latter. The court also held that the facts of the instant case did not warrant punitive damages because the defendants' behavior was not sufficiently wanton, willful, or malicious. The court also held that the supervisor was erroneously removed from the retaliatory discharge claim because it was not necessary for him to directly discharge the plaintiff to be liable. The court remanded the case on the issue of damages only, because it recognized that its drastic reduction of the jury verdict on damages substantially affected the plaintiff's right of recovery. Harless v. First Nat. Bank in Fairmont, _ W.Va. ___, 289 S.E.2d 692, 703-705.

W.Va.1978. Cit. in ftn. An action was brought against a bank and its officers by an at-will employee who alleged that he was fired because he attempted to require his employer to operate in accordance with state and federal consumer credit protection laws by reporting apparent violations thereof to a member of the bank's board of directors. The trial court dismissed the complaint and certified its ruling, which this court reversed. The complaint stated a cause of action on the ground: that the dismissal was retaliation for the employee's efforts to require his employer to conform to statutes, and was thus contrary to public policy; and also on the ground that the employer's action surrounding and leading up to the dismissal amounted to intentional, malicious, and outrageous conduct which caused plaintiff severe emotional distress. In a footnote, the court, citing the Restatement, stated that it did not address the question of whether emotional distress arising solely from outrageous conduct, which conduct was not in itself a tort, could be actionable. Harless v. First Nat. Bank in Fairmont, 162 W.Va. 116, 246 S.E.2d 270, 276.

W.Va.App.

W.Va.App.2016. Com. (d) quot. in case quot. in sup. and cit. in ftn. Registered nurse filed, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) against hospital, alleging that hospital wrongfully terminated her for falsely completing documentation in patient files and filed a false complaint about her with the state nursing board. The trial court entered judgment on a jury verdict finding hospital liable for IIED. Reversing and remanding, this court held that the trial court erred in refusing to grant hospital's motion for judgment as a matter of law on nurse's IIED claim. The court reasoned that, even if hospital's discharge of nurse might not have been warranted and might have been a grievous mistake, it could not be said that hospital's actions were so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, as required to state an IIED claim under Restatement Second of Torts § 46. Herbert J. Thomas Memorial Hospital Association v. Nutter, 795 S.E.2d 530, 544.

Wis.

Wis.1994. Com. (j) quot. in ftn. A boy was killed when his bicycle was struck by a car. The boy's estate sued the driver's insurer for the boy's trauma preceding the collision, and the boy's mother sued for negligent infliction of emotional distress arising from her viewing the immediate aftermath of her son's fatal injury. The trial court dismissed both claims and the intermediate appellate court affirmed. This court affirmed the dismissal of the estate's claim, but reversed the dismissal of the mother's claim. The court abandoned the "zone of danger" rule and held, inter alia, that a bystander's claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress was governed by the traditional rules applicable to negligence actions. The court stated that it was borrowing the requirement of severe emotional distress from the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress, and that, in this case, the mother's severe emotional distress was neither too remote nor too extraordinary. Bowen v. Lumbermens Mut. Cas. Co., 183 Wis.2d 627, 517 N.W.2d 432, 442-443.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Wis.1991. Cit. in ftn. to diss. op. A husband brought an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress against the biological father of a child born to the husband's wife, alleging that the defendant concealed his paternity until the husband developed a bond with the child. The trial court dismissed the claim, and the intermediate appellate court certified the appeal to this court. Affirming, this court held that the complaint in essence stated a claim for criminal conversation and was barred by a state statute abolishing claims for criminal conversation and alienation of affections. The dissent argued that the plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress was distinct from the claims of alienation of affections and criminal conversation and should not be barred; it said that the three causes of action focused on different concepts, noting that alienation of affections and criminal conversation focused on harm to the marriage, while emotional distress claims focused on harm to the plaintiff's well-being. Koestler v. Pollard, 162 Wis.2d 797, 471 N.W.2d 7, 13, 15.

Wis.1980. Cit. in ftn. in sup. The plaintiff brought an action charging wrongful performance of an autopsy on their deceased child. The defendants, Milwaukee County and individuals employed by the County, moved to dismiss the complaint, contending that it failed to state a claim upon which relief could be granted because an autopsy performed by a medical examiner is a quasi judicial function and immunity therefore applies. The trial court denied the motion to dismiss, declaring that the immunity was not so broad as to encompass the negligence which occurred in this case. This court stated that a family has a legal right to entomb deceased family members with integrity and without mutilation. Therefore, a next of kin has an actionable claim against one who mutilates a corpse. The action does not revolve around the physical mutilation, but rather encompasses the degree of emotional suffering endured by the living kin. The plaintiff claimed that the defendant's conduct was negligent, or in the alternative, intentional. Given the standards of emotional distress, the court found the bare allegations of the plaintiff sufficient to survive the initial hurdle of the motion to dismiss. The medical examiner's authority to perform autopsies is discretionary, but is limited by statute in order to protect the emotional well being of the next of kin. The court found that the defendants' duties were quasi judicial, and blanket immunity did not apply. The court found that the discretion was medical, not governmental, and therefore public policy would not be served by allowing wholesale decisions to perform autopsies. The claim for misconduct was not barred by immunity. The defendants did not act in excess of their jurisdiction but instead acted wholly outside their jurisdiction. The court held that the complaint did state a claim upon which relief could be granted, and affirmed the order of the trial court. Scarpaci v. Milwaukee County, 96 Wis.2d 663, 292 N.W.2d 816, 822.

Wis.App.

Wis.App.1987. Com. (d) quot. in diss. op. A funeral director who failed to prepare a corpse properly for shipment to Mexico for viewing and burial was found guilty of gross negligence and outrageous conduct by the state licensing board, which revoked his license. The trial court reversed the revocation and remanded, and this court reversed the trial court, holding that the evidence was sufficient to support the board's decision. The dissenting opinion argued that the board was entitled to find the funeral director negligent, but there was insufficient evidence that he acted in reckless and willful disregard of the family's wishes. Doersching v. State Funeral Directors Bd., 138 Wis.2d 312, 405 N.W.2d 781, 791.

Wis.App.1983. Cit. in ftn. The plaintiff sued the defendant after failing to collect a debt on a consumer loan. The plaintiff had contacted the defendant several times a month and had contacted the defendant's employer to determine that the defendant had been paid. The defendant denied that he had defaulted, and counterclaimed for alleged violations of debt collection practices. The trial court granted judgment of foreclosure on a summary judgment motion and denied the counterclaim after a trial. This court affirmed the denial of the counterclaim, but reversed an award of damages to the plaintiff, holding that the defense asserted by the defendant was not frivolous. The court conducted its inquiry under a state statute which eliminated the need to rely on the tort of intentional infliction of emotional harm. Associates Financial Services Co. v. Hornik, 114 Wis.2d 163, 336 N.W.2d 395, 397.

Wyo.

Wyo.2017. Cit. in case cit. in sup. (general cite). Computer renters filed claims for invasion of privacy against rent-to-own franchise, alleging that defendant installed software on leased computers that allowed defendant to track the location of the computer, capture screen shots and key strokes, and activate the webcam. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendant. The court of appeals affirmed. This court reversed, holding that Wyoming recognized a common-law cause of action for intrusion upon seclusion as set forth in Restatement Second of Torts § 652B, with damages as defined by § 652H. The court agreed with plaintiffs that the Restatement version of the tort of intrusion upon seclusion was the approach best suited to Wyoming common law, noting its prior reliance on Restatement Second of Torts § 46 to define the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Howard v. Aspen Way Enterprises, Inc., 406 P.3d 1271, 1278.

Wyo.2005. Subsec. (1) quot. in sup., com. (d) cit. in sup., com. (h) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee sued employer for breach of contract and intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that defendant unlawfully terminated her as an act of retaliation for reporting co-worker's sexual harassment. Trial court granted defendant summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding that plaintiff's lawful termination by defendant could not support her claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiff was an at-will employee, and there was evidence that plaintiff was fired because she could not balance her cash drawer over a period of time and because of insubordinate actions when questioned about her last submitted cash drawer statement accounting. Hoflund v. Airport Golf Club, 2005 WY 17, 105 P.3d 1079, 1089-1090.

Wyo.2003. Cit. in disc., cit. in case quot. in sup., subsec. (1) and com. (d) quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. and quot. in diss. op. Mother and daughter who were separated for 43 years because a hospital switched two newborn babies at birth sued hospital for negligence, seeking damages for great emotional pain, humiliation, anxiety, grief, and expenses for psychological counseling. The federal district court certified to this court the question of whether

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Wyoming allowed recovery of purely emotional damages. Answering the question, this court held that plaintiffs could maintain a negligence action in which the only alleged damages were emotional. The court required that the emotional distress inflicted be severe. The dissent argued that the court system would be overburdened by the requirement of a case-by-case determination of emotional severity. Larsen v. Banner Health System, 2003 WY 167, 81 P.3d 196, 205-207.

Wyo.2002. Cit. in sup., subsecs. (2) and (2)(a) cit. and quot. in sup., coms. (d), (i), and (j) and illus. 1 and 11 quot. in sup., com. (h) cit. and quot. in sup., and com. (l) and caveat cit. in ftn. Minors brought suit for intentional infliction of emotional distress against attorney who attacked their mother. Reversing in part the trial court's grant of summary judgment for defendant and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that the trial court erred in requiring plaintiffs to show a continuing course of abuse, and genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether defendant's alleged conduct in beating, kicking, and punching plaintiffs' mother, while screaming that he wanted to kill her, was sufficiently outrageous for liability, and as to whether plaintiffs sustained severe emotional distress as a result of the conduct. Bevan v. Fix, 2002 WY 43, 42 P.3d 1013, 1019-1021, 1023-1025.

Wyo.2002. Quot. in case quot. in sup., coms. (g), (h), and (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Parents sued grandparents and others for various conspiracy and individual claims, including tortious interference with the parent-child relationship and intentional infliction of emotional distress, arising from daughter's failure to return home after staying with grandparents during pendency of abuse charges against father. Trial court dismissed tortious-interference claim against grandparents for lack of jurisdiction and dismissed remaining claims by summary judgment. Supreme court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that there was no supporting evidence that defendants' conduct caused parents “severe emotional distress.” Hoblyn v. Johnson, 55 P.3d 1219, 1231-1232.

Wyo.2002. Subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in sup. Employee who was fired sued former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that termination of her employment solely on the basis of her coemployees' anonymous and unsubstantiated comments during a time in which she was grieving over the recent death of her mother caused her severe emotional distress. Trial court granted defendant summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that employee's emotional-distress claim failed. In light of the court's holding that plaintiff's employment was at will, the court found that employer did nothing more than act within its legal rights when it terminated plaintiff's employment. Trabing v. Kinko's, Inc., 2002 WY 171, 57 P.3d 1248, 1256.

Wyo.2001. Coms. (d) and (e) quot. in sup., com. (h) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee sued employer and employer's owner for wrongful discharge and intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, alleging that defendants fired him despite knowing that his mother was terminally ill. Trial court granted defendants summary judgment, concluding that plaintiff's allegations were not so extreme and outrageous as to permit jury to consider emotional-distress claim. This court reversed and remanded, holding, in part, that since defendants did not submit evidence in support of summary judgment motion controverting plaintiff's complaint that he suffered intentional infliction of emotional distress, plaintiff could rest on allegations of his complaint. While plaintiff presented no evidence supporting his claim, he had no burden to do so. Loya v. Wyoming Partners of Jackson Hole, Inc., 2001 WY 124, 35 P.3d 1246, 1252-1253.

Wyo.2001. Adopted in case cit. in disc., quot. in disc., cit. generally in law review article quot. in disc., coms. (d) and (h) quot. in sup. Wife sued for divorce and brought various tort claims, including one for intentional infliction of emotional distress, against husband. The trial court held, in part, that wife failed to state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Reversing in part and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that extreme and outrageous conduct by one spouse that resulted in severe emotional distress to the other spouse should not be ignored by virtue of the marriage of the victim to the aggressor, and that such behavior could create an independent cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress. McCulloh v. Drake, 24 P.3d 1162, 1169, 1170.

Wyo.2000. Cit. in disc., subsec. (1) quot. in case quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in disc., coms. (h) and (j) cit. and quot. in disc. Survivors of worker killed in mine collapse brought wrongful-death action against mining company. Plaintiffs also asserted a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with the conduct of defendant's on-site representatives. The trial court dismissed the complaint. Affirming, this court held that the Workers' Compensation Act provided the exclusive remedy for the wrongful-death claim, that the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress was derivative of the statutory claim, and that, in any event, defendant's representatives did nothing extreme or outrageous when they informed plaintiffs that a rescue crew had reached worker, who was supposedly talking and laughing with crew, but who was pronounced dead two hours later. Anderson v. Solvay Minerals, Inc., 3 P.3d 236, 239, 241.

Wyo.2000. Subsec. (1) and coms. (d), (e), (h), and (j) quot. in sup. Terminated employee sued former employer under theories including promissory estoppel and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The trial court entered summary judgment for defendant. Affirming in part and reversing in part, this court held, inter alia, that material factual issues existed as to whether plaintiff had detrimentally relied on defendant's assurances of job security, whether defendant's actions were outrageous under the circumstances, and whether plaintiff's claimed mental distress was severe. Worley v. Wyoming Bottling Co., Inc., 1 P.3d 615, 627-630.

Wyo.1997. Cit. in headnotes, adopted in case cit. in disc., com. (d) quot. but dist., coms. (h) and (j) cit. and quot. in disc. Insureds whose house was destroyed by fire sued insurer for, inter alia, intentional infliction of emotional distress in connection with insurer's claims investigation practices. On remand from this court, the trial court directed a verdict for insurer. Affirming, this court held, in part, that insureds presented insufficient evidence from which a jury could conclude that insurer had acted outrageously or caused insureds to suffer severe mental distress. Hatch v. State Farm Fire and Cas. Co., 930 P.2d 382, 384, 385, 395-397.

Wyo.1997. Subsec. (1) cit. in headnote and quot. in case quot. in sup., coms. (d), (e), (h), and (j) cit. in headnotes and quot. in sup., com. (h) quot. in spec. conc. op. A former dispatcher with the city police department sued another officer for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Trial court granted defendant summary judgment. This court reversed, holding that a fact issue existed as to whether defendant's conduct was extreme and outrageous. Plaintiff alleged repeated incidents over a period of several weeks in which defendant stared at her, followed her, and subjected her to sexually motivated advances and physically intimidating behavior, each escalating in intensity and severity. She also alleged unwelcome, non-negligible physical contact wherein defendant touched and hugged her even after she repeatedly rebuffed his advances, and ultimately confined her in a closet and rubbed his crotch against her leg. The court also determined that plaintiff presented sufficient evidence to create a jury issue on the severity of her emotional distress, as she received therapy for post-traumatic stress disorder, anxiety, and depression. Specially concurring opinion argued that the majority opinion did not establish an arbitrary rule that in every case involving sexual misconduct reasonable men could differ as to whether the conduct is so extreme and outrageous as to justify recovery. Kanzler v. Renner, 937 P.2d 1337, 1337, 1338, 1341, 1343, 1345.

Wyo.1997. Com. (g) cit. in case cit. in disc. and cit. generally in headnote. An employee sued his former employer, the employer's vice president, and the employer's production supervisor for breach of contract and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. Plaintiff based his emotional-distress claim on the fact that he was fired at a time when the defendants knew he was extremely vulnerable due to the death of a longtime friend. The trial court granted defendants summary judgment. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that defendants' conduct was not sufficiently extreme and outrageous to support an emotional-distress claim, because plaintiff's employment was at will and his contract permitted discharge for any reason or for no reason. The employer did no more than act on its legal rights in a permissible way when it terminated his employment and subsequently filled his position. Terry v. Pioneer Press, Inc., 947 P.2d 273, 274, 278.

Wyo.1997. Cit. in headnote, quot. in case quot. in sup. Former employee sued employer, alleging breach of contract and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. The jury awarded plaintiff emotional-distress damages, but trial court struck jury's award of damages for loss of business reputation. This court affirmed in part, holding, inter alia, that plaintiff could not recover damages for loss of business reputation as part of his emotional-distress claim. Plaintiff did not present any evidence to the jury that the injury to his business reputation was caused by emotional distress. Wilder v. Cody Country Chamber of Commerce, 933 P.2d 1098, 1098, 1105.

Wyo.1996. Cit. in headnotes, adopted in case quot. in disc., cit. in spec. conc. op., com. (d) cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (d) quot. in spec. conc. op., com. (j) cit. in case quot. in disc., com. (h) quot. in disc. and quot. in spec. conc. op. In action brought under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, woman who was kidnapped by her boyfriend, held against her will, and repeatedly raped charged responding police officer with intentional infliction of emotional distress, alleging that he conducted a substandard and inadequate investigation of her complaint. Officer moved for summary judgment on the ground that he was entitled to invoke the doctrine of qualified immunity. The trial court denied the motion, but the intermediate appellate court reversed. Affirming, this court held that, while officer was rude, insensitive, and offensive, his conduct was not so extreme or outrageous as to be considered utterly intolerable in civilized society. Specially concurring opinion believed that behavior coming within the protection of the qualified immunity doctrine could not be termed outrageous. Garcia v. Lawson, 928 P.2d 1164, 1165, 1166-1168.

Wyo.1994. Cit. in headnote, cit. in case cit. in sup., subsec. (1) quot. in sup., coms. (d) and (j) quot. in sup. and cit. generally in headnote. Alleging that his former wife removed his daughter from Oregon and hid her from him for nine years, assisted by the maternal grandmother and the woman's second husband, a husband brought suit for interference with parental rights and intentional infliction of emotional distress, among other claims. The trial court dismissed. Affirming, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to state an emotional-distress claim because there were no facts alleged in the complaint supporting the intentional concealment of the child or any prevention of plaintiff from visiting with her, and there was no factual allegation in the complaint that would demonstrate the lack of notice to plaintiff of the filing of guardianship proceedings was due to defendants' intentional or reckless acts that would overstep all bounds of decency. Cosner v. Ridinger, 882 P.2d 1243, 1243, 1248, 1249.

Wyo.1994. Cit. in case cit. and quot. in sup., subsec. (1) cit. in case cit. in sup., subsec. (2) cit. in headnotes, cit. and quot. in sup. and adopted, com. (l) quot. in sup. A woman whose stepfather had sexually abused her throughout her life developed psychiatric difficulties and eventually committed suicide by ingesting an overdose of a prescription drug. Although stepfather had been aware of the woman's previous suicide attempt, he contacted a doctor and asked him to write a prescription for the woman. The woman's husband and her child sued stepfather for wrongful death and infliction of emotional distress. The trial court dismissed. Reversing and remanding, this court held, inter alia, that plaintiffs sufficiently pleaded a third-party cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress because they were present in the immediate aftermath of the tragic results of stepfather's outrageous conduct, and the suicide was the final result of a continuing course of conduct instigated by stepfather. R.D. v. W.H., 875 P.2d 26, 27, 32, 33.

Wyo.1994. Subsec. (1) quot. in disc., coms. (d), (h), and (j) quot. in case quot. in sup. Former executive director sued nonprofit corporation for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, after he was terminated by board of directors dissatisfied with his financial oversight. The trial court granted defendant summary judgment. This court reversed and remanded, holding that sufficient evidence existed of outrageous conduct by defendant, both before and after plaintiff's termination, when corporation officials placed plaintiff on probation, reduced his compensation, possibly altered his employment status, and required him to publicly address community group to accept responsibility for defendant's financial problems, despite fact that defendant had not completed any formal investigation and despite plaintiff's denial of any prior knowledge of the problems; defendant also aggressively sought to prevent plaintiff from getting a job after termination. It noted that shame and humiliation that plaintiff alleged extended for two years and was enough to create a jury question on issue of liability. Wilder v. Cody Country Ch. of Commerce, 868 P.2d 211, 223, 224.

Wyo.1990. Quot. in case quot. in disc., coms. (d), (h), and (j) quot. in case quot. in disc. Several ranchers sued an oil company, alleging that the company's failure to properly plug and abandon an oil test well allowed salty seepage water to escape and damage their lands. The ranchers asserted, inter alia, a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress based on the company's misrepresentations in telling them that the well was adequately plugged. One of the ranchers allegedly became chronically depressed and had to have part of his stomach removed because of the failure of his crops due to the salt on his ranch. The trial court granted the defendant a directed verdict on the emotional distress claim. Affirming, this court held that the plaintiffs failed to establish the element of causation necessary to support the claim. The court said that a reasonable jury could only conclude that the emotional distress suffered by the rancher resulted not from any statement made to him concerning the well but rather from the condition of his land. Davis v. Consolidated Oil & Gas, Inc., 802 P.2d 840, 849.

Wyo.1989. Cit. in case quot. in sup. A university student filed an action for damages against her professor for assault, battery, intentional infliction of emotional harm, and duress and undue influence, after he ran at her during class, yelling and shaking his fists, and pounded his fists on her belongings on the table in front of her, creating in the plaintiff fear and apprehension of imminent bodily contact. The trial court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment. Reversing and remanding in part, this court held that the trial court erred in granting summary judgment for the defendant because the elements of civil assault, civil battery, and intentional infliction of emotional distress, as found in the Restatement, were stated in the plaintiff's complaint. Affirming in part, this court held that the plaintiff's allegations of duress and undue influence in that the defendant had forced her to submit her final class paper, thus depriving her of free exercise of her will and her constitutional rights, did not state a cognizable claim. Jung-Leonczynska v. Steup, 782 P.2d 578, 583, appeal after remand 803 P.2d 1358 (1990).

Wyo.1989. Com. (g) quot. in case quot. in sup. The plaintiff sued the defendants for intentional infliction of emotional distress, inter alia, on the ground that the defendants purchased an outstanding judgment against the plaintiff and caused execution to be levied against the plaintiff and his stock in a malicious, improper, and unlawful fashion. The trial court dismissed the complaint for failure to state a claim for which relief could be granted. Affirming, this court held that the plaintiff did not sufficiently allege the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress, since there was nothing in the complaint that alleged that the defendants did anything that they were not entitled to do under the law. Mummery v. Polk, 770 P.2d 241, 243.

Wyo.1986. Quot. and cit. in conc. and diss. op. The family of a child struck by an automobile who observed the child's severe injury after the impact sued the driver for negligent infliction of emotional distress. The trial court dismissed the complaint for failure to state claims on which relief could be granted. Reversing in part, this court held that the class of plaintiffs who could bring an action for negligent infliction of emotional distress must either witness the accident or soon come to the scene while the victim was still there. The dissenting and concurring opinion argued that a proper plaintiff status should be allowed only if the party was present at the location of the incident when it occurred. Gates v. Richardson, 719 P.2d 193, 205.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Wyo.1986. Cit. in sup. and adopted, quot. and cit. in disc., coms. (d), (g), and (h) quot. in disc., com. (j) quot. in sup. and in disc. An employee sued his former employer for intentional infliction of emotional distress after he was discharged from his job because he was suspected of leaking confidential information to competitors. The trial court awarded the employer summary judgment. Affirming in part, this court held that the employee's allegations of distress were insufficient to create a jury question on the severity issue. The court stated that, as a matter of law, the employee's distress was not severe enough to be compensable. Leithead v. American Colloid Co., 721 P.2d 1059, 1065, 1066-1067.

Wyo.1986. Quot. in case cit. in disc. A bank filed a complaint for replevin against a rancher, alleging that the rancher was preparing to sell cattle in which the bank had a secured interest. The trial court issued an order of attachment against the rancher's property and later granted summary judgment to the bank, finding that the rancher's affirmative defenses and counterclaim were meritless. This court affirmed, holding, inter alia, that there was no evidence to support the rancher's counterclaim that the bank intentionally inflicted emotional distress upon her by forcing her to negotiate loans when she was grief-stricken following her husband's death. Sturman v. First Nat. Bank, 729 P.2d 667, 680.

Wyo.1985. Quot. in sup., coms. (d), (g), (h) quot. in sup., subsec. (1) quot. in diss. op., com. (g) cit. in diss. op. A former high school principal brought action for intentional interference with contractual relations and intentional infliction of mental distress against parents, teachers, and students who had addressed complaints about him to the school board. The trial court entered summary judgment for the defendants, holding that as a matter of law the information furnished was not the cause of the principal's termination. The claim for intentional infliction of mental distress also failed because it was adjunct to the claim for interference with contract. This court affirmed, holding that the essential element of outrageous conduct by the defendants was not present. The court declined to use this case to explicitly recognize and define the torts of intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress. A dissent argued that the defendants' conduct was sufficiently extreme and outrageous for the claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress to have gone to a jury. Spurlock v. Ely, 707 P.2d 188, 192, 193, 194.

Restatement of the Law - Torts © 1934-2025 American Law Institute.
Reproduced with permission. Other editorial enhancements © Thomson Reuters.

End of Document

© 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

CASE NO. 12

2024 WL 1216562
Only the Westlaw citation
is currently available.
United States Court of Appeals, Fifth Circuit.

Selva KUMAR, Plaintiff—Appellant,
v.
PANERA BREAD COMPANY,
Defendant—Appellee.

No.
23
-
20178
|
FILED March 21, 2024

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Southern District of Texas, USDC No. 4:21-CV-3779

Attorneys and Law Firms

Selva Kumar, Houston, TX, Pro Se.

Cassie J. Dallas, David A. McFarland, Ryan Owen, Thompson, Coe, Cousins & Irons, L.L.P., Dallas, TX, for Defendant—Appellee.

Before Wiener, Haynes, and Higginson, Circuit Judges.

Opinion

Per Curiam: [*]

1 Plaintiff-Appellant and steadfast vegetarian Selva Kumar, proceeding pro se, alleges that Defendant-Appellee Panera Bread Company misrepresented that its broccoli-cheddar soup was free of meat byproducts. The district court granted Panera's motion to dismiss pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6). For the reasons set forth below, we AFFIRM in part, and VACATE and REMAND in part.

I. Facts and Procedural History

Kumar is a "staunch and unfaltering follower of the Hinduism religion." [1] Central to his faith is a commitment to vegetarianism. As such, when he eats out at restaurants, Kumar asks whether the food that he orders is vegetarian, including whether it is cooked in the same oil used for animal products. He notes that "[a]ccidentally consuming meat for a vegetarian is upsetting on many levels."

Kumar alleges that (1) on January 23, 2021, Kumar dined "as usual" at a Panera location in Houston, Texas; (2) every time that he ordered the broccoli-cheddar soup at Panera, he inquired whether it was made with chicken broth; (3) "each time," the answer was no; (4) those representations were false; and (5) he was "fraudulently induced into purchasing [Panera's] products."

Kumar brought this suit in Texas state court, alleging negligence, gross negligence, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and violation of the Texas Deceptive Trade Practices Act (DTPA). Panera removed the case to federal court on the basis of diversity jurisdiction, then sought dismissal pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6). The district court allowed Kumar to amend his complaint, which is now the operative pleading. Panera then filed a second motion to dismiss, which the court granted. Kumar appeals.

II. Standard of Review

On appeal, a district court's grant of a motion to dismiss is reviewed de novo, "accepting all well-pleaded facts as true and viewing those facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs." Meador v. Apple, Inc., 911 F.3d 260, 264 (5th Cir. 2018) (quoting Dorsey v. Portfolio Equities, Inc., 540 F.3d 333, 338 (5th Cir. 2008)). A complaint survives a motion to dismiss under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) only if it "pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678 (2009). "Factual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level." Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 556 (2008). Pro se complaints are "held to less stringent standards than formal pleadings drafted by lawyers." Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 106 (1976) (internal quotation marks and citation omitted). Nevertheless, they must "set forth facts giving rise to a claim on which relief may be granted." Johnson v. Atkins, 999 F.2d 99 (5th Cir. 1993).

III. Discussion

2 Kumar challenges the merits, but before we address his arguments, we examine the basis for our jurisdiction, as we are obligated to do. See In re Yazoo Pipeline Co., L.P., 746 F.3d 211, 214 (5th Cir. 2014).

A. Subject-Matter Jurisdiction

It is axiomatic that federal courts are courts of limited jurisdiction. Perez v. McCreary, Veselka, Bragg & Allen, P.C., 45 F.4th 816, 821 (5th Cir. 2022). As such, this court has an independent responsibility to address questions of subject-matter jurisdiction, even when parties "overlook or elect not to press" the issue. Henderson ex rel. Henderson v. Shinseki, 562 U.S. 428, 434 (2011); see also Gonzalez v. Thaler, 565 U.S. 134, 141 (2012) ("Subject-matter jurisdiction can never be waived or forfeited."). Although Kumar did not raise the subject, on review of the pleadings we sua sponte observed that Panera's amended notice of removal does not properly allege diversity jurisdiction.

For a federal court to exercise diversity jurisdiction, there must be complete diversity between the parties. Howery v. Allstate Ins. Co., 243 F.3d 912, 920 (5th Cir. 2001) (citing 28 U.S.C. § 1332). Panera's amended notice of removal alleges that Kumar is a citizen of Texas, a fact which neither party disputes. The notice then states that Panera is a "limited liability company with its principal place of business in Missouri." However, the citizenship of an LLC is not determined by its principal place of business, but instead by the citizenship of each of its members. Harvey v. Grey Wolf Drilling Co., 542 F.3d 1077, 1080 (5th Cir. 2008). Without correct information as to Panera's citizenship, the district court could not properly exercise diversity jurisdiction. See Stafford v. Mobil Oil Corp., 945 F.2d 803, 805 (5th Cir. 1991).

This overlooked issue is not fatal to the instant appeal, however, because 28 U.S.C. § 1653 provides a mechanism for amending the pleadings to properly assert jurisdiction. Id. at 805–06. Parties may "cure technical defects or failure to specifically allege the citizenship of a party in the appellate courts, but only when the amendment would do nothing more than state an alternative jurisdictional basis for recovery upon the facts previously alleged." Howery, 243 F.3d at 919 (internal quotation marks and alteration omitted) (quoting Whitmire v. Victus Ltd., 212 F.3d 885, 888 (5th Cir. 2000)).

The court requested that the parties file a letter addressing this apparent failure to properly assert diversity jurisdiction. Panera admits that it wrongly pleaded that it is an LLC rather than a corporation. It has attached public records from Missouri and Delaware which establish that it is a corporation with citizenship in each of these states. This court may take judicial notice of "online state agency records" to resolve a jurisdictional defect via amendment on appeal. See Swindol v. Aurora Flight Scis. Corp., 805 F.3d 516, 518–19 (5th Cir. 2015) (taking judicial notice of jurisdictional facts from public agency filings as they are "not subject to reasonable dispute"); MidCap Media Fin., L.L.C. v. Pathway Data, Inc., 929 F.3d 310, 315 (5th Cir. 2019). Kumar opposes this amendment, claiming that Panera is indeed an LLC, but cites no evidence for his assertions.

3 Title 28 U.S.C. § 1653 is to be "broadly construed to avoid dismissals of actions on purely 'technical' or 'formal' grounds." Whitmire, 212 F.3d at 887. The purpose of the statute is to correct "formal mistakes," which is how we would characterize the error made by Panera in its amended notice of removal. See Midcap Media, 929 F.3d at 316. We thus elect to take judicial notice of the state agency records attached to Panera's letter and to treat the letter as a motion to amend its notice of removal. We hereby grant that motion. With this amendment, we are satisfied that federal diversity jurisdiction existed at the time of removal and at the time of judgment. See Howery, 243 F.3d at 921.

B. Waiver

In its responsive briefing, Panera argues that Kumar has waived every issue on appeal because he did not adequately brief his arguments. Briefs must "contain appellant's contentions and the reasons for them." Fed. R. App. P. 28(a). As Panera points out, several of the cases that Kumar cites are nonexistent, and those cited cases that do exist are largely irrelevant to his claims. Further, Kumar fails to identify any error in the district court's analysis of at least one of his claims, simply re-urging the same points that he urged below. See Shaw v. Norman, 389 F. App'x 408, 409 (5th Cir. 2010) (per curiam) ("When an appellant does not identify error in the district court's analysis, it is the same as if the appellant had not appealed the judgment."). While we recognize the evident shortcomings in his briefing, Kumar's pro se status and impressive effort at self-representation leads us to consider his appellate arguments on their merits. Cf. Goins v. Dir., Office of Worker's Comp. Programs, 436 F. App'x 366, 369 (5th Cir. 2011) (per curiam) (describing the adequate briefing standard as a "low hurdle," but finding arguments waived when plaintiff's brief had zero citations to the record or legal authority).

C. Tort Claims

Kumar appeals the district court's dismissal of his claims for negligence, gross negligence, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. We review each in turn.

"To sustain a negligence action, the plaintiff must produce evidence of a legal duty owed by the defendant to the plaintiff, a breach of that duty, and damages proximately caused by that breach." Lee Lewis Constr., Inc. v. Harrison, 70 S.W.3d 778, 782 (Tex. 2001).[2] In dismissing Kumar's negligence claim, the district court held that his complaint failed to allege any facts supporting the elements of duty, breach, and damages.

We agree with the district court that Kumar has failed to identify a breach of duty owed to him by Panera. On appeal, Kumar discusses the "reasonable expectations" test, suggesting that Panera acted negligently by failing to warn him of the chicken broth despite knowing about his vegetarianism. However, this test applies to premises liability claims, not negligence claims. See Austin v. Kroger Tex., L.P., 465 S.W.3d 193, 215–16 (Tex. 2015) (distinguishing between negligent-activity and premises-defect claims). Although negligence and premises liability are related, Kumar's amended complaint alleges only that Panera breached a duty owed to him to "act reasonably and perform their responsibilities in such a way as to protect their patrons from injury." This "action-focused" claim sounds in negligence, not premises liability, which instead concerns injuries resulting from a "condition on the premises." See Austin v. Kroger Tex., L.P., 746 F.3d 191, 198 (5th Cir. 2014). Accordingly, we conclude that the district court did not err in dismissing Kumar's claims for simple and gross negligence.

4 Kumar's complaint also brings a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. However, in his briefing before this court, Kumar expressly abandons this claim, stating that he "agrees with the trial court [that] Appellee did not cause Intentional Infliction of [E]motional Distress." He admits that Panera's actions were not intentional, "but [were] still reckless." Although Kumar does not raise this argument, intentional infliction of emotional distress can be established through merely reckless conduct. See Twyman v. Twyman, 855 S.W.2d 619, 621 (Tex. 1993) (citing RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 46 (AM. L. INST. 1965)). But, given Kumar's decision to agree specifically with the district court's holding, we deem this claim abandoned. And, while Kumar may seek to pursue other types of "emotional distress" claims, such as negligent infliction of emotional distress, we are a "court of errors" and may not consider claims that were not before the district court. See Miller v. Nationwide Life Ins. Co., 391 F.3d 698, 701 (5th Cir. 2004).

As the district court properly dismissed each of Kumar's tort claims, we turn now to the DTPA.

D. The DTPA

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

The DTPA protects consumers from "[f]alse, misleading, or deceptive acts or practices." TEX. BUS. & COM. CODE § 17.46(a). To state a claim under the DTPA, a plaintiff must establish that (1) he or she was a consumer within the meaning of the Act, (2) the defendant violated a specific provision of the Act, and (3) the violation caused the plaintiff's injury. Amstadt v. U.S. Brass Corp., 919 S.W.2d 644, 649 (Tex. 1996) (citing TEX. BUS. & COM. CODE § 17.50(a)). Kumar alleges that Panera fraudulently misled him "regarding the meal ingredients," causing him pain and suffering.

In federal court, a complaint alleging violations of the DTPA is subject to the requirements of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 9(b), which requires that fraud be pleaded "with particularity." See Lone Star Ladies Inv. Club v. Schlotzsky's Inc., 238 F.3d 363, 368 (5th Cir. 2001) ("Rule 9(b) applies by its plain language to all averments of fraud, whether they are part of a claim of fraud or not."); see also Berry v. Indianapolis Life Ins. Co., 608 F. Supp. 2d 785, 800 (N.D. Tex. 2009) (noting that it is well settled that claims alleging violations of the DTPA are subject to Rule 9(b)'s particularity requirement). A pleading satisfies "particularity" when it alleges the "time, place, and contents of the false representations, as well as the identity of the person making the misrepresentation and what he obtained thereby." Wallace v. Tesoro Corp., 796 F.3d 468, 480 (5th Cir. 2015) (citation omitted). However, Rule "9(b)'s ultimate meaning is context-specific." IAS Servs. Grp., L.L.C. v. Jim Buckley & Assocs., Inc., 900 F.3d 640, 647 (5th Cir. 2018). Likewise, "we are mindful that Rule 9(b) does not supplant Rule 8(a)'s notice pleading, which requires only enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." Id. (internal quotation marks and citations omitted).

Here, the district court dismissed Kumar's DTPA claim because his complaint failed to allege the identity of the person who made the false representations about the soup. However, given that he is a pro se litigant and has represented in his brief that he is able to submit that name, we conclude that the case should not have been dismissed solely on that basis. Cf. Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89, 94–95 (2007) (per curiam) (relying, in part, on later filings by a pro se plaintiff to conclude the complaint plausibly alleged harm and explaining "a pro se complaint, however inartfully pleaded, must be held to less stringent standards than formal pleadings drafted by lawyers" (citation omitted)). Importantly, his first attorney failed to file anything, so he was pro se. By the time that he found another attorney, he was not given the necessary time to have that attorney represent him. Moreover, while his complaint was not very clear on the issue of his alleged injury, liberally construing it, he does plead the third element of a DTPA claim: that Panera's actions caused his alleged injury. See Metro Allied Ins. Agency, Inc. v. Lin, 304 S.W.3d 830, 834 (Tex. 2009) (defining causation under the DTPA as a "substantial factor in bringing about the injury, without which the injury would not have occurred"); Amstadt, 919 S.W.2d at 650 ("[T]he defendant's deceptive trade act or practice is not actionable under the DTPA unless it was committed in connection with the plaintiff's transaction in goods or services."). Thus, upon remand, he should be permitted to have his new attorney come in and amend his DTPA claim.

5 Accordingly, we AFFIRM in part, and VACATE and REMAND in part.

All Citations

Not Reported in Fed. Rptr., 2024 WL 1216562

Footnotes

* This opinion is not designated for publication. See 5th Cir. R. 47.5.

1 Because this case comes to this court on review of a motion to dismiss, all facts in the operative complaint are assumed to be true. See Lampton v. Diaz, 639 F.3d 223, 225 (5th Cir. 2011) (quoting Kalina v. Fletcher, 522 U.S. 118, 122 (1997)).

2 As a federal court sitting in diversity, we apply the law of the forum state. James v. Woods, 899 F.3d 404, 408 (5th Cir. 2018) (citing Erie R.R. Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64, 78 (1938)).

End of Document © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

CASE NO. 13

2024 WL 4183301
Only the Westlaw citation
is currently available.
United States District Court,
E.D. Texas, Tyler Division.

7X CATTLE CO. LLC, Plaintiff,
v.
Daniel BRANDSTADT, 3C Farms, LLC, and Pinehurst Partners I, LLC, Defendants.

CASE NO . 6 : 22 - CV - 00396 - JDK - KNM

Signed July 22, 2024

Attorneys and Law Firms

Jonathon P. Reinisch, Thomas P. Cimino, Jr., Vedder Price P.C., Chicago, IL, Samuel M. Deau, Arianna G. Goodman, Vedder Price P.C., Dallas, TX, for Plaintiff.

Eric Charles Wood, Brown Fox, PLLC, Frisco, TX, C. Alan Carrillo, Brown Fox PLLC, Dallas, TX, for Defendant Pinehurst Partners I, LLC.

Daniel Brandstadt, Big Timber, MT, Pro Se.

REPORT AND RECOMMENDATION OF THE UNITED STATES MAGISTRATE JUDGE

K. NICOLE MITCHELL, UNITED STATES MAGISTRATE JUDGE

1 Before the Court is Plaintiff/Counter-Defendant 7X Cattle Company, LLC's motion to dismiss Defendant/Counter-Plaintiff Daniel Brandstadt's counterclaims (Doc. 109). Defendant/Counter-Plaintiff Brandstadt has filed a response (Doc. 133) and a sur-reply (Doc. 140). 7X has filed a reply (Doc. 136). Having considered the parties' pleadings and the relevant law, the Court RECOMMENDS 7X's motion to dismiss (Doc. 109) be GRANTED in part and DENIED in part.

BACKGROUND

Brandstadt is 7X Cattle Company's former employee.[1] 7X alleges that during Brandstadt's last year of employment, co-defendant Pinehurst Partners paid Brandstadt to concurrently manage Pinehurst's ranch.[2] 7X states that this caused Brandstadt to neglect his job duties at 7X and that 7X's ranch operations materially suffered as a result.[3] Pinehurst allegedly paid Brandstadt through Brandstadt's LLC, 3C Farms.[4]

7X brings claims against Brandstadt, Pinehurst, and 3C Farms for breach of fiduciary

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

duty, knowing participation in the breach of fiduciary duty, conversion, violations of the Texas Theft Liability Act, and interference with contract and employment relations.[5] Brandstadt (proceeding pro se) brings various counterclaims against 7X, which 7X now moves to dismiss.[6]

STANDARD OF REVIEW

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a)(2) requires that a pleading stating a claim for relief, which includes a counterclaim, contain "a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief." A party's counterclaims must set forth plausible, not merely possible, claims. Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 570 (2007). "A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678 (2009) (citing Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556). "Threadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements, do not suffice." Id.

Under Rule 12(b)(6), a party can move for the dismissal of asserted claims for "failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted." In considering a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss, "[t]he court accepts all well-pleaded facts as true, viewing them in the light most favorable to the plaintiff." In re Katrina Canal Breaches Litig., 495 F.3d 191, 205 (5th Cir. 2007) (citation omitted). But the court will "not look beyond the face of the pleadings to determine whether relief should be granted based on the alleged facts." Spivey v. Robertson, 197 F.3d 772, 774 (5th Cir. 1999).

2 Courts must construe the pleadings of pro se litigants liberally. Andrade v. Gonzales, 459 F.3d 538, 543 (5th Cir. 2006). However, "such a liberal construction does not require that the Court or a defendant create causes of action where there are none." Smith v. CVS Caremark Corp., 2013 WL 2291886, at *8 (N.D. Tex. May 23, 2013). Even with pro se litigants, "conclusory allegations or legal conclusions masquerading as factual conclusions will not suffice to prevent a motion to dismiss." Taylor v. Books A Million, Inc., 296 F.3d 376, 378 (5th Cir. 2002) (quoting S. Christian Leadership Conference v. Supreme Court of State of La., 252 F.3d 781, 786 (5th Cir. 2001)).

DISCUSSION

Brandstadt brings counterclaims against 7X that are labeled as follows: (1) defamation of character; (2) tortious interference; (3) hostile work environment/wrongful termination; and (4) emotional distress.[7] Texas law governs here. Wisznia Co. v. Gen. Star Indem. Co., 759 F.3d 446, 448 (5th Cir. 2014) ("A federal court sitting in diversity applies the substantive law of the forum state ....")

I. Defamation

To establish a prima facie case of defamation under Texas law, a plaintiff must demonstrate the following: "(1) the defendant published a false statement; (2) that defamed the plaintiff; (3) with the requisite degree of fault regarding the truth of the statement (negligence if the plaintiff is a private individual); and (4) damages." Bedford v. Spassoff, 520 S.W.3d 901, 904 (Tex. 2017) (citations omitted); see also Fiber Sys. Int'l, Inc. v. Roehrs, 470 F.3d 1150, 1161 (5th Cir. 2006) (stating that defamation is "a false statement about a person, published to a third party, without legal excuse, which damages the person's reputation" under Texas law). "[S]tatements that are not verifiable as false cannot form the basis of a defamation claim." Dallas Morning News, Inc. v. Tatum, 554 S.W.3d 614, 639 (Tex. 2018) (citation omitted). In addition, even if false, a statement is not actionable if "the entire context in which it was made discloses that it is merely an opinion masquerading as fact." Id. (citation omitted).

"While a claim for defamation is not subject to the heightened pleading requirements of Rule 9(b), the pleadings for a defamation claim must be sufficiently detailed to the extent necessary to enable the defendant to respond." Encompass Off. Sols., Inc. v. Ingenix, Inc., 775 F. Supp. 2d 938, 958 (E.D. Tex. 2011). Specifically, "[t]o recover on such a claim, the plaintiff must identify the alleged defamatory statement and the speaker." Ameen v. Merck & Co., 226 F. App'x 363, 370 (5th Cir. 2007). Additionally, "[a] plaintiff generally must specify when and where the statement was published. Otherwise, the claim may be too vague to give adequate notice to the defendant of the claim he must contest." Mandawala v. Ne. Baptist Hosp., 16 F.4th 1144, 1153 (5th Cir. 2021). Texas defamation claims are subject to a one-year statute of limitations. Ameen, 226 F. App'x at 370.

Brandstadt generally alleges that 7X made knowingly false statements that "impugn[ed] Defendant Brandstadt's honesty, integrity and professional abilities."[8] Brandstadt also states that "7X achieved such defamation of character through Gilbert Pepin, Fred Bennett, their private investigator John McSwain, and others seeking to find information other than the truth that they had already have [sic] been informed of and knew in great detail."[9]

3 7X argues that Brandstadt's defamation claim as written is too vague to give adequate notice to 7X of the claim it must contest. The Court agrees. Brandstadt does not quote or paraphrase any particular statement. He does not delineate which speaker made any particular statement. Additionally, as noted by the Fifth Circuit, a plaintiff generally must specify when and where the alleged defamatory statement was published to give adequate notice to the defendant of the claim he must contest; Brandstadt has not done so here. See Mandawala, 16 F.4th at 1153 (5th Cir. 2021).

Construing the complaint liberally, Brandstadt has not pleaded factual allegations that raise the right to relief above the speculative level. See Stukes v. Nehls, 614 F. App'x 792, 794 (5th Cir. 2015) (affirming dismissal of defamation claim that "fail[ed] to identify any specific defamatory statements" and "fail[ed] to squarely identify the speaker of the alleged defamatory statement").

Brandstadt's Response raises new factual allegations regarding a YouTube video that are not pleaded in his second amended counterclaims.[10] Generally, claims and allegations that are not raised in the complaint, but raised for the first time in a response to a motion to dismiss are not properly before the court. Middaugh v. InterBank, 528 F. Supp. 3d 509, 535 (N.D. Tex. 2021). However, the Fifth Circuit has held that where a plaintiff raises new claims in opposition to a dispositive motion, courts may construe the opposition as a motion for leave to amend the complaint to assert the new claims. Cash v. Jefferson Assocs., Inc., 978 F.2d 217, 218 (5th Cir. 1992) (deciding that a response to a motion to dismiss in which plaintiff first alleged that she had been willfully discriminated against should be treated as a motion to amend).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

The Court will not construe Brandstadt's response as a motion for leave to amend at this juncture. The deadline to amend pleadings without leave of Court in this case passed on March 29, 2024.[11] The Report and Recommendation issued on June 13, 2024, clearly stated that to the extent Brandstadt wishes to add allegations regarding a YouTube video to his Second Amended Counterclaims, he should file a motion seeking leave of court to do so.[12] Brandstadt has not filed such a motion.

II. Tortious Interference

Brandstadt's second counterclaim alleges that 7X tortiously interfered with "business relationships and expectancies."[13]

To state a claim for tortious interference with prospective business relations, Brandstadt must allege:

> (1) there was a reasonable probability that the plaintiff would have entered into a business relationship with a third party; (2) the defendant either acted with a conscious desire to prevent the relationship from occurring or knew the interference was certain or substantially certain to occur as a result of the conduct; (3) the defendant's conduct was independently tortious or unlawful; (4) the interference proximately caused the plaintiff injury; and (5) the plaintiff suffered actual damage or loss as a result.

Coinmach Corp. v. Aspenwood Apartment Corp., 417 S.W.3d 909, 923 (Tex. 2013).

To the extent that Brandstadt instead intends to bring a claim for tortious interference with existing contractual relationships, that claim would require: (1) an existing contract subject to interference; (2) a willful and intentional act of interference with the contract; (3) that proximately caused the plaintiff's injury; and (4) caused actual damages or loss. Prudential Ins. Co. of Am. v. Fin. Review Servs., Inc., 29 S.W.3d 74, 77 (Tex. 2000).

4 7X argues that Brandstadt's interference claim should be dismissed because he has not pleaded facts to support any of the required elements for either claim.[14] Under the paragraph labeled "Tortious Interference," Brandstadt states that his "purpose and concern outside of supporting his family was providing a place for underprivileged youth to experience a wholesome and healthy lifestyle" and that "7X actively, viciously, and hatefully attacked and destroyed this positive environment and place for underprivileged youth."[15] Specifically, Brandstadt states that 7X "made obscene and hateful gestures and statements directed to the youth of color" and that 7X prevented Brandstadt from accessing "the property that [he] lived, worked and recreated on."[16]

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Any claim that Brandstadt brings for tortious interference with existing and prospective business relationships should be dismissed because Brandstadt does not allege the existence of a specific contractual relationship that ended due to 7X's interference or a prospective business relationship that failed to develop due to 7X's interference. See Priority Design & Serv., Inc. v. Plaza, No. SA-19-CV-00058, 2019 WL 2124677, at *4 (W.D. Tex. May 15, 2019) (dismissing tortious interference claims because Plaintiff did not identify any prospective contracts or existing business relationships with third parties that had been jeopardized by Defendant's actions). Brandstadt does not allege that any contractual relationship existed between himself and the "underprivileged youth," nor does not allege that there was a reasonable probability he would have entered into a contractual relationship with said youth.

As 7X points out in its motion to dismiss, to the extent Brandstadt is alleging that 7X interfered with its own employment relationship with Brandstadt or with 7X's own lease for the property Brandstadt was living on, this claim fails as a matter of law because "a party cannot tortiously interfere with its own contract." Holloway v. Skinner, 898 S.W.2d 793, 796 (Tex. 1995). Brandstadt's tortious interference claims should be dismissed.

III. Hostile Work Environment/Wrongful Termination

Brandstadt's third counterclaim is labeled "Hostile Work Environment, Wrongful Termination."[17] Under this heading, Brandstadt alleges that "[7X] forced [Brandstadt] to quit by using undue pressure and lack of good cause to improperly motivate [Brandstadt] to resign."[18] Brandstadt's general assertion is that he was forced to resign so that 7X would have a "straw man" to blame their failures on.[19]

Under Texas law, the employment-at-will doctrine governs unless there is an employment contract to the contrary. County of Dallas v. Wiland, 216 S.W.3d 344, 347 (Tex. 2007). Under the employment-at-will doctrine, "employment may be terminated by the employer or the employee at will, for good cause, bad cause, or no cause at all." Montgomery Cnty. Hosp. Dist. v. Brown, 965 S.W.2d 501, 502 (Tex. 1998). The Texas Legislature has carved out several exceptions to the employment-at-will doctrine. Winters v. Houston Chron. Pub. Co., 795 S.W.2d 723, 724 (Tex. 1990) (listing statutory limitations to the doctrine). In the same vein, the Supreme Court of Texas has created limited judicial exceptions to the employment-at-will doctrine. For example, an employee may sue for damages if he was discharged solely for refusing to perform an illegal act. Sabine Pilot

Serv., Inc. v. Hauck, 687 S.W.2d 733, 735 (Tex. 1985).

Brandstadt does not allege that he had any employment contract with 7X. He does not plead any recognized exception to the employment-at-will doctrine or cite to any specific statute that his claim arises under. His claim labeled "Hostile Work Environment, Wrongful Termination" should be dismissed.

5 To the extent that Brandstadt's use of the term "hostile work environment" is an attempt to invoke the protections of Title VII or the Texas Commission on Human Rights Act ("TCHRA"), these statutes apply to discrimination based on a protected characteristic.[20] Brandstadt has not pleaded that he is a member of a protected class, and any claim arising under those statutes should be dismissed. It is also possible that, in using the term "hostile work environment," Brandstadt is attempting to bring a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. This claim will be discussed further below.

IV. Emotional Distress

The final paragraph of Brandstadt's complaint is labeled "Emotional distress."[21] Brandstadt alleges that 7X caused him "unbearable emotional distress by their extreme and outrageous misconduct in the workplace, forcing wrongful termination and by their continuous attacks and false accusations against Brandstadt after his resignation."[22] Given Brandstadt's pro se status, the Court will construe this paragraph as a counterclaim for intentional infliction of emotional distress ("IIED").

Under Texas Law, the elements of IIED are: (1) the defendant acted intentionally or recklessly; (2) the defendant's conduct was extreme or outrageous; (3) the defendant's actions caused the plaintiff emotional distress; and (4) the plaintiff's emotional distress was severe. Kroger Tex. Ltd. P'ship v. Suberu, 216 S.W.3d 788, 796 (Tex. 2006). To be actionable, the alleged conduct must be "so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious, and utterly intolerable in a civilized community." Id. "Meritorious claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress are relatively rare precisely because most human conduct, even that which causes injury to others, cannot be fairly characterized as extreme and outrageous." Id.

An employer can be held liable for its employee's intentional infliction of emotional distress in certain circumstances. See GTE Southwest, Inc. v. Bruce, 998 S.W.2d 605, 613 (Tex. 1999). The Texas Supreme Court has "declined to recognize intentional infliction of emotional distress claims for 'ordinary employment disputes,' emphasizing that extreme conduct in this context 'exists only in the most unusual of circumstances.' " Texas Farm Bureau Mut. Ins. Companies v. Sears, 84 S.W.3d 604, 611 (Tex. 2002) (compiling cases). Under Texas law, an action for intentional infliction of emotional distress lies only when the conduct "brings the dispute outside the scope of an ordinary employment dispute and into the realm of extreme and outrageous conduct." Bruce, 998 S.W.2d at 613 (citation omitted).

7X moves for dismissal of Brandstadt's IIED claim on two grounds: 1) because his allegations are conclusory; and 2) because he does not adequately plead that his utilities being cut off caused him emotional distress. [23]

As to 7X's first ground for dismissal, the Court does not find that Brandstadt's allegations are too conclusory to support a claim for IIED. [24] Brandstadt describes Pepin, his 7X supervisor, as "having angry fits, throwing things, cussing, demeaning employees, [and] in essence treating them as trash." [25] Brandstadt also alleges that Pepin "[cut] off Brandstadt's utilities to the house where he and his family resided with their animals, attempting to euthanize or run Brandstadt away." [26] A jury could plausibly find this conduct demonstrates the "extreme and outrageous" standard required for an IIED claim. See Bruce, 998 S.W.2d at 617 (holding that acts amounting to a course of conduct of "harassment, intimidation, and humiliation" plus "daily obscene and vulgar behavior" meet the standard).

6 Severe emotional distress does not include mere worry, anxiety, vexation, embarrassment or anger. Regan v. Lee, 879 S.W.2d 133, 136 (Tex. App. 1994). But here, Brandstadt alleges more than "worry." He claims that these actions caused him "agony," "extreme mental anguish," and "physical manifestations and illness." [27] Brandstadt pleads enough facts to survive 7X's motion to dismiss, especially given his pro se status.

7X next argues that Brandstadt's IIED claim should be dismissed because Brandstadt does not adequately allege that Pepin cutting his utilities off is what caused his emotional distress. [28] 7X points to a portion of Brandstadt's complaint in which he states that his emotional distress was caused by 7X's "lies and greed," and 7X seems to argue that Pepin's conduct does not fall under the category of "lies and greed." [29] Reading the complaint as a whole and construing it liberally, Brandstadt has adequately pleaded that Pepin's behavior proximately caused his emotional distress. It is not the case that Brandstadt only alleges 7X caused him emotional distress through "lies and greed." Brandstadt also states that 7X "caused [him] unbearable emotional distress by their extreme and outrageous misconduct in the workplace." [30] And, as stated above, he describes that alleged workplace misconduct in detail. [31]

At this preliminary stage, Brandstadt has successfully pleaded that Pepin acted intentionally or recklessly; his conduct was extreme or outrageous; his actions caused Brandstadt emotional distress; and Brandstadt's emotional distress was severe. Brandstadt has stated a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and 7X's motion to dismiss is denied as to this counterclaim.

V. Request for Attorney's Fees

7X moves to strike Brandstadt's request for attorney's fees because he is proceeding pro se and because he has not alleged the existence of any contract that permits fee shifting or asserted a claim under a statute authorizing fee shifting. [32] Texas law allows a party to recover attorney's fees when a statute or contract provides. In re Velazquez, 660 F.3d 893, 895–96 (5th Cir. 2011); Tony Gullo Motors I, L.P. v. Chapa, 212 S.W.3d 299, 311 (Tex. 2006). "Generally, attorney's fees are not recoverable in an action for tort." Von Beck-Lutes v. Arning, 484 F. Supp. 2d 585, 588 (W.D. Tex. 2007) (citing New Amsterdam Cas. Co. v. Texas Indus., 414 S.W.2d 914, 915 (Tex. 1967)). Brandstadt's surviving IIED claim sounds in tort. Brandstadt has not cited to a statute that would permit recovery of attorney's fees as an element of damages for this claim. See Von Beck-Lutes v. Arning, 484 F. Supp. 2d 585, 588 (W.D. Tex. 2007) (dismissing cause of action for attorney's fees because Plaintiff's causes of action all sounded in tort). Brandstadt's request for attorney's fees should be stricken.

CONCLUSION

Based on the foregoing, the Court RECOMMENDS that 7X's Motion to Dismiss (Doc. 109) be GRANTED in part and DENIED in part. Brandstadt's claims for defamation, tortious interference, hostile work environment, and wrongful termination should be dismissed with prejudice. Brandstadt's response and sur-reply give no indication that he could fix the pleading deficiencies present in his second amended counterclaims if permitted to file third amended counterclaims. The Court notified Brandstadt in its June 13, 2024, Report and Recommendation that, to the extent he wished to amend his pleadings to add allegations regarding a YouTube video, he needed to file a motion seeking leave of Court to do so.[33] Brandstadt has not requested leave to amend his counterclaims.

7 The Court also recommends that Brandstadt's request for attorneys' fees be stricken.

Within fourteen (14) days after service of the magistrate judge's report, any party must serve and file specific written objections to the findings and recommendations of the magistrate judge. 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1)(C). In order to be specific, an objection must identify the specific finding or recommendation to which objection is made, state the basis for the objection, and specify the place in the magistrate judge's report and recommendation where the disputed determination is found. An objection that merely incorporates by reference or refers to the briefing before the magistrate judge is not specific.

Failure to file specific, written objections will bar the party from appealing the unobjected-to factual findings and legal conclusions of the magistrate judge that are accepted by the district court, except upon grounds of plain error, provided that the party has been served with notice that such consequences will result from a failure to object. See Douglass v. United Servs. Auto. Ass'n, 79 F.3d 1415, 1417 (5th Cir. 1996) (en banc), superseded by statute on other grounds, 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1) (extending the time to file objections from ten to fourteen days).

So ORDERED and SIGNED this 22nd day of July, 2024.

All Citations

Slip Copy, 2024 WL 4183301

Footnotes

1 Doc. 87 at ¶ 1.

2 Doc. 87 at ¶ 1.

3 Doc. 87 at ¶ 1.

4 Doc. 87 at ¶ 1.

5 Doc. 87 at ¶ 2.

6 This is not the first iteration of Brandstadt's counterclaims. On February 21, 2021, the Court dismissed Brandstadt's original counterclaims and granted him leave to amend. Doc. 84. Brandstadt filed his amended counterclaims on March 14, 2024. Doc. 85. 7X moved to dismiss Brandstadt's amended counterclaims. Doc. 89. Before the Court could rule on this motion to dismiss, 7X filed its Second Amended Complaint. Doc. 87. On April 19, 2024, Brandstadt filed his answer to 7X's Second Amended Complaint along with the counterclaims that are currently before the Court. Doc. 101.

7 Doc. 101.

8 Doc. 101 at ¶ 1.

9 Doc. 101 at ¶ 1.

10 Doc. 133 at 1.

11 Doc. 71.

12 Doc. 127 at 5.

13 Doc. 101 at ¶ 2 (errors in original).

14 Doc. 109 at 6.

15 Doc. 101 at ¶ 2.

16 Doc. 101 at ¶ 2.

17 Doc. 101 at ¶ 3.

18 Doc. 101 at ¶ 3.

19 Doc. 101 at ¶ 3.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

20 Pursuant to Title VII, an employer may not discriminate against its employees or potential employees because of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin. 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2. Likewise, under the TCHRA, an employer "commits an unlawful employment practice if, because of race, color, disability, religion, sex, national origin, or age, the employer discharges an individual, or discriminates in any other manner against an individual in connection with compensation or the terms, conditions, or privileges of employment." TEX. LAB. CODE ANN. § 21.051(1).

21 Doc. 101 at ¶ 4.

22 Doc. 101 at ¶ 4.

23 Doc. 101 at 9–10.

24 Doc. 101 at 9.

25 Doc. 101 at ¶ 3.

26 Doc. 101 at ¶ 4.

27 Doc. 101 at ¶ 4.

28 Doc. 109 at 9.

29 Doc. 109 at 9.

30 Doc. 101 at ¶ 4.

31 Doc. 101 at ¶ 4.

32 Doc. 109 at 10.

33 Doc. 127 at 5 (noting that the deadline to amend pleadings without leave of court expired on March 29, 2024).

End of Document

© 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

CASE NO. 14

2024 WL 3950677
Only the Westlaw citation
is currently available.
United States District Court,
E.D. Texas, Tyler Division.

7X CATTLE CO. LLC, Plaintiff,
v.
Daniel BRANDSTADT, et al., Defendants.

Case No

. 6:22-cv-396-JDK-KNM

|

Signed August 26, 2024

|

Filed August 27, 2024

Attorneys and Law Firms

Jonathon P. Reinisch, Thomas P. Cimino Jr., Vedder Price P.C., Chicago, IL, Samuel M. Deau, Arianna G. Goodman, Vedder Price P.C., Dallas, TX, for Plaintiff.

Eric Charles Wood, Brown Fox, PLLC, Frisco, TX, C. Alan Carrillo, Brown Fox PLLC, Dallas, TX, for Defendant Pinehurst Partners I, LLC.

Daniel Brandstadt, Big Timber, MT, Pro Se.

ORDER ADOPTING THE REPORT AND RECOMMENDATION OF THE UNITED STATES MAGISTRATE JUDGE

JEREMY D. KERNODLE, UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE

1 This case was referred to United States Magistrate Judge K. Nicole Mitchell for findings of fact, conclusions of law, and recommendations for disposition pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 636. Before the Court is Plaintiff 7X Cattle Company's motion to dismiss Defendant Daniel Brandstadt's counterclaims with prejudice. Docket No. 109. On July 22, 2024, the Magistrate Judge issued a Report recommending that the Court grant in part and deny in part Plaintiff's motion. Docket No. 142. Plaintiff timely filed objections. Docket No. 143. Defendant did not file objections.

Where a party timely objects to a Report and Recommendation, the Court reviews the objected-to findings and conclusions of the Magistrate Judge de novo. 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1). In conducting a de novo review, the Court examines the entire record and makes an independent assessment under the law. Douglass v. United Servs. Auto. Ass'n, 79 F.3d 1415, 1430 (5th Cir. 1996) (en banc), superseded on other grounds by statute, 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1) (extending the time to file objections from ten to fourteen days).

Brandstadt brought the following counterclaims against Plaintiff 7X: (1) defamation of character; (2) tortious interference; (3) hostile work environment/ wrongful termination; and (4) emotional distress. Docket No. 101. The Magistrate Judge recommended dismissing all the counterclaims except the claim for "emotional distress," which the Magistrate Judge construed as a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress ("IIED"). Docket No. 142 at 12. The Magistrate Judge found that Brandstadt sufficiently pleaded that claim under Rule 12(b)

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

(6). Id. at 9–12. Plaintiff 7X objects only to the recommendation to allow the IIED claim. Docket No. 143 at 2.

In Texas, the elements of an IIED claim are: (1) the defendant acted intentionally or recklessly; (2) the defendant's conduct was extreme or outrageous; (3) the defendant's actions caused the plaintiff emotional distress; and (4) the plaintiff's emotional distress was severe. Kroger Tex. Ltd. P'ship v. Suberu, 216 S.W.3d 788, 796 (Tex. 2006). 7X first objects to the Magistrate Judge's finding that Brandstadt's allegations regarding the conduct of his supervisor, Gilbert Pepin, satisfy the "extreme and outrageous" conduct element of an IIED claim. Docket No. 143 at 4. Brandstadt described Pepin as "having angry fits, throwing things, cussing, demeaning employees, [and] in essence treating them as trash." Docket No. 101 ¶ 3. Brandstadt also alleged that Pepin "[cut] off Brandstadt's utilities to the house where he and his family resided with their animals, attempting to euthanize or run Brandstadt away." Id. ¶ 4. 7X argues that the Magistrate Judge improperly considered these allegations because they were included in a paragraph labeled "hostile work environment, wrongful termination," rather than the paragraph labeled "emotional distress." Docket No. 143 at 5.

But Brandstadt is representing himself pro se, and courts generally do not hold pro se litigants to procedural strictures that penalize them "for lacking the linguistic and analytical skills of a trained lawyer." Perez v. United States, 312 F.3d 191, 194 (5th Cir. 2002). "[A] pro se complaint, however inartfully pleaded, must be held to less stringent standards than formal pleadings drafted by lawyers." Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 106 (1976). The Court has a "duty to construe pro se [filings] liberally so that a litigant will not suffer simply because he did not attend law school or find a suitable attorney." United States v. Ayika, 554 F. App'x 302, 308 (5th Cir. 2014) (per curiam). Here, Brandstadt referenced "outrageous misconduct in the workplace" in the paragraph titled "emotional distress." Docket No. 101 ¶ 4. Given that Brandstadt is held to a "less stringent" standard as a pro se litigant, the Magistrate Judge did not err in considering his factual allegations regarding Pepin's workplace conduct.

2 7X next argues that Brandstadt's allegations amount to a mere employment dispute. Docket No. 143 at 4–8. As the Magistrate Judge acknowledged in her Report, the Texas Supreme Court has declined to recognize intentional infliction of emotional distress claims for "ordinary employment disputes." Tex. Farm Bureau Mut. Ins. Cos. v. Sears, 84 S.W.3d 604, 611 (Tex. 2002) (compiling cases). For example, in Hoffmann-LaRoche Inc. v. Zeltwanger, 144 S.W.3d 438, (Tex. 2004), the court held that evidence of insensitive jokes, unfair performance reviews, and failure to report an employee's sexual harassment concerns did not amount to "extreme and outrageous conduct." But in GTE Southwest, Inc. v. Bruce, 998 S.W.2d 605, 613–14 (Tex. 1999), the court held that the defendant's conduct was extreme and outrageous and was outside the scope of an ordinary employment dispute when he, over a period of two years, "engaged in a pattern of grossly abusive, threatening, and degrading conduct," including "repeatedly physically and verbally threaten[ing] and terroriz[ing]" employees. Here, although the Court recognizes the high burden set forth in Bruce and its progeny, Brandstadt's allegations —particularly his allegations that Pepin cut off the utilities to his home—"bring[ ] the dispute outside the scope of an ordinary employment dispute and into the realm of extreme and outrageous conduct." Id. at 613.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

7X next argues that Brandstadt's allegation that "Pepin cut[ ] off Brandstadt's utilities to the house where he and his family resided with their animals, attempting to euthanize or run Brandstadt away" is both conclusory and plainly implausible. Docket No. 143 at 4. Courts may dismiss an action that fails to "state a claim for relief that is plausible on its face." Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 570 (2007). But the standard articulated under Twombly "simply calls for enough fact to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of' the necessary claims or elements." In re S. Scrap Material Co., LLC, 541 F.3d 584, 587 (5th Cir. 2008) (citing Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 545 (2007)). And a well-pleaded claim "may proceed even if it strikes a savvy judge that actual proof of [the alleged] facts is improbable." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556. While Brandstadt may not ultimately prevail on his claim, he has alleged sufficient facts to nudge his claim "across the line from conceivable to plausible," especially considering the lighter burden placed on pro se pleadings. Twombly, 550 U.S. at 547; see also Haines v. Kerner, 404 U.S. 519, 520 (1972).

Finally, 7X objects to the Magistrate Judge's finding that Brandstadt sufficiently alleged he experienced severe emotional distress. Docket No. 143 at 8. 7X is correct that Brandstadt must allege facts beyond the conclusory statement that it caused him "severe emotional distress." See Vera v. Mulet, 2005 WL 8164063, at *10 (S.D. Tex. May 11, 2005) ("Given the high standard for 'severe' distress under Texas law, the pleading must do more than recite the term, without supporting factual allegations, to state a claim."); Yadav v. Frost Bank, 2020 WL 2733955, at *4 (W.D. Tex. May 26, 2020) (holding that allegations that "plaintiff has severely suffered for more than one year and will be suffering for the rest of his life" and that defendant caused plaintiff "extreme emotional distress" were insufficient to state a claim under Rule 12(b)(6)). But here, Brandstadt has pleaded facts to support his claim that he suffered from severe emotional distress by alleging that 7X caused him agony, extreme mental anguish, and physical manifestations and illness. See Howe v. Yellowbook, USA, 840 F. Supp. 2d 970, 982 (N.D. Tex. 2011) (denying motion to dismiss IIED claim because the plaintiff pleaded sufficient facts to support her allegation that she was "mentally, emotionally, and physically damaged and distraught" by the defendant's actions).

Having conducted a de novo review of the record in this case and the Magistrate Judge's Report, the Court has determined that the Report of the Magistrate Judge is correct and that Plaintiff's objections are without merit. Accordingly, the Court hereby ADOPTS the Report of the Magistrate Judge (Docket No. 142) as the findings of the District Court. 7X's Motion to Dismiss Brandstadt's counterclaims is GRANTED in part and DENIED in part. Specifically, 7X's motion to dismiss is GRANTED as to Brandstadt's counterclaims for defamation, tortious interference, and hostile work environment/wrongful termination. These counterclaims are DISMISSED with prejudice and Brandstadt's request for attorneys' fees is STRICKEN. 7X's motion to dismiss is DENIED as to Brandstadt's counterclaim for intentional infliction of emotional distress.

3 So ORDERED and SIGNED this 26th day of August, 2024.

All Citations

Slip Copy, 2024 WL 3950677

End of Document

© 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

CASE NO. 15

2019 WL 13191641
Only the Westlaw citation
is currently available.
United States District Court,
S.D. Texas, Houston Division.

WESTERN RESERVE MEDTEC SERVICES, LLC, Plaintiff,
v.
STRYKER CORPORATIOn, Defendant.

Civil Action
No.
4
:
18
-
CV
-
2604

|

Signed 05/13/2019

Attorneys and Law Firms

Colin Sayer Sherrod, Jett Williams, III, Henke, Williams & Boll, LLP, Houston, TX, for Plaintiff.

Jesse Coleman, Emma Canales Mata, Seyfarth Shaw LLP, Houston, TX, Michael D. Wexler, Seyfarth Shaw LLP, Chicago, IL, for Defendant.

MEMORANDUM AND ORDER

Christina A. Bryan, United States Magistrate Judge

1 Western Reserve MedTec Services, LLC (WRMS) has sued Stryker Corporation for tortious interference with an existing contract, tortious interference with prospective business relations, and unfair competition. Stryker filed an initial motion to dismiss WRMS's claims under Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6). Dkt. 3. The court denied Stryker's motion without prejudice and ordered WRMS to replead. WRMS filed an amended complaint. Dkt. 19. Now before the court is Stryker's Renewed Motion to Dismiss for Failure to State a Claim. Dkt. 20. Having considered the parties' submissions and the law, the court denies the motion for the reasons set forth below.

I. Background

WRMS's Amended Complaint alleges the following facts which, for purposes of the motion, the court presumes are true:

Stryker is a manufacturer of medical equipment. WRMS was a supplier of medical equipment to hospitals throughout the United States, including Memorial Hermann Medical Center Memorial City (MHMC). WRMS was both a customer of Stryker (because WRMS distributed Stryker products) and a competitor of Stryker (because Stryker also supplied its products to entities such as MHMC directly).

WRMS alleges that on multiple occasions, Stryker worked to undermine WRMS and caused hospitals to terminate contracts with

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

WRMS. In 2012, a Stryker Regional Manager authorized delivery of an email to MHMC that contained disparaging, false, and misleading information about WRMS. Also in 2012, a Stryker employee boasted that he was starting a Facebook group called "Bad Gear from WRMS" and would invite a MHMC decision-maker to join the group.

WRMS also alleges that Stryker's embedded employees at MHMC undermined WRMS by ignoring equipment replacement or repair requests and then contacting MHMC directly so that Stryker could supply or service the equipment. Stryker employees, who were chummy with MHMC supply chain executives, initiated rumors about Stryker taking over WRMS and disseminated misinformation about WRMS's business and reputation.

In late October 2013, WRMS entered a contract with MHMC to supply and service equipment for the period November 1, 2013 through December 1, 2018 (the Agreement). Stryker employees started a rumor that Stryker's takeover of WRMS's service contract was imminent, and misinformed MHMC supply chain executives in a 2104 meeting about WRMS business and reputation. In this way, Stryker started a smear campaign against MRMS.

In September 2014, less than a year after entering into the Agreement, MHMC notified all vendors that it would be centralizing the hospital's supply chain management and terminating all existing contracts. MHMC also told WRMS it would initiate a new bidding process for the award of a centralized contract. In November 2014, MHMC accepted bids only from WRMS and Stryker. Meanwhile, while MHMC was evaluating the bids, WRMS continued to perform under the existing contract.

On January 1, 2016, MHMC notified WRMS that the Agreement would be terminated effective June 30, 2016. Yet, MHMC entered a month-to-month contract with WRMS from June 30, 2016 through September 2016. October 2016 was the first month in which MHMC did not perform or receive payment, either under the original Agreement or a month-to-month contract. Also in October 2016, MHMC notified WRMS that it awarded Stryker the new centralized vendor contract for which both companies had submitted bids.

2 Prior to October 2016, WRMS believed its business relationship with MHMC would continue. WRMS suffered damages as a result of Stryker's interference that resulted in MHMC's discontinuing the month-to-month or longer-term Agreement with WRMS and entering into a new contract with Stryker to supply and service medical equipment. Ultimately, and as a result of Stryker's unfair competition and interference with WRMS's existing Agreement with MHMC and its prospective business relationship with MHMC, WRMS went out of business.

WRMS filed this suit against Stryker on June 29, 2018. WRMS's First Amended Original Complaint asserts causes of action against Stryker for tortious interference with existing contracts, tortious interference with prospective business relations, and unfair competition.

II. Rule 12(b)(6) Standards

To survive a motion to dismiss under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6), the plaintiff must plead "enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 570 (2007). "A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the conduct alleged." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678 (2009); Gonzalez v. Kay, 577 F.3d 600, 603 (5th Cir. 2009). In reviewing a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6), this Court accepts all well-pleaded facts as true, viewing them in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. Alexander v. AmeriPro Funding, Inc., 848 F.3d 698, 701 (5th Cir. 2017) (citing Martin K. Eby Constr. Co. v. Dallas Area Rapid Transit, 369 F.3d 464, 467 (5th Cir. 2004)). However, the court does not apply the same presumption to conclusory statements or legal conclusions. Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678-79.

Generally, the court may consider only the allegations in the complaint and any attachments thereto in ruling on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion. However, the court may take judicial notice of public documents, and may also consider documents a defendant attaches to its motion to dismiss under 12(b)(6) if the documents are referenced in the plaintiff's complaint and central to the plaintiff's claims. [1] See Collins v. Morgan Stanley Dean Witter, 224 F.3d 496, 499 (5th Cir. 2000); King v. Life Sch., 809 F. Supp. 2d 572, 579 n.1 (N.D. Tex. 2011).

"Although dismissal under Rule 12(b)(6) is ordinarily determined by whether the facts alleged in the complaint, if true, give rise to a cause of action, a claim may also be dismissed if a successful affirmative defense appears clearly on the face of the pleadings." Clark v. Amoco Prod. Co., 794 F.2d 967, 970 (5th Cir.1986) If the face of the pleadings demonstrate that a cause of action is time-barred, and the pleadings do not raise a basis for tolling, a motion to dismiss based on a statute of limitations defense may be granted. Taylor v. Bailey Tool & Mfg. Co., 744 F.3d 944, 946 (5th Cir. 2014) (citing Jones v. Alcoa, Inc., 339 F.3d 359, 366 (5th Cir. 2003)).

III. Analysis

Stryker asserts several bases for dismissal of WRMS's claims pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6): (1) that all of WRMS's claims are barred by the statutes of limitations (Dkt. 20 at 10-14); (2) that WRMS has failed to meet its burden to plead independently tortious conduct by Stryker (Dkt. 20 at 15-17); (3) and that WRMS has failed to plead the required element of proximate cause (Dkt. 20 at 18-20). In response, WRMS argues that each claim was timely filed or, alternatively, that equitable tolling doctrines apply to toll limitations [2] (Dkt. 21 at 13-19), and that it has adequately pleaded all of the elements of each cause of action, including independently tortious conduct and proximate cause (Dkt. 21 at 19-21). The court addresses each cause of action separately.

A. Tortious Interference with Existing Contract

1. Statute of Limitations

3 WRMS filed this action in state court on June 29, 2018. Texas law imposes a two-year statute of limitations on claims for tortious interference with an existing contract.[3] See TEX. CIV. PRAC. & REM. CODE ANN. § 16.003(a); First Nat'l Bank of Eagle Pass v. Levine, 721 S.W.2d 287, 289 (Tex. 1986); Burke v. Ins. Auto Auctions Corp., 169 S.W.3d 771, 776 (Tex. App. –Dallas, 2005, pet. denied). "The statute of limitations begins to run when the cause of action accrues." Burke, 169 S.W.3d at 776 (citing TEX. CIV. PRAC. & REM. CODE ANN. § 16.003(a)). "Causes of action accrue and statutes of limitations begin to run when facts come into existence that authorize a claimant to seek a judicial remedy." Exxon Corp. v. Emerald Oil & Gas, Co., L.C., 348 S.W.3d 194, 202 (Tex. 2011) (citations omitted). "When a cause of action accrues is normally a question of law." Id.

Stryker argues that the existing contractual relations claim accrued on January 1, 2016, when WRMS received notice that MHMC was "exercising its option to terminate the Agreement without cause by providing 180 days written notice." Dkt. 19-2. WRMS, on the other hand, argues the claim could not have accrued before the effective termination date of June 30, 2016.

As discussed below, the accrual date of WRMS's claim for tortious interference with existing contract is not evident from the face of the pleadings. Therefore, dismissal of the claim for interference with existing contract based on the statute of limitations is not appropriate at the motion to dismiss stage.

As one Texas court has stated:

> The first step in ascertaining when the statute of limitations begins to run in a tort action is to determine whether the act causing the damage constitutes a legal injury. If the act complained of constitutes a legal injury to a plaintiff, the wrong is completed and the cause of action accrues from the time the act is committed, even where little, if any, actual damage occurs immediately on commission of the tort. Conversely, if the act complained of does not, by itself, constitute a legal injury, the cause of action accrues when, and only when, the damages are sustained.

Burke, 169 S.W.3d at 776 (citations omitted). The Fifth Circuit has also recognized the need to determine whether the act complained of constitutes a legal injury when deciding when a cause of action accrues:

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

> The test to determine when the statute of limitations begins to run against an action sounding in tort is whether the act causing the damage does or does not of itself constitute a legal injury, that is, an injury giving rise to a cause of action because it is an invasion of some right of plaintiff. If the act is of itself not unlawful in this sense, ...the cause of action accrues, and the statute begins to run, when, and only when, the damages are sustained; and this is true although at the time the act is done it is apparent that injury will inevitably result.

Randolph v. Resolution Tr. Corp., 995 F.2d 611, 618 (5th Cir. 1993) (citing Atkins v. Crosland, 417 S.W.2d 150, 153 (Tex. 1967)).

In order to determine whether WRMS's existing contractual relations claim accrued when WRMS received the January 1, 2016 notice of termination, the court must examine whether the act (notice of termination) is a legal injury in and of itself. See, id.; Burke, 169 S.W.3d at 776. If it is not, the cause of action did not accrue until the facts establishing a legal injury or damages come into existence. See Burke, 169 S.W.3d at 777 (citing Waxler v. Household Credit Services, Inc., 106 S.W.3d 277, 281 (Tex. App.–Dallas 2003, no pet.) (negative credit reports were not, themselves, unlawful, so the legal injury and cause of action accrued only when plaintiff was denied credit and damages were sustained).

4 As Stryker points out in its argument regarding proximate cause, MHMC's January 1, 2016 notice of termination was not a breach of the contract. The contract allowed for termination without cause with 180 days' notice. Thus, at least on the face of the pleading, the January 1, 2016 termination notice was not a legal injury in and of itself. Because the notice was not a legal injury in and of itself, WRMS could not seek a judicial remedy in January 2016 absent actual damages or loss.

Stryker also argues that WRMS's claims are time-barred because the alleged acts of interference with contract occurred in 2012, more than two years before suit was filed. This argument fails first because WRMS has alleged that Stryker's interference continued through September 2016, and second because WRMS alleges it did not suffer damages from MHMC's termination of the contract until after September 2016. WRMS was not harmed until the contract was actually terminated. See Hill v. Heritage Res., Inc., 964 S.W.2d 89, 116 (Tex. App. – El Paso 1997, pet. denied) ("A cause of action for tortious interference with an existing contract does not accrue until the contract is interfered with and harm caused to the plaintiff. Atkins v. Crosland, 417 S.W.2d 150, 153 (Tex. 1967)" (emphasis added)); Miller v. Amer. Intern. Group, Inc., Civil Action No. 3:04-CV-1417, 2005 WL 1131110 at 7 (N.D. Tex. May 9, 2005).

Stryker cites Exxon Mobile Corp. v. Rincones, 520 S.W.3d 572, 591 (Tex. 2017), for the proposition that "a claim for tortious interference with a contract accrues at the time a contracting party knows the nature of the injury and the damages, regardless of whether the contract is terminated at that time." (emphasis added). Rincones is not controlling here because the facts in this case materially differ from the facts in Rincones. Rincones brought a tortious interference claim against a laboratory that reported an allegedly false positive drug test to his employer. On the date of the false report, Rincones was placed on "inactive" status, which prevented him from receiving any work from or being paid by his employer. Rincones, 520 S.W.3d at 578. Thus, as of the date he was placed on inactive status, Rincones was unable to work or be paid, even though his employment was not terminated until a later date. The Texas Supreme Court ruled that his interference claim accrued from the date he was notified of his inactive status, because he was immediately damaged at that point by not earning wages. Id. at 591. Here, WRMS continued to perform and receive payment under the existing contract until at least June 30, 2016. Dkt. 19 at ¶ 21. The face of the pleadings and contract show only that WRMS was notified of an imminent injury in January 2016, not that it suffered a legal injury at that time. See Randolph, 995 F.2d at 617 ("[E]ven an inevitable injury will not result in the accrual of a cause of action for limitations purposes in Texas.").

Dismissal under Rule 12(b)(6) is not appropriate unless the face of the pleadings and exhibits to the motion clearly establish that a claim is barred by limitations. On its face, the Amended Complaint does not demonstrate the existence of facts in January 2016 that would have authorized WRMS to seek a judicial remedy. WRMS could not seek a judicial remedy for tortious interference with the Agreement until it suffered actual damages or loss. See Prudential Ins. Co. of America, 29 S.W.3d 74, 77 (Tex. 2000) (actual damages or loss is an element of a claim for tortious interference with existing contract). WRMS alleges in the Amended Complaint that it continued to perform and be paid under the Agreement at least through the June 30, 2016 termination date. Dkt. 19 at ¶ 21. Despite the January 2016 notice of termination, WRMS did not know at that time if it would suffer damages from the termination, because it was still possible that the parties would renew or enter a new contract. Thus, the pleadings do not demonstrate the existence of an injury or damages prior to June 30, 2016. Therefore, the motion to dismiss the existing contractual relations claim as time-barred is denied.

2. Proximate Cause

5 Stryker also moves for dismissal of the existing contractual relations claim on the basis that WRMS has failed to allege and cannot demonstrate proximate cause. According to Stryker, WRMS has failed to allege that Stryker intentionally interfered, offered any inducement, or persuaded MHMC to breach its contract, and therefore has failed to plead the element of proximate cause. Stryker further argues that even if Stryker had actively induced MHMC to terminate the Agreement, WRMS cannot meet the proximate cause requirement because "merely inducing a contract obligor to do what it has a right to do is not actionable interference." ACS Invest., Inc. v. McLaughlin, 943 S.W.2d 426, 430 (Tex. 1997) (defendant merely negotiated with a party to do what the party had a right to do under its agreement with plaintiff).

With respect to the latter argument, "the terminable-on-notice or terminable-at-will status of a contract is not a defense to an action for tortious interference." Faucette v. Chantos, 322 S.W.3d 901, 914 (Tex. App. – Houston [14th Dist.] 2010, no pet.). As the court in Faucette explained, it is possible to tortiously interfere with a contract that is terminable on notice or at will:

> [A] third party is prohibited from tortiously interfering with a terminable-on-notice or terminable-at-will contract, but 'merely inducing one of the parties to exercise his right to terminate contractual relations after giving the required notice does not necessarily constitute tortious interference with contract under Texas law.'

Id. (emphasis in original).

Texas law allows claims for tortious interference with a terminable-on-notice contract, but to plead a plausible claim, WRMS must allege that Stryker did more than merely induce MHMC to exercise its right to terminate the Agreement. Stryker correctly argues that "[t]o establish proximate cause, a party must show that 'the defendant took an active part in persuading a party to a contract to breach it[,]' " and "[m]erely entering into a contract with a party with the knowledge of that party's contractual obligations to someone else is not the same as inducing a breach." Amigo Broad, LP v. Spanish Broad Sys., Inc., 521 F.3d 472, 493 (5th Cir. 2008) (citing Davis v. HydPro, Inc., 839 S.W.2d 137, 139 (Tex. App. – Eastland 1992, writ denied)); M-I LLC v. Stelly, 733 F. Supp. 2d 759, 775 (S.D. Tex. 2010).

The proximate cause element of a tortious interference claim requires "active participation." Lincoln Gen. Ins. v. U.S. Auto Ins. Servs., 787 F.3d 716, 731 (5th Cir. 2015). However, WRMS has described willful acts of interference by Stryker and alleges that MHMC would not have taken the actions it did absent Stryker's acts. For example, WRMS alleges that "[f]or years Stryker worked to undermine and disrupt WRMS's services in order to induce WRMS's business partners to terminate their respective agreements and/or relationships and to replace WRMS with Stryker.... Stryker has succeeded in usurping WRMS's contracts and business relationships in the past, and it succeeded again at [MHMC]." Dkt. 19 at ¶ 10. "Stryker's employees regularly communicated with each other to undermine WRMS and damage its business reputation in the community and with [MHMC]. Id. at ¶ 11. "[D]uring the term of the Agreement, Stryker delayed or ignored equipment maintenance or replacement requests from WRMS.... Consistently during the term of the Agreement, Stryker would act as [WRMS's] competitor in hopes of forcing WRMS into breaching the Agreement and convincing [MHMC] to terminate the Agreement and its business relationship with WRMS." Id. at ¶ 14. "Stryker employees initiated a rumor campaign that Stryker's takeover of WRMS's [Agreement] was imminent." Id. at ¶ 15.

Generally, proximate cause is a fact question. See Ryder Integrated Logistics, Inc. v. Fayette Cty., 453 S.W.3d 922, 929 (Tex. 2015) ("Because proximate cause is ultimately a question for a fact-finder, we need only determine whether the petition 'creates a fact question' regarding the causal relationship between [defendant's] conduct and the alleged injuries."); J.K. & Susie L. Wadley Research Inst. & Blood Bank v. Beeson, 835 S.W.2d 689, 698 (Tex. App. – Dallas 1992, writ denied) ("The question of causation is a fact question for the jury."). At this stage, the facts alleged by WRMS, if presumed to be true, raise a fact issue regarding proximate cause and preclude dismissal under Rule 12(b)(6).

B. Tortious Interference with Prospective Business Relations

1. Statute of Limitations

6 The statute of limitations in Texas for a cause of action for tortious interference with prospective business relations is two years. TEX. CIV. PRAC. & REM. CODE § 16.003(a); First Nat'l Bank of Eagle Pass v. Levine, 721 S.W.2d 287, 289 (Tex. 1986). "[A] cause of action for tortious interference with business relations does not accrue until existing negotiations, which are reasonably certain of resulting in a contract, are interfered with such that the negotiations terminate and harm to the plaintiff results." Hill v. Heritage Resources, 964 S.W.2d 89, 116 (Tex. App. – El Paso 1997, pet. denied). "If the plaintiff is not yet harmed, even in the face of a breach of duty, then the cause of action has not yet accrued and any suit filed thereupon is premature." Id. at 116.

WRMS has alleged that once MHMC announced it would be centralizing its supply chain and using a single vendor, it accepted proposals from only two suppliers, WRMS and Stryker. Dkt. 19 at ¶ 16-17. At the time WRMS submitted its proposal to MHMC it had "four years left on its contract and a previous successful relationship of at least six years." Id. at ¶ 17. Based at least in part on these facts, WRMS "was hopeful that it would win the bid." Id. at ¶ 18.

WRMS has also alleged that even after the January 1, 2016 notification from MHMC that its contract would be terminated effective June 30, 2016, WRMS believed it was still in the running to be awarded the centralized vendor contract and was "never formally advised that Stryker had won the bidding process." Id. at ¶ 20. It is plausible that WRMS's belief that it was still in the running may have been reinforced by MHMC's continued renewal of month-to-month contracts between June 30, 2016, and September 30, 2016.

Taking these factual allegations as true, WRMS has alleged that negotiations between WRMS and MHMC, which, based on allegations in the pleadings, were reasonably certain of resulting in a contract, did not terminate until after June 30, 2016. The pleadings do not demonstrate on their face that WRMS's interference with prospective relations claim is time-barred. Therefore, the motion to dismiss the prospective relations claim as time-barred must be denied.

2. Proximate Cause

In a tortious interference with prospective relations case, "[i]t is not necessary to prove that the contract would have certainly been made but for the interference; it must be reasonably probable, considering all of the facts and circumstances attendant to the transaction. More than mere negotiations must have taken place." Hill, 964 S.W.2d at 109 (citation omitted); M-I LLC, 733 F. Supp. 2d at 775 (plaintiff must plead facts showing a reasonable probability that it would have entered into a business relationship); Lincoln Gen. Ins., 787 F.3d at 731 (5th Cir. 2015).

As described in the section above, WRMS alleges that MHMC invited it to bid for a contract after announcing its intention to centralize its vendor contracts; MHMC repeatedly entered into month-to-month contracts with WRMS, even after the June 30, 2016 termination; WRMS continued performing and being paid by MHMC until the end of September 2016; WRMS believed its bid for the centralized vendor contract was under consideration by MHMC; and MHMC never informed WRMS that it was awarding the centralized vendor contract to Stryker. Again, proximate cause is generally a question for the fact-finder, and as a matter of pleading standards required to survive a motion to dismiss, WRMS has met its burden to allege facts from which a jury could find a contract between MHMC and WRMS was reasonably probable and that Stryker's interference was the proximate cause of WRMS's injury.

3. Independently Tortious Conduct

7 In order to state a claim for tortious interference with prospective business relations the plaintiff must allege that the defendant's conduct was independently tortious or unlawful. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Sturges, 52 S.W.3d 711 (Tex. 2001); see also, El Paso Healthcare Sys., Ltd. v. Murphy, 518 S.W.3d 412, 420-21 (Tex. 2017) ("Tortious interference with a prospective business relationship requires a finding that the defendant engaged in independently tortious or unlawful conduct; interference with an existing contract does not."). In Sturges, the Texas Supreme Court wrote at length to clarify just what the phrase "independently tortious or wrongful" means in the context of tortious interference with prospective business relations. The court stated:

> [A]n action for interference with a prospective contractual or business relation provides a remedy for injurious conduct that other tort actions might not reach ... but only for conduct that is already recognized to be wrongful under the common law or by statute.

52 S.W.3d at 713. The example the court gave of actionable conduct was a defendant who threatened a customer with bodily harm if he did business with the plaintiff. In such a case, the defendant's conduct is independently tortious because it is an assault, but the plaintiff could not sue for assault. Id. After examining the history of the tort at common law, and surveying the few Texas cases in which plaintiffs recovered damages under this cause of action, the Sturges court concluded that the scope of culpable conduct was fairly limited:

> It appears that in most Texas cases in which plaintiffs have actually recovered damages for tortious interference with prospective business relations, the defendants' conduct was either independently tortious —in the four cases noted, defamatory or fraudulent— or in violation of state law... [W]e see no need for a definition of tortious interference with prospective business relations that would encompass other conduct.

Id. at 726. The Sturges Court further observed that "the historical limitation of the tort to unlawful conduct — 'the actor's conduct was characterized by violence, fraud or defamation and was tortious in character' — provides a viable definition and preserves the tort's utility of filling a gap in affording compensation in situations where a wrong has been done." Id. The plaintiff need not prove an independent tort as part of an interference with prospective relations claim, but must be able to show the defendant's conduct would be actionable under a recognized tort. Id.

WRMS argues in its response to the motion to dismiss that it has alleged conduct that "was independently tortious or unlawful because it was characterized by defamation, disparagement, and fraud." Dkt. 21 at 19 (citing Dkt. 19, at ¶¶ 1-15, 18). WRMS also argues that it is plausible that discovery will reveal further evidence in support of its claim. See Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556 ("Asking for plausible grounds to infer an [anti-competitive] agreement does not impose a probability requirement at the pleading stage; it simply calls for enough fact to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of illegal agreement."). Although WRMS identifies allegedly tortious conduct that occurred in 2012, before MHMC last renewed its agreement with WRMS for a five-year term, it also alleges specific acts in 2014 (Dkt. 19 at ¶ 15), and that Stryker's independently tortious acts continued throughout the entire term of the MHMC Agreement. The court concludes that for purposes of pleading, WRMS has satisfied its burden to state a plausible claim for relief by pleading defamatory conduct by Stryker.

C. Unfair Competition

8 "Unfair competition under Texas law 'is the umbrella for all statutory and nonstatutory causes of action arising out of business conduct which is contrary to honest practice in industrial or commercial matters.' " Taylor Pub. Co. v. Jostens, Inc., 216 F.3d 465, 486 (5th Cir. 2000). The tort of unfair competition requires that the plaintiff show that an illegal act by the defendant interfered with the plaintiff's ability to conduct its business. Id.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

(citing Schoellkopf v. Pledger, 778 S.W.2d at 897, 904–05 (Tex. App.—Dallas 1989, writ denied)). The statute of limitations on WRMS's unfair competition claim is two years, R. Ready Prods., Inc. v. Cantrell, 85 F. Supp. 2d 672, 693 (S.D. Tex. 2000), and the accrual of WRMS's unfair competition claim is governed by the same legal principals as his tortious interference claims. See Jackson v. W. Telemarketing Corp. Outbound, 245 F.3d 518, 523-24 (5th Cir. 2001) ("Under Texas law, claims for unfair competition, unfair trade practices, conversion, tortious interference with contract, misappropriation of trade secrets, and conspiracy must be brought within two years from the time the cause of action accrues. In general, a cause of action accrues and limitations begin running when a wrongful act causes a legal injury." (footnotes and citations omitted)). In addition, the requirement for pleading an illegal act or independent tort also applies to WRMS's unfair competition claim. "Although the illegal act need not necessarily violate criminal law, it must at least be an independent tort." Taylor, 216 F.3d at 486 (citations omitted).

WRMS's unfair competition claim appears to be entirely coextensive with its tortious interference with prospective business relations claim. A party is entitled to plead alternative theories for relief. FED. R. CIV. P. 8(d). For current purposes, the court denies Stryker's motion to dismiss WRMS's unfair competition claim for the reasons discussed above in connection with its tortious interference with prospective relations claim.

III. Conclusion

For the reasons discussed above, Stryker's motion to dismiss is DENIED.

All Citations

Not Reported in Fed. Supp., 2019 WL 13191641

Footnotes

1 WRMS objects to consideration of the excerpt from the deposition of Jack Coenen attached as Exhibit 1 to Defendant's Reply (Dkt. 23). The objection is sustained, and the court will not consider Exhibit 1.

2 The discovery rule applies where the nature of the plaintiff's injury is inherently undiscoverable and the injury itself is objectively verifiable. HECI Expl. Co. v. Neel, 982 S.W.2d 881, 886 (Tex. 1998). The court rejects WRMS's argument that the discovery rule or other tolling doctrines apply to toll limitations in this case. Nonetheless, the court denies the motion on the grounds that it is not apparent from the face of the pleading that WRMS's claims accrued prior to June 30, 2016.

3 Texas substantive law governs this diversity action. See Erie R.R. Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64 (1938).

End of Document

© 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

CASE NO. 16

2010 WL 2163284
Only the Westlaw citation
is currently available.

This decision was reviewed by West editorial staff and not assigned editorial enhancements.

United States District Court,
S.D. Texas,
Corpus Christi Division.

Monica GARCIA, Plaintiff,
v.
LCS CORRECTIONS SERVICES, INC., et al, Defendants.

Civil Action
No.
C
–
09
–
334

|
May 24, 2010.

Attorneys and Law Firms

Kathryn Snapka, The Snapka Law Firm, Corpus Christi, TX, David W. Holman, Attorney at Law, Houston, TX, for Plaintiff.

Myra Kay Morris, Brian Charles Miller, Royston Rayzor, Andrew J. Lehrman, Jordan Mason Anderson, Sorrell Anderson et al, Corpus Christi, TX, for Defendants.

ORDER GRANTING PLAINTIFF'S MOTION TO REMAND

RANDY CRANE, District Judge.

I. Factual and Procedural Background

1 Now before the Court is Plaintiff's Motion to Remand (Doc. 12). [1] This is a wrongful death and survival action brought by Plaintiff Monica Garcia, individually and as representative of the estate of Mario A. Garcia ("Mr.Garcia"), and as next friend of Mr. Garcia's ten-year-old son, P.G., against Defendants LCS Corrections Services, Inc. ("LCS"), Miguel Niderhauser, and Dr. Michael Pendleton. (Doc. 19). Plaintiff's factual allegations consist of the following. On December 31, 2008, after pleading guilty to a federal offense, Mr. Garcia was remanded to federal custody for suicide watch at Brooks County Detention Center in Falfurrias, Texas, where he died on January 12, 2009. Id. The detention center is a private prison operated by LCS, and Niderhauser was the warden at the prison, and Dr. Pendleton a physician there, at the time of Mr. Garcia's death. Id. At the time he was remanded to custody, Mr. Garcia had a known seizure disorder for which he was taking medication prescribed to him by his personal physician. Id . Mr. Garcia suffered from seizures and headaches while at the prison and was transported to Christus Spohn Hospital in Kingsville, Texas, where "it was noted that the private prison had stopped Mr. Garcia's medications." Id. The hospital released Mr. Garcia with instructions given to the prison guards to continue his medications, including his seizure medication. Id. As described more fully infra, Plaintiff seeks to recover against Defendants on the grounds that their negligent and grossly negligent acts or omissions caused Mr. Garcia's death. Id.

Plaintiff originally filed this cause in the 79th Judicial District Court, Brooks County, Texas, on November 2, 2009, and amended her petition on November 4, 2009. (Doc. 1, Ex. 1–B). On December 2, 2009, LCS removed the action to federal court on the grounds that Plaintiff improperly joined in-state Defendants Niderhauser and Dr. Pendleton to defeat diversity jurisdiction. (Doc. 1). Absent the joinder of these Defendants, it is undisputed that the parties are diverse in citizenship and that the Court has jurisdiction over the case. (Docs.1, 12, 16, 20, 25, 29, 34); see 28 U.S.C. §§ 1332, 1441. Plaintiff now moves to remand, claiming that Niderhauser and Dr. Pendleton are proper Defendants to Plaintiff's claims. (Doc. 12). As the removing Defendant, LCS contests remand and requests the dismissal of Plaintiff's claims against Niderhauser and Dr. Pendleton. (Docs.16, 29).

II. Plaintiff's Motion to Remand

A. Improper Joinder

The doctrine of improper joinder constitutes a "narrow exception" to the rule of complete diversity, and the burden of persuasion on a party claiming improper joinder is a "heavy one." Campbell v. Stone Ins., 509 F.3d 665, 669 (5th Cir.2007) (quoting McDonal v. Abbott Labs., 408 F.3d 177, 183 (5th Cir.2005)). The Fifth Circuit has recognized two ways to establish improper joinder: (1) actual fraud in the pleading of jurisdictional facts, or (2) inability of the plaintiff to establish a cause of action against the non-diverse defendant in state court. Smallwood v. Ill. Cent. R.R. Co., 385 F.3d 568, 573 (5th Cir.2004) (en banc) (quoting Travis v. Irby, 326 F.3d 644, 646–47 (5th Cir.2003)). Here, LCS has not claimed any actual fraud; therefore, this Court's inquiry is limited to whether a reasonable basis exists for predicting that Plaintiff might be able to recover against either of the in-state Defendants. Id.; (Docs.1, 12, 16, 20, 25, 29, 34). "This means that there must be a reasonable possibility of recovery, not merely a theoretical one." Ross v. Citifinancial, Inc., 344 F.3d 458, 462 (5th Cir.2003) (emphasis omitted). The Fifth Circuit has likened this inquiry to the standard of review for evaluating a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b) (6). Campbell, 509 F.3d at 669; Smallwood, 385 F.3d at 573. In other words, the court considers the allegations of the complaint to determine whether the plaintiff states a claim under state law against the in-state defendant. Smallwood, 385 F.3d at 573. Ordinarily, no improper joinder exists if a plaintiff survives this Rule 12(b)(6)-type analysis. Id. However, in cases "in which a plaintiff has stated a claim, but has misstated or omitted discrete facts that would determine the propriety of joinder," the district court may, in its discretion, "pierce the pleadings" and conduct a summary judgment-type inquiry. Id. In determining whether improper joinder has occurred, the court must resolve contested fact issues and ambiguities in state law in favor of the plaintiff. Travis, 326 F.3d at 649.

B. Analysis

2 Plaintiff's claims of negligence and gross negligence against all Defendants require a showing that (1) the defendant owed a legal duty to the plaintiff; (2) the defendant breached that duty; and (3) the defendant's breach proximately caused the plaintiff's damages. See, e.g., W. Invs. v. Urena, 162 S.W.3d 547, 550 (Tex.2005) (common law negligence); Hamilton v. Wilson, 249 S.W.3d 425, 426 (Tex.2008) (medical negligence). The live pleading at the time of removal, Plaintiff's First Amended Original Petition, alleged the following with respect to the elements of duty, breach, and proximate cause:

> 11. At the time of Mr. Garcia's incarceration, Defendants were responsible for providing for the medical needs of inmates at the Brooks County Detention Center.
>
> 12. Although Mario Garcia was on prescribed medication at the time of confinement, the Defendants intentionally refused him his medication, in deliberate indifference to his medical needs. Further, at the time that the Defendants knew that Mario Garcia's health was deteriorating, they denied him treatment.
>
> 13. The deprivation of proper medication and treatment posed an excessive risk which the medical staff of LCS knew. Prior to Mario Garcia's death, numerous people complained to the Defendants and the medical staff about Mr. Garcia's deteriorating condition and his lack of proper medication.
>
> 14. On January 12, 2009, Mario Garcia died while in confinement. The autopsy revealed that Mr. Garcia died as a result of seizures. The Defendants' violation of the proper standard of care and conscious indifference and willful neglect of Mr. Garcia's serious medical needs and refusal to allow him to have his medication was a direct and proximate cause of his death.

(Doc. 1, Ex. 1–B). Citing to the Texas Supreme Court's decision in Leitch v. Hornsby, 935 S.W.2d 114, 117 (Tex.1996), LCS argued in its Notice of Removal that Niderhauser did not owe any duty to Mr. Garcia separate from the duties owed by his employer, as would be required to establish Niderhauser's individual liability. (Doc. 1). LCS also contended that Niderhauser had not personally engaged in any actionable conduct that was the legal cause of Mr. Garcia's injuries. Id. Therefore, Plaintiff had no possibility of recovery against this Defendant. Id. With respect to Dr. Pendleton, LCS appealed to a toxicology report incorporated into the autopsy of Mr. Garcia that allegedly demonstrated that the deceased had in fact received anti-seizure medication. Id. [2] LCS further claimed that Plaintiff had "no evidence to the contrary," and therefore this Defendant was also improperly joined. Id.

In response, Plaintiff filed both the motion to remand now pending before this Court and a request for leave to amend her pleading to clarify her allegations of duty, breach, and proximate cause. (Docs.11, 12). The Court granted leave, and Plaintiff now alleges the following with respect to Niderhauser and Dr. Pendleton:

> 3 12. Because Mr. Garcia was in confinement, Warden Niderhauser, Dr. Dr. Pendleton and other employees or agents of the Brooks County Detention Center had a duty to provide for Mr. Garcia's care. And, because he was in custody and unable to care for himself, Warden

Niderhauser, Dr. Dr. Pendleton and other employees or agents at the Brooks County Detention Center had a higher duty of care than that owed to persons generally.

13. Warden Niderhauser, Dr. Dr. Pendleton, and other employees and agents at the Brooks County Detention Center breached their duty of care to Mario A. Garcia by failing to care for his medical needs. In particular, Defendants breached their duty of care by:

(a) failure to continue Mario Garcia's medications;

(b) failure to determine what Mario Garcia's medical condition was at the time he was placed in custody;

(c) failure to refer Mario Garcia for competent treatment when he continued to suffer seizures;

(d) failure to attend to Mario Garcia's needs when his condition was deteriorating;

(e) failure to properly diagnose Mario Garcia's medical condition and medical needs;

(f) failure to provide proper training to care for the medical needs of persons placed into custody at the Brooks County Detention Center;

(g) failure to have proper policies and procedures to care for the medical needs of persons who have chronic and/or ongoing medical issues and who are placed into custody at the Brooks County Detention Center.

....

16. Warden Niderhauser's negligence was a proximate cause of Mario Garcia's death, for which the Plaintiff sues.

17. Dr. Pendleton's medical malpractice was a proximate cause of Mario Garcia's death for which the Plaintiff sues. See TEX. CIV. PRAC. & REM.CODE § 74.001, et seq.

(Doc. 19).

1. Dr. Pendleton

Finding it dispositive of the motion to remand, the Court turns to the issue of whether one of the in-state Defendants, Dr. Pendleton, is a properly joined Defendant to the action. The Court first notes that the response by LCS to the motion to remand abandons any argument that the toxicology report, and Plaintiff's inability to controvert it, demonstrate improper joinder. (Doc. 16). In any event, these arguments are unavailing. If Plaintiff's claims against Dr. Pendleton can survive a Rule 12(b)(6)-type analysis, LCS can only show improper joinder by producing evidence to negate the possibility of liability on the part of Dr. Pendleton. See Travis, 326 F.3d at 650. LCS has not shown that the toxicology report negates any possible claim against Dr. Pendleton, and "simply pointing to the plaintiff's lack of evidence at this stage of the case is insufficient" to show improper joinder. Id. at 650–51.

Nonetheless, LCS continues to assert that Plaintiff improperly joined Dr. Pendleton because her claims against him cannot withstand a Rule 12(b)(6)-type challenge.

(Docs.16, 29). Rule 12(b)(6) allows for dismissal for "failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted." FED. R. CIV. P. 12(b)(6). In Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 127 S.Ct. 1955, 167 L.Ed.2d 929 (2007), the Supreme Court confirmed that Rule 12(b)(6) must be read in conjunction with Rule 8(a), which requires " 'a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief,' in order to 'give the defendant fair notice of what the ... claim is and the grounds upon which it rests.' " Id. at 555 (quoting FED. R. CIV. P. 8(a); Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41, 47, 78 S.Ct. 99, 2 L.Ed.2d 80 (1957)). "While a complaint attacked by a Rule 12(b)(6) motion does not need detailed factual allegations, a plaintiff's obligation to provide the 'grounds' of his 'entitle[ment]' to relief requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do." Id. at 555 (internal citations omitted). To survive a motion to dismiss, a complaint must contain "enough factual matter (taken as true)" to state a claim for relief that is "plausible on its face." Id. at 556, 570.

4 Most recently, in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, —— U.S. ——, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 173 L.Ed.2d 868 (2009), the Supreme Court explained that "[t]wo working principles underlie our decision in Twombly." Id. at 1949. "First, the tenet that a court must accept as true all of the allegations contained in a complaint is inapplicable to legal conclusions." Id. "Second, only a complaint that states a plausible claim for relief survives a motion to dismiss." Id. at 1950. A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court, drawing upon its "judicial experience and common sense," to reasonably infer that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged. Id. at 1949 (citing Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556), 1950. "But where the well-pleaded facts do not permit the court to infer more than the mere possibility of misconduct, the complaint has alleged—but it has not 'show[n]'—'that the pleader is entitled to relief.' " Id. at 1950 (quoting FED. R. CIV. P. 8(a)(2)). In keeping with these principles, the Supreme Court in Iqbal set forth a "two-pronged" approach to considering Rule 12(b)(6) motions:

> [A] court considering a motion to dismiss can choose to begin by identifying pleadings that, because they are no more than conclusions, are not entitled to the assumption of truth. While legal conclusions can provide the framework of a complaint, they must be supported by factual allegations. When there are well-pleaded factual allegations, a court should assume their veracity and then determine whether they plausibly give rise to an entitlement to relief.

Id. at 1950.

No party disputes that Plaintiff's claims against Dr. Pendleton constitute health care liability claims under Chapter 74 of the Texas Civil Practices and Remedies Code. See TEX. CIV.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

PRAC. & REM.CODE ANN. § 74.001, et seq. (Vernon 2005); (Docs.12, 16, 20, 24, 25, 29, 34). Chapter 74 defines a health care liability claim, in relevant part, as "a cause of action against a ... physician for treatment, lack of treatment, or other claimed departure from accepted standards of medical care ..., which proximately results in injury to or death of a claimant, whether the claimant's claim or cause of action sounds in tort or contract." TEX. CIV. PRAC. & REM.CODE ANN. § 74.001(13) (Vernon 2005). The claims against Dr. Pendleton sound in negligence, and it is LCS's contention that Plaintiff's "seven bare-boned allegations of negligence and one-sentence generic allegation of causation" fail to state a facially plausible claim for relief against this Defendant. (Doc. 29). In so arguing, LCS ignores the additional, factual allegations that the Court must consider in conducting its Rule 12(b)(6) analysis. Those allegations are that Mr. Garcia had a known seizure disorder, for which he was taking medication prescribed to him by his personal physician, when he was remanded to the custody of Brooks County Detention Center. Mr. Garcia suffered from seizures and headaches while at the prison, necessitating a trip to the hospital where it was determined that the prison had stopped his medications. The hospital discharged Mr. Garcia with instructions given to continue his medications. Shortly thereafter, he died. Against the "framework" of Plaintiff's allegations of negligence in the provision of medical treatment to Mr. Garcia, and proximate cause, these factual allegations are enough to state a facially plausible claim for relief against Dr. Pendleton, allegedly the physician at the prison at the time of Mr. Garcia's death.

5 Both LCS and Dr. Pendleton further assert that Dr. Pendleton must be dismissed as a Defendant to this action in light of Plaintiff's failure to comply with a specific procedural requirement for Chapter 74 claims. (Docs.16, 24, 29). The Court recognizes that a plaintiff asserting a health care liability claim must serve an expert report on the defendant physician or his attorney within 120 days of filing suit or face the dismissal of her claim with prejudice upon the motion of that defendant. See TEX. CIV. PRAC. & REM.CODE ANN. § 74.351 (Vernon 2005). As set forth in Dr. Pendleton's motion to dismiss, Plaintiff first filed her health care liability claims against Dr. Pendleton in federal court on July 22, 2009 and then dismissed that cause and filed the current action in state court on November 4, 2009. (Doc. 24; Doc. 24, Exs. 1, 2, 4). Dr. Pendleton submits that Plaintiff failed to serve an expert report within 120 days of the initial filing and requests the dismissal of Plaintiff's claims against him on this basis. (Doc. 24; Doc. 24, Ex. 4). LCS also notes that Plaintiff has not served the expert report, although it does so to suggest that Plaintiff would have served the report "if [she] were serious about proceeding against Dr. Pendleton for some reason other than disrupting diversity jurisdiction." (Doc. 16). Upon review of the relevant case law, this Court cannot overlook that the vast majority of district courts have held that the expert report requirement does not apply in federal court. See, e.g., Politis v. Noblin, 2009 WL 3761748, at *1 (S.D.Tex. Nov.9, 2009); Mason v. United States, 486 F.Supp.2d 621, 623–626 (W.D.Tex.2007); Garza v. Scott & White Mem'l Hosp., 234 F.R.D. 617, 621–24 (W.D.Tex.2005).[3] Therefore, this Court must find that the initial filing of suit in a federal forum did not start the 120–day clock, and the clock had not yet run in the current action when LCS removed it to federal court, where the rule does not apply. Given that Plaintiff's allegations against Dr. Pendleton otherwise state a plausible claim for relief, the Court must remand the case.

2. Attorney's Fees

Finally, the Court notes that Plaintiff's motion to remand requests an award of attorney's fees, expenses, and costs under 28 U .S.C. § 1447(c) on the grounds that LCS lacked an "objectively reasonable basis" for removal. (Doc. 12); see Martin v. Franklin Capital Corp., 546 U.S. 132, 141, 126 S.Ct. 704, 163 L.Ed.2d 547 (2005). Given that the crux of Plaintiff's claims against Dr. Pendleton at the time of removal was the deprivation of medication, LCS reasonably relied on the toxicology report in initially asserting that Plaintiff had no possibility of recovering against Dr. Pendleton based on this theory of negligence. The Court allowed Plaintiff to clarify her allegations after removal, upon which LCS reasonably maintained that Dr. Pendleton was not a properly joined Defendant by appealing to the Supreme Court's recent clarification of the Rule 12(b)(6) standard. For these reasons, the Court concludes that Plaintiff does not merit an award of attorney's fees, expenses, or costs for improper removal.

III. Conclusion

6 For the foregoing reasons, the Court finds that Plaintiff has stated a facially plausible claim for relief against Defendant Dr. Michael Pendleton. Therefore, the Court lacks diversity jurisdiction over the case and hereby ORDERS that Plaintiff's Motion to Remand is hereby GRANTED and the case hereby REMANDED to the state district court from which it came.

SO ORDERED.

All Citations

Not Reported in F.Supp.2d, 2010 WL 2163284

Footnotes

1 Also pending are Defendant Dr. Michael Pendleton's and Defendant Miguel Niderhauser's respective Rule 12(b)(6) Motions to Dismiss. (Docs.24, 32). The Court need not rule on these Motions, as the presence of properly joined Defendant Dr. Pendleton in this case requires remand.

2 LCS did not attach a copy of the report to the Notice of Removal.

3 Dr. Pendleton argues that the Court must dismiss the claims against him by citing to Cruz v. Chang, 400 F.Supp.2d 906, 915 (W.D.Tex.2005), in which U.S. District Judge Kathleen Cardone concluded that the export report requirement did apply in federal court. (Doc. 24). However, in Mason, Judge Cardone reached the opposite conclusion "[i]n light of the recent change in law and the persuasive reasons provided by every district court in Texas to consider the issue." Mason, 486 F.Supp.2d at 625.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

End of Document

© 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

CASE NO. 17

2023 WL 4249268
Only the Westlaw citation
is currently available.
United States Court of Appeals, Fifth Circuit.

Sara LUEBANO, Plaintiff—Appellant,
v.
OFFICE DEPOT, L.L.C.,
Defendant—Appellee.

No.
22
-
50767
|
FILED June 29, 2023

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Western District of Texas, USDC No. 7:21-CV-233

Attorneys and Law Firms

Nkechinyelumka Hilda Chukwurah, NLC Law Group, P.L.L.C., Houston, TX, for Plaintiff—Appellant.

Jeremy Wayne Hawpe, Littler Mendelson, P.C., Dallas, TX, for Defendant—Appellee.

Before Clement, Graves, and Higginson, Circuit Judges.

Opinion

Per Curiam: [*]

1 Sara Luebano was an assistant manager at Office Depot's location in Odessa, Texas. She worked for the company during a mass shooting event in August 2019. In June 2020, Luebano needed knee surgery and applied for time off under the Family and Medical Leave Act. Office Depot granted her leave beyond the twelve weeks required by statute. When Luebano failed to return to work by January 2021, the store terminated her employment. Luebano sued Office Depot for negligence related to the 2019 mass shooting and for violations of the FMLA and the Americans with Disabilities Act. The district court dismissed Luebano's federal claims pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) and declined to take supplemental jurisdiction over her state law claims. We AFFIRM in part and REVERSE in part the district court's order on the motion to dismiss. Consequently, we VACATE the district court's order on the motion to reopen. Finally, we REMAND to the district court for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

I

A

What follows are the facts as alleged in Luebano's amended complaint. Luebano worked at Office Depot in Odessa, Texas, from June 2016 until January 2021. She started as a copy center associate and worked her way up to an assistant manager. While serving as an assistant manager, on August 31, 2019, an associate informed her that an active shooter was in Odessa. Police activity outside the store was heavy, and her active general manager, Dieter Mullin, ordered Luebano to ask the officers what was happening. Luebano was terrified. But she complied with her supervisor's instructions and went outside to speak with the police. An officer told her to return to the building and that the situation was serious. Luebano informed the customers and associates that the store was on lockdown due to the ongoing active shooter event. She then locked the door and dropped the gate.

Rumors started to fly around the building that the mass shooter had shot people down the street. However, Mullen was anxious to reopen the store, asking Luebano to pay attention to what a nearby Target was doing. A little later, believing Target had reopened and that the situation was over, Mullen ordered Luebano to open the location for business. However, the store's area loss prevention manager, Blake Langley, countermanded these instructions. After intense confusion, Luebano followed Langley's guidance to conduct an emergency store closing and safely led the remaining people outside the building. The next day, Luebano submitted a letter to Office Depot complaining about how its managers handled the active shooter event. But nothing materialized from her letter.

About a month later, on October 1, 2019, Mullen and Hector Arellano, the new general manager, called Luebano into their office. They presented her with a performance improvement plan, in which Luebano's managers informed her that she was not performing her assistant manager responsibilities appropriately. Luebano disputed the factual basis for the plan, specifically its claim that she had been disciplined in the past for her performance. Mullen and Arellano refused to show her the documents underpinning the performance improvement plan. In response, Luebano declined to sign any disciplinary paperwork. Later, Luebano's management held additional disciplinary discussions regarding her handling of store security, bag checks, laptop inventory, and the store's safe.

2 Unrelated to these events, on June 10, 2020, Luebano informed Office Depot that she needed to take prolonged medical leave for knee surgery starting June 19. Office Depot's human resources team instructed her to submit a request for FMLA leave, and she complied. Initially, Office Depot approved Luebano for FMLA leave starting June 19 and ending July 30. However, it later extended her leave several times.

But Luebano started to suspect her job might be in jeopardy. Early in October 2020, she saw the Odessa Office Depot advertising for a new assistant manager. Arellano denied any knowledge of a job posting. On October 12, Luebano was cleared to return to work with restrictions. She attempted to get on the work schedule, but Office Depot's HR team extended her leave to December 10, 2020, instead. Oddly, about a month later in November 2020, Office Depot informed Luebano that her leave had caused undue hardship, and it could no longer guarantee her role as an assistant manager at the Odessa store. But Office Depot informed Luebano she would be considered for any positions available at the Odessa location once she fully recovered.

On December 10, 2020, Luebano's leave expired, and Office Depot emailed her the next day. Luebano informed Office Depot that she had another appointment set for December 14, and Office Depot granted a further extension of her leave until December 15. On December 16, Luebano received another email indicating that her leave had been exhausted. However, Luebano did not return to work, and on January 7, 2021, she received an email from Fidelity Investments regarding her 401k and the termination of her employment. Concerned, Luebano contacted Arellano, who claimed to be uncertain whether Office Depot had terminated her. A few days later, on January 12, Arellano texted Luebano that Office Depot had fired her.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

B

Luebano filed suit on September 27, 2021, in Ector County against Office Depot for violations of the FMLA and Texas law. Office Depot accepted service of her complaint on November 10, 2021, and timely removed to federal court based on federal question jurisdiction. It simultaneously moved to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6). Luebano responded to this motion by requesting leave to amend, and the district court allowed her to file an amended complaint. On April 7, 2022, Luebano submitted her amended complaint, which added an ADA cause of action. Later that month, Office Depot again moved to dismiss. Luebano did not file a response to that motion. The district court granted Office Depot's motion to dismiss.

In its order, the district court first found that Luebano had failed to exhaust her ADA claim with the EEOC before filing her lawsuit. It then concluded that Luebano could not plausibly state a violation of the FMLA because she had exhausted her protected leave. Having dispatched her federal claims, the district court refused to take supplemental jurisdiction over Luebano's state law causes of action and dismissed the remainder of the amended complaint.

Luebano responded to the district court's order by moving to reopen the case under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 60(b)(1). In support of her motion, Luebano argued that her attorney could not access the electronic filing system and submit her response to the motion to dismiss. She went on, asking the district court for relief because her attorney got sick while traveling and could not effectively remedy the filing issue before the court ruled on the motion. The district court did not agree that these barriers met the Rule 60(b)(1) threshold and denied Luebano's motion. Luebano timely appealed the order denying her motion to reopen her case. [1]

II

3 "We review the grant of a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6) de novo, accepting all well-pleaded facts as true and viewing those facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs." Meador v. Apple, Inc., 911 F.3d 260, 264 (5th Cir. 2018) (quotation marks and citation omitted). "To survive a motion to dismiss, a complaint must 'plead factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.' " Nix v. Major League Baseball, 62 F.4th 920, 928 (5th Cir. 2023) (alteration adopted) (quoting Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678 (2009)). "Conclusory allegations or legal conclusions masquerading as factual conclusions will not suffice to prevent a motion to dismiss." Id. (alteration adopted) (citation omitted).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

III

Luebano's appeal exclusively challenges the district court's order dismissing her complaint. She first argues that the district court erred in rejecting her ADA claim because she generally alleged administrative exhaustion, which Luebano contends is all that is required of her at the pleading stage. Second, Luebano contends that the district court erred in dismissing her FMLA causes of action by collapsing her FMLA leave with other disability leave that she never requested. We address each argument in turn.

A

The district court concluded that Luebano failed to allege that the EEOC sent her a right-to-sue letter or that the agency had not adjudicated her charge within 180 days. Consequently, it dismissed her ADA claim because Luebano had not demonstrated on the face of her amended complaint that she had exhausted her administrative remedies.

Before an employee can file an ADA case in federal court, she must exhaust her administrative remedies. See Dao v. Auchan Hypermarket, 96 F.3d 787, 788–789 (5th Cir. 1996) (per curiam). In the ADA context, proper exhaustion of administrative remedies requires an employee to submit a timely charge with the EEOC and file her complaint within ninety days after receiving a right-to-sue letter. Id. Under the appropriate circumstance, a district court may dismiss a cause of action under Rule 12(b)(6) when the plaintiff fails to show she exhausted her administrative remedies on the face of the complaint. See Taylor v. U.S. Treasury Dep't, 127 F.3d 470, 478 n.8 (5th Cir. 1997) (per curiam).

However, failure to exhaust is an affirmative defense that a defendant must raise. See Davis v. Fort Bend Cnty., 893 F.3d 300, 307 (5th Cir. 2018), aff'd, 139 S. Ct. 1843, 1850-52 (2019). And while affirmative defenses, including non-exhaustion, can be appropriately asserted on a 12(b)(6) motion, dismissal on such a basis is appropriate only if the defense is evident on the face of the complaint. See EPCO Carbon Dioxide Prods., Inc. v. JP Morgan Chase Bank, 467 F.3d 466, 470 (5th Cir. 2006). Here, Luebano's purported failure to exhaust does not appear on the face of her complaint. Indeed, she affirmatively claims she has exhausted her administrative remedies. For its part, Office Depot did not attach any documentation supporting the application of exhaustion defenses when it moved for 12(b)(6) dismissal. Nor did it move in the alternative for summary judgment based on such evidence. So, the district court erred when it dismissed Luebano's ADA claim for lacking exhaustion pleading in her complaint. [2]

B

4 Next, we address Luebano's challenge to the district court's decision to dismiss her FMLA claims. The district court found that Luebano had taken all twelve weeks of her statutorily protected FMLA leave. As a consequence, according to the district court, she could neither plead a prima facie case for FMLA interference nor FMLA retaliation. Luebano argues that she adequately pleaded both causes of action and that the district court erred by improperly conflating her FMLA leave with other, non-statutorily protected leave that Office Depot gave her.

1

"The FMLA requires covered employers to grant covered employees up to twelve weeks of unpaid leave for certain qualifying reasons, such as the ... occurrence of a serious health condition." DeVoss v. Sw. Airlines Co., 903 F.3d 487, 490 (5th Cir. 2018). To protect this statutory right, the FMLA bars covered employers from interfering with the right of an employee to take such leave. 29 U.S.C. § 2615(a)(1). In this circuit, to establish her interference claim under the FMLA, Luebano must show: (1) she "was an eligible employee;" (2) her "employer was subject to FMLA requirements;" (3) she "was entitled to leave;" (4) she "gave proper notice of [her] intention to take FMLA leave;" and (5) her "employer denied [her] the benefits to which [s]he was entitled under the FMLA." Caldwell v. KHOU-TV, 850 F.3d 237, 245 (5th Cir. 2017). Luebano alleges the first four elements but fails to allege the fifth.

We have held that a plaintiff who exhausts her FMLA leave cannot allege that her employer interfered with her right to take such leave. See Hunt v. Rapides Healthcare Sys., LLC, 277 F.3d 757, 763–768 (5th Cir. 2001), abrogated on other grounds by Wheat v. Fla. Par. Juvenile Justice Comm'n, 811 F.3d 702 (5th Cir. 2016) (finding in an FMLA leave interference claim where an employer failed to reinstate a plaintiff: "[i]f an employee fails to return to work on or before the date that FMLA leave expires, the right to reinstatement also expires."). [3] The district court correctly concluded that Luebano has not pleaded a claim for FMLA interference. Luebano applied for FMLA-protected leave on June 10, 2020, and Office Depot approved her leave. As alleged, the store allowed her to remain on medical leave until January 2021. Per her complaint, this roughly six-month period of applied-for and received medical leave exceeds the twelve weeks protected under the FMLA. So, given her pleading, Luebano cannot plausibly allege that Office Depot interfered with her FMLA rights.

2

But the district court went too far in dismissing Luebano's FMLA retaliation cause of action by applying the same reasoning it used to dismiss her FMLA interference claim. In employment discrimination cases, the complaint need not "contain specific facts establishing a prima facie case of discrimination under the framework set forth ... in McDonnell Douglas Corp. v. Green, 411 U.S. 792 (1973)." Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N.A., 534 U.S. 506, 508 (2002). "The prima facie case under McDonnell Douglas ... is an evidentiary standard, not a pleading requirement." Id. at 510, 122 S.Ct. 992. But Luebano must "plead sufficient facts on all of the ultimate elements" of her claim. Chhim v. Univ. of Tex. at Austin, 836 F.3d 467, 470 (5th Cir. 2016). In framing a motion to dismiss inquiry, "a district court may find it helpful to reference McDonnell Douglas." Norsworthy v. Hous. Indep. Sch. Dist., No. 22-20586, 2023 WL 3965065 at *2 (5th Cir. June 13, 2023).

5 The district court determined in its order granting the motion to dismiss that Luebano failed to establish her prima facie case. It found that she did not plead the third element, specifically that her FMLA leave caused Office Depot's decision to terminate her when Luebano received all her statutorily protected leave. Because a plaintiff is not required to plead a prima facie case at the motion to dismiss phase, Scott v. U.S. Bank Nat'l Ass'n, 16 F.4th 1204, 1210 (5th Cir. 2021), the district court applied the wrong standard here.

Still, an FMLA retaliation claim does require Luebano to show a causal link between her FMLA leave and the adverse action. Acker v. Gen. Motors, L.L.C., 853 F.3d 784, 790 (5th Cir. 2017). But it is enough to survive a Rule 12(b)(6) motion for Luebano to plead adequate facts that allow us to draw a reasonable causation inference. Nix, 62 F.4th at 928. Luebano alleges that she took advantage of FMLA-protected leave and was terminated shortly after doing so. As we have explained in the past, "[t]he FMLA's protection against retaliation is not limited to periods in which an employee is on FMLA leave, but encompasses the employer's conduct both during and after the employee's FMLA leave." Hunt, 277 F.3d at 768-69 (emphasis added). Accordingly, Luebano effectively pleads causation when her termination took place in close "temporal proximity" to her use of FMLA leave. Mauder v. Metro. Transit Auth. of Harris Cnty., 446 F.3d 574, 583 (5th Cir. 2006). But the timing between Luebano's termination and the end of her statutory leave must be "very close[.]" Clark Cnty. Sch. Dist. v. Breeden, 532 U.S. 268, 273–74 (2001) (per curiam).

Here, Luebano pleads temporal proximity that is quite tight. Luebano took her FMLA leave in June 2020, which means the statutorily protected period of that leave expired in September 2020. And while Luebano was not formally terminated until January 2021, Office Depot began advertising a vacancy for her position as early as October 4, 2020. In November 2020, she was essentially warned that she was being terminated. In early January 2021, it became official. Based on this alleged timeline, and in light of the fact-intensive nature of the causation question, Luebano has sufficiently alleged a causal link between her statutorily protected leave and Office Depot's decision to fire her, such that her complaint should survive a 12(b)(6) dismissal. Consequently, the district court erred because Luebano's complaint plausibly establishes the elements of her FMLA retaliation cause of action.

IV

For the reasons above, the district court correctly dismissed Luebano's FMLA interference claim. But it erred in dismissing Luebano's ADA and FMLA retaliation claims. And because federal claims remain, the district court erred in dismissing Luebano's state law causes of action. Thus, we AFFIRM in part and REVERSE in part the district court's order granting the motion to dismiss. Consequently, we VACATE the district court's order on the motion to reopen. Finally, we REMAND to the district court for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

All Citations

Not Reported in Fed. Rptr., 2023 WL 4249268

Footnotes

* This opinion is not designated for publication. See 5th Cir. R. 47.5.

1 In 2021, the Supreme Court approved an amended Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure 3(c)(5). The amended rule states: "In a civil case, a notice of appeal encompasses the final judgment ... if the notice designates ... (B) an order described in Rule 4(a)(4)(A)." Fed. R. App. P. 3(c)(5). Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure 4(a)(4)(A)(vi) includes motions pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 60. The upshot of these intertwining rules is that Luebano has properly appealed the district court's order dismissing her complaint pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) by filing an appeal of the order denying her Rule 60(b)(1) motion.

Additionally, because we ultimately reverse the district court's order granting the motion to dismiss, we do not address the order on the motion to reopen the case on the merits. Instead, we vacate that order.

2 Office Depot also asserts on appeal that Luebano's complaint was untimely because she failed to plead that she filed suit within 90 days of receiving a right-to-sue letter. But this argument was not raised to the district court. See Rollins v. Home Depot USA, Inc., 8 F.4th 393, 397 (5th Cir. 2021) ("A party forfeits an argument by failing to raise it in the first instance in the district court—thus raising it for the first time on appeal...."). In any case, this theory suffers from the same problem as before: the ninety-day deadline is "not a jurisdictional prerequisite" and is instead "akin to a statute of limitations." Espinoza v. Mo. Pac. R.R. Co., 754 F.2d 1247, 1249 n.1 (5th Cir. 1985).

3 Hunt analytically divides the FMLA rights of employees into two. See 277 F.3d at 763. First, "[t]he statute prescriptively provides a series of substantive rights[,]" such as the right to take FMLA leave without interference from an employer. Id. Second, the statute protects employees from penalties for exercising their statutory rights. Id.

End of Document

© 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

CASE NO. 18

2022 WL 673854
Only the Westlaw citation
is currently available.
United States District Court, S.D.
Texas, Corpus Christi Division.

Yuriana BRICENO-BELMONTES, Plaintiff,
v.
COASTAL BEND COLLEGE, Defendant.

Civil Action
No.
2
:
20
-
CV
-
00114

|
Signed 03/05/2022
|
Entered 03/07/2022

Attorneys and Law Firms

Charles C. Smith, Attorney at Law, Corpus Christi, TX, for Plaintiff.

Charles Cory Rush, Kirk Allen Agee, Karczewski Bradshaw Spalding, Houston, TX, for Defendant.

MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER

Drew B. Tipton, UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE

1 Plaintiff Yuriana Briceno-Belmontes contends that the Defendant, Coastal Bend College ("CBC"), discriminated against her on the basis of her national origin and retaliated against her for raising allegations of discrimination with her superiors. Before the Court is CBC's Motion to Dismiss Briceno-Belmontes's Second Amended Complaint. CBC argues that Briceno-Belmontes failed to sufficiently state claims upon which relief can be granted. For the reasons that follow, the Court DENIES the Motion.

I. BACKGROUND

For purposes of addressing this Motion, the Court accepts all factual allegations in the Complaint as true and views them in the light most favorable to Briceno-Belmontes. CBC is a community college in South Texas. Briceno-Belmontes is a Hispanic woman and citizen of the United States. (Dkt. No. 18 at ¶ 4). In March 2018, Briceno-Belmontes was hired by CBC to work as an academic advisor and recruiter at its Kingsville, Texas campus. (Id. at ¶¶ 9–10). Her responsibilities included attending recruiting events and making presentations at various schools. (Id. at ¶ 11). Student Services Director Amanda Barrera was Briceno-Belmontes's supervisor from March 2018 through March 2019. (Id.). Executive Dean of Student Services Guadalupe Ganceres was Briceno-Belmontes's supervisor from March 2019 through Briceno-Belmontes's termination in June 2019. (Id. at ¶¶ 11, 23).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Briceno-Belmontes's earliest issue at work occurred in August 2018, when she was treated unfairly by an unnamed CBC administrator. (Id. at ¶ 13). Starting in January 2019, Briceno-Belmontes was subjected to a "pressure campaign" initiated by Ganceres and Kingsville Site Director Joseph Hayen. (Id. at ¶¶ 14–15). The "pressure campaign" is not described in detail in the Second Amended Complaint. Reading it in the light most favorable to Briceno-Belmontes, as the Court must, it appears to be an effort by her supervisors to force Briceno-Belmontes to purchase incidentals for her job and then seek reimbursement from CBC. See (id. at ¶¶ 13–16). This, Briceno-Belmontes asserts, was contrary to the letter of the purchasing policy of CBC, (id. at ¶ 16), and was meant to place her in a position that could compromise her employment. (Id. at ¶¶ 13, 17).

Briceno-Belmontes resisted and was accused of insubordination as a result. (Id. at ¶ 17, 22). In February 2019, she complained to CBC human resources manager Audrey Ramirez, Student Services Director Barrera, and Dean Ganceres about the reimbursement practice she was pressured to carry out. (Id. at ¶ 14). She attributed this mistreatment to national origin discrimination. (Id.). In April 2019, she filed a formal complaint against Hayen. (Id.). In May 2019, she complained a second time to the administrators about the reimbursement practice pressure campaign and once again attributed the situation to national origin discrimination. (Id.). On May 2, 2019, Briceno-Belmontes received an "Employee Discipline Notice" for insubordination and violating CBC policies and procedures. (Id. at ¶ 22). The Amended Complaint does not make clear whether Briceno-Belmontes's internal complaint of discrimination or the disciplinary notice came first. Last, Briceno-Belmontes complained to Hector Villarreal, who assumed the role of Interim Kingsville Site Director at an unspecified time. (Id. at ¶ 23).

2 The events culminated in June 2019 when Briceno-Belmontes was fired for insubordination and violating CBC policies and procedures. (Id.). But other employees with comparable job titles and responsibilities who also resisted the reimbursement practice were not fired. (Id. at ¶ 25). Specifically, Mercy Boamah, a black academic advisor and recruiter at the CBC Alice campus, (id.), and Kristen Jambers, a white academic advisor and recruiter at the CBC Pleasanton campus, (id. at ¶ 28), did not receive the same treatment. Boamah and Jambers had the same supervisors as Briceno-Belmontes. (Id. at ¶¶ 11, 25–26, 28).

On January 15, 2020, Briceno-Belmontes filed a Charge of Discrimination with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission ("EEOC") asserting national origin discrimination and retaliation for engaging in protected activity. (Id. at ¶ 6). On February 18, 2020, the EEOC sent Briceno-Belmontes a Notice of Right to Sue. (Id. at ¶ 7). Briceno-Belmontes filed suit on May 12, 2020. After Briceno-Belmontes filed her Second Amended Complaint, CBC filed a Motion to Dismiss for failure to state a claim. (Dkt. No. 21). Briceno-Belmontes filed a Response, (Dkt. No. 22), and CBC filed a Reply, (Dkt. No. 23).

II. LEGAL STANDARD

A. RULE 12(B)(6)

Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure permits a defendant to move to dismiss for "failure to state a claim upon which relief may be granted." Rule 8(a)(2) requires a pleading to contain "a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief." Although "the pleading standard Rule 8 announces does not require 'detailed factual allegations,' " it demands more than labels and conclusions. Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1949, 173 L.Ed.2d 868 (2009) (quoting Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 555, 127 S.Ct. 1955, 1964, 167 L.Ed.2d 929 (2007)). Threadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements, do not suffice." Id. The Defendant, as the moving party, bears the burden of proving that no legally cognizable claim for relief exists. 5B Charles Alan Wright & Arthur R. Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1357 (3d ed.).

In reviewing a 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss, a court must accept the plaintiff's factual allegations as true and view those allegations in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. White v. U.S. Corrections, L.L.C., 996 F.3d 302, 306–07 (5th Cir. 2021). The court must evaluate whether "a complaint contains sufficient factual matter to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678, 129 S.Ct. at 1949 (cleaned up). "A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Id. "The plausibility standard is not akin to a 'probability requirement,' but it asks for more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully." Id. "Dismissal ... is appropriate where the plaintiff fails to allege 'enough facts to state a claim that is plausible on its face' and thus does not 'raise a right to relief above the speculative level.' " Montoya v. FedEx Ground Package Sys., Inc., 614 F.3d 145, 148 (5th Cir. 2010) (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555, 127 S.Ct. at 1965).

III. DISCUSSION

A. TIMELINESS

As a threshold matter, CBC raises the issue of the timeliness of Briceno-Belmontes's claims. (Dkt. No. 21 at 10). CBC, citing the text of 42 U.S.C. § 2000e–5(e)(1), argues that Title VII plaintiffs in Texas must file a charge of discrimination with the EEOC within 300 days of learning of the conduct alleged, or the claim is barred. Briceno-Belmontes filed her charge on January 15, 2020. (Id. at 11). Because of the Title VII statutory bar, CBC asserts that any claims that arise out of discrete events that occurred before March 21, 2019—300 days earlier—must be dismissed. (Id.). Those would be Briceno-Belmontes's allegation of unfair treatment in August 2018, (Dkt. No. 18 at ¶ 13), and her allegation of discrimination based on her national origin in February 2019, (id. at ¶¶ 12, 14). Briceno-Belmontes responds by highlighting that the May 2019 allegation of national origin discrimination occurred within the 300-day window. (Dkt. No. 22 at ¶ 6).

3 In Texas, "a title VII plaintiff must file a charge of discrimination with the EEOC within 300 days after learning of the conduct alleged." Huckabay v. Moore, 142 F.3d 233, 238 (5th Cir. 1998) (citing 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5(e)(1)), abrogated on other grounds by Heath v. Bd. of Supervisors for S. Univ., 850 F.3d 731, 737

(5th Cir. 2017). "[D]iscrete discriminatory acts are not actionable if time barred, even when they are related to acts alleged in timely filed charges." National R.R. Passenger Corp. v. Morgan, 536 U.S. 101, 113, 122 S.Ct. 2061, 2072, 153 L.Ed.2d 106 (2002). However, an act that happened outside the filing period "may constitute relevant background evidence in a proceeding in which the status of the current practice is at issue[.]" United Air Lines, Inc. v. Evans, 431 U.S. 553, 558, 97 S.Ct. 1885, 1889, 52 L.Ed.2d 571 (1977). A plaintiff can support a Title VII claim with conduct occurring more than 300 days before filing an EEOC charge if the plaintiff can allege facts that could show that "the pre-and post-limitations period incidents involve[d] the same type of employment actions, occurred relatively frequently, and were perpetrated by the same managers." Morgan, 536 U.S. at 120–21, 122 S.Ct. at 2076 (alteration omitted); see also Heath, 850 F.3d at 736–39.

Briceno-Belmontes's claims stem from her June 2019 termination—which occurred within the statutory deadline. See Morgan, 536 U.S. at 114, 122 S.Ct. at 2073. The acts that occurred outside the filing period may constitute relevant background evidence. See Evans, 431 U.S. at 558, 97 S.Ct. at 1889. Thus, Briceno-Belmontes's claims are not time barred.

B. NATIONAL ORIGIN DISCRIMINATION CLAIM

CBC also challenges Briceno-Belmontes's national origin discrimination claim. CBC asserts that Briceno-Belmontes does not plead any direct evidence to support her Title VII claims, so they must be analyzed under the McDonnell Douglas burden shifting paradigm, see McDonnell Douglas Corp. v. Green, 411 U.S. 792, 93 S.Ct. 1817, 36 L.Ed.2d 668 (1973), to assess a circumstantial claim of employment discrimination.[1] (Dkt. No. 21 at 11). CBC concedes that, for purposes of the Rule 12(b)(6) pleading standard, Briceno-Belmontes establishes a prima facie case of national origin discrimination on the first three prongs of McDonnell Douglas. (Id. at 12 n.1). But CBC disputes that Briceno-Belmontes successfully pleads the fourth prong: that she was treated less favorably than others outside her protected class who were similarly situated to her. (Id. at 12). CBC argues that Briceno-Belmontes's comparators of Mercy Boamah and Kristen Jambers are not similarly situated because Briceno-Belmontes does not assert that they had the same disciplinary history nor adequately describe how they responded to the "pressure campaign" of the school administrators. (Id. at 13–17).

Briceno-Belmontes counters that the comparators she identified are sufficient to state a prima facie case under the permissive Rule 12 pleading standards. (Dkt. No. 22 at ¶¶ 6–12). Briceno-Belmontes contends that CBC is mistakenly increasing the burden on her at the pleading stage to bring a circumstantial case of employment discrimination under Title VII. (Id. at ¶ 9, 11–12). The Court agrees with Briceno-Belmontes.

4 CBC places too high a burden on Briceno-Belmontes. "At the Rule 12(b)(6) stage, [a court's] analysis of [a] Title VII claim is governed by Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N.A., 534 U.S. 506, 122 S.Ct. 992, 152 L.Ed.2d 1 (2002)—and not the evidentiary standard set forth in McDonnell Douglas Corp. v. Green[.]"

Olivarez v. T-Mobile USA, Inc., 997 F.3d 595, 599 (5th Cir. 2021). Under Swierkiewicz, "there are two ultimate elements a plaintiff must plead to support a disparate treatment claim under Title VII: (1) an adverse employment action, (2) taken against a plaintiff because of her protected status."[2] Id. (internal quotations omitted) (emphasis in original).

Here, Briceno-Belmontes meets this burden. She states that her comparators—Boamah and Jambers—had the same job titles, responsibilities, and supervisors. (Dkt. No. 18 at ¶¶ 25–30). Most importantly, she pleads that they also "resisted the pressure campaign" and that they are a different race and were not fired. (Id.). Thus, Briceno-Belmontes plausibly claims that (i) she was subject to an adverse employment action—her termination—(ii) it was taken against her because of her protected status, and (iii) her comparators who are another race were not fired. This meets the Swierkiewicz requirements. See Cicalese v. Univ. of Texas Med. Branch, 924 F.3d 762, 768 (5th Cir. 2019) ("The district court erred by holding [the plaintiffs] to a heightened pleading standard. The court's analysis of the complaint's allegations—scrutinizing whether [the plaintiffs'] fellow employees were really 'similarly situated' and whether [their superiors'] derogatory statements about Italians amounted to 'stray remarks'—was more suited to the summary judgment phase.").

Furthermore, although a plaintiff does "not have to submit evidence to establish a prima facie case of discrimination [under McDonnell Douglas] at this stage, [she must] plead sufficient facts on all of the ultimate elements of a disparate treatment claim to make [her] case plausible." Chhim v. Univ. of Texas at Austin, 836 F.3d 467, 470 (5th Cir. 2016) (per curiam). While it is not required at this stage, "it can be 'helpful to reference' [the McDonnell Douglas] framework when the court is determining whether a plaintiff has plausibly alleged the ultimate elements of the disparate treatment claim" because the plaintiff will eventually need to satisfactorily assert each element of the McDonnell Douglas test to meet her burden to recover. Olivarez, 997 F.3d at 600 (internal quotations omitted).

CBC concedes for the purposes of the pleading standards set out in Twombly and Iqbal that Briceno-Belmontes meets the first three prongs of the McDonnell Douglas test but disputes that the fourth prong is satisfied. (Dkt. No. 21 at 12 n.1). The Court disagrees. Briceno-Belmontes pleads sufficiently similar comparators who are of different races but who were not fired for the same conduct. This is enough at the Rule 12(b)(6) stage. Yes, whether Boamah and Jambers are "similarly situated" to Briceno-Belmontes is a question of law and faces a demanding standard in this Circuit, see Lee v. Kansas City S. Ry. Co., 574 F.3d 253, 259–60 (5th Cir. 2009), but that is for the Court to determine at the summary judgment stage. To impose such a rigorous inquiry at the pleading stage, when discovery has not occurred, would make it nearly impossible to bring a circumstantial case of employment discrimination.

C. RETALIATION CLAIM

5 To establish Title VII retaliation, a plaintiff must show that (1) she engaged in protected activity; (2) she suffered an adverse employment action; and (3) a causal link exists between the protected activity and the adverse employment action. Wright v. Union Pac. R.R. Co., 990 F.3d 428, 433 (5th Cir. 2021). For the following reasons, the Court finds that Briceno-Belmontes has stated a plausible claim.

1. Protected Activity

The first element of a Title VII retaliation claim requires the plaintiff to have engaged in protected activity. The Fifth Circuit explained, "An employee has engaged in activity protected by Title VII if she has either (1) 'opposed any practice made an unlawful employment practice' by Title VII or (2) 'made a charge, testified, assisted, or participated in any manner in an investigation, proceeding, or hearing' under Title VII." Long v. Eastfield Coll., 88 F.3d 300, 304 (5th Cir. 1996) (citing 42 U.S.C. § 2000e–3(a))

CBC argues that, for the purposes of the Rule 12(b)(6) pleading standard, the only two activities that Briceno-Belmontes engaged in that are protected by Title VII are the instances in which she internally complained to CBC administrators about national origin discrimination. (Dkt. No. 21 at 18–19). Those were in February and May 2019. (Id.) Briceno-Belmontes states in her Response, "Plaintiff engaged in protected activity in the month before [she was fired. That is,] in May 2019." (Dkt. No. 22 ¶ 13). Briceno-Belmontes does not state what the protected activity was in which she engaged.

Reading the Second Amended Complaint in the light most favorable to Briceno-Belmontes, the Court finds that she engaged in activity protected by Title VII on at least two occasions —both times she complained internally about national origin discrimination in February and May 2019. (Dkt. No. 18 at ¶ 14). Bringing allegations of national origin discrimination to one's superiors is opposing a practice that is protected by Title VII. Long, 88 F.3d at 304.

2. Adverse Employment Action

The next inquiry is whether Briceno-Belmontes has pleaded facts sufficient to demonstrate that CBC took an adverse employment action against her. CBC argues the only adverse employment action was the firing of Briceno-Belmontes on June 10, 2019. (Dkt. No. 21 at 19). Briceno-Belmontes agrees. (Dkt. No. 22 at ¶ 13).

3. Causal Connection

The last element of a Title VII retaliation claim is a causal connection between the protected activity and the adverse employment action. CBC claims that Briceno-Belmontes does not establish the requisite causal connection. First, CBC argues Briceno-Belmontes "does not identify who made the decision to terminate her employment, nor does she allege whether that person was aware of her allegedly protected complaint(s)." (Dkt. No. 21 at 20). Second, CBC asserts that Briceno-Belmontes cannot rely on the temporal proximity of her internal complaints and her firing to create a causal connection. (Id.).

Briceno-Belmontes does not provide much of a response to CBC's causation argument.

She does not address CBC's contention that she needs to identify a decisionmaker as to her firing and plead facts sufficient to support a finding that this person was aware of her internal complaints. In the single paragraph devoted to the retaliation claim in her Response, Briceno-Belmontes states that the one-month difference between her complaint to the administrators and her firing is enough to create an inference of causation. (Dkt. No. 22 at ¶ 13). At this juncture, the Court agrees with Briceno-Belmontes.

6 As with a Title VII discrimination claim, at the pleading stage of a Title VII retaliation claim, a plaintiff need not make out a prima facie case of retaliation to survive a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss. Wright, 990 F.3d at 433. Rather, she only needs to plausibly allege facts "going to the ultimate elements of the claim." Id. Briceno-Belmontes satisfies her pleading burden. Her protected activities are her two instances of internal complaints of national origin discrimination. It is uncontested that her firing was an adverse employment action. And, reading the facts alleged in the light most favorable to Briceno-Belmontes, the Court could reasonably infer that CBC terminated her because of her complaints of national origin discrimination.

CBC is correct that, "to establish the causation prong of a retaliation claim, the employee should demonstrate that the employer knew about the employee's protected activity." Manning v. Chevron Chem. Co., 332 F.3d 874, 883 (5th Cir. 2003). This is because "quite logically, if an employer is unaware of an employee's protected conduct at the time of the adverse employment action, the employer plainly could not have retaliated against the employee based on that conduct." Wright, 990 F.3d at 434 (cleaned up).

Here, Briceno-Belmontes has met her burden for the moment. Briceno-Belmontes raised her internal complaint of national origin discrimination to her superiors Ramirez, Barrera, Ganceres, and Villarreal. (Dkt. No. 18 at ¶¶ 14, 23). At the motion to dismiss stage, complaining of national origin discrimination to the human resources manager, the student services director, the dean of student services, and the site director is enough to infer that the employer had knowledge of the employee's protected activity—even though Briceno-Belmontes does not state specifically who fired her. After all, pleading enough facts to state a plausible claim of retaliation "simply calls for enough facts to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence" sufficient to state a claim. Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556, 127 S.Ct. at 1965. Discovery will reveal whether the decisionmaker(s) had actual knowledge of Briceno-Belmontes's protected activity, or if she can advance a cat's paw theory, or neither. See, e.g., Zamora v. City Of Houston, 798 F.3d 326, 331 (5th Cir. 2015) ("Under [the cat's paw] theory, a plaintiff must establish that the person with a retaliatory motive somehow influenced the decisionmaker to take the retaliatory action.").

Now for the heart of the causation dispute. Briceno-Belmontes maintains that the proximity of the second complaint to the administrators in May 2019 and her firing in June 2019 is enough to create an inference of causation. (Dkt. No. 22 ¶ 13). CBC vigorously disagrees. (Dkt. No. 21 at 20–21); (Dkt. No. 23 at 5). CBC makes a two-point argument, which it says is dispositive: (1) the Court must measure the difference between the February 2019 complaint and Briceno-Belmontes's firing —not the May 2019 complaint and her firing; and (2) that four months' difference between the complaint and her firing is too long to create an inference of causation as a matter of law. The Court agrees with Briceno-Belmontes.

First, the cases cited by CBC are distinguishable. CBC provides the Court only with authority at the summary judgment stage for its propositions.[3] At the summary judgment or post-trial stage, the parties have conducted meaningful discovery to unearth the factual record. In contrast, at the motion to dismiss stage the Court's sole duty is to "[focus] on the allegations in the pleadings, not whether a plaintiff actually has sufficient evidence to succeed on the merits." Ferrer v. Chevron Corp., 484 F.3d 776, 782 (5th Cir. 2007).

7 Second, CBC's line of argument is a tacit recognition that if Briceno-Belmontes's pleading had no mention of her February 2019 complaint, CBC would have no basis to object to the use of her May 2019 complaint and the June 2019 firing to create an inference of causation See, e.g., Outley v. Luke & Assocs., Inc., 840 F.3d 212, 219 (5th Cir. 2016) (concluding that about two months' difference is close enough to show a prima facie causal connection, even in the more onerous summary judgment context). It is Alkhawaldeh, CBC asserts, that mandates dismissal because Alkhawaldeh holds that three to four months' delay between a protected activity and an adverse employment action is insufficient to create an inference, 851 F.3d at 428 n.23, and "a Title VII claimant cannot, with each protected activity, re-start 'the temporal-proximity clock.' " Id. The Court disagrees. Again, Alkhawaldeh was a summary judgment appeal in a case that was brought under the McDonnell Douglas framework. It follows then that the Fifth Circuit would foreclose subsequent protected activity, standing alone, from restarting the "temporal-proximity clock" after the plaintiff had the benefit of discovery. That is, it is logical that the Fifth Circuit would hold plaintiffs to a higher standard at that stage of a case—but at this stage, it is too much.

Garayalde-Rijos v. Municipality of Carolina, from the First Circuit, is instructive. 747 F.3d 15 (1st Cir. 2014). Garayalde-Rijos considers the use of temporal proximity to satisfy the causation requirement under a Title VII retaliation claim, but at the Rule 12(b)(6) stage, unlike CBC's cited cases. There, the First Circuit explained:

> The parties have directed us to no case dismissing a Title VII retaliation claim under Rule 12(b)(6) utilizing only a temporal analysis to defeat causation allegations. Once a complaint has alleged enough facts that retaliation for protected conduct is plausible, the plaintiff is entitled to proceed to discovery .... And discovery might unearth evidence of retaliation such that at summary judgment or > trial, the plaintiff will not have to rely heavily on the "temporal proximity" between protected conduct and adverse actions to prove her case.

Garayalde-Rijos, 747 F.3d at 25 n.8 (emphasis in original).

The purpose of a Rule 12(b)(6) motion is to test the sufficiency of the complaint, not to decide the merits of the case. Therefore, the Court finds that Briceno-Belmontes has pleaded sufficient facts showing a causal connection between her protected activity and her firing that would permit the inference that CBC fired her because of her protected activity. See Wright, 990 F.3d at 434.

IV. CONCLUSION

Considering the foregoing analysis, the Court DENIES CBC's Motion to Dismiss.[4] (Dkt. No. 21).

It is SO ORDERED.

All Citations

Not Reported in Fed. Supp., 2022 WL 673854

Footnotes

1 See also Alkhawaldeh v. Dow Chem. Co., 851 F.3d 422, 426 (5th Cir. 2017). Under the McDonnell Douglas test, a plaintiff must first make a prima facie showing of employment discrimination by demonstrating that she: (1) is a member of a protected class; (2) was qualified for the position that she held; (3) was subject to an adverse employment action; and (4) was treated less favorably than others similarly situated outside her protected class. Id. Once the employee makes a prima facie case, the burden "shifts to the employer to articulate a legitimate, non-discriminatory reason for the adverse employment action." Id. If the employer can articulate such a reason, the burden shifts back to the employee to demonstrate that the employer's proffered reason is just a "pretext for discrimination." Id.

2 "Disparate-treatment discrimination addresses employment actions that treat an employee worse than others based on the employee's race, color, religion, sex, or national origin. In such disparate-treatment cases, proof and finding of discriminatory motive is required." Cicalese v. Univ. of Tex. Med. Branch, 924 F.3d 762, 766 (5th Cir. 2019) (internal quotations and citation omitted).

3 In its Motion to Dismiss, CBC relies on: Harville v. City of Houston, Mississippi, 935 F.3d 404 (5th Cir. 2019) (withdrawn) (post–summary judgment appeal); Gorman

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

v. Verizon Wireless Tex., L.L.C., 753 F.3d 165 (5th Cir. 2014) (post–summary judgment appeal); Strong v. Univ. Healthcare Sys., L.L.C., 482 F.3d 802 (5th Cir. 2007) (post–summary judgment appeal); and Widder v. Tex. A&M Univ. Corpus Christi, No. 2:11-CV-00282, 2012 WL 3776477 (S.D. Tex. Aug. 29, 2012) (summary judgment). In its Reply, CBC again cites the withdrawn Harville opinion and cites Alkhawaldeh, 851 F.3d at 428 n.23 (post–summary judgment) and Perkins v. Child Care Assocs., 751 F. App'x 469 (5th Cir. 2018) (per curiam) (unpublished and summary judgment).

4 CBC's Motion to Dismiss also briefed that Briceno-Belmontes failed to plead a hostile work environment claim, (Dkt. No. 21 at 9, 17–18), even though Briceno-Belmontes's Second Amended Complaint only brings two counts—for national origin discrimination and retaliation, (Dkt. No. 18 at ¶¶ 31–40). CBC did this out of caution because Briceno-Belmontes states in her factual resume that "she was subjected to harassment on account of her national origin." (Dkt. No. 21 at 17) citing (Dkt. No. 18 at ¶ 12). In her Response, Briceno-Belmontes acknowledges that she only brings a national origin discrimination claim and a retaliation claim by again not addressing a hostile work environment claim.

End of Document

© 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

CASE NO. 19

2020 WL 4261253
Only the Westlaw citation
is currently available.
United States District Court, S.D.
Texas, Corpus Christi Division.

Jose Romero PEREZ, Plaintiff,
v.
BROOKS COUNTY, TEXAS, Defendant.

Civil Action
No.
2
:
19
-
CV
-
391
|

Signed 07/24/2020

Attorneys and Law Firms

Charles C. Smith, Attorney at Law, Corpus Christi, TX, for Plaintiff.

Rebecca S. Hayward, Ricardo J. Navarro, Denton Navarro Rocha Bernal & Zech, P.C., Harlingen, TX, for Defendant.

ORDER

NELVA GONZALES RAMOS, UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE

1 Plaintiff Jose Romero Perez filed this action against his former employer, Defendant Brooks County, Texas, alleging causes of action arising from his termination after suffering on-the-job injuries. D.E. 1, 14. Before the Court is Defendant's Rule 12 Motion to Dismiss Plaintiff's Second Amended Complaint for Failure to State a Claim. D.E. 15. Plaintiff responded (D.E. 16) and Defendant replied (D.E. 17). For the reasons stated below, the motion is GRANTED IN PART and DENIED IN PART.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

The test of pleadings under Rule 12(b)(6) is devised to balance a party's right to redress against the interests of all parties and the court in minimizing expenditure of time, money, and resources devoted to meritless claims. Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 558 (2007). Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a)(2) requires only "a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief." Furthermore, "Pleadings must be construed so as to do justice." Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(e). The requirement that the pleader show that he is entitled to relief requires "more than labels and conclusions[;] a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555 (citing Papasan v. Allain, 478 U.S. 265, 286 (1986)).

Factual allegations are required, sufficient to raise the entitlement to relief above the level of mere speculation. Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555. Those factual allegations must then be taken as true, even if doubtful. Id. In other words, the pleader must make allegations that take the claim from conclusory to factual and beyond possible to plausible. Id. at 557. The Twombly court stated, "[W]e do not require heightened fact pleading of specifics, but only enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." Id. at 570.

The Supreme Court, elaborating on Twombly, stated, "The plausibility standard is not akin to a 'probability requirement,' but it asks for more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678 (2009). "Threadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements, do not suffice." Id. In dismissing the claim in Iqbal, the Supreme Court stated, "It is the conclusory nature of respondent's allegations, rather than their extravagantly fanciful nature, that disentitles them to the presumption of truth." Id. at 681.

FACTS

2 Taking the facts alleged as true pursuant to the standard of review, the salient events set out in Plaintiff's second amended complaint form the following timeline:

February 1, 2002 Brooks County hired Plaintiff to work as a full-time operator for its Road and Bridge Department.

February 2003 Plaintiff sustained an on-the-job injury to his back while operating a backhoe. Plaintiff's supervisor, Ruben Gutierrez, filled out an injury report and told him to seek medical attention.

Pursuant to his orthopedic surgeon's treatment plan, Plaintiff was off work for two months for physical therapy.

Plaintiff declined surgery for his herniated disc.

Two Months Later Plaintiff returned to work for the Road and Bridge Department and, after sitting too long as a driver-operator, he complained of back pain.

The Next Day Gutierrez assigned Plaintiff to light duty as a spotter at the County Landfill, where his duties included checking trash, directing others as to where to put the trash, and infrequently operating a backhoe.

The Next Several Years Plaintiff continued to work at the County Landfill, through a succession of supervisors, including Alan Hernandez and ending with David Guerra.

June 9, 2017 Plaintiff experienced an on-the-job injury to his right shoulder.He reported the injury to Supervisor Hernandez and filed a Texas workers' compensation claim.

The Next Several Months Plaintiff was under the care of Doctor Pechero and the Rio Grande Valley Orthopedic Center. He was examined, tested, and diagnosed with a physiological condition affecting his neurological and ambulatory systems. This has an effect on his ability to perform certain manual tasks and is at least part of the cause of a rotator cuff problem. He was treated for this, with appropriate periodic work status reports being provided and signed by his physician.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

September 2017 Plaintiff had surgery to repair four torn ligaments from his June 9, 2017 injury.

March 9, 2018 Plaintiff continued with follow-up appointments with the Orthopedic Center and the resulting series of status reports indicated that his injury had prevented his return to work and that he could not return until May 4, 2018.

April 3, 2018 A Senior Workers' Compensation Adjuster for the Texas Association of Counties Risk Management Pool began a review of Plaintiff's injury and treatment, communicating with Defendant's Human Resources (HR) representative regarding an intention to seek an independent medical examination.

May 1, 2018 There were no medical findings that Plaintiff had healed from his June 9, 2017 injury. Nevertheless, he claims that, despite his medical condition and failure to return to work, he was able to perform the essential functions of his job as a spotter at the County Landfill.

First Week of May 2018 Plaintiff had an MRI at the Orthopedic Center, which indicated that he would need a second shoulder surgery and that he could not return to work until May 21, 2018.

May 21, 2018 Plaintiff obtained another status report signed by his physician, indicating that he could not return to work until August 20, 2018.

May 23, 2018 Supervisor Guerra contacted Plaintiff and instructed him to report to work for the Road and Bridge Department (not the County Landfill) on May 29, 2018.

As a result of the unexplained change in assignment and supervisor, Plaintiff was concerned that his prior light duty accommodation had been rescinded. Plaintiff requested an accommodation from Defendant, but his request was refused by its supervisory staff.

May 24, 2018 The adjuster for the Risk Management Pool informed Defendant's HR department that Plaintiff's recent MRI confirmed a recurrent full thickness tear associated with his shoulder injury. The plan at that time was to hold off on the independent medical examination and, instead, obtain peer review of Plaintiff's medical records.

Plaintiff confronted Supervisor Guerra about an unverified, unsubstantiated, and unsigned "amended" status report on which Guerra was apparently relying in formulating his directive that Plaintiff was to return to work. And Plaintiff disputed a manufactured claim that he had stated that he would injure himself (as he had never said such a thing and was already injured).

3 Plaintiff went to Guerra's office and produced his May 21, 2018 status report, revealing work restrictions through August 20, 2018. In particular, Plaintiff's work restrictions included no pushing, pulling, overhead reaching, lifting, or carrying. Guerra made a copy of it and indicated that there was something wrong with the documentation of Plaintiff's injury, but he nevertheless insisted that Plaintiff return to work on May 29, 2018.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

May 29, 2018 Plaintiff reported to work and was assigned to pick up trash while carrying a bucket and a trash grabber. Plaintiff asked Guerra to call his superiors to ask why he was being put to work despite his unresolved injury. After working several hours, Plaintiff's right hand and wrist became noticeably swollen. Before clocking out for lunch, he reported his condition to Guerra. About one hour after Plaintiff clocked back in after lunch, Guerra took him to HR where his employment was terminated with allegations that Plaintiff had followed through on a threat to hurt himself.

June 4, 2018 The Risk Management Pool adjuster informed HR that Plaintiff was in need of additional surgery and that temporary income benefits would continue.

August 21, 2018 Noting that the last status report indicated that Plaintiff could return to work on August 20, 2018, HR emailed the Risk Management Pool adjuster about the DWC Form 1.

September 6, 2018 Plaintiff had a surgical procedure involving "right shoulder subacromial decompressions with RCT repair."

November 18, 2018 Plaintiff filed his EEOC complaint.

September 25, 2019 The EEOC provided Plaintiff with a right to sue letter.

DISCUSSION

Defendant complains at the outset of its motion that, while Plaintiff's second amended complaint sets out five numbered recitations of claims, it discerns only three causes of action. Comparing the amended complaint, motion to dismiss, and response, the Court reads Plaintiff as attempting to claim:

1. Disability discrimination in the form of a violation of equal rights under unspecified law, which could include the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment (D.E. 14, ¶¶ 48-52);

2. Disability discrimination under the basic anti-discrimination provision of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), § 12112(a) (D.E. 14, ¶¶ 48-52);

3. Disability discrimination in the form of failure to accommodate Plaintiff's disability under the ADA, §§ 12111(9), 12112(b) (D.E. 14, ¶¶ 53-58; D.E. 15, p. 2; D.E. 16, ¶¶ 11, 14);

4. Disability discrimination in the form of failure to engage in an interactive process to generate an accommodation for Plaintiff's disability (D.E. 14, ¶ 33);

5. Retaliation for complaints made to Supervisor Guerra upon being ordered back to work (D.E. 14, ¶¶ 59-63; D.E. 15, p.5; D.E. 16, ¶ 17);

6. Deliberate indifference to Plaintiff's unspecified constitutional rights (D.E. 14, ¶¶ 64-66; D.E. 16, ¶ 17); and

7. Violation of Plaintiff's First Amendment rights, through 42 U.S.C. § 1983 (D.E. 14, ¶¶ 67-69; D.E. 15, p.1).

The viability of each is discussed below.

A. Disability Discrimination in the Form of a Violation of Equal Protection

4 On its face, Plaintiff's first cause of action is pled in the form of an equal protection challenge under the Fourteenth Amendment, although it does not use those terms. He claims that his disability placed him in a protected class and that he was treated differently than those who were similarly situated outside the protected class. D.E. 14, p. 15. Setting aside Plaintiff's failure to name a single similarly situated comparator, it is clear that Plaintiff has not alleged a viable equal protection claim under the United States Constitution.

Disability is not a class that supports an equal protection challenge.

> [T]he result of Cleburne is that States are not required by the Fourteenth Amendment to make special accommodations for the disabled, so long as their actions toward such individuals are rational. They could quite hardheadedly—and perhaps hardheartedly—hold to job-qualification requirements which do not make allowance for the disabled. If special accommodations for the disabled are to be required, they have to come from positive law and not through the Equal Protection Clause.

Bd. of Trustees of Univ. of Ala. v. Garrett, 531 U.S. 356, 367–68 (2001) (referring to City of Cleburne, Tex. v. Cleburne Living Ctr., 473 U.S. 432 (1985)). To the extent that Plaintiff seeks to raise an equal protection challenge, the motion is GRANTED IN PART and the claim is DISMISSED.

B. Disability Discrimination under ADA § 12112(a)

The "positive law" that protects a disabled individual from employment discrimination is embodied in the ADA. The general rules states:

> No covered entity shall discriminate against a qualified individual on the basis of disability in regard to job application procedures, the hiring, advancement, or discharge of employees, employee compensation, job training, and other terms, conditions, and privileges of employment.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

42 U.S.C. § 12112(a). When relying on circumstantial evidence of discrimination,[1] a prima facie case involves four elements: (1) plaintiff is disabled or is regarded as disabled; (2) he is qualified for the job; (3) he was subjected to an adverse employment action on account of his disability; and (4) he was replaced by or treated less favorably than non-disabled employees. Gowesky, 321 F.3d at 511.

Mindful that this case is at the pleading stage, the Court liberally construes the second amended complaint to satisfy the first and third elements of his discrimination claim. He pleads that he has a physical impairment that substantially limits his ability to perform manual tasks, lift, and work and that affects his neurological and ambulatory function. See 42 U.S.C. § 12102(1)(A) & (2). He suffered termination immediately after complaining that his disability was exacerbated by his work assignment, which is a classic adverse employment action. See, 42 U.S.C. § 12112(a); EEOC v. Chevron Phillips Chem. Co., LP, 570 F.3d 606, 622 (5th Cir. 2009).

The second and fourth elements, however, are not adequately pled. With respect to whether he is qualified for the job, his pleading is conclusory and contradicted by his other factual pleadings. Specifically, he pleads:

- He has a physiological condition that makes him prone to physical injury;

5 • He sustained a major back injury while assigned to the Road and Bridge Department;

- He sustained a major shoulder injury while assigned to light duty at the County Landfill;

- He had not yet recovered from the shoulder injury and thus could not return to his County Landfill job;

- He vehemently objected to reassignment to the Road and Bridge Department because he could not perform the essential functions of the job there; and

- In the course of working one-half day in the Road and Bridge Department, he exacerbated his shoulder injury, when he should not have been working at all because of his disability.

D.E. 14. These are not facts that would support a finding that Plaintiff was a qualified individual for any of Defendant's relevant positions.

To be qualified, Plaintiff must, with or without reasonable accommodation, be able to perform the essential functions of the employment position that he holds or desires. 42 U.S.C. § 12111(8). Plaintiff pleads that he cannot perform the essential functions of work in the Road and Bridge Department and he has actively resisted his assignment to that department. He further pleads that, even with his accommodation of light duty with the County Landfill, he got injured performing the basic functions of the job and was not medically released to return to work.

The Supreme Court has defined an otherwise qualified person as "one who is able to meet all of a program's requirements in spite of his handicap." Southeastern Cmty. Coll. v. Davis, 442 U.S. 397, 406 (1979). "The definition of a qualified handicapped individual also includes a personal safety requirement—an otherwise qualified handicapped individual is defined as one who 'can perform the essential functions of the position in question without endangering the health and safety of the individual or others.' " Chandler v. City of Dallas, 2 F.3d 1385, 1393 (5th Cir. 1993) (quoting Chiari v. City of League City, 920 F.2d 311, 317 (5th Cir. 1991)).

Plaintiff does not allege that he can safely perform the essential functions of either position. Rather, he has pled that, while performing those essential functions, he was and will continue to be injured because of his underlying disability. He has affirmatively pled himself out of the required element of being qualified.

Last, as noted above, Plaintiff does not name a comparator or describe other circumstances to satisfy the fourth element: that he was replaced by, or treated less favorably than, a non-disabled employee. Thus, Plaintiff has failed to plead a prima facie case of disability discrimination under ADA § 12112(a). The motion is GRANTED IN PART and the Court DISMISSES Plaintiff's claim for disability discrimination by disparate treatment.

C. Disability Discrimination Under ADA § 12112(b): Failure to Accommodate/ Failure to Engage in Interactive Process

In addition to the basic disability discrimination case addressed above, an individual can claim discrimination in the form of a failure to accommodate a disability under ADA § 12112(b):

> As used in subsection (a), the term "discriminate against a qualified individual on the basis of disability" includes—
>
> 6 ...
>
> (5)(A) not making reasonable accommodations to the known physical or mental limitations of an otherwise qualified individual with a disability who is an applicant or employee, unless such covered entity can demonstrate that the accommodation would impose an undue hardship on the operation of the business of such covered entity; or
>
> (B) denying employment opportunities to a job applicant or employee who is an otherwise qualified individual with a disability, if such denial is based on the need of such covered entity to make reasonable accommodation to the physical or mental impairments of the employee or applicant;
>
> ....

42 U.S.C. § 12112 (emphasis added). The elements of a failure to accommodate claim are: (1) plaintiff is a qualified individual with a disability; (2) defendant knew of the disability and its consequential limitations; and (3) defendant failed to reasonably accommodate those known limitations. Anderson v. Harrison Cnty., Miss., 639 Fed. App'x 1010, 1015 (5th Cir. 2016) (citing Feist v. La. Dep't of Justice, Office of the Attorney Gen., 730 F.3d 450, 452 (5th Cir. 2013)).

As noted above, Plaintiff has not pled that he is a qualified individual. In connection with his failure-to-accommodate claim, he appears to imply that he would be qualified if extended a reasonable accommodation. After all, "The term 'qualified individual' means an individual who, with or without reasonable accommodation, can perform the essential functions of the employment position that such individual holds or desires." 42 U.S.C. § 12111(8) (emphasis added).

In that regard, Defendant challenges Plaintiff's pleadings as failing to allege that (a) he made a request for an accommodation[2] and (b) a specific reasonable accommodation was available. These are issues on which Plaintiff bears the burden of proof. See generally, Johnson v. Gambrinus Co., 116 F.3d 1052, 1059 (5th Cir. 1997). While he pled that he requested an accommodation at the time that his supervisor required him to return to work and then terminated him, he did not plead any particular reasonable accommodation that would render him qualified for the position. The only accommodation he mentions is the transfer to the County Landfill, which was insufficient—by facts apparent in his own pleadings—to qualify him for work. And requesting an indefinite amount of time off (paid or unpaid) is not a reasonable accommodation. Delaval v. PTech Drilling Tubulars, L.L.C., 824 F.3d 476, 481 (5th Cir. 2016). So Plaintiff has not pled a failure to accommodate. The motion is GRANTED IN PART and that claim is DISMISSED.

7 Plaintiff contends that his allegations that Defendant failed to engage in an interactive fact-gathering process to generate a reasonable accommodation is a separate claim. This position is supported by Gardea v. DialAmerica Mktg., Inc., EP-12-CV-158-KC, 2013 WL 1855794, at *6 (W.D. Tex. Apr. 30, 2013). "Under the ADA, once the employee presents a request for an accommodation, the employer is required to engage in the interactive process so that together they can determine what reasonable accommodations might be available." Chevron, 570 F.3d at 622.

Defendant has failed to address this as a separate claim. Neither has Defendant briefed any basis for not treating it as a separate claim or for treating the request as futile. For that reason, the motion is DENIED IN PART and the Court RETAINS Plaintiff's claim for failure to engage in an interactive process toward an accommodation of his disability.

D. Retaliation for Complaints of Discrimination

The elements of a claim for retaliation under the ADA are that (1) plaintiff participated in a protected activity; (2) defendant took an adverse employment action against him; and (3) a causal connection exists between the protected activity and the adverse action." Clark v. Charter Commc'ns, L.L.C., 775 Fed. App'x 764, 767 (5th Cir. 2019) (citing Feist, 730 F.3d at 454). Plaintiff has not set out the specific facts on which he relies for his retaliation claim. Reading his complaint generously, there are three different events that could conceivably trigger a retaliation claim:

- He filed a workers' compensation claim for his February 2003 back injury;

- He filed a workers' compensation claim for his June 2017 shoulder injury; and
- He objected to the May 23, 2018 order to return to work.

D.E. 14.

As a result of both workers' compensation claims, Plaintiff was directed to seek medical attention and received time off from work. Nothing in the pleading or briefing asserts an adverse employment action causally related to either of his compensation claims. In fact, his complaint states, "Plaintiff's employment with Brooks County was not placed in jeopardy until after May 23, 2018 and May 24, 2018 when Plaintiff questioned and challenged the May 23, 2018 notice to return to work." D.E. 14, ¶ 44.

That leaves the objection to the order to return to work. Defendant challenges the retaliation claim arising from this event on the basis that Plaintiff complains of unspecified policies, his allegations are conclusory, and he fails to show how his complaints amount to a protected activity. Defendant reads the complaint too narrowly, in violation of the standard of review. Plaintiff's outcry included not only objections based on Defendant's own policies, but the fact that he was not yet medically released to return to his job and the work order involved being placed in a position with greater physical demands than the position he had left. Plaintiff clearly pleads that he wanted to avoid returning to the Road and Bridge Department and to remain in his less demanding job at the County Landfill.

This outcry can be construed as a request for an accommodation. Requesting an accommodation is a protected activity. Jenkins v. Cleco Power, LLC, 487 F.3d 309, 316 & n.3 (5th Cir. 2007). As mentioned, termination is an adverse employment action —a proposition Defendant does not contest. And while Defendant challenges the pleading of a causal connection, it is clear from the allegations that the termination followed just a few days after the protected activity, which is sufficient to support causation. Clark Cnty. Sch. Dist. v. Breeden, 532 U.S. 268, 273 (2001) (holding that a "very close" temporal relationship between the protected activity and the adverse action can support a prima facie case of causation, citing cases with temporal proximity of three to four months as sufficient).

8 Thus, in the context of Rule 12(b)(6), the Court finds that Plaintiff has adequately pled a cause of action for retaliation based on his objection to returning to work in May 2018. The motion is DENIED IN PART and the Court RETAINS the retaliation claim.

E. First Amendment Violations

The outcry does not fare as well in the context of a First Amendment claim. A prima facie free-speech retaliation claim requires pleading "four elements: (1) he suffered an adverse employment action; (2) his speech involved a matter of public concern; (3) his interest in commenting on matters of public concern outweighs the employer's interest in promoting efficiency; and (4) his speech motivated the employer's adverse employment action." Salge v. Edna Indep. Sch. Dist., 411 F.3d 178, 184 (5th Cir. 2005).

While satisfying the first and fourth elements, Plaintiff's pleading does not address any public concern as required by the second element. Neither does it suggest that any public concern outweighs the employer's legitimate interests regarding its workforce as required by the third element. The issue was a private one: whether it was appropriate to order Plaintiff back to work before he was medically released and whether the position to which he would return should involve some accommodation of his particular physical needs. This failure to meet the second and third requirements for this First Amendment claim was not addressed in Plaintiff's response to the motion to dismiss. In fact, there was no mention of this claim whatsoever in his defense of the complaint.

Plaintiff has failed to state a First Amendment claim. He has cited no other constitutional claim, and thereby has failed to state a claim under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. Consequently, the motion is GRANTED IN PART and the Court DISMISSES the claims that he lists in his second amended complaint as his fourth and fifth causes of action. D.E. 14.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons set out above, the motion to dismiss (D.E. 15) is GRANTED IN PART and the Court DISMISSES: (1) Plaintiff's claim for disability discrimination to the extent that it is couched in terms of equal protection; (2) Plaintiff's claim for disability discrimination under ADA § 12112(a); (3) Plaintiff's claim for failure to accommodate his disability under ADA § 12112(b); (4) Plaintiff's claim for retaliation based on his exercise of free speech; and (5) Plaintiff's unspecified constitutional claims brought under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. The motion is DENIED IN PART and the Court RETAINS: (1) Plaintiff's claim for failure to engage in an interactive process to generate potential accommodations for his disability; and (2) Plaintiff's claim for retaliation for seeking an accommodation for his disability. The Court DENIES without prejudice Plaintiff's general request for leave to amend his complaint because Plaintiff has failed to apprise the Court of the substance of any intended amendment so as to demonstrate that it would not be futile.

ORDERED this 24th day of July, 2020.

All Citations

Not Reported in Fed. Supp., 2020 WL 4261253

Footnotes

1 Plaintiff has pled his disability discrimination claim in the form prescribed for a claim based on circumstantial evidence. Such a claim uses the McDonnell Douglas burden-shifting framework. Gowesky v. Singing River Hosp. Sys., 321 F.3d 503, 511 (5th Cir. 2003); McDonnell Douglas Corp. v. Green, 411 U.S. 792, 802 (1973). He does not plead or argue a direct evidence discrimination claim.

2 When an employee's limitations caused by a disability are not "open and obvious" to the employer, it is the employee's responsibility to notify the employer of the limitations and suggest a reasonable accommodation. Chevron, 570 F.3d at 621 (citing Taylor v. Principal Fin. Grp., Inc., 93 F.3d 155, 165 (5th Cir.1996)). We need not be concerned with this rule because, whether or not Plaintiff's disability was open and obvious, he did plead that he made the request for an accommodation.

End of Document

© 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

CASE NO. 20

779 F.Supp.3d 910
United States District Court, S.D. Texas, Corpus Christi Division.

Chic HENDERSON, Plaintiff,
v.
WELLS FARGO BANK, Defendant.

CIVIL ACTION NO. 2:23-CV-00166
|
Signed March 31, 2025

Synopsis

Background: Customer brought state court action against bank, alleging bank failed to provide fraud protection services and allowed unauthorized third-party access to customer's account before wire transfer occurred, and asserting claims for breach of contract and negligence. Following removal to federal court, the United States District Court for the Southern District of Texas, Julie K. Hampton, United States Magistrate Judge, 2024 WL 5184469, issued a memorandum and recommendation to grant bank's motion to dismiss customer's action. Customer filed objections.

Holdings: The District Court, David S. Morales, J., adopted in part and rejected in part memorandum and recommendation and held that:

[1] customer's claim for breach of contract was not preempted by Article 4A of Uniform Commercial Code (UCC);

[2] customer's claim for negligence premised on third-party access to account was not preempted by Article 4A;

[3] customer's claim for negligence alleging bank's failure to recall transferred funds was preempted by Article 4A;

[4] customer stated claim for breach of contract; but

[5] customer failed to state negligence claim.

Motion granted in part and denied in part.

Procedural Posture(s): Motion to Dismiss for Failure to State a Claim; Motion to Amend the Complaint.

West Headnotes (18)

[1] United States Magistrate Judges Plain error, clear error, and manifest injustice review

As to any portion for which no objection to findings and recommendations of a magistrate judge is filed, district court reviews for clearly erroneous factual findings and conclusions of law. 28 U.S.C.A. § 636(b)(1).

1 Case that cites this headnote

[2] Finance, Banking, and Credit Funds Transfers

To the extent the conduct falls within the scope of Article 4A of the

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Texas Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), the statute controls, whether the common law is inconsistent or duplicative of it. Tex. Bus. & C. Code § 4A.102.

[3] Finance, Banking, and Credit 🔑 Funds Transfers

When claims are based on alleged conduct occurring before or after an automated funds transfer, they are not preempted by Article 4A of the Texas Uniform Commercial Code (UCC). Tex. Bus. & C. Code § 4A.102.

[4] Finance, Banking, and Credit 🔑 Funds Transfers

When evaluating if a claim is preempted by Article 4A of the Texas Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), courts consider if additional facts or conduct potentially lying outside the scope of Article 4A are at issue; if the conduct is not squarely addressed by Article 4A's provisions, preemption is less likely to apply. Tex. Bus. & C. Code § 4A.102.

[5] Finance, Banking, and Credit 🔑 Unauthorized orders; effect of fraud or other misconduct

Finance, Banking, and Credit 🔑 Banks and similar financial institutions, obligations and practices of Bank customer's claim against bank for breach of contract, alleging bank's failure to uphold promised fraud protection and to prevent third-party access to his account, was not preempted by Article 4A of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), as adopted in Texas, in customer's action arising from fraudulent activity that culminated in customer wiring funds based on fraudsters' instructions; underlying contract did not involve a security procedure under Article 4A, and customer alleged neither failure to verify identity nor errors in transmission of funds, but instead customer sued bank for allowing unauthorized third parties to access his banking information prior to the transfer process and for bank's failure to notice the activity and inform customer of it. Tex. Bus. & C. Code §§ 4A.102, 4A.201.

More cases on this issue

[6] Finance, Banking, and Credit 🔑 Funds Transfers

Whether Article 4A of the Texas Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) preempts a plaintiff's claims depends on whether the conduct and facts giving rise to the claims are squarely covered by Article 4A. Tex. Bus. & C. Code § 4A.102.

[7] Finance, Banking, and Credit Negligent hiring, retention, training, or supervision

Finance, Banking, and Credit Unauthorized orders; effect of fraud or other misconduct

Finance, Banking, and Credit Banks and similar financial institutions, obligations and practices of Bank customer's claim against bank for negligence, alleging bank's failure to prevent third parties from accessing customer's account and to train its employees, was not preempted by Article 4A of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), as adopted in Texas, in customer's action arising from fraudulent activity that culminated in customer wiring funds based on fraudsters' instructions; duties to prevent unauthorized access did not relate to the wire transfer itself, and failure to train employees was not covered by Article 4A. Tex. Bus. & C. Code § 4A.102.

[8] Finance, Banking, and Credit Unauthorized orders; effect of fraud or other misconduct

Bank customer's claim against bank for negligence, alleging bank's failure to issue timely recall after wire transfer, was preempted by Article 4A of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), as adopted in Texas, in customer's action arising from fraudulent activity that culminated in customer wiring funds based on fraudsters' instructions, since Article 4A spoke directly to procedures for canceling and amending payment orders. Tex. Bus. & C. Code §§ 4A.102, 4A.211.

[9] Contracts Grounds of action

To satisfy a claim for breach of contract under Texas law, a plaintiff must show: (1) a valid contract between the parties; (2) performance was completed or tendered by the plaintiff; (3) the defendant breached the contract; and (4) the plaintiff was damaged as a result of the breach.

[10] Contracts Pleading contract or specifications

To state a plausible breach of contract claim under Texas law, a plaintiff must allege which provision of an identified contract has been breached.

[11] Finance, Banking, and Credit Banks and similar financial institutions, obligations and practices of Bank customer's allegations, that terms of service for his personal checking and savings accounts contained provision concerning fraud protection and that bank's failure to provide contracted-for protection against fraud allowed unauthorized third party to access his account, were sufficient to state claim against bank for breach of contract under Texas law.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

More cases on this issue

[12] Contracts Pleading contract or specifications

To pass muster under Texas law, a breach of contract claim must contain the substance of the contract which supports the pleader's right to recover; a claim meets this standard if it either identifies what provisions were breached or provides factual allegations about the terms of the contract.

[13] Finance, Banking, and Credit Actions

Bank customer failed to plausibly allege that bank's actions or omissions proximately caused customer's harm, precluding customer's claim for negligence under Texas law arising from unauthorized access to customer's account by third party, absent allegations as to the foreseeability of fraudsters hacking and manipulating customer's account.

[14] Negligence In general; foreseeability of other cause

Under Texas law, the intervening act of a third party can break causation and relieve a potential tortfeasor of liability.

[15] Federal Civil Procedure Alternate, Hypothetical and Inconsistent Claims

The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure allow a party to assert separate claims under alternative theories of liability. Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(d)(2).

[16] Federal Civil Procedure Alternate, Hypothetical and Inconsistent Claims

Plaintiff does not need the magic words "in the alternative" to successfully plead an alternative theory. Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(d)(2).

[17] Federal Civil Procedure Liberality in allowing amendment

While leave to amend is not automatic, district court must possess substantial reason to deny party's request for leave to amend. Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(a).

[18] Federal Civil Procedure Complaint

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

When evaluating request to amend complaint, district court may consider undue delay, bad faith or dilatory motive on part of movant, repeated failure to cure deficiencies by amendments previously allowed, undue prejudice to opposing party, and futility of amendment. Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(a).

Attorneys and Law Firms

Holly Henderson Barnes, Spencer Fane LLP, Houston, TX, for Plaintiff.

Brittney Marie Angelich, Justin Ryan Opitz, McGuireWoods LLP, Dallas, TX, for Defendant.

ORDER ADOPTING IN PART MEMORANDUM AND RECOMMENDATION

DAVID S. MORALES, UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE

912 Before the Court is Magistrate Judge Julie K. Hampton's Memorandum and Recommendation ("M&R"). (D.E. 33). The M&R recommends that the Court:

(1) Grant Defendant's Motion to Dismiss, (D.E. 27); and

(2) Dismiss Plaintiff's cause of action, (D.E. 26).

(D.E. 33, p. 1, 16). Plaintiff filed written objections to the M&R. (D.E. 34). Defendant filed written responses to Plaintiff's objections to the M&R. (D.E. 35).

[1] When a party objects to the findings and recommendations of a magistrate judge, the district judge "shall make a de 913 novo determination of those portions of the report or specified proposed findings or recommendations to which objection is made." 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1)(C). As to any portion for which no objection is filed, a district court reviews for clearly erroneous factual findings and conclusions of law. United States v. Wilson, 864 F.2d 1219, 1221 (5th Cir. 1989) (per curiam).

I. Analysis

A. Preemption of Breach of Contract and Negligence Claims

Plaintiff objects to the M&R's findings that his common law claims for negligence and breach of contract are preempted by Article 4A of the Texas Business and Commerce Code. (D.E. 34, p. 4). In support, Plaintiff argues that the preemption provision of Article 4A is not absolute and does not preempt all common law claims between parties to a funds transfer. (D.E. 34, p. 1-2). Rather, the provision only preempts claims that contradict one of the Article's clauses. Id.

[2] [3] [4] "Article 4A establishes 'precise and detailed rules to assign responsibility, define behavioral norms, allocate risks and establish limits of liability' regarding funds transfers." Sols. v. First State Bank of Brownsboro, No. 6:19-CV-329-JDK, 2020 WL 12991132, at *3 (E.D. Tex. Apr. 16, 2020) (Kernodle, J.) (quoting Tex. Bus. & Com. Code Ann. § 4A.102, cmt.). "[T]o the extent the conduct falls within the scope of Article 4A, the statute controls, whether the common law is inconsistent or duplicative of it." Id. (collecting cases). "This does not mean that Article 4A displaces all common law claims." Id. (citing Regions Bank v. Provident Bank, Inc., 345 F.3d 1267, 1274 (11th Cir. 2003)). In other words, when "claims are based on alleged conduct occurring before or after the automated funds transfer, they are not preempted." Id. at *4. When evaluating if a claim is preempted, courts also consider if "additional facts or conduct potentially lying outside the scope of Art[icle] 4A are at issue." Consorcio Indus. de Construccion Titanes, S.A. de C. V. v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., No. 3:10-CV-2111-K, 2012 WL 13019678, at *3 (N.D. Tex. July 12, 2012) (Kinkeade, J.). If the conduct is not squarely addressed by Article 4's provisions, preemption is less likely to apply. See id. (collecting cases).

i. Preemption of Breach of Contract Claim

[5] In support of his breach of contract claim, Plaintiff emphasizes this claim "is not based on the wire transfer itself or on any claim that [Defendant] mishandled the wire transfer." (D.E. 34, p. 5). Rather, he maintains that Defendant "[failed] to provide the standard fraud protection associated with [Plaintiff's] checking and savings accounts, as well as additional fraud protection for which [Plaintiff] was billed." Id. Based on Plaintiff's second amended complaint, these failures include: (1) not detecting when third parties gained access to the online banking application before the transfer, and (2) failing to provide the contracted-for fraud protection. (D.E. 33, p. 4; D.E. 26, p. 5). Upon review, Article 4A does not preempt the conduct alleged by Plaintiff.

[6] "To determine whether a claim is 'covered by particular provisions' of Article 4A, courts look to whether 'additional facts or conduct potentially lying outside the scope of [Article 4A] are at issue.' " Ison-Newsome v. JP Morgan Chase Bank, Nat'l Ass'n, No. 3:22-CV-2805-L-BH, 2023 WL 5022287, at *4 (N.D. Tex. July 21, 2023) (Ramirez, Mag. J.) (quoting Consorcio, 2012 WL 13019678, at *3), adopted, No. 3:22-CV-2805-L, 2023 WL 5022681 (N.D. Tex. Aug. 7, 2023) (Lindsay, J.). "If the conduct at issue or factual circumstances of the claim are 'not addressed 914 squarely by the provisions of the article, courts are more likely to find that preemption does not apply.' " 3T Oil & Gas Servs., LLC v. JPMorgan Chase Bank, N.A., No. A-18-CV-131-LY, 2018 WL 5018483, at *3 (W.D. Tex. Oct. 16, 2018) (Austin, Mag. J.) (quoting Consorcio, 2012 WL 13019678, at *3), adopted, 2018 WL 6220139 (W.D. Tex. Nov. 1, 2018) (Yeakel, J.). In other words, whether Article 4A preempts Plaintiff's claims depends on whether the conduct and facts giving rise to the claims are squarely covered by Article 4A. Id.

Article 4A's scheme consists of "the interlocking provisions of" § 4A.202, § 4A.203, and § 4A.204. Ison-Newsome, 2023 WL 5022287, at *4 (citing Essilor Int'l SAS v. J.P. Morgan Chase Bank, N.A., 650 F. Supp. 3d 62, 75 (S.D.N.Y. 2023) (Liman, J.)).

Article 4A's scheme covers a receiving bank's obligations when it receives an unauthorized or ineffective payment, § 4A.204(a); when a payment order is authorized, § 4A.202(a); and when a payment order is effective, § 4A.202(b). Each of these provisions deals with "[w]hether the bank or customer bears the risk of loss for a fraudulent wire transfer ...." Ison-Newsome, 2023 WL 5022287, at *4 (citing Essilor, 650 F. Supp. 3d at 75).

The conduct Plaintiff alleges does not involve the issuance or acceptance of the payment order. He similarly neither alleges issues with the execution of the payment order, nor that it was ineffective or unauthorized under Article 4A. Lastly, he does not allege errors related to payment. See generally (D.E. 26, p. 5–6). While his harm ultimately resulted from the wire transfer, Plaintiff alleges that the actionable harm central to his breach of contract claim is Defendant's failure to uphold the contracted fraud protection and its failure to prevent third-party access to his account. To the extent Plaintiff has alleged conduct preceding the wire transfer and encompassing Defendant's obligation to provide said fraud prevention services, that conduct is not covered by Article 4A. See Ison-Newsome v. JPMorgan Chase Bank, Nat'l Ass'n, No. 3:22-CV-2805-L-BH, 2023 WL 5022287, at *4 (noting that Article 4A only displaces claims that "create rights, duties and liabilities inconsistent with" Article 4A, or when the circumstances "giving rise to that claim are directly addressed or specifically covered by the provisions of Article 4A." (citations omitted)).

The M&R relied on Grainmarket, LLC v. PNC Bank, N.A., No. 3:22-CV-2419-X, 2023 WL 4162278 (N.D. Tex. June 23, 2023) (Starr, J.), see (D.E. 33, p. 7-8), but that case is distinguishable. There, the plaintiff's common law claims were preempted where he alleged the bank failed to verify that the payment order was between the bank and himself. Grainmarket, 2023 WL 4162278, at *2. This was because Article 4A "governs situations in which 'a bank and its customer have agreed that the authenticity of payment orders ... will be verified pursuant to a security procedure.' " Id. at *2 (quoting Tex. Bus. & Com. Code Ann. § 4A.202(b)).

By contrast, Plaintiff's underlying contract does not involve a security procedure under Article 4A. Article 4A defines "security procedures" as procedures for "(i) verifying that a payment order or communication amending or cancelling a payment order is that of the customer, or (ii) detecting error in the transmission or the content of the payment order or communication." Tex. Bus. & Com. Code Ann. § 4A.201. As such, actions arising from verifying a payment order or detecting error in a payment's transmission fall within Article 4A's ambit. But here, Plaintiff alleges netiher failures to verify identity nor errors in transmission. Rather, Plaintiff sues Defendant for "allow[ing] unauthorized third-parties to access [his] 915 banking information" prior to the transfer process and for Defendant's failure to "notice this activity or inform [him] of it." (D.E. 33, p. 4). These alleged duties exceed the scope of Article 4A because they do not seek to assign duties and liabilities for wire-transfer procedures. Ison-Newsome, 2023 WL 5022287, at *4 (citing Essilor, 650 F. Supp. 3d at 75). [1]

Likewise, insofar as Plaintiff's breach of contract claims exceed the scope of issuing, accepting, and executing wire transfers, they implicate obligations "that go well beyond the scope of wire transfer services." See Hedged Inv. Partners, 578 N.W.2d at 771. Indeed, Plaintiff asserts "[his] breach of contract claim is not based on the wire transfer itself or on any claim that [Defendant] mishandled the wire transfer, but rather is based on alleged failures by [Defendant] before the wire transfer occurred." (D.E. 34, p. 5).

Accepting this pleading as true, Plaintiff's breach of contract claim is not preempted. See Ison-Newsome, 2023 WL 5022287, at *4; Essilor, 650 F. Supp. 3d at 84 (claim not preempted where plaintiff's allegations implicated actions that did not involve wire transfers and were not about how wire transfers were conducted).

Therefore, the Court SUSTAINS Plaintiff's objection to the M&R's findings that Plaintiff's breach of contract claim is preempted.

ii. Preemption of Negligence Claims

Similarly, Plaintiff maintains that Article 4A does not preempt his negligence claim because he does not assert negligent mishandling of the wire transfer itself. (D.E. 34, p. 6). Rather, Plaintiff maintains (1) that before the transfer was executed, "[Defendant] failed to meet its duty to provide 'reasonable fraud protection methods to prevent unauthorized access to [Plaintiff's] accounts,' " (D.E. 34, p. 6); and (2) Defendant failed to take action in a timely manner, including issuing a necessary wire transfer recall after the transfer. Id. at 5-6.

[7] Article 4A does not preempt Plaintiff's negligence claims relating to failures before the transfer. Duties to prevent unauthorized access do not relate to the wire transfer itself and are not covered by Article 4A. See 3T Oil, 2018 WL 5018483, at *3 (holding no preemption as negligent misrepresentation claim was not based on the wire transfer itself). Article 4A also does not preempt Plaintiff's negligence claims to the extent they arise out of Defendant's failure to train its employees. See Squeeze Me Once, LLC v. SunTrust Bank, No. CV 19-787-JWD-RLB, 2020 WL 12968001, at *10 (M.D. La. Aug. 3, 2020) (deGravelles, J.) (concluding that negligent claims arising out of failure to train employees on fraud and take reasonable investigative action were not preempted as they did not fall squarely within Article 4A's ambit).

[8] On the other hand, Article 4A does preempt Plaintiff's negligence claim relating to failures after the transfer. As the M&R observed, such claims clearly relate to a provision of Article 4A. (D.E. 33, p. 8–9). 916 Article 4A speaks directly to procedures for cancelling and amending payment orders. Tex. Bus. & Comm. Code Ann. § 4A.211. Thus, Plaintiff's negligence claims as to the wire transfer recall are preempted. See Sols., 2020 WL 12991132, at *4 (preempting negligence claims based on automated funds transfers governed by § 4A.207, but not claims based on conduct occurring before or after the transfers).

Therefore, the Court SUSTAINS Plaintiff's objection as to his negligence claims relating to conduct before the wire transfer but OVERRULES his objection relating to conduct after the transfer—specifically, the duty to provide a wire transfer recall.

B. Failure to State a Claim Upon Which Relief Can Be Granted

Plaintiff objects to the M&R's findings that he has failed to adequately plead a breach of contract claim. (D.E. 34, p. 8–9). Plaintiff also objects to the finding that he had failed to plead a negligence claim as barred by the economic loss doctrine. Id. at 9–10.

To survive a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss, a complaint must "state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 173 L.Ed.2d 868 (2009) (quoting Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 570, 127 S.Ct. 1955, 167 L.Ed.2d 929 (2007)). "A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Cicalese v. Univ. of Tex. Med. Branch, 924 F.3d 762, 765 (5th Cir. 2019) (quoting Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678, 129 S.Ct. 1937). While a sufficient complaint does not require detailed factual allegations, the facts pled must raise the plaintiff's "right to relief above the speculative level." Id. (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555, 127 S.Ct. 1955). Courts must draw all reasonable inferences in favor of the plaintiff, Allen v. Vertafore, Inc., 28 F.4th 613, 617 (5th Cir. 2022); however, a plaintiff must provide "more than labels and conclusions" or "a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action" to survive a motion to dismiss. Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555, 127 S.Ct. 1955.

i. Failure to State a Breach of Contract Claim

[9] [10] "To satisfy a claim for breach of contract under Texas law, a plaintiff must show: (1) a valid contract between the parties; (2) performance was completed or tendered by the plaintiff; (3) the defendant breached the contract; and (4) the plaintiff was damaged as a result of the breach." Siegfried v. JPMorgan Chase, N.A., No. 1:18-CV-1026-LY, 2019 WL 13194134, at *7 (W.D. Tex. Oct. 25, 2019) (Lane, Mag. J.) (citing Garofolo v. Ocwen Loan Servicing, L.L.C., 669 F. App'x 219, 220 (5th Cir. 2016)).[2] As the M&R noted, see (D.E. 33, p. 10), "to state a plausible breach of contract claim a plaintiff must allege which provision of an identified contract has been breached." Caine v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., No. CV H-17-2046, 2018 WL 3195102, at *3 (S.D. Tex. June 8, 2018) (Stacy, Mag. J.) (citing Williams v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., 560 F. App'x. 233, 238 (5th Cir. 2014) (per curiam)), adopted, No. 4:17-CV-02046, 2018 WL 3159783 (S.D. Tex. June 28, 2018) (Bennett, J.).

[11] [12] To pass 12(b)(6) muster, a breach of contract claim must contain "the substance of the contract which supports the pleader's right to recover." See 917 Bayway Servs., Inc. v. Ameri-Build Const., L.C., 106 S.W.3d 156, 160 (Tex. App.—Houston [1st Dist.] 2003, no pet.) (citing Cadle Co. v. Castle, 913 S.W.2d 627, 630-31 (Tex.App.—Dallas 1995, writ denied)). A claim meets this standard if it either "identif[ies] what provisions were breached or provide[s] factual allegations about the terms of the [contract]." See Innova Hosp. San Antonio, L.P. v. Blue Cross & Blue Shield of Georgia, Inc., 995 F. Supp. 2d 587, 603 (N.D. Tex. 2014) (O'Connor, J.). Here, Plaintiff's amended complaint points to the "standard fraud protection" and "additional fraud protection" as provisions of the contract that Defendant allegedly breached. (D.E. 26, p. 5). Plaintiff contends that Defendant's failure "to provide the contracted-for protection" against fraud allowed an unauthorized third-party to access his account. Id. Moreover, Plaintiff provides factual allegations about the terms of the contract. Plaintiff alleges that, "[u]nbeknownst to [Plaintiff], [Defendant] was not providing [Plaintiff] with any meaningful fraud protection." Id. at 2. This factual allegation allows the Court to infer that the contract had at least one term that required Defendant to provide meaningful fraud protection.

While Defendant claims that Plaintiff now fails to identify any contract despite "acknowledging and attaching the controlling agreement" in his first amended complaint, see (D.E. 27, p. 9), Plaintiff's operative complaint alleges a different contract—namely, the "terms of service for personal checking and savings accounts" that contains a "fraud protection" provision. See (D.E. 26, p. 5; D.E. 34, p. 9). And that is the contract he alleges Defendant breached. (D.E. 26, p. 5; D.E. 34, p. 9).

Plaintiff has pled factual content—Plaintiff and Defendant had a contract that provided for "standard fraud protection" and "additional fraud protection"—that allows the Court to draw the reasonable inference that Defendant could be liable for breach of contract. See Cicalese, 924 F.3d at 765. In other words, if Plaintiff and Defendant contracted for fraud protection and additional fraud protection in Defendant's terms of service agreement, and Defendant failed to provide the agreed fraud protection, then Plaintiff has a viable breach of contract claim. See (D.E. 26, p. 5). As the Court must take the complaint's allegations as true, Plaintiff states a breach of contract claim.[3] See Cicalese, 924 F.3d at 765.

Thus, the Court SUSTAINS Plaintiff's objections to the M&R's conclusion that Plaintiff has failed to state a claim for breach of contract.

ii. Failure to State a Negligence Claim

[13] The M&R next concluded that the economic-loss doctrine barred Plaintiff's negligence claim. (D.E. 33, p. 13). The M&R reasoned that any duty Defendant had to engage in fraud protection or recall the wire transfer (and any corresponding duty to train its employees on those two duties) was based in Plaintiff's contract with Defendant —specifically, "his account agreements and the wire transfer agreement." Id. Plaintiff objects, contending that "[he] did not have an expectation under the parties' contract that [Defendant] would properly train its employees to combat 918 known fraud after a wire transfer." (D.E. 34, p. 10). Instead, Plaintiff maintains that [Defendant's] duties are "general obligations that are imposed by law." Id.

[14] However, as Defendant points out, Plaintiff fails to plausibly allege that Defendant's actions or omissions proximately caused Plaintiff's harm. (D.E. 27, p. 12). Plaintiff alleges that "[i]t was foreseeable that [Defendant's] failure to" act on the wire transfer would cause Plaintiff harm. (D.E. 26, p. 6). But, as Defendant points out, the intervening act of a third party can break causation and relieve the potential tortfeasor of liability. See, e.g., Parker & Parker Const. Co. v. Morris, 346 S.W.2d 922 (Tex. App.—El Paso 1961, writ ref'd n.r.e.) (reversing judgment where a third party causing an accident sufficed as an "independent, intervening cause" that severed causation). Plaintiff's complaint contains no allegations as to the foreseeability of fraudsters hacking and manipulating his account (or bank accounts in general). Cf. Urbach v. United States, 869 F.2d 829, 833 (5th Cir. 1989) (torts foreseeable "because of prior experiences"). In other words, Plaintiff alleges no prior experiences that might make the intervening act —here, the criminal(s) who defrauded Plaintiff —foreseeable to Defendant. See generally (D.E. 26, p. 2–6).

[15] [16] In sum, Plaintiff's negligence claim cannot pass 12(b)(6) muster based on causation. Thus, the Court OVERRULES as moot Plaintiff's objections to the M&R's conclusion that the economic loss doctrine bars Plaintiff's negligence claim. [4]

C. Leave to file Third Amended Complaint

[17] [18] Plaintiff requests the opportunity to once again amend his complaint. (D.E. 34, p. 11). Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 15(a) provides that leave to amend "shall be freely granted when justice so requires." FED. R. CIV. P. 15(a). While "[l]eave to amend is [not] automatic," the "district court must possess a 'substantial reason' to deny a party's request for leave to amend." See Marucci Sports, L.L.C. v. NCAA, 751 F.3d 368, 378 (5th Cir. 2014) (quoting Jones v. Robinson Prop. Grp., L.P., 427 F.3d 987, 994 (5th Cir. 2005)). When evaluating a request to amend, the court may consider "undue delay, bad faith or dilatory motive on the part of the movant, repeated failure to cure deficiencies by amendments previously allowed, undue prejudice to the opposing party, and futility of amendment." Matter of Southmark Corp., 88 F.3d 311, 314–15 (5th Cir. 1996) (first citing 919 Foman v. Davis, 371 U.S. 178, 181, 83 S.Ct. 227, 9 L.Ed.2d 222 (1962); and then citing Wimm v. Jack Eckerd Corp., 3 F.3d 137, 139 (5th Cir. 1993)).

After careful review, the Court will allow Plaintiff to file a motion for leave to amend his complaint as to the negligence claims, with the proposed amended complaint attached to the motion.

II. Conclusion

Having reviewed the proposed findings and conclusions of the M&R, the record, the applicable law, and having made a de novo review of the portions of the M&R to which Plaintiff's objections are directed, 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1)(C), the Court SUSTAINS in part and OVERRULES in part Plaintiff's objections, (D.E. 34), and ADOPTS in part the M&R, (D.E. 33). Accordingly, the Court GRANTS in part and DENIES in part Defendant's motion to dismiss. (D.E. 27).

Plaintiff may move to amend his complaint, as to his negligence claims, with the proposed amended complaint attached to the motion, on or before April 14, 2025.

SO ORDERED.

All Citations

779 F.Supp.3d 910, 116 UCC Rep.Serv.2d 906

Footnotes

1 Other state courts have also recognized breach of contract claims which are not preempted by Article 4A. For example, in Hedged Investment Partners, L.P. v. Norwest Bank Minnesota, N.A., the plaintiffs sued under a breach of contract theory based on the parties' Agency Agreement which created several fiduciary duties. 578 N.W.2d 765, 768 (Minn. Ct. App. 1998). The plaintiffs similarly sought to recover wire transfers, but the defendant's employees were not aware of the required procedures or terms of the Agency Agreement. Id. at 769. The Minnesota court concluded that Article 4A did not provide exclusive relief because "[t]he Agency Agreement between HIP and Norwest cover[ed] specific fiduciary responsibilities that go well beyond the scope of wire transfer services." Id. at 771.

2 In Siegfried, a week after the M&R addressing the defendant's motion to dismiss was entered, the parties entered an agreed stipulation. See Siegfried, No. 1:18-CV-1026, (D.E. 49). The court subsequently denied the motion to dismiss based on the agreed stipulation, obviating the need to address the M&R. Id. (D.E. 52).

3 Plaintiff's complaint suggests the possibility that two different contracts exist, each of which had fraud protection provisions (the standard fraud protection and the additional fraud protection). (D.E. 26, p. 5). Because there are sufficient facts to support a breach of contract claim on at least one contract, the Court does not determine whether second contract, which provides for "additional fraud protection," exists. The Court notes, however, that neither party has submitted the terms of service contract for the Court's review. While not necessary to pass the motion to dismiss stage, the specific terms of the contract would have assisted the Court in determining whether Plaintiff failed to state a claim.

4 The "Federal Rules of Civil Procedure allow a party to assert separate claims under alternative theories of liability." Fulcrum Credit Partners LLC v. ChipMOS Techs. Inc., 2010 WL 11444280, at *8 (W.D. Tex. Mar. 30, 2010) (Sparks, J.) (citing FED. R. CIV. P. 8(d)(2)). And a plaintiff does not need the magic words "in the alternative" to successfully plead an alternative theory. Id. (citation omitted). Here, Plaintiff pleads in the alternative. (D.E. 26, p. 6). Other courts have found dismissing negligence claims—at the motion to dismiss stage—on economic-loss doctrine grounds is inappropriate because plaintiffs can plead under alternative theories. See e.g., Hybrid Energy Servs., Ltd. v. Magness Oilfield Brokerage, LLC, No. 5:16-CV-090-C, 2016 WL 11673473, at *3 (N.D. Tex. Aug. 5, 2016) (Cummings, J.) ("Dismissal on [the economic-loss rule] ground is inappropriate at this stage of the litigation, however, because [the plaintiff] is entitled to plead meritorious claims under alternative theories of contract and negligent misrepresentation or fraud, even if it cannot ultimately recover under each of these theories."); Sunday Riley Mod. Skin Care, L.L.C. v. Maesa, No. CIV.A. H-12-1650, 2014 WL 722870, at *5 (S.D. Tex. Feb. 20, 2014) (Harmon, J.) ("The economic loss rule does not prevent parties from pleading multiple theories of liability; it bars them from recovering economic losses caused by a breach of contract on a negligence theory." (collecting cases)).

End of Document

© 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

CASE NO. 21

2024 WL 3297361
Only the Westlaw citation
is currently available.
United States District Court,
S.D. Texas, Houston Division.

Suzanne STEWART, Plaintiff,
v.
CITY OF ARCOLA, Defendant.

CIVIL ACTION
NO.
4
:
23
-
cv
-
04387

Signed July 3, 2024

Attorneys and Law Firms

Connor Throckmorton, Throckmorton Law Firm PLLC, Houston, TX, for Plaintiff.

William Scott Helfand, Lewis Brisbois Bisgaard Smith LLP, Houston, TX, for Defendant.

ORDER

Andrew S. Hanen, United States District Judge

1 Before the Court is Defendant City of Areola's ("the City" or "Defendant") Motion to Dismiss. (Doc. No. 8). Plaintiff Suzanne Stewart ("Stewart" or "Plaintiff") responded in opposition. (Doc. No. 10). The City replied. (Doc. No. 11). For the reasons explored below, the Court hereby GRANTS IN PART and DENIES IN PART the City's motion to dismiss. (Doc. No. 8).

BACKGROUND

Stewart filed this employment discrimination lawsuit against the City, her former employer, for sex discrimination and retaliation under Title VII. Stewart is a biracial female who was employed by the City of Arcola as a police officer between 2019 and 2021. In 2021, at a City-sponsored barbeque cookoff, Stewart alleges that Areola's mayor Fred Burton ("Burton") made a public announcement over a microphone in which he referred to Stewart as an "overweight lover." (Doc. No. 1 at 2). She further alleges that Burton referred to her as "Mrs. Stewart" rather than "Officer Stewart." (Id.) Stewart allegedly made several complaints about Burton's behavior but was met with "the same response," that "Fred Burton [is] the mayor and could do what he wanted to." (Id.) Stewart also appears to allege that Burton made other "sexually inappropriate comments to and about her," but does not provide further specifics. She further alleges that she complained to the mayor about his conduct. Several weeks later, she was terminated. Based on these instances, Stewart claims that her termination was pretextual and retaliatory and that Burton's behavior was "severe and pervasive" such that it altered the terms and conditions of Stewart's employment.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

The City filed this Motion to Dismiss, arguing that Stewart's complaint fails to state a claim of sex discrimination, hostile work environment, or retaliation under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C. § 2000e et seq. ("Title VII").

LEGAL STANDARD

A defendant may file a motion to dismiss a complaint for "failure to state a claim upon which relief may be granted." Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6). To defeat a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6), a plaintiff must plead "enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 570, 127 S.Ct. 1955, 167 L.Ed.2d 929 (2007). "A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 663, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 173 L.Ed.2d 868 (2009) (citing Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556, 127 S.Ct. 1955). "The plausibility standard is not akin to a 'probability requirement,' but it asks for more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully." Id. (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556, 127 S.Ct. 1955). "Where a complaint pleads facts that are 'merely consistent with' a defendant's liability, it 'stops short of the line between possibility and plausibility of entitlement to relief.' " Id. (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 557, 127 S.Ct. 1955).

In reviewing a Rule 12(b)(6) motion, the court must accept all well-pleaded facts in the complaint as true and view them in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. Sonnier v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 509 F.3d 673, 675 (5th Cir. 2007). The Court is not bound to accept factual assumptions or legal conclusions as true, and only a complaint that states a plausible claim for relief survives a motion to dismiss. Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678–79, 129 S.Ct. 1937. When there are well-pleaded factual allegations, the court assumes their veracity and then determines whether they plausibly give rise to an entitlement to relief. Id.

ANALYSIS

2 At the outset, the parties disagree about the relevant pleading standard for employment discrimination cases under Title VII. The City argues that Stewart needs to allege facts to support each element of a prima facie case of sex discrimination and retaliation to survive a 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss. Stewart responds that the City "conflates" the motion to dismiss standard with the summary judgment standard and that she "need not provide a concrete factual basis for every claim she makes at the pleading stage." (Doc. No. 10 at 3).

At the motion to dismiss stage, the complaint is liberally construed in favor of the plaintiff and all reasonable inferences are drawn in favor of the plaintiff's claims. Nonetheless, "conclusory allegations and unwarranted factual deductions will not suffice to avoid a motion to dismiss." Toronka v. Conti. Airlines, Inc., 649 F. Supp. 2d 608, 611 (S.D. Tex. 2009). In considering motions to dismiss discrimination claims, courts "typically look to the elements of a prima facie case to determine whether the plaintiff has plead a valid claim for relief."

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Id. Although Stewart does not need to meet the heightened evidentiary burden reserved for the summary judgment stage, she does need to plausibly allege facts that tend to establish that the City is liable for the alleged conduct – the Court will accordingly look to the prima facie elements of each claim as a guide to determine whether Stewart's claims survive a 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss.

A. Sex discrimination under Title VII

"Under Title VII, it is an unlawful employment practice for an employer to fail or refuse to hire or to discharge any individual, or otherwise to discriminate against any individual with respect to his compensation, terms, conditions, or privileges of employment, because of such individual's race, color, religion, sex, or national origin." Hamilton v. Dall. Cty., 79 F.4th 494, 502 (5th Cir. 2023). To plead a disparate-treatment claim under Title VII, a plaintiff must allege facts plausibly showing (1) an adverse employment action, (2) taken against a plaintiff because of her protected status. Id. Accepting the allegations as true, Mayor Burton publicly called plaintiff an "overweight lover," which (taken in the light most favorable to the plaintiff) could be considered a gender-based remark. Burton also allegedly called her "Mrs. Stewart" rather than "Officer Stewart." (Doc. No. 1 at 2). Plaintiff was later terminated. Based solely on those alleged facts. Plaintiff claims that "but for her gender," she would not have been terminated from her position as a police officer (or, in the alternative, that her gender was a "motivating factor" in her termination).

"In order to make a sufficient claim of disparate treatment under Title VII, a plaintiff must 'plead sufficient facts on all of the ultimate elements' to make her case plausible." Jenkins v. State Workforce Comm'n, 713 F. App'x 242, 244 (5th Cir. 2017). Stewart has failed to do so here. She has pleaded that she belonged to a protected class (female), but she has not pleaded facts leading to a reasonable inference that she was terminated because of her gender. The "overweight lover" comment, without more, is not sufficient to tie her termination to her protected status. The allegation that her termination would not have occurred "but-for" her gender (or even that her gender was a "motivating factor" in her termination") is therefore conclusory. Plaintiff's disparate treatment claim is deficient as currently pleaded and Defendant's motion to dismiss is granted as to this claim.

B. Hostile Work Environment [1]

3 To survive summary judgment on a hostile work environment claim under Title VII, a plaintiff must show that (1) she is a member of a protected class; (2) she suffered unwelcomed harassment; (3) the harassment was based on her membership in a protected class; (4) the harassment "affected a term, condition, or privilege of employment"; and (5) "the employer knew or should have known" about the harassment and "failed to take prompt remedial action." West v. City of Houston, 960 F.3d 736, 741–42 (5th Cir. 2020) (quoting Ramsey v. Henderson, 286 F.3d 264, 268 (5th Cir. 2002)).

Of course, at the 12(b)(6) stage, Stewart does not need to bring forth evidence raising a fact issue as to each of these factors. The Court must accept all well-pleaded allegations as true. Stewart has alleged that she belongs to a protected class (female). Her complaint alleges that Mayor Burton's comments to her and about her (including the "overweight lover" remark at the barbeque cookoff) were "sexually charged" and "offensive to a reasonable person" such that they constituted harassment under Title VII. Further, Stewart alleges that the mayor's harassment was "so severe or pervasive that it altered the conditions of [her employment]." (Doc. No. 1 at 3). She further alleges that she complained to the mayor about his behavior, that he failed to take remedial action, and that she was subsequently terminated. When viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, these facts are sufficient to state a claim for hostile work environment under Title VII. Defendant's motion to dismiss is denied as to Stewart's hostile work environment claim.

C. Retaliation

"To state a Title VII retaliation claim, the Plaintiff must allege facts that tend to establish: (1) she engaged in an activity protected by Title VII; (2) an adverse employment action occurred; and (3) a causal link existed between the protected activity and the adverse action." Richards v. JRK Prop. Holdings, 405 Fed. Appx. 829, 831 (5th Cir. 2010) (unpublished). The City argues that Stewart has not sufficiently alleged that she participated in any protected activity prior to her termination. "Protected activity is defined as opposition to any practice rendered unlawful by Title VII, including making a charge, testifying, assisting, or participating in any investigation, proceeding, or hearing under Title VII" Ackel v. Natl. Commun., Inc., 339 F.3d 376, 385 (5th Cir. 2003). In her complaint, however, Stewart claims that she engaged in protected activity when she complained to the mayor about what she reasonably believed to be unlawful discrimination. Taken as true, this qualifies as protected activity under Title VII. Furthermore, her termination is clearly an adverse employment action.

Defendant argues that Plaintiffs allegations "fall well short of alleging causation." (Doc. No. 8 at 11). She was terminated on December 14, 2021, only few weeks after the "overweight lover" comment was made at the barbeque on November 12, 2021. Stewart essentially claims that this "temporal proximity" is enough to plausibly plead a retaliation claim under Title VII. While temporal proximity standing alone is often not enough to prove causation, the Court finds that the close temporal proximity in this case is enough to satisfy the low 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss standard. See Roy v. Veolia Envtl. Servs., No. 1:19-CV-00443-MJT, 2020 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 121583 at *13 (E.D. Tex. June 15, 2020). Defendant's motion to dismiss is denied as to Stewart's retaliation claim.

4 The Court hereby GRANTS IN PART and DENIES IN PART the City's motion to dismiss as outlined above. (Doc. No. 8).

All Citations

Slip Copy, 2024 WL 3297361

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Footnotes

1 Stewart's complaint does not include a separate heading for her hostile work environment claim; however, given that she alleges that Burton's behavior was "so severe or pervasive that it altered the conditions of Stewart's employment," the Court liberally construes the complaint to state a hostile work environment claim under Title VII.

End of Document

© 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

CASE NO. 22

2023 WL 6393885
Only the Westlaw citation
is currently available.
United States District Court, S.D.
Texas, Corpus Christi Division.

Priscilla GARCIA, Plaintiff,
v.
OCEANS HEALTHCARE, L.L.C., Defendant.

Civil Action
No.
2
:
22
-
CV
-
00219

Signed September 30, 2023

Attorneys and Law Firms

Adam Poncio, Poncio Law Offices PC, San Antonio, TX, for Plaintiff.

Juan Benito Hernandez, Ogletree Deakins, Houston, TX, Melissa Gayle Vest, Baker Donelson, Houston, TX, Phyllis G. Cancienne, Pro Hac Vice, Baker Donelson Bearman Caldwell & Berkowitz, PC, Baton Rouge, LA, for Defendant.

MEMORADUM OPINION AND ORDER

Drew B. Tipton, UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE

1 Plaintiff Priscilla Garcia began working for Defendant Oceans Healthcare, L.L.C. in September 2020 as a registered nurse. The sole caretaker of her mother who suffers from cirrhosis of the liver, Garcia began taking a few days off every month in preparation for her mother's liver transplant. In October 2021, Garcia was fired from her position at Oceans Healthcare. Garcia alleges that she was wrongfully terminated under theories of associational disability discrimination and retaliation. Oceans Healthcare contends that she was terminated for failing to show up for her scheduled shift without giving prior notice.

Pending before the Court is Defendant's Rule 12(b)(6) Motion to Dismiss. (Dkt. No. 16). For the following reasons, the Court GRANTS IN PART and DENIES IN PART the Motion.

I. BACKGROUND [1]

In September 2020, Plaintiff Priscilla Garcia started working for Defendant Oceans Healthcare L.L.C. as a registered nurse in the Corpus Christi branch. (Dkt. No. 9 at 3). Garcia is the sole caretaker of her mother, who suffers from liver cirrhosis. (Id.). Garcia alleges that the Director of Nursing at Oceans Healthcare and many of her co-workers were aware of her mother's condition. (Id.).

Beginning in May 2021, Garcia started taking her mother to San Antonio for medical care. (Id.). Around the same time, Garcia started to plan for her husband to donate a portion of his liver to her mother. (Id.). Garcia alleges that she discussed her mother's condition and liver transplant with her supervisors at Oceans Healthcare, including the Director of Nursing. (Id.). Specifically, Garcia alleges she communicated that she would need to take two to three days off every month to take her mother and husband to their medical appointments to prepare for the procedure. (Id.).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Garcia took three days off in June 2021, one day off in September 2021, and two days off in October 2021 without any issues. (Id.). However, conflict later arose in October 2021, when Garcia needed two additional days off to take her husband to a liver donor evaluation as part of her mother's ongoing treatment. (Id. at 4). Garcia alleges that in accordance with Oceans Healthcare's time-off policy, she requested the days off at least two weeks in advance. (Id.). However, when Garcia did not receive either an approval or a denial for her leave request by October 25, Garcia approached the Director of Nursing to follow up. (Id.). The Director of Nursing informed Garcia that the time off would be approved. (Id.). Garcia alleges that later that day, Garcia received a text message from Oceans Healthcare's HR Department approving her leave request. (Id.).

But on October 27, when Garcia was allegedly taking her approved leave, she received a text message from her administrator asking if she was going to make it in for her shift that day. (Id.). She added that Oceans Healthcare has a zero-tolerance policy for no-call-no-shows. (Id.). Garcia explained that she was on leave, but her administrator would not discuss the matter with her. (Id. at 5). Garcia contacted HR, who told her she was being terminated for failing to show up to her shift without giving prior notice. (Id.). Garcia was formally terminated from Oceans Healthcare the next day. (Id.).

2 On September 21, 2022, Garcia filed suit against Oceans Healthcare asserting that she was wrongfully terminated in violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act ("ADA"), the Rehabilitation Act, and the Family and Medical Leave Act ("FMLA"). (See Dkt. No. 1); (Dkt. No. 9). Pending before the Court is Oceans Healthcare's Motion to Dismiss. (Dkt. No. 16). With briefing complete, the Motion is ripe for review.

II. LEGAL STANDARD

Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure permits a defendant to move to dismiss for "failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted." Rule 8(a)(2) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure requires a pleading to contain "a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief." "[T]he pleading standard Rule 8 announces does not require 'detailed factual allegations,' but it demands more than ... 'labels and conclusions.' " Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1949, 173 L.Ed.2d 868 (2009) (quoting Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 555, 127 S.Ct. 1955, 1964, 167 L.Ed.2d 929 (2007)). "Threadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements, do not suffice." Id. The defendant, as the moving party, bears the burden of proving that no legally cognizable claim for relief exists. Flores v. Morehead Dotts Rybak, Inc., No. 2:21-CV-00265, 2022 WL 4740076, at *2 (S.D. Tex. Sept. 29, 2022) (citing 5B Charles Alan Wright & Arthur R.

Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1357 (3d ed.)).

In reviewing a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss, a court must accept the plaintiff's factual allegations as true and view those allegations in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. White v. U.S. Corrections, L.L.C., 996 F.3d 302, 306–07 (5th Cir. 2021). The court must evaluate whether the complaint contains "sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to 'state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.' " Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678, 129 S.Ct. at 1949 (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570, 127 S.Ct. at 1974). "A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Id. "The plausibility standard is not akin to a 'probability requirement,' but it asks for more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully." Id. (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570, 127 S.Ct. at 1974). "Dismissal ... is appropriate where the plaintiff fails to allege 'enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face' and thus does not 'raise a right to relief above the speculative level.' " Montoya v. FedEx Ground Package Sys., Inc., 614 F.3d 145, 148 (5th Cir. 2010) (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555, 127 S.Ct. at 1965).

III. DISCUSSION

In her First Amended Complaint, Garcia raises four claims: (1) a claim for associational disability discrimination under the ADA; (2) a claim for associational disability discrimination under the Rehabilitation Act; (3) a claim for retaliation under the ADA; and (4) a claim for violation of the FMLA. (Dkt. No. 9 at 5–8). Oceans Healthcare moves to dismiss each claim. (See Dkt. No. 16 at 4–13).

A. ASSOCIATIONAL DISABILITY DISCRIMINATION UNDER THE ADA

Garcia asserts that she satisfies all the elements of an associational disability discrimination claim, and that Oceans Healthcare's reason for terminating her is pretextual. (Dkt. No. 9 at 5–6). In its Motion to Dismiss, Oceans Healthcare argues that Garcia's claim fails because the Fifth Circuit has never recognized the existence of an associational disability discrimination claim. (Dkt. No. 16 at 5–6). Moreover, Oceans Healthcare contends that even if such a claim was cognizable, Garcia has not alleged any facts to support a prima facie case of such discrimination. (Id. at 6–8). More specifically, Oceans Healthcare argues that (1) Garcia has failed to allege any facts showing that her mother's disability was a determining factor in her termination, (2) she is unable to allege such facts because on October 27 when she did not show up for her shift, she was at an appointment for her husband, not her mother, and (3) Garcia makes no allegations that the decisionmakers at Oceans Healthcare made any negative comments about her mother's disability. (Dkt. No. 16 at 7–8).

3 Garcia responds that the statutory language of the ADA allows someone who is associated with a disabled person to bring a discrimination claim. (Dkt. No. 18 at 5–6). She further contends that nearly all the Circuits recognize an associational disability discrimination cause of action, the Fifth Circuit has neither recognized nor foreclosed such a cause of action, and district courts within the Fifth Circuit have recognized such a cause of action. (Id. at 6–13). Garcia maintains that she has properly pleaded a prima facie case for associational disability discrimination. (Id. at 15). Garcia argues that she was terminated under circumstances that give rise to a reasonable inference that her mother's disability was a determining factor in the decision. (Id. at 15–17). Oceans Healthcare replies that Garcia has not made any allegations that would give rise to a reasonable inference that her mother's disability itself was a determining factor in her termination. (Dkt. No. 19 at 6–8). The Court agrees with Oceans Healthcare.

The ADA prohibits an employer from discriminating against an employee as a result of "the known disability of an individual with whom [the employee] is known to have a relationship or association[.]" 42 U.S.C. § 12112(b)(4). This statutory language has been found by the Second, Sixth, Tenth, and Eleventh Circuits to create an independent cause of action for associational disability discrimination. See Graziadio v. Culinary Inst. of Am., 817 F.3d 415, 432 (2d Cir. 2016); Stansberry v. Air Wis. Airlines Corp., 651 F.3d 482, 486–87 (6th Cir. 2011); Den Hartog v. Wasatch Acad., 129 F.3d 1076, 1084–85 (10th Cir. 1997); Hilburn v. Murata Elecs. N. Am., Inc., 181 F.3d 1220, 1230–31 (11th Cir. 1999).

The Fifth Circuit, however, has "not explicitly recognized a cause of action for discrimination based on association with a handicapped individual ... nor described what such a claim requires." Grimes v. Wal-Mart Stores Tex., L.L.C., 505 F.App'x 376, 380 n.1 (5th Cir. 2013) (per curiam); see also Besser v. Tex. Gen. Land Off., 834 F.App'x 876, 886 (5th Cir. 2020) (per curiam); Spencer v FEI, Inc., 725 F.App'x 263, 267 (5th Cir. 2018) (per curiam). District courts within the Fifth Circuit appear split on whether a cause of action for associational disability discrimination is cognizable. Compare Hartman v. Lafourche Par. Hosp., 262 F.Supp.3d 391, 398–99 (E.D. La. 2017) (recognizing a cause of action for associational disability discrimination), and Spinks v. TruGreen Landcare, L.L.C., 322 F.Supp.2d 784, 795 (S.D. Tex. 2004) (same), with Balachandran v. Valvtechnologies, Inc., No. 4:20-CV-01078, 2021 WL 3639806, at *2 (S.D. Tex. July 30, 2021) (declining to recognize a cause of action for associational disability discrimination), and Roth v. Canon Sols. Am., Inc., No. 3:18-CV-02196, 2019 WL 4597583, at *5 (N.D. Tex. Sept. 23, 2019) (same).

Although the Fifth Circuit has declined to formally adopt an associational disability discrimination cause of action, it has stated that if such a cause of action were to exist:

> A prima facie case of associational discrimination would require that the Plaintiff show (1) her qualification for the job, (2) an adverse employment action, (3) the employer's knowledge of the employee's disabled relative, and (4) that the adverse employment action occurred under circumstances raising a reasonable inference that the relative's disability was a > determining factor in the employer's adverse action.

Grimes, 505 F.App'x at 380. The Parties in this case focus on the fourth element, i.e., whether Garcia has asserted any facts that raise a reasonable inference that her mother's alleged disability was a determining factor in her termination. To create a reasonable inference that her mother's disability was a determining factor, Garcia points to the temporal proximity between her taking leave and her termination. (Dkt. No. 9 at 6); (Dkt. No. 18 at 16–17).

The Court finds that Garcia's purported facts do not create a reasonable inference that her mother's alleged disability was a determining factor in Oceans Healthcare's decision to terminate her. First, Garcia's reliance on temporal proximity alone is insufficient to show that her mother's alleged disability was a determining factor in her termination. Generally, being fired one day after taking leave, as is the case here, would be sufficient evidence of causality to establish a prima facie case. See Clark Cnty. Sch. Dist. v. Breeden, 532 U.S. 268, 273, 121 S.Ct. 1508, 1511, 149 L.Ed.2d 509 (2001) (explaining that temporal proximity alone can suffice if the protected activity and adverse employment action are "very close"). But temporal proximity is gauged between a protected activity and an adverse employment action. Id. On October 27, Garcia took leave to care for her non-disabled husband. (Dkt. No. 9 at 4). This activity is not a protected activity under the ADA. Because Ocean's Healthcare was not obliged to agree to Garcia's time-off request, that request could not be a protected activity under the ADA. Therefore, the temporal proximity between an unprotected activity and Garcia's termination cannot suggest that her mother's disability was a determining factor in her termination.

4 Second, to determine whether a relative's alleged disability was a determining factor in a plaintiff's termination, courts generally look for some indication of negative animus. See e.g., Gomez v. Off. Ally, Inc., 796 F.App'x 224, 225–26 (5th Cir. 2020) (per curiam); Spinks, 322 F.Supp.2d at 795–96 (focusing on the fact the plaintiff's employer never made any comments regarding plaintiff's disabled sister or daughter, or their ailments); Murphy v. Univ. Health Shreveport, LLC, No. 5:20-CV-00614, 2022 WL 277347, at *8 (W.D. La. Jan. 27, 2022) (finding that the plaintiff did not allege that her employer made any negative comments about plaintiff's disabled son). Here, Garcia's First Amended Complaint is devoid of any allegations that any of the decisionmakers at Oceans Healthcare made negative comments about her mother's alleged disability. (See Dkt. No. 9). The Court finds that Garcia has failed to assert a legally cognizable claim for associational disability discrimination under the ADA.

B. ASSOCIATIONAL DISABILITY DISCRIMINATION UNDER THE REHABILITATION ACT

In her First Amended Complaint, Garcia raises a claim for associational disability discrimination under the Rehabilitation Act, codified at 29 U.S.C. §§ 701–97. (Dkt. No. 9 at 6–7). In its Motion to Dismiss, Oceans Healthcare argues that Garcia's associational disability discrimination claim under the Rehabilitation Act suffers from the same defect that her ADA claim does—Garcia has not shown that her mother's disability was a determining factor in her termination. (Dkt. No. 16 at 8–10). The Court agrees with Oceans Healthcare.

Under the Rehabilitation Act's nondiscrimination provision: "No otherwise qualified individual with a disability in the United States ... shall, solely by reason of her or his disability, be excluded from the participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance or under any program or activity conducted by any Executive agency[.]"[2] 29 U.S.C. § 794(a). The Rehabilitation Act and the ADA define the term "disability" in "substantially the same terms[.]" Espina v. City of San Antonio, No. 5:21-CV-01176, 2022 WL 3362286, at *4 (W.D. Tex. Aug. 15, 2022) (citations omitted). Accordingly, Garcia extends the concept of associational disability discrimination found in the ADA to her Rehabilitation Act claim. (Dkt. No. 18 at 17–18).

"A prima facie case of discrimination under the Rehabilitation Act is operationally identical to the test under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA)[.]" Espina, 2022 WL 3362286, at *4 (citation omitted). "The only additional requirement for a Rehabilitation Act cause of action is the alleged discrimination must be solely by reason of the disability, instead of just a motivating factor as is required by the ADA." Id. (citations omitted); see also Longoria v. Via Metro. Transit, No. 5:21-CV-01171, 2022 WL 1445396, at *12 (W.D. Tex. May 6, 2022) ("To the extent that the Rehabilitation Act allows claims of associational discrimination ... such a claim requires a showing that the adverse actions were solely caused by an association with a disabled person." (internal quotations omitted)).

As discussed previously, Garcia fails to allege that her association with an allegedly disabled relative—her mother—was a determining factor in her termination, let alone the sole factor. Franklin v. Union Pac. R.R. Co., No. 5:17-CV-00020, 2018 WL 8576557, at *11 (W.D. Tex. May 15, 2018). Accordingly, Garcia has failed to state a claim upon which relief can be granted.

C. RETALIATION UNDER THE ADA

5 In her First Amended Complaint, Garcia raises a claim for retaliation under the ADA. (Dkt. No. 9 at 5–6). In its Motion to Dismiss, Oceans Healthcare argues that Garcia's claim fails because she has not established that she was engaged in an activity protected under ADA. (Dkt. No. 16 at 10–11). Garcia responds that she has properly pleaded a claim for retaliation. (Dkt. No. 18 at 17). Garcia claims that "she requested leave that her employer knew was for the purpose of assisting her disabled mother ... she was terminated ... and there is a connection between the activity and [her] termination[.]" (Id.). Oceans Healthcare replies that requesting leave for the purpose of caring for a disabled relative is not a protected activity under the ADA. (Dkt. No. 19 at 9). The Court agrees with Oceans Healthcare.

The ADA prohibits an employer from retaliating against an employee who seeks to exercise her rights under the ADA. See 42 U.S.C. § 12203(a) ("No person shall discriminate against any individual because such individual has opposed any act or practice made unlawful by this chapter or because such individual made a charge, testified, assisted, or participated in any manner in an investigation, proceeding, or hearing under [the ADA].”). “To establish a prima facie case of unlawful retaliation under the ADA, the plaintiff must show that: (1) she engaged in an activity protected by the ADA, (2) she suffered an adverse employment action, and (3) there is a causal connection between the protected activity and the adverse action.” Lyons v. Katy Indep. Sch. Dist., 964 F.3d 298, 304 (5th Cir. 2020).

In this case, the Parties dispute whether Garcia was engaged in a protected activity under the ADA. Protected activities are those statutorily covered by the ADA, including opposing or complaining about discrimination based on disability. See Besser, 834 F.App'x at 886–87. Here, Garcia claims she engaged in a protected activity when “she requested leave that her employer knew was for the purpose of assisting her disabled mother[.]” (Dkt. No. 18 at 17). However, the Fifth Circuit has clearly articulated that under the ADA, an employer is under no obligation to provide a non-disabled employee accommodations such as a modified work schedule or allowing them to miss work to care for a disabled relative. See Besser, 834 F.App'x at 886–87 (citing 29 C.F.R. § 1630.8). Therefore, the Court finds that Garcia has failed to allege that she engaged in protected activity as required.

D. VIOLATION OF THE FMLA

In her First Amended Complaint, Garcia raises a claim for violation of the FMLA. (Dkt. No. 9 at 7–8). In its Motion to Dismiss, Oceans Healthcare argues that Garcia's claim under the FMLA fails because Garcia “alleges no facts that she requested, applied for, or took FMLA leave at any point during her employment[.]” (Dkt. No. 16 at 11). Even if she had done so, Oceans Healthcare argues that on October 27, Garcia took leave to care for her husband who does not have a “serious health condition” as is required to be eligible for leave under the FMLA. (Id. at 11–13). Garcia responds that by attributing the “serious health condition” requirement to her husband instead of her mother, Oceans Healthcare misstates her claim. (Dkt. No. 18 at 18). Garcia maintains that she has properly pleaded a claim under the FMLA. (Id.). Oceans Healthcare replies that because Garcia took leave on October 27 for her husband, she must show that her husband has a “serious health condition.” (Dkt. No. 19 at 9–10).

The FMLA entitles an eligible employee to twelve weeks of leave during any twelve-month period “[i]n order to care for the spouse, or a son, daughter, or parent, of the employee, if such spouse, son, daughter, or parent has a serious health condition.” 29 U.S.C. § 2612(a)(1)(C). Further, the FMLA makes it unlawful for any employer to interfere with, restrain, deny, or retaliate against an employee that exercises, or attempts to exercise, her rights under the FMLA. See 29 U.S.C. § 2615(a)(1); Acker v. Gen. Motors, L.L.C., 853 F.3d 784, 788 (5th Cir. 2017). It is unclear from Garcia's First Amended Complaint whether the alleged FMLA violation occurred because she was entitled to leave under the FMLA and it was denied, or, alternatively, she was retaliated against for rightfully using her FMLA leave.

However, given the Court's obligation at this stage of the litigation to view allegations in the light most favorable to Garcia, the Court will proceed as if Garcia has advanced both claims.

1. FMLA Interference

6 To establish a prima facie case of FMLA interference, Garcia must show: (1) she was an eligible employee; (2) her employer was subject to FMLA requirements; (3) she was entitled to leave; (4) she gave proper notice of her intention to take FMLA leave; and (5) her employer denied her the benefits to which she was entitled under the FMLA. Hester v. Bell-Textron, Inc., 11 F.4th 301, 306 (5th Cir. 2021).

After careful review, the Court finds that Garcia has alleged a facially plausible claim for FMLA interference. First, Garcia alleges that she was an eligible employee as defined by the FMLA. (Dkt. No. 9 at 7). Second, she claims that Oceans Healthcare was subject to FMLA requirements. (Id.). Third, Garcia claims that she was entitled to leave because her mother suffered from a serious health condition, and the leave was taken in order to care for her mother.[3] (Id. at 7–8). Fourth, she asserts that the management of Oceans Healthcare was aware of her mother's medical issues and of her husband's plan to donate a portion of his liver to Garcia's mother, which places Oceans Healthcare on notice of her leave. (Id. at 8). And fifth, she claims that despite using the proper procedure for requesting leave, she was denied benefits under the FMLA. (Id. at 4–5, 8).

While Oceans Healthcare disputes the validity of some of these alleged facts, they are viewed in Garcia's favor at the motion to dismiss stage.

2. FMLA Retaliation

To establish a prima facie case of retaliation under the FMLA, Garcia must show that "(1) she engaged in protected activity; (2) the employer took a materially adverse action against her; and (3) a causal link exists between her protected activity and the adverse action." Wheat v. Fla. Par. Juv. Just. Comm'n, 811 F.3d 702, 705 (5th Cir. 2016).

The Court finds that Garcia has alleged a facially plausible claim for retaliation under the FMLA. First, Garcia alleges she was engaged in a protected activity—taking FMLA leave. (Dkt. No. 9 at 7–8). Second, she alleges that she was terminated. (Id. at 8). Third, she alleges that the temporal proximity between her protected activity and her termination is enough to establish a casual link. (See id. at 6); see also Besser, 834 F.App'x at 884 (stating that that when the temporal proximity is very close, proximity alone suffices to establish causation in a prima facie case of retaliation).[4] These factual allegations are sufficient to survive a 12(b)(6) motion.

IV. CONCLUSION

7 Considering the foregoing analysis, the Court GRANTS IN PART and DENIES IN PART Defendant's Rule 12(b)(6) Motion to Dismiss. (Dkt. No. 16). The Court GRANTS the Motion with respect to the Garcia's ADA and Rehabilitation Act claims and DENIES the Motion with respect to Garcia's FMLA claim.

The Court finds that Garcia has failed to plead sufficient facts to support her claims of associational disability discrimination under the ADA and the Rehabilitation Act, as well as her claim for ADA retaliation. These claims are dismissed without prejudice, and Garcia may amend her Complaint no later than 14 days from the date of this Order in an effort to remedy these deficiencies. Oceans Healthcare may re-urge dismissal at the summary judgment stage after appropriate discovery.

It is SO ORDERED.

All Citations

Not Reported in Fed. Supp., 2023 WL 6393885

Footnotes

1 For purposes of addressing this Motion, the Court accepts all factual allegations in the Complaint as true and views them in the light most favorable to Garcia. See White v. U.S. Corr., L.L.C., 996 F.3d 302, 306–07 (5th Cir. 2021).

2 Notably, the briefing from both Parties is devoid of any information about whether Oceans Healthcare is subject to the requirements of the Rehabilitation Act—namely whether Oceans Healthcare receives federal funding. For purposes of this Motion, the Court will assume that as a public hospital Oceans Healthcare receives federal funding and is therefore subject to the provisions of the Rehabilitation Act.

3 As mentioned previously, the Parties dispute the significance of Garcia taking leave on October 27 to care for her husband instead of her mother. The Court finds that, for purposes of FMLA leave, it is immaterial that the leave was to take her husband to an appointment; Garcia only needs to show that her mother has a serious health condition.

The FMLA entitles eligible employees to take leave "[i]n order to care for" certain family members. See 29 U.S.C. § 2612(a)(1)(C). While the FMLA does not define what "care for" entails, the Fifth Circuit has stated that "caring for a family member with a serious health condition involves some level of participation in ongoing treatment of that condition." Baham v. McLane Foodservice, Inc., 431 F.App'x 345, 348 (5th Cir. 2011) (per curiam) (quoting Tellis v. Alaska Airlines, Inc., 414 F.3d 1045, 1047 (9th Cir. 2005)) (internal quotation marks omitted).

For example, in Baham the Fifth Circuit found that when the plaintiff was mowing his lawn, cleaning his house, and padding the furniture, he was not caring for his daughter under the FMLA. Id. at 349. In contrast, here, Garcia took leave to take her husband to an evaluation for the ongoing treatment of her mother's liver cirrhosis. (Dkt. No. 9 at 8). It was not as though her husband's evaluation offered some incidental benefit to Garcia's mother; her husband's evaluation was an essential step in her mother's ongoing treatment.

4 The Court earlier found that the use of temporal proximity for Garcia's ADA claim was insufficient to establish a causal link because taking leave to care for a disabled relative is not a protected activity under the ADA. See supra Part III.A. The use of temporal proximity to establish a causal link is sufficient for Garcia's FMLA claim because taking FMLA leave in order to care for a relative is a protected activity. See Clark Cnty. Sch. Dist., 532 U.S. at 273, 121 S.Ct. at 1511.

End of Document

© 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

CASE NO. 23

2016 WL 6638845
Only the Westlaw citation
is currently available.
United States District Court,
S.D. Texas, McAllen Division.

M.D.C.G., individually and as next friend of N.L.M.C., a minor, et al, Plaintiffs,
v.
UNITED STATES of America, Defendant.

CIVIL ACTION
NO.
7
:
15
–
CV
–
552

Signed 09/13/2016

Attorneys and Law Firms

Samuel K. Allen, Mark Dollar Clore, Clore Law Group LLC, Charleston, SC, for Plaintiffs.

Eric Paxton Warner, U.S. Attorneys' Office, McAllen, TX, for Defendant.

ORDER GRANTING IN PART AND DENYING IN PART DEFENDANT'S MOTION TO DISMISS

Randy Crane, United States District Judge

I. Factual and Procedural Background

1 Now before the Court is Defendant United States of America's Motion to Dismiss filed pursuant to Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 12(b)(1) and 12(b)(6). (Dkt. No. 11). Plaintiffs M.D.C.G., individually and as next friend of N.L.M.C., a minor, and D.E.G., as next friend of J.M.A.E., a minor, filed this suit on December 23, 2015, seeking to hold the United States liable under the Federal Tort Claims Act ("FTCA") for injuries inflicted on three of the Plaintiffs by U.S. Border Patrol Agent Esteban Manzanares. (Dkt. No. 1). Plaintiffs allege that on March 12, 2014, Manzanares was dressed in uniform, armed, and driving his official vehicle when he encountered M.D.C.G., her minor daughter N.L.M.C., and minor female J.M.A.E., all aliens from Honduras who had crossed the U.S.–Mexico border without authorization. Id. [1] Manzanares apprehended and bound them, and over the course of several hours drove them around in his official vehicle, intermittently stopping to physically (and in some cases, sexually) abuse them. Id. The alleged abuse ended at Manzanares's apartment in Mission, Texas, where he committed suicide after law enforcement arrived. Id. Plaintiffs assert claims under the FTCA for: (1) assault and battery; (2) false imprisonment/false arrest; (3) intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress; (4) negligence; and (5) negligent hiring, retention, and supervision. Id. Defendant now moves to dismiss all but the latter for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction under Rule 12(b)(1), on the grounds that the FTCA does not waive the government's sovereign immunity from suit because Manzanares was not acting within the scope of his employment when he committed the alleged torts. (Dkt. No. 11). Defendant also moves for dismissal of the same claims under

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Rule 12(b)(6) for failure to plead sufficient facts to support Plaintiffs' allegations that Manzanares was acting in the scope of his employment. Id. Finally, Defendant moves to dismiss Plaintiffs' negligent hiring, retention, and supervision claims under Rule 12(b)(6), appearing to challenge the duty and proximate cause elements of these claims by asserting that Manzanares's conduct was not foreseeable to his employer. Id. Upon consideration of the Motion and Plaintiffs' response (Dkt. No. 17), in light of the relevant law, the Court finds that that all causes of action dependent on the allegation that Manzanares was acting in the scope of his employment must be dismissed, and all other causes of action may remain.

II. Overview of Factual Allegations

A. Facts Relevant to All Plaintiffs

Plaintiffs' Original Complaint alleges that from 2008 until his death, Esteban Manzanares was employed as an Agent/Officer of U.S. Customs and Border Protection ("CBP" or "Border Patrol"), a sub-agency of the U.S. Department of Homeland Security ("DHS"). (Dkt. No. 1 at ¶¶ 2, 3, 14).[2] In March 2014, Agent Manzanares was assigned to a post along the Rio Grande River Sector, in what is believed to be near the town of Abram, in Hidalgo County, Texas. Id. at ¶ 15. He is believed to have been affiliated with the Rio Grande Valley Sector (Texas), CBP McAllen Station, during the relevant time. Id.

2 On March 12, 2014, M.D.C.G., her 15–year–old daughter N.L.M.C., and 14–year–old J.M.A.E., who had been traveling together, were sitting on the side of a dirt road in Hidalgo County. Id. at ¶ 16. The road runs parallel to the Rio Grande River, and follows a bend in the river. Id. Plaintiffs had recently crossed the river and the U.S.–Mexico border without authorization, and were sitting on the U.S. side, resting. Id. Manzanares was driving by in his official vehicle when he spotted Plaintiffs. Id. He was in uniform, armed, and in possession of multiple communication devices either issued by CBP, or possessed by Manzanares with CBP's knowledge. Id. at ¶ 17. Manzanares stopped and asked whether Plaintiffs were alone, and when they said they were, told Plaintiffs to come with him. Id. at ¶ 16. He told Plaintiffs that they were in his custody and control, and to follow his instructions. Id. Plaintiffs surrendered without incident to Manzanares, with the understanding that he was armed and was a federal law enforcement officer. Id. at ¶ 17.

Manzanares advised Plaintiffs that they would be transported to a facility for mothers and their children. Id. at ¶ 18. He then drove around, making multiple stops, and at one point stopped to place black restraint bands on Plaintiffs, and to transfer Plaintiffs to the back of his vehicle. Id. He eventually made a stop at what appeared to be a government building occupied by other individuals, including personnel who appeared to be uniformed CBP employees. Id. After driving further for an unknown distance, Manzanares stopped again in an unpopulated area. Id. at ¶ 19. He took Plaintiffs out of the vehicle and taped their mouths and wrists, telling them he was doing so due to a secondary order he had received. Id.

During the several hours he transported Plaintiffs from place to place, Manzanares used keys that are believed to have been given to him by CBP to operate the gates. Id. at ¶ 20. Plaintiffs saw at least one other uniformed CBP employee along the roadway while they were being transported through the gates. Id. Manzanares eventually stopped the vehicle in a new area, where he forcibly removed M.D.C.G. and her daughter N.L.M.C., who were still restrained, one at a time from the truck. Id.

B. Facts Specific to M.D.C.G.

Manzanares dragged M.D.C.G. out of the vehicle and forced her to the ground, striking her face and body for several minutes. Id. at ¶ 22. When M.D.C.G. began to struggle, Manzanares dragged her up a hill, struck and kicked her, strangled and choked her, and twisted her neck. Id. M.D.C.G. feared for her life, and became temporarily unconscious or disoriented when Manzanares was strangling and choking her. Id.

At some point, Manzanares pulled out a knife and began to cut M.D.C.G.'s arms and wrists. Id. at ¶ 23. She believed that Manzanares was torturing her, or possibly making it look as if she had killed herself, and eventually lost consciousness. Id. When she regained consciousness, M.D.C.G. could hear Manzanares beating her daughter, N.L.M.C. Id. at ¶ 24. Since she was bleeding and knew that Manzanares had weapons, that she and the girls were restrained, and that Manzanares had been overpowering them, M.D.C.G. decided to leave the scene and run for help. Id.

M.D.C.G. eventually encountered a CBP officer who questioned her at gunpoint. Id. at ¶ 25. She told the officer what happened and why she was disheveled and covered in blood, and that the person who had done this to her was still doing it to her daughter and to another girl. Id. When the officer asked who was doing this, M.D.C.G. responded that the perpetrator was "dressed just like you." Id. The officer began to communicate by radio and call for assistance, and other "CBP-dressed" individuals began to arrive, followed by emergency medical personnel. Id.

M.D.C.G. was placed in an ambulance and transported to a hospital in McAllen, where she was placed under guard in the custody of CBP. Id. at ¶ 26. Some time passed before M.D.C.G. learned what happened to her daughter, and she was not permitted to see N.L.M.C. until the third day. Id.

C. Facts Specific to N.L.M.C.

3 N.L.M.C. watched, restrained, as Manzanares forcibly removed her mother, M.D.C.G., from the vehicle. Id. at ¶ 27. She witnessed the injuries her mother received until Manzanares dragged M.D.C.G. away from the truck. Id. N.L.M.C. could then hear the beatings and sounds of distress from her mother. Id.

Manzanares then returned to the vehicle and forcibly removed N.L.M.C. Id. at ¶ 28. N.L.M.C. struggled while he strangled and choked her and twisted her neck in a manner that led her to believe he was trying to break her neck. Id. At some point, N.L.M.C. became temporarily unconscious or disoriented. Id. Eventually, she acted as if she were unconscious or dead in an attempt to limit Manzanares's actions. Id. Even then, Manzanares "continued to touch and assault her in an offensive and provocative manner." Id. at ¶ 29. Manzanares manipulated N.L.M.C.'s clothing to gain access to her breast and vaginal area, and touched her provocatively with his hands and other body parts. Id. at ¶ 30. He also walked around her, taking pictures of her semi-unclothed body. Id.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Manzanares then used his knife to cut N.L.M.C.'s left arm. Id. at ¶ 31. N.L.M.C. was awake, but continued to act unresponsive in an attempt to save her life. Id. Manzanares then covered N.L.M.C. with dirt, debris, and brush, and left the area. Id. After she heard him drive away, N.L.M.C. dug herself out and began to look for her mother. Id. Eventually she found another individual dressed as a CBP officer, and was placed in an ambulance and transported to the hospital. Id. N.L.M.C. was placed under guard at the hospital, in the custody of CBP, and was not permitted to see her mother until the third day. Id. at ¶ 32.

D. Facts Specific to J.M.A.E.

Manzanares eventually returned to the vehicle without M.D.C.G. or N.L.M.C., and refused to tell J.M.A.E. what he had done with them despite her pleas. Id. at ¶ 33. He drove around for a while before taking J.M.A.E. to a deserted area, where he tied her to a tree and left her for a few hours. Id. at ¶ 34.

Manzanares eventually returned and took J.M.A.E. to his apartment in Mission, Texas. Id. There, he cut away her clothing, forcibly bathed her, and tied her to a bed. Id. While she was restrained, he photographed her naked body and over the course of several hours, "took physical liberties with J.M.A.E., including touching her provocatively and offensively, fondling her, penetrating her vaginally, and other assaults...." Id. at ¶¶ 35, 36. At some point, he left the apartment and returned. Id. at ¶ 37. Several hours later, J.M.A.E. heard a loud pounding on the door and loud voices, and shortly thereafter, gunfire and "explosions of gaseous chemicals" in the apartment. Id. at ¶ 38. She was later told that Manzanares had killed himself with his own weapon. Id.

When law enforcement officers entered the apartment, they found J.M.A.E. still tied to the bed. Id. at ¶ 39. She was transported to the hospital and placed under guard, and was not allowed to see her family for a month. Id.

E. Facts Relevant to Negligent Hiring, Retention, and Supervision Claims

On the basis of information released to Plaintiffs and in press reports, Plaintiffs believe that one or more agencies of Defendant (specifically, Immigration and Customs Enforcement ("ICE") and/or the Federal Bureau of Investigation ("FBI")) knew of Manzanares "having abused persons in his custody and control," "that there had been investigations into abuse and his wrongful use of excessive force," and that "[t]he prior allegations included complaints of attacks on women in a physical, mental, and/or sexual manner." Id. at ¶ 40. Plaintiffs also allege that "[i]t has further been reported that the CBP Sector/Station in question has been placed on notice by other governmental agencies and non-governmental agencies about a direct failure of managerial level employees to enforce policies, regulations, statutes, and/or internal protocol regarding the excessive use of force, the handling of unaccompanied minors, and women." Id. at ¶ 41.

III. Defendant's 12(b)(1) Motion to Dismiss

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

A. Standard of Review

4 A court properly dismisses a case for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction under Rule 12(b)(1) " 'when the court lacks the statutory or constitutional power to adjudicate the case.' " Home Builders Ass'n of Miss., Inc. v. City of Madison, 143 F.3d 1006, 1010 (5th Cir. 1998) (quoting Nowak v. Ironworkers Local 6 Pension Fund, 81 F.3d 1182, 1187 (2d Cir. 1996)). The court may determine lack of subject-matter jurisdiction on the basis of: (1) the complaint alone; (2) the complaint supplemented by undisputed facts in the record; or (3) the complaint supplemented by undisputed facts plus the court's resolution of disputed facts. Ramming v. United States, 281 F.3d 158, 161 (5th Cir. 2001).

B. FTCA Waiver of Sovereign Immunity

As a general rule, the United States has sovereign immunity from suit, depriving federal courts of subject-matter jurisdiction over claims against the government. E.g., Bodin v. Vagshenian, 462 F.3d 481, 484 (5th Cir. 2006). However, the FTCA provides a broad waiver of sovereign immunity for claims against the United States for personal injury > caused by the negligent or wrongful act or omission of any employee of the Government while acting within the scope of his office or employment, under circumstances where the United States, if a private person, would be liable to the claimant in accordance with the law of the place where the act or omission occurred.

28 U.S.C. § 1346(b)(1); id. By its terms, the waiver only applies when the tortfeasor acts in the scope of his government employment. Id. Even if he does, another section of the FTCA makes the waiver inapplicable to certain enumerated intentional tort claims, including any claim "arising out of" assault, battery, false imprisonment, or false arrest, unless the tortfeasor was an "investigative or law enforcement officer." 28 U.S.C. § 2680(h); see id.; Davila v. United States, 713 F.3d 248, 256 (5th Cir. 2006) (law enforcement proviso of § 2680(h) provides "an exception to the exception" to § 1346(b)(1)). The FTCA defines "investigative or law enforcement officer" as "any officer of the United States who is empowered by law to execute searches, to seize evidence, or to make arrests for violations of Federal law." 28 U.S.C. § 2680(h). The U.S. Supreme Court recently held that "the waiver effected by the law enforcement proviso extends to acts or omissions of law enforcement officers that arise within the scope of their employment, regardless of whether the officers are engaged in investigative or law enforcement activity, or are executing a search, seizing evidence, or making an arrest." Millbrook v. United States, 133 S.Ct. 1441, 1446 (2013). In other words, the focus of the law enforcement proviso is on "the status of persons whose conduct may be actionable, not the types of activities that may give rise to a tort claim against the United States." Id. at 1445 (emphasis in original).

C. Overview of Defendant's Grounds for Dismissal: Manzanares Not Acting in Scope of Employment

Defendant does not dispute that on March 12, 2014, Manzanares held the status of "investigative or law enforcement officer" for purposes of the FTCA waiver of sovereign immunity. See (Dkt. No. 11). Rather, Defendant seeks dismissal of Plaintiffs' intentional tort and negligence causes of action on the grounds that Manzanares was not acting within the scope of his employment at the time of his alleged tortious conduct, in which case the FTCA waiver does not apply and the Court lacks subject-matter jurisdiction over these causes of action. Id. Since the issue of whether an employee is acting in the scope of his employment is governed by the law of the state in which the wrongful act occurred, Bodin, 462 F.3d at 484, the Court looks to Texas law to determine this question.

5 The general rule in Texas is that an employee's conduct falls within the scope of his employment, therefore subjecting his employer to liability under the theory of respondeat superior, if the employee's actions were: "(1) within the general authority given him; (2) in furtherance of the employer's business; and (3) for the accomplishment of the object for which the employee was employed." Id. (quoting Counts v. Guevara, 328 F.3d 212, 214 (5th Cir. 2003)) (internal quotations omitted); Minyard Food Stores, Inc. v. Goodman, 80 S.W.3d 573, 577 (Tex. 2002). The Texas Supreme Court has also directed that, for an employee's acts to be imputed to his employer, his conduct "must be of the same general nature as that authorized or incidental to the conduct authorized." Minyard Food Stores, 80 S.W.3d at 577 (quoting Smith v. M Sys. Food Stores, Inc., 156 Tex. 484, 297 S.W.2d 112, 114 (1957)). "If the purpose of serving the master's business actuates the servant to any appreciable extent his acts are within the scope of his employment." Bodin, 462 F.3d at 485 (quoting Howard v. Am. Paper Stock Co., 523 S.W.2d 744, 747 (Tex. Civ. App.–Ft. Worth 1975), reformed and aff'd, 528 S.W.2d 576 (Tex. 1975)). "However, when the servant turns aside, for however short a time, from the prosecution of the master's work to engage in an affair wholly his own, he ceases to act for the master, and the responsibility for that which he does in pursuing his own business or pleasure is upon him alone." Id. (quoting Tex. & P. Ry. Co. v. Hagenloh, 247 S.W.2d 236, 241 (1952)) (internal quotations omitted); see also Minyard Food Stores, 80 S.W.3d at 577 ("[I]f an employee deviates from the performance of his duties for his own purposes, the employer is not responsible for what occurs during that deviation.").

Defendant acknowledges that when Manzanares allegedly apprehended Plaintiffs by the side of the road near the Rio Grande River, restrained them with black restraint bands, placed them in the back of his official vehicle, and drove them to what appeared to be a government building, his actions were "consistent with [those of] a Border Patrol agent who has detained individuals who have illegally entered into the United States." (Dkt. No. 11). However, Defendant takes the position that any conduct alleged to have been committed by Manzanares after he left the government building with Plaintiffs was outside the performance of his duties and committed for his own purposes, and cannot be imputed to the United States. Id. The Court finds it appropriate to consider Defendant's argument separately with respect to each of the torts allegedly committed by Manzanares.

D. Assault and Battery

1. Elements of Cause of Action and Plaintiffs' Allegations

"Texas courts have recognized private causes of action for both assault and battery for well over a century." City of Watauga v. Gordon, 434 S.W.3d 586, 589 (Tex. 2014). "These two intentional torts are related, but conceptually distinct." Id. "An assault occurs when a person is in apprehension of imminent bodily contact, whereas a battery is committed when an individual actually sustains a harmful or offensive contact to his or her person." Id. "Today, the Texas Penal Code combines common-law concepts of assault and battery," providing that a person commits an "assault" if he either:

> (1) intentionally, knowingly, or recklessly causes bodily injury to another...;
>
> (2) intentionally or knowingly threatens another with imminent bodily injury...; or
>
> (3) intentionally or knowingly causes physical contact with another when the person knows or should reasonably believe that the other will regard the contact as offensive or provocative.

Id. at 589–90 (quoting TEX. PENAL CODE § 22.01(a)). "The statute's second alternative definition mirrors the traditional notion of common-law assault, while the first and last alternatives correspond to separate forms of common-law battery." Id. at 590. "The Second Restatement of Torts similarly identifies two forms of battery: one form that results in harmful bodily contact and another that results in offensive bodily contact." Id. (citing RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS §§ 13, 18 (1965)).

Plaintiffs' Complaint alleges that Manzanares's actions fall within each of the three definitions of assault provided by the Texas Penal Code, as follows:

> 6 (1) Manzanares intentionally and knowingly inflicted bodily injury on M.D.C.G. and N.L.M.C. when he dragged them out of his truck and dragged M.D.C.G. up a hill, "roughed them up," knifed them, strangled and choked them, twisted their necks as if attempting to kill them, and rendered them unconscious for brief periods;
>
> (2) Manzanares's infliction of bodily injury on M.D.C.G. and N.L.M.C. to the point that they would temporarily lose consciousness, and thought they were going to die, also constituted the intentional and knowing threat of imminent bodily injury to M.D.C.G., N.L.M.C., and finally J.M.A.E., who assumed the others were dead "and that she was next"; and
>
> (3) Manzanares intentionally and knowingly engaged in offensive or provocative physical contact with M.D.C.G., N.L.M.C., and J.M.A.E. when he was "rough and offensive" with them and "engaged in provocative physical contact with the two minors."

(Dkt. No. 1 at ¶¶ 51–55).

2. Respondeat Superior Claims for Assault and Battery

Under Texas law, "[i]t is not ordinarily within the scope of a servant's authority to commit an assault on a third person," since "[u]sually assault is the expression of personal animosity and is not for the purpose of carrying out the master's business." Hagenloh, 247 S.W.2d at 239. However, "[t]he nature of the employment may be such as necessarily to involve at times the use of force...so that the act of using force may be in furtherance of the employer's business, making him liable even when greater force is used than is necessary," and "even though the master has expressly forbidden the particular act...." Id. (citing Int'l & G.N. Ry. Co. v. Anderson, 17 S.W. 1039 (Tex. 1891)). In determining whether an assault was committed in the scope of employment, Texas courts consider "whether the assault was so connected with and immediately arising out of authorized employment tasks as to merge the task and the assaultive conduct into one indivisible tort imputed to the employer." Buck v. Blum, 130 S.W.3d 285, 289 (Tex. App.–Houston [14th Dist.] 2004, no pet.). The plaintiff bears the burden to prove that the employee acted for reasons other than personal animus, which is generally a fact question. Bodin, 462 F.3d at 485 (citing Texas cases).

3. Analysis

a. Overview of Parties' Arguments

Citing mostly to FTCA and Texas respondeat superior cases involving alleged sexual assaults, Defendant makes two main arguments in support of its position that Manzanares was not acting in the scope of his employment: (1) as soon as Manzanares left the government building with Plaintiffs still restrained in the back of his vehicle, and drove to an unpopulated area, his actions were no longer consistent with those of a Border Patrol agent; and (2) Manzanares's criminal acts "were clearly not undertaken to further the interests of the United States" or "to accomplish any purpose for which Manzanares was employed," and were instead "prompted solely by [his] own motives." (Dkt. No. 11). In their response, Plaintiffs reject the supposed inference that criminal acts, and more specifically sexual assault, are not actionable under the FTCA. (Dkt. No. 17). They also claim that in contrast to most of the cases on which Defendant relies, in this case Manzanares was authorized to use force as part of his job, and that Manzanares's purpose for acting is a fact question that may not be resolved at this stage. Id. The Court will examine each of Plaintiffs' responsive arguments in turn.

b. FTCA Liability for Criminal Acts

7 Plaintiffs' response first takes issue with an inference they believe Defendant's Motion and citation to authority attempts to make: that criminal acts, including sexual assault, cannot fall within the scope of a person's employment for purposes of the FTCA. (Dkt. No. 17). To the extent that Defendant intends the inference, the Court agrees that that the criminal nature of Manzanares's actions does not determine the scope inquiry; if it did, the federal government could never be held liable for an assault in Texas, given that the intentional tort of assault "is identical to criminal assault" under Texas law. Davila, 713 F.3d at 261. Defendant's Motion relies in part on the district court's observation in Davis v. United States, 474

F. Supp. 2d 829, 832 (N.D. Tex. 2007), that "when a prison guard turns from the duties of the job to violate [Federal Bureau of Prisons] policy and the law by intentionally raping an inmate, the government is not liable for his intentional, criminal actions." As Plaintiffs observe, this observation was dicta, given that the plaintiff sought to hold the government liable not for the prison guard's intentional tort, but for the negligence of other prison guards in allowing the rape to occur. (Dkt. No. 17); see id. Plaintiffs also point out that since the district court's decision in Davis, the U.S. Supreme Court decided Millbrook—also an FTCA case involving a BOP officer's sexual assault of an inmate—in which the government conceded that the offending officer was acting within the scope of his employment. The Supreme Court did not, therefore, engage in a scope inquiry, but its holding that an officer need not have committed an intentional tort in the course of executing a search, seizing evidence, or making an arrest for the government to be held liable under the FTCA for his tortious conduct leaves open the possibility that the United States may be held liable for a sexual assault committed outside those contexts. The dispositive question under Texas law is not whether the tortfeasor's actions are criminal, but whether those actions are sufficiently connected to the exercise of his authorized duties and the purpose given him by his employer.

c. Authority to Use Force

Plaintiffs attempt to distinguish five of the assault cases cited by Defendant by emphasizing that these cases "do not analyze the course and scope of an employee who was authorized to use force in carrying out his duties, as Manzanares was." (Dkt. No. 17) (emphasis in original); see (Dkt. No. 11) (citing Bodin, 462 F.3d at 483–87 (psychiatrist's "illegal, inappropriate, and unnecessary physical examinations of [patients'] genitalia" during regularly scheduled visits were not within scope of his employment with U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs); Hagenloh, 247 S.W.2d at 240 (hitting and knocking down suspected thief not in scope of tortfeasor's employment as railway company "special agent," whose duties to investigate claims for and find property missing from baggage "were not of such nature as to involve the use of force"); Buck, 130 S.W.3d at 290 (neurologist who placed his penis in patient's hand during grip test was not acting within scope of his employment with hospital, in part because "neurology is not an inherently sexual profession and never requires the action allegedly perpetrated by [the doctor]"); Mackey v. U.P. Enters., Inc., 935 S.W.2d 446, 454 (Tex. App.–Tyler 1996, no writ) (brushing up against and fondling employee not within scope of tortfeasors' duties as food service managers); Kelly v. Stone, 898 S.W.2d 924, 928 (Tex. App.–Eastland 1995, writ denied) (supervisor's sexual advances not within scope of his employment as office services manager at electric cooperative)). Plaintiffs instead attempt to analogize this case to other cases in which Texas appellate courts have found employers liable for assaults committed by employees with the authority to use some degree of force in performing their job duties. (Dkt. No. 17) (citing G.T. Mgmt., Inc. v. Gonzalez, 106 S.W.3d 880, 884 (Tex. App.–Dallas 2003, no pet.) (nightclub bouncers' assault of patron within scope of their employment where they were authorized to use force to carry out duties to break up fights, walk parties out of club, and control patrons, and assault was incidental to their use of that force); Durand v. Moore, 879 S.W.2d 196, 199–201 (Tex. App.–Houston [14th Dist.] 1994, no writ) (nightclub bouncer's assault of complaining customers amounted to "overzealous" enforcement of authorized task of controlling admittance of customers into club, and was within scope of his employment); Frito–Lay Inc. v. Ramos, 770 S.W.2d 887 (Tex. App.–El Paso 1989), rev'd on other grounds, 784 S.W.2d 667 (Tex. 1990) (under circumstances of "being responsible for what he thought was company equipment," district sales manager who pushed customer while retrieving equipment was acting in scope of employment)).

A similarity among all of these cases is the factually intensive nature of the scope of inquiry, which in this case requires consideration of the type of force authorized by Manzanares's employer, and the extent to which the force used against Plaintiffs fell within the scope of that authority. In the FTCA context, the Fifth Circuit has found that federal officers such as Manzanares "are peace officers for the purpose of the Texas criminal assault statute and its civil privilege defense," and are therefore justified in using force "when and to the degree the actor reasonably believes the force is immediately necessary to make or assist in making an arrest or search." Davila, 713 F.3d at 261 (quoting TEX. PENAL. CODE § 9.51(a)). The Texas Penal Code further justifies the use of force "to prevent the escape of an arrested person from custody...when the force could have been employed to effect the arrest under which the person is in custody." TEX. PENAL CODE § 9.52. Plaintiffs also direct the Court to several publicly available documents: (1) the CBP "Use of Force Policy, Guidelines and Procedures Handbook," dated May 2014 ("Use of Force Handbook"); (2) the CBP "National Standards on Transport, Escort, Detention, and Search," dated October 2015 ("National Standards"); (3) the Stipulated Settlement Agreement in Flores v. Reno, Case No. CV 85–4544–RJK(px) (C.D. Cal. Jan. 17, 1997) ("Flores Agreement"); (4) a DHS report on "CBP's Handling of Unaccompanied Alien Children" in compliance with the Flores Agreement, dated September 2010 ("Flores Agreement Report"); and (5) a CBP memorandum addressing agency policy for "Hold Rooms and Short Term Custody," dated June 2, 2008 ("Custody Policy"). (Dkt. No. 17).[3] These documents provide the following insight into the responsibilities of CBP agents/officers, and the authority given them and requirements imposed on them:

8 • CBP is the agency responsible for protecting U.S. borders and enforcing immigration laws through the apprehension and detention of aliens who attempt to enter the county illegally, Flores Agreement Report at p. 2;[4]

- Agents are to make "[e]very effort...to promptly process, transfer, transport, remove, or release those in custody as appropriate and as operationally feasible," Custody Policy at p. 3;

- Agents may use restraints on juveniles only in "exigent circumstances," and otherwise "in a manner that is safe, secure, humane, and professional," not "in a punitive manner or in a manner that causes detainees undue pain," National Standards at pp. 5, 15, 23;

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

- Agents may use "objectively reasonable and necessary" force to carry out their law enforcement duties, including the use of: (1) "empty-hand strikes" as a compliance tool, and "other strikes (e.g., punches, kicks, etc.)" as a defensive tactic, "on a subject offering, at a minimum, assaultive resistance"; and (2) "any available weapon" for self-defense or defense of others in "threatening, emergent situations," Use of Force Policy at pp. 1, 23, 27, 37;

- Agents must not leave detainees unattended in a vehicle, and must report any observed or reported injury and provide timely, appropriate medical care, National Standards at pp. 5–6; and

- "Whenever operationally feasible," transport must be conduct by two agents "with at least one being of the same gender...as the detainee(s)," and agents are obligated to take precautionary measures and other actions necessary to protect detainees from sexual abuse and assault, National Standards at pp. 6, 24–25.

Plaintiffs also point out that the Flores Agreement, which governs policy for CBP's treatment of unaccompanied alien children in federal custody, requires that CBP treat minors "with dignity, respect and special concern for their particular vulnerability as minors," "place each detained minor in the least restrictive setting appropriate to the minor's age and special needs," and ensure the safety and well-being of minors detained in CBP facilities. Flores Agreement at ¶¶ 11, 12; Flores Agreement Report at pp. 1–3, 19.

Obviously, Manzanares may not assert the Texas civil privilege defense for his alleged assaults, and Plaintiffs in fact emphasize that his actions were in clear violation of CBP standards and policies. (Dkt. No. 11). However, standing alone, that Manzanares misused the authority given him does not foreclose a showing that he acted within the scope of his employment; again, an employee's assault may be imputed to his employer even when he uses greater force than necessary, and even when the employer has forbidden the particular act. See Hagenloh, 247 S.W.2d at 239. The caveat, which the Court finds dispositive in this case, is that the employee's misapplication of force must be sufficiently connected to his employer's purpose to impute liability.

d. Purpose

9 Plaintiffs claim that Manzanares's purpose for committing the various assaults is a fact-driven inquiry best reserved for a later stage. (Dkt. No. 17). However, the Court finds, as did the Texas court of appeals in Buck, that Plaintiffs' pleaded allegations and other documents properly considered at this stage are dispositive of this question. In Buck, the court affirmed the trial court's summary judgment for a hospital sued under the theory of respondeat superior for a neurologist's sexual assault of a patient. The plaintiff in Buck alleged that while performing a neurological examination, the doctor placed his penis in her hand instead of using the metal weight he had used previously. Buck, 130 S.W.3d at 289. Looking only to the plaintiff's pleaded allegations, the appellate court reasoned that "it cannot be fathomed that the action was in furtherance of the employer's business or for the accomplishment of an object for which [the doctor] was employed," since "[a]t the very moment [the doctor] placed his body part in [the plaintiff's] hand (assuming he did), he was acting in his own prurient interest and ceased to be acting for the employer." Id. at 289–90. Citing to Durand, supra, the court also found that the assault > was [not] so connected with and immediately arising out of [the doctor's] employment tasks as to merge the activities into one indivisible tort. A club bouncer has an inherently confrontational job that may well require physical force; whereas, neurology is not an inherently sexual profession and never requires the action allegedly perpetrated by [the doctor].

Buck, 130 S.W.3d at 290 (internal citation omitted). On these bases, the court concluded as a matter of law that the neurologist's conduct did not arise out of the course and scope of his employment. Id. Plaintiffs rely on the contrast to Durand drawn by Buck, but neither Durand nor G.T. Mgmt., supra—both cases involving assaults committed by club bouncers and imputed to the employer—are of aid to Plaintiffs in this case. (Dkt. No. 17). Durand involved evidence that the bouncer had the responsibility to control the admittance of customers into the club, and that his assault of the plaintiff immediately followed their discussion of why the bouncer was giving preferential treatment to certain customers—evidence that the assault "was overzealous enforcement of the criteria and procedures used to select waiting customers for admittance into the club." Durand, 879 S.W.2d at 200. In G.T. Mgmt., the court cited to evidence that "the bouncers' duties were to break up the fights and walk the parties out of the club," that they "were expected to signal for back-up with their flashlights when fights occurred," and that they "used choke holds to control the patrons." G.T. Mgmt., 106 S.W.3d at 884. The evidence also included testimony that the plaintiff was under suspicion by one bouncer for having thrown a bottle in the club, and that after back-up was summoned, the force employed by the bouncers included grabbing the plaintiff from behind and pinning his arms, hitting him in the face with their flashlights, and throwing him down the steps of the club entrance. Id. at 882. The court concluded that the case before it was similar to Durand, in that the bouncers' assault of the plaintiff was incidental to their use of authorized force against him. Id. at 884.

In contrast to these cases, which involve a close connection between (1) the employees' duties and the use of force sanctioned by their employers, and (2) the force actually employed, Manzanares's duties to apprehend, detain, and transport Plaintiffs, and the authority given him by CBP to use "objectively reasonable and necessary" force to carry out these duties, are in stark contrast to the alleged abuse inflicted by Manzanares on Plaintiffs in this case: dragging M.D.C.G. and N.L.M.C. out of his truck and dragging M.D.C.G. up a hill; knifing, strangling, and choking M.D.C.G. and N.L.M.C. and twisting their necks to the point that they were rendered unconscious; tying J.M.A.E. to a tree; and finally, sexually assaulting the minors. The Court recognizes, as Plaintiffs emphasize, that "[e]ven if the employee's act would not be imputed to the employer when the act is considered in isolation, the employer can be found liable if the employee's act is connected with and immediately grows out of another act of the employee that is imputable to the master." (Dkt. No. 17) (citing Houston Transit Co. v. Felder, 208 S.W.2d 880, 881 (Tex. 1948) (after plaintiff's car rear-ended company bus, bus driver who approached plaintiff's car to get information, and in the course of doing so struck plaintiff with a money-changing box, committed assault "while...about his master's business and before he had finished his mission"); Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Cobb, 45 S.W.2d 323, 325–26 (Tex. App.Austin 1931, writ dism'd w.o.j.) (railway company employee's shooting of plaintiff, even if it exceeded his authority and was accomplished with personal weapon carried in violation of employer's rules, immediately grew out his efforts to prevent plaintiff from interfering with his duties to control switching of railroad cars and to protect employer's property, train crew, and other persons from improper switching of cars upon plaintiff's signals); Hooper v. Pitney Bowes, Inc., 895 S.W.2d 773, 777 (Tex. App.–Texarkana 1995, writ denied) (alleged defamatory statements about plaintiff were made in course of supervisors' effort to investigate plaintiff's conduct as their subordinate, and were within scope of employment even if investigation was in part conducted through activities of which company would not have approved)). However, in contrast to the cases cited by Plaintiffs, in this case Plaintiffs' allegations make clear that any acts imputable to the employer met their end well enough before the assaults began as to eliminate the requisite close connection. That is, Plaintiffs allege that after Manzanares first apprehended Plaintiffs and took custody over them in his official vehicle, he told them that they would be transported to a facility for mothers and children—actions consistent with his duties as a CBP agent. After making several stops, and at some point placing restraint bands on Plaintiffs and transferring them to the back of his vehicle, Manzanares stopped at "what appeared to be a government building" occupied by CBP personnel. Similar to Buck, the Court can pronounce on the basis of the current record that no CBP agent would ever have reason to do what Manzanares allegedly did next: drive away from the government building and instead transport three restrained female detainees, two of them minors, to unpopulated or private areas and then remove them from his vehicle, one by one, to inflict unprovoked physical and sexual abuse on them. Although the assaults may have been facilitated by Manzanares's duties and authority to use force, they were not so connected with the purpose and authority given him by CBP as to render his actions within the scope of his employment.

10 Plaintiffs cite to an additional case in an effort to show that even if Manzanares's tortious actions were in part for his own purposes, they can still be within the scope of his employment. (Dkt. No. 17). In Best Steel Buildings, Inc. v. Hardin, 553 S.W.2d 122 (Tex. App.–Tyler, writ ref'd n.r.e.), a wrongful death case arising from an automobile-truck collision attributed to the employee's negligence while acting in the scope of his employment, the court observed that even if "the preponderate motive of the servant is to benefit himself or a third person," Texas law directs that "[i]f the purpose of serving the master's business actuates the servant to any appreciable extent, the master is subject to liability if the act otherwise is within the service of his employer." Best Steel Bldgs., 553 S.W.2d at 128 (citing cases). Thus, the court determined that "[e]ven had it been established that [the employee] attended to some personal business or visited his family while on the trip" during which the accident occurred, "if, as the jury found, he was directed to make the trip in furtherance of the affairs of his employer, he would nevertheless be in the course and scope of his employment." Id. Here, Plaintiffs' allegations themselves, and other documents properly considered at this stage, make evident that any actions that could have been directed by CBP in furtherance of its purposes ended when Manzanares proceeded, with three female detainees bound in the back of his vehicle, away from any government facility, and instead to unpopulated or private areas conducive to his unprovoked assaults.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

Finally, Plaintiffs contend that "the personal animosity exception does not mean that the employee cannot become angry, displeased, abusive, or even violent in the course and scope of his employment," citing to Soto v. El Paso Natural Gas Co., 942 S.W.2d 671 (Tex. App.–El Paso, writ denied), for support. (Dkt. No. 17). Soto involved evidence that a supervisor became angry with a secretary, "berated her with his face in hers, and pushed into her breast with the side of his hand," thereby assaulting her, when she failed to type a label quickly enough to suit him. Soto, 942 S.W.2d at 681. Since evidence existed that the incident occurred at the work place during regular hours, that the supervisor had the authority to ask the secretary to type labels for him, and that typing labels was a regular part of the secretary's duties, the court determined that a fact question existed as to whether the supervisor's acts were in the scope of his employment. Id. Although Manzanares's abuse of Plaintiffs may have occurred, in part, during work hours, for the reasons explained supra, the record at this stage makes clear that he did not become abusive in the course of carrying out any authorized task.

The Court agrees with Plaintiffs that the scope inquiry is a factually intensive one, but in this case, the detailed, pleaded facts are dispositive. It is irrelevant what Manzanares's actual motive was—personal animosity or, as Plaintiffs posit, "a desire and need for power and control over others"—since the record makes clear that his motive was not his employer's. (Dkt. No. 17). When he inflicted physical and sexual abuse on Plaintiffs, Manzanares was departing from CBP's purposes to such an extent that his actions must be deemed his own, and his employer may not be held liable for them under the theory that he was acting in the scope of his employment. Accordingly, the FTCA does not waive Defendant's sovereign immunity to suit for Manzanares's alleged assaults, and the Court must dismiss this cause of action for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction.

E. False Imprisonment/False Arrest

In Texas, the essential elements of the intentional tort of false imprisonment are: (1) willful detention; (2) without consent; and (3) without authority of law. E.g., Randall's Food Markets, Inc. v. Johnson, 891 S.W.2d 640, 644 (Tex. 1995). "A detention may be accomplished by violence, by threats, or by any other means that restrains a person from moving from one place to another." Id. at 644–45. "Where it is alleged that a detention is effected by a threat, the plaintiff must demonstrate that the threat was such as would inspire in the threatened person a just fear of injury to her person, reputation, or property." Id. at 645. False arrest is not a separate cause of action, but a means of committing a false imprisonment. Whirl v. Kern, 407 F.2d 781, 790 (5th Cir. 1968); see Villegas v. Griffin Indus., 975 S.W.2d 745, 754 (Tex. App.–Corpus Christi 1998, no pet.) (where justness of imprisonment depends on whether officers had probable cause to arrest, false imprisonment and false arrest claims are indistinguishable and share the same elements).

11 Plaintiffs' Complaint alleges that Manzanares initially had the consent of M.D.C.G., N.L.M.C., and J.M.A.E. "to detain them and take them to a CBP facility." (Dkt. No. 1 at ¶ 60). However, when he instead took Plaintiffs to various remote areas and kept them in restraints while he abused them, Manzanares's willful detention of Plaintiffs lacked their consent and the authority of law. Id. Plaintiffs also allege that the false imprisonment did not end when they were rescued from Manzanares. Id. at ¶ 61. Rather, M.D.C.G. and N.L.M.C. were separated and not permitted to see each other for days, and J.M.A.E. was kept under guard and not permitted to be with her family for nearly a month. Id.

In sum, Plaintiffs claim false imprisonment by (1) Manzanares and (2) those agents of Defendant responsible for taking custody of Plaintiffs after their rescue, and seek to impute the alleged tortious conduct of these agents to the United States. Again, Defendant moves for dismissal of this claim on the grounds that Manzanares could not have been acting in the scope of his employment when he engaged in this conduct. (Dkt. No. 11). Plaintiffs' briefing concentrates largely on their assault claim, and offers no citation to any Texas case discussing employer liability for false imprisonment. (Dkt. No. 17).[5] The failure is inconsequential, however, as the Court finds that precedent applicable to all Texas respondeat superior claims requires a finding that Manzanares's actions could not have been within scope of his employment for reasons set forth in Plaintiffs' own pleading: they allege that Manzanares "never had any intention of detaining them lawfully to take them directly to a CBP detention center or office; rather he detained them for his own personal purposes...." (Dkt. No. 1 at ¶ 62) (emphasis added). Plaintiffs' detailed factual allegations, and the CBP standards and policies to which they cite, reinforce this admission. Although Manzanares had the general authority to detain Plaintiffs when he encountered them illegally in the United States, and although this authority may have facilitated his actions, he wholly departed from the employer-sanctioned purpose for the authority given when he continued his detention of Plaintiffs in order to drive them to remote locations and finally his apartment, remove them one by one from his vehicle, and physically and sexually abuse them.

With respect to Plaintiffs' false imprisonment claim premised on the actions of federal agents other than Manzanares, Defendant does not move to dismiss this claim against the government on any basis. See (Dkt. No. 11). Arguably, these agents were acting in the scope of their employment when they placed Plaintiffs under guard and separated them from their family members, and the Court has no occasion to determine whether any such detention meets the elements of a false imprisonment claim. Therefore, the Court will allow Plaintiffs' false imprisonment claim to proceed in this limited respect.

F. Intentional and Negligent Infliction of Emotional Distress

To recover for the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress in Texas, a plaintiff must prove that (1) the defendant acted intentionally or recklessly; (2) the defendant's conduct was extreme and outrageous; (3) the defendant's actions caused the plaintiff emotional distress; and (4) the emotional distress suffered by the plaintiff was severe. E.g., Twyman v. Twyman, 855 S.W.2d 619, 621 (Tex. 1993). To be extreme and outrageous, conduct must be "so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious, and utterly intolerable in a civilized community." Id. (quoting RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS 46 cmt. d (1965)). Texas does not recognize a cause of action for negligent infliction of emotional distress. Id. at 620–61.

12 In support of their emotional distress claim, Plaintiffs allege that "none of the injuries they sustained were accidental," and that Manzanares's conduct—the "brutal and drawn out torture of each plaintiff," in part within the others' view or earshot—"will remain mental scars years after physical injuries diminish." Id. at ¶ 64 (emphasis omitted). According to Plaintiffs, each suffers from "severe post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) as a result of her harrowing ordeal with Manzanares." Id. at ¶ 65. Plaintiffs also allege that "their trauma did not end when they were rescued from Manzanares," but continued as "M.D.C.G. and her minor daughter, N.L.M.C., were separated for three days while the other could only imagine the state the other was in after their ordeal." Id. Further, "[e]ven after the nightmare she'd experienced, the minor then-14–year–old plaintiff J.M.A.E., who'd been tortured for nearly 24 hours, was not permitted to be with her family for a month." Id.

Plaintiffs' emotional distress claim against Defendant, like their false imprisonment claim, is premised on the actions of (1) Manzanares and (2) other federal agents who detained Plaintiffs after the ordeal with Manzanares had ended, and who separated them from their family members. With respect to the claim stemming from Manzanares's conduct, the Court first notes that this claim plainly "arises out of" Manzanares's alleged assault and false imprisonment of Plaintiffs for purposes of the FTCA law enforcement proviso waiver of sovereign immunity. See Truman v. United States, 26 F.3d 592, 595 (5th Cir. 1994) ("[i]f the conduct on which [the plaintiff] bases her claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress constitutes a claim 'arising out of' what is traditionally taken to be a tort enumerated in section 2680(h)," emotional distress claim barred under intentional tort exception to FTCA waiver of immunity). For this reason, and for the reasons discussed supra, the Court agrees with Defendant that Manzanares could not have been acting in the scope of his employment when he inflicted emotional distress on Plaintiffs in the course of engaging in the conduct also alleged to constitute assault and false imprisonment. See (Dkt. No. 11). Defendant does not, however, challenge Plaintiffs' emotional distress claim premised on the actions of the agents other than Manzanares. See id. Therefore, the Court will allow Plaintiffs' intentional infliction of emotional distress claim, as limited, to proceed.

G. Negligence of Manzanares

The elements of a negligence cause of action under Texas law are (1) the existence of a legal duty; (2) a breach of that duty; and (3) damages proximately caused by the breach. IHS Cedars Treatment Ctr. of DeSoto, Tex., Inc. v. Mason, 143 S.W.3d 794, 798 (Tex. 2004). Manzanares's alleged breaches of the duties owed to Plaintiffs consist entirely of actions also alleged to constitute the intentional torts of assault and false imprisonment, and thus for the reasons discussed supra, the Court agrees with Defendant that these actions could not have been taken within the scope of Manzanares's employment for purposes of the FTCA waiver of sovereign immunity. See (Dkt. No. 1 at ¶ 69; Dkt. No. 11).[6] Accordingly, Plaintiffs' negligence claim must be dismissed in its entirety for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction.

IV. Defendant's Rule 12(b)(6) Motion to Dismiss

A. Standard of Review

Dismissal is proper under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) for a party's "failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted." FED. R. CIV. P. 12(b)(6). Rule 12(b)(6) is read in conjunction with the pleading standard set forth in Rule 8(a), which requires "a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief." FED. R. CIV. P. 8(a)(2); see Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 677–68 (2009). This standard does not require detailed factual allegations. Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678 (quoting Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 555 (2007)). However, a party's "obligation to provide the 'grounds' of his 'entitle[ment]' to relief requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555 (internal citations omitted). To survive a Rule 12(b)(6) motion, the complaint and any other matters properly considered[7] must contain "sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to 'state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.' " Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678 (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570). A claim has facial plausibility when the pleaded factual content allows the court, drawing upon its "judicial experience and common sense," to reasonably infer that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged. Id. at 678 (citing Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556), 679. "But where the well-pleaded facts do not permit the court to infer more than the mere possibility of misconduct, the complaint has alleged—but it has not 'show[n]'—'that the pleader is entitled to relief.' " Id. at 679 (quoting FED. R. CIV. P. 8(a)(2)).

B. Overview of Grounds for Dismissal

13 Defendant invokes Rule 12(b)(6) as an alternate basis for the dismissal of Plaintiffs' assault and battery, false imprisonment/false arrest, intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress, and negligence claims to the extent that they are premised on the alleged tortious conduct of Manzanares, on the grounds that Plaintiffs fail to state a plausible claim that Manzanares acted within the scope of his employment. (Dkt. No. 11). Since the Court has already dismissed these claims under Rule 12(b)(1), Defendant's Rule 12(b)(6) Motion is moot in this respect. [8]

Defendant also moves for dismissal of Plaintiffs' negligent hiring, retention, and supervision claims under Rule 12(b)(6), but in doing so, does not dispute that the agents/officers whose acts or omissions form the bases for these claims were acting in the scope of their employment for purposes of the FTCA. See (Dkt. No. 11). Further, as Plaintiffs observe, Defendant does not challenge the existence of the requisite private analog for these claims under Texas law. (Dkt. No. 17); see id. Rather, Defendant moves for dismissal on the grounds that Plaintiffs have failed to plead anything other than conclusory allegations to support the foreseeability element of these claims. (Dkt. No. 11).

C. Analysis

Plaintiffs allege that Defendant, through its agents or officers other than Manzanares, was negligent in its hiring and retention of Manzanares by: (1) failing to perform an appropriate investigation of Manzanares prior to March 12, 2014, "particularly in view of prior complaints/evidence of his abuse, assault(s), and/or excessive use of force by Officer Manzanares with regard to females while previously performing authorized duties or otherwise on-duty"; and (2) failing "to have accurately and/or adequately reported results of [the] investigation concerning, and/or [to have] taken prospective/remedial action with regard to" Manzanares prior to March 12, 2014. (Dkt. No. 1 at ¶ 71). Plaintiffs further allege that Defendant was negligent in its supervision of Manzanares by failing to ensure that he "did not have isolated access to...females, including migrants/immigrants, while performing his job on or about March 12, 2014, particularly in view of prior complaints/evidence of abuse, assault(s), and/or excessive use of force by Officer Manzanares with regard to other females while previously performing authorized duties or otherwise on-duty." Id. Plaintiffs also make more generalized allegations of negligent hiring, retention, and supervision, including that Defendant was negligent in its "enforcement of policies, procedures, regulations, and/or other directives," and in its "use of independent contractors or outside agencies to conduct otherwise fundamental processes relating to hiring, supervision, and/or retention of CBP employees" prior to March 12, 2014. Id. Plaintiffs assert that Defendant's negligence was a proximate cause of and/or significant contributing factor to Plaintiffs' injuries. Id.

Defendant correctly observes that under Texas law, Plaintiffs' negligent hiring, retention, and supervision claims all require a showing that (1) the employer owed a legal duty to protect third parties from the employee's actions; and (2) the third party sustained damages proximately caused by the employer's breach of that legal duty. (Dkt. No. 11) (citing Rosell v. Cent. W. Motor Stages, Inc., 89 S.W.3d 643, 655 (Tex. App.–Dallas 2002, pet. denied)). The threshold inquiry in all negligence cases is the existence of a duty —"a question of law for the court to decide from the facts surrounding the occurrence in question." Greater Houston Transp. Co. v. Phillips, 801 S.W.2d 523, 525 (Tex. 1990). "In determining whether the defendant was under a duty, the court will consider several interrelated factors, including the risk, foreseeability, and likelihood of injury weighed against the social utility of the actor's conduct, the magnitude of the burden of guarding against the injury, and the consequences of placing the burden on the defendant." Id. "Of all these factors, foreseeability of the risk is the foremost and dominant consideration." Id. (quoting El Chico Corp. v. Poole, 732 S.W.2d 306, 311 (Tex. 1987)) (internal quotations omitted). Foreseeability is also one of two elements comprising proximate cause. IHS Cedars Treatment Ctr., 143 S.W.3d at 798. "Foreseeability means that an actor, as a person of ordinary intelligence, should have anticipated the dangers that his negligent act created for others." Lee Lewis Constr., Inc. v. Harrison, 70 S.W.3d 778, 785 (Tex. 2001) (quoting Travis v. City of Mesquite, 830 S.W.2d 94, 98 (Tex. 1992)) (internal quotations omitted). The other element of proximate cause is cause-in-fact, which is established "when the act or omission was a substantial factor in bringing about the injuries, and without it, the harm would not have occurred." IHS Cedars Treatment Ctr., 143 S.W.3d at 798–99. [9]

14 Defendant appears to ask that the Court decline to find the existence of a duty or proximate cause on the basis of Plaintiffs' allegations, asserting that "Plaintiffs have failed to plead sufficient facts to show that the United States should have foreseen a risk of Manzanares committing" the conduct alleged in this case. (Dkt. No. 11). Emphasizing the criminal nature of that conduct, Defendant analogizes to cases in which courts have declined to impose liability on employers for the criminal acts of their employees, resulting in injury to third parties. Id. For example, in Guidry v. National Freight, Inc., 944 S.W.2d 807 (Tex. App.–Austin 1997, no writ), a woman sexually assaulted by a truck driver sued the driver's employer under theories of negligent hiring, retention, and supervision. Guidry, 944 S.W.2d at 809. After stopping his truck in a parking lot, the driver had wandered through an adjacent neighborhood, eventually encountering the plaintiff on her walk home and dragging her into an adjoining apartment complex to rape her. Id. The court of appeals recognized that "[a]n employer can be held directly liable for hiring or retaining an incompetent employee, especially where the occupation at issue could cause hazard to others or requires skilled or experienced persons." Id. at 810 (citing RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 378 (1965)). Further, "[l]iability is imposed when [an employer] brings into contact or association with [a] vulnerable person an individual whom the entity knows or should know is particularly likely to commit intentional misconduct, under circumstances which afford a peculiar opportunity or temptation for such misconduct." Id. (citing Golden Spread Council of Boy Scouts v. Akins, 926 S.W.2d 287, 291 (Tex. 1996); RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 302B, cmt. e (1965)). Although the employer in Guidry had a duty to hire competent drivers, the court declined to impose the additional duty to determine whether prospective or current employees have a non-vehicular criminal record, and to refuse to hire or retain them on that basis. Id. at 810. The court explained that the driver should never have come into contact with the plaintiff in the exercise of his duties as an employee, and thus the sexual assault was not foreseeable by the employer at the time of hiring. Id. at 811. The plaintiff also was not a member of a vulnerable or specially protected group with whom the driver could be expected to come into contact during his work. Id. Since the employer's obligation with respect to hiring, retaining, and supervising its drivers "did not flow to [the plaintiff] so as to impose upon [the employer] a duty to protect one in her position from sexual assault by one of its drivers," the employer could not be held liable. Id. at 811–12.

In Houser v. Smith, 968 S.W.2d 542 (Tex. App.–Austin 1998, no pet.), also cited by Defendant, the court of appeals relied on Guidry in holding that the employer was not liable for negligently hiring or supervising an employee of his transmission shop who sexually assaulted the plaintiff after hours at the shop. The plaintiff was a customer of the shop, and at the employee's invitation, accompanied him to an employer-sponsored barbecue at a tavern, leaving her car in the shop so they could drive to the event together. Houser, 968 S.W.2d at 543. At the end of the night, the plaintiff drove them both back to the shop to retrieve her car, and upon their return was sexually assaulted by the employee at gunpoint. Id. The court recognized that "the theory of negligent hiring and supervision imposes a general duty on an employer to adequately hire, train, and supervise employees." Id. at 544 (citing Dieter v. Baker Serv. Tools, 739 S.W.2d 405 (Tex. App.–Corpus Christi 1987, writ denied)). Although the employee need not be acting in the scope of his employment to impose liability on the employer, as is required for respondeat superior claims, "the theory of negligent hiring and supervision does require that a plaintiff's harm be the result of the employment." Id. (citing Dieter, 739 S.W.2d at 408). As in Guidry, the court in Houser determined that the criminal conduct at issue and the harm inflicted on the plaintiff were not foreseeable, and concluded that the employer did not owe a legal duty to his customers, including the plaintiff, beyond the duty to provide a competent transmission mechanic. Id. at 545. Also as in Guidry, the plaintiff was not a member of a vulnerable or specially protected group so as to impose a duty on the employer to diligently investigate the employee's background. Id. at 545–46.

In arriving at its holding, Houser distinguished the facts before it from those at issue in Estate of Arrington v. Fields, 578 S.W.2d 173 (Tex. Civ. App.–Tyler 1979, writ ref'd n.r.e.), in which the employer was found liable for negligently hiring an employee with a long criminal record for the position of an armed security guard. Id. at 545 (citing Estate of Arrington, 578 S.W.2d at 184). Houser reasoned that "[t]he foreseeability that some harm might come to a customer is greater when the employee is armed and charged with carrying out a hazardous job that requires skill or experience." Id. (citing Estate of Arrington, 578 S.W.2d at 178). In contrast, the transmission shop employee's job "did not require him to be in close and possibly confrontational situations with customers or to carry a dangerous weapon, nor did it require skill or experience beyond that of a mechanic." Id.

15 Guidry and Houser serve to highlight the weakness of Defendant's challenge to foreseeability at the pleading stage of this case, which is more akin to Estate of Arrington. Manzanares was not hired as a truck driver or a mechanic, but as an armed Border Patrol agent. In that capacity, it was certainly expected that he would come into contact—often in remote areas—with persons who had illegally entered the United States, including women and minors specially protected as vulnerable persons under the Flores Agreement. Defendant also could reasonably anticipate that its agents stationed along the U.S.–Mexico border, as Manzanares was, would be placed in situations requiring competency in the use of force, and also affording an opportunity for the misuse of force against those taken into their custody, including women and children.[10] Importantly, "[f]oreseeability does not require an actor to anticipate the precise manner in which the injury will occur; instead, the injury need only be of a general character that the actor might reasonably anticipate." Lee Lewis Constr., 70 S.W.3d at 785. The Court finds that Defendant could be expected to foresee at least the general character, if not the degree, of the conduct and the harm inflicted here—the physical and even sexual abuse of female detainees, including minors, by its Border Patrol agents—in the absence of the duties indicated by Plaintiffs' Complaint: adequate background investigations into prospective and current agents,[11] internal reporting of complaints of similar abuse by prospective and current agents while on duty, appropriate remedial actions taken in response to such complaints, and adequate supervision of these agents so as to guard against repeated abuse.

Defendant also takes the position that foreseeability does not exist under the facts of this case "in light of Plaintiffs' failure to allege that the United States had any knowledge of information that might have even hinted that Manzanares would engage in criminal misconduct." (Dkt. No. 11). However, Plaintiffs have alleged that Defendant through its agencies, thought to be ICE and/or the FBI, knew of Manzanares "having abused persons in his custody and control," "that there had been investigations into abuse and his wrongful use of excessive force," and that "[t]he prior allegations included complaints of attacks on women in a physical, mental, and/or sexual manner." (Dkt. No. 1 at ¶ 40; see also ¶ 71). Plaintiffs also allege that the CBP Sector/Station to which Manzanares was assigned was "placed on notice" about a direct failure by managerial level employees to enforce policies and/or internal protocol regarding the use of excessive force and the handling of women and unaccompanied minors. Id. at ¶ 41. At this stage, these combined allegations at least state a plausible claim that the general character of the conduct and harm that occurred in this case were the reasonably foreseeable result of Defendant's hiring and retention of Manzanares despite its knowledge of the complaints against him, and of Defendant's failure to adequately supervise him—for example, as alleged by Plaintiffs, by ensuring that Manzanares did not gain isolated access to females by patrolling alone. In sum, the Court finds that Plaintiffs have made sufficient allegations of foreseeability to support the duty and proximate cause elements of their negligent hiring, retention, and supervision claims.

V. Conclusion

16 For the foregoing reasons, the Court hereby ORDERS that Defendant's Rule 12(b)(1) Motion to Dismiss is GRANTED with respect to Plaintiffs' FTCA claims for (1) assault and battery, (2) false imprisonment/false arrest, (3) intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress, and (4) negligence, all premised on the conduct of U.S. Border Patrol Agent Manzanares; and DENIED with respect to Plaintiffs' FTCA claims for (1) false imprisonment/false arrest and (2) intentional infliction of emotional distress, both premised on the conduct of those agents or officers of Defendant responsible for detaining Plaintiffs after their rescue.

The Court further ORDERS that Defendant's Rule 12(b)(6) Motion is DENIED with respect to Plaintiffs' FTCA negligent hiring, retention, and supervision claims, and otherwise MOOT.

SO ORDERED.

All Citations

Not Reported in Fed. Supp., 2016 WL 6638845

Footnotes

1 The remaining Plaintiff, D.E.G., was not directly involved in the incident, and sues only on behalf of her minor daughter, J.M.A.E.

2 The Court will employ Plaintiffs' interchangeable use of the terms "agent" and "officer," and "CBP" and "Border Patrol."

3 The Court finds it appropriate to take judicial notice of these documents, which may be found at: (1) https://www.cbp.gov/sites/default/files/documents/UseofForcePolicyHandbook.pdf; (2) https://www.cbp.gov/sites/default/files/documents/cbp-teds-policy-20151005_1.pdf; (3) https://cliniclegal.org/sites/default/files/attachments/flores_v._reno_settlement_agreement_1.pdf; and (4) https://www.oig.dhs.gov/assets/Mgmt/OIG_10-117_Sep10.pdf; and (5) http://foiarr.cbp.gov/streamingWord.asp?i=378. See FED. R. EVID. 201.

4 In its attempt to draw a contrast between the lawful objectives of CBP and Manzanares's conduct, Defendant also draws the Court's attention to a publicly available document of which the Court takes judicial notice: the CBP website page entitled "Border Patrol Overview," which also describes the agency's primary mission as detecting and preventing the illegal entry of aliens into the United States. (Dkt. No. 11) (citing https://www.cbp.gov/border-security/along-us-borders/overview).

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

5 Plaintiffs do offer a citation to Wal–Mart Stores, Inc. v. Odem, 929 S.W.2d 513 (Tex. App.–San Antonio 1996, writ denied), in which the court upheld the jury's verdict that a Wal–Mart employee had falsely imprisoned a customer while searching her purse for suspected stolen merchandise. However, the court did not discuss the employer's liability for this tort.

6 Again, regardless of whether this claim "arises out of" the intentional torts of assault and false imprisonment under § 2680(h), or is for personal injury caused by Manzanares's "negligent act" under § 1346(b)(1), Manzanares must have been acting within the scope of his employment for the United States to be held liable for his conduct under the FTCA.

7 "Generally, a court ruling on a 12(b)(6) motion may rely on the complaint, its proper attachments, 'documents incorporated into the complaint by reference, and matters of which a court may take judicial notice.' " Randall D. Wolcott, M.D., P.A. v. Sebelius, 635 F.3d 757, 763 (5th Cir. 2011) (quoting Dorsey v. Portfolio Equities, Inc., 540 F.3d 333, 338 (5th Cir. 2008)); see also Lone Star Fund V (U.S.), L.P. v. Barclays Bank PLC, 594 F.3d 383, 387 (5th Cir. 2010) (court's review on 12(b)(6) motion "is limited to the complaint, any documents attached to the complaint, and any documents attached to the motion to dismiss that are central to the claim and referenced by the complaint.").

8 As to the claims that survive the Rule 12(b)(1) challenge—Plaintiffs' false imprisonment/false arrest and intentional infliction of emotional distress claims premised on the actions of those agents responsible for detaining Plaintiffs after their rescue—Defendant offers no basis for dismissal under Rule 12(b)(6). See (Dkt. No. 11).

9 Defendant refers to the absence of well-pleaded facts to support this element in the heading preceding its argument, but not in the argument itself, which focuses on foreseeability. See (Dkt. No. 11).

10 The Court's observation is supported by the publicly available (although partially redacted) report cited by Plaintiffs' response, and of which the Court takes judicial notice: the "CBP Use of Force Training and Actions to Address Use of Force Incidents" ("CBP Use of Force Report") published by DHS in September 2013, and therefore during Manzanares's employment and approximately six months before the incident in question. (Dkt. No. 17) (citing CBP Use of Force Report, available at https://www.oig.dhs.gov/assets/Mgmt/2013/OIG_13-114_Sep13.pdf). The document discusses DHS's internal review of allegations regarding the use of excessive force by CBP employees, including incidents categorized as detainee/alien abuse and criminal misconduct, and reports that within CBP Office of Border Patrol ("OBP"), "98 percent of FY 2011 uses of force and 98 percent of FY 2012 uses of force were along the southwest border." (CBP Use of Force Report at pp. 6, 13).

11 Plaintiffs emphasize that the CBP Use of Force Report discussed the implementation of pre-employment polygraph examinations to detect "unsuitable candidates who might otherwise have been selected," and that they "believe the evidence will likely show Manzanares was one of the officers who fell through the cracks of the system." (Dkt. No. 17); see (CBP Use of Force Report at pp. 5, 21). These allegations are outside the bounds of Plaintiffs' pleading, and in any event, the Court's determination of the Motion does not require a finding of a specific duty to polygraph prospective CBP agents; any such duty is subsumed within the duty to conduct adequate pre-employment background investigations.

End of Document

© 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

CASE NO. 24

2025 WL 699353
Only the Westlaw citation
is currently available.
United States District Court, W.D.
Texas, San Antonio Division.

Michael GAONA and Aleshea Chanel Thames, Plaintiffs,
v.
WELLS FARGO BANK, N.A. and Timothy Wells, Defendants.

SA
-
23
-
CV
-
280
-
FB
(
HJB
)
|

Signed February 13, 2025

Attorneys and Law Firms

Paul G. Vick, Law Offices of Paul G. Vick, San Antonio, TX, for Plaintiffs.

Collin K. Brodrick, Fisher & Phillips LLP, Dallas, TX, Jacqueline Del Villar, Brian D. Guerinot, Stephen J. Roppolo, Fisher & Phillips L.L.P., Houston, TX, for Defendant Wells Fargo Bank, N.A.

Jacqueline Del Villar, Brian D. Guerinot, Stephen J. Roppolo, Fisher & Phillips L.L.P., Houston, TX, for Defendant Timothy Wells.

REPORT AND RECOMMENDATION OF UNITED STATES MAGISTRATE JUDGE

Henry J. Bemporad, United States Magistrate Judge

1 To the Honorable United States District Judge Fred Biery:

This Report and Recommendation concerns Defendants' Motion for Summary Judgment and Brief in Support (Docket Entry 25). Pretrial matters have been referred to the undersigned for consideration. (Docket Entry 5.) For the reasons set out below, I recommend that the motion be GRANTED IN PART and DENIED IN PART.

I. Jurisdiction.

Plaintiffs assert one federal claim and two related state-law claims arising out of the termination of their employment with Defendant Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. ("Wells Fargo"). (Docket Entry 1-1, at 5–7.) The Court has original jurisdiction over the federal claim pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1331 and supplemental jurisdiction over the related state-law claims pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1367. The undersigned has the authority to issue this Report and Recommendation pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1)(B).

II. Background.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

A. Plaintiffs' Employment at Wells Fargo.

Plaintiff Michael Gaona began working for Wells Fargo on January 29, 2007, as a lead teller at a branch in Lakehills, Texas. (Docket Entry 25-1, at 3.) Sometime shortly thereafter, Gaona transferred to the Marbach branch in San Antonio, Texas, still working as a lead teller. (Id. at 4.) In the Spring of 2008, Gaona was promoted to the role of personal banker at the Marbach branch, where he remained for several years. (Id. at 5–6.) Sometime in the Spring of 2012, Gaona was promoted to the role of branch manager for the Martin Luther King Plaza branch. (Id. at 8.) Gaona spent one year managing that branch before being promoted again, in 2013, to the role of branch manager for the larger Foster Road branch. (Id.) Gaona remained in that role—and received two pay raises and a stellar performance review—until his termination on June 17, 2022. (Id. at 8, 15; Docket Entry 25-6, at 10; Docket Entry 34-5, at 2.)

Plaintiff Aleshea Thames, is another former employee of Wells Fargo. She was hired on February 6, 2015, as a personal banker at the branch in La Vernia, Texas. (Docket Entry 25-2, at 3.) Approximately one year later, in March of 2016, Thames transferred to the Foster Road branch in San Antonio, Texas, where Gaona was serving as branch manager. (Id. at 4.) Thames remained at the Foster Road branch until her termination on June 17, 2022. (Docket Entry 34-8, at 3.)

B. Gaona's Military Service.

On October 18, 2019, about six years after assuming his position as branch manager for the Foster Road branch, Gaona enlisted in the Texas Army National Guard ("TANG"). (Docket Entry 25-1, at 9.) On January 2, 2020, Gaona left his position at the Foster Road branch for 10 weeks to attend basic training. (Id. at 10–11.) Upon his return from basic training, on March 13, 2020, Gaona was reinstated in his branch manager position at Foster Road. (Id. at 11–12.) Gaona left the Foster Road branch again on June 1, 2020, after the Governor activated his TANG unit following the murder of George Floyd by police in Minnesota. (Id. at 12; Docket Entry 25-3, at 2.) Two weeks later, Gaona returned to his position as branch manager at Foster Road. (Docket Entry 25-1, at 14; Docket Entry 25-3, at 2.) On June 29, 2020, an article was published on Wells Fargo's employee-intranet page, praising Gaona as a "San Antonio Hero" for his service. (Docket Entry 25-3, at 2.) Gaona left at least once more in December of 2021 to attend TANG annual training, and again was reinstated as branch manager at Foster Road upon his return. (Docket Entry 25-1, at 24.)

2 On May 2, 2022, Gaona received official orders from TANG to appear at ROTC summer training at Fort Knox, Kentucky. (Docket Entry 25-4, at 11.) The training was to last 35 days, beginning on July 5, 2022, and ending on August 8, 2022. (Id.) Gaona already had a general understanding that he would be required to attend such training in the Summer of 2022, and verbally notified Defendant Timothy Wells—Wells Fargo's district manager and Gaona's direct supervisor. (Docket Entry 34-6, at 15.) Once he received his official orders, Gaona immediately emailed a copy of said orders to Wells. (Docket Entry 25-4, at 2.) However, as described in greater detail below, Gaona would no longer be employed by Wells

Fargo by the time he arrived at his scheduled ROTC training. (See id. at 11; Docket Entry 25-6, at 10; Docket Entry 34-1, at 6–7.)

C. Wells Fargo's Investigation into Falsification of Bank Records and Subsequent Termination of Plaintiffs.

In early 2022, Wells Fargo conducted an investigation into the falsification of bank records at bank branches in the San Antonio area. The issue apparently first arose when, in December 2021, Cindy Delgado, manager at the North Star branch, confronted Sasha Shimohata, one of the personal bankers, about some missing documentation. (Docket Entry 25-7, at 8.) Delgado had assigned Shimohata to complete the "control online task" ("COT") of reviewing and documenting any technical exceptions ("TEs") for November of 2021. (Id.) Shimohata had marked the COT complete on November 18, 2021, and Delgado certified that Shimohata completed the COT as directed on December 8, 2021. (See id.; Docket Entry 34-15, at 2.) However, when the personal banker assigned to complete the task for December asked Shimohata for the documents from the previous month, Shimohata reported that she did not have them. (Docket Entry 25-7, at 8) When Delgado asked her where the documents were, Shimohata reported that there were none because there were no TEs in November of 2021. (Id.) Delgado told Shimohata that there were, in fact, five TEs. (Id.) Admonishing Shimohata that marking COTs complete without reviewing or documenting TEs was a "falsification of bank records," Delgado reported the matter to Wells Fargo's HR department. (Id.)

On December 24, 2021, Sarah Nelson, Wells Fargo's risk management specialist, advised district manager Wells of the Shimohata incident. (Docket Entry 25-5, at 3–6.) Wells reached out to Delgado, instructing her to consult with Wells Fargo's employee relations ("ER") department as to how to proceed. (Docket Entry 25-5, at 6.) An investigation into the matter was initiated on January 6, 2022. (Docket Entry 34-9, at 4.) Wells Fargo's investigators concluded that, on November 18, 2021, Shimohata marked a COT as complete without reviewing and documenting the TEs. (Docket Entry 34-9, at 4.) Shimohata reported that the error was not intentional: she may have reviewed the wrong report because she did not see any TEs. (Id. at 2, 4.) Wells Fargo's ER department recommended that Shimohata be terminated, and that Delgado be "coach[ed] ... for having withheld reporting of additional similar incidents by other employees." (Id. at 2–4.)

Wells fired Shimohata on February 28, 2022. (Docket Entry 25-5, at 9; Docket Entry 34-9, at 3.) Delgado, however, was not fired for improperly certifying that Shimohata completed the COT correctly. (Docket Entry 34-6, at 9–10; Docket Entry 34-15, at 2; see Docket Entry 25, at 7; Docket Entry 36, at 3–4.) In January of 2022, Wells Fargo stopped using personal bankers and branch managers to complete and certify COTs. (Docket Entry 34-7, at 2.) From that point on, Wells Fargo entrusted those tasks to a branch supervision program. (Id.)

In light of the North Star incident, district manager Wells initiated an investigation into the rest of the branches under his supervision, to determine whether COTs were being falsely marked or certified as completed anywhere else. (Docket Entry 25-5, at 6; Docket Entry 25-6, at 11–12.) The investigation uncovered that the same misrepresentations had occurred at the Foster Road branch and the branch in Seguin, Texas. (Docket Entry 25-5, at 7.) At the Foster Road branch, the conclusions of the investigation were that Thames had falsely reported completing three consecutive COTs —for October of 2021, November of 2021, and December of 2021—and that Gaona, in turn, had falsely certified their completion. (Docket Entry 25-6, at 2; Docket Entry 25-9, at 2–4; Docket Entry 34-1, at 7; Docket Entry 34-10, at 2–3; Docket Entry 34-13, at 2.) Upon completion of the investigation, Wells Fargo's Regional President, Joe Atkinson, instructed Wells to fire Thames and Gaona. (Docket Entry 25-5, at 8–9.) Wells terminated their employment on June 17, 2022. (Docket Entry 25-1, at 25–26; Docket Entry 25-2, at 5; Docket Entry 25-6, at 10, 13; Docket Entry 34-1, at 6–7.)

3 When Gaona learned of his termination, he denied any wrongdoing, reminded Wells how much he had given to Wells Fargo, and then left the building. (Docket Entry 25-1, at 27.) Thames cried upon learning of her termination. (Docket Entry 25-2, at 6.) Neither Gaona nor Thames asked for any clarification as to the stated reasons for their termination. (Docket Entry 25-1, at 26; 25-2, at 6.) Thames was permitted to gather her things and say goodbye to her coworkers before she left. (Docket Entry 25-2, at 6.)

D. Procedural History.

Plaintiffs filed suit in state court on January 24, 2023. (Docket Entry 1-1.) In their petition, Plaintiffs assert three claims in total—two pertaining to Gaona and one as to Thames. (Id. at 5–7.) As to Gaona, Plaintiffs claim that his termination constituted discrimination on the basis of his TANG-based leaves of absences, in violation of the Uniformed Services Employment and Reemployment Rights Act ("USERRA"), 38 U.S.C. § 4311(a), and its state-law equivalent in the Texas Government Code ("TXSERRA") TEX. GOV. CODE ANN. § 437.2131. (Id. at 5–6.) As to Thames, Plaintiffs claim intentional infliction of emotional distress ("IIED"), alleging that her termination was "part of a scheme to fabricate a pretext for terminating Gaona's employment on the basis of [his] service in the TANG." (Id. at 7.)

Defendants removed the case to this Court on March 7, 2023 (Docket Entry 1), and they have now moved for summary judgment (Docket Entry 25).

III. Summary Judgment Standard.

The purpose of summary judgment is "to isolate and dispose of factually unsupported claims or defenses." Hayes v. Locke Supply Co., 724 F. Supp. 3d 609, 612 (E.D. Tex. 2024) (citing Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 323–24 (1986)). Summary judgment is warranted when "the movant shows that there is no genuine dispute as to any material fact and the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law." FED. R. CIV. P. 56(a). A dispute is genuine "if the evidence is such that a reasonable jury could return a verdict for the nonmoving party." Allen v. United States Postal Serv., 63 F.4th 292, 300 (5th Cir. 2023) (quoting Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 248 (1986)). A disputed fact is material when it "might affect the outcome of the suit under the governing law." Id. (quoting Anderson, 447 U.S. at 248).

The party moving for summary judgment "bears the initial burden of ... demonstrat[ing] the absence of a genuine issue of material fact." Espinoza v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., No. 7:19-CV-00299, 2020 WL 5040409, at *1 (S.D. Tex. Aug. 26, 2020) (quoting Lynch Props. v. Potomac Ins. Co. of Ill., 140 F.3d 622, 625 (5th Cir. 1998)). To demonstrate such absence, "the movant must point to competent evidence in the record, such as documents, affidavits, and deposition testimony and must 'articulate precisely how this evidence supports [it].' " Espinoza, 2020 WL 5040409, at *1 (quoting RSR Corp. v. Int'l Ins. Co., 612 F.3d 851, 857 (5th Cir. 2010)). If the movant fails to do so, summary judgment "must be denied, regardless of the nonmovant's response." Espinoza, 2020 WL 5040409, at *1 (quoting Pioneer Expl., L.L.C. v. Steadfast Ins. Co., 767 F.3d 503, 511 (5th Cir. 2014)). If the movant meets its burden, "the nonmovant must then direct the court's attention to evidence in the record sufficient to establish that there is a genuine issue of material fact for trial." Mary Kay, Inc. v. Weber, 601 F. Supp. 2d 839, 851 (N.D. Tex. 2009) (citing Celotex, 477 U.S. at, 323–24).

4 When the movant "also carries the burden of proof at trial"—e.g., a defendant moving for summary judgment on an affirmative defense —"[its] burden is even higher." Guzman v. Allstate Assur. Co., 18 F.4th 157, 160 (5th Cir. 2021). In that scenario, the movant must "establish beyond peradventure all of the essential elements of the claim [or defense]." Id.; see Fontenot v. Upjohn Co., 780 F.2d 1190, 1194 (5th Cir. 1986)). "[B]eyond peradventure" is a "heavy" standard. Carolina Cas. Ins. Co. v. Sowell, 603 F. Supp. 2d 914, 924 (N.D. Tex. 2009) (citation omitted). But if the movant succeeds, the burden then shifts to the nonmovant to "direct the court's attention to evidence in the record sufficient to establish that there is a genuine issue of material fact for trial." Mary Kay, Inc., 601 F. Supp. 2d at 851 (citing Celotex, 477 U.S. at 323–24).

When considering a motion for summary judgment, the Court "may not make credibility determinations or weigh the evidence." Reeves v. Sanderson Plumbing Prods., Inc., 530 U.S. 133, 150 (2000). Instead, the Court "must view all facts and evidence in the light most favorable to the non-moving party." Feist v. La., Dep't of Just., Off. of the Atty. Gen., 730 F.3d 450, 452 (5th Cir. 2013). This also means that the Court must "construe all reasonable inferences in [the non-movant's] favor." Guzman, 18 F.4th at 160. However, the Court may only do so "when there is an actual controversy, that is, when both parties have submitted evidence of contradictory facts.' " Meaux v. Cooper Consol., LLC, 477 F. Supp. 3d 515, 523 (E.D. La. 2020) (quoting Little v. Liquid Air Corp., 37 F.3d 1069, 1075 (5th Cir. 1994) (en banc)). In making its determinations, the Court need only consider the party's cited materials. FED. R. CIV. P. 56(c)(3); see Am. Fam. Life Assur. Co. of Columbus v. Biles, 714 F.3d 887, 896 (5th Cir. 2013) ("Rule 56 does not impose upon the district court a duty to sift through the record in search of evidence ....") (citation omitted).

IV. Analysis.

Defendant's have moved for summary judgment on Gaona's USERRA claim and Thames's IIED claim. For the reasons set out below, I recommend that summary judgment be denied as to the USERRA claim, but granted as to the IIED claim. [1]

A. Gaona's USERRA Claim.

Gaona claims that he was terminated in violation of USERRA's antidiscrimination provision, 38 U.S.C. § 4311(a). Section 4311(a) provides that a servicemember "shall not be denied ... retention in employment ... or any benefit of employment" because of his or her military service. 38 U.S.C. § 4311(a). An employer violates this prohibition when "membership, ... service, ... or obligation for service in the uniformed services is a motivating factor" in an employment decision. 38 U.S.C. § 4311(c)(1). Military status is a "motivating factor" if it is "one of the reasons" for the employer's action. Garcia-Ascanio v. Spring Indep. Sch. Dist., 74 F.4th 305, 310 (5th Cir. 2023) (citing Bradberry v. Jefferson Cnty., Tex., 732 F.3d 540, 545 (5th Cir. 2013) (citing 20 C.F.R. § 1002.22 (2006))).

5 Like other federal employment discrimination laws, USERRA employs a "burden-shifting framework." Garcia-Ascanio, 74 F.4th at 310. Similar to Title VII cases, the plaintiff in a USERRA case "has the [initial] burden of proving that a status or activity protected by USERRA was one of the reasons for the employer's decision." Bradberry, 732 F.3d at 545 (citing 20 C.F.R. § 1002.22). Put otherwise, "a plaintiff must first establish a prima facie case of discrimination, demonstrating that his participation as a service member was a motivating factor behind the employer's adverse employment action." Hansen v. Alamo Mobile X-Ray & Ekg Servs., Inc., No. SA-14-CA-01070-FB, 2016 WL 7486370, at *2 (W.D. Tex. Feb. 10, 2016). Discriminatory motive may be reasonably inferred from several factors, including:

> [1] proximity in time between the employee's military activity and the adverse employment action, [2] inconsistencies between the proffered reason and other actions of the employer, [3] an employer's expressed hostility towards members protected by the statute together with knowledge of the employee's military activity, and [4] disparate treatment of certain employees compared to other employees with similar work records or offenses.

Garza v. Energy Transfer Partners, L.L.C., No. 3:23-CV-0027-D, 2024 WL 991588, at *6-7 (N.D. Tex. Mar. 7, 2024) (citation omitted), aff'd, No. 24-10208, 2025 WL 304527 (5th Cir. Jan. 27, 2025).

If a plaintiff establishes a prima facie case of discrimination, the burden shifts, but the rules are different than those under Title VII. Instead of imposing a simple burden of production as to a legitimate non-discriminatory reason for its action, USERRA requires the employer "to prove the affirmative defense that it would have taken the action anyway." Garcia-Ascanio, 74 F.4th at 310 (citing Bradberry, 732 F.3d at 547). An employer cannot satisfy its burden by showing that it was motivated in part by a legitimate reason—"[r]ather, the employer must show that its legitimate reason, standing alone, would have induced it to make the same decision." Robinson v. Morris Moore Chevrolet-Buick, Inc., 974 F. Supp. 571, 576 (E.D. Tex. 1997); accord. Mayeaux v. Hous. Indep. Sch. Dist., 986 F. Supp. 2d 842, 850–51 (S.D. Tex. 2014). Additionally, in contrast with Title VII cases, the burden under USERRA does not shift back to the plaintiff to demonstrate that the employer's legitimate reason is pretext—"the burden [remains] on the employer to show lack of pretext." Mayeaux, 986 F. Supp. 2d at 848 (quoting Velazquez-Garcia v. Horizon Lines of P.R., Inc., 473 F.3d 11, 17 (1st Cir. 2007)).

1. Plaintiffs' Prima Facie Case.

Defendants argue that Plaintiffs cannot carry their initial burden of establishing a prima facie case of discrimination. They argue (a) that Plaintiffs have produced no evidence that Defendants ever considered Gaona's TANG service when terminating his employment; (b) that there is no comparator evidence showing disparate treatment of other employees; and (c) that temporal proximity cannot support a prima facie case here. (Docket Entry 25, at 16.) Each argument is addressed below.

a. Consideration of Gaona's National Guard service.

Defendants point out that they continued to employ Gaona after his enlistment in TANG on October 18, 2019, and allowed him to take several military leaves of absence, always to be reinstated in his job upon his return. (Docket Entry 25, at 16, 19; see Docket Entry 25-1, at 10–12, 14, 24; Docket Entry 25-3, at 2). Defendants also point to provisions of Wells Fargo's employee handbook advising employees of their rights under USERRA, including the right to have their jobs reinstated upon return from military leave. (Docket Entry 25, at 16; Docket Entry 25-13, at 4.) Defendants argue that such a policy is evidence that they "respect[ed] and honor[ed] military service," and therefore lacked any discriminatory animus against veterans and servicemen. (Id. (quoting Gill v. Petroleum Co-Ordinators, Inc., No. 6:14-CV-02869, 2016 WL 4574169, at *5 (W.D. La. Aug. 31, 2016).) And, as further evidence that they were supportive of Gaona's military service, Defendants point to the article posted by Delgado on Wells Fargo's intranet system on June 29, 2020, praising Gaona as a hero. (Docket Entry 25, at 20; Docket Entry 25-3, at 2.)

6 To counter Defendants' evidence that they were perfectly accommodating to Gaona or any other servicemembers employed by Wells Fargo, Plaintiffs rely upon portions of Gaona's and Wells' deposition testimonies. (Docket Entry 34, at 8–9, 11.) Plaintiffs point to Gaona's testimony that when he told Wells about his scheduled ROTC training for the Summer of 2022, Wells responded that he was not sure

Wells Fargo could allow that and that he would have to check with the HR department to confirm one way or the other. (Id. at 8; Docket Entry 24-1, at 28.) Gaona assured Wells that the absence was permitted, providing him with information regarding USERRA. (Docket Entry 24-1, at 28.) Gaona also testified that one of Wells Fargo's employees who was to be serve as the acting branch manager during Gaona's leaves of absences was a military veteran, and that he quit his job because the work environment was hostile to servicemembers. (Docket Entry 25, at 9; Docket Entry 25-1, at 11.)

With regard to Wells, Plaintiffs point to his testimony that he had never "managed a service member before" Gaona, and that he researched USERRA once Gaona notified him of his ROTC training in the Summer of 2022, "because it was an extended [amount of] time" for Gaona to be on leave. (Docket Entry 34, at 11 (citing Docket Entry 34-6, at 16–17).) Based on the aforementioned testimony, Plaintiffs argue that it is reasonable to infer "that the adverse employment action against Gaona was related to the extended [ROTC] leave, which was to commence on July 5, 2022." (Docket Entry 34, at 11.)

It is somewhat doubtful that the testimony cited by Plaintiffs, standing alone, is sufficient to withstand summary judgment in this case. However, it is evidence that the Court may wish to consider with the other evidence below in determining whether a genuine dispute of material has been raised regarding Plaintiff's prima facie case.

b. Disparate treatment.

Defendants argue that Plaintiffs have failed to establish a prima facie case of discrimination because they have produced no evidence of disparate treatment of comparable employees. (Docket Entry 25, at 17.) They point out that two other employees—Thames and Shimohata—were terminated for committing the same alleged violations as Gaona—i.e., "falsification of [bank] records." (Id.) Plaintiffs respond that the proper comparator employee is neither Thames nor Shimohata; instead, the proper comparator is Cindy Delgado, a branch manager like Gaona. (Docket Entry 34, at 7, 11–12.) The point is well taken. Whereas Thames and Shimohata were both personal bankers who allegedly falsely marked that COTs were completed, Gaona and Delgado were both branch managers alleged to have certified that their bankers had properly completed the COTs. As such, Delgado appears to be the proper comparator for determining whether disparate treatment occurred.

With Delgado as the comparator, Gaona argues that he can show disparate treatment in this case. Even though Delgado certified that Shimohata completed the COT for November of 2021 when she had not (Docket Entry 34-6, at 9–10; 34-15, at 2), Defendants did not terminate Delgado's employment. (Docket Entry 34, at 11–12; see Docket Entry 25, at 17; Docket Entry 36, at 3–4.) Instead, Delgado ostensibly received "coaching." (Docket Entry 34, at 11–12; Docket Entry 34-9, at 2–4.) Gaona, on the other hand, was fired for certifying that Thames had properly completed her COTs when she allegedly had not. (Docket Entry 25-1, at 25–26; Docket Entry 25-5, at 8–9; Docket Entry 25-6, at 2, 10; Docket Entry 25-11, at 4–5; Docket Entry 34-1, at 6–7.)

Defendants argue that the comparison is improper because "Gaona's and Delgado's behavior with respect to the control online task certification could not have been more different." (Docket Entry 36, at 4.) Specifically, Defendants argue that Delgado "confronted Ms. Shimohata" regarding her one failure to properly complete the COT for November of 2021 and "promptly reported it," whereas Gaona "certified tasks in three (3) consecutive months, ... failed to identify the mistake on his own, and did not report [the] mistake." (Docket Entry 25, at 17.) As Defendants tell it, Shimohata made a mistake and Delgado did everything correctly upon discovering it. But their account fails to acknowledge that Delgado improperly certified the mistake just as Gaona had; moreover, there is some evidence in the record that she had failed to report similar mistakes made by several other employees in the past. (See Docket Entry 34-9, at 2–4; Docket Entry 34-15, at 2.) This evidence is sufficient to raise a genuine dispute as to whether Gaona received treatment disparate from that received by a similarly-situated employee.

c. Temporal proximity.

7 Defendants lastly argue that discriminatory motive should not be inferred from the close temporal proximity between Gaona's termination and his scheduled leave for ROTC training. (Docket Entry 25, at 18–19.) That leave was scheduled from July 5, 2022, to August 8, 2022; Gaona was terminated on June 17, 2022. (Docket Entry 25-4, at 2, 11; Docket Entry 25-6, at 10.) Thus, Gaona was fired a mere 18 days before he was to depart for his month-long ROTC training.

Defendants direct the Court's attention to out-of-circuit cases which stand for the proposition that temporal proximity cannot suffice by itself to establish a plaintiff's prima facie case under USERRA that their military leave was a motivating factor in their termination. (Docket Entry 25, at 18–19.)[2] Plaintiffs, however, have done more than just point to the temporal proximity between Gaona's ROTC leave and his termination. As noted above, they have additionally produced evidence which, if construed in Plaintiffs favor, shows that Wells was taken aback by how long Gaona's ROTC leave was scheduled to last; that a former employee left on account of hostility toward military veterans; and that another branch manager received coaching rather than termination for similar conduct. This evidence, when combined with the fact that Gaona was fired 18 days before he was to go on military leave, establishes a prima facie case of discrimination under USERRA sufficient to withstand a summary judgment motion.

2. Defendants' Affirmative Defense.

Defendants argue that, even if a reasonable jury could infer from the evidence recounted above that Gaona's military service may have been one of the reasons for his termination, he would have been fired regardless of his military status. (Docket Entry 25, at 20–21.) Specifically, they argue that, after a thorough investigation, a bank investigator found that Gaona violated Wells Fargo's policies by committing acts tantamount to falsifying bank records. (Docket Entry 25, at 21.) Defendants then point out that falsification of bank records is a terminable offense under the terms of Wells Fargo's Employee Handbook. (Docket Entry 25, at 21; Docket Entry 25-8, at 3.) Thus, according to Defendants, Gaona's termination was inevitable.

Defendants' argument fails to justify a grant of summary judgment in their favor, for two reasons. First, Wells Fargo's Employee Handbook does not actually require termination for falsifying bank records. To the contrary, it specifically states that "[f]alsifying required documentation can result in corrective action, which may include termination of ... employment." (Docket Entry 25-13, at 3.) Even when discussing grounds for immediate termination, the policy hedges: [f]alsification of records.... may result in immediate termination of employment." (Docket Entry 25-8, at 2–3.) "[T]he word 'may' clearly connotes discretion." Biden v. Tex., 597 U.S. 785, 802 (2022) (emphasis omitted). And the discretionary nature of the policy is confirmed by the facts of this case: Gaona was fired for allegedly falsifying a certification, but Delgado was not. (Compare Docket Entry 25-9 with Docket Entry 34-15.)

8 Second, Plaintiffs have produced some evidence which calls into question the credibility of the investigator upon whose report Gaona's termination was based. Specifically, Plaintiffs identify several statements in the investigator's report where, they claim, he misstated or otherwise falsely characterized their responses to interview questions. (Docket Entry 34, at 8; Docket Entry 34-1, at 4, 8–10; Docket Entry 34-17, at 4–5.) And they point out that Atkinson—Wells Fargo's regional president who ultimately directed Wells to fire Gaona—testified that if "factual findings in the investigative reports turned out to be incorrect," then it would have "ha[d] an impact" on his decision to do so. (Docket Entry 34-14, at 6.) The Court should not resolve the credibility of the investigator: on summary judgment, it "may not make credibility determinations or weigh the evidence," Reeves, 530 U.S. at 150. Suffice it to say that, Given Atkinson's testimony, the discrepancies in the investigator's notes raise additional questions as to the Defendants' asserted basis for terminating Gaona's employment which preclude the Court from finding, beyond peradventure, that Defendants would have terminated Gaona's employment regardless of his TANG service because he certified incomplete COTs. As such, Defendants are not entitled to summary judgment on Gaona's USERRA claim.

B. Thames's IIED Claim.

Thames asserts an IIED claim, alleging that Defendants "terminated [her] employment as part of a scheme to fabricate a pretext for terminating Gaona's employment on the basis of [his] service in the TANG." (Docket Entry 1-1, at 7.) Plaintiffs allege that Thames' termination was extreme and outrageous, that Defendants intended to cause her severe emotional distress, and that she suffered severe emotional distress as a result. (Id. at 7–8.) Plaintiffs' claim fails.

1. Applicable Law.

"Under Texas law, a plaintiff bringing an IIED claim must demonstrate that the defendant [1] intentionally or recklessly [2] engaged in extreme or outrageous conduct [3] that resulted in severe emotional distress." Stelly v. Duriso, 982 F.3d 403, 407–08 (5th Cir. 2020) (citing Standard Fruit & Vegetable Co. v. Johnson, 985 S.W.2d 62, 66 (Tex. 1998)). "The severity of distress is an element of the cause of action, not merely of the damages." Munoz v. H&M Wholesale, Inc., 926 F. Supp. 596, 612 (S.D. Tex. 1996) (collecting cases).

To establish that the defendant acted intentionally or recklessly, a plaintiff must prove that emotional distress was the "intended or primary consequence of the defendant's conduct." GTE Sw., Inc. v. Bruce, 998 S.W.2d 605, 611 (Tex. 1999) (citing Standard Fruit, 985 S.W.2d at 68); accord. Espinosa v. Aaron's Rents, Inc., 484 S.W.3d 533, 546 (Tex. App.—Houston [1st Dist.] 2016, no pet.). An IIED claim is not available when the "emotional distress is solely derivative of or incidental to the intended or most likely consequence of the actor's conduct." McManaway v. KBR, Inc., No. 4:10-CV-1044, 2015 WL 13679501, at *6 (S.D. Tex. Oct. 23, 2015) (quoting Standard Fruit, 985 S.W.2d at 67).

To establish that the defendant's conduct was "extreme and outrageous," a plaintiff must prove that it was "beyond all possible bounds of decency," "atrocious," and "utterly intolerable in a civilized society." Jones v. Dall. Cnty., 47 F. Supp. 3d 469, 479 (N.D. Tex. 2014) (quoting Tex. Farm Bureau Mut. Ins. Cos. v. Sears, 84 S.W.3d 604, 610 (Tex. 2002)). "[T]hat an action is intentional, malicious, or even criminal does not, standing alone, mean that it is extreme or outrageous for purposes of [IIED]." Brewerton v. Dalrymple, 997 S.W.2d 212, 215 (Tex. 1999) (citing RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 46(1) (1965)) "Courts must determine as a threshold matter whether the defendant's conduct may reasonably be regarded as so extreme and outrageous as to permit recovery." City of Midland v. O'Bryant, 18 S.W.3d 209, 216–17 (Tex. 2000) (citation and internal quotation marks omitted). "Only when reasonable minds may differ is it for the jury" to decide. Jones, 47 F. Supp. 3d at 479 (citing GTE Sw., 998 S.W.2d at 616). "[T]he kind of extreme conduct necessary to raise a fact question of [IIED] in the workplace 'exists only in the most unusual of circumstances.' " O'Bryant, 18 S.W.3d at 217 (quoting GTE Sw., 998 S.W.2d at 612–13). Thus, "[t]he fact of [a] discharge itself as a matter of law cannot constitute outrageous behavior." Munoz, 926 F. Supp. at 612 (quoting Wornick Co. v. Casas, 856 S.W.2d 732, 735 (Tex. 1993)).

9 To establish that the emotional distress is sufficiently severe to support liability for IIED, a plaintiff "must prove 'distress that is so severe that no reasonable person could be expected to endure it." Jones, 47 F. Supp. 3d at 479 (quoting GTE Sw., 998 S.W.2d at 618). In short, IIED claims require proof of "an extraordinarily damaging impact on a plaintiff." Amin v. United Parcel Serv., Inc., 66 F.4th 568, 574 (5th Cir. 2023) (holding that emotional distress was insufficiently severe where the plaintiff did not seek treatment, was "withdrawn and no longer happy," and suffered from "anger, depression, and humiliation").

Courts in Texas have held emotional distress to be sufficiently severe where it resulted in "severe psychosomatic symptoms, suicidal ideation, a marked degradation in physical appearance, or post-traumatic stress disorder," id. (citing cases), or "psychiatric problems, ... debilitating headaches, ... [and] suicidal, reactive depression," Munoz, 926 F. Supp. at 613 (citing cases).

2. Discussion.

Defendants argue that Thames' IIED claim must fail because courts have routinely found in favor of employers whose conduct was substantially worse than what Thames alleges took place here. (Docket Entry 25, at 24–27 (citing cases).) As such, Defendants argue, Thames can produce no evidence that their conduct rose to the level of "extreme and outrageous." (Id.) In response, Plaintiffs point to the discrepancies between what Wells Fargo's investigator reported and Thames' testimony as to what she told him. (Docket Entry 34, at 24 ("Thames told the ... investigator that she had completed the task, ... yet the investigator put in his notes that she said she was 'not sure.' ").) Aside from that, the only evidence Plaintiffs produced to substantiate Thames' assertion that her termination was extreme and outrageous is the fact of her termination itself. But "the fact of discharge itself as a matter of law cannot constitute outrageous behavior." Munoz, 926 F. Supp. at 612; Wornick; 856 S.W.2d at 735.

Even if it were true, as Plaintiffs insist, that Defendants terminated Thames' employment as part of a scheme to terminate Gaona's employment, her termination is not thereby elevated to the level of extreme and outrageous for purposes of IIED. See Brewerton, 997 S.W.2d 215 ("[T]hat an action is intentional, malicious, or even criminal does not, standing alone, mean that it is extreme or outrageous for purposes of [IIED]."). Plaintiffs have failed to produce evidence to raise a genuine dispute that Defendants acted "beyond all possible bounds of decency," by firing Thames —an at-will employee. Sears, 84 S.W.3d at 610; see Wornick; 856 S.W.2d at 735 ("In exercising its rights as an employer-at-will, ... [defendant's] conduct as a matter of law did not exceed all possible bounds of decency and was not utterly intolerable in a civilized community.") (citations and internal quotation marks omitted).

Plaintiffs have also failed to produce any evidence that Defendants intended Thames' emotional distress or that said distress was sufficiently severe to support an IIED claim. As to intent, Plaintiffs do no more than assert in their response that Thames "believes [Defendants] intended her distress by including her in the scheme to terminate Gaona." (Docket Entry 34, at 24.) To support this claimed belief, Plaintiffs cited to portions of Thames' deposition; however, they failed to attach these portions as evidence to their response. Even if they had, "[a] plaintiff's subjective inference, without proof from which an inference might be drawn, is not enough to survive summary judgment." Corbin v. Sw. Airlines, Inc., No. CV H-17-2813, 2018 WL 4901155, at *13 (S.D. Tex. Oct. 9, 2018) (Rosenthal, J.) (citation omitted).

Most fatal to the intent element of Thames' IIED claim is Plaintiffs' assertion that her termination "[w]as part of a scheme to fabricate a pretext for terminating Gaona's employment." (Docket Entry 1-1, at 7.) Plaintiffs have consistently characterized Thames' termination as a mere means by which Defendants could accomplish their ultimate end—firing Gaona. If their primary goal was to terminate Gaona, Defendants could not have intended Thames' emotional distress for purposes of an IIED claim: "a claim for [IIED] will not lie if emotional distress is not the intended or primary consequence of the defendant's conduct." GTE Sw., 998 S.W.2d at 611; see also McManaway, 2015 WL 13679501, at *6 (IIED is not available when emotional distress is "derivative of or incidental to the intended or most likely consequence of the actor's conduct").

10 Even if all these weaknesses could be overcome, Plaintiffs have presented no evidence whatsoever as to the severity of Thames' emotional distress. Plaintiffs assert that Thames suffers from anxiety and depression as a result of her termination, and that she can no longer sleep without the assistance of medication. (Docket Entry 34, at 24.) However, Plaintiffs have produced no evidence to support these assertions. Again, Plaintiffs purported to rely on portions of Thames' deposition but failed to actually attach those portions to their response. (See id.) As the deposition excerpts are not part of the summary judgment record, they need not be considered. FED. R. CIV. P. 56(c)(3). In any event, neither anxiety, depression, nor sleeplessness amount to the sorts of "extraordinarily damaging impact[s]" that are necessary to support an IIED claim. See Amin, 66 F.4th at 574; Munoz, 926 F. Supp. at 613; McCray v. DPC Indus., Inc., 875 F. Supp. 384, 392 (E.D. Tex. 1995) (holding that emotional distress resulting in insomnia "is not severe as a matter of law").

Based on the foregoing, Plaintiffs have failed to raise a genuine dispute as to any of the elements of Thames' IIED claim. Accordingly, Defendants are entitled to summary judgment on that claim and Thames should be dismissed from this case.

V. Conclusion and Recommendation.

For the foregoing reasons, I recommend that Defendants' Motion for Summary Judgment (Docket Entry 25) be GRANTED IN PART and DENIED IN PART. Specifically, I recommend that Defendants' motion be DENIED as to Gaona's USERRA and TXSERRA claims, and GRANTED as to Thames' IIED claim. Because IIED is Thames' only claim, I recommend that she be dismissed from this case.

VI. Notice of Right to Object

The United States District Clerk shall serve a copy of this Report and Recommendation on all parties by either (1) electronic transmittal to all parties represented by attorneys registered as a "filing user" with the Clerk of Court, or (2) by mailing a copy to those not registered by certified mail, return receipt requested. Written objections to this Report and Recommendation must be filed within 14 days after being served with a copy of the same, unless this time period is modified by the District Court. 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1); FED. R. CIV. P. 72(b).

The parties shall file any objections with the Clerk of the Court and serve the objections on all other parties. An objecting party must specifically identify those findings, conclusions, or recommendations to which objections are being made and the basis for such objections; "objections that are frivolous, conclusory, or general in nature needn't be considered." Williams v. Lakeview Loan Serv. LLC, 694 F. Supp. 3d 874, 881 (S.D. Tex. 2023) (citing Battle v. United States Parole Comm'n, 834 F.2d 419, 421 (5th Cir. 1987)).

A party's failure to file written objections to the proposed findings, conclusions, and recommendations contained in this Report and Recommendation shall bar the party from a de novo review by the District Court. Thomas v. Arn, 474 U.S. 140, 149–52 (1985); Acuña v. Brown & Root, Inc., 200 F.3d 335, 340 (5th Cir. 2000). Additionally, failure to file timely written objections to the proposed findings, conclusions, and recommendations contained in this Report and Recommendation shall bar the aggrieved party, except upon grounds of plain error, from attacking on appeal the unobjected-to, proposed findings and conclusions accepted by the district court. Douglass v. United Servs. Auto. Ass'n, 79 F.3d 1415, 1428–29 (5th Cir. 1996) (en banc).

All Citations

Slip Copy, 2025 WL 699353

Footnotes

1 While Defendants attack the adequacy of evidence produced to support the USERRA and IIED claims, they make no mention of the TXSERRA claim. Nor is this claim addressed in Plaintiffs' response (Docket Entry 34) or Defendants' reply (Docket Entry 36).

> TXSERRA provides that:
>
> [A] service member of the Texas military forces who is ordered to state active duty or to state training and ... is entitled ... to the same benefits and protections provided to persons ... performing services in the uniformed services as provided by [USERRA] ... may retain private legal counsel and ... file a civil action in a district court in this state if the service member is aggrieved by a violation of or is denied a benefit or protection guaranteed under ... [USERRA].

TEX. GOV. CODE § 437.2131(a)–(b). Although the undersigned had found no cases interpreting TXSERRA the language of § 473.2131 would suggest that Defendants cannot prevail on Gaona's TXSERRA claim unless they also prevail on his USERRA claim. As discussed infra, summary judgment should be denied as to Gaona's USERRA claim. Accordingly, even assuming that Defendants' motion has requested summary judgment on the TXSERRA claim, the Court should deny the request.

2 See, e.g., Vega-Colon v. Wyeth Pharm., 625 F.3d 22, 29 (1st Cir. 2010) ("[T]hough the proximity in time between ... [plaintiff's military] leave and ... [the adverse employment action] is a factor for consideration, it alone is not sufficient."); Herrera v. City of Hialeah, Fla., No. 21-14271, 2023 WL 238999, at *5 (11th Cir. Jan. 18, 2023) ("[S]how[ing] a temporal proximity between the [adverse employment action] ... and [the plaintiff's] military service ... would not automatically meet [the plaintiff's] prima facie burden").

End of Document

© 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

CASE NO. 25

2025 WL 696546
Only the Westlaw citation
is currently available.
United States District Court, W.D.
Texas, San Antonio Division.

Michael GAONA, and Aleshea Chanel Thames, Plaintiffs,
v.
WELLS FARGO BANK, and Timothy Wells, Defendants.

CIVIL ACTION NO. SA-23-CA-00280-FB
|
Signed March 4, 2025

Attorneys and Law Firms

Paul G. Vick, Law Offices of Paul G. Vick, San Antonio, TX, for Plaintiffs.

Collin K. Brodrick, Fisher & Phillips LLP, Dallas, TX, Jacqueline Del Villar, Brian D. Guerinot, Stephen J. Roppolo, Fisher & Phillips L.L.P., Houston, TX, for Defendant Wells Fargo Bank.

Jacqueline Del Villar, Brian D. Guerinot, Stephen J. Roppolo, Fisher & Phillips L.L.P., Houston, TX, for Defendant Timothy Wells.

ORDER ACCEPTING REPORT AND RECOMMENDATION OF UNITED STATES MAGISTRATE JUDGE

FRED BIERY, UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE

1 Before the Court is the Report and Recommendation of United States Magistrate Judge (docket no. 37), filed in the above captioned cause on February 13, 2025. This Report and Recommendation concerns Defendants' Motion for Summary Judgment and Brief in Support. (Docket no. 25). To date, no objections to the Report and Recommendation have been received. [1]

Plaintiffs Michael Gaona and Aleshea Chanel Thames assert three claims in total against Defendants Wells Fargo Bank and Timothy Wells. (Docket no. 1-1). Two pertain to Plaintiff Gaona and one as to Plaintiff Thames. (Id. at 5-7). As to Plaintiff Gaona, Plaintiffs claim that his termination constituted discrimination on the basis of his Texas Army National Guard ("TANG") based leaves of absences, in violation of the Uniformed Services Employment and Reemployment Rights Act ("USERRA"), 38 U.S.C. § 4311(a), and its state-law equivalent in the Texas Government Code ("TXSERRA"), Tex. Gov. Code Ann. § 437.2131. (Id. at 5-6). As to Plaintiff Thames, Plaintiffs claim intentional infliction of emotional distress ("IIED"), alleging that her termination was "part of a scheme to fabricate a pretext for terminating Gaona's employment on the basis of [his] service in the TANG." (Id. at 7).

Because no party has objected to the Magistrate Judge's Report and Recommendation, the Court need not conduct a de novo review. See 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1) ("A judge of the court shall make a de novo determination of those portions of the report or specified proposed findings and recommendations to which objection is made."). The Court has reviewed the Report and Recommendation and finds its reasoning to be neither clearly erroneous nor contrary to law.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

United States v. Wilson, 864 F.2d 1219, 1221 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 492 U.S. 918 (1989).

IT IS THEREFORE ORDERED that the Report and Recommendation of United States Magistrate Judge (docket no. 37) is ACCEPTED pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1) such that Defendants' Motion for Summary Judgment (docket no. 25) is GRANTED IN PART and DENIED IN PART. Specifically, Defendants' motion is DENIED as to Plaintiff Gaona's USERRA and TXSERRA claims, and GRANTED as to Plaintiff Thames' IIED claim. Because IIED is Plaintiff Thames' only claim, she is DISMISSED from this case. This case continues to be referred to the Magistrate Judge for further proceedings.

It is so ORDERED.

All Citations

Slip Copy, 2025 WL 696546

Footnotes

1 Any party who desires to object to a Magistrate's findings and recommendations must serve and file his, her or its written objections within fourteen days after being served with a copy of the findings and recommendation. 28 U.S.C. § 635(b)(1). If service upon a party is made by mailing a copy to the party's last known address, "service is complete upon mailing." FED. R. CIV. P. 5(b)(2)(C). If service is by electronic means, "service is complete upon transmission." Id. at (E).

End of Document

© 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

CASE NO. 26

810 Fed.Appx. 237
This case was not selected for publication in West's Federal Reporter. See Fed. Rule of Appellate Procedure 32.1 generally governing citation of judicial decisions issued on or after Jan. 1, 2007. See also U.S.Ct. of App. 5th Cir. Rules 28.7 and 47.5.
United States Court of Appeals, Fifth Circuit.

UNITED STATES of America, EX REL., Gwendolyn PORTER, Relator, Plaintiff - Appellant
v.
MAGNOLIA HEALTH PLAN, INCORPORATED, Defendant - Appellee

No. 18-60746
|
FILED April 15, 2020

Synopsis

Background: Licensed registered nurse (RN) brought qui tam False Claims Act (FCA) action alleging that her former employer, a coordinated care organization that contracted with Mississippi Division of Medicaid, committed fraud by employing licensed practical nurses (LPN) as care and case managers. The United States District Court for the Southern District of Mississippi, Halil Suleyman Ozerden, J., 2018 WL 9866507, dismissed. Nurse appealed.

Holdings: The Court of Appeals held that:

[1] nurse failed to adequately plead materiality requirement for FCA action, and

[2] nurse's request to amend complaint was futile.

Affirmed.

Procedural Posture(s): On Appeal; Motion to Dismiss for Failure to State a Claim; Motion to Amend the Complaint.

West Headnotes (2)

[1] United States 🔑 Materiality

Plaintiff failed to adequately plead materiality requirement for qui tam False Claims Act (FCA) action involving alleged fraud in administration of Medicaid services in Mississippi via defendant's use of licensed practical nurses (LPN) rather than registered nurses (RN) to provide case or care services in defendant's role as coordinated care organization, where complaint failed to identify a specific contractual provision requiring that a case manager or care manager position be staffed by an RN, complaint failed to identify any specific federal or state statute or regulation mandating that an RN provide those services, and complaint failed to otherwise establish that the staffing of case manager or care manager positions was a material term of contracts. 31 U.S.C.A. § 3729(a)(1)(A, B); Social Security Act § 1900, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1396 et seq.

 © 2025 Thomson Reuters. No claim to original U.S. Government Works.

14 Cases that cite this headnote

[2] Federal Civil Procedure Form and sufficiency of amendment; futility

Plaintiff's request to amend complaint was futile, and therefore leave to amend would not be granted in qui tam False Claims Act action involving alleged fraud in administration of Medicaid services in Mississippi via defendant's use of licensed practical nurses (LPN) rather than registered nurses (RN) to provide case or care services in defendant's role as coordinated care organization, where contracts in question did not require that case or care services be performed by an RN, and Mississippi Medicaid program continued paying and contracting with defendant after plaintiff reported defendant's staffing practices and filed complaint. 31 U.S.C.A. § 3729(a)(1)(A, B); Social Security Act § 1900, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1396 et seq.

5 Cases that cite this headnote
More cases on this issue

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Southern District of Mississippi, USDC No. 1:16-CV-75

Attorneys and Law Firms

Clinton William Walker, III, Greenville, MS, Timothy Dylan Moore, Attorney, Moore & Ogletree, P.L.L.C., Jackson, MS, Derrick Terrell Simmons, Simmons & Simmons, P.L.L.C., Greenville, MS, for Plaintiff - Appellant

John Burley Howell, III, Jackson & Arrington, P.L.L.C., Hattiesburg, MS, Hugh Ruston Comley, Timothy Lee Sensing, Esq., Watkins & Eager, P.L.L.C., Jackson, MS, for Defendant - Appellee

Before SOUTHWICK, GRAVES, and ENGELHARDT, Circuit Judges.

Opinion

JAMES E. GRAVES, Jr., Circuit Judge: *

238 This is a qui tam False Claims Act suit involving the administration of Medicaid services in Mississippi. The relator alleges that her former employer, which contracts with the Mississippi Division of Medicaid, is violating the False Claims Act by using licensed professional nurses for tasks that require the expertise of registered nurses. The federal government declined to intervene, and the district court dismissed the suit with prejudice. We affirm.

I. BACKGROUND

Medicaid is a "joint state–federal program in which healthcare providers serve poor or disabled patients and submit claims for government reimbursement." Universal Health Servs., Inc. v. United States ex rel. Escobar, ___ U.S. ___, 136 S.Ct. 1989, 1996–97, 195 L.Ed.2d 348 (2016) (citing 42 U.S.C. § 1396 et seq.). The Mississippi Division of Medicaid contracts with third parties to co-administer the state's Medicaid program through a program commonly known as MississippiCAN. Companies that contract with MississippiCAN are known as Coordinated Care Organizations ("CCOs"). CCOs provide a "comprehensive package" of services including, "at a minimum, the current Mississippi Medicaid benefits which must be medically necessary." They operate call centers, process claims, and contract with health service providers for the provision of covered services. CCOs are expected to provide "care management"[1] services. During the time period at issue, Magnolia Health Plan, Inc. ("Magnolia" or "Defendant") operated as a CCO pursuant to several consecutive contracts.[2]

